House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Wednesday, January 31, 1923

SECOND SESSION, FOURTEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the 31st day of January, 1923, met this day at Ottawa for the despatch of business.

The House met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUR OF MEETING

CHANGE IN THE RULE SUGGESTED BY Mr. SPEAKER

Mr. SPEAKER: Under rule 2 the House should have met at 2 o'clock to-day; but as the letter received from the Governor General stated that His Excellency would proceed to open parliament at 3 o'clock, I have come to the conclusion that there would be less inconvenience for everyone concerned if I applied the spirit rather than the letter of the law. I have no doubt that it was the government's intention that the House should meet at 3 o'clock to-day. The rule says that the time for the ordinary meeting on Wednesday should be at 2 o'clock. It may be that opening day is not an ordinary meeting day. At any rate I am satisfied to put such a construction on the rule under the present circumstances. The question came up in 1918 when the House met at 11 o'clock on Monday, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier then made the following remark:

> We meet under conditions of some peculiar novelty. We do not meet under the rules of the House because those rules say that this House shall meet at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. We do not meet under the proclamation of His Excellency the Governor-General, because the Governor-General, while fixing the date of the meeting of Parliament, did not fix the hour. Of course, parliament, though elected by the people, has to be called by the Governor-General. It is within His Excellency's privilege to summon it at any time he pleases, and to fix the hour also. It has pleased him to call parliament for the 18th March, but he has not fixed the hour. He might have said that we should meet at 11 o'clock of the morning or at the same hour in the evening, and we would have to obey his command. I think, therefore, that under such circumstances the House is irregularly called.

The Governor General's proclamation does not state at what hour parliament is to meet. Since the House is to meet to-day, it has to do so in accordance with its rules which state that on Wednesday it should meet at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

As Speaker it is my duty to see that the rules which the House has adopted for its proceedings be observed. I do not think they should be infringed upon, and I would suggest that rule 2 be amended so that the government be given a free hand to open parliament at any time it may deem it advisable in the future.

Mr. SPEAKER read a communication from Mr. A. F. Sladen, Governor General's Secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And the House being returned to the Commons chamber:

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that during the recess I received communications from several members notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz:

Of Marie Joseph Demers, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. Johns and Iberville, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

Of Hon. William Costello Kennedy, member for the electoral district of the North Riding of Essex, by decease.

I accordingly issued my warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts respectively.

I have also the honour to inform the House that I received a communication from the Chief Electoral Officer, informing me that in accordance with Chapter 11, Section 10, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, he had received communications from several members notifying him of the following vacancies having occurred in the representation, namely:

Of David Arthur Lafortune, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Jacques Cartier, by decease.

Of Lucien Turcotte Pacaud, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Megantic, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

Of Edward Blackadder, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Halifax, by decease.

Of Onesiphore Turgeon, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Gloucester, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

And that the Chief Electoral Officer had accordingly issued new writs of election for the said electoral districts respectively.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I am glad to welcome you to a return to your parliamentary duties. In the interval which has elapsed since the last session, I have had the pleasure of extending my travels throughout Western Canada and as far as the Territory of the Yukon. The cordial hospitality everywhere enjoyed by Her Excellency and myself will be long remembered.

It is gratifying to note that in a period of world-wide trade depression following the Great War, Canada has made substantial progress towards recovery.

The increase in the volume of trade, the diminution of unemployment as compared with last winter, and the restoration of our currency to a position of equality with that of the neighbouring Republic, are indications of the improved situation. The economic condition in European countries makes for embarrassment the world over. A much better situation in Europe will be necessary before we can expect a complete restoration of confidence in business affairs here. In the meantime, the Dominion has much reason for satisfaction with the improvement that has taken place, and with the many evidences of a returning prosperity.

The desirability of obtaining the best available terms for the admission of our products in foreign markets has engaged the attention of the Ministry.

Conventions have been made to govern trade relations between France and Canada and between Italy and Canada. These Conventions will be submitted for your approval.

Since last session, acting under a Statute of 1919, with amendments thereto, an Order in Council has been passed appointing a Board of Directors to be known as The Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway Company, having under its control and operation the various lines which go to make up the system, and also the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. The various units of the system are being consolidated as rapidly as possible. This, it is expected, will increase the efficiency and decrease the cost of operation.

It having been represented that an amalgamation of interests of shipping companies and vessel owners upon the Great Lakes has operated to control freight rates and insurance upon grain shipments in a manner which has deprived agriculturists of much of the benefit to which they were entitled, as well as led to discrimination against Canadian ports and harbours, a Royal Commission has been appointed to investigate and report upon this alleged combine.

A bill will be submitted to you to safeguard the interests of consumers and producers from undue enhancement of prices or unfair restriction of trade by combines, monopolies, trusts, or mergers.

As a consequence of an agreement entered into between the Government of Great Britain and members of the Canadian Government, the law with respect to the landing of imported animals in Great Britain has been amended by the British Parliament. The removal thereby effected of the embargo on Canadian cattle entering the United Kingdom is a source of general satisfaction. It has materially improved the outlook as regards live stock, and should lead to the re-establishment of a profitable trade with Great Britain.

The adverse conditions with which agriculture generally is confronted in many parts of Canada, despite the abundant crops of the past year, render it desirable that a special committee, with powers to make recommendations, be appointed to look into various agricultural matters such as the mixing of grain in private terminal elevators, the marketing of farm products, the development of the live stock industry, and the possibilities of further diversification in our Canadian agriculture.

The matter of securing an increasing flow of desirable settlers to develop the large areas still available for cultivation in Canada has had the serious consideration of my advisers. Additional advertising and general publicity campaigns have been launched in Great Britain and in the United States and, as opportunity offers, will be extended to other lands from which a suitable class of settlers may be attracted. In other particulars, the activities of the Department of Immigration and Colonization are being expanded.

The time for the usual decennial revision of the Bank Act having arrived, a measure for that purpose will be laid before you.

Having regard to the recent decennial census, a readjustment of the representation of the Provinces in the House of Commons, as required by the British North America Act, is also due. A Bill will be introduced for that purpose.

In pursuance of the announcement made in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of last Session a Postal Conference with the United States was held at Ottawa in the month of December last. The results of the Conference were embodied in a new Postal Convention which has been in force since January 1st. It is a pleasure to record that arrangements were made not only for extending and improving the international postal service, but also for the conveyance through the United States of parcel mail from Canada to all South American countries.

The Government of France has graciously offered to the Canadian Government a tract of land of 250 acres on Vimy Ridge, at the site selected for the erection by Canada of a monument commemorating the exploits of Canadian troops in the Great War. This gift has been gratefully accepted, and a bill approving the agreement has been duly introduced in the French Parliament. An appropriate resolution expressing Canada's appreciation of the action of the French Government will be offered for your acceptance.

During the course of the session your attention will be invited to other agreements of an international character and significance, and to other matters requiring legislation.

Members of the House of Commons:

The Public Accounts for the last fiscal year, and the Estimates for the coming year, will be submitted at an early date. A strict economy in all public expenditures continues to be a necessity of the existing financial situation.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

Since you last assembled, Canada has harvested the largest wheat crop in its history, and an abundance of other kinds of grain and fruits. May the Divine Providence which has vouchsafed this basis of our material prosperity guide and bless all your deliberations.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that during the recess the Clerk of the House received from the Chief Electoral Officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz:

Of Alderic Joseph Benoit, Esquire, for the electoral district of St. Johns and Iberville.

Of Eusébe Roberge, Esquire, for the electoral district of Megantic.

Of Joseph T. Rhéaume, Esquire, for the electoral district of Jacques Cartier.

Of John G. Robichaud, Esquire, for the electoral district of Gloucester.

Of Richard Franklin Preston, Esquire, for the electoral district of Lanark.

Of Robert Emmett Finn, Esquire, for the electoral district of Halifax.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Alderic Joseph Benoit, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. Johns and Iberville, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Sir Lomer Gouin.

Eusèbe Roberge, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Megantic, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. H. S. Béland.

John G. Robichaud, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Gloucester, introduced by Hon. A. B. Copp and Pius Michaud, Esquire.

M. Joseph Théodule Rhéaume, député de la circonscription électorale de Jacques-Cartier, est présenté par Sir Lomer Gouin et l'hon. Ernest Lapointe.

Robert Emmett Finn, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Halifax, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Richard Franklin Preston, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Lanark, introduced by Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and Hon. Sir Henry Drayton.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office, introduced and read the first time.—Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King.

REPORTS

Report of the Chief Electoral Officer in conformity with the Dominion Elections Act. —Mr. Speaker.

Joint Report of the Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms, with my approval, has appointed Louis Charles Panet, Esquire, to be his deputy during the present session of Parliament.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the Speech of His Excellency, the Governor General, to both Houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Thurday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except the introduction of bills until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this House under rule 10, said committee to be composed of Messieurs Béland, Copp, Low, Kyte, Papineau, Tolmie, Boys, Johnston (Last Mountain) and Halbert, and that that portion of rule 10 limiting the number of members of the said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved Minute of Council appointing the Honourable H. S. Béland, Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, the Honourable

J. A. Robb, Minister of Trade and Commerce; the Honourable T. A. Low, Minister without Portfolio; and the Honourable John E. Sinclair, Minister without Portfolio, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the Eleventh Chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, intituled "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

DECEASED MEMBERS

TRIBUTES PAID BY RIGHT HON. MESSIEURS MACKENZIE KING AND MEIGHEN, AND FORKE.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since last we assembled, some of our members have visited distant lands, have crossed continents and oceans, and, in the providence of God, have safely returned, or are returning, to resume their legislative duties. Four of our number have made "upon a vaster sea the unreturning voyage."

It is fitting that before proceeding with the business which parliament has been summoned to transact, we should pause for a moment, to give some expression to the sorrow which at this time we feel in our hearts; and to pay some tribute, however slight, to the memory of those who, in the brief interval which has elapsed since our previous session, have been taken from our midst.

As I have already mentioned, no less than four honourable members, each enjoying in special measure the regard and esteem of this House, have been removed by the Hand of Death; three of them in the month of October, and the fourth but a fortnight ago. Both sides of the House have been bereaved. Each has sustained a loss which is deeply felt in this parliament and throughout the country. We on your right, Mr. Speaker, have suffered most; no less than three of the four who are gone having been loyal and devoted supporters of the government, and one of them a member of it.

The first on this side to be taken was Mr. David Lafortune, K.C., at the time member for Jacques Cartier. Who is there, who has been in parliament during the twelve years Mr. Lafortune was a member of the Commons, will not deeply deplore the fact that he is no longer with us?

Mr. Lafortune was active in politics for many years. He was first returned to parliament in a by-election in 1909, was re-elected in 1911, and again in 1917 and 1921.

At two previous general elections he 4 p.m. had also been the Liberal candidate.

For some thirty years he practised law in the city of Montreal, and attained in his province a distinguished position as a member of the legal profession. Few members shared a more intimate knowledge of the lives and needs of their constituents or enjoyed more completely their confidence. His early life had acquainted him with the hardships and struggles of those in humble circumstances, and his energies in public life were directed in the main toward an improvement of industrial and social conditions.

Mr. Lafortune possessed rare gifts as a public speaker and as an advocate. Both at the bar and in parliament his talents were employed with zeal and effectiveness in the cause of the people. His fluency and ready wit, on more than one occasion, lent not a little merriment to the proceedings of this House. They were a part of a generous and kindly disposition which made him hosts of friends, left him without an enemy, and endeared him to to all who knew him well.

Dr. Edward Blackadder, one of the honourable members for Halifax, died within three days after Mr. Lafortune. He, too, had taken an active part in politics for a number of years, though he was returned to parliament only at the last general election. He was one of the Liberal candidates in 1911, and was again nominated as a Liberal candidate in 1917, withdrawing subsequently when it was decided to avoid an election in the constituency because of the Halifax disaster of that year.

It was apparent to us all that Dr. Blackadder was in failing health. The news of his death was not therefore, wholly unexpected, though it brought with it a sense of real loss to our public life. We all recall, as one of the most touching incidents of the last session of parliament, the fidelity with which, despite his all too evident infirmity, he attended the several sittings of this House, and sought to further to the utmost of his strength and opportunity the interests of his constituents.

The most modest of men, Dr. Blackadder was also one of the most cultured. He possessed a wide range of knowledge and experience and rare literary gifts. These he used with zeal in the advocacy of Liberal principles and ideals. Few men, in a brief career, have enjoyed activities as important and manysided. He was a practising physician, a journalist, a university professor and a member of parliament. His time and his talents were employed in the most unselfish manner in the service of his fellowmen, and in upholding a high standard in matters of public concern. At all times unassuming, well-informed, intensely earnest and sincere, he was a type of citizen this parliament and our country can ill afford to lose.

The last to be taken from this side of the House was the Honourable Mr. Kennedy, Minister of Railways and Canals. Mr. Kennedy's death is so recent, and has come so near to all of us who were his colleagues in the government, that it is not possible to speak of the loss it has occasioned without emotion. That he is no longer with us is due, beyond all question, to the fidelity and tenacity with which, at great risk to his health, and as it has now proved, at the peril of his life, he held to his post of duty at a time when the business of his department demanded close and continuous attention. To his colleagues in the government, and to myself in particular, Mr. Kennedy's death has occasioned profound sorrow.

Mr. Kennedy was elected to parliament as the member for North Essex at the general elections of 1917. He was returned in the general election of 1921. Few men have entered upon public life with more of promise, and even fewer in so short a time have won and merited so great distinction. With early manhood still on his side, his rare organizing genius and business ability had put him in a position of independence, where it was possible for him to place virtually the whole of his time and his talent at the service of the state. His generous nature, social disposition and known integrity combined with his business and political sagacity had gained for him not only hosts of personal friends and the confidence of his fellow townsmen and constituents, but the high regard of his fellow members in parliament and the esteem of the citizens of our country generally. His administration of the affairs of the Department of Railways and Canals revealed a positive genius for the work of government. He seemed to possess the very qualities most needed; untiring energy, undaunted courage, high integrity, sound judgment and vision. All of that is now lost to Canada in whose service he died. In a very true sense his death is a national loss. He was in every way worthy of the many tributes paid his memory from one end of our country to the other.

There is but one thing left to be done by those of us who loved and honoured him, and that is to emulate his courage; to take up our public tasks with renewed vigour and devotion, that the spirit which he exemplified so bravely may be kept alive in our midst.

All that I have said of our friend, the late Mr. Kennedy, might be said with equal truth, and fulness of meaning of the late Honourable James A. Stewart. Indeed, the parallel is so close as to be almost complete throughout.

Mr. Stewart entered the House of Commons as the Member for Lanark in the first session of the last parliament. He was returned at a by-election in May, 1918, and so sat through practically the whole of that parliament. He was again returned at the general elections of 1921, at which time he was holding the portfolio of Minister of Railways and Canals in the government of my right honourable friend, the leader of the opposition. I can sympathize with my right honourable friend, as I am sure he does with me, in the loss of one who was the most loyal of colleagues and truest of friends. I extend to him, and to those who sit around him, the sympathy of all honourable gentlemen on this side of the House, in the loss from their ranks of one whose splendid qualities of heart and mind were appreciated by us all, and who, though opposed to us politically, was genuinely respected and admired.

It may be said of Mr. Stewart as it has been of Mr. Kennedy that without question, the impairment of his health which, amidst the promise of years and fortunate circumstances, brought his life thus early to a close, was furthered by his high sense of public duty, and endeavour conscientiously to discharge his obligations as a representative of the people in parliament and as a minister of the Crown.

There would appear to be something more than chance in the tragic circumstance that these two men, both more or less of a like age, of like characteristics, attainments, and distinction in the business and political world, should have come beneath the roof of the same institution at the same time to wage battle against death, each with the companion of his life, a solitary watcher at his side. For a time it seemed that "one would be taken and the other left." Now they have both passed, "gentlemen unafraid," into the Great Beyond. It may well be that all this has come to teach those of us who are engaged in political controversies a wider tolerance and more of chivalry towards those who differ from us in opinion; and the nation, a larger measure of charity towards its public men!

All four of the honourable members who have been taken from us were alike in this: each loved mercy, each sought to do justly, and each walked humbly with his God. They were alike in yet another particular. Each enjoyed, in all that pertained to his personal and public life, the interest and devotion of a companionship which it was beautiful, and at times touching, to witness, and which it will ever be pleasing to recall. Our sympathy goes out in fullest measure to the ones who have been so greatly bereaved. It will be the unanimous wish of this House that an expression of its sympathy should be conveyed to Mrs. Kennedy, Mrs. Stewart, Madame Lafortune and Mrs. Blackadder, and to those who share their irreparable loss. To you, Mr. Speaker, we are fortunate in being able to look for the discharge of this sad duty on our behalf.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the entire course of my membership of this House, now extending over a goodly number of years, there has never been an occasion before when the opening of parliament was clouded by the recollection of the death of so many members. Between our parting last session and our gathering now, no less than four, as the right honourable Prime Minister has said, have passed from among us. It is true, I think, of all, that, even when we parted at the close of last session, the hand of disease had been laid upon them—a premonitory touch was there, warning them of what might come. Each had been conducting a constant battle with physical infirmity. But nevertheless all were gallantly holding on and were doing a big day's work as each day passed, and all undoubtedly were hopeful that they would gather with us to share our tasks to-day. It is the seeming intrusion of the enemy of life in the season of activity and before the evening comes that makes the writing of the finger of Providence hard to comprehend. When the allotted span has run—a span that for thousands of years has remained almost unchanged, the measure of the tenure of our life on earth—when that span has run the passing of a man seems to fit in with the scheme of things; we submit in sorrow, and we imagine we understand. But when one falls from among us in the very middle of achievement and before the sun has sunk in the heavens, it is then that his journey seems not to be ended, but to be broken, and we fail wholly to understand—we realize that we do not know.

Dr. Blackadder had been a member of this House for only a few months. His family has been for generations a well known and highly respected one in the province of Nova Scotia. His passport to parliament was the same as that which accounts for the entrance of the great body of representatives in all democratic parliaments in the world,—the possession of those acceptable human qualities in which rather than in brilliant attainment, the mass of people put their trust. A wide and generous sympathy with the lot of his fellows, a generous playing of life's game, modesty of manner and earnestness and integrity of character—these were the things that we all observed in Dr. Blackadder, and by these attributes we will remember him long.

Mr. Lafortune was a very extraordinary man He possessed two characteristics in pre-eminent degree—tenacity of purpose and a sunny temperament, warmed and vivified with humour. The course of this life is always a struggle, but in the case of Mr. Lafortune the journey was a very long and very steep one and he travelled it pretty much alone. From a youth and young manhood not blessed with any advantages of education he plodded through to a very considerable professional success. From most modest circumstances he worked on and on into comparative affluence. From obscurity he rose to a position of high public office and to a secure place in public esteem. His passing will not soon be forgotten by the members of this House, because he was the type of man one could not readily forget. He had an individuality that was distinctive, and his unique characteristics came to the surface in everything he set his hand to do.

Hon. W. C. Kennedy's death adds another to the honour roll—now one of considerable length, of Canadian ministers of the Crown who have died in office. For a long time he waged with conspicuous bravery an almost hopeless battle, and in the conduct of it he drew to himself the admiring sympathy of everyone, both friend and foe. The tribute paid to him by his fellow countrymen last week in the city of Windsor where the funeral service was followed by mourning multitudes; the warm, glowing, earnest eulogy of the Prime Minister this afternoon—these testify to the worth of the former Minister of Railways more fittingly and more impressively than I can do. But this I can say with the fullest assurance—no man could have fallen out of the ranks of the foe whose death would seem to us more like the loss of a friend. Mr. Kennedy was a man born to success—success not alone in some specialized form, the attainment of which in these times is a great life's work, but he reached success in every form that answers to the aspirations of a wholesome rounded man. In business he was farsighted and enterprising; he marched right through from humble beginnings to substantial wealth. In social life his very presence seemed to be all that was necessary to make him friends, he won his way just by the warmth of a genial personality. In politics his rise was phenomenally rapid. In domestic life he was singularly happy. And all these successes, in the case of a man of Mr. Kennedy's mould, could be carried without exciting the envy of any one. He seemed to move in a perpetual atmosphere of comradeship and goodwill. His death is a distinct loss to this House, and I can well understand the feelings of the Prime Minister that his place in the councils of the government, as in the hearts of us all, will not soon or readily be filled.

There remains another, a fourth, one who was with us when we parted and who will join us no more in this arena of toil and strife. Hon. John Alexander Stewart, big constructive man of affairs, gallant friend, fearless fighter, clear-headed leader of men—he too has gone from us. The career of Mr. Stewart was one that warms the heart of youth. Not so much is that due to the high station that he ultimately reached, it is due more to the length of the journey, to the perilous path he travelled, to the cliffs surmounted, to the pluck and spirit he displayed. To these things are due the grip such a career has on the imagination of the young, and the fact that it fires the ambitions and commands the emulation of others. There could scarcely be imagined an obstacle calculated to prey on human vitality and throw a shadow over the path of a forward-looking mind which Mr. Stewart did not have to encounter. He was blessed by inheritance with little, if anything at all, of a material nature; but he did inherit a sound intellect and a will of iron. Early in his life he was attacked by one of the worst of maladies, and for three decades he waged a constant war against the dreadest of disease. There is nothing so haunts and depresses the spirit as an exhausting conflict with an unshakeable physical affliction. "The weariness, the fever and the fret" have robbed this world of some of the best of human treasures. Against such a handicap Mr. Stewart waged the struggle of life; but rarely did he reveal the spectre, the spectre that never left him, even to his closest friends.

> Yield not thy neck
> To fortune's yoke, but let thy dauntless mind
> Still ride in triumph over all mischance.

That was the motto he followed through the buffetings and struggles of fifty years.

The personality of the hon. member for Lanark was the mainspring, indeed, it was the creator, of a series of industries that changed the face of the countryside in which he lived. The fruits of his energies were reaped by hundreds of happy people. Indeed, he held the belief—and he made good that belief—that a concentration of will and intellect would win the day in competition with all other assets that so much command the envy and admiration of men. And wherever the hand of his operations went, the strength of his character became recognized, and larger and larger numbers came to rely upon his judgment and his leadership. He was one of the few big men of commerce—how few, only those of long parliamentary life fully realize—whose qualifications for parliament were as ample as their qualifications for business. Entering this House when far past middle life, on toward the half century mark, a member of it for the short space of four years, even then speaking very rarely, he nevertheless marched, and marched with ease, to a recognized place in the forefront of the House of Commons. His firm grasp of facts, his direct, visible march from premise to conclusion, the confidence he always inspired that on everything that counted he knew just where he stood, lucidity of statement that was simply the reflection of lucidity of intellect,—these were the qualities that accounted for his rapid rise in a short parliamentary term. And, indeed, these are all the possessions which in a modern British parliament any man really needs.

The place which Mr. Stewart had reached among the fifty men who comprised His Majesty's opposition was very much the same as that which he attained in the community in which he lived. He was the tried counsellor, the trusted of everyone, the friend of all.

It is, as the Prime Minister has gracefully said, fitting that a word should go to the families of the deceased, expressive of the solicitude of this House. To the widows of the two former Ministers of Railways—two women who shared in a very peculiar way their husbands' fortunes, and shared just as intimately their husbands' cares; two women, as well, who enjoyed in a very marked degree the affectionate regard of hon. members here of all political parties, this House will not fail while honouring their husbands, to extend a tender, a very real, and a very lasting sympathy.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, amidst the pressing duties of life we are sometimes called upon to pause for a moment and to realize that here we have no abiding city. The House has lost four valuable and highly esteemed members through death. I should like to add a few words of tribute to the memory of those departed members, but I shall not speak at any length after the very eloquent and feeling speeches which we have had from the right hon. the Prime Minister and the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). I had not a long acquaintance with any of the deceased, but sitting here day by day, month after month, during the last session of parliament, one could not help forming a fair estimate of the men whose loss we now deplore.

The late Mr. Kennedy, I think, must very easily have impressed all new members as being a man of ability and character, whom it was well to know, a real man in every sense of the word. He undertook a great task and discharged it faithfully and creditably, and I am sure we all keenly regret his death. In Mr. Kennedy's decease the Prime Minister has lost a valuable friend and the government an able counsellor, while the country at large has suffered an equal loss.

In Hon. Mr. Stewart, too, we all recognized a man of ability, one who proved a shining light in this House and whom we could all admire. We know his record, and I am sure we deeply deplore the fact that he will be with us no longer. It did not require very much discernment, nor much knowledge of character, to realize not only that Mr. Stewart was a man of ability, but that also he was of a kindly and genial nature. Surely we all sincerely regret the loss of these two bright lights.

I shall not labour the fine qualities of Dr. Blackadder. Studying him across the floor of the House, I came to admire him. I learnt that he was a highly valued member of his community, and that he had lived a useful life and had done much service for his country. Not only the House, but his constituents as well, will greatly miss him.

Of Mr. Lafortune a great deal might be said. As I sat in this chamber last session I could not help being impressed by the assiduous attention he paid to his duties, as well as by his regular attendance throughout the session. I cannot speak about his past services, not having been acquainted with him, but I am confident he must have been greatly beloved by his constituents. He had lived a long and useful life, and having done his day's work he has been called home and has gone to rest at eventide. With the other two eminent speakers who have referred to these departed gentlemen, I think it is but fitting that some intimation should be given to the bereaved, as has been done this afternoon, of the esteem in which those who have gone were held in this House, and whose presence we shall greatly miss.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 4.45 p.m.

TREATIES WITH FRANCE AND ITALY

On the Orders of the Day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Can the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) inform me whether he intends this week or next week laying on the Table of the House the treaty with France and the treaty with Italy?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING: (Minister of Finance): I expect on Monday next to bring down the treaty with France. We may have to wait a day or two for authority to place the Italian treaty on the Table, but that matter is under negotiation.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. HAROLD PUTNAM, SECONDED BY MR. JOSEPH T. RHEAUME

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester) moved:

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, offering the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, postponing just for a moment whatever else I may choose to say in respect of this motion in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I desire to refer to the very first paragraph of the Speech, wherein His Excellency graciously informs this House of the pleasure derived by Their Excellencies from their recent visit to the Canadian West and also far to the Canadian North. The proverbial hospitality of our fellow citizens in that part of Canada would doubtless be extended with particular zest to visitors so very distinguished and at the same time so democratic in habit and sympathy. No member of this House who has enjoyed—and I think all have—that personal touch with His Excellency will doubt the sincerity of the wish of His Excellency for the welfare, not only of Canada in general, but of every constituency in our far-flung Dominion. In that spirit, in that light, we interpret his recent trip to the West. This House is pleased that Their Excellencies accomplished that long journey evidently with no undue discomfort, but under conditions which made the visit the very reverse. If and when Their Excellencies visit eastern Canada, I am sure the people there will be only too proud, will find it an unbounded pleasure, to try to emulate the hospitality of the West. We cannot show them there mountains as high, or valleys as deep, or plains as wide, as those which obtain in the West; but we have a type of natural scenery, the varied beauty of which will stand, like the word of Caesar, "against the world".

We members of this House who were present yesterday heard from our three respective leaders very touching and appropriate references to four parliamentary comrades who have departed. Time, the great healer, has had, as yet, the least opportunity to perform his kindly office in the case of the Hon. Mr. Kennedy, late Minister of Railways in the present administration. Even after this House was summoned, he received that other summons which supersedes every human plan, every human mandate with which it may come into conflict. The words concerning the virtues of our departed friends were so well and fittingly spoken yesterday that in saying more I am in danger of adding imperfection to that which was said so perfectly. But I did have the pleasure of knowing, in varying degree of intimacy, those four friends, and I am at least able to say of them all, that each had a heart like the heart of a tender child, but a character as firm as a rock. After all, the shock was tempered somewhat in each case, by the circumstance which was pointed out by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) yesterday, namely, that though they were with us as recently as last session, hoping to return to the duties of this, there was a premonitory hand visible upon them. Frequently the angel of death beckons away from their activities and from their ambitions those who are in the prime of years and in the pride of their strength. In the case of all these four friends the visitation was a release from a wavering body, "a worn-out fetter which the soul had broken and thrown away."

Mr. Speaker, it is entirely to my constituency that I ascribe the honour which is involved in the very kindly request of my political superiors that I should move this afternoon this reply to the Speech from the Throne. I would disclaim even any partial application of that honour to myself personally. Indeed, I would invoke my own obscurity in the discussions of this House as proof that the favour was for my constituency, and from what I have heard since the bestowal of this honour, I am amply authorized to say, as representing people of all political affiliations in my constituency, that that constituency appreciates the honour.

I should like,—but I know the sense of proportion will forbid,—to delineate some of the local characteristics of my constituency. The House, however, will allow me to say that, in geographical situation, in point of importance, it is easily one of the pivotal counties of the Maritime provinces. I should like to tell of the industry of its virile people, of the importance of its shire town, as an educational and railway centre, of its natural scenery, wherein it has the constant blue waters of the Northumberland strait upon its north, and those wonderfully whimsical tides from the Bay of Fundy on the major part of its south shore. Those tides caress and forsake that south shore every morning and every night. I should like to tell of those Cobequid mountains, standing always as a thing of beauty between those two arms of the sea. I should like to tell of rich and cultivated valleys in my county bejewelled with beautiful farm houses, commingling with stately elm trees for mile upon mile until, were it not that the unfolding panorama were so enchanting, the traveller would protest that he were satiated. But I shall not offend further the sense of proportion by dwelling upon a thing so purely local in regard to the constituency to which I so gladly relate the honour of my place towards this motion today, for a high honour it is, because this recurring motion is always, by common consent of all the parties, and groups in this House, accorded an august and cordial place of priority at the very threshhold of our deliberations. Unfortunately, in the earlier days of colonial and constitutional government, especially in the older provinces of Canada, a Speech or a Message from the British Throne could not be always received in the same cordial spirit. At the head waters of that same Bay of Fundy, there is, in my county, a pretty settlement which furnishes a sad and tragic example of this fact. In those days about 165 years ago, I think, when there were such hopeless enmity and distrust between England and France, that spot was peopled by peaceful French-Acadian farmers, and on one luckless day, without the least premonition of evil, those people received a Speech or a Message from the British Throne, delivered by a military messenger, surrounded by his stern soldiery, a message which embraced the appalling tidings that on the very morrow they must leave their happy homes, they must abandon all the worldly possessions which their years of toil had garnered, they must contribute their quota, to the last man and woman and child, in that historic, that tragic expulsion of the French-Acadians from my own fair province of Nova Scotia. My gratefulness rises to the very gates of Heaven that since that day the mercy of England has grown even more rapidly than her material might; that though her arm is strong to smite it is equally strong to save; and that it is unthinkable that she should ever again treat a conquered people so, or resort to any such nightmare of Frightfulness. Between that day and this, in the old provinces of Canada, we had a long and stern fight to achieve the political rights which we to-day enjoy. In our Maritime provinces, fortunately, by circumstances, responsible government itself was attained without the shedding of blood. In the older areas formerly known as Upper and Lower Canada, that unfortunately was not entirely the case. But we shall waste no words in doubtful blame of those who found themselves in the thickest of that fight. Rather, we shall be profoundly thankful that the rugged road to the goal of responsible government was marked by such very few stains of blood.

And right in that connection, may I make bold to offer one word of appeal to our good friends who represent the western provinces in this House. We hear rumours, in fact more than rumours, that sooner or later there must be accountings between the East and the West; that there must be, for example, an authoritative deliverance as to who owns the great revenues of the national resources of the West; while there may be arguments and contentions as to how much of eastern money went to build the western railroads. Mr. Speaker, in one sense these are matters of pure dollars; and let me eliminate every possibility of misunderstanding by telling my friends from the West that I fully credit them with just as sincere a desire as the best-intentioned patriot of the East to have in this Dominion a real union of the peoples of all the provinces. I can say that much with all the more sincerity by reason of the fact that the majority of my own relatives have long lived on those prairies, which sometimes have smiled and sometimes have been bitterly unresponsive to their labours. But when we approach these accountings and try to balance this unique ledger, I ask our friends from the West to remember that the boon of responsible government as a spiritual heritage for all Canada is something in the battle for which the eastern provinces alone bore the brunt, the tedium, the delay, the expense, and, here and there the bloodshed. Let our friends, as I think they will, give due credit for that asset which was won by the East.

During our recess, Mr. Speaker, an event of national importance—because of his recognized place, and that of his party, in this House—has been the resignation from the Progressive leadership of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), whose absence to-day I regret. We are glad, every member in this House, that that resignation has not carried down with it the resignation by the hon. member of his seat in this chamber. Allow me to say that a leader more devoted to an honest cause, or abler in debate, or more courteous toward every member of the House, or better equipped with the saving grace of common sense to handle routine or to grapple with emergency, it would be difficult indeed to discover. May I congratulate—and I think I do so safely on behalf of the whole House—the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) on his promotion. I am sincere in wishing him, as the new leader of the Progressives, the same measure of success as was achieved by his predecessor. I think that the canny quality of the Scotsman is one of his outstanding characteristics, and therefore, he will not expect me to wish him further success than that generous measure. Besides, I doubt whether there is among his followers a single man who is a disciple of the error of pushing a good thing too far.

Glancing at the clock, it seems to me that I have spent more time than I had intended upon what may be called pure preliminaries. But I will set the House at quasi-ease by promising to atone for that by curtailing some at least of the details which I had contemplated in discussing the remaining topics proper in the Speech from the Throne. And in doing so, I may deem it consistent with my duty to omit some of those topics altogether, because I can neither flatter nor upbraid myself that if I now omit anything legitimate for discussion some other hon. gentleman will not observe the omission and supply the discussion much more acceptably, I am sure, than I might hope to do.

There is in the Speech from the Throne a reference to the intention of this government in regard to the battlefields of Europe. I know there will be profound and consecrated approval that something definite is to be done in connection with those historic fields to perpetuate the memory of our unreturning brave. The government of France graciously donates, and the government of Canada gratefully accepts, the gift and the trust of a site for a suitable memorial at Vimy Ridge. Mr. Speaker, your grateful countrymen have followed your personal visit to those spots, and the personal part which you have been good enough to take in that splendid project. We know that your part in this matter involves a drain upon your time and energy; but, Sir, we cannot forbear to hope that you will see that great duty through. None, by sympathy or by artistic temperament, are better qualified, and we know, Sir, that your patriotism is so deep that "giving doth not impoverish." We shall in our hearts be the better able to honour those who on our behalf have surrendered the dear prize of life, when we know that we have done what we could to observe all the outward symbols of honour and to have their last resting places set in proper order.

I am sure the House will join with me in congratulating upon their return in such good health the two distinguished ministers of this government, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe). They have visited Europe upon a mission that was many-sided, and Canada is to be congratulated that she was represented by gentlemen of such outstanding ability and prestige.

There is mention in the speech of better trade relations not only with France but with that friendly nation, Italy. We shall await their own report on this matter, Mr. Speaker; but we are in hopes that we shall have a real extension of our commerce. International trade is very apt to be like Shakespeare's definition of the quality of mercy, in that it is twice blessed; it blesses him that gives and him that takes. In that light, and so far as Canada sets herself to trade with the countries of Europe, she will do her part to relieve that distress which unfortunately now obtains there, because the sane statesmen of the world all agree that to get Europe back into the orbit of normal trade is one of the main hopes for an issue out of her present troubles.

Nothing, Mr. Speaker, can exceed the patriotic patience of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in going thousands of leagues to try to discover avenues of trade when none know more accurately than himself that it violates every standard of logic that we are not trading in an unhampered way with our great neighbour immediately upon the south. The foolish virgins of the parable had themselves to blame when they found that the door was shut against them. But those people —and there are very many in this country, though I will not at present be partisan in this particular to say whether they are in the majority, but I certainly have my own opinion about that,—who desire still that we should have reciprocity with the United States are ready to do full justice to the Finance Minister, as current history is doing him ample justice in that respect while still his vigour is virtually unabated.

It may perhaps be asked sometimes by some: What has this government done during its twelve months of office?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUTNAM: "Hear, hear," say my hon. friends. I am glad to be able to report that, as far as my observation goes, the people are evidently much more judicial than my hon. friends themselves, for they realize to the full the manifold and unique difficulties—particularly the financial problem—which have faced this administration when it came into power. Another way to put the question, and I hesitate not to ask it of the hon. members who said "hear, hear," is: what has this government neglected to do that it might feasibly have done for the national welfare during the past twelve months? The people are disposed—and it is a good thing for democracy, which we on this side so uniformly trust, —to give the government an absolutely fair trial. For my own part I see ample evidence of the old adage that the new broom sweeps clean; and if we take the results of the recent by-elections we do not find any indication that the people regret the verdict they gave about twelve months ago.

One criticism has been levelled against the government from certain quarters—most unfairly I think—in connection with the attitude of the Prime Minister in regard to a message received last fall from Mr. Winston Churchill, then a member of Mr. Lloyd George's cabinet, asking the academic question, whether, in the event of England despatching soldiers to the Near East, Canada would immediately do likewise. I heartily commend, and I feel certain that the country also heartily commends, the answer of the Prime Minister that parliament must first be consulted. Had he done otherwise he would have offended not only what we think is the well-established principle of responsible government, but also the very spirit of the League of Nations. Because the League of Nations, to which Canada is a party, did not make the extravagant promise that of its own volition it could bring about the end of war. One of its cardinal policies is that when war threatens the League shall ask the contending powers to pause, to wait, to ponder, to weigh and discuss the merits and demerits of the question at issue to see if there is not an honourable way out. It would have been the very reverse of that salutary treatment of dangerous international disputes if, without summoning parliament at all, the Prime Minister had committed Canada to war with the haste and through the agency of a mere telegram.

There is naturally mention of the fact that we have a new board of directors of our National Railway System, and that as soon as possible there is to be a complete amalgamation of the Grand Trunk with the other units of the system. Down in Nova Scotia—and it will occasion no bitterness now if I give it as an historic fact—the arms of Confederation were suddenly thrown around us although we had never consented to any such approach, and naturally we felt an intense shock because we are a modest people. Now, this immense increase of government railway ownership from approximately 2,000 miles to 22,000 miles was also wished upon the Maritimes without their consent in any shape or form, and Nova Scotia in particular unanimously pronounced against that action at the very first opportunity. But, Mr. Speaker though the people of my province believe that both those bargains were very bad for them economically, as good and loyal Canadians they are disposed now to make the best of those bad bargains, and consequently they expect to see government railway ownership have a fair trial. Under this new Board, working in conjunction as far as the law and the circumstances will permit with the government, I have faith that our National Railways will get a fair trial under government ownership.

We in the Maritime provinces have waited long for what we believe are our just rights, and in stating this I will not thank any hon. gentleman to tell me that I am trenching upon ground that is sectional. I suppose that in Russia, to proclaim a wrong and seek redress would be considered sectional, and the reformer might be given short shrift before a firing squad; but in Canada to seek redress of a wrong suffered in any quarter must never be considered sectional.

Mr. HANSON: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? I should like to ask him where he stands with reference to the inclusion of the Intercolonial railway in the National Railway system, having regard to his own specific declarations in the Halifax Herald during the autumn of 1921.

Mr. PUTNAM: I beg to inform my hon. friend that I stood precisely where the Minister of Public Works in the last administration, Mr. McCurdy, stood during the election in my county. His election manifesto said: Give us back the Intercolonial Headquarters at Moncton. I have told my hon. friend that on the question of railway amalgamation, just as on the question of Confederation, I do not propose to walk with aimless feet, whatever his own attitude may be. I have told him, and I do not see why now he asks the question, that we propose to make the very best of a bad bargain, just as Joseph Howe did with Confederation.

Mr. HANSON: Thank you.

Mr. PUTNAM: Two statements, Mr. Speaker, made recently by the president of the new Canadian National Railway board, Sir Henry Thornton, have my utmost approval. Speaking at Halifax, he said he had heard during the course of his visit to that part of the country that there was an honourable understanding under which, as a condition of the Maritime provinces entering the confederation, such railway rates would prevail and such railway treatment would be accorded to us as would not interfere with the legitimate flow of trade between those provinces and the more westerly parts of Canada. Sir Henry said—and it is a long time since we have had such a specific promise from so authoritative a source—that in the formulating of his railway policy that contention would be examined upon its merits. For the present, Mr. Speaker, that is all I want; I believe that if the contention is examined into and decided upon its merits, there are better days in store for the people of the Maritime provinces.

Sir Henry Thornton also stated publicly in the city of Moncton that the railway employee need not fear that the wages paid to him in the future would not be sufficient to enable him, without undue worry and anxiety, to support his family and to attain that degree of independence which would be commensurate with his station in life, based upon the ordinary standards of Canadian citizenship. That, Mr. Speaker, gives me comfort, and it gives comfort to thousands of deserving railway men throughout this country. The life of the railway employee is a laborious and a hazardous one, and when he is performing an honest day's work; when by the sweat of his brow he does his part in the building up of our transportation facilities, he should not have to worry about the question whether his wages will be sufficient to maintain in decency and in comfort the little family which God has committed to his care. I say it is a consoling utterance, an utterance which, though made by Sir Henry Thornton soon after his arrival in this country, was overdue to the railway employees of Canada. It should have come sooner, from some one in authority to speak, because the smaller paid railway men have been more than once placed under the threat and the execution of slashes and cuts in their pay, producing a state of doubt whether a bare living would remain for them and their dependents. Deficit or surplus, that must stop. I give this government praise for having restored to their proper status and their proper seniority those employees of the Grand Trunk Railway Company who, for a grievance which they undoubtedly considered just, went on strike away back in 1910. During the course of the last election campaign the Prime Minister promised that, the Grand Trunk railway being under government sponsorship, he would use his influence to have that grievance remedied. I congratulate the Prime Minister and his cabinet upon the vindication of the promise made in that respect. It is an earnest of the fair play which the railway employees may expect in all parts of this country.

There is another order promulgated by Sir Henry Thornton with which I agree; he has rescinded the order of the old board providing that any railway employee who responded to his legitimate ambition or to the desire of his fellow men that he should become a member of a provincial or the federal parliament, would thereby become subject to dismissal. The rescinding of that order was a proper measure of reform. I know there will be academic and technical critics who will say, "Oh, if you are going to extend that principle you will have difficulty; there will be an incongruous condition if other federal officials are not allowed to run for parliament." In all these matters, Mr. Speaker, we must not forget to be practical. The railway men are in constant and close touch with the commercial conditions of the country. If I want to inquire how business is, how trade is, I ask a railway man of my own town and he can tell me. If the railway employees, segregated as they are for the most part in large centres, choose to take advantage of this new order promulgated by Sir Henry Thornton, I am very certain that even this House—looking at the matter from the point of view of ability and public service, will be the gainer.

Mention is made in the Speech of a proposal to examine into an alleged combine in shipping on the Great Lakes. In view of the fact that the Speech suggests that there may be a combine, without dogmatically saying so, it will perhaps be as well to reserve judgment on that point. It is significant, however, that at a time when competition in tonnage was very keen and difficulty was found in getting business of any profitable sort, the fresh water freight rates did multiply themselves two and three times. It is exasperating to our western friends that they should have to put up with that sort of parasite upon the economic body. I can only hope that the probe will be thorough—as I believe it will—and if there are combines and if there can legitimately be brought into force means to punish the grafters, I hope that a mere finding will not be the end of it, but that a salutary punishment will follow. Let us prevent that sort of thing, I care not from what quarter it may come.

It is a matter of such universal approval, Mr. Speaker, that the embargo upon live beef cattle going to England from this country has been removed that I would not be justified in dealing with the matter at any considerable length. I know that strong friends of the farming industry in this country have lived and died despairing that this reform would ever come about. I myself was brought up on a farm and from the earliest days of my youth I heard this question agitated. I know that this House and the country are prepared to extend their thanks to those two illustrious ministers who were in Europe at that time, and who, when this matter was being dealt with, took occasion to be in London. Some may say that their presence had nothing to do with the result; I am not prepared to say dogmatically that it had. But I am prepared to affirm that these ministers took care to be on the job in case they might be able, by offering arguments or submitting data, to turn the balance in this important matter in favour of the Dominion. For our agricultural friends I only hope that the benefits will be as substantial as they anticipate. Of course, it will not mean everything, but at a time when our American friends are seeing fit—temporarily, I do hope—to tighten their tariff restrictions against Canadian agricultural products, the entry of live Canadian cattle into the British market is certainly a step in the right direction.

The Speech from the Throne portends the dawn of a better time. The clouds of economic discouragement have overhung the firmament for a long while, and through long and strenuous years we have watched to try and determine whether the situation was growing darker or more hopeful; but at last we see the dark clouds interlaced with streaks of light that, we believe, herald the morning which will slowly roll them away. Thus far the Canadian people deserve unlimited credit for their patience and their morale in holding the economic line. If we should falter now, if we should fail in the qualities of courage and tenacity and hope which we have hitherto displayed, we should be utterly unworthy of those brave boys, living and dead, who held the trenches when the odds seemed so overwhelmingly against them as might well have caused dismay.

I am gratified to learn, in fact, I have seen evidence of it personally, that there is a diminution in unemployment. That should bring joy not only to the heart of the honest labourer worthy of his hire, but to every humane heart in this country; for what spectacle is more pitiful, what more calculated to tempt us to ask whether our civilization has not failed after all, than that of the honest and needy labourer begging simply for the modest prize of work and finding it not, but going back home each evening to his wife and bairns and reporting that this simple privilege of work is not for him. In the times of stress through which we have passed, years in which the world was reeking and rocking from the earthquake of the great war, labour and capital have been taught a lesson in common, and that lesson is that sometimes both are equally helpless in the face of a combination of difficult circumstances. Out of these stressful times, and because of the severe lesson which they have learned, may there not grow henceforth—God grant that there may—a spirit of mutual forebearance and of sweet reasonableness when labour and capital come together to try and adjust their differences? And may each strive as never before to see and to appreciate the other's viewpoint. In my humble view, legislation will probably never be devised that will permanently establish a satisfactory standard of affairs as between capital and labour. Labour must never think that it may not run into the time when it shall have to walk the streets looking in vain for work; and capital need never presume that it may always be profitably active. May they both profit by the lesson of their helplessness. I hope that for a long time to come labour and capital are going to be more genuinely reasonable in meeting to settle their differences, whatever those differences may be. After all, as the poet of a former century said —and we have in this year of grace to sigh in common with him:

> How small, of all that human hearts endure,
> The part that laws or kings can make or cure!

I am glad to believe, Mr. Speaker, that the rebound is coming for this Canada of ours, and I believe that the rebound which we already feel, despite the depression in Europe, is a measure of the rebound we would have felt had conditions been anything like normal over there.

We have to welcome several new members to the House this session, and amongst them is the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Rhéaume). He shares with myself the honour of speaking to this motion, and I understand that he will second it in his own language. The fact that he has the right to speak in this House in his own mother tongue, and I in mine, however poor my effort may have been, is certainly not a thing to be deplored. I regard it rather as an evidence of that accord which is rooted in liberty. My only regret is, that though my ear may be able to catch some of the music of that language of charm the meaning of whose words and phrases would seem to be graded like the hues of the sunset, my understanding will not be able to follow except, like Peter, afar off, until I shall have seen the English translation. I remember when a very young man reading a speech by Sir John Macdonald, the then great leader of the Conservative party, whose very worthy successor, the present honourable leader of the Opposition, sits opposite me to-day. In beautiful language he pictured this dual liberty of the representatives of the two main partners in Confederation, and I remember those moving words of his: "The solace of the mother tongue, the language learned in lisping tones at a mother's knee."

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and the House for your considerate attention, and regret that I have occupied so much of its time. I do now move that an humble address be presented to His Excellency in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. THEODULE RHEAUME (Jacques Cartier) (Translation): In rising, Mr. Speaker, my thoughts very naturally dwell upon my predecessor in this House, the late lamented David Lafortune, who, as the saying goes, died at his post, in full harness, in that court of justice which was particularly dear to him. His whole life was that of the toiler. In all the accepted sense of the word he was "a self-made man." Through hard work, unbending energy and perseverance he climbed to the highest station of life. A veteran of many a contest, he was able to command, together with the admiration of his friends, the respect and esteem of his opponents. A conscientious member, he faithfully served his fellow-citizens, his party and his country, and I believe myself to be the interpreter of the people of Jacques Cartier and of those who knew him when offering to his memory the homage of heartfelt sorrow and everlasting remembrance.

May I now thank the Prime Minister for the honour which he has bestowed on the county of Jacques Cartier by graciously inviting its representative, elected but yesterday and a new comer in this House, to second in French, according to custom, the motion for an address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

No doubt, all will agree that I should see the justification of this choice in the importance of the riding which has designated me as its representative, a county both industrial and agricultural, synthetizing the economic aspect of the country, where one descries, not far distant from large factories, the finest farms of America.

It is the custom at the opening of parliament, to review briefly the conditions of the country. There was a time when such a survey was easy, when those who were called upon to speak on the Address had but to make a glowing picture of Canada's prosperity, shining proudly amongst nations that knew but abundance; to-day conditions have changed. Nevertheless, even in these years of depression, it seems to me that there is ample reason to cheer up and to have faith when it is seen by unmistakable omens, that Canada, burdened like others by the consequences of the world-wide war, nevertheless maintains its vigour and reveals a more promising future.

Being a young country, it had grounds to fear that its credit might not emerge safely out of this conflict. However, notwithstanding the fabulous amounts spent, the difficulties encountered, the financial steps which it was forced to take requiring heavy sacrifices from all, it did not founder like so many others. On the contrary: it is pleasing to acknowledge that it quickly recovered and, at present, offers to the world the spectacle of stability auguring well for the future. It seems indeed, from an economic point of view, that our position is, day by day, improving. If agriculture and commerce have reasons to complain, sure signs of recovery are given to us by the statistics which give the measure of our various activities. Our foreign trade maintains itself, notwithstanding the obstacles which have arisen through the custom regulations adopted by our neighbours to the south. For the eight months of the year 1922, from April to November, our trade amounted to $1,138,-175,366. If we compare these figures with those of other years we shall find that, for the same period, we have a surplus of $124,-000,000 over 1921. By taking into account the depreciation in values, we can verify that our external trade is very gratifying since the quantities are at least being maintained, when they are not on the increase.

Those who attach some importance to the net balance of trade have learned, no doubt with pleasure, that our exports of Canadian products have increased from $502,152,675 for the eight months of the year 1921, to $621,-705,316 for the eight months of the year 1922, while our imports have but slightly increased, in fact just by a little over $4,000,000, leaving a balance in favour of exports in national products of more than $114,000,000.

This balance in our favour added to the one of our foreign credits, has contributed to restore our exchange which in the end went up to par, after dropping as low as an adverse —19 per cent. We do not positively state that it will maintain that level, nevertheless we are led to believe that this established parity between the American money and ours is to us the indication of a fortunate state of affairs and is reassuring to trade.

If agriculture, particularly, is still suffering from the depreciation in values, at least it rejoices in a crop which no past figure has ever reached and which was transported to outside markets with extraordinary rapidity. These favourable conditions combined with the able administration of the late lamented Minister of Railways were responsible, no doubt, for the progress noticed in our National Railways.

Thanks to the recent initiative taken by the government, we are in hopes that our National Railways will succeed in extricating themselves from the difficulties which they have encountered within the last years.

There is a French proverb which says: "Quand le bâtement va, tout va". It is specially in the building trade that the crisis was felt more acutely. However, of late, we have noticed in this essential industry a marked progress, for instance in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and in other localities. The same progress is noticeable in most of our industries, so that the future may be viewed more serenely.

In order to further secure our prosperity, we must have a larger population which will increase our output and take its share of the burden which we carry. It is not that empty cradles are to be feared in Canada, especially in our good old province of Quebec where it is customary for our spouses to generously respond to our patriotism; however, the immigration contribution is not what we might expect. A remedy must be found. The government has given proof of its solicitude for this all important subject. It will promote a sound agricultural immigration and in the same way endeavour to repatriate our people.

It is not sufficient, Mr. Speaker, to greet a person on his landing in this country, to offer him all the material advantages possible; we must moreover, and I lay stress on this point, create in the new comer a state of mind in harmony with the ideals of the new country which he has adopted and, Sir, such a mission belongs to us all.

In order that a people may exist and attain nationhood, an ideal which can create a national spirit is indispensable. Let us teach our new settlers the noble deeds of our history, whether in past or present times. Let them draw from those pages filled with great accomplishments the determination and will to ever be, before and above all things, a member of the great Canadian family.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, if our economic conditions require that we should increase our population, the conditions which prevail in our industries and regulate our agricultural interests demand equally that our trade policy should find new outlets on foreign markets. In this connection, Sir, the country rejoices in the initiative taken by the government which, returning to its policy of the past, has renewed commercial conventions with France and Italy. Our gratitude is secured to those ministers, to whom the government so confided these missions, the hon. Minister of Finance, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. The government, Mr. Speaker, has endeavoured to establish the wealth of this country upon the basis of a prudent and rational use of our resources. To promote the agricultural interests, protect the consumer, maintain and encourage the industries that we have so patiently established; such is its aim. The people of Canada rely again with confidence on the distinguished leader of the government, a noted statesman and a wise economist and, also on the eminent men with whom he has associated himself, so as to fulfil their hopes, perpetuate these traditions of progress and lead our dear Canada towards the high destinies which await her. I have the honour to second the motion of the hon. member from Colchester (Mr. Putnam).

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion recurring each session, moved to-day by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam), and seconded by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Rhéaume) has received at the hands of both these gentlemen that courteous, brief and moderately non-partisan treatment that does honour, not only to the motion, but to themselves. I heartily congratulate the hon. member for Colchester on having, in a brief space of time, covered in language of precision and of dignity all that could be expected to be referred to on the motion, some things, indeed, on which the Speech from the Throne is silent. I am afraid I did not detect in his utterances any sign of the loosening of those hard Maritime partisan bonds, nor of the intrusion of light into the prejudices of the past; but nevertheless he spoke well and with credit to himself. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier is to be welcomed into this House to-day for the first time. He comes from a historic constituency, one that stands now far to the front of the progressive, prosperous districts of this country. His speech this afternoon indicates that, in point of standing as an orator, he worthily represents the great constituency from which he comes. May my words of welcome extend as well to the other new members of Parliament? In the most of cases, we regret that new members are necessary from those districts; but they will receive at the hands of those of us longer here a courteous and cordial greeting in this House.

We meet now under circumstances new in another regard. One of the great parties of this House has lost its erstwhile leader, he having severed that association with his party that he may devote himself more to other occupations. I shall not comment on any circumstances connected with that severance now. I refer to it only for the purpose of welcoming to the ranks of leadership the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), who has been signally honoured by his fellows in an early elevation to that office. Rarely does the prize of leadership come after so brief an experience in parliament. One session alone has the hon. member for Brandon served; but that session was long enough to enable him to impress most favourably hon. members of this House of all parties. I believe it can be said that his sincerity of belief, as well as his fairness of discussion, made a marked impression upon hon. members generally. I do not know that I look, myself, for any less evidence of Liberal affiliation than I looked for in his predecessor; but I do believe that the hon. member from Brandon approaches all problems from the entire, wide Canadian standpoint. I believe further that his heart is not only truly Canadian, but just as truly British.

Very few words of mine are necessary at this stage of the work of parliament. This is our second session. The Speech from the Throne is down, and it covers a range of subjects. I cannot say there is to be found within its paragraphs very much difficult of digestion, very much of weight or importance to command the attention of hon. members this session. Some things are there that appeared a year ago. There are promises repeated, promises made in the fervour of new-found power twelve months ago, promises never yet fulfilled, but which they do not hesitate to come back and reiterate, undertaking to do better in 1923.

Last year we found in the Speech from the Throne a commitment on a railway policy, a policy which, it is true, they had one and all declared themselves opposed to in order, in eastern Canada, to attain the reins of power, but to which, in the Speech from the Throne, they pledged themselves to give effect, namely, to continue the public operation, through a board of directors, of the National Railway systems of this country, specifically promising, as well, what was the declared and admitted policy of the previous administration, to bring what were then two great systems into one by what they described as co-ordination. Later in the session, when the railways were under discussion at the hands of the late lamented minister, that hon. gentleman further proclaimed that that co-ordination was about to take place, that there was to be such a unification—a word also used in the former Speech from the Throne—as would enable economies to be effected and the greatest efficiency to be brought about. This time those words are somewhat modified in their reaffirmation in the present Speech from the Throne. Instead of assuring parliament, as was done a year ago when this long-delayed amalgamation or co-ordination of the Grand Trunk with the National system was to take place, the Speech from the Throne to-day,—its author evidently feeling somewhat ashamed that that undertaking has never yet been carried out—makes no reference to the Grand Trunk system at all, but solemnly assures the people of Canada that the National system is to be co-ordinated, to be unified. Why, that co-ordination, that unification was all complete when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. It had been done. The roads, apart from the Grand Trunk, were all being operated under one board.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Grand Trunk had a separate board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly; I did not say the Grand Trunk. I said that the other roads were all being operated under one board, with all the advantages of unification. And all that the Speech from the Throne to-day pretends to say is that what was already done a year ago is still going to be done. No reference at all is made to the Grand Trunk. Now, the practical consideration for this House on railway subjects is this: Why is it that the amalgamation of the Grand Trunk with the National Railways is not yet a fact? Why is it that no progress whatever has been made in twelve months, and that we have had nothing but promise after promise, non-fulfilment after non-fulfilment, and now not even a promise? Why is it that to-day we have two railway systems owned by the country, operated, I know, nominally under a single board, but which are each run as a separate system, just the same as they were run under private management? We have a separate traffic manager for the Grand Trunk as well as a separate passenger manager. There is a whole separate organization for the Grand Trunk, including a separate freight department and all the rest, involving all the burden of duplication. And the Speech from the Throne to-day even suppresses the hope that the government purpose to do away with that unnecessary expense to this country. Now, I am quite aware that certain preliminary steps had to be taken, that probably some arrangement would be required to be made as regards the holders of bonds of certain of the individual systems. But I have not learned that any steps have been taken to make these arrangements, or that any progress has been made. All that has been done in connection with this entire policy has been to oust from office a board of directors and a manager who, on the admission of the Minister of Railways who sat in this House last session, had succeeded in a singular way in achieving great progress in connection with the amalgamation and the betterment of that system, and in the reduction of its deficits. All that has been done has been ruthlessly to oust them from power and place in office some of the favourites of hon. gentlemen opposite. This question is of real and practical consequence because of its bearing on a larger subject to which I will refer later in my address. This country is not to-day getting the advantages that it ought to get from the unification of the railways it owns. On the contrary, it is suffering under a burden which it has no right to bear, because of the wholly unjustified delay, a delay now extending over thirteen months. There has been no cause for one of two months' duration, on the part of the present government. What may be the loss it is very difficult, of course, to say. But I do not think that any railway expert would place it under $10,000,000 per year. What is more, I observe that the government has made commitments in relation to the purchase of equipment and supplies aggregating, so the report would indicate, from $12,000,000 to $20,000,000, at least not less than the lower figure; and this for equipment and supplies, the necessity for which would seem to me to be very doubtful indeed, were the advantages of amalgamation first brought about. I am unable to understand why these large engagements should be made on behalf of this country before we know what the requirements are as the result of a survey, a survey that can be made only when amalgamation is effected. But I have another objection to these commitments. What authority did the government have from this parliament sanctioning commitments of between $12,000,000 and $20,000,000 for equipment? I am not aware that authority was asked for, much less granted, at the last session of parliament. All these matters had been reviewed and should have been included in the estimates of a year ago. There is no excuse whatever for commitments in between, commitments that could not have arisen because of circumstances unforeseen. If the need was there, then the need was known to the directors in the spring of 1922, and I doubt not if the directors and the general manager felt that those commitments were necessary they would have laid before the administration estimates covering the same, and parliament would have had the right to decide whether they were necessary. That was not done. We have since gone through a transport season, perhaps the largest in the history of the country, involving the carriage of grain to the extent of three-quarters of one hundred million bushels more, I think, than was ever transported before. That was done, it is true, mainly under the late management, but wholly without complaint as to car shortage or equipment shortage, so far as I heard. Besides this, earlier in the season large bodies of equipment were altogether unused. Consequently it seems to me that the government has some explanations to make to the House as to why they have joined with the new directors in binding the country to millions of expenditure without the authority of parliament.

May I also mention an ingredient of the pledge of a year ago, as to the fulfilment of which we have no word and no assurance? It will be recalled that in the Speech from the Throne of a year ago when the promise of co-ordination was given, His Excellency was made to say that that co-ordination was to be accompanied by a thorough inquiry in order that the people of Canada would at last know the real inside financial facts of the National Railway system. Has that thorough inquiry taken place? If so, by whom was it conducted? In the speech of the former minister, made later in the session, it was intimated that inquiry would be made by a body of men specially appointed for the purpose by the board of directors. Has that inquiry taken place at all? If it has, what is the result? Has it been found that the facts disclosed previously were in any way coloured, in any way misleading, in any way incomplete? If it has been made, the House should have known ere this what the result of the inquiry was. I venture to say it was one of those alluring manifestoes that are made only to be forgotten.

The other subject that is repeated this year from the sessional programme of the year before is the subject of immigration. In the Speech from the Throne of 1922 the House was informed that immigration had been necessarily neglected during the war, that there had been naturally a falling off of immigrants, but that now the blessing of peace had come the government was alive to the need of an aggressive immigration policy and was immediately addressing itself to the formulation of same. This time the Speech from the Throne says that they are still impressed with the need of an active and effective immigration policy, and that their belief is that the efforts of the government should be specially directed to acquiring United States and British immigrants. I can quite understand that the government would feel the country in need of some renewed assurance on this subject. We have had a number of speeches in the interim in various parts of the country, chiefly from the mouth of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart), many of them emphasizing the labours of the administration to formulate a policy, one of them announcing that at last the task was complete and they had decided to increase the advertising, to increase the agencies, and to seek immigrants from other lands, and as well to stop the exodus of those already within our borders.

I was not able to detect anything in the way of a new idea in that formulation of alleged policy. But a review of the success of this administration on the subject of immigration is illuminating as illustrating its success with every other subject that it has turned its hand to since coming into power. I could detect a sense of humour coming back into the mind of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam) when he asked himself the hypothetical question: What after all has this government done? If his mind should turn to the subject of immigration, he would see the real irony of the question. He spoke of the very great difficulties the government encountered when it came into power a year ago. Oh, what a pathetic situation this country was in! Our financial condition, he said, was so bad that it really constituted—and I waited for the word: finally it came—it really constituted a "problem." He forgot the Speech from the Throne of last year. In that speech the government which had in their election speeches described our national condition as perilous, as bringing forebodings into the minds of "masters of finance," in the words of the present Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), as making even rich men quail with fear, as indeed making patriotic men dread the day when, because of our obligations to the Republic to the south, we would drift into annexation,—in the Speech from the Throne these same men had His Excellency say, that the condition of this country was the best of that of any country that had been engaged in the world war. And as the hon. member reviews the year, dwelling all the time on the vastness of the task of the government, the conclusion his philosophic mind finally arrives at is this:

> How small, of all that human hearts endure,
> The part that kings or laws can cause or cure.

How little more especially can those of that name and quality in the present administration do in the matter of immigration!

Immigration during the war of course fell off. Our efforts during that time were not centred on that subject; they had other and bigger tasks to engage them. But nevertheless our immigration during the war was better than our immigration after the vast display of effort of the present administration. The average during the whole period of the war was about 90,000 immigrants per year. This year up to the end of December some 60,000 entered Canada, or a 25 per cent falling off from the year before. I have the correct figures before me. In the year 1920 we received 117,396 immigrants; in 1921, 148,477; in 1922, 89,999. That is the way immigration went on after the war closed. Our immigration from the beginning of last April to the end of the year is given me by the department at 60,247. The government affirm in the Speech from the Throne that the most desirable immigration is British and American. Well, British immigration has almost disappeared altogether. British immigration that a year ago was five to one is now less than two to one. As against European, British immigration absolutely is going down to the zero mark. That is the result of one year of operation.

But while immigration is stagnant, emigration appears to be active. The government somewhat boasts in the Speech from the Throne of the expansion of our exports. Our exports have gone up in part—there is no very great stimulus apparent, but there is a somewhat small increase. But there are exports and exports. With a crop transcending anything we have ever had before in the history of the Dominion, it is scarcely of much credit to the government that that crop has had to find an export market—it must go. We have, I should think, a 400,000,000 bushel wheat crop this year; our barley and our oat crop much exceeds that of any previous year in our history, and that accounts for the expansion of our exports. But there is something else that accounts for it as well. We are exporting settlers' effects at a very considerable rate. In 1920 the export of settlers' effects was valued at some $7,762,000, but in the same year there were imported settlers' effects to the value of $9,127,000. In a word, the balance was in our favour to the extent of $1,364,631. The year before—1921—we had a balance in our favour in the matter of export and import of settlers' effects of $1,161,000—$6,808,000 worth came in and $5,647,000 worth went out. But this year, after the exertion of the government, as promised in the Speech from the Throne of a year ago, we managed to have come in $5,068,000 worth while there went out $6,155,000 worth, or a balance against us of $1,086,767. Nothing will more clearly, more rigidly and more unanswerably illustrate the success of the government's immigration policy. The United States immigration figures show that the population of this country is going over to the United States at a rate which is increasing every month. That was the case throughout 1922; in later months the figures run up to almost eight thousand per month. That, by the way, is the cause—I regret to have to say that it is the main cause—of the diminution of unemployment in the larger cities of this country to-day. Well, the government takes to itself credit in the Speech from the Throne for the reduction of the unemployment figures as compared with those of a year ago. They would be more frank and more fair with this country if they explained that unemployment has gone down because the artisans of Canada have gone across to American cities where they are getting work that they cannot obtain in this Dominion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen opposite say, "hear hear"; they are apparently quite glad to increase the figures of our export, even though it is the export of manhood and of settlers' effects. No, the situation in Canada to-day has not improved over that of a year ago. I do not think all these things are attributable to government; I have never argued that. There are some things government can do; this government has not turned a hand to make work for a single individual in this Dominion. No policy can they point to that has brought meals to the mouths of the labourers of this country, no policy can they point to that has brought a taxpayer into this country to share the load we carry now. They sit in office,—well, I do not know that it is quite fair to say that they always sit; they did travel considerably. At all events, they enjoy the honours of office; but a Speech from the Throne that contained something of a specific policy designed to check the flow of emigration, designed to enhance the flow of immigration, designed to reduce the taxation of those who are here, designed to bring work and food to the people of this country—that would be a Speech from the Throne more welcome to the people than anything we find in the document now before us.

There was, however, mention of certain subjects in the Speech from the Throne twelve months ago upon which the government is conspicuously silent now. Hon. members—especially hon. members to my left and others interested in western Canada—will recall the note of triumph with which it was announced in the government press—yes, by the government itself—that the long-standing question of the return of the natural resources to the western provinces had at last been solved at the hands of this administration. Here was a question that had baffled ministers of mediocre talent in the days that had gone. Year after year incompetent men had struggled with it, but now a new government had come to power and in the space of a few short weeks had solved this intricate question by the application of the spirit of justice and of equality; and the Speech from the Throne pronounced that already a solution, or what was hoped would be a solution, had been sent forward to the premiers of the western country. In the interim the suggestion had been made—and it had already been accepted by the then premier of Manitoba—that if in the application of the principle of equality, when they all got together later on to solve the natural resources problem, any difficulty should arise, a tribunal should be erected to determine, upon a principle of accounting, just how these difficulties should be resolved. And so the announcement went forth that at length that could be decided; the question would be off the skyline of Canadian politics, solved by the superior talent of the present administration. There is no mention of it, Mr. Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne this year. Does it mean that the prophecy or the promise of a year ago is fulfilled and the sky-line clear of the question? No; the question stands exactly where it stood when they came into office, save and except that they have messed it and retarded it. Not one foot of progress has been made: nothing was done whatever save the holding of a futile conference from which each participant went forth to say that he came down, discussed, and went home in vain. All indeed, that happened was this: a provincial election was approaching in Manitoba. It was important for the political associate of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that he go back with the solution of the natural resources question in his pocket, and so between them they contrived that this concoction of verbiage should be tried upon a credulous public. The people should be told that the two prime ministers had met and had decided to settle the whole matter merely by the introduction of the great principle of equality as between the citizen of Manitoba and the citizen of the rest of Canada Precisely, Mr. Speaker, as if two litigants had long struggled before a judge on the bench for the ascertainment of their civil rights, and after many weeks of disputation and litigation their lawyers rose and announced to the court that they, the lawyers, had decided on a settlement of the entire matter, had entered into a formal, binding, sealed agreement to settle the whole question "on the principle of justice." That is what evolved from the promise of the Speech from the Throne of a year ago. Consequently, no reference to it appears in the Speech from the Throne to-day.

There is still another subject upon which the Speech is silent. It is a subject that attained no little prominence in the contest of 1921, a subject, indeed, that has been more a bone of political contention, that has been more the subject of illusory hope and final disappointment than any other subject in the politics of our country; I refer to the tariff question. Hon. members, of course, will do the government this justice, that the reference of a year ago was exceedingly delicate, exceedingly gentle, exceedingly vague;—there would be something done in the way of revision; it could not, unfortunately, be much on account of the short space of time that they had had, but something in the way of revision would be done and done last session. The budget, it will be remembered, finally came down, and I remember well how the feelings which I expressed in the debate on the Speech from the Throne were amply vindicated by the event, how the high hopes of the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply were dashed to the ground, how the hopes of hon. gentlemen to my left, which they more sincerely held, were dashed to the ground as well. So little was done, and that reversed by subsequent articles of the budget, that in the end we find the tariff average on our imports to-day higher than it averaged when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. But hope had not died in the breasts of certain hon. members of this House, and in all sincerity they expressed the conviction that having made a short step on farm implements, very short indeed, in the way of reduction, if that were accepted as a step in the right direction, as the half a loaf that was better than no bread, more would follow to vindicate the measure of confidence of hon. gentlemen on this side in the government of the day.

I wonder if there is any evidence this afternoon that there is going to be more to follow. The customs pledge of a year ago is, apparently, in the minds of the government, wholly fulfilled, and they believe silence the better part of discretion. This year they have forgotten the question of the tariff altogether. So that if the molecular step of last session is a "step in the right direction," I am afraid the hopes of hon. gentlemen now to my left will not be very high that that step is to be followed by others in the right direction; and, indeed, after the government took this long—promised step, heralded with the language of hope by hon. gentlemen behind them and diagonally across, after that was done and their manipulations with the tariff were over, when we reflect that the government collected $88,000,000 of customs tax on importation of $506,000,000, as against a collection of $78,000,000 on an importation of $502,000,000 the year before, those who were so ardent for tariff reform in the way of revision downward will hope that this step "in the right direction" will not be repeated very often. A tariff that averaged 15½ per cent up to the end of 1921 for that fiscal year, now averages, when the half loaf is delivered and the sales tax put on at the boundary, 17.5 per cent over the whole scale. Such is the fulfillment of the famous platform of 1919. Such is the end of the comedy on this tariff issue by virtue of which hon. gentlemen opposite sit in power to-day.

I desire to touch on a question or rather a phase of Canadian conditions that demands the earnest attention of every thoughtful citizen at this time. I refer to the general financial and taxation condition of this country. My mind goes back to the days that immediately followed the conclusion of the late war. The war was scarcely over when the government of the time was importuned by hon. gentlemen then on this side of the House for the reduction of the debt of this country. The war is over, we were told; other countries are retrenching, and that retrenchment is reflected not only in a diminution of expenditure but in a diminution of national obligations. I can well recall the speeches of hon. gentlemen who now sit on the government benches, stating that it was not enough to know that the consolidated revenue was equalling, yes far exceeding, consolidated fund expenditure. That assurance was no solace to hon. gentlemen at all. They wanted the capital expenditure cut down until we could show a reduction of the obligations of this Dominion. At that time the big policies that provided the means of the re-establishment of our returned men were being laid, and their principles were being applied in practice. Our pension scale was growing, our land settlement plans were developing; and our expenditure in these regards was very high. Our soldier re-establishment policies were in full effect, and larger amounts were required in respect of them than were required in the worst days of the war. But even under those conditions we were required at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite to show a reduction in the national debt of this country, instead of an increase, as was inevitable from year to year. The time has now come when those necessities are passed. We are not now at a time of an ascending pension scale; we are in the days of a descending pension scale. Already in the ten months of this year over $3,000,000 less is required for our pensions than a year ago. Instead of spending $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 per year on our soldier land settlement, we are spending about $1,500,000, and we are getting in more money than we are expending, according to the figures recently published by the department. Instead of requiring vast and increasing expenditures for our re-establishment department, that expenditure is also being reduced, naturally and inevitably reduced. There is being a saving made in respect of the soldier everywhere. That naturally follows the recedence of this country from the days of the war. The expenditure of that department is at least $3,000,000 less than it was a year ago. There are no new plans of re-establishment evolved. There is nothing new evolved by them in the world; indeed, nothing is more foreign to the mind of this government than the evolution of any new policy on any subject. But the expenditure keeps up; the debt keeps up, and it not only keeps up, but it increases by millions every month. A year ago when hon. gentlemen opposite came into office the net debt of Canada according to figures recently published was $2,366,861,252. The net debt of Canada when they turned the corner of the year 1922-1923, just at the very moment the Prime Minister issued that paean of praise reciting the achievements of his administration and the bettered condition of the country at that very moment the net debt was $2,412,496,151, or an increased obligation on the back of this country, and an obligation chiefly to the people of the United States of America, not to the citizens of our own country at all, of $45,624,899. That means that, in the days of peace, in the days four years after the great conflict, in the days when the expenditure in re-establishment of the soldier had generally gone down, the government was able to show a debt forty-five and a half million greater than when they came into power. Take away those expenditures that have diminished, the savings that they could not help making in relation to the soldier services to this country, and the consolidated fund expenditure to-day is greater than the consolidated fund expenditure a year ago. That is the success the government has achieved in that regard. And all this aggregation of debt piles up while the government exhausts its ingenuity, not in reducing the public expenditure, not in cutting down unnecessary services—for these are not reduced at all as they were in 1920 and 1921—but in ascertaining what new taxes they can place on the backs of the people of this Dominion. They have added to the revenue of the country something, I have not the exact figures, but it must run into tens of millions, by the imposition of a sales tax fifty per cent greater than the sales tax they found when they came into power. That is a tax that is placed upon the backs of everybody in this Dominion. All who use the necessities of life must pay their share of the sales tax. Around the neck of those people the government has placed a weight fifty per cent greater than they found when they came into office. They take all those engaged in business, large and small, in agricultural as well as industrial operations and, as they seek to do their business in the best, the cleanest, the most effective way, the way that leads least to litigation, the government comes in between and adds its impositions here, there and everywhere, until business becomes clogged and next to impossible. They have added taxes on business to the extent, at least of four million dollars extra in the way of stamps on cheques and the like. I find the receipts of the Post Office department, for example, increased from some $19,000,000 to some $23,000,000 this year, because by the law of the country everybody has to go to the post office and buy stamps day by day in order to transact the ordinary business that keeps himself and his family alive. We find taxes here and taxes there, stamps here and stamps there, plastered on every business document, until there is little but stamps to be seen; and the fact that that has to be done is made the basis of exuberant self-congratulations at the hands of members of the government, because this year the Post Office department is going to show a surplus. Such is the success the government attains in the imposition of taxes. One tax has followed another and there are indications, there are even intimations, that we may expect further taxes upon the overburdened people of this country again this session. The government has not addressed itself with any energy whatever to the task of reducing expenditure department by department as this country has the right to expect, year by year, as we recede from the days of the war. I will give an illustration. The late government undertook the reorganization of departments. It undertook the reorganization of the Printing Bureau in Ottawa, of the Post Office department, and what savings we have to-day in that department in the matter of expenditure are the direct result of that reorganization, and if any hon. gentleman opposite wants any proof I refer him to the words of the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy), extracted from him last session, frankly indeed, given by him in this House. That department was reorganized. The Customs department and Inland Revenue were reorganized and millions were saved to this country in the process. Let this government pursue such work department by department, and they will save the people of Canada millions that are to-day going in waste services all over the country. Now, there is no question of this at all. The government takes great credit for reducing the hours the civil servants had to work last year, for increasing the holidays, as they say they have done. By this means I suppose they hope that votes will be attracted to their standard. The country looks in vain for substantial contraction in the expenditures of the Dominion. That contraction has taken place this year in very marked degree in other countries of the world. They talk in the Dominion about not being able to do anything in the way of meeting our honest share of Empire obligations, in the way of paying for what we enjoy in this country. We can do nothing, they say, because of the great debt of the Dominion. The government of Great Britain in the year that has gone was under the necessity of paying two-thirds of its entire revenue in the interest on obligations which that country incurred, that the liberty of the world might be saved. The interest on the obligations of this country, obligations that I know were great, obligations that I know were honourable and creditable—the interest on the obligations that were incurred in the war—is not more than about one-third of the revenue of this country to-day. The government have the other two-thirds. The government of Great Britain, with one-third of their revenue, are able to pay off a portion of their national debt; this government with two-thirds of our revenue available, none of which is applicable in interest upon the war debt, is not able to reduce any of its national debt, but rather adds to the national debt by forty-five millions in one year. Such is the comparison between this administration and other administrations that have been in power. So I say that the effort of this House should be directed this session to one end more than all others, namely, to the end of bringing to the government a realization of its duties in this matter of expenditure and taxation.

Considerable is stated in the Speech from the Throne about improved conditions in the Dominion. I have not observed those improved conditions myself. I do not come to parliament animated by a desire to paint in colours that are darker than the truth the actual condition of our country. So far from despairing, there is none of higher hope for this Dominion among its citizens than myself. We are in a good position yet, relatively to other countries, in the matter of national obligations. By the conduct of our finances through those years of war by procuring for this country a large share of the work of producing all kinds of goods necessary in the conflict, we were able to hold the debt of this Dominion pretty largely within the four corners of the Dominion itself. We were able in that time to add to our savings deposits in this country a sum no less than $550,000,000. We were able at the same time to provide, from the pockets of our people, a sum no less than $1,700,000,000 of the national debt of this country, so that of the interest on that sum, four dollars out of every five come into the pockets of the people of our country themselves. While that was going on our people purchased and paid for at least $600,000,000 worth of automobiles. That was the condition, the prosperity that prevailed prior to the end of the year 1921, and that was a fundamentally healthful and sound position. That process has not continued. The government, starting with the country in that position, with the necessities of the war and all that the war entailed contracting day by day, should have been able to show a splendid reduction of our national debt to-day; it should have been able also to show a reduction of our obligations owing to the citizens of countries abroad. The contrary is the case. We owe more abroad; we have a national debt bigger than ever; all the obligations and duties of government in this regard have been passed over and ignored.

In western Canada, it is true, our farmers reaped the largest harvest that that country has ever known. I would not say that this was true of every portion of the Dominion. Of the three western provinces, it is unquestionably true; of the Dominion, in the aggregate, it also is unquestionably true; but I believe it must be said—and it is only right that this should be brought home to the administration—that the condition of the individual farmer in western Canada, after the enjoyment of a year of government under the present administration, is more difficult, more overshadowed with debt and trouble than it has been in the history of the last fifteen years. Of that, I do not think there is any question at all. The government says, in the Speech from the Throne: We are getting on fine; everything is going well; but, of course, we cannot be restored to complete prosperity so long as there is disturbance, disruption and chaos in Europe. There is a measure of truth in the latter part of that sentence. I am one of those who believe there is a very direct relationship between sixty-, seventy-, or seventy-five-cent wheat on the western prairies and a chaotic, moneyless Europe. I think one of the primary essentials for the restoration of sounder agricultural conditions in this country is the preservation over there, first of all, of securities for peace, for without peace there can be no order, no production, no prosperity. First of all, we must have the preservation of the securities for peace that the world paid so much for in the war, and next of all the restoration of those monetary and financial conditions and conditions of mutual trust that form the corner stone of anything that men enjoy in the way of commercial and economic prosperity.

Those things must be brought about, and I also lay this suggestion before the government —although this is not the time to discuss it in detail nor to make controversy over it— that for the restoration of those securities for peace that the best of the world fought and died for, Canada herself is not without some responsibility. Canada yearns for peace; Canada yearns for prosperity. Canada is bound to do Canada's share in bringing about those essential things without which there cannot be prosperity or peace on earth. We want peace, we want prosperity; but do not let us just keep on yearning for peace and the consequent prosperity, always at the expense of someone else. There is, I know, on this continent, a feeling in which, unfortunately, I think myself, one great nation places too much reliance, a feeling that here in America our safe and best course in the general interest of the world is to hold ourselves intact, to refrain from all participation in the economic rehabilitation of the Old World. From that position, I believe, there is a tendency to-day to recede, and Canada is in no position to point a finger at another country so long as we ourselves, as part of the British Empire, maintain that selfish part ourselves. I do not say there is any major part that we can play; but we can play a part commensurate with the part we played before, and it is the duty of this country to do its full share, joining with other countries of the world, to bring about those sure securities for peace and consequently those sure securities for economic recovery in those portions of the world that have suffered.

The Speech from the Throne makes no reference to an effort of the British government to join the whole forces of the Empire, to make still more secure the peace of eastern and southern Europe, and on that account I make no reference to it now. I noticed in the speech of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam), that he applauded what he said was the action of the government—if there was action, I could not really define it myself—in refusing to submit a policy until parliament met. I only make this reference now that the programme of the session is before us in the Speech from the Throne, and I find that speech as barren of any suggestion or submission of policy to parliament as the government was barren when other parts of the Empire answered in September last.

It will, of course, be the duty of the administration—this should have been done already—to bring down to parliament, now that parliament has met, all the correspondence that has passed on those subjects between ourselves and the government of the Motherland, all the correspondence, all the information that this government has, to place this parliament in possession of the facts in order that the representatives of the people assembled here may know just the position this country has taken, may know just exactly the circumstances that surround us within the Empire and before the world, and, therefore, be the better able to judge what, in all the circumstances, is the duty of this country.

I stated, in opening, that there was no necessity of prolonged discussion now. We make better progress by concentrated, concrete devotion to individual questions, one by one. The Speech from the Throne, however, does refer to what is alleged to have been an achievement of the administration with regard to the removal of the embargo on Canadian cattle. Well, the function of the Speech from the Throne is to lay before parliament in brief form the programme of its intended duties for that session. I have no particular objection to the singing of a song of praise if something really important has been accomplished to the credit of the administration; but it must be known to every citizen of this country, known very clearly to everyone who reads the reports of the parliament of Great Britain, that whatever has been accomplished in relation to that embargo, whatever has been acceded to by the British parliament and the British government, is the direct and sole result of the obligation of honour felt by that parliament and that government in relation to the promise made by Great Britain in 1917 to the government of Canada then in power. No one can read the debates of the House of Commons of Britain; no one can read the debates of the House of Lords of Britain in particular; yes, no one can read the speeches of members of the government, in those debates, and not agree that had it not been for the word of Britain passed at the Imperial Conference of 1921, that after the war that embargo would be removed, had it not been for the feeling there that the word of Britain having been given, whatever the consequences, must be redeemed, there would have been not even a promise of a removal of the embargo in 1923. Moreover, is the embargo even yet removed? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is here; he shakes his head in the negative. That does not seem to me precisely in harmony with the words of the Speech from the Throne. But what the Minister of Agriculture tacitly admits is true; the embargo has not yet been removed. There is not an animal in this country to-day that could horn itself into the British Isles. All that this government has obtained—or rather all that has come to it, because it has not obtained it in any way whatever—is the promise of the British parliament that it will implement the pledge given in 1917 to Sir Robert Borden at the Imperial Conference of that year. The execution of that promise is still to take effect, and I believe the time at which it is to take effect is still very much in doubt. More than that, I express some apprehension—of course, it is difficult for anyone to know until the test of experience is applied—that the conditions agreed to by the representatives of this government will, in the actual working out of the trade following the removal of the embargo, prove onerous if not serious. I hope not. I earnestly hope that the flow of trade, particularly in the product of the farms of this country, over to Great Britain will receive a stimulus as a consequence of the removal of the embargo. I hope that all the blessings of trade will follow and that by this means something in the way of relief may come for what is at present a rather unfortunate condition of agriculture in many parts of this country.

Let the government not lull itself into any illusory belief that this Dominion enjoys to-day the measure of prosperity which, on this continent and relative to the United States, it ought to enjoy at this time. I do not believe it does. There is too much emigration; there is too much idleness, even if unemployment may have diminished somewhat. There is too much hardship, too much increase of debt, particularly on the part of those engaged in agriculture in this country. The condition of the farmer in the West demands attention. and I venture to suggest that the grievances against which the western farmer complains can receive no adequate investigation at the hands of such a committee as is foreshadowed to-day in the Speech from the Throne. The government says that the western farmer has been complaining of the mixing of grain and, as well, of the way in which his products are shipped; and it therefore proposes a special committee of the House of Commons to inquire into and report upon these complaints. Why, for fifty years we have had a committee of this House which has been empowered to inquire into every one of these subjects year by year, with all the powers that any committee wants. And still we have these complaints abroad to-day. Now, Sir, these complaints call for investigation at the hands of a body who will have no other duties to perform until it completes its task. Let this government launch such an investigation and it will be welcomed by the farmer of western Canada. These complaints to-day have reached an acuteness far past any stage that has been reached in the years that are gone, and naturally the cry for remedy is louder, because of the distressed condition of the country generally. The government, therefore, would do well to launch an investigation by competent men, whom, of course, they have power to choose, who should have full authority, and whose sole duty it should be to go into these complicated, difficult questions that harass the mind of the western farmer to-day. That is the suggestion I make to the administration. I see no value at all in merely appointing a committee of this House to do what has been the duty year by year for fifty years of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Commons.

I pass no further comment on the Speech from the Throne at this moment, save the following: A revision of the Bank Act is promised. Of that I am glad. I think it is the duty of this parliament at this session to complete the task of the Bank Act revision. I trust that that task will be approached in a spirit of liberality, in a spirit of determination that whatever can be done in the way of making more secure the savings of the people, and of providing a more elastic and equitable distribution of the banking service, shall be rendered possible by that revision.

The Speech refers to a redistribution bill. That should have been brought down last session. It is overdue now. I welcome the appearance of that promise in the Speech, and venture the hope, in closing, that in carrying out their plans as to the redistribution bill the government will imitate the practice established in 1912 in submitting the question to a joint committee of parliament fairly constituted, doing so freely and without restrictions; and I trust that that committee will be commissioned to come to terms on the whole details of redistribution, fair and acceptable to all sections of this House. That is the right spirit in which to approach the redistribution problem. The government have an example in the procedure of 1912, and I ask that they follow it. If these suggestions are accepted by the administration, I venture to think that the labours of this parliament this session need be neither very onerous nor very long.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to me to have the privilege of agreeing with my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) and to find that we are in accord on any important matters. His speech to-day has been characterized by the moderation in tone which he has ascribed to the remarks of the mover (Mr. Putnam) and seconder of the address (Mr. Rhéaume). I shall endeavour to follow my right hon. friend in like spirit. May I, with him, congratulate the mover and seconder upon the speeches they have delivered. The hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam) who moved the Address has been in this House for a short time. We have not heard him speak very often; his modesty more or less constrains him to be silent in debate; but I think that all hon. members who have had the privilege of listening to his erudite address to-day will hope that in the course of the debates he will see his way to take a larger part. He has referred to the compliment which has been paid his constituency, and I think it is natural he should so regard the choice of himself as mover of the address. The hon. member may, however, feel that his fellow members on this side of the House take pride, as well, in his achievements as one who in public life has taken an active and courageous part. Some men enter public life in the hope more or less that, after taking an active part in political controversies, they may find, towards the close thereof, some opportunity of public service removed from the uncertainties of politics. Very few there are who, having a position of security and of usefulness, are ready to give it up to embark upon the troublous sea of politics. The hon. member for Colchester belongs to those of the exceptional class; he resigned an important life position which he held, to enter the arena of politics at the last general elections and contest a constituency which was then held by a minister of the Crown. He contested it successfully. After listening to him to-day we can appreciate some of the qualities which helped to win him the great confidence of the constituency he now represents.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Rhéaume) who has seconded the motion, has delivered his maiden speech. All of us who have had that experience realize how difficult it is for a member to make his first public utterance in this House. I am sure, as we listened to the hon. member to-day, many of us, had we not known he was but recently returned, would have regarded him as an old parliamentarian. As a matter of fact, I believe the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has just come through his first political contest. He has not before been a member of a representative assembly. If to-day is any prophecy of the future, we may expect that the hon. member will in course of time make a distinguished name for himself, as so many of his fellow-members from the province of Quebec have done. He is an orator in his own tongue; had we had the privilege of hearing him in the English tongue, in which he is also fluent, I am sure we would have found him equally proficient.

May I follow my right hon. friend also in extending to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) congratulations upon the confidence which his fellow-members of the Progressive party have reposed in him. We all regret the circumstances which have made it seem necessary to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) to withdraw from the active part he had previously been taking in the political life of our country. We are pleased, however, that he has found it possible to retain his seat in this House, and we hope that what will undoubtedly prove a gain for the business with which he is connected will not interfere too largely with his public duties, and thereby prove our loss, but that he will be enabled to take an active part in the discussions of this House.

I may say to my hon. friend from Brandon that we on this side feel that the confidence which has been placed in him by his fellow-members of the Progressive party has been well placed. It has been a pleasure to me to notice that at the outset he has set his face against anything in the nature of class organization for political purposes. In so doing I think he has taken a stand which is very much in the public interest. He has seen, I believe, even in the short time during which he has been in this parliament, that one of the worst misfortunes that can befall the common good is that, in this country's political affairs we should become divided into groups on any basis, whether it be of occupation, of race, of religion, or other sectional or class interest however expressed. I am confident that he has taken a step which will be for the good of our country as a whole in advocating the wider view of the interests of all classes of the country in general, and setting himself in opposition to anything which looks to a narrowing of that broad basis.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I also, with my right hon. friend, congratulate the new members who have come into this House, and wish them well in the discharge of their public duties.

I come now to some of the remarks which my right hon. friend made on the Speech from the Throne. His utterances were directed first of all to references in the Speech which seemed to bear similarity to references in the Speech of the preceding year. He thought this was a mistake; he took exception to any repetitions. But the latter part of his address was altogether in the nature of a criticism of omissions from the Speech from the Throne of references which had been made in the Speech of last year. That is my right hon. friend's favourite way of criticizing: he endeavours to place his opponents in the position that regardless of whatever they do, they must, somehow, be in the wrong.

My right hon. friend might well have paused in some of the criticisms he made in reference to repetitions and omissions. He seemed eager to attack the government on not having fulfilled some of the promises which it made on a previous occasion with respect to its railway policy. He was very definite and very positive in what he had to say in that regard. He asked, why is it that we have still to-day two railway systems, why is it that after the promise of co-ordination and unification there still remain these two systems, the National Railway system and the Grand Trunk Railway system, with their separate offices and all the additional cost which that involves? Why is it, he asks, that we have not even a promise in the Speech from the Throne that these two systems are to be amalgamated and brought together. He sought by his remarks to create the impression that the government in some way was not sincere in the pledge it had made that it would see that these two systems were amalgamated. He sought to imply that by avoiding some explicit mention in the Speech from the Throne, the intention was, to allow further time to elapse before these two systems were brought together as one, or else to evade this responsibility altogether. Well, may I tell my right hon. friend that he is much mistaken in his criticism in that regard. His remarks are not only wholly without foundation, but are absolutely untrue as respects what has been accomplished by way of the amalgamation of the Grand Trunk and Canadian National railways. My right hon. friend had to do with the drafting of the legislation under which these systems were to be amalgamated. That legislation provided a certain procedure whereby after a board of directors for the Canadian National Railway system had been appointed the other system was to be brought under that board. That has been accomplished, and I may tell my right hon. friend that the Grand Trunk Railway as a separate system no longer exists; that it has been amalgamated with the Canadian National Railways, that to-day there is only one National Railway system, that there is only one head office, that there is only one management, and that there is only one board of control in charge of both systems. Perhaps my right hon. friend hereafter will be a little more careful and not display such haste to criticise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the right hon. gentleman permit me a question? Does he say that the two sets of departments and the two sets of officers do not exist as before?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is exactly what I say. The two sets of officers have ceased to exist. There is now only one set of officers and only one head office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the right hon. gentleman tell me who is the traffic manager of the whole system, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian National?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend will only be patient he will get all that information very much in detail in a very short time. But for the present let me give him information which I think ought to satisfy him: to-day there are no longer two separate systems; they have been amalgamated and brought together as one national railway system.

My right hon. friend touched also on the subject of immigration and seemed to complain because the government made further mention of its immigration policy in the Speech from the Throne. He dwelt particularly on the absence of any large number of immigrants during the past year. If he had reflected for a moment he would have realized that what he was saying was in the nature of a criticism of his own administration, because, as every hon. member must know, the immigration of one year is largely the result of preparations that have been made for it in the year preceding. You sow fall wheat one year and you reap the harvest in the year following; it is precisely the same with immigration. The natural time for the influx of immigrants is the early part of the year; immigrants do not come to the country in any numbers in the latter part of the year. They come as the result of the preparations that have been made and what by way of inducing them to come has been accomplished in the year preceding. My right hon. friend was in office in 1921 but was busy with the general elections throughout the fall of that year. From August until December, when the immigration representatives of the government should have been active in Great Britain, in the United States, and wherever suitable immigrants could have been found, he and his colleagues were paying little or no attention to their departments; were allowing them, in fact largely, to look after themselves. My right hon. friend and his Minister of Immigration were busily engaged at the time in vainly trying to win the confidence of the electors at the polls; that is the reason why we have had so little in the way of immigration during the past year. But the pledge that was given in last year's Speech from the Throne has been fulfilled. Efforts were made by the administration as soon as it took office to improve conditions. Those efforts are being and will continue to be extended, and my right hon. friend's desire to see a return of the flow of immigration to this country will probably be fulfilled before very long.

In regard to the question of the natural resources, to which my right hon. friend also alluded, I would draw his attention to the fact that it is not unusual to find that some questions take a little longer to solve than others. The question of the return to the provinces of western Canada of their natural resources is one with which previous governments have grappled over a long period of years. Some progress, I think, has been made in the matter. Conferences have been held. It is quite true that the results have not been all that we had hoped for. We might have made a settlement had we been prepared to accept the terms that the western provinces proposed. But we felt that there were considerations affecting the Dominion as a whole of which account had to be taken, and we were not prepared to go the lengths that the western provinces wished us to go in the matter of returning to them the control of their natural resources. However, I think the discussions we have had have brought the western provinces and the federal government a little closer together on this issue, and we may hope as the result of further conferences to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the problem.

With the other subjects to which my right hon. friend referred — the tariff and financial matters — I shall not deal at present. I understand there is a desire on the part of hon. members that the House should adjourn at six o'clock, and that being the case I shall endeavour to bring my remarks to a close by that time. Perhaps I should touch more particularly upon a subject to which my right hon. friend made only a passing reference, namely, the despatches which have recently passed between the British government and ourselves respecting the crisis in the Near East.

My right hon. friend says he expects and hopes the government will bring down all the correspondence or communications which have passed between the British government and the Canadian government. Let me say that the government has all along been hoping that it would be possible to bring all the correspondence down. The moment the despatch of September 15 was received here, I made it quite plain in a communication to the British government that in all probability parliament would desire to see the correspondence that might be passing between the British government and ourselves. I have to inform my right hon. friend that we repeatedly asked the British government if we might be at liberty to bring down the correspondence. The British government has in the most clear and emphatic way indicated its wish that the correspondence should not be laid before parliament. However, the British government has stated that no exception can be taken on its part to a general statement being made by myself as to what has passed between us in the matter of correspondence, and I propose to give to the House, as clearly and as fully as I can, an exact statement of what has taken place.

First of all, may I say just a word in regard to the circumstances under which the first despatch with respect to the situation in the Near East was received. I believe it was within five minutes of midnight on Friday, September 15, that the despatch was sent from Great Britain to Canada, and also, I understand, to other of the British dominions. That despatch was received in Ottawa, I understand, quite late that same evening. It was in cipher, and had to be decoded after its receipt here. Communications which come to the Canadian government from the government of Great Britain reach the Prime Minister's office through the Governor General's office. The despatch in question was received in my office some time between two and three o'clock on Saturday afternoon. With respect to that there is no difference of opinion between the clerks in His Excellency's office and those in my own; it was between two and three o'clock on Saturday afternoon that the despatch was received. In the meantime, the press of this country had received a cable communication from the Old Country to the effect that the several dominions had been invited to send contingents to the Near East. Indeed, the press of Saturday between twelve and two announced that the government of New Zealand had already sent an answer promising to send a contingent. On the Saturday in question I was in my constituency of North York. Some comment has been made with regard to the circumstance that I was not in Ottawa, and it has been suggested that had I been in the city, the despatch on the Near East crisis would have been received before the press announcement that Canada had been invited to send a contingent to the Near East; also that the answer of our government would have been sent with greater promptness. The circumstance that I was not here on that particular day made no difference whatever as to the time of receipt of the despatch being after that at which the announcement was made in the press that the dominions had been invited to send contingents. Had I been here the result would have been exactly the same. However, I may say—perhaps it is not necessary, but I should like to say it—that that particular day was one of about a dozen days in the entire year during which I was absent any distance from my post in this city. I think that through the whole of last year, I did not allow myself a single day's vacation; so far as I recall, there was but an exception of one day. On this particular occasion I was spending two days in my own constituency, the only two days I had been privileged to spend there during the year. When I reached Ottawa the following morning, immediately upon reading the despatch I sent a communication to the British government asking for an explanation as to how it came about that before any communication had reached the government at Ottawa, the press of the country should have had a statement to the effect that the British government had invited Canada to send a contingent to the Near East. At the same time I forwarded to my colleagues who were at Geneva a copy of the communication which had been received, in order that they might be fully informed, and in order that we who were at Ottawa might have the benefit of their opinion and counsel from Geneva where, with other delegates, they were attending the sessions of the League of Nations.

Perhaps I had better give to the House immediately, as nearly as I can, the substance of the despatch which was received, and then I will give the House the substance of the communication which I sent after seeing its context. The despatch was to the effect that the British cabinet had decided to resist Turkish aggression upon Europe, and to make exertions to prevent the Allies being driven out of Constantinople by Mustapha Kemal, and in particular and above all, to maintain the freedom of the Straits by securing firmly the Gallipoli peninsula. The French government, it was stated, had notified the British government that they were in agreement with the British government in informing Mustapha Kemal that he must not violate the neutral zone by which the Straits and Constantinople were protected, and had so instructed their High Commissioner at Constantinople. It was also stated that the Italians were in general accord. It was mentioned that the government of Great Britain was addressing itself to Roumania, Serbia and Greece with a view to securing their military participation in defence of the deep-water line between Europe and Asia.

It was further stated that the British government were notifying all the powers aforesaid of their intention to make exertions, and that they were placing a British division under orders to reinforce Sir Charles Harington, the allied commander-in-chief at Constantinople; that the British navy would co-operate, that these arrangements were intended to cover the period which must elapse before a stable peace with Turkey could be secured; that for this purpose a conference was being proposed probably at Venice, possibly at Paris, and that it was essential that the Allies should be strong enough to maintain their position at Constantinople and round the Straits until this peace had been achieved.

It was further stated in the despatch that the British government did not think it was likely that the forces of Mustapha Kemal would attack if a firm front were shown by any large number of powers acting together. Mention was made of the fact that the total forces were estimated between sixty and seventy thousand men, who thus far had not encountered any serious resistance.

Mention was made of one or two other matters which, if the House had the privilege of seeing the correspondence, it would, I think, regard in the circumstances, as being necessarily confidential. The despatch contained one paragraph which I think may be regarded as the vital and essential one. It was to the effect that the British government would be glad to know whether the Dominion government wished to associate themselves with the action the British government were taking, and whether we would desire to be represented by a contingent. I wish to draw the attention of the House to these particular words, because they constitute the vital part of the despatch. The inquiry was—and I use the word inquiry because it has been used by the late Prime Minister of England, Mr. Lloyd George, in referring to this particular passage—as to whether the Dominion government wished to associate themselves with the action which the British government were taking and whether they would desire to be represented by a contingent.

Mention was also made in the despatch of reasons why possibly some of the Dominions would particularly wish to be represented by a contingent. It was stated by Premier Smuts in addressing the parliament of South Africa that his understanding of the communication was that it had been addressed primarily to Australia and New Zealand on account of their interest in the Gallipoli peninsula, and that its being subsequently sent to the other Dominions was due to the circumstance that the British government having sent it in the first instance to these two Dominions, felt they should send it to all four. I am simply giving the House the statement which Premier Smuts has given to his parliament as his interpretation of the despatch.

There was a further reference to the effect that the announcement that any or all of the Dominions were prepared to send contingents would undoubtedly exercise a favourable influence on the situation, and might conceivably be a potent factor in preventing any actual hostilities. Mention was made of the fact that the despatch was being sent to the different Dominions.

I am anxious, Mr. Speaker, that not only hon. members of this House, but the country as well, should have every reason to feel that nothing of significance contained in the despatch is being withheld, and I therefore propose to hand it to my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, who is a member of the Privy Council, and ask him to peruse its contents and satisfy his mind that I have in every particular given to the House what is essential in it. I should be happy if he would see his way, and I think it would be perfectly proper under the circumstances, to allow the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) who is leading an important party in this House, also to see the contents of the despatch. I think that would not be violating any arrangement which the British government would wish us to keep.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may say that I appreciate being shown the despatch. I think it would have been of more value had it been shown me sooner. As to whether it should be shown to others, that is for the government and the Prime Minister to decide, not for me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to take the responsibility of deciding the latter point. This, as far as I have been able to see it, is the first occasion on which it has seemed proper to give the despatch the publicity I am now giving to it.

I see, Mr. Speaker, it is nearly six o'clock. If it is the wish of hon. members that the House should adjourn to-night, and you are prepared to allow me to complete what I have to say at the present time, I shall try and not take long to conclude. The understanding between the Whips was, I believe, that after I had finished speaking, the hon. member for Brandon would move the adjournment of the debate, and under the circumstances the government has expressed a willingness to have the House adjourn.

May I say in reference to this despatch, that this was the first and only intimation which the government had received from the British government of a situation in the Near East which had reached a critical stage, and with respect of which there was reason to anticipate the necessity of making any kind of appeal for military assistance. I want it to be clearly understood that nothing in the way of an official communication respecting a critical situation in the Near East was received by our government from the British government prior to our receipt of the particular despatch of which I have just given the substance.

Receiving the despatch in the manner described, I immediately sent a communication to His Majesty's government somewhat along the following lines: That before it was possible to have the contents of the cable which had come from London communicated to myself or other members of the government the press of Canada carried despatches from Great Britain announcing an invitation by the British government to Canada to participate in resistance of Turkish forces by sending a contingent. I pointed out that a most embarrassing situation had arisen in consequence, that I was being asked by press representatives if any communication, and if so what communications, had been received from the British government. As the message from Great Britain had been marked secret and was in cipher, I was not at liberty to disclose its contents and I asked if the British government would cable immediately stating their wishes in the matter, and whether I was at liberty to disclose the contents of the communication in whole or in part, and if not, what communication the British government desired to have made public as coming from them. I concluded the despatch by saying that our parliament would certainly wish to have copies of all official correspondence in this matter brought down. I asked the British government clearly to indicate, as regards communications, which they might send, what, if any, should be regarded as not coming within the sphere of publicity. I felt that a request for the correspondence was a most natural and proper request, and would be made as soon as Parliament assembled, and it was my desire that if possible this document and others which might pass should be given the fullest publicity. For this reason I endeavoured at the very outset—as soon as I saw the despatch on the Sunday morning, the day following its receipt at Ottawa—to make it quite clear to the British government that as soon as parliament met the government would be confronted, as it has been this afternoon, with a request for publicity in the matter of all despatches, and that I would like the British government to give their consent to have all the correspondence brought down. I was also anxious to give at the time the fullest publicity to the despatch.

The reply I received to the part of the communication to which I have just referred, asking for permission to make the despatch public, was to the effect that it was not suitable for publication textually. The British government indicated that the substance of the despatch might be given in a general statement, but expressed the hope that the despatch itself would not be given publicity. I then gave the following statement to the press on Monday, September 18th at 6.30 p.m.

> As already mentioned the only communication which our government has thus far received with respect to the situation in the Near East from the British Government is a cable despatch marked "secret," the contents of which, without the consent of the British government we do not feel at liberty to make public. It is the view of the government that public opinion in Canada would demand authorization on the part of Parliament as a necessary preliminary to the despatch of any contingent to participate in the conflict in the Near East. The government is in communication with members of the cabinet at present in Europe as Canada's representatives at the League of Nations, and with the British government, with a view to ascertaining whether the situation that exists in the Near East is one which would justify the summoning of a special session of Parliament.

I informed the British government that our cabinet would hold daily sittings, if necessary, that we would be pleased to receive the fullest information; in particular that we wished to be informed whether in their opinion it was desirable that the Canadian parliament should be called to consider this important matter. The reply which was received to this communication was to the effect that the British government saw no necessity for the summoning of parliament.

I should have made mention earlier in this general statement of the nature of the reply sent by the government in answer to the despatch which was received. It was to the effect that as respects the sending of any contingent, it was our view that parliament alone should authorize a step of the kind, and that we would be pleased to receive the fullest information in order to decide upon the advisability of summoning parliament.

Hon. members will recall that for some days there was considerable uncertainty as to the outcome of events, and during that time the government did not deem it advisable to press the British government further in the matter of the publicity to be given to the despatches, or for an explanation of the circumstances accounting for the issue of the circular press communication advising that Canada had been invited to send a contingent to the Near East before our government had received the despatch in question. However, when the crisis appeared to have passed, we did send a further communication to the British government, asking if it were possible to have an explanation, and mentioning again our desire to give publicity to the communications that were received. A change of government came about that time in Great Britain, and the government which succeeded the previous government asked that they might have opportunity to give consideration to the matter before replying with respect to the request to make public any part of the correspondence. I have since received from the present government in Great Britain a communication with respect to publicity, and it is along the line which I have indicated to my right hon. friend.

In this connection, I might as well give to hon. gentlemen the substance of a part of a despatch which was sent on October 17. It was to the effect that as the need for the immediate summoning of Parliament was apparently passed, it was our purpose to adhere to the original intention of having parliament meet in January. That we should like to be free at that time to bring down all the correspondence that has passed between our respective governments on the Near East situation; that parliament would expect this, and that any refusal on our part to comply with the wish of parliament might create misunderstanding or misapprehension.

In reply to that request, expressing anew our desire to make public all of the correspondence, the present government in Great Britain has sent a further communication as recently as the 27th of January, stating in so many words, that they realize it may be necessary and essential for me to make a statement to parliament setting out the purport of the correspondence between the two governments, and explaining in particular the attitude of Canada, but that at the present juncture the British government would deprecate the publication of the actual text of the telegrams. Part of the correspondence it was stated was necessarily confidential. The request was repeated that a general statement only should be made and that I should refrain from laying any of the telegrams before parliament.

I have thought it only fair to the present administration in this country and to both administrations in the Old Country, to make perfectly clear the circumstances as respects the correspondence not being brought down It is solely because most of it is of that confidential character that, with the situation what it is in Europe at the present time, it would probably not be in the interest of any of the parties there that the correspondence should be made public.

I shall conclude, Mr. Speaker, by making mention anew of the words of the reply which was sent by our government on the 18th of September in reply to the despatch which came two days previously. After mentioning that the Cabinet had had under consideration the representations of the despatch received, it was stated that it was the view of the government that public opinion in Canada would demand authorization on the part of parliament as a necessary preliminary to the despatch of a contingent to participate in the conflict in the Near East; that we would welcome the fullest possible information in order to decide upon the summoning of parliament.

In this somewhat hurried manner, I have not, I regret, been able to give the House as much in the way of information as I should like to have been privileged to give; if there has been any reserve or reticence, it has been due solely to the endeavour to maintain the obligation of secrecy which has been imposed upon us in virtue of the character of the communications that have been received. As regards the part which our government has taken in this matter, I would say to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) that we have felt and feel very strongly that, if the relations between the different parts of the British Empire are to be made of an enduring character, this will only be through a full recognition of the supremacy of parliament, and this particularly with regard to matters which may involve participation in war. It is for parliament to decide whether or not we should participate in wars in different parts of the world, and it is neither right nor proper for any individual or for any group of individuals to take any step which in any way might limit the rights of parliament in a matter which is of such great concern to all the people of our country.

On motion of Mr. Forke the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 6.20 p.m.

Friday, February 2, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Fifty-fifth annual report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the year 1921-22.—Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

Return of leases of wharves, piers and breakwaters.—Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

Return of tolls and dues of government harbours, etc., for the year 1921.—Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

Fifty-fifth annual report of the Fisheries Branch of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, for the year 1921-22.—Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

Report of the Canadian Battlefields Memorials Commission from April 1, 1922, to date.—Hon. Mr. Graham.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AMALGAMATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Referring to the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday, that there had been an amalgamation of the Grand Trunk with the National system, I should like to ask if he would intimate to the House to-day what orders have been passed under the Canadian National or other Acts effecting the amalgamation, and also if he will place such orders on the Table to-day?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may promise my right hon. friend that I will place the orders on the Table to-day. I will send and get them at once.

ADDITIONAL DIRECTOR

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the same connection, some ten days ago the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) is reported to have stated, I think in the city of Quebec, that there was to be added to the new Canadian National Board another representative from that province. Is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have discussed with Sir Henry Thornton the advisability of an additional director from the province of Quebec, and Sir Henry is of opinion and the government is also of opinion, that it is desirable to have a director appointed from the city of Quebec, and one will be appointed shortly.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Putnam for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Thursday, February 1.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, reference was made in the Speech from the Throne to the Governor General's visit to the West and North. I would like to say only this, that if the Governor General received as much pleasure from his visit to the West as the western people had in welcoming him there, it was a very happy visit that he had to the West. The Governor General made a very good impression, winning the hearts of all the western people, and there is nothing but the most pleasing recollections in connection with that visit.

Might I refer for a moment to the very kind notices that were taken of myself and the position which I now hold in the party in this part of the House? During the last month or six weeks I have been learning a great deal about myself, some of it very nice, some of it, perhaps, not quite so nice. Certain ideas, however, have been borne upon my mind, one of them being that I am canny. I have never failed to find that expression used by everyone in connection with myself since I have assumed the position of leader of the Progressive party. I hope that is true, and that if I am not going to shine as a brilliant light in this position, I am not going to make any very fatal mistakes anyway. I must thank the previous speakers for the very kind notice which they took of myself. I will say only this, that I hope, no matter what may be our political differences, they shall not interfere with our personal friendships. I am one of those who believe that we may have different points of view and yet all be thoroughly in earnest in what we advocate, working for the best interest of our country as a whole, so that I hope differences in politics will be no bar to friendship.

I must compliment the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I listened with a great deal of attention to the very eloquent speech made by the mover (Mr. Putnam), and I could not but feel a certain humility when I recollected the fact that I had sat in this House all during last session and scarcely ever heard that member make a speech in this chamber, and yet found that he had a gift of oratory and expression that, perhaps, very few can equal. I am sure that the House, as well as his constituency, is to be complimented on having an hon. member capable of making an address such as he made on that occasion. I remember, while speaking in the House last session, expressing my regret that I was unable to follow the speech made by the seconder of the Address. The same difficulty has occurred this year, and I still feel the same as I did last year, sorry that I am unable to understand the French language, and although a year older, expressing the same idea that I still would like to have a knowledge of that language.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You can learn it.

Mr. FORKE: I am afraid, however, that I lack the courage and the perseverance ever to attempt any such thing at this late date. But I am going to make this statement: I have in my household some people who are younger than myself, and I hope I shall have an opportunity of seeing that they at least understand the French language when it is spoken.

I should like to say a few words in regard to the resignation of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) as leader of this group. I can assure the House that there was nothing but regret on the part of members of this party, and, I think, probably of all members in this House over the hon. gentleman's resignation as leader. There was no difference of any kind, nothing but the greatest of respect and admiration on the part of his followers, and were it not for the business with which he is connected requiring his close attention, he would still, I suppose, be occupying the same place. We are glad that he still remains a member of this House, and we are likely to see him here just as often as he possibly can come to take part in our deliberations. He was five years in public life, for some time occupying the high position of a cabinet minister, and we are glad to reflect that during all that time he had nothing but the respect and admiration not only of the House but, as well, of the people back home where he was so well known. Let me assure the House that the change in leadership will make no difference in the policies of the group in this part of the chamber. We still retain exactly the same position we have held all along. We are neither supporting nor opposing the government; we are here to give expression to and to advance the ideas and principles which we hold to be in the best interests of Canada and to see them, if possible, carried into effect in the form of legislation.

Now, we all know quite well that we are passing through a very difficult and trying period; we do not need to be told this fact. We believe, however, all of our difficulties notwithstanding, that we are to-day in a very happy position in relation to the rest of the world. Over in Europe we see a very different state of affairs. During the years when the great war was in progress we buoyed ourselves up with the conviction that this was a war to end war. We told ourselves that never again would the world be called upon to sacrifice so much and to suffer such terrible hardships. We have been disillusioned to a very large extent. We realize that human nature after all is liable to the same old weaknesses and is just as apt as of yore to go astray. Over in the old continent, the home of civilization, we find hatred and jealousy still rampant, standing in the way of peace and the re-establishment of normal conditions. There, there is economic distress which brings untold misery in its train. This world, Mr. Speaker, is growing smaller day by day, and no part of it, no matter how remote it may be, can escape some of the consequences that follow the disturbances and sufferings that are caused in any country to-day. We are realizing in Canada to-day that we shall never have a return to normal conditions, nor have real prosperity, until stable governments are re-established on the continent of Europe, until trade once again flows back and forth as in days gone by.

The Speech from the Throne states that Canada is recovering from the depression following the war and that there is less unemployment. This may be, perhaps, somewhat optimistic, although I hope it is true. Probably there has been some improvement in the situation, but we have still very many difficulties to overcome. We cannot believe that we have surmounted those difficulties, and we must set our faces resolutely towards the future and earnestly seek a solution for all these problems. In reference to the matter of unemployment mention is made of the trek towards the cities. There are many causes to which this fact can be attributed. During the war the high wages paid in connection with war industries attracted a large percentage of the rural population to the cities. A great many of the returning soldiers no doubt went back to the land, but a large proportion of those who left the country districts to work in the cities at that time never returned, and this has naturally accentuated the difficulties that have arisen by reason of the congested state of population in the cities. This condition of things, however, existed to a great extent also before the war, and the country to-day has a serious rural problem on its hands. I would emphasize the fact right here, Mr. Speaker, that this is the problem we have to solve to-day in Canada. When you have made the countryside a good place to live in and have helped to make rural homes happy and prosperous, I have no difficulty in believing, you will have gone a long way towards solving your industrial problems. I really believe that people have attempted to build up the country from the wrong end; they have tried to build it up from the industrial, instead of from the rural, point of view. The development of the natural resources of the country is the first duty that lies at the hands of the government, and nothing can be done in this direction by herding people into large cities. I might go on for quite a while stating just what was the trouble with the countryside, but I may tell you that one of the first things we have to take into consideration is the lack of remuneration. You cannot get people to stay anywhere or undertake any work if they are not going to receive adequate remuneration for their labours. In by-gone years it has not taken the young people in the country districts very long to learn that more remuneration and better conditions were to be found in the cities than in the country, and consequently they have sought them. We cannot blame those people; they did just what was natural, and what others would likely do again. Perhaps every dweller in the rural districts will agree with me in what I am about to say; at least I know it is true of my own particular district, where I am well acquainted. Look over that district and pick out the best homes and the most intelligent people, and in the great majority of cases you will find that the brightest and best of the children have left the countryside and gone to the cities. I am not going to attempt to solve the problem which that state of affairs presents; I am simply pointing out what is a fact, and I should like the government to take notice of it and endeavour to find some remedy.

The government may be congratulated upon the trade treaties which ministers have been able to make while they were abroad. I sometimes, however, wonder why such efforts should be made to secure treaties for the improvement of our trade when one of this country's policies has always been to erect barriers against international trade. It seems so contradictory. I believe that if artificial restrictions were removed trade would flow freely and naturally, to the advantage of all sections of the country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) has been over in Australia, and we have learned that he has not been very successful in his endeavours to enter into trade arrangements with the people of that continent. I am rather sorry at this, because as a true Briton I should really like to see as close connection between the countries of the British Empire as it is possible to have. But looking back a few years I cannot help wondering that such desperate efforts should be made to enter into trade treaties with nations far distant after we have ignored the opportunity we had of making a treaty with the nation that lies at our doors. I am not going to be too critical of our ministers going abroad and trying to make treaties, but I certainly desire to see closer attention paid to matters at home. We have many home problems that need looking into. We have trade commissioners in these countries abroad, and I hope they are on the job and are trying to do the business they have been sent out upon. We have only one trade commissioner in the United States, resident in New York, and it seems to me that perhaps a little more expansion might be made in that direction.

We had the Prime Minister's assurance that the railways had been co-ordinated and unified. We were glad to learn this. I am sure we heard a great deal last session about co-ordination; we have made advancement, and we find that that has been carried into effect, and I am willing to congratulate the government on that step. A new board has been created with Sir Henry Thornton as chairman. He has made a very good impression on coming to Canada. I noticed that the right hon. leader of the Opposition criticized him a little at the time it was announced he was coming to this country. I have no doubt that Sir Henry is all the better of the little touch-up that he got from the right hon. leader of the Opposition and no doubt will be very careful to carry on his duties in the way he should. However, I think we are all very anxious to see that the new board and the new manager get a good start and be afforded an opportunity to make good the situation. It is far too serious a matter for party politics, and I hope that patronage and every political aspect of the case will be removed far away, that the board will have a free hand, and that public ownership will receive a fair and just trial in the Dominion of Canada at the present time.

Much dissatisfaction has occurred this fall in regard to lake freights. A royal commission has been appointed. I am not very sure just where to apportion the blame, but I know there was a good deal of dissatisfaction in the West that some move was not made a little earlier. It seems just a little like locking the door after the horse has been stolen, and as far as the trade last fall is concerned, no remedy can now be obtained. However, we will hope for better things in the future. The farmers—and I might say all the people in the West, because it is not confined to the agricultural population—were delighted that the Crowsnest pass agreement was brought into effect this fall in the carrying of our grain. I want to be perfectly fair, and I may say that I think the right hon. leader of the Opposition is very sincere when he says his heart is sore for the people and the difficulties they have in the West; in fact I know he is sincere. But at the same time I could not forget that we had his active opposition while we fought, during the last session of parliament, for a reduction of the freight rates last fall. Perhaps it is a little hard on him to bring that up at the present time. At the same time I think it is just as well to remember those things.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to the hon. member bringing the matter up, if he is faithful to the facts. I did not oppose any reduction of rates, but I opposed the House doing what parliament had delegated to another institution.

Mr. FORKE: The effect was exactly the same anyway. However, we will let that pass. Mention is also made in the Speech from the the Throne of the question of immigration. I know that this is a very difficult subject to deal with. A great deal of criticism is coming to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), because he has been slow in making a move in this direction. I do not know that I will blame him very much for trembling on the brink a little before he makes a plunge. However, I think he might talk just a little less about it, if nothing is going to be done, because the people have been looking for quite a long while to see that stream of immigrants, that has been so much talked about, begin to flow into the country. There is a good deal of diffidence among the people of the West in regard to the matter of immigration, and if we are holding a meeting in the western provinces and mention the matter of immigration, we are immediately met with the statement, Why are you going to bring more people her when the people already here are not contented with their position? However, Mr. Speaker, I believe in immigration, and I think that immigration will help us out of a great many of our difficulties. Whatever our conditions in Canada are to-day, if we look abroad, to the Motherland or to Europe, we find conditions a great deal worse than in Canada, and I do not think we need have very much compunction in asking people to leave these countries and come to take up their lot with us. They are not, to say the least of it, coming to any worse conditions. However, notwithstanding all our difficulty, I am optimistic enough to believe that unfavourable conditions in Canada are not going to last. We have not lost faith in our country. We are having hard times in the prairie provinces, but I have not lost faith in those provinces. This year in the West we had a splendid crop, a magnificent crop, and no fault could be found with the country. The country is just as good as it ever was. The trouble was on account of economic conditions, artificial conditions, and some of them world conditions, that no one could possibly help; but we believe that these conditions are going to change, and that this great country is going to be prosperous once again. And to make it prosperous we must have capital and we must have people.

Lord Shaw, speaking in Dunfermline, Scotland, after he went back from Canada, said it was almost ridiculous to think of eight and a half or nine million people occupying half a continent, rich in natural resources, yet unable to take possession of those riches, just because they had neither the means nor the people to do it, and I believe that with increased population, with increased capital, if we can possibly get it, all of us, those who are her now and those who come here, will be in better condition. I sometimes think, when we speak of our great natural resources in Canada, that we are like the small boy who sees something well worth the having but just a little out of his reach, and he cannot obtain it. That is exactly the position we are in to-day with the great resources we have in Canada. We cannot develop them or get hold of them, because we have neither the means nor the people. I believe immigration would help our trouble to a very large extent, but the difficulty arises here: Where are you going to get the millions of people with money to come here and establish themselves in the agricultural districts of Canada? I am sorry to say that I do not believe we are going to get many immigrants of that class. I may be wrong, but I do not think so. If we look to the country to the south of us, where we are likely to get the very best class of immigrants, what is the situation? I hardly like to say it, but under present conditions we find on this side of the line that the cost of living is higher than it is on the other side of the line, and the price of agricultural products on the other side of the line is higher than in this country. What is the inducement to bring those people here under present conditions? That is one of the difficulties we have to meet, and we may just as well face it. I saw another statement—I do not know whether it was correct of not—that the Anglo-Saxon people were not an agricultural people. That perhaps may explain the trend of the people towards the city, and if you go into the States the large percentage of the farmers is not of English or French descent, but is largely German, Scandinavian and other European nationalities. I give the House that statement for what it is worth. At the same time we are quite ready to take the Scandinavian or German either, for that part of it. I do not know whether I should say that in this House, but I think it is all right. They are good farmers; we can get along with them, anyway. There is a class of immigrants we can get, and I am sure they would be a valuable asset to this country. Agricultural labourers from the British islands can be got by the hundreds—yes, by the thousands, and there is employment for them to-day right here in Canada. I do not know what the conditions are in Ontario and the eastern provinces, but I do know that there is a place for that kind of farm labourer in western Canada just as soon as he lands on this side. That is the only system of immigration that is any good—get the immigrant and have a place for him when he lands so that he can go right to work. I have no doubt that the Minister of the Interior has given this matter a great deal of consideration, so that I shall not deal with it further. I reiterate the statement, however, that I would like to see this class of people gone after, and I believe they can be got if they are sought in the right way.

It has struck me as very strange—I think the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) also referred to it yesterday—that in the Speech from the Throne no mention is made of the tariff. I do not know that I have quite recovered from the shock I received on hearing that speech and realizing that the word "tariff" had not been mentioned in it. I have lived in Canada for forty years, and it is a word that has never been out of my hearing during all that time; yet here in the most important assembly in this Dominion the matter has evidently entirely escaped notice. I sincerely hope, however, that the face of the government is still in the right direction, and that with a little encouragement they may take another step forward.

I noticed that before parliament opened the government was receiving delegations from various interests protesting against certain methods of raising taxes. Their representations may have been right or may have been wrong, but I could not help wondering what delegation had waited on the government in the interests of the common people, who, in the final analysis, actually pay the taxes. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that at least in some parts of the House the interests of the common people will be as well looked after as possible.

I have mentioned the tariff. I do not think that in this part of the House we are going to give up the fight for a reduction of duties. I do not refer so much to ploughs or farm machinery—you know, we are sometimes accused of being a little selfish;—but we would like to see the duties reduced on all the necessities of life that have to be purchased by the common people. I say that we are not going to give up the fight until we reap some reward for our endeavours.

The decennial revision of the Bank Act is due at this session. I have noted with some alarm—I do not pose as a financial authority, but I believe the matter is worthy of some examination at least—the condition under which so many financial interests in this country are concentrated in a few hands, in a few institutions. Whatever is done in regard to a revision of the Bank Act, I hope that the interests of the common people will be well protected.

I notice also that in the Speech from the Throne reference is made to the proposed appointment of a committee to inquire into agricultural problems. I understand from that that a parliamentary committee is contemplated. Now, I do not know that a parliamentary committee can go into this question just in the way that it ought to be gone into. The inquiry will have to be a real one; the matter will have to be gone into from a great many different points of view. The difficulties which have arisen in the West have been accentuated—matters affecting grain marketing and transportation—but these are not all the difficulties we have in Canada to-day. We have fruit industries; we have dairying; we have the difficulties experienced by the people down in the Maritime provinces. When I listened to the delegation that came from there the other day to interview the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) I came to the conclusion that the Maritime provinces were in just as difficult a position as we were in the West. I only hope that if a committee is appointed there will be a real investigation and that some practical solution of the problems involved will be arrived at.

I have listened to a great many speeches during the last few weeks, some of them delivered by professors of economics who have spent a good deal of time elaborating upon the different movements that have led up to the present state of agricultural depression. With bated breath I have waited to hear what the suggested solution would be, but these gentlemen generally led you up to the brink and left you there. I do not know what our professors of economics are paid for if they are only able to show us that we are in trouble and are not able to show us the way out. However, I believe that agricultural people will have to begin by helping themselves. They can do that in a great many ways, and it is my view that they have a perfect right to get into politics and try to help themselves in that way also.

All artificial restrictions must be removed and agriculture must have a fair show. And in speaking of agriculture, I want to speak for all Canada, because I go back to where I was and say again that we have got to solve this problem before we can have a prosperous country. We generally estimate the value of our products by what they will purchase. I suppose that down in the Maritime provinces, in the constituency of the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) they estimate the value of their products by calculating how many commodities a bag of potatoes will purchase. Out in the western provinces we put it this way: How much can you purchase for a bushel of wheat? Money, after all, is only a counter, and that is the way we get at values. A bushel of wheat cannot purchase very much in western Canada to-day, and the large overhead expense is one of the reasons why we are in a difficult position.

I notice also that a bill is foreshadowed "to safeguard the interests of consumers and producers." Now, we will have a splendid thing if we can get any bill that will safeguard the consumer and the producer. I heard it stated not very long ago by a very high economic authority that in a great many instances there was a spread of 300 per cent between what the manufacturer or the farmer got and what the consumer paid; on an average the spread was 100 per cent. That is something that ought to be remedied; this whole question of the distribution and handling of goods and products from the producer to the consumer is well worth the attention of the government. But we have a policy that does encourage trusts, mergers and combines and makes it possible to have those very "gentlemen's agreements" that are the source of difficulty, from the point of view of the consumer at least. I think we might have a system of economics that would remove a great many of these troubles without very much investigation.

Just a word in connection with the cattle embargo. There was some little dispute yesterday as to whether the embargo was actually removed or not. At all events, I am inclined to believe that it is going to be removed, and I am glad that this is so, because from my knowledge of agriculture, even in the western provinces, I know that their salvation depends to a very large extent upon finding a market for their cattle. The lack of such a market has been one of the causes of bad times in the last few seasons, when there was no market whatever for our cattle. It would perhaps astonish the House were I to mention the price at which cattle were sold on the public yards in the city of Winnipeg last fall. In some cases a car of cattle scarcely paid the expense of shipping them to market. Agriculture can never prosper under such conditions. Though the removing of the embargo will help to relieve the situation, I am inclined to believe that the best market we can possibly have is that great market to the south of us, and I hope every endeavour will be made to see that that gate is opened to us once again, if it be at all possible.

I want to say a few words on the subject of economy. Economy is a word we hear repeated over and over again everywhere these days. We must economize and taxation must be reduced. The burden of taxation is becoming almost too heavy to be borne. The country is weary of the load and some remedy must be found. A halt must be called in expenditure, or we shall find the ship on the rocks in a very short time. I am sorry to see that we are still adding to our national debt. This cannot go on indefinitely. It does not take a wise man to see that something is bound to happen unless some remedy is applied very promptly. I am willing to admit that we have been passing through a period of extravagance. Individuals, corporations, and governments have all been extravagant, or, I will put it this way, too optimistic; there is no question about it. But we have learned our lesson. We in this Dominion, have spent the money, and we have now to meet the bills. We are beginning to practise economy, and I am sorry to see that the Dominion of Canada has added to its public debt during the past year. That is a cause for deep disappointment to all well-wishers of our country. It is all very well to devise measures for extracting money from the pockets of the people—and I pay this tribute to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) he is an adept at that; he deserves all the credit that can come to him as the financier for the government—at the same time, getting money in order to spend it will not solve any of our problems. I think all parties are agreed to-day that something must be done to reduce expenditure. We might have some measure of civil service reform, for instance. I believe that the government of the country is costing too much, and that economies could be effected in that direction. I think the three parties in this House might well get together on a matter of this kind and try and work out some arrangement for reducing the expenditure under this head. I know it is very difficult for any government to attempt to reform the civil service. In fact, it is almost saying good-bye to office to do so. At the same time, I believe we are all sufficiently in earnest on this question to get together and try and do something to reduce the cost of carrying on the business of this country.

There must be no return to patronage. Since becoming a member of parliament, I have thanked my stars time and again that there was a Civil Service Commission. We want no return to the old order of things.

We are promised a measure of redistribution. That matter will be taken up in a way that I think will be satisfactory to all sections of the House.

Just a word in regard to our national status. I do not intend to take up any time in dealing with this matter at this particular moment, but I would like to say here, that I like to count myself a loyal citizen of the British Empire. I am proud of that connection, and I hope that nothing will ever occur to make me feel less proud of it. At the same time, I agree with the steps that were taken by the Prime Minister and with his government's reply to the telegram that was sent from the Prime Minister of Great Britain last fall. I agree with the position that the government took at that time. I hope that whatever measures may be taken, nothing will be done to retard the progress of Canada as a nation controlling her own destinies within the British Empire.

In conclusion, I would make a few recommendations:

Trade. I would say, increase trade by the removal of trade barriers, and increase the British preference.

Unemployment. I would encourage the industries where unemployment does not exist to-day—agriculture, etc.

Railways. I would give Sir Henry Thornton a fair trial, and in so far as possible, give government business to the government railways.

Great Lakes freight rates. Speed up the investigation, and make it a real one.

Anti-trust bill. It would not be necessary to find a cure if prevention were exercised, and the best prevention is to take away the tariff on which combines, trusts and mergers flourish. Every industry needing protection should be made to prove it. This would eliminate profiteering of this kind.

Immigration. The best immigrant that ever comes to Canada is the one which the stork brings to the Canadian home. We should study how to keep at home those we already have. Secondly, we should see that there is a job awaiting every immigrant. If there is no job, then no immigrant. There are plenty of jobs at the present time for agricultural workers.

The Bank Act. This needs careful study, not from the banker's standpoint, but from the people's standpoint. I am going to give all the encouragement I can in that line of business.

Redistribution. I should like to see a measure of proportional representation applied to the urban centres, as a trial.

Vimy Ridge Monument. I am glad that the French government has made a present of 250 acres to the Dominion government upon which a monument is to be erected. Putting up a great monument to the dead is doing what is right. But while we remember those who gave up their all, let us not forget the living who may need our attention.

International agreements. These should be in accord with the national and individual conscience. The Golden Rule might well be applied in an international sense. I believe Canada should stand by the League of Nations.

The Tariff. There is nothing in the Speech from the Throne on the most important matter of policy which has been before this country for the last forty or fifty years. We still demand further reductions on the necessaries of life. Cheaper food and clothing are far more essential than cheaper ploughs and binders.

Civil Service. Fair warning—no tampering with the Civil Service Act. A return to patronage is unthinkable. If the Civil Service Act is not functioning properly, it is the fault of the personnel, and not of the Act itself.

Taxation. It is time that municipal, provincial and federal authorities learned to "cut the coat according to the cloth." There is too great a tendency to make estimates and then seek new ways and means of taxation to provide the money. For a change, why not approach the problem from the other angle? —Estimate what money can be raised without oppression, and readjust national expenditures to keep within those estimates.

National debt. No plan appears to be under consideration for the reduction of the national debt. An increase in last year of $45,000,000 is a matter for some alarm, but the government appears to have no project under consideration whereby this staggering debt of nearly two and a half billion dollars is to be reduced. I would urge the government to formulate a plan whereby something definite and concrete may be done in the way of reducing this debt.

Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen, I thank you for your very kind attention.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, there are certain points in the Speech from the Throne upon which I should like to comment from the standpoint of labour. When I came into this building I had rather a curious sensation of how far removed the concerns of this assembly are from the actual life of a large number of people of Canada. During the recess I have had the opportunity of moving back and forth, and talking to a great many of those whom the hon. leader of the Progressives has called the common people of Canada; and I think I would agree with him that they are the most important people in the Dominion. And yet in the Speech to which we have listened there is comparatively little that bears directly upon the welfare of that great mass of people. It is now more than four years since the great war came to a close. Conditions the world over are in a bad way. We know the horrible conditions in Europe; and I think no thoughtful man, or no student of economics but must realize that very fundamental changes are necessary if we are to be able to solve even our local problems. And yet, I submit, there is very little in the Speech from the Throne which would indicate any thoroughgoing changes in our policy. Some of the same old policies are brought forward that we have been familiar with since our childhood. We are told again, that now the war is over we are to bring in more people; as if we had not had a progressive immigration policy fifteen or twenty years ago. We are told that we have to arrange for foreign markets; as if the old national policy of Canada was not very largely built up on securing foreign markets. We have had these things; they have gotten us nowhere.

I think, perhaps, I am rather glad in many ways that the tariff was left out of the Speech from the Throne. It is possible that we are getting down to a rather more serious consideration of the actual situation—the recognition that, after all, the tariff is not fundamental in our economic solutions.

Although we have been running behind to the extent of some $45,000,000 there is no indication in the Speech from the Throne that we are to have any lessening of the taxation on the great mass of the people. Nor is there any scheme proposed by which this great debt may be in any wise reduced. Sometimes I think that those responsible for the policies of this country almost resemble a cornered rat, as he darts first into one corner and then into another in order to try a way of escape, and then even after he has been the rounds he starts again and darts into the self same corners.

It has been given out very generally that we have comparatively little unemployment in Canada and I think that this year, at least, as representing a section of the people largely interested in this question, I shall have to deal first of all with this subject. May I read an excerpt from the Daily Mail, of London, bearing date December 15, 1922:

> An appeal for more British emigrants to Canada was made by the Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons, Mr. Rodolphe Lemieux, at a luncheon given in his honour by the Empire Parliamentary Association at the House of Commons restaurant. He said: "There is no unemployment in Canada. There is work for all those who are anxious to do work—to work more than eight hours a day. We are anxious to increase our population of labourers and farmers, and we expect that that stock will come from the British Isles."

I trust that the speaker has been incorrectly reported; but the point is, that the information is going out very widely that we have little or no unemployment in Canada. I notice that in the Speech from the Throne reference is made to the diminution of unemployment. May I read an advertisement that appeared a few weeks ago in the Manitoba Free Press of my own city:

> Public Notice
> The Council of the city of Regina have by resolution declared that the policy of the city will be one of utterly refusing relief to any person. Notice is further given that there is not sufficient work during the winter months for the present residents, and the public are warned against coming here in search of work.
> JAMES GRASSICK,
> Mayor.
> GEO. BEACH,
> City Clerk.

In commenting upon that the Manitoba Veteran says:

> We read and hear a lot about the various brands of "red" isms, which seek to undermine our freedom, our constitution, and our civilization; but if any thing more anarchistic can be found in all the red propaganda than this "starve and be damned" pronouncement of a constituted body, we would like to hear of it.

Let me now read a letter that was forwarded by the Mayor of the city of Winnipeg to the Prime Minister:

> This winter it has been necessary for the city to open up a special emergency unemployment relief office similar to that opened during the winters of 1920-21 and 1921-22. There are being relieved at the present time, through these offices 583 married men with 1,630 children, making a total of 2,781 persons and 146 single men, making a total of 729 cases and 2,927. This certainly indicates an abnormal condition. Winnipeg, during the time of depression, is the focal point to which the unemployed of western Canada come in the hope there will be a better chance of getting work, and consequently it is called upon to look after persons who are not really citizens. These persons might be called "Dominion citizens at large," but at the same time they cannot be allowed to starve and this is one of the reasons why Federal aid is sought. Of the total of 583 families now being cared for, representing 2,781 persons, 202 cases are families of returned soldiers or over one-third of the total. In the case of single men, unfit for farm or busy work, the percentage of returned soldiers is considerably greater, out of a total of 146 men there are 104 returned soldiers. I quote for your information the particulars in regard to several typical cases in the classes of "returned soldiers" and "Dominion Citizens at large."

From England, three months, ex-army No. 203, married, three children, wife pregnant. The above-noted man arrived from England the latter part of September and with the exception of a few weeks work in October has been a public charge. His health is poor and his eldest child is only fourteen. This family, due to the condition of his wife, are unable to support themselves, having no person with an earning power in the family.

Ontario resident, No. 27, three months in Manitoba, married, one child, wife sick. The above man left Ontario to farm in Alberta in the spring of 1922. Attempted to return to Toronto and obliged to stop over in Winnipeg on account of wife's confinement. Is destitute and wishes to return East.

Soldier settler: returned soldier, married, six children. This man had farm under Soldier Settlement Board for three years, but was obliged to give same up this fall. Came to Winnipeg and with exception of temporary employment at Canadian National shops on arrival, has been out of work. No employment for two months before registration.

And there is a long list of similar cases which the mayor assures us are typical. This condition is not confined to Winnipeg. For example, in the city of Montreal an organization which is under the direction of one of the most capable and careful social welfare experts states:

The general secretary of the Montreal Council of Social Agencies is of the opinion that there is just as much unemployment and just as much distress this winter as last. In his report for last year he states that 1,777 came or were directed to them for assistance of one kind or another, as against 1,400 in 1921. Sixty per cent of these cases were classed as "sickness," and this amounted to about 1,080.

The report says:

Much of this illness had been preventable were it possible to provide right living conditions for these families. Among citizens who have sufficient means to live in houses decently built and properly heated, who have plain, wholesome food to meet the demands of normal appetites, who have proper clothes to secure protection against heat, cold, wind and rain, and who can enjoy recreational facilities, there is comparatively little illness. But to the man and woman who must leave a cold flat to face colder weather with thin clothing and poor shoes, who knows not the luxury of the necessitous pair of rubbers and work for hours in wet foot gear, to the ill-fed scantily clothed youngsters who lose much of the value of schooling because they are not in a fit physical condition to enable their mental equipment to assimilate the knowledge presented, illness of a more or less serious nature is a very constant and disagreeable visitor.

We in this country might well set our own house in order, might very well care for the thousands, the tens of thousands, of people who are more or less living the life described by the general secretary of social agencies, before we begin to talk very much of bringing in more people to swell the ranks of the unemployed. If my memory serves me aright, the government last year accepted a resolution which was passed by this House, that it was a certain responsibility of theirs to furnish a scheme to provide for the unemployed in Canada. We have yet to hear what policy the government is going to adopt on that point.

An immigration scheme has been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and that scheme has been outlined and given to the press by the Acting Minister of Immigration. We find that it is proposed to adopt a progressive immigration policy again, to carry on an advertising campaign in the older lands and in the United States. We are told that our free lands are exhausted. Before, we had free lands to offer. We no longer can offer free lands in western Canada, and we are told that the immigrants who are desired are the tenant farmers and agricultural workers. For a great many years in this country it was our ideal for Canada that every man who went to work on a farm might ultimately own a farm of his own. Now it seems that that time is past and that all that we can offer as an inducement to the immigrant is that he may become an agricultural labourer or a tenant farmer. Secondly, we are told that we are to have household workers. I suppose that means young girls who will, for a time, serve in the homes, in the cities or on the farms. I might say that they are not going to remain very long in that condition and that that is not going to be any very great addition to the whole population and the permanent productivity of this country. We are told further that we are to have orphan children brought over to this country. I verily believe that if we would give simply half a chance to the people who are already in this country, they would be able to rear children in Canada instead of having to go overseas to secure them. This is a real trouble. To-day, whether in the rural districts or in the urban districts, the ordinary wage earner finds it is practically impossible to bring up a family in decency. Further, we have been told during the last few weeks or few months that we are going to have a national settlement land plan. Paid advertisements were put forth some weeks ago in our newspapers. Let me read the opening paragraph from one of them, from the Calgary Daily Herald of September 12:

> The National Land Settlement Plan. The British and Canadian Governments have joined with the Canada Colonization Association and the Canadian railways in a co-ordinated land settlement plan covering all the provinces. An efficient colonization machine is being set up and will begin to operate forthwith. Colonization in Canada has been at a comparative standstill ever since 1913. Yet nothing is clearer than that effective land settlement on a comprehensive scale is the only available solution of the country's pressing economic and financial problems. By increasing the farming population and agricultural production throughout Canada, we shall lower freight rates, stimulate business, lighten the burden of the national debt to every individual family, lessen federal, provincial, and municipal taxation, and go far to eliminate the serious annual deficit on the National railways.

That sounds suspiciously like the old protectionist programme that most of us have listened to for a very long time. In fact, I cannot but be struck with the great similarity which exists between that programme and another that was given great publicity just three years previously, namely, June 25, 1918, as a national policy. I fancy the two are written by the same hand, and I would venture to suggest that the one will go the way of the other, because we are fighting against great economic forces and we are not attempting the real solutions. With regard to that land settlement plan. I should like to read what one group of workers thinks of it. I quote from the Alberta Labour News of September 23:

> The first thing necessary in order to intelligently criticize the plan is to examine the details thereof. We can do this by taking the figures of the Association. A settler buys a quarter section of land for twenty dollars per acre, or $3,200 for the 160 acres. He pays two dollars per acre down, or $320, leaving a balance unpaid of $2,880. For the first two years he makes no further payment, but the interest accrued during this period is added to the principal. This creates a curious situation. At the end of three years he owes more than the original price of the land, the $320 he has paid in cash being more than eaten up by the interest. In the third year the purchaser begins to pay $234.34 per year on the principal and interest. After paying this amount annually for eight years or ten years, after he started on the venture, the purchaser still owes $3.15 more than he did after making his first cash payment. Or in other words, after paying, $2,194.72 to the vendor after ten years of toil to develop a farm from raw prairie the purchaser has a smaller equity in the land than when he made his first payment ten years before.
> The plan provides for thirty-two years in which the purchaser may pay for the land at the annual rate of $234.34. At the end of the period he will have paid $7,350 for his farm, or $4,150 more than the nominal purchase price. In other words, he will have paid $4,150 interest on the $2,880 which was the unpaid balance after he had made his first cash payment.

I submit that no emigrant who understands the situation will fall for a real estate exploitation scheme of that character. Let me look for a moment at our immigration policy in the past. The expenditures in promoting and regulating immigration, from 1898 to 1908, the period during which our immigration policy was in full swing, amounted to $6,779,823. By the way, I take my figures from a United States Senate document, in which I find the best study of Canadian immigration problems that I have met with. Of the amount spent outside Canada, 45 per cent was spent in the United States, 38 per cent in the United Kingdom and 16 per cent in Continental Europe. Let us look at the figures in regard to the United States. In 1901, there were in Canada 4,761,815 native born Canadians. In 1910, when the census was taken in the United States, there were in that country 1,181,255 native born Canadians, as well as large numbers of trans-Atlantic emigrants who had been temporarily resident in Canada. Now, what has been accomplished with all this vast expenditure of money in the United States? In 1909, we received approximately 60,000 immigrants from the United States, of whom Scandinavians, Germans, Italians, English, Russian and Scotch predominated. But we lost 53,448, almost as many as we gained. And the American report notes the fact that a very large proportion of these were skilled labourers. According to their country of origin, our immigrants may be classed as British, Continental or United States. The British immigrants have invariably shown a tendency to drift to the cities, and afterwards a considerable number of them —especially skilled labourers—go to the United States. In the case of Continental immigrants, we are faced with the serious problem of mixed nationalities. We find that in the last few years large numbers of Mennonites, who were amongst our very best settlers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, have been forced to cross the border into the United States; and I believe that negotiations are now in progress looking to the Doukhobours leaving this country to go back to their homeland, Russia. So far as United States immigration is concerned, as I have said, we cannot even hold our own with that country, as has been proved as the years have come and gone. Classified according to the work they do, immigrants are very largely either farmers or farm labourers, or industrial workers. I suggest that before we adopt a progressive immigration policy we should very carefully consider the agricultural conditions in western Canada and the labour conditions in the Canadian cities from coast to coast.

Let me say a word or two with regard to the financial situation with which we find ourselves faced. Surely we do not need to go very deeply into economics to understand that something is very radically wrong with conditions in Canada when we have abundant natural resources, with plants lying idle, when there is a world in dire need of goods, and when, on the other hand, there are large numbers of unemployed. I turn to our big financial institutions and ask what light they can throw on the question, and I find in their annual reports that they have to tell us of huge crops and large exports of live stock, greater than we have ever had before, and yet all these things at very inadequate prices. They have to tell us of large numbers of failures in the business world; they have to tell us of the immense deficits in our government and other public bodies. And yet at the same time they tell us of their own great gains. I wonder whether it will not make some of us suspicious as to whether or not the financial structure itself is sound. My colleague (Mr. Irvine) last year suggested that we should have an inquiry, not merely into the present system of banking, but, one deeper than that, into the whole present system of currency and credit itself. It seems to me that we are not going to get very far if we begin merely to tinker with the present banking system without getting deeper down than that. Most of us find ourselves somewhat at a loss to follow all the details of what the economists tell us about money. But I may venture to put forward several propositions in this connection. Sometimes we confound money with wealth. This country may be poor so far as money goes, but I submit we have all the wealth that ever we had. We are told we ought to economize, but it may well be that the more we economize the worse off we are. One of the great needs of to-day is that the ordinary people of the country should be given buying power, which they do not at the present time possess. Money is not wealth; at best it merely represents wealth, real or potential. Some of the banks are trying to delude us into the belief that there still exists a gold standard. The interim report of Lord Cunliffe's Committee on Currency and Foreign Exchanges says:

1. Before the war this country possessed a complete and effective gold standard.

2. During the war the conditions necessary to the maintenance of that standard have ceased to exist.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I submit that Walker is correct when he says that "money is that money does" and that to-day the cheque currency is the real currency of the country. It is a well-known law of economics that the value of money depends on the quantity in circulation. It depends ultimately on the community credit, but is mechanically controlled by the amount issued. What do we see round about us to-day? That money is a public utility, as Adam Smith said many years ago, a highway through the air, and yet this is monopolized by a comparatively small group of the people. The banks may be quasi-public institutions, but they are managed in the interest of a comparatively small number of people. I have sometimes thought that the financial situation in Canada might be illustrated in some such way as this: Suppose that all this country was dependent upon irrigation for its agricultural production, and suppose that one group of people controlled the Fraser river in the west: another group controlled the great rivers that pour their waters through the Nelson river into Hudson bay: another group controlled the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence, and so on, and that through underground canals the waters of all these great rivers might be pooled. The men that controlled such an irrigation system as that would be absolute in their control. They could make of Ontario a wilderness, or they could make the prairies to blossom as the rose. Have we not the same condition prevailing with regard to our financial affairs to-day? A small number of people, some seventeen different groups, are able to draw a tribute from every country district, from every little hamlet and every town, and through the control of the community credit they are able to determine where things will be produced and what will be produced. Never was there a dictatorship so absolute as that which we have to-day. We are not going to get very far until we recognize that fact frankly, and get at the foundation of the financial control that exists.

The Speech from the Throne refers to the fact that we can never hope to have prosperous conditions in Canada until conditions in the Old World become more stable. I am sure we are all very glad to have seen that commercial arrangements or treaties have been made between this country and France and between this country and Italy. I sometimes wonder why it is that those in authority should feel free to make a treaty with Italy when they have failed to make treaties and failed to enter into commercial relationships with a much greater country, the great country of Russia. I take it, that if we deprecate the Russian revolution which was brought about by a measure of force we ought also deprecate the revolution in Italy which was brought about by force. If we recognize the government of the latter country, for the life of me I cannot see any reason why we should not recognize the government of the former country. Personally—and I think I am speaking for a very large number of the labour people in Canada—I should like to express endorsation of the action of the government this fall in regard to its action in the Near East trouble. I am sure it was a tremendous relief to a great number of the people of Canada when they found the Premier of this country did not intend to plunge this country into war without the consent of parliament. I want to compliment the Premier on adopting a policy which is, I believe, essentially in line with the very best Liberal traditions. But, on the other hand, I take it that a negative attitude with regard to European affairs cannot very well be maintained. It would seem to me that we must ultimately face the alternative: that either we shall have to develop into what is practically an independent nation, or else we shall have to set up machinery by which we can have an effective voice in the affairs of the British commonwealth. I do not know which way events will drive us, but I think we ought to frankly face that alternative. I for one should like to have seen the government bring before us at this time some policy which would enable us to define more clearly our relationship to the British Empire. The Premier in his speech yesterday dwelt upon the right of parliament to decide this question of parliament being consulted before Canada embarked on war. I agree with him. On the other hand he refuses, at the request of the British government, to place before this House certain correspondence which was said to be confidential. Mr. Speaker, as a representative of the people of this country, I claim that I, and the whole body of citizens, have a perfect right to know what negotiations are proceeding between Canada and the United Kingdom. It may be all very true that the present government may say that they will take no step to commit us to war without submitting the matter to parliament, but, on the other hand, we all know that negotiations may be going on steadily, which practically commit the country to war before we reach the final step where parliament is to be consulted. If we really believe in democracy we ought to do away with secret diplomacy in every form.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is it his opinion, inasmuch as the British government have asked that certain cables which they have sent to this government should not be made public, that the government should decline to meet their wishes in that matter?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is for the Premier to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am asking the hon. member if he would kindly give the House his views.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would refuse to allow Canada to continue to be placed in such a position as that. It is impossible that we can continue in that relationship very long, and I think that we ought to insist, as I have said, on the adoption of one or the other alternative, either that of independence, recognizing that we are not in honour bound to do just what Great Britain says or, on the other hand, that machinery should at once be set up which would enable us to have an effective voice in the determination of the policy of the British Empire. Personally, I am afraid of Imperialism. I was reading the other day a book written some twenty years ago by Mr. J. A. Hobson, and I should like to quote one or two excerpts, because I am firmly convinced that whilst we all, I take it, in this House, as true Britishers, should have a profound respect for the Old Land, we recognize that many of the policies that have been given to the world in the name of Great Britain are, in reality, policies of only a very small section of the British people. A very few weeks after the attempt was made to involve this country in this imperial question we find the government was turned out of power, and another government put in its place. Mr. Hobson says:

> Imperialism is the endeavour of the controllers of industry to broaden the channel for the flow of the surplus wealth by seeking foreign markets and foreign investments, to take off the goods and capital they cannot sell or use at home. . . . It is not too much to say that the modern foreign policy of Great Britain is primarily a struggle for profitable markets of investment to a larger extent each year. Great Britain is becoming a nation living on tribute from abroad and the classes who enjoy the tribute have an ever increasing incentive to employ the public policy, the public purse, and the public force to extend the field of their private investments.

Mr. Cecil Rhodes, you remember, said rather cynically that "Her Majesty's flag is the greatest commercial asset in the world." Mr. Brailsford, in "The War of Steel and Gold," published before the war, says:

> In 1909, as Sir George Paish stated in a paper which he read to the Royal Statistical Society, our profits prove from foreign and colonial investments amounted to $140,000,000. One no longer inquires why the unaggressive, anti-militarist, anti-imperialist Liberalism of the free-trading England, which was content to take Cobden as its guide, has given place to the expansionist, militarist, financially-minded Imperialism of today . . . . Both our navy and our army overseas are an insurance provided and maintained by the nation at large for the capital owned abroad by our business class. The formal rights of control which the House of Commons enjoys are exceedingly limited. . . . Its assent is not required for a declaration of war, which means that it cannot interfere effectually before the event to delay a rupture to enforce arbitration, or to overthrow a minister who has failed to exhaust on behalf of peace all the resources of diplomacy. . . . A secret treaty is for us no less binding than a public instrument.

Mr. A. G. Gardiner, the great publicist, the great Liberal of England, complained bitterly of the development which had taken place in British procedure when he said that the authority of the British House of Commons with regard to foreign affairs was little more than that of a village debating society. Now, if that is the development which has taken place in Great Britain, I say that we in Canada shall be very foolish indeed if we place ourselves in such a position that we must endorse, or feel in honour bound to endorse, the policies that may be carried out over there in the interests of a very small group. I think we are not encouraged to give easy endorsation to what may be said from London when we consider the last war. I say frankly that this country was tricked, as other countries were, with regard to the real causes of the last war. At the Conference held August 4, 1917, Mr. Lloyd George declared:

What are we fighting for? To defeat the most dangerous conspiracy ever plotted against the liberty of nation, carefully, skilfully insidiously, clandestinely plotted in every detail with ruthless, cynical determination.

That was the idea given to the world at large, but Mr. Lloyd George himself, after the war was over, says—on December 23, 1920:

The more one reads memoirs and books written in the various countries of what happened before August 1st, 1914, the more one realizes that no one at the head of affairs quite meant war at that stage. It was something into which they glided, or rather staggered and stumbled, perhaps through folly, and a discussion, I have no doubt, would have averted it.

Mr. Lloyd George tells us afterwards—after thousands and tens of thousands and millions of men had laid down their lives—that a discussion would have averted the war. In a book, "Peaceless Europe," which is really great in that it reveals much of the war, Francesco S. Nitti tells us:

I cannot say that Germany and her Allies were solely responsible for the war which devastated Europe. . . . That statement which we all made during the war was a weapon to be used at the time. Now that the war is over, it cannot be used as a serious argument. . . .

When it will be possible to examine carefully the diplomatic documents of the war and time will allow us to judge them calmly, it will be seen that Russia's attitude was the real and underlying cause of the world conflict.

Thus we perceive very clearly that the fairy stories that were told us concerning the war were told us simply to keep up the morale of the people at that particular time. We were deceived as to the causes of the war; we were deceived during the war as to the real aims of the allies. Secret treaties were made which are only now being brought to light. And then, by that infamous Treaty of Versailles, it was possible to carry on the war after the war. Some of the leaders of a great many of the European nations today are recognizing that we are not going to have permanent peace in Europe until we have a revision of the terms of the Treaty of Versailles. Some of you remember Mr. Maynard Keyne's characterization of that treaty. We remember that it violated the terms on which our enemy laid down their arms. The best statesmen have recognized that it has led to the chaos that exists in Europe to-day.

I wish to place on record a policy which I might almost call a world policy, given, as it was, to the peoples of Europe by the great Trades Union Congress which met recently at the Hague, and concerning which I have seen very little in our Canadian papers. In his opening speech on December 9, J. H. Thomas, from the chair, stated that this Trade Union Congress represented, due allowance having been made for overlapping, no less than forty millions of people. What do the workers in Europe believe? The main points which the congress supported were the following:

(1) Revision of the peace treaties.

(2) Resistance to militarism and armaments, and control of the armament industry.

(3) Admission of Germany and all nations into a revised league of peoples.

(4) The suppression of secret treaties and secret diplomacy.

(5) The use of all means to combat war, including the general strike if the outbreak of war is actually threatened.

(6) Educational efforts in all directions to ingeminate ideas of peace and internationalism.

(7) Opposition to the occupation of the Ruhr and all coercive action to secure reparations.

(8) Acceptance of the German promise to repair the devastated areas of France and Belgium.

(9) Submission to the League of Nations of the proposal for an international loan to supersede debts and indemnities.

Yesterday we heard the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) urge that we should give sureties for peace. Mr. Speaker, I submit that guarantees for the peace of Europe and for the world are not military guarantees. It is only as we bring about fundamental economic changes in our industrial and financial system; it is only as we recognize more clearly that the world today has become a unit and that instead of my neighbour's welfare being disadvantageous to me, my neighbour's prosperity is my prosperity—it is only as we change this system and as we develop good will among the nations that we can hope for permanent peace. My greatest ambition for this country of mine is that Canada, lying side by side with the great American republic, a friendly country, allied also by ties of blood and sentiment with the great Motherland, and allied, I am glad to think, with other nations of Europe, should not follow weakly the policies of older nations and older periods but take a foremost place in bravely blazing a path to that better day to which I believe we are all looking.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, it is my desire to make a few remarks, some of them growing out of the Speech itself, and some of them prompted by the discussion that has taken place upon it. Like preceding speakers, I wish to offer my congratulations to the hon. member who moved this Address (Mr. Putnam). I listened with a great deal of pleasure as he expressed himself so felicitously yesterday in regard to the subject matter in hand, and I am sure we all regret that we have not heard from him more on former occasions. I am glad to say this because I intend shortly to offer one criticism upon one of the remarks he made in the course of his address. But first let me congratulate also the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Rheaume), who seconded the motion for an Address. Like most members in our corner of the House I am unable to understand the French language. That is our misfortune. But I have no doubt that the address given by the hon. member, from the way in which it was received by those who did understand it, was well worth listening to, and I shall look forward with a great deal of pleasure to his addressing the House in English, when I am sure I shall experience the delight I have so often experienced before, sometimes mixed with envy at the facility with which the French-speaking members of this House speak the English language.

I said that I would offer one criticism in regard to a certain remark made by the hon. member who moved the Address. It is in regard to the question of the natural resources of the western provinces. I shall quote his remarks from yesterday's Hansard:

> But when we approach these accountings and try to balance this unique ledger, I ask our friends from the West to remember that the boon of responsible government as a spiritual heritage for all Canada is something in the battle for which the eastern provinces alone bore the brunt, the tedium, the delay, the expense, and, here and there the bloodshed. Let our friends, as I think they will, give due credit for that asset which was won by the East.

Mr. Speaker, we glory in the past of our country. We honour and esteem those men who fought for responsible government. It is true the East fought for responsible government, because then there was no West; but that heritage, Sir, is as much our heritage as theirs, and in discussing this question of the natural resources we do not propose to trade off our share of that inheritance for anything else. I belong to a race which has been closely identified with everything that makes for freedom and liberty. I glory in the past, in all that has been done in the way of obtaining human freedom. I glory in the Cromwellian traditions, in the traditions of the Earl of Chatham, and in all that has been done in Canada to secure greater freedom for the people, and I would like to make this remark: that the principle enunciated here is no less, to my mind, a false principle when it is uttered in such a gentlemanly way as it was yesterday than when it is enunciated in the brutal form in which has sometimes been stated in the past. I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, of the danger of transgressing the bounds that have been set by good taste upon introducing personal allusions, but I think perhaps I can best impress upon the members of this House by a personal allusion what I regard as the fallaciousness of this argument. I again make an apology for this personal reference, which I am introducing only to emphasize the point I want to make.

About a hundred years ago there settled in the township of Caledon, west of Toronto, a township that is now part of the constituency represented by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Charters)—although, if I am well informed, he did not get his majority from Caledon, but it increased in proportion as he drew nearer to Toronto—there settled in that township a band of Scotch people who brought with them from old Caledonia the traditions of freedom and liberty that were inherent in the people of the Scotch hills. When the strenuous times of 1837 arose, where was the natural place for these men to find themselves? Side by side with William Lyon Mackenzie, and that is where they were. Among these people were my own ancestors. Three of my grandmother's brothers shouldered the rifle. Two of them stood their trial, and one of them, a younger man, just a boy, was sent home. One of his sons told me the other day that he still cherishes as his dearest possession the rifle which his father carried on that occasion. My grandfather helped to take the grandfather of the present Prime Minister out of the country, and on one occasion he had him in that underground railroad, hidden under a bunch of straw on a sleigh.

I refer to this, Mr. Speaker, in order to emphasize the point that I have an inheritance in this tradition of our family that helped to win responsible government, and I do not want the other members of my family who still live in and around old Tory Toronto to say to me: You have forfeited your share in that family heritage because you moved to the western prairies. I want to say this to the eastern gentlemen: Do not introduce an argument of that kind into the discussion of the natural resources question; for to my mind it is an absolutely fallacious one.

I shall not criticize the Speech from the Throne in its general aspect. I took occasion after some of the criticisms that were made yesterday by the right hon. leader of the Opposition to read over the different speeches from the Throne made in the years 1920 and 1921, and I find so far as his general criticisms were concerned, that they might just as well have been offered to those former speeches—and possibly the same kind of criticism was offered to them as was offered yesterday. I have noticed since being in the House that circumstances sometimes alter cases, and it makes a difference whose ox is being gored. There are two or three things, however, I should like to refer to.

I shall not elaborate at any great length on conditions in the West. The hon. leader of this group who has preceded me has, I think, done full justice to that subject. We do not like to appear in the position of being calamity howlers, but perhaps another illustration, and again a personal one, for which I must apologize, will show the condition of things better perhaps than anything else can do. In the year 1912 I bought a wagon for use on the farm and it cost me $78 cash. It was a fully equipped farm wagon with a three decked-box—a type perfectly familiar to gentlemen from the prairies. My crop, if I remember aright, I sold for 70 cents a bushel. Now remember—$78 for a wagon and wheat selling at 70 cents a bushel! Last fall I found that I needed a wagon box to put on this same wagon, the old one having become useless in the meantime. I paid $67 for the box alone, and for my wheat I got 78 cents a bushel net. Now I think these figures will show you that the thing which is confronting the agriculturist to-day is the fact that the old equilibrium between the price he received for his products and the price of the articles he bought for carrying on his work has not been restored. Illustrations of that kind might be multiplied indefinitely, but I think one is sufficient.

Reference has been made to the control of lake rates. I am certain that we hail with approval the action of the government in appointing a royal commission to investigate these rates. Just how far they have been dilatory in taking cognizance of the situation I am not going to say at the present time. Undoubtedly the loss to the western agriculturist during the past season has been serious; we have lost through the combine, if it be a combine, whatever advantage we hoped to have gained through the diminution of freight rates.

If the cattle embargo should be removed we will herald it as, at least, a measure of relief to the farmers of Canada who are producing cattle for the market. To my own mind the question of the cattle embargo today is not as serious a thing for Canada as it was thirty years ago when the restriction was imposed. Since that time we have had a large demand growing up in the United States for cattle of a particular class, which we could raise at a profit. My personal opinion is, could we secure that market for the class of cattle we have it would be of infinitely more value to us than the British market would be under present conditions. Nevertheless, I deem it desirable that every possible effort should be put forth to secure and to retain for us that market; and when the time comes to award the honour for the removal of the embargo I would like that the Minister of Agriculture in the province of Ontario should not be forgotten. Because he was responsible in a large measure, I believe, for bringing the matter to the attention of the British people—not perhaps to the attention of the British government direct, but to the attention of the British people—and was responsible for the organization of a campaign which finally resulted in the government of Great Britain taking action in the matter.

Were we assured that a full inquiry into all that relates to the grain trade was to take place forthwith we would look forward to it with a great deal of satisfaction. In my own judgment that can best be done by the appointment of a royal commission if we can get a good one. If we cannot get that kind of a tribunal it cannot do us any very effective service; but I believe a good royal commission could serve the interests of the whole country better than any other body could. There is undoubtedly a feeling of dissatisfaction among the people of the West. It may be that some of the dissatisfaction is uncalled for; but the feeling of suspicion is there—that in some way certain interests are absorbing an undue amount of the value of our product in its passing through the various hands; and if it is only to allay this suspicion, and to show that this feeling is unfounded, I think the $40,000 set apart last year for the prosecution of such an inquiry would be well spent. To me it was a disappointment when I read in the newspapers the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) that that inquiry would not take place because there seemed to be no demand for such an investigation. I shall not deal at any great length with this matter; undoubtedly we shall have occasion to discuss it at greater length as the session goes on.

But there is one subject on which I would like to make a few remarks. It arose naturally in the matters dealt with by the 5 p.m. Prime Minister when presenting to us a statement as to the correspondence that had taken place between this government and the government of Great Britain —I refer to the question of the British Empire, or the British Commonwealth of Nations as some are pleased to term it. The British Empire is something unique. We have had nothing like it in all the course of human history. I have been reading with great pleasure during the last few months H. G. Wells' "Outline of History," and it is a wonderfully interesting book. He gives us a picture of the rise and fall of republics, kingdoms and empires; but in all the pictures which he presents to us of these various states and communities that have been created since the dawn of civilization there is nothing that in any way resembles the British Empire of to-day. It is something unique in that it is built upon mercy, justice and freedom. I appreciate the reference made by the honourable member (Mr. Putnam) who moved the Address yesterday to the expulsion of the Acadians, the hon. gentleman pointing out that such a thing could never be done again by British people. I think sometimes we forget to pay tribute to the great men of the past; and I think it were well to again remind this house of the great men who constituted the government of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman—those statesmen who, after the South African war with all its bitterness, determined, in spite of the most strenuous opposition of their opponents, in spite of the prophecy of dire calamities that would follow, granted self government to the people of South Africa. Here again I want to emphasize that I believe that good politics, good morals, and good religion are built upon the same foundation. We can imagine what would have been the difference in the condition of South Africa when the great world war broke out, if the opponents of the British there had been turned into enemies instead of warm friends which they proved themselves to be. I am fearful sometimes of attempts at exact definition of our Empire relationship. I am convinced that the existing bonds will be strong in proportion to their elasticity and will become weak in proportion to the success of the attempts to secure rigidity.

Then there is the closely allied question of national obligations. There are some phases of this problem that are undoubtedly difficult of solution. There are some phases of the problem for which I have not been able to secure a solution in my own mind. Nevertheless there are two principles that seem to me to be fundamental, and to my own mind seem to be as clear as crystal. The first of these is the solidarity of humanity. We cannot, even if we would, separate ourselves from the rest of the world; no nation can live to itself alone. And here again let me refer to H. G. Wells. He says something like this: That we know more of the world of six thousand years ago than any living man at that time knew. And why? Because the people living in one part of the world, no matter how high the state of civilization, had no possibility of coming into contact with the people of other parts of the world. So, I believe his statement is correct that we know more of the world of six thousand years ago than any man living at that time knew of the world. He gives another illustration: He says that when the Spaniards came to America, they found two highly civilized communities, one in Mexico and the other in Peru, and yet neither one of these knew that the other existed. Such a condition of things is impossible to-day. There is no such thing as a self-contained nation. There is no possibility of any nation remaining aloof from interest in the general welfare of nations. We cannot remain aloof, even if we should decide in our own minds that it was desirable for us to do so. No nation can live to itself alone. We, therefore, must take some part. What that part may be may concern us at times and cause us great differences of opinion; it may not always be clear to our own minds what that part should be; we may make blunders and we may make mistakes; but the possibility of blundering and of making mistakes does not relieve us of the obligation, and I heartily agree with what the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) said yesterday, that we cannot consistently criticise, as we have done, and I think rightly done, the people of the United States for their vain attempt to remain aloof from world-wide problems, if we ourselves should take the same position. On the principle involved in that matter my mind is clear, in spite of the fact that as regards some phases of the problem we have not yet found the correct solution.

Another principle is equally clear to me, namely, that what we do must be determined by ourselves alone. Therefore, I must heartily endorse the position taken by the government when the situation arose last autumn, namely, that the representatives of Canada must be the responsible body to determine what we shall do under any set of circumstances that may arise. I know there is no such thing as a perfect analogy; but perhaps Kipling's words express the idea as well as anything else can: "Daughter am I in my mother's house, but mistress in my own." As I say, there may be difficulty in solving some of our problems and deciding on a course at any given time; but to my mind our course under any set of circumstances must be decided in harmony with those two great principles, namely, that we cannot escape from obligations, and that the part we shall take in fulfilling those obligations must be determined by the Canadian people.

Mr. J. MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a small contribution to this debate, I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I was pleased indeed to note the remarkable ability shown by those members in that regard.

I have noticed that in the addresses that have been given several suggestions have been made of a constructive nature; but I believe in some cases there was more of criticism without anything of a constructive nature. I have listened to addresses in various places, sometimes from pulpits, sometimes from professors of colleges and from the man on the street, and while all agree that something is wrong with our economic system, I note a great dearth of suggestions that will give any assistance or direction in the solution of those problems. I believe anyone who is able to tell what is wrong has rendered a service; but the one who can tell how to remedy those evils and how to solve those problems has rendered a greater service. I do not hope to be able to perform that task, but I may make some suggestions as I go along.

Let me touch briefly on the unemployment question. A short time ago I heard an address in which the speaker remarked: "There is something wrong when we have so much unemployment, and I think our government should find out what is wrong, should try to find a solution." I wondered if it struck that gentleman or any of his hearers that possibly our unemployment problem may be so complex that no simple formula will furnish a solution. It is possible that as regards unemployment Canada, at the present time, is in need more of a great moral leader than of a great political leader. Let me go back a few years, in fact, two decades. I can remember the time when the law of supply and demand seemed to operate well, almost unrestrainedly. Then there came a time when some wise person said to his fellows of the same craft: "In so far as the law of supply and demand affects us adversely, we will evade it; we will profit by it so far as it assists us." They put their heads together, and they prevented the law of supply and demand from affecting them. This has been carried during the last two decades to its logical conclusion. Almost everything we buy has its price fixed by arbitrary means. Combines have been formed in almost every industry. The time came when labour learned a trick from its masters. They learned to combine in order to set aside the law of supply and demand, to set aside competition, and they have been able arbitrarily to fix the remuneration which they shall receive for their work. They are so numerous and powerful that they have been able largely to block our economic machine. As soon as we remove an important part of a machine, we need not be surprised to see that it does not run smoothly; and when we begin to wonder why it turns out that things are not right, the fact is simply that the governor of the machine has been removed. You know what happens if you remove the governor of an engine—it goes crazy and runs away, and that is about what happens when the law of supply and demand ceases to operate. I have wondered if labour has been able to recognize the fact that it is in part responsible for unemployment. While organization of labour has been wise; while they have been able to remedy many abuses; while they are quite justified in organizing, yet I believe they have abused their powers, and the fact remains now that some in the ranks of labour are unemployed and on the verge of starvation because others in the ranks of labour have been so exacting about demanding wages, remuneration that is exorbitant, and conditions that no industrial system can bear. It seems to me that a little educational work might be of very great benefit, and I was glad to hear the suggestion made by the Premier of Ontario the other night in his address to the Social Service organization that they should spend a great deal of their time in educating democracy. He made this terse remark: "If democracy fails, it will be through ignorance."

Let me say a word in regard to immigration, a subject which has been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Recently, there came to me some figures that were startling. I would not say that they are correct; but this statement has been made as—from a very high authority—that for every settler that comes to Canada at the present time, fifteen have been leaving. What is wrong that we are not able to keep our population? The reason is simply that the people are dissatisfied; the conditions are so hard that they find they cannot continue. As regards the West, I do not think that our farmers can be justly blamed for being quitters. They have continued patiently during the past two or three years at a very heavy loss, but they have been hoping that something could be done to improve economic conditions so that they might be enabled at least to make a living. In this connection I might say a word with regard to the returned soldier—this is a matter that is closely related to the immigration question. The scheme launched by the late government to settle the returned soldiers on the land was, I believe, well-intentioned; but I am afraid that some very serious mistakes have been made. Not very long ago I had the privilege of examining some farms purchased by returned soldiers at about $30 per acre. I found these farms to be worth, in reality, probably, between $5 and $10 per acre. They were simply immense sand banks. I am quite convinced, and I have no hesitation in stating the conviction, that the inspectors that passed these farms at $30 per acre were either inefficient and incompetent or they were crooks. I can reach no other conclusion. These men have in almost every case been driven from the land. The last of them are leaving these farms at the present time, and in conversation some of them have given certain information. One of them says, in effect: "What worries me most is not the fact that I have lost about $2,000 of my own money, nor that I have wasted four years of the best of my life, but that after I have left this land I shall be hounded by the Soldier Settlement Board and be compelled by judgment to pay the loss upon the land". This man said to me that he was not a good judge of land, but that he had been advised that the farm would be satisfactory. He said: "I trusted the inspector whom the government sent out to safeguard my interests in this regard. But if anyone doubts, I can show him the land and he can see for himself that it is nothing but a vast sandbank on which the best farmer in Canada could not possibly hope to succeed". Now, I mention this largely for this reason: I understand that some suggestions have been made, originating, I believe, at Regina, to the effect that the same inspectors that served on the Soldier Settlement Board should be re-engaged in connection with the Canadian Colonization Association. It seems to me it would be wise for the government, if they contemplate anything of that kind, to be very careful and go over the work of these appraisers, because although in some cases their work has been eminently satisfactory, in other cases it has proved just as I have stated. I can give you a bright picture of this work. In a district some thirty or forty miles from Regina, known as Piapot, a locality well known, I think, to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), fifty-four returned soldiers were settled, and I was pleased to find that of this number only one had failed. As a matter of fact there were two failures, but as one of these two never really tried to succeed there is really only one failure to be considered. The difference seems to lie in this fact: the land was virgin soil, it was not improved in any way; and if the gentleman whose name I heard mentioned really was the appraiser, I can say he is a man who has a very great knowledge, and is an excellent judge of land, and, whose high integrity cannot be questioned. And there were no personal owners who might try to bring any influence to bear upon him. I think that has a good deal to do with the success in these cases. No doubt some of the appraisers sent out by the government were honest, but others were either incompetent or were not honest, and their work should be carefully scanned by the government or by the Colonization Association. Numbers of returned soldiers have been placed in a position in which their hearts have been almost broken, having settled on farms which they are now compelled to leave almost penniless, in some cases with no hope of being able to escape from debt and being faced with the only alternative of leaving this country. And those who have been guilty of placing these men in this position should not be re-engaged either by the government or by the Colonization Association. In fact, I think it would be well for them to be sent to the hangman or to the penitentiary.

Reference has been made to a commission appointed to investigate grain rates charged on the lakes. I was pleased indeed to see a commission appointed for that purpose. One of the gentlemen appointed I know very well, and I cannot speak too highly of his integrity. I believe the work will be thoroughly done. I am afraid that we have fallen many times in the past into the habit of throwing suspicion on commissions the moment they have been appointed. We have had several commissions appointed in Saskatchewan, and I have some knowledge of commissions appointed by the federal government, and only in one case have I had reason to believe that there was good ground for suspicion or doubt. I believe that work such as this can be thoroughly done by a commission, and we might do a great deal to hinder and to destroy the effect of such work by casting suspicion on the commission as soon as it is appointed. An explanation was given me of the high cost of carrying grain across the lakes, and it seems to me that it may have had some bearing on the matter. At the port of Montreal, it seems, there was such a congestion of traffic that in a short time the grain was backed up to Port Colborne. The boats carrying the grain down the lakes had to remain for periods ranging up to a week, and sometimes longer, before they could unload, and instead of charging demurrage, the owners informed those who were chartering the boats that if they could make only half as many trips in the season as formerly they must make a greater charge. This has been stated on very good authority and has been given as an explanation of the high rates. Now, the loss to the shipper has been enormous. The statement has been made again and again, at meetings I have addressed, that all that has been gained by lower freight rates has been lost by the higher rates on the lakes. And to a certain extent that is true. I think something should be done to prevent a recurrence of this. In my opinion some change should be made at this session in regard to the coastal regulations. I understand that it is only by act of parliament that the coastal regulations can be amended. I think it should be so arranged that the minister in charge of the department, when he finds that there is a combine taking too great a toll from the grain on the lakes, should have the power to set aside the coastal regulations and allow American boats to compete.

No mention has been made in the Speech from the Throne in regard to deep waterways. This is a matter of very great importance. I fear very much that pressure might be brought to bear upon the government to persuade them to engage in this enterprise, which would cost a vast amount of money and the benefits from which, for a great many years at least, would not be sufficient to warrant the expenditure. I remember that in the discussion that took place in this House last year it was claimed by some gentlemen that a saving as high as five cents a bushel might be effected. I took the pains, during the last few months, to look into the cost of carrying grain from Fort William to Montreal over a period of years preceding, and I was surprised to find out that the total cost was about four cents a bushel. I cannot give the exact fraction, but I hope to have it in a few days. How in the name of common sense could six cents a bushel, or five cents a bushel, or four cents a bushel be saved, if the total cost was only about four cents?

In connection with the railway situation, reference was made to the appointment of Sir Henry Thornton as head of the government railways, and I must commend the government for their action in this regard. I think every member of this House should be very pleased indeed that the government has secured the services of a man of such great ability as Sir Henry Thornton possesses. I had the opportunity of listening to Sir Henry Thornton in the city of Regina, and at the close of his address the impression I carried away was that the great tact that he showed, and the great grasp of railway problems, and particularly the problems of the Canadian National Railways, were such that he was very likely to succeed in an almost impossible task. I was struck by a terse remark which he made in his address. In substance, he stated that, his friends in the Old Land had said that the task was impossible, that it could not be done, but, he said, that was one of the most attractive features in his view. I felt that the address on that occasion did a great deal to reassure the people in regard to our national railway problem. It did a great deal, I think, to inspire them and to secure their co-operation and support. I hope that the government will give Sir Henry Thornton and his colleagues every chance possible, in order that our national railways under government ownership will have a good chance for success.

With regard to the commission of inquiry that was referred to in the Speech from the Throne with regard to agricultural conditions, I suppose its inquiry will include the marketing of the grain. I am speaking for western Canada now, but I do not forget eastern Canada and other parts of Canada have their problems to solve; but what we in western Canada need is more outlets for our grain. I have referred to the enormous loss on account of the congestion of traffic. It seems to me that if we had three outlets for grain instead of one, or instead of two, it would help us greatly. I suppose it might be said that we already have two, because some of our grain goes by the Pacific route. I hope in the near future to see a great deal more of it go by that route. The question arises whether the elevator facilities at Vancouver should be increased. I have been led to believe, from information I have received, that the trouble during this last crop season was not that there were not elevator facilities at Vancouver, but simply that those who control the space do not control the grain. Grain men had grain that they could not ship because they had not chartered any boats. Others had chartered boats but had no grain to put in them. In some cases they had chartered space hoping to sell it at a higher price than they paid for it. An adjustment had to be made, and I believe the Grain Commission served a very useful purpose in loosening up the deadlock there. The arrangements had been made, the grain had to be loaned and replaced. As soon as it was arranged so that this transfer elevator performed the service and the function for which it was intended, the grain was loaded out in the boats that arrived, and there was space for everey man. I believe I am correct in saying that later on the railway took this position—and I am not sure that they were not suported by the Grain Commission—a grain man had a quantity of grain at the elevator at Calgary and wished to have it shipped to the Vancouver elevator, and they said, "Where is your space? Show us your space and you will get the cars"; he said, "All right, there is the space"; he gave them the proof that he had the space, the cars were supplied and the grain went forward. In other cases the grain man said, "I want cars to ship out a quantity of grain", but he failed to show that he had space, and they said, "You cannot have the cars". An important question arises as to what elevators should be demanded for that western route. Elevator facilities should be provided at Calgary or Edmonton for the Canadian National Railways, or at Vancouver. I am not prepared to commit myself just yet to say where, but it is a matter to which the government should give serious consideration.

I shall not detain the House longer, but I shall have an opportunity to discuss many of these questions again in regard to the grain marketing problem. I have a resolution on the order paper that will enable me to discuss this question fully later on.

Mr. KYTE: There is an understanding between the Whips that the debate should adjourn at six o'clock, and that the House should adjourn thereafter. As it is now nearly six o'clock, I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ORDERS IN COUNCIL RESPECTING AMALGAMATION TABLED

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. leader of the Opposition asked me to lay on the Table of the House such orders in council as had been passed with relation to the amalgamation of the Grand Trunk Railway system and the Canadian National Railway system. I beg to lay on the Table of the House five orders in council relating to this matter.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 5.25 p.m.

Monday, February 5, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARY, PRINTING AND RESTAURANT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House:—

That His Honour the Speaker, the Honourable Messieurs Bennett, Bolduc, Chapais, David, Gillis, Godbout, Gordon, Griesbach, Hardy, Laird, McHugh, McLennan, Poirier, Taylor, Turriff, and Webster (Brockville), have been appointed a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the Senate are concerned, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of a joint committee of both Houses on the said Library.

Also,—A message acquainting this House that the Honourable Messieurs Chapais, Dessaulles, DeVeber, Donnelly, Farrell, Forget, Green, Legris, McCall, McDonald, McLean, McLennan, Pardee, Pope, Ratz, Robertson, Sharpe, Thibaudeau, Todd, White (Inkerman) and White (Pembroke), have been appointed a committee to superintend the printing of the Senate during the present Session, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of a joint committee of both Houses on the subject of Printing of parliament.

And also,—A message acquainting this House that His Honour the Speaker, the Honourable Messieurs Blain, Green, Hardy, Lougheed (Sir James), Sharpe, and Watson, have been appointed a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the Restaurant of parliament, so far as the interests of the Senate are concerned, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of a joint committee of both Houses on the said Restaurant.

FRANCE-CANADA CONVENTION

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General, which was read by Mr. Speaker, as follows:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, February, 1st, 1923.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a copy of a Convention of Commerce between France and Canada, entered into at Paris on the 15th day of December in the year 1922 between His Majesty the King and the President of the French Republic.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Annual Report of the Department of Health, and copy of Regulations under the Proprietary and Patent Medicines Act.—Hon. Mr. Béland.

Report of the Department of the Secretary of State for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1922.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

Ordinances of the Yukon Territory, passed by the Yukon Council, second session 1921, and in the year 1922.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

Report of the Public Archives for the year 1921.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

Order in Council dated June 29, 1922, under the Soldier Settlement Act.—Hon. Mr. Stewart.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will the hon. member please explain the bill?

Mr. STEVENS: Briefly, the purpose of the bill is to correct what appears to be rather an awkward and anomalous situation that exists by virtue of certain words in the Railway Act. The Railway Act provides that the Board of Railway Commissioners shall determine the question of freight rates and contains certain clauses against discrimination. But in every case in which the word "discrimination" appears, it is preceded by some qualifying word such as "unfavourable," "undue," "unjust." This bill proposes to remove these qualifying words, so that the effect will be an absolute provision against discrimination in the matter of freight rates.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LAUSANNE CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Has the government any information regarding the failure of negotiations at Lausanne?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Such information as the government has in respect of the proceedings at Lausanne is to all intents and purposes the same as what has appeared in the press.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Putnam for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Friday, February 2.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to the motion before the House I cannot but feel that in dealing with the question which will form the greater part of my remarks I am speaking for another who is not now with us. The words I am about to utter will be in confirmation of his businesslike management of the department over which he so ably presided. I would not for one moment, Sir, mar the effect of the eloquent tributes to the departed, delivered by the three leaders, by any commonplace words of my own. Never in all my life have I heard more eloquent tributes more thoroughly deserved, and I concur in everything that was said in recognition of the personal worth and ability of our former comrade.

To those young members who have just entered the House of Commons I, with other speakers, tender my hearty congratulations and welcome. Young men can enter no better school for the development of their sum of knowledge and their intellect than this House; and, Sir, notwithstanding criticisms that we often hear of the calibre of the men in the Canadian parliament, as a man who has been in public life for some years, I believe that the membership of our two Houses will compare favourably with the membership of any other legislative body in the world. The two members who moved and seconded the Address in this House, as is usual, brought to their task both eloquence and information, and we look to them to be in the future a great strength not only by their debating ability, but for the quota of information which they will impart to this House and to the country.

I would not for a moment, Sir, forget to congratulate my good friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke), who is not the leader of the "peculiar angle," but the leader of the second largest group in this House. His speech, to my mind, was fair in every respect, well reasoned and temperate. We all join with him in believing that the legislation enacted by Parliament ought to be for the welfare of all classes, and that the nearer we can arrive at one viewpoint on matters of controversy by each giving and taking a little, the closer we shall be passing legislation that will beneficially affect the whole nation.

Now, Sir, I want to direct the attention of the House to the railway problem that confronts this country. I do not hope to add anything to the information of the older members of the House who have been here since 1911, and I do not flatter myself that I can add much to the information of the younger members, but I think it not unwise that the sequence of events leading up to the present situation should be placed before the House and the country, not by way of argument, but as a statement of fact, so that those of us who were not here throughout the earlier sessions, and have not had an opportunity of becoming conversant with the conditions then existing and which eventually resulted in the problem that now confronts us, will be in a position hereafter to grasp that problem in a comparatively succinct form.

Let me first try to impress the House with the magnitude of the problem that our people are undertaking to solve. The National Railway System, as it will be in a few months, is the most extensive railway system in the world, and Canada in entering upon the experiment of public ownership is undertaking the solution of the greatest rail transportation problem that has ever been attempted by any company or by any country. The effort is worthy of a young country like Canada, and we will be judged, to a certain extent, as to our ability to grapple with great undertakings by the way we work out this problem.

The Canadian National Railway System comprises a total of 22,646 miles, made up as follows: Canadian Northern Railway, 9,900; Canadian Government Railways, 4,682; Grand Trunk Railway, with owned and controlled lines, 5,308 (this includes 1,164 miles in the United States); Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, 2,756. The Government lines of which I have spoken are: The Intercolonial, 1,670 miles; the National Transcontinental 2,006; the Prince Edward Island, 2,076; Branch lines, 730; and the Hudson Bay Railway.

The value of this property as appearing on the books of the various companies is: Canadian Northern Railway, $681,822,115; Canadian Government Railways, $415,438,153; Grand Trunk Pacific, $256,768,407; Grand Trunk Railway and subsidiaries, $512,687,252; Central Vermont Railway, $25,861,823. The consolidated system owns 3,476 locomotives, 3,583 passenger service cars, 122,362 freight cars, and 7,719 work and company service cars. The total earnings in 1921 were $235,789,000, and the working expenses $247,509,000; the operating deficit, therefore, was $11,720,000. The magnitude of this system and its possibilities may be judged from a comparison of its working expenses with the total revenues of the Dominion of Canada. The working expenses of the system in 1921—it included then, of course, the Grand Trunk—were $247,509,000, while the entire Dominion revenue was $381,271,000. So that in the working out of this great railway problem we are facing a task which is second only to the task of administering the affairs of the Dominion of Canada.

The number of employees in 1921 was 102,454, the operating pay-roll for that year amounting to $149,426,849.59. I place these figures on record in order to give an idea of the great task involved in the administration of this system, and to impress on all the people—because the system is theirs—the necessity of giving it, without political preference or political prejudice, a fair chance under government ownership. Government ownership is on trial in respect of the largest scheme that man has ever devised for the purposes of transportation, and it rests with the people, the government and the parliament of Canada to allow the Canadian National Board to try this experiment untrammelled.

I wish to direct the attention of the House to the transactions which led up to the acquisition by the country of the various units that go to make up this system. We will take first the acquisition of the Canadian Northern Railway, which, as we all know, is made up of many subsidiary companies. Aid was given to that system by the federal authority as well as by the provinces. I may point out in passing, as it is a live question, that that part of the Canadian Northern which lies within the province of British Columbia was constructed with the assistance of and under a charter granted by the government of that province. Under the agreement entered into in respect to that road—which connected with the Canadian Northern main line at the British Columbia boundary—the province had control of the rates. Later, when aid was given by the federal authority, that portion of the Canadian Northern system in British Columbia was declared by parliament, on the recommendation of the government of that day—the head of which was Sir Robert Borden, I believe—to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. The whole line of the Canadian Northern was thus made one complete system. There has been a good deal of discussion about the propriety of that action, but I want just to deal with the facts so that we may know exactly how we came into possession of all these roads.

Many advances had been made, much aid had been given to the Canadian Northern by the federal as well as by the provincial authorities, and as a result the government of Canada recommended to parliament in 1917 that the stock of the Canadian Northern should be acquired by the people. An act incorporating this recommendation was assented to on September 20, 1917. Prior to that date the majority of the stock of the Canadian Northern system had passed into the hands of the government on acount of aid having been given, and this act provided for the acquisition of the balance of that stock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not the majority—forty per cent.

Mr. GRAHAM: A large portion of the stock, anyway, passed into the hands of the government on account of the aid given to the Canadian Northern. A board of arbitrators was appointed to determine what the balance of the stock was worth. When aid had been given to the Canadian Northern on a former occasion an act was passed by the House and approved by the Senate under which, in the event of default, the property of the Canadian Northern should come into possession of the government without process of law and without further remuneration. But the parliament of that day thought it better to provide that the value of that stock should be determined by arbitration. The board met, and on May 31, 1918, they made an award of $10,800,000. Then, under authority of an order in council, dated November 20, 1918, the Canadian Northern board was appointed a board of management of the Canadian Government Railways, which would include the Transcontinental, the Intercolonial, the Prince Edward Island Railway, and, I think, the Hudson Bay Railway. On December 20, 1918, an order in council authorized and directed the board of directors of the Canadian Northern Railway to use a collective and descriptive designation—"Canadian National Railways" — for the lines of railway and railway properties controlled or operated by the board. But up to last October the Canadian National Railways as such had had no legal existence. As I say, the system which included all the lines I have mentioned—not then the Grand Trunk —was designated by order in council as the "Canadian National Railways," but there was no Canadian National board; this group of lines was under the management of the Canadian Northern board.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition has asked the question why these railways, all these lines, were not amalgamated sooner, and I think he had particular reference to the Grand Trunk. Well, up to last October there was no board under which to amalgamate them, because the Canadian National board was only appointed on the 4th of October last. The name "Canadian National" previous to that time was really only a sort of advertising nomenclature, a billboard, so to speak, for the Canadian National had no existence until the order in council of October 4 was passed. I imagine the ex-Minister of Finance, Sir Henry Drayton, knows exactly why the Canadian Northern with all its ramifications was not brought in. Why, the act to amalgamate all these lines was passed in 1919, and the government of which he and my right hon. friend were members was in power until December, 1921, and up till that time there was not a foot of any of these lines amalgamated with the Canadian National system.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was no difficulty whatever, no reason for delay at all, in connection with the Canadian Northern. There was only one reason for the delay in our case and that was that we could not very well act until the Grand Trunk arbitration was over. That was the reason we delayed. I know of no reason for delay after that was concluded.

Mr. GRAHAM: You will bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, the reason given by my hon. friend why this entire amalgamation, which refers more to the Grand Trunk than it does to the Canadian Northern did not take place; I shall deal with that when I am dealing with the Grand Trunk.

As I said before, the Canadian Northern system is made up of a great many entities. There was stock outstanding on the Canadian Northern system which it was thought not wise to have as stock of the Canadian National system—some five or six shares which have since been brought under the control of the government. In addition to that, there are certain Canadian Northern securities in the hands of the British Columbia government as collateral—I use that word for lack of a better term. We think we shall be able to get control of this stock. I would point out that no attempt was ever made to get control of this stock until a year ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that Canadian Northern stock? I think it is, from memory.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am so informed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The act of 1919 provides for the acquiring of that and paying for it in exactly the same way as the other stock was to be acquired.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was not acquired, at all events, and we are trying to acquire it now, and hope to have the matter in shape in a little while. I would point out that if there were no reason why it could not be acquired in two months by the present government—

Mr. MEIGHEN: If they are in no hurry, I do not see why we should be.

Mr. GRAHAM: The amalgamation cannot take place until that stock is acquired. The stock may possibly be replaced by other securities and will not have to be paid for.

There is another question that has arisen concerning the amalgamation of the Canadian Northern which I am afraid my right hon. friend did not investigate. When the $45,000,000 guarantee was given to the Canadian Northern, there was a trust deed drawn up which is now in the hands of the National Trust Company of Toronto. Accompanying that is the stock of a great many of the smaller companies of the Canadian Northern system. Now when that agreement was drawn, it was thought that there was nothing in it that would interfere with the amalgamation, but the National Trust Company think that there is, and, as that company will have to vote the stock of these smaller companies in order to carry out the amalgamation, every impediment in the way of voting that stock by the trustees must be removed while at the same time protecting the bond holders of the Canadian Northern. There is a clause in that trust deed—I shall give it verbatim in a few moments—which provides that the Canadian Northern may amalgamate with any companies that belong to the Canadian Northern system; but it does not provide that the Canadian Northern may amalgamate with the Canadian National, for the very good reason that there was no Canadian National at that time. The National Trust Company takes the ground, that that point must be cleared up to the satisfaction of the bond holders. That cannot take place until a meeting of the bond holders is called and they agree, which they will, to the amalgamation of the Canadian Northern with the Canadian National, and then the agreement will be changed accordingly. Lest owing to my lack of legal knowledge I may have misstated the case, I shall read, if the House will permit me the advice given to me by the solicitor for the Canadian National Railways, who was also for many years the solicitor for the Canadian Northern and had much to do, I believe, with the drawing up of the various agreements, trust deeds, and statutes. Mr. Ruel, speaking of the non-amalgamation of the Canadian Northern company and subsidiary companies with the Canadian National, says:

"The reason was because of objection raised by the trustees of what we call the $45,000,000 mortgage. That was the mortgage executed by the Canadian Northern Railway Company to the National Trust and British Empire Trust on the 15th July, 1914, pursuant to the parliamentary enactment of 1914, chapter 20. Under that mortgage it is the duty of the Canadian Northern to carry on not only its own enterprise but the enterprise of its various subsidiary companies, and failure to do so would be an event of default under the mortgage. However, permission is given in the mortgage to amalgamate under certain terms, as follows:

"Article II

"9. Notwithstanding the mortgages and charges hereby created or anything contained in this Indenture, any Railway Company comprised in the Canadian Northern system (including the company which is now or may hereafter be subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, may with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into arrangements and agreements with any other railway company comprised in said system, which is now or may hereafter be subject to said legislative authority, or which has now or may hereafter have power to enter into the same, respecting the operation by or the leasing to or the sale and transfer to such other railway company of its undertakings, assets, rights, franchises and powers or any of them; and any railway company (including the company) comprised in the Canadian Northern system which is now or may hereafter be subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada may under the provisions of the Railway Act amalgamate with any other or others of the railway companies comprised in said system which is now or may hereafter be subject to such legislative authority, or which if not so subject has now or may hereafter have power to enter into such amalgamation."

The important part of this section 9 is the sentence at the end of the section:

"and any railway company (including the company) comprised in the Canadian Northern system...may... amalgamate with any other or others of the railway companies comprised in said system."

The statement made by the trustees is simply that the Canadian National Railway Company is not a company comprised in the Canadian Northern railway system and cannot be so declared. The point is highly technical, and personally I do not agree with it at all. Power was given in the 1914 act to the Governor in Council to declare any companies to be companies comprised in the Canadian Northern railway system, and this same power was echoed in the Canadian National Railways Act, Stats. Can. 1918, chapter 13. We proposed to pass an order in council declaring the Canadian National Railway Company to be a company comprised in the Canadian Northern railway system within the provisions of the trust deed. The trustees say that we cannot do this because of the wording of Section 21 of the Canadian National Railway Company Act of 1919, which says that the company (the Canadian National Railway Company) may amalgamate with any company comprised in the Canadian Northern railway system. They say that indicates that the company is not comprised in the Canadian Northern railway system, and that the wording excludes any idea that it is so comprised. This seems to me to be splitting hairs with a vengeance. My reply, of course, is that there is nothing in the two enactments restricting the power of the Governor in Council to declare any company to be a company comprised in the Canadian Northern railway system, and unless you find an express restriction you cannot imply a restriction.

However, the trustees have the voting power on the stock of the subsidiary companies which is deposited with them, and the trustees will, of course, act only on the advice of their counsel. Under these circumstances, we have nothing to do but to accept the ruling of the counsel for the trustees and to take immediate steps for the amendment of the clause in the trust deed by the bondholders. This means that a bondholders' meeting will be called in London, England, as soon as we can get the notice published, and we will submit to the bondholders that the clause in question be extended so as to include authority to amalgamate with the Canadian National Railway Company or any other railway company approved by the Governor in Council."

I think, Mr. Speaker, that covers the ground. The statement is in legal phraseology and can now be referred to by any members of the House. That is the reason I have placed it on Hansard.

Now I come to the Grand Trunk Pacific. I think I have made it clear to the House that the amalgamation of the Canadian Northern is not such an easy task and must be approached—not approached because we have approached it, but must be carried on—with all regard to the securities held against the Canadian Northern system, and the government of Canada accepts all the liabilities as well as the assets.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me? I merely want to get at what he is driving at. I am not clear myself and I do not think other hon. members are, as to what amalgamation he looks forward to, of the Canadian Northern with the Canadian National Railway system, other than what now exists. That is to say, what other amalgamation does he think is legally possible? I realize what he says is true, that the entity must be preserved because of the legal securities that are outstanding. I have never complained of the lack of amalgamation of the Canadian Northern; I do not know what other amalgamation of the Canadian Northern with the Canadian National system my hon. friend looks forward to. I understand the order in council of January 30, 1922, provides what can be done further in the way of amalgamation of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, as I understand it the government of Canada have become the shareholders of the Canadian Northern as they now are the shareholders of the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are shareholders now.

Mr. GRAHAM: We have not all the stock, as I pointed out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all provided for by law. We do not want any further vote of the National Trust for that; there must be something in the way of physical amalgamation that the counsel has in mind.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, at the present time the Canadian Northern railway is being operated by the Canadian National Railway board—in fact, although not legally speaking, the Canadian National Railway board to-day is also the Canadian Northern board. By this amalgamation there will be operation by a Canadian National Railway board. Under the act of 1919 the Canadian Northern system will be brought in as an entity of the Canadian National Railway system, and not operated separately as the Canadian Northern system is operated separately now, even though that operation is by the same board of directors.

Now let me take up the Grand Trunk Pacific as one of the entities that make up this system. The Grand Trunk Pacific was an integral part of the great transcontinental system inaugurated a few years ago. From Moncton to Winnipeg, some 1,800 miles, it was called the Transcontinental Railway, and was constructed by the people of Canada. From Winnipeg to Prince Rupert the line was called the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, and was made up of two sections—the prairie section, and the mountain section. Guarantees were given by the Canadian government to the Grand Trunk Pacific. In addition the old Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada gave a guarantee of bonds. That company did not meet the interest on these bonds under the guarantee, and aid was given year after year, both for operating deficits and to meet liabilities on securities which the government had guaranteed. A question arose with the government of that day concerning a certain amount of money, I think it was something like $900,000, which the company wished to apply to the payment of interest on the bonds; but the government insisted, and I think rightly so, that that amount should be applied to operating deficit. As a consequence the company ceased operating the road. The government of Canada then took it over, and the Minister of Railways of that day became receiver of the company. That line is still under a receivership, although operated by the Canadian National board. Now, in regard to the guarantee of the Grand Trunk Company, the government's guarantee of course, on the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific was absolute. The guarantee given by the Grand Trunk Company on the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific was somewhat restricted, and provided that the interest on those bonds should be met out of the net earnings of the Grand Trunk. The purchasers of those bonds bought them on the understanding that the interest would be paid out of the net earnings of the Grand Trunk. When the Grand Trunk came to the point where it had no net earnings, no interest was paid, and none, I believe, has been paid since. In reference to the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the act of 1919 provides, that when the amalgamation would take place and the Grand Trunk was brought into the Canadian National system it would be possible to dissolve the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific. That has not yet been done, and there are many obstacles in the way of doing it. I believe the Grand Trunk Pacific will form an integral part of a road which will be a paying proposition in the future development of Canada, even though it is not paying now. It never was intended, in the construction of the transcontinental system, of which the Grand Trunk Pacific forms a part, that it should run from the Atlantic to the Pacific and stop there. As in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was hoped and believed that it would be connected with the Orient; that it would be possible to carry traffic from Europe to the Orient by a route several hundred miles shorter than by any other line. I look forward to the time when the system will give such a service, making connection at Prince Rupert with a privately or publicly-owned line of steamships. When that time comes the project will be an asset and not a loss to the people of Canada.

Now, Sir, I come to the acquisition of the Grand Trunk, but first I want to deal for a moment with the objection of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). Referring to the Grand Trunk, rather than the Canadian Northern, he gave as a reason for the former government being without proper energy for two years, the fact that the Board of Arbitrators appointed to determine the value, if any, of the preference and common stock of the Grand Trunk had not yet reported, and consequently it was difficult to make the amalgamation without this report. I submit that the report, no matter what it contained, would not stand in the way of amalgamation. When the Board of Arbitrators wished to extend the time, it was made a condition by the government that the operation of the road should be handed over to the government. That was done. Then the award of the arbitrators was made. I submit that whether the award was made or not, no matter what it meant as to the value of the preference or common stock, if it had been decided, as it in fact had, to amalgamate the Grand Trunk with the Canadian National system, there was nothing that has come to my knowledge to prevent the government of that day, from the year 1919 until 1921, making that amalgamation.

Now my hon. friend says that the fact that the award had not been made really prevented them from proceeding with the amalgamation. Perhaps there may be something in it of which I am not cognizant, but, speaking from my own knowledge, that should not have interfered with it, because the government of Canada was committed to take over the Grand Trunk, the terms had been agreed upon, and the only question was what Canada should pay for it in addition, if anything. But, take the other viewpoint. Suppose that were the case; the award of the arbitrators was not given until after the appeal was decided. There was an appeal made to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and if the non-appearance, or the non-handing out of that award, made by the arbitrators, prevented my hon. friend from making the amalgamation for two years, then that time was extended automatically after the appeal was entered until such time as the appeal was decided by the Privy Council. Let me give a few dates to clear up this point. Notice of the appeal by the Grand Trunk to the Privy Council was served October 1st, 1921, but the case was not heard until July 10th, 11th and 13th, 1922, and judgment was pronounced on July 28th, 1922. We might call that August 1st. Two months after that decision was rendered the Canadian National Board of Directors was appointed by the present government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was not amalgamation.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was much nearer amalgamation than anything my hon. friend ever attempted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not a particle.

Mr. GRAHAM: The first step towards amalgamation was to form a board under which amalgamation should take place, and for two years the hon. gentleman did not make an attempt to even appoint a board. They gave the one system the name Canadian National, but it was operated by the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk as separate entities. Two months after the Privy Council had rejected the appeal this government named a board of directors under the act passed in 1919, and that board set the wheels in motion for the amalgamation of the Grand Trunk with the Canadian National system. The award was handed out on July 28th. On October 4th the new board was appointed,—the House will understand the difficulties surrounding this matter, insurmountable for two years,—and the new board set to work with their counsel to see just how rapidly this amalgamation could be brought about. Even bringing in the Grand Trunk was not so easy, and I am not blaming the hon. gentlemen for not getting it through in two years, but I think they should not blame us for not getting it through in two or three months.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman cannot be really serious in what he says, if he understands the agreement with the Grand Trunk. Under that agreement the Grand Trunk board remained in control, pending the decision of the arbitrators. In the spring of 1921—only a few months before the award—when they delayed the arbitration as we believed we came to parliament and got authority to put our board in, but it would have been rude injustice to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk to have amalgamated and done away with the Grand Trunk altogether, when there was a possibility that they would require access to data for the purposes of the arbitration.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose these were all necessary for the purpose of the appeal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. The evidence was in.

Mr. GRAHAM: Consequently my hon. friend's argument applies to us just as much as to him, and I am not blaming him, as I said before, for going so slowly for two years. There are many difficulties in the way. But I do blame him for saying to the House that in two months we could clear up all those difficulties and amalgamate the Grand Trunk, and I make the further assertion that, in two months we did take the first step towards amalgamation and appointed a Canadian National board, and on January 30, the Grand Trunk became a part of the Canadian National system.

Mr. HANSON: Was there not a Canadian National board then? Were not Mr. Barnhill, Mr. E. R. Wood and Mr. E. T. Riley on that board?

Mr. GRAHAM: There was never any Canadian National board until October 4, 1922.

Mr. HANSON: That was when you promulgated the appointment?

Mr. GRAHAM: There was not any before that. By order in council the systems were called the Canadian National system prior to that, but the board was the Canadian Northern Railway board.

I want now to give the dates, so that we will have them in proper sequence. When the late government took control of the Grand Trunk they appointed a separate board for the Grand Trunk, not an amalgamated board, with Sir Joseph Flavelle as chairman. It became the duty of the present government when we wished to bring about the amalgamation, first, to retire the directorate of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern, for these were the only directors in existence, to make way for whoever we might propose as the new Canadian National board. The new Canadian National board when named was only a board, it had no railway to run except as an operator, and there was not one single mile of railway otherwise under that board; consequently it was necessary to appoint that same board as the board of directors for the Grand Trunk, the board of directors for the Canadian Northern and practically the board for all the subsidiary companies of the Canadian Northern. This continued until the Grand Trunk board was brought in a few days ago by order in council under the act of 1919 and the Canadian Government Railways were brought in. At the present time the Canadian National is operating the Canadian Northern and its lines until such times as they can be brought in, but it is in control, and practically the owner of the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Government Railways, the latter for operation only. I will give the dates now, so that we will have them in sequence.

The formal transfer of control of the Grand Trunk was effected at the initial meeting of the new board in Toronto on October 10. By order in council dated January 19, 1923, preference and common stock of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada was declared the property of the government of Canada in accordance with the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

I might say that was under the act passed in 1919, and that was the process by which the stock of the Grand Trunk became the property of the people of Canada. Under the agreement to which my hon. friend has referred the government of Canada guaranteed 4 per cent on what is known as Grand Trunk guaranteed stock. I think the amount is something like $8,000,000 anually in round figures on the preference and common stock—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Two and a half millions on the guaranteed stock I think.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps my figures are wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Two and a half millions is right.

Mr. GRAHAM: The agreement under which the government became responsible for interest charges on the debentures and guaranteed stock ($8,984,634.58 annually) left the value if any, of the preference and common stock to be decided by arbitration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, if you include the debentures, but you said only the guaranteed stock.

Mr. GRAHAM: I should have included the debentures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a big difference.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was a slip of the tongue. In addition to this $8,000,000 I mentioned there was the preference and common stock the value of which was left to arbitration. The arbitrators declared that of no value but that is the voting stock. That is the only stock, I think, that has any voting power. They had to transfer it to the government of Canada. One can readily understand it having no value as declared by the arbitrators, the identical certificates could not be obtained, but the act provided that a transfer could be made in the books of the company, which was done, and the Grand Trunk stock passed into the possession of the Finance Minister, in trust for the people of Canada. Before the shareholders of the Grand Trunk could agree to the amalgamation with the Canadian National a meeting was necessary. The Minister of Finance of Canada being the only shareholder of the Grand Trunk with any voting power, he alone had the exercise of that power. But he gave a proxy to Mr. Cope, Controller of the Railway department, who, acting for the shareholders of the Grand Trunk, in Ottawa a few days ago, agreed to the amalgamation of the Grand Trunk with the Canadian National system. This having been done, an agreement of amalgamation was necessary. This agreement was drawn up and acquiesced in by the two boards. Further, it had to be approved by order in Council, and that has been done; so that to-day the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Government Railways are part of the Canadian National system; and the Canadian Northern will shortly also form a part of that system, as soon as the legal technicalities can be disposed of. I have tried to give in sequence the steps that were taken to bring about this amalgamation. As I remarked before, we are entering upon an experiment which calls for the best that is in us all if we are to succeed. I believe that government ownership in Canada, even starting under the handicap of a deficit such as this great system has to face, can in time be made a success. If it is, we shall have given a lesson to the entire world in the matter of transportation.

My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) referred, I think, to the fact that certain rolling stock has been purchased without a vote of parliament. Well, as we know, that is not an uncommon practice in this parliament. But rolling stock cannot be ordered to-day and be ready for use to-morrow. The wants of next year—at least, that has been my experience ever since my first connection with railways—have invariably been anticipated, and rolling stock required a year ahead must be ordered now if it is to be available. I think I could produce some orders in council, passed under the late government and, as well, some passed by the government of which I was formerly a member, in connection with matters analogous to this. Now, the necessity must exist for rolling stock before such a procedure can be justified. Did that necessity exist in this case? My right hon. friend stated that it did not, because, under the old board, my good friend Mr. Hanna, who was at its head, was able to move crops and fill the requirements of the commercial interests of Canada without ordering rolling stock in advance. My right hon. friend is entirely mistaken. The greatest trouble I have known to exist through the lack of rolling stock, particularly in eastern Canada, to meet the needs of the lumbermen of Quebec and New Brunswick, and to keep up with the pulpwood business and all the other trade east of here, prevailed before the new board was formed at all. Mr. Hanna and myself were communicating day by day on the question as to how the demand should be met, because there was such a shortage of rolling stock. The United States is also short of rolling stock. There was a balance of 20,000 cars of the Canadian National Railways in the United States, and consequently we were very short of rolling stock. To show how a shortage in cars can come about, I might mention a recent incident. A few days ago, at the urgent request of some coal interests, the Canadian Pacific Railway sent over, into the United States, fifty cars with the express understanding that they were all to come back loaded with coal for the Canadian people. Only fifteen came back; thirty-five were diverted. Early last autumn the people of eastern and western Canada were very much in need of additional rolling stock, but there was none bought last year. Now, we cannot hope to carry on the business of this country and have our National Railway system compete with other lines and, what is of greater importance, transport the commodities which the people produce or require, unless we are able and ready to provide the necessary rolling stock and motive power that are required for these movements. We hope to finance the purchasing of this rolling stock as far as possible without appealing to parliament for assistance. I am not speaking positively, but for the most part we expect to finance the purchase of necessary rolling stock through the sale of equipment bonds.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Guaranteed by the government?

Mr. GRAHAM: They will not have to be guaranteed by the government; that is my information. The company will purchase it, just as any other incorporated company would do, and the government will not be called upon to finance these purchases. The transactions will be carried on as in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other incorporated company. For the most part, the Canadian National Railway Company will provide its own securities for the purchase of stock.

I have endeavoured in sequence to put on the records of the House the method by which this amalgamation was brought about, and I have outlined the difficulties that have attended it. The sky is not cloudless, either in regard to the railways or any other business. There are difficulties that have to be overcome, and an attempt will be made to meet them. I believe that the board is entering upon this work with an earnest desire to make the railways a success, and it is my conviction that with the help of the Canadian people this can be done. Now, Montreal has been selected as headquarters of the Canadian National system.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is where the pull was.

Mr. GRAHAM: Transportation is based on pull of freight and passengers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Sometimes.

Mr. GRAHAM: I may point out that under the act of 1919 only the government has the right to name the headquarters. That duty is reserved to the government; all else comes within the purview of the board, such, for example, as divisions of districts and all that sort of thing. The board was asked to advise the government in regard to the question of headquarters, but that advice need not necessarily have been taken. I am not trying to crawl under the coat of the board at all. Personally, it would have been a great pleasure for me, as an Ontario man, to see the headquarters established in Ontario. But I have always advised that the headquarters should be in Montreal, and this from purely business reasons. What the people of Ontario, and the people of all Canada besides, need is efficient transportation at reasonable rates, and the fact that the expert who has been engaged to advise on such matters recommended Montreal as headquarters is, to my mind, evidence that that city should have been chosen. More than that—and I am not speaking in any way derogatorily of the Canadian Pacific Railway—when you have to compete in business with another you want to be as near your competitor as you possibly can. The Canadian Pacific Railway headquarters are in Montreal, and there, I think, is where the Canadian National Railway system should have its headquarters. Some of my friends say that the Canadian National headquarters have been taken from Toronto. Toronto never had the Canadian National headquarters any more than Montreal had. There were certain railways which were christened the "Canadian National" by order in council, but there was no Canadian National company until October 4th. Toronto was headquarters of the Canadian Northern, and not the Canadian National; and Montreal was the headquarters of the Grand Trunk and not of the Canadian National Railways. I fully concur with the chairman of the board, that the headquarters of the Canadian National system ought to be in the same place as the headquarters of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Further than that, at the present time Montreal, during the summer months, is the great distributing centre, inward and outward; and where trade originates oceanward, either in or out, is where the headquarters of the Canadian National system should be, if that system is to get its share of that traffic. Many reasons perhaps could be adduced why some other place should have been selected as the headquarters of the system, but from purely a business standpoint I believe Montreal is the right place.

As to the divisional headquarters, that is a matter for the board to decide. Let me point out that the president will be glad to have any views or opinions from members of this House; indeed, he is anxious to listen to such views or opinions because the people whom we represent own this railway system, and their representatives have a right to advise, but not to order.

Now, as to this Canadian National railway system being removed from politics. In the smaller sense of politics, the operation of the system ought not to be interfered with by any outsider; that is a matter that only those in charge are in a position to judge and decide. But in the higher sense of politics, the management of the affairs of the nation, such a property as I have attempted to describe to you this afternoon, a property owned by the people who sent you here, may be expected to engage your attention, and our shareholders—the people—will naturally require their views to be presented to this House as would the views of the shareholders of any incorporated company be brought before a general meeting of shareholders. We hold the proxies for the shareholders, and it is the inherent right of parliament to discuss the affairs of the Canadian National railway system. The government is in a way a committee of this House which has by statute been given authority to name for you a board of directors. It is therefore the privilege of this House at any time, if the shareholders believe that the gentlemen to whom they have confided this duty have not properly discharged it, to put other gentlemen in their place—but they will not do so for a while.

I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that in the smaller things, the operation of the line, the men whom we have hired for the purpose must not be interfered with; but in the larger things we do not forget that the people whom we represent—every man, woman and child in the Dominion—are shareholders of this great national transportation system. Its success is their success, and if we allow it to become a failure, it will be a failure for the entire people. I believe that it will not be a failure, and I trust that as the months go by and the machinery gets working more smoothly as all these different entities are consolidated into one, that success will be achieved. And I ask parliament and the people of Canada to be patient, to give the board of directors and its president an opportunity to put the system on a sound basis, and a year from now begin to judge by actual results—not by promises, but rather by accomplishment.

Mr. R. A. HOEY (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to a very informative address, an address dealing with a subject of the most vital importance to the Canadian people, but a subject to which I have no desire to refer at the moment.

I cannot persuade myself, Mr. Speaker, nor can I be easily persuaded, that the Address of His Excellency the Governor General, which is ostensibly the programme of the government for this session, and which forms the basis of our discussion at this time, will on the whole awaken hope or kindle inspiration in the hearts of the Canadian people. It is defective in that it fails, seemingly, to come to close grips with the economic conditions confronting us. It must suggest to many hon. members, at any rate it suggests irresistibly to me, a lack of faith on the part of the government itself—that is, a lack of faith to deal successfully and effectively with the tasks confronting it; a lack of faith that is no doubt due to lack of unity within the government ranks. Without faith we cannot have those deep-seated, deep-rooted convictions upon which a true and adequate legislative programme must be based, and without conviction there cannot be that enthusiasm generated, the warmth and glow of which is so essential to national progress.

The programme, to me, is sectional, not so much because of what is stated, but rather because of what is carefully and guardedly omitted—notably all reference to a revision of the customs tariff. Evidently that policy last year of attrition is now to be displaced by a spiritual state of contrition on the part of the government itself. The programme is to me an eerie programme, and I am convinced that, had the government which adopted that attitude of austere aloofness to the Near Eastern crisis abroad—and with some measure of justification I am convinced—adopted the same attitude of austere aloofness to the near-eastern interests at home, a different programme would have been submitted at this session. The programme, I am convinced, was framed during the absence of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), at a time when the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) was sleeplessly engaged in his celebrated immigration policy, and prior to the departure of the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) to take part in that little family misunderstanding in the province of Quebec.

That the people of Canada to-day are vitally and—shall I say?—intelligently interested in social and economic conditions, none will deny. The producers of Canada in general, and the western agriculturalists in particular, are interested in a rapid deflation of the price of foodstuffs which has not been accompanied by any corresponding reduction in the price of manufactured commodities. I have no desire to weary the House with lengthy quotations or to irritate hon. members with statistics, but in order that the House may grasp what that deflation means, let me quote just one short paragraph:

> The farmer who on November 1st, 1919, went to pay a one hundred dollar obligation, required 38 bushels of 1 Northern wheat. On November 1st, 1922, he would require 95 bushels to pay $100.00. If he paid it with oats he required 117 bushels 2 C. W. in 1919 and 218 bushels in 1922, 67 bushels of barley in 1919 and 190 bushels in 1922. If he was a mixed farmer he could meet his one hundred dollar obligation by selling a 952 lb. best butcher steer, four years ago. This last November his steer would have to weigh 1,818 lbs. If he sold hogs, 654 lbs. of selects would pay the bill in 1919, but it would take 1,025 lbs. to do the trick in 1922. In other words, one dollar's worth of the various farm products on Nov. 1st, 1922 were worth four years previous as follows:—wheat, $2.50; oats, $1.94; barley, $2,85; cattle, 1.90 and hogs, $1.56.

The western agriculturists, then, are vitally interested not only in the deflation of the value of farm products, but in a problem that is closely associated with that deflation, namely, the problem of the cost of production. Let me say here that if we ever turn seriously to consider the payment of our national debt—and I am not persuaded that we shall do so during the life of the present administration—we shall be forced to the conclusion that the national debt can be paid only by the disposal of our surplus farm products in the markets of the world—there is no other way, so far as I can determine. And when we reach that conclusion we shall realize that we can profitably dispose of our surplus farm products in the markets of the world only when agriculture is detached and divorced from every handicap now associated with that industry.

[Mr. Hoey.]

The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) discovered a relationship between sixty-five- and seventy-five-cent wheat on the western plains and the impoverished if not chaotic conditions prevailing in Europe. But in what was an admirable address, no words fell from his lips that would lead me to believe that he grasped the real relationship. Hon. members will recall the three major struggles in which Great Britain was engaged during the nineteenth century—that struggle in the second decade of the century; the Crimea, just about the middle of the century; and later the war in South Africa. After the earlier struggle there were bread riots in Great Britain; the conditions were indescribable. After the second, in the middle of the century, squalor, poverty and penury were in evidence everywhere; men paraded the streets crying aloud for bread. After the South African war the conditions were not quite so acute, owing to Britain's free trade policy. It was conditions such as these that led Norman Angell, the author, to prophesy that if modern nations engaged in war on any large, any colossal, scale in the early years of the twentieth century, such a struggle would be followed by the complete collapse of modern civilization itself. Well, we engaged in the struggle; we have reached the post-war period, and there are no bread riots in Europe. There were one or two features that these prophets—shall I call them prophets of despair?—overlooked. The first thing that they overlooked was the efficiency and responsiveness of the agricultural machine, particularly on the American continent. They overlooked also the combination of circumstances—they had of necessity to overlook those circumstances, being unable to visualize them—that has forced the producer on the American continent onto a treadmill, a treadmill the revolutions of which he is forced to make prompted by the instinct of self-preservation. And when we discern that relationship we discern the only redeeming feature in the public life of the country in this post-war crisis. I see the Canadian agriculturist a depressed and discouraged but nevertheless heroic figure, toiling, toiling, toiling, that the world may be fed and that civilization itself may be saved. The Canadian agriculturist to-day is feeding Europe at a price considerably less than cost.

So much for the redeeming feature; what about the tragedy? Well, when the people who receive our foodstuffs say, in substance, though perhaps not in so many words, "The cheap foodstuffs that we are obtaining at a price less than cost, coupled with our industrial efficiency enable us to produce manufactured commodities at a price considerably less than the price prevailing in your country for similar articles"—when they say that to us, what do we say? We put up both hands, and we say, "No; these goods can only be admitted at a price that will guarantee a dividend to the home manufacturer." You cannot with impunity treat natural laws with contempt; the nation that seeks to thwart these fundamental laws will be ground ultimately by their very force. That is the vital relationship existing to-day between the agricultural conditions in this country and the state of Europe. When men prate of Canada's selfishness and aloofness, they are simply overlooking the fundamental facts of the case.

Physical conditions will not permit me, Mr. Speaker, to speak at length, but I do want to make one or two suggestions. I want to suggest to the government, first of all, that in my humble judgment the time has arrived for the appointment of a Canadian ambassador to the United States. I am convinced that that appointment is inseparably bound up with the problem of wider markets. I am convinced that if the right man were secured,—and he ought to be secured; a man of tact, good judgment, and familiar, to some extent at least, with conditions on the North American continent at this time, a man who could become responsible for negotiations and take the initiative in starting negotiations that could be followed up by the administration here—I believe that if such a man were secured and ultimately appointed he could make a contribution of the first magnitude to the cause of a better understanding between the two nations at this time. Furthermore, it is my opinion that our foreign policy is going to be more and more bound up with the foreign policy of the United States, whether we desire it or not. For Canada to embark on an European struggle at this time with the United States remaining neutral, would mean, in view of our present financial obligations, bankruptcy to this young nation. If some people contend that no other nation of the British Commonwealth has ever taken this step, I reply that no other nation in the British Commonwealth is inseparably associated with the United States in the sense that this Canadian nation is.

The second practical suggestion I should like to make is one to the government, and it is that they should seriously consider at the earliest possible moment, or as soon as circumstances will permit, the advisability of calling a conference of representatives of the provinces who will meet with the federal representatives and clearly define, if they can, the respective sources to which each body may go in search of the revenue that is necessary to meet its needs. Nothing could be more irritating than to receive a notice from the Dominion government that your income tax is overdue, or at least due, and then to receive a similar notice from a provincial government. I think this is a conference the holding of which is long overdue.

Before I take my seat I should like to refer to the address delivered during this debate by the right hon. leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Meighen). I was surprised, I was amazed, at its toleration. We had from him at least a speech worthy of his mind. But there was one pronouncement in his address that seems to have remained with me in a peculiar sense. Referring to the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), he said that he was a man who was not only truly Canadian, but also truly British. I could not help but think as the right hon. gentleman concluded his remarks that he himself was rapidly becoming Canadianized. But what of his immediate followers? I trust the Canadianization of my right hon. friend will not lead to the fossilization of his immediate followers. Why this ominous silence? The country did not expect much from them we know, but surely the country expects something. Well might an angel exclaim "Why seek ye the living amongst the dead?"

Believing, Mr. Speaker, that there is an aspect of our economic conditions that has not been emphasized in this debate, believing also that that aspect of our economic conditions is of the most vital importance to the Canadian people in this crisis, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell):

> That in view of the increased burden of taxation and of the hardship which many of the people suffer from this burden, and the unrest and dissatisfaction arising therefrom, and in view of the desirability of adopting measures to reduce the cost of production, and effect such relief to consumers and producers as may be within the power of parliament, the House is of the opinion that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation should be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance.
> (1) Diminishing the very high cost of production, which presses so severely on the primary producers of the country at this time;
> (2) Reducing the cost of living to the great masses of the common people, many of whom are being forced out of the country by the prevailing economic conditions.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment. I would point out that the form is not in accordance with Beauchesne's Rules, but I suppose that can be changed without altering the spirit of the matter that has been submitted by the hon. member. His Honour, the Speaker, will deal with the question of the form of the amendment.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I join with those who have preceded me in congratulating the mover and seconder of the resolution for the adoption of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne upon their efforts. They have worthily acquitted themselves of the task entrusted to them. May I be permitted also, Mr. Speaker, to tender my humble congratulations to yourself upon the conclusion of your successful and delicate mission overseas. Those of us who are familiar with the manner in which you fulfil your high office in this House had every reason to expect that in those delicate negotiations you would conduct yourself with becoming dignity, and with honour to yourself and credit to this country. May I also say that I am sure you have amply realized our highest expectations in that regard. It was a very fitting thing indeed that the government of France should donate to Canada as a gift to this country, 250 acres of land on the historic Vimy Ridge. It is a very fitting thing indeed that this government should not hesitate to erect upon that historic ridge a monument which I am convinced will be a thing of beauty and a joy forever, a monument which, through all the ages, will constitute a challenge and an inspiration to the growing manhood and womanhood of this country,—a challenge to greater service, and an inspiration to a fuller duty. May I also venture to say that it seems to me that through the coming centuries the children of France will have before them a constant reminder and a fitting memorial of the service which was rendered by the sons of Canada in the days when the liberty, the equality and the fraternity of the citizenship of the republic was threatened.

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that the challenge of the country to this parliament at the present time lies in two directions. I am convinced that first of all the challenge is to economy—to economy not only in expenditure, but economy also in the administration of the government. We must of necessity view with considerable alarm, as the responsible representatives of the people of Canada, the rapid and substantial increase in the public debt. We cannot fail but be impressed with the increasing and over-whelming cost of government. What can we do, what answer can this parliament make, to that challenge? Is there any way out of this increasing cost, which ultimately must necessarily if continued bring us to the very abyss of bankruptcy? I think there are several things we may do. In the first place I think we should make an effort to decentralize government. There seems to have been, through the passing years, a tendency towards centralization of government, and especially a centralization of government in this particular city. Let me give one illustration, because I think we should not continue the policy of bringing the people to the government—we should take the government to the people. The federal national parks of this country constitute an area, I think, of approximately 8,000 square miles. In the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia considerably over 7,000 square miles of the total area is found. In eastern Canada—and I mean by that practically the territory east of Manitoba—the national parks of Canada represent an area of only 160 acres. Yet we have established in Ottawa a large Parks Department, admittedly with a very efficient and able gentleman in charge. Now why should not that particular department, if we need such a department, be located at the very centre, where the activities of that department must necessarily be? If that were done, if that department were located at Banff, or some other convenient point, its work could be more satisfactorily and efficiently carried on than under present conditions. That is one thing, I think, that we must do; we must make a substantial effort towards decentralization of government. With that will come not only considerable economy but increased efficiency.

Co-related to the subject of economy in Canada, in both its expenditure and its administration, it seems to me the second challenge of our people to this parliament comes in the matter of taxation. If one were to examine in detail the various methods of taxation in force not only under our municipal governments, but also under our provincial and federal governments, I think he would be driven to the conclusion that governments first of all decide that a certain amount of money must be raised in order to meet their expenditures. Then they seek to impose a sufficient levy to secure, in the most rapid way, the required amount, without much reference to the accepted principles of taxation, without much reference to those accepted canons of taxation which have been undisputed for at least one hundred years. It seems to me that we should pay much greater attention to this matter, and I propose, although the subject must be familiar to many of the members of this house, to suggest for consideration four cardinal principles or canons of taxation laid down by Adam Smith. I think that in the light of these canons we should examine the various methods of taxation applied, and endeavour to make them harmonize with these particular principles or else wipe them out altogether. The first principle I would cite is the following:

1. The subjects of every state ought to contribute towards the support of the government, as nearly as possible, in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state. The expense of government to the individuals of a great nation, is like the expense of management to the joint tenants of a great estate, who are all obliged to contribute in proportion to their respective interests in the estate. In the observation or neglect of this maxim consists, what is called the equality or inequality of taxation.

2. The tax which each individual is bound to pay ought to be certain and not arbitrary.

3. Every tax ought to be levied at the time, or in the manner, in which it is most likely to be convenient for the contributor to pay it.

4. Every tax ought to be so contrived as both to take out and keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the public treasury of the state.

These have been the accepted principles of taxation for over a hundred years, as I suggested, and yet in all our departments of government we virtually obscure the fundamental principles. I think there is much in the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Springfield (Mr. Hoey). We require some sort of a tax conference. We require a delimitation of the fields of taxation as between the existing tax levying bodies. That may require, and probably does necessitate in the ultimate analysis a change in our British North America Act, but nevertheless, some steps should be taken in this, which seems to be a vital and essential matter. We should delimit the field, as far as possible as between the various tax collecting organizations, and then see that the taxes imposed comply with the accepted canons of taxation.

The debate on the Address, Mr. Speaker, is a splendid opportunity for members from various parts of the country to become acquainted with the actual conditions which exist in other parts. Spread out, as we are, for hundreds of miles along the northern fringe of this continent, it is, doubtless, true that there must be many diverse and divergent interests. It is difficult, indeed, for an individual in one part of the country to come to any conclusion with regard to the economic conditions in any other parts, and so it is desirable that, in this initial debate, the conditions from all parts of the country should be brought to the attention of the House, in order that the House may be duly informed and may be able to act accordingly. And, therefore, I propose, for a few moments, to survey the existing conditions in that part of the country from which I come, and more particularly in the province of Alberta. It is actual practical facts that we desire. Principles are splendid, but we must first of all know the facts before we are in a position to apply the appropriate principles.

It is a platitude, indeed, that the agricultural industry, in its many ramifications, is the vital and the basic industry, so far as western Canada is concerned. In fact, I doubt not that I might go further and say that it is the essential and vital industry of all Canada, but looking at the conditions in this particular industry, as many hon. members are aware, nature has perhaps in the past year been unkind to large sections. The affliction of drought, hail, and other climatic conditions has left in its wake a considerable hardship, but nevertheless, so far as the western provinces are concerned, we find the largest crop in our history, and yet we find agriculture in a deplorable financial and economic condition. We find in Alberta that a large number of farms are being sacrificed and many are being abandoned, leaving as a heritage a weed menace for those to combat who are content to remain upon adjoining land. We find a large number of these farmers are emigrating to the western and northwestern states. In some portions of Alberta, afflicted to a considerable extent with drought, depopulation, as I am informed by one of the hon. members, varies in the district, extending south of the town of Hanna to north of the village of Tabor, from about thirty to fifty per cent. The beneficent effects of prosperous conditions in the agricultural industry are rapidly reflected in every other industry and business, not only in western Canada, but in eastern Canada, but as a result of the condition which now
5 p.m. exists in that industry we find very considerable urban depopulation. As an illustration we find, for instance, in the city from which I come, in the end of the month of December, there were something like five hundred vacant houses. An examination of the railway figures indicating the emigration through the port of Kingsgate, which is one only of the avenues of exit from the province of Alberta to the States, shows that in the three months ending December 31st last, there has been an excess of emigration over immigration of approximately 5,000 paying passengers.

Now these are actual facts and these are conditions which must be faced. I am not one of those who might properly be called a calamity howler, and I am not a pessimist. In fact, I think I would be a pessimist indeed if I failed to reveal to this House on this occasion these facts as I have found them. I personally have great faith in western Canada, I have great faith in all of Canada, and I trust these conditions may be but temporary and that they may shortly be removed.

What are the reasons for this condition in the agricultural industry? Because if we want to know the condition of western Canada we must ascertain the condition in the agricultural industry. None will deny—certainly I will not for a moment attempt to deny—that the chaotic political conditions in Europe have resulted in a chaotic economic and financial condition which is necessarily reflected in Canada to the detriment of our grain growers. But while it is true that these external factors are of great significance, it is also true that there are many internal handicaps to which I think this government might properly turn its attention. Before the war—there was a relativity, if you like, existing between the cost of production and the price which the farmer received for his product, which normal relativity is disturbed to-day. We find expensive production costs, we find expensive marketing costs, and we find only pre-war prices for the product raised.

I have endeavoured to make some little examination into the cost of production. It is a very difficult matter I admit but, many people have given it much consideration, endeavouring to take into consideration all the factors involved. I am informed that in the province of Saskatchewan in the year 1920 it cost approximately 72 cents to raise one bushel of wheat. I understand that in the province of Alberta it would necessarily cost a few cents more than that sum per bushel. The cost of production, as you will readily admit, is excessive. May I add to that sum the cost of preparation for market and the cost of transportation. Take the transportation costs from Calgary to Montreal. During the year 1922 examination revealed that the cost of transportation on a bushel of wheat varied from something like 40 cents a bushel to approximately 60 cents a bushel. Let me give the details of this figure. Threshing cost from 10 to 14 cents a bushel in Alberta this year. Haulage and elevator charges may be placed at the very modest sum of 2½ cents a bushel. Then railway charges to Fort William 15·6 cents per bushel; elevator and cleaning and inspection charges, 1¼ cents a bushel. From Fort William to Bay ports, according to the best information I have been able to get, the transporting cost would run from 3½ to 10 cents a bushel. Then railway or canal transportation up to Montreal would not be less than 5 cents a bushel; elevator charges at bay ports, ¾ cent per bushel; expenses at Montreal, 1¾ cents per bushel; insurance charges varying from ·33, or approximately one-third cent per bushel, upwards. That makes a total cost in transportation charges alone, varying according to the particular part of the country, of from forty to something like sixty cents per bushel.

Hon. members can readily see that, with these excessive production costs and high transportation charges, it was impossible for the farmers of western Canada to raise grain at a profit during the past year. It is all very well to indicate these conditions. But what can, or what should the government do to reduce production costs? They should, it seems to me, make some definite effort to reduce or, preferably, to eliminate entirely the customs tariff from the implements of production and from the necessaries of life, including food and clothing and the other articles that are so essential to comfortable living, at least on the western plains. In the Speech from the Throne there is not one ray of hope in this connection; the Governor General's lips have been sealed in this matter. I think it is unfortunate that the government have not given some indication of their desire to live up to the pledges upon which they secured a mandate from the people of Canada. Further I am glad to see that the government does not hesitate now to have an investigation into the grain business. That investigation has long since been overdue. I think that probably the government have been altogether too solicitous of the views of certain members on this side of the House. The investigation is necessary, and it should be conducted in the most thorough and the most complete manner.

Now, what can, or what should, the government do to lessen marketing costs? Last session we secured the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement through an act of parliament, or rather, perhaps, by the efluxion of time. The restoration of that agreement meant, I understand, a saving of approximately $30,000,000 to the farmers of western Canada. But what is the use of effecting a saving in that regard, when, at the same time, conditions exist upon the lakes which largely nullify the action taken by parliament? I notice that the government proposes to inquire, by royal commission, into the alleged combine which exists on the Great Lakes; and I am glad to observe, also, that they are going to investigate the matter of insurance charges in connection with the shipping of grain. It has been a matter of common knowledge for many months past—in fact, I doubt not that it has been commonly known for years now—that some sort of effort is being and has been made to mulct the producers of western Canada in the matter of transportation rates and insurance charges upon cargoes carried on the Great Lakes. It has always occurred to me as a peculiar thing and one which, I admit, I cannot understand, why it is that season after season, this season like the rest, there is a constant discrimination against Georgian bay ports. I find that uniformly through the past season the rate per bushel on grain from Duluth on lake Superior to Buffalo varied between about two cents and, at the close of the season, five cents. But you take grain rates from Fort William to bay ports, competing points at both ends with American ports and you find that the rate during this season, and in prior seasons too, has varied from 3½ cents to as high, I understand, as ten cents per bushel. I cannot understand the reason for this discrimination, and I hope that in this connection the inquiry by the royal commission will be as thorough as possible. I trust that no effort will be spared to bring to bay any combine which may exist in regard to these matters.

I hope that the government, in their zeal to discover whether there is a combine on the lakes in the matter of transportation rates, will not fail to carry their investigation to the point where they can be assured whether or not there is any combine in connection with ocean rates; because, after all, these combines, if they do exist, are usually hydra-headed. You may cut off one head, but the others remain; and the government should see to it that the investigation shall be such that it may not be said afterwards that, while a combine has been robbed of its power in one section, nevertheless it can rise up in might in another. In connection with this inquiry I regret that the government did not long ago take some drastic action in dealing with the situation. I cannot see why the coastal laws of the country were suspended, practically at the close of navigation, when such suspension could do little good so far as grain transportation costs were concerned. The government might well have acted far more diligently in that regard.

There is another way in which the government can be of some service: I refer to an investigation of the possibilities of the westward movement of grain through the port of Vancouver. If that investigation justifies it, their support should be given in connection with the so-called western grain route. I know there are problems involved in connection with the shipping of grain from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan westward through the port of Vancouver. Some of these problems should be mastered by this government; others should be taken up and solved by the people of Vancouver and of British Columbia generally. This is the more necessary in view of the fact, as revealed upon examination, that this westward movement of grain is becoming a far more popular movement than heretofore. I understand that the amount of grain shipped this year through this route is considerably in excess of that shipped last year, despite inadequate terminal and elevator facilities. Account must also be taken of the fact that uniformly through the past season there has been a premium on the Vancouver price over the Fort William price of grain, extending from approximately three cents to between seven and eight cents per bushel. These are matters that should be carefully investigated by the government. I see no reason why the Board of Grain Commissioners should not long ago have been charged with the duty of investigating this matter with a view to ascertaining the feasibility of developing this western movement of grain. Is there anything the people of British Columbia can do to make it more feasible? That an investigation should disclose. In the years to come, in my opinion, this matter will be of increasing importance to this country, and I trust that the government will not neglect any opportunity to give, at least, what counsel and support they can to the western movement of grain.

Now, I have dealt to some extent with the matter of grain growing in western Canada. I propose to turn my attention for a moment to the cattle industry of western Canada. This industry, as everyone must realize, is one for which the province of Alberta particularly is naturally adapted. In past years it has been a very profitable and a very large industry. But unfortunately the high American tariff has excluded our cattle from the Chicago market, and the result has been a disastrous fall in prices, the sacrifice of cattle at very low rates that are utterly unprofitable and, most unfortunate of all, the sale of a large amount of our best breeding stock in western Canada to purchasers from the States. So that if perchance the cattle industry should subsequently revive, it may be that our western cattle owners will not be able to take the fullest advantage of that revival.

Now, what are the prospects in connection with this industry? We are told the British cattle embargo has been removed. I understand that Mr. Duncan Marshall—who is, I believe, a six months' employee of the Department of Agriculture—has given it as his opinion that this is going to make a very great difference. Well, not being a cattle man, I cannot say, but certainly the largest cattle shipper in western Canada says that the removal of the embargo is not going to be of much significance for a considerable time to come. I am glad to say that some of the cattle growers of western Canada are showing an initiative in regard to this industry which, if not very complimentary perhaps to the government, is at least complimentary to the individuals concerned. In the province of Alberta they are endeavouring by a special method of cultivation, which does not involve very much expense, to raise the necessary fodder so that they can finish the cattle on their farms and ship the finished product to the market in the United States, and consequently be enabled to take advantage of a market that they were not able to exploit with grass fed cattle as heretofore.

But let me suggest in passing that what the Department of Agriculture wants in connection with these particular matters is experienced, practical, scientific men. We have had in the various departments altogether too many political agents and theorizing prophets. It does occur to me that it would be advisable so far as the Agricultural department of the federal government is concerned, to attempt to co-ordinate that department with the provincial departments of agriculture in order that there will not be this constant overlapping, with the consequence that inefficiency results and nobody is served. That is particularly, but not exclusively, true of the Department of Agriculture.

To add to the general difficulties in connection with these industries, some of the people of western Canada have been called upon to pay what might be called an excess rate of interest, a greater rate than that provided by the Bank Act. In practically every case the minimum rate charged is eight per cent, although the banks are limited to seven per cent, in many cases nine per cent is charged, and in some cases as much as ten per cent has been exacted. These conditions are unnecessarily severe. It is unfortunate that they exist, and it is no wonder that the people of western Canada are now directing their attention to this parliament, hoping that in the pending revision of the Bank Act some relief at least will be given them.

In reference to this revision, which I understand must take place every ten years, it occurs to me that in a country that is changing as rapidly as this Dominion is, it would be advisable perhaps to have a revision of the act every five years. I think that would enable parliament to size up the situation somewhat more frequently without interfering with that stability of financial conditions which I think banks and other institutions should enjoy.

In western Canada our attention has been specially directed to banking matters, and there has been an increasing realization that after all credit is the life blood of trade, that if that credit is denied trade must necessarily atrophy and decay. There is also a realization, I think, that credit is largely community created. Along with this realization we have witnessed the increasing centralization of the credit power of this country in the hands of a decreasing number of men, and to cap the climax we have witnessed the tragic fiasco in connection with the Merchants Bank. Many people wonder how it is possible that the interests of the depositors and creditors may be imperilled to the extent disclosed by the Merchants Bank scandal, how it is possible that false returns may be made to the government and yet absolutely no one be held responsible before the law. That is a strange and a depressing fact, and I think this parliament would be well advised to give serious consideration to remedying the defects in our banking law.

But now the government have under consideration another scheme to change and improve the existing economic conditions. Despite the rural depopulation which I have suggested is taking place, despite the corresponding decrease in urban population which is also taking place, the government now propose an immigration policy. That is what they pin their hope and their faith to. And the invitation extended to prospective immigrants is: Come in with us and share our debt! I am not altogether convinced that the intending immigrant would consider the invitation as entirely disinterested and charitable. In fact, I suspect, if I were to suggest to hon. members that I would be very glad to have them come and share my personal debts, there would probably be some misgivings on their part about accepting my invitation.

However, I am not opposed to any immigration policy per se. I am of opinion that an immigration policy under proper conditions and preceded by proper efforts by this government, is of value and is probably of vital consequence to the country. What has the government done? First of all, it has called to its councils the Canada Colonization Company, a company which seems to plan as a basic principle a certain amount of real estate exploitation. The president and some of the officers of this company made a grand transcontinental tour, and immediately thereafter the whole project lapsed into a state of coma—no explanation offered. The president resigned, and one at least of the directors also resigned—no explanation offered. Well, it seems to me that the explanation does not require much seeking to find. I think the whole scheme is foredoomed to failure in that it is predicated upon a false basis—it does not take cognizance of the economic conditions existing. But the government goes further. It says: We will bring in some tenant farmers and put them on the land. These gentlemen have not much money; indeed, it is suggested that the transportation charges are so high that it will be difficult for them to get here anyway. And then, the "most unkindest cut of all," they take helpless orphans and endeavour to formulate an immigration policy for these poor, defenceless children. They, of course, can make no objection. They are helpless, and I presume they must take the consequence. Now, a proper immigration policy must be predicated by an adjustment, or readjustment if you like, of our economic conditions. Make farming in western Canada profitable and then you do not need much of an immigration policy. The best immigration advertisement for this country, is a prosperous and a contented farmer; if you have that you do not need to go to much expense—certainly the expense will be less than would otherwise be necessary. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that if as a result of the government's effort many men and women are, under existing conditions, brought into the country, Canada will simply become a conduit pipe through which these people will pass on their way to the United States, where economic and general employment conditions are much more satisfactory than they are here. The country looks to this government for leadership in connection with these pressing economic problems. It is a strange fact, but nevertheless true, that for some reason or other, as soon as governments get into office they become subject to a sort of creeping paralysis, a state of inaction and laissez faire. They become largely the numbed and chilled victims of circumstance. The people, therefore, are looking to parliament for a real leadership in these matters.

Turning for a moment, Mr. Speaker, from the internal conditions—which, I suggest, are not entirely without hope if you have a government of vision, a government of progress, a government not lacking in courage—turning from these conditions to external affairs, I think there is more ground for congratulation. During the time of the Near Eastern crisis the Cabinet indicated this country's position in regard to participation in war, and particularly in regard to the sending of a contingent to the Near East. I am glad that the Prime Minister and his Cabinet took the position that they did. They followed in the footsteps of that illustrious statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier; they indicated in no uncertain terms that the question of Canada's participation or non-participation in any war is a matter for the responsible representatives of the Canadian people in parliament assembled. In a matter so vital as war, involving, as it well may, the lives of thousands of our fellow-countrymen; involving the loss, perchance, of immense treasures of wealth; involving, as it well may in these latter days, the destruction of our whole civilization, it is imperative that the decision be made exclusively by parliament, or if not by parliament then by the people themselves. No group of men either here or elsewhere outside these two bodies should take any action committing the country to any condition of war. Action in respect to the eastern crisis was the more imperative in view of the fact, as those who are familiar with some at least of the circumstances must know, that the whole story of the Near East, both prior to the armistice with the Turks and subsequent thereto, has been a long series of secret intrigues, secret treaties, selfish aggrandizements. I would like to have seen the Prime Minister send a challenge to the old world from this new world of democracy indicating that so far as we are concerned we are through with that variety of old world diplomacy which has brought the earth almost to the brink of ruin, almost to the verge of despair. So I say that real progress has been made in the disposition of our external affairs during the recess.

May I say just in this connection that I believe Canada has latterly been looking altogether too much to Europe for its cue. I wish to quote, if I may be permitted, from a statement made by General Smuts at the Imperial Conference in 1921, where Canada was represented by the present right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen. I commend this statement to the consideration of the House as Canada's policy. He said:

> In shaping our course for the future, we must bear in mind that the whole world position has radically altered as a result of the war. Europe is no longer what she was, and the power and the position which she once occupied in the world has been largely lost. The great empires have disappeared. Austria will never rise again. Russia and Germany will no doubt revive, but not in this generation nor in the next; and when they do, they may be very different countries in a world which may be a very different world. The position, therefore, has completely altered. The old viewpoint from which we considered Europe has completely altered. She suffers from an exhaustion, which is the most appalling fact of history; and the victorious countries of Europe are not much better off than the vanquished. No, the scene has shifted on the great stage. To my mind that is the most important fact in the world situation to-day, and the fact to which our foreign policy should have special regard.

Then, discussing the possibilities of the future, he asks the question, What will be the next chapter in human history? and says:

> What will be the character of that history? Will it be along the old lines? Will it be the old spirit of national and Imperial domination which has been the undoing of Europe? Or shall we have learned our lesson? Shall we have purged our souls in the fires through which we have passed? Will it be a future of peaceful co-operation, of friendly co-ordination of all the vast interests at stake?

In the latter part of that statement of Premier Smuts lies, I think, the course for this country to follow—a non-partisan course as between the nations, holding the balance of justice with an equal poise, seeking to extend our friendly help and co-operation to all nations in distress.

I say further that if we are obligated by any warlike commitments, we should seek release from them. We should not engage in any further war-provoking entanglements. If we do that much we shall at least have made some efforts to usher in, or perhaps to bring somewhat closer to realization, that day when—

> The common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe.
> And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

Now, there is one other matter to which I wish to refer, and that is my position before this House. There has been some misunderstanding. There has been, perhaps, to some extent some slight misrepresentation. Let me say at the outset that my position before this House has not changed in the slightest. I was elected as an Independent for the Calgary West federal riding. I was supported most generously by the United Farmers of Alberta within that constituency, and supported most generously indeed by the labour unions in that constituency. It was my duty, and it has been my effort to fulfil it, to co-operate not only with the Progressive group but with any group which was interested in the securing of democratic legislation. That is my obligation to my constituents; that is the course which I intend to pursue—that and none other. I am not fettered by any party consideration; I am not embarrassed by any partisan affiliations; and so I say I am prepared to co-operate not only with the government, not only with my friends of the opposition, but with the Progressive group in any legislation which appears to me deserving of favourable consideration by this parliament.

I have listened with considerable interest to the belated—shall I say?—amendment proposed by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey). That amendment is worthy of some consideration. I think the challenge, however, of the country to-day to this parliament is the challenge to economy, not only in administration but also in the expenditure of government—the challenge to keep our expenditure within our income. I think the challenge to parliament to-day is to reduce and lessen the burdens of taxation which so grievously bear upon the people, and so in that spirit I desire to move an amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Springfield. The amendment which I propose reads as follows:

> That the following words be added to the amendment before the House:
> That this House views with alarm the substantial increase in the national debt, and urges Your Excellency's advisers to exert every possible effort to economize in the expenditure and administration of government, and to lessen the burden of federal taxation which bears so heavily on the people of Canada.

I offer that amendment, not for the purpose of embarrassing the government, for I believe the government is under no obligation to consider it as necessarily indicating a want of confidence, but because its adoption will indicate that the challenge of the country to this parliament has been answered to some extent at least.

Mr. E. W. ROBINSON (Kings, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any length on the question before the House. I might assure the House right now that it is not my intention to move an amendment to the amendment or anything of that kind. I shall be as brief as possible.

I believe that it is first of all my duty to express the pleasure that I had in listening to the eloquent address of my colleague the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam).

I have heard kind words spoken of his address from various parts of the House, and the only note of criticism that I heard was an implication perhaps that he had spoken from a sectional viewpoint, from the standpoint of the Maritime provinces principally. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that we are sectional by nature. In this Canada of ours there is a maritime section, there is also a western section, and I claim that it is only by hearing the opinions of various members from the different sections that we can ever come to any concerted action that will mean anything. Therefore, I shall make no excuses for the hon. member for Colchester having spoken from a maritime standpoint. It seems to me that we are expected to listen with patience while the members from the West tell of their grievances and while the members from British Columbia, for instance, speak of the peculiar questions confronting them; but if a member from the Maritime provinces tells of the needs and aspirations of that section we are at once accused of sectionalism.

There are one or two points in the Speech from the Throne to which I particularly wish to call attention. The first is redistribution. It is well-understood, of course, that after every decennial census it is necessary to have a redistribution of the representation. Redistribution will affect Nova Scotia perhaps more than any other province at this time, because we stand to lose two members. It might interest the House to know that our loss of two members is not due to the fact that we have exhausted our natural resources; it is not that our population is fading away because we have exhausted the country entirely; nothing of the kind. Our population has increased to a certain extent, but has not kept pace with the increase in the population of the province of Quebec. We have at the present time about 535,000 people in the province of Nova Scotia. We produced products in the year 1922 valued at $163,000,000, and I think all will agree that that is no mean total for a population of that size. I do not believe any other part of this Dominion, I was going to say the world, possesses as many and as varied resources as does the province of Nova Scotia. We raised coal last year to the value of $30,000,000; our farm products were valued at $34,000,000, and our fisheries at $12,000,000. No other part of the Dominion, I believe, has such a variety of resources as we possess.

The question may be asked: In view of these considerations, why is our population diminishing, or apparently diminishing? In answer to that I would say that we have, apparently, been side-tracked. In the Maritime provinces we possess advantages that are not enjoyed by any of the other provinces. We have communications with all parts of the globe, and we have the best harbours in the world. What we lack is communication with the rest of the Dominion, because of the fact that we are discriminated against as far as railway rates are concerned.

In the Speech from the Throne there was a reference to immigration. I do not suppose that it would be wise for the provinces of Canada to compete with one another in attempting to secure immigrants. If the West requires farm labourers I am sure that we in the East would wish them to have all they need. In the Maritime provinces we require money as well as men in order to develop our resources. The speech from the Throne refers to the necessity of advertising the Dominion in those European countries from which we desire to attract immigrants. I would ask, in all fairness, that when that advertising takes place the Maritime provinces shall not be overlooked. I am afraid that the advertising of Canada in the past has been almost entirely confined to extolling the resources and capabilities of the West rather than of the East. In this matter the Maritime provinces only ask for a fair show.

I am not one of those who expect the government to realize prosperity for this country while the rest of the world is suffering. It seems to me that we have only to look at the conditions in Europe to realize that those conditions cannot be removed by a simple wave of the hand. No magic formula exists by which a statutory enactment will bring prosperity to any country in Europe or elsewhere. I am sure that if we pause and consider the markets of Europe, where the prices of the world's produce are fixed to a great extent, we shall understand why the price of wheat, and other commodities, has been so low in the Canadian West. In this connection let me refer to conditions in the county I represent. There in a small valley, some sixty miles long and four miles wide, we raised 2,000,000 barrels of apples for export last season. To-day the price of apples is not nearly as high as it was a year ago. Where does the fault lie? We export our apples to Great Britain—to London, to Liverpool, to Glasgow. Yet when the markets became depressed we did not look for any government action to maintain prices.

I have no wish to occupy the attention of the House unduly, and will therefore close with an expression of my appreciation of the excellent speech made by the mover of the resolution for the adoption of the Address.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Victoria, Alta.): In view of the hour, it being nearly six o'clock, I think I may be permitted to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is probable that a large number of members will be absent this evening, and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not rise particularly to object to the motion but to sever myself and those I represent from acquiescence in it. It is no desire of ours that these early adjournments shall take place. The government must assume the responsibility for them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have nothing to say except that I understood that the whips had agreed to have an early adjournment, but my right hon. friend takes exception to their action.

Mr. BOYS: There was no agreement made.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Tuesday, February 6, 1923.

The House met at three o'clock.

Report and financial statement of the Honorary Advisory Council of Industrial and Scientific Research for the year ending March 31, 1922.—Hon. Mr. Robb.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain, please.

Mr. NEILL: This is the bill I introduced last year, but owing to its being near the end of the session it did not go beyond the first reading. To be brief, it presents a simple and yet complete and unassailable method by which the people of Canada can exclude any form of undesirable immigration that they desire without at the same time becoming involved in any dispute with any foreign nation or government whatsoever. In the past the trouble has been that by endeavouring to exclude any particular race or body of people by name, you immediately involved yourself in objections raised upon legal or treaty, or even sentimental grounds, by the government of the people you sought to exclude. That has always been the trouble. This bill gets round that situation without any quibble, trickery or freak legislation whatever.

Like most effective things, it is simple. The vital clauses are sections two and five. Section two provides that any immigrant from wheresoever he comes, wishing to enter Canada, shall first ask permission to do so from his country of origin. Section five prescribes that the Minister of Immigration on receiving the formal application shall arbitrarily and without question decide whether or not that particular immigrant shall be admitted. He has to give no reasons to the government under which the intending immigrant lives, and therefore there cannot be raised the objections I have alluded to.

I may mention that in New Zealand, which is always the forerunner of advanced legislation in almost any regard, this act has practically been in force for two years, and the Prime Minister of that country in introducing some report on its working made the comment that it had proved so superior to previous legislation of a similar nature—because hitherto in New Zealand they had proceeded along the lines of imposing an educational test—that he was thoroughly of opinion that its provisions would finally have to be adopted by every possession of the British Empire.

As I said, this bill hits at no one in particular, yet it is applicable to all, and can involve us in no international troubles. It is a very important bill so far as the interests of this country are concerned, and I might go further and state that in respect to the ultimate destiny of British Columbia hardly any more important bill could be introduced, and therefore I earnestly submit it for the favourable consideration of the government and of this House.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Putnam for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Hoey, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Shaw, resumed from Monday, February 5.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Victoria, Alta.): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations in this debate it is my wish first to join with those who have preceded me in complimenting the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The manner in which those two gentlemen acquitted themselves reflected credit upon themselves and brought honour to this House and to the constituencies which they represent.

It is not my intention to take up the time of the House by making any extended remarks, but in view of the serious condition that prevails to-day throughout this whole vast Dominion, and believing as I do that we have responsible government in Canada, I feel it is our duty as representatives of the people to place the viewpoints of our various sections of the country before the government so that they may be fully seized of the true conditions and endeavour to meet them in framing their policies at this time.

In crossing over half a continent in proceeding to this capital city, I came in contact with a great many men from different parts of the country, and in every conversation that I entered into I was particularly struck with the serious note that was interjected in regard to present conditions in Canada. I am not a pessimist, but I believe we would have been a good deal better off in Canada if we had had a little more pessimism in our make-up, and if the persons known as "boosters" had been classified as undesirable and rejected at the gates of our Dominion. The true optimist, in my opinion, is the man who really sizes up the situation, who does not underestimate his enemy, and who makes provision accordingly.

I would like to comment upon what might be termed the unfair criticism that has been levelled at hon. members in this corner of the House. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) referred to it in the opening remarks of his address, and reference was made on different occasions last year to the Progressives leaning on the government. While I am speaking only for myself, I believe I express the view of the majority of hon. members in this corner of the House when I say that the people having at the last election placed the reins of government in the hands of new men, this new and untried government should be given a fair chance. Those who believe in British fair play will not condemn anyone without a trial. Personally I am not supporting the government, nor am I opposing it if they bring down legislation in the interests of the country.

I did not want to introduce this subject, but reference has been made to the matter of our organization, and we have been criticized by the press and in this House from the point of view of our representing a class. I am sorry that the two old parties which up to recently had represented this country since confederation did not deal with national questions in a national way, and thus compelled one class of the people to organize in order to present their views before this House—indeed, in order to protect their very existence. I say without fear of contradiction that the agricultural viewpoint was never fairly placed before the House until the Progressives sat here in large numbers.

Since confederation we have had, as I have already suggested, two parties, one known as the high tariff and the other as the low tariff party. In my recollection there has never been an election in the course of which the political football of the tariff has not been hauled out and made the main issue before the people. We were told last year that the government, being new in office, could not at that time make sweeping reductions in the tariff, but that they had taken a step in the right direction, and we were given to understand that when another session came around a further similar step would be taken. I was greatly disappointed, therefore, to note that in the Speech from the Throne no mention whatever was made of the tariff. Irrespective of what party has been in power in the past, we have been governed by the same national policy that was promulgated in the early days of confederation. The argument was made last year—and it may not have been without force—that our attitude in respect to tariff might be influenced by the attitude of our neighbours to the south when they practically placed an embargo on our goods. I do not believe that we should go down on our knees to men who will not deal with us, but I do think that the government lost one of the greatest opportunities they ever had when they did not at that time make a greater increase in the preferential tariff with Great Britain. I have here a press despatch which shows who our best customer is. It is dated August 26, 1922, Canadian Press, and says:

> The United Kingdom was a better customer of Canada than the United States for the twelve months ending with July. The total exports of Canadian produce to the United States for that period were $304,000,000, and to Great Britain and Ireland were nearly $307,000,000. These figures are the monthly summary of trade issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

The American people have practically slammed the door in the face of the Canadian farmer, leaving us with only one market that is sound, stable and steady, and that market is Great Britain. In 1922 about seven-eighths of our farm produce found a market in that country, and I think it is the duty of the government to endeavour annually to increase that preferential trade with Great Britain by building up an export trade—in other words, the task of the Dominion government should be to find new ways of promoting our inward trade with Britain as well as our outward. If we buy twice as much from the Motherland we enable her to buy more of our farm products.

We heard a great deal in this House both this year and last in regard to farming conditions. The hon. member for King's, N.S. (Mr. Robinson) last night said that he presumed that the House had to listen with patience to the tribulations of the farmer. I think it is the duty of every man who is acquainted with conditions in his own part of the country to place them before the House in their true light. I am not going into the subject of farming conditions in any detail, but I should like to place a few facts before the House regarding conditions in the province from which I come.

Of 80,000 farmers in Alberta it is said that 20,000 are insolvent at the present time. The minister administering the Drought Relief Act has 3,000 live accounts of farmers who have placed their financial affairs in his hands. This indebtedness averages $5,000 a quarter, or a total of $15,000,000. The interest average is between eight and ten per cent, and at eight per cent the yearly interest amounts to $1,200,000. There is a debt of $5,000,000 for feed and seed, and $2,000,000 in unpaid taxes. As I said before I shall not go into any detail in speaking of farming conditions, because others will no doubt add something during the course of this debate, and the House will in that way get a pretty fair view of the true conditions under which the Canadian farmer works.

Lest anyone should have the idea that these lamentable conditions exist only in the province of Alberta, I should like to give a few figures, taken from the Bureau of Statistics, in regard to those who pay income tax. I find that 93 per cent of the farmers of the entire Dominion who are assessed for income tax are in western Canada; 46 per cent of the whole are in Alberta, and 33 per cent of the whole in Saskatchewan. The figures by provinces are as follows: Ontario, 396; Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, 12; New Brunswick, 4; Quebec, 30; British Columbia, 79; Manitoba, 1,654; Saskatchewan, 1,084; and Alberta, 2,822.

To give an idea of the prices we have to pay for our manufactured goods in the West in the line of farm machinery, I will mention only one item. In 1911 we could purchase an eight-foot binder for $180; to-day the cost is $276. Those are the conditions in which we find ourselves. It is not that we are kicking so much about the prices of our goods coming down, as against the fact that the other fellow has not come down in the same proportion we have been forced to reduce.

One of the great questions before parliament and the country to-day is our immigration policy. It seems to me, in view of the conditions that now face us, it is rather a poor policy to invite other men to come in and work under the same difficulties. We hear a great deal about our immense national debt, and when you consider the combined Dominion, provincial and municipal debts, amounting to $4,000,000,000 of funded debt, and $200,000,000 of floating liabilities no one can deny that we are living under a great burden, and I would ask the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart)—for I notice that the government intend launching a big advertising scheme for immigrants—if they intend to include in their advertisements that statement of our debt and say that the men who come here must share that load with us. We have been spending millions in the last number of years to induce settlers to come to this country, and yet, acording to the statistics that have been compiled by our own government department, in the last ten years over two millions of people have left Canada. Would it not seem to be a good business proposition, before spending further money to induce immigrants to come to this country first to spend a little in trying to find out why these people are leaving the country? If we pursued that policy, I do not think we should require the huge sums that have been spent to bring in new settlers. I was talking to a gentleman this fall about our immigration policy, and he told me that very often a quarter section near him becomes vacant, and as he has a brother in the Old Land his wife has often said to him, "Why don't you invite John to come and take up that quarter section, and have him for your neighbour?" But the man said: "I have lived in this country for the last twelve years, and my conscience will not let me advise my brother to leave a fairly good position over there and come here and put up with the conditions he would have to face at the present time." I say that if we can bring about a condition that will make our farmers prosperous and contented it will be better for this country than any immigration policy that any government can bring in.

Some startling figures were given yesterday as to the number of people who are leaving Canada. I have not compiled any for my constituency, but I can give the figures for the little village in which I live and the immediate vicinity. From that district 113 people left last fall, and among them are many of our good Canadian-born men whom I have known from boyhood and who understand farming conditions as well as any man. Yet they told me this fall they could not stay here any longer, that they had stayed up till then on the strength of promises that times were going to get better, but now they had to pull out. It is bad enough to lose the immigrants brought in from outside, but it is a much greater loss when our own Canadian-born boys, who have been reared and brought up in this country, and on whom we have spent our energies educating and raising them up to a position where they are ready to go out and take their place in life, leave this country for some other.

I see by the Speech from the Throne that the decennial revision of the Bank Act is due, and I trust that when the legislation comes down it will receive the very serious consideration of the committee that will deal with it and of the House. I am not a financial expert, but I have looked over some figures and I find that in October of 1920 our entire circulation was $249,000,000 and in the following three months it was reduced by $43,000,000—and remember, that was the period when in other years it was always felt that circulation had to be increased. By June of 1921, the circulation had decreased by another $10,000,000. It seems to me, when we consider that in 1904 we had 34 banks in this country, and that that number has dwindled to only 17, that our financial system is becoming centralized in the hands of a small group of men who are able to dictate the financial policies of this country to the detriment of the masses. It is often said that we have the soundest banking system in the world. But does anyone claim that there exists anywhere in the world a banking or financial system operating for the best interest of the average person? There are many problems confronting the people of Canada to-day, and for which they are seeking a solution. You will scarcely meet a man but will agree that those problems are difficult, that we are facing serious conditions; and I think it should be the duty of the government to endeavour honestly to try and find a solution for the existing difficulties and put into force the necessary remedy.

To my mind one of the remedies for the existing situation is the development of our transportation system in such a manner as will afford an easy exit for our products from this country. In that connection I would like to say that we in western Canada, especially in Alberta, are looking forward anxiously to the time when the western route for our grain, via Vancouver and the Panama canal shall be developed. Previous to 1921 very little of our grain was shipped by the Panama canal, in fact the movement was in the experimental stage. From January to October, 1921, a trifle over half a million bushels, to be exact 563,065 bushels, were shipped by that route, but during November and December of the same year the shipment was 565,699 bushels, or a total for 1921, of 1,128,764 bushels. At the end of June, 1922, that amount had increased to 7,101,802 bushels; and it is hoped that this year more than twice that amount will have been shipped by that western route through Vancouver. One of the criticisms of the Panama canal route that we hear is that there are no bottoms available at Vancouver to take care of traffic. In view of the figures I have placed before the House showing that tonnage has been available to take care of the already large shipments developed in such a short space of time,

I think it is evident that when the freight comes there will be tonnage to meet it. With further reference to the amount of grain shipped let me quote a brief item which I noted in the press the other day, and which reads as follows:

> Winnipeg, Man.—Seven thousand cars of grain have been loaded since September 1, 1922, for the western coast by the Canadian Pacific railway, it was announced here. This represents 10,234,000 bushels of grain for export from Vancouver.

Actually over ten million bushels of grain were shipped by the Canadian Pacific railway alone, so that I was well within the mark when I anticipated that the export of seven millions in the first half of 1922 would soon be doubled. And here I would like to say to the hon. members from British Columbia that I was glad to see them acting as a unit last year on one particular question. On the subject of oriental immigration they forgot their politics and worked unitedly together. I would like to see the same unity exist in respect to this particular matter. If they are in earnest in desiring to develop this western route, and at the same time develop their own province, I hope they will assist us in seeking to increase the British preference so that when we ship grain to Great Britain, those vessels may return loaded with merchandise.

In further consideration of the western route I would like to cite some of the comparative grain rates that are in force at the present time. The average rate from Alberta to both Vancouver and Fort William is around 27 cents per hundred pounds. So that, under the present tariff, the rates to Vancouver and Fort William are on the same basis. From Vancouver to the United Kingdom the average ocean rate is 25 cents per bushel; the all-rail route from Fort William to St. John or Halifax is 35½ cents per hundred pounds, or 21 cents per bushel; the ocean rate from Atlantic ports to the United Kingdom averages 15 cents per bushel, or a total rate via the eastern route of 36 cents, showing a difference in favour of the Vancouver route of 11 cents per bushel. Now, previous to this year the lake-and-rail rate from Fort William to Montreal averaged about 14 cents per bushel; but owing to the grain blockade on the lakes this fall that channel was denied us and we paid the all-rail rate. In any case we pay that during the winter time, and the fact that Vancouver is a port which is open all the year round should make it apparent to the government that this subject should be given the most serious consideration at the earliest date possible, in order that when our crop has to be shipped next year we may be able to reap some advantage from the reduced rates.

Another matter that interests us out there very greatly indeed is the differential that exists on the mountain freight haul. Now, the people of Canada have assumed the control of our National Railway system. Whether we consider eastern Canada or western Canada, we are all assuming the burden of that great debt, and under the circumstances I do not see why the people living in western Canada, taking the territory from Alberta to the Pacific, should be paying a double burden in the shape of that differential rate to the coast. If that rate were equalized with the rest it would mean a further reduction of about 4 cents a bushel in the cost of shipping our grain. We are quite well aware that we cannot raise the price of our grain in Europe. Therefore we must follow the example of any business firm which, when it finds the price of its goods limited, immediately endeavours to reduce its overhead cost in getting its goods to the market. A great deal has been said in this House about reducing the high cost of production, and one of the things that would be of the greatest possible advantage to the farmers in the West would be some assistance in reducing the overhead expenses entailed in getting our products to their ultimate destination.

Another remedy, and perhaps one of the most effective in bringing about a change for the better, would be placing the administration of government on a strictly business basis. We have heard a great deal about economy, and it is undoubtedly one of the greatest needs of the country to-day. But how are we going to effect economy unless we work along busines lines? Take the Canadian Pacific Railway and the other large corporations which have been conducted with so much success in this country. What has been at the bottom of their success? Has it not been the fact that they have been conducted along sound business lines? We know very well that unless that system is adopted any business will sooner or later go to destruction. Whilst talking on the subject of economy and the conduct of the affairs of government on business lines, it seems to me it would be hard to expect economy under present conditions when our governments appear to be out for political rather than for business efficiency.

Since confederation we have had what is known as the National Policy, and I am free to admit that at that time, as the country was young, it was perhaps the best policy that could have been adopted for Canada. But we must admit that times are changing, that we have developed into a vast agricultural country, and what Canada needs to-day is a new national policy that will not only meet one section but will meet all the interests within the country. Just as any business firm would do, we have to change our tactics to meet the changed conditions. We hear of a great many schemes being advised in many parts of the world to-day, and in fact there are so many that we often become a little alarmed and scarcely know what to do. We find that many sensible and intelligent people very often become alarmed and refuse to consider these schemes. I think when we look back over our history we will realize that we have always been changing, and that we have had to make changes to meet those changing conditions. Our life, to my mind, is like a mighty river flowing to the sea. Sometimes its course will be across wide level prairies and its advance so easy and gradual as to be almost imperceptible; again, it tumbles over rocks and waterfalls, and dashes up great clouds of foam and spray. So it is with this river of civilization. For generations, our ancestors may at times have appeared to be standing still, but they were never standing still. They were gradually adapting themselves to changed conditions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was born and brought up in Canada, and I think I have always been led to believe that we have had two parties in this country. But, as I stated before, irrespective of which party has been in power, we have had the same policy of protection administered to the people of the country. Owing to the very serious conditions that we are confronted with at present, I think this is the time for plain speaking, and that we should come out and face that serious situation as true Canadians. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), towards the close of last session, stated that the time had come when a show-down would have to be made. The people of Canada elected a new government last year on the platform on which they went before the country, and they are anxiously waiting to see how that government is living up to its platform. If you intend to keep the people of Canada along the old party lines, with the prejudices and the hatreds that we have had in the past, you have got to eliminate the educational system we are working under to-day. We have a compulsory educational system, whereby we are forced to educate our children. Are you going to educate the child to develop his brain, and then tell him he is not to use his brain? To my mind, under our old party system with its prejudices, there was very little intelligence used in our voting; we were either Liberals or Conservatives—our grandfathers and forefathers were the same. But we are living in a different age and the people of to-day are thinking as they never thought before. If any government think they can go before the people of Canada to-day with one platform, and come down to this House and carry out a different platform, they are vastly mistaken. I have heard it stated by our public men—and I have seen it in the press—that there is a great deal of hypocrisy in our government. I believe with the hon. member for Brome that the time for a show-down has come. I think that the amendment which the hon. member from Springfield (Mr. Hoey) has placed before this House is going to force a show-down that will make hon. members in this House place themselves in their true position.

The right hon. Prime Minister has done a great deal of talking throughout the country in regard to the rights of the common people. He will have an opportunity to declare himself and to show where his interests lie. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), who comes from those western provinces and knows the true conditions out there, will also have an opportunity of placing himself on record and of stating whether he is in favour of the reduction of the tariff, as we have always been led to believe he was. In regard to the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin)—being a director—

Mr. GAUVREAU: Be careful, now.

Mr. LUCAS: Being a director of many large companies, I presume he will have no interest in the common people anyway.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Very small interest.

Mr. LUCAS: In regard to my hon. friends to my right, I have a hazy recollection that I heard an hon. member say not many hours ago that they were dead.

Mr. STEVENS: False information.

Mr. LUCAS: If that is a fact, I think the least the hon. members can do in this House is to perform the last funeral rites to that "dilapidated" portion of a once great party.

I am speaking in all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, I say that conditions are serious in this Canada of ours, and I trust every member will come out in his true light and place himself in the position in which the country expects to find him. What Canada needs to-day is a bold statesmanship and men who will come out and fight for the same principles in this House as they advocate before the people. In conclusion let me say:

> God give us men! A time like this demands
> Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands;
> Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
> Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
> Men who possess opinions and a will;
> Men who have honor, men who will not lie;
> Men who can stand before a demagogue,
> And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking!
> Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
> In public duty, and in private thinking;
> For while the interests with their thumb-worn creeds,
> Their large professions and their little deeds—
> Mingle in selfish strife, lo, Freedom weeps, > Wrong rules the land and waiting Justice sleeps.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South & Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish, in common with others who have spoken in this debate, to congratulate very heartily the mover and seconder of the Address. I have listened on seven or eight occasions to persons who have performed this duty and I in no way derogate from their ability when I say that I have never heard it more ably done than by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam) and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Rhéaume). I wish also to congratulate the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) on his elevation to the position of leader of a great political party in this country. I wish to congratulate the Progressive party on their choice. They have made a good one. It has, I think, been the pride of the two old parties in this country that they have always chosen from amongst them the very best men to lead them in a public and political way. Looking back over the history of this country to confederation, I must say that both the old political parties have succeeded amply well, and the Progressive party to-day has succeeded as well as either of the old political parties have in the past.

It has been suggested by hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this motion that the Speech from the Throne does not contain enough. I am, however, one of those who think that if we do our duty by what the Speech from the Throne contains and do our duty well, we shall be here this year as late as we were last year. The Speech from the Throne suggests that unemployment is not so rampant to-day as it was a year ago. That is pre-eminently true of the part of Canada from which I come. One year ago distress, unemployment and practically starvation constituted the condition of the eastern part of Nova Scotia. To-day, I am proud to say that any man who wishes to work in the coal regions or the steel works in the county of South Cape Breton may have employment. In some cases it is true the wage is not large, but employment is to be had. On the 3rd of this month this news item appeared in the columns of the Sydney Daily Post:

> In conversation with Robert Ingraham, manager of the local employment office, the Post learns that almost every unskilled labourer in the city has work.

And it goes on to say that there is a scarcity of that kind of labour. I am not as familiar with conditions in other parts of Canada, but I believe unemployment in this country is not as great as it was one year ago.

One matter which appears in the Speech from the Throne must be of great encouragement to the army of consumers in this country and that is the promise therein contained that legislation will be brought down to keep persons who deal in foods and, indeed, generally in what consumers require, from enhancing the prices of those commodities. In Canada, there has always been a tendency—and I do not think this tendency pertains alone to what we sometimes call mergers, trusts and combines—amongst wholesalers and retailers to keep up the prices of the necessities of life. I hope, when this bill comes down and is enacted into law, that law will be able to lay its hand not only upon what we are pleased to call the combines, but wholesalers and retailers as well. I hope the legislation will be effective. We have had such legislation in the past, and I am sorry to say that it has not been the benefit to this country which many of us were led to believe it would be. Such legislation, in order to be made effective, must be enforced under government control. It must not be left to the say-so of a man here, there and everywhere, whether or not a person shall be indicted, if you will, punished, if you will, because he has broken the law. It is a somewhat different law from the ordinary criminal law of this country and yet our people, our legislators pay criminal lawyers to punish persons who have committed a common assault; they appoint and pay well criminal lawyers, the best in the land, to indict and to see that persons are punished who commit small, petty thefts. It is therefore, the duty of this government or some other government to see to it that persons who unduly enhance the prices of the necessaries of the ordinary consumer should have criminal lawyers at their heels to see that they get the meed of justice that is due them.

With regard to the matter of immigration, the Minister of the Interior, (Mr. Stewart) has not yet announced his immigration policy in this House and it may, perhaps, be a little premature for me to say very much upon that subject. There are, however, a few comments and a few impressions which I wish to make. I am one of those who do not think that we should allow free entrance into this country of every Scotchman, Irishman, Englishman or American who, perchance, wishes to come to our shores. I am not one of those either who say that we should turn away from our shores every Austrian, German, or inhabitant of one of the southern or central parts of Europe who wishes to come here. If English immigrants, Scotch immi-

4 p.m. grants, Irish immigrants, American immigrants are good, let them in; and if we do get a fairly good type of immigrants from the central part of Europe who will develop into virile Canadians, as such immigrants have done, let them in under the same conditions as the people of Anglo-Saxon countries. Much has been said regarding the advertising and publicity work which a government must do in order to induce people to come to our shores. I am afraid that in the past the mistake that was made by both governments in this country was that there was too much advertising and too much publicity of the wrong nature. I believe it is a mistake for government agents to go to any country and paint conditions in Canada as blessed. I believe that facts and not fiction should be told the intending immigrant. I fear that in very many cases the imagination of our publicity agents in foreign countries runs away with their better judgment, and that they paint the conditions of this country in too glowing colours. It is unfortunate that in the earlier days people were enticed to this country under false information. While I say that, Mr. Speaker, I also say that it is a mistake on the part of Canadians to spread broadcast the impression that conditions to-day are so bad with us and the tide running so low that we should not have any immigration at all. The type of immigrant that the government would rather have to-day, I presume, is he who will settle on our vacant lands or who who will hire himself out to a farmer.

Some time ago I happened to see a resolution which was passed by the East Edmonton District Association of the United Farmers of Alberta. With the resolution itself I have little fault to find, because I do not know the conditions of the Edmonton district sufficiently well to criticise their action. However, I shall read the resolution:

> Whereas, we believe that the occupation of our vacant land by prosperous settlers is most desirable, the prosperous settler being the best immigration agent, and,
> Whereas the economic and financial burdens on this, the basic industry, are such that it is impossible for farmers to continue to carry on under existing conditions,
> We therefore wish to point out the folly of any immigration project until the aforesaid burdens be removed, because; first, any large influx of settlers would but tend to intensify for those already on the land the conditions now existing; and, second, we consider it a gross injustice to those who may be induced to come.

That resolution on its face seems to me to be all right, provided the conditions are as painted. But, Mr. Speaker, that resolution was sent to the Weekly Scotsman, a newspaper published in Edinburgh, Scotland, with this letter attached from a gentleman in the city of Edmonton, but I do not know his name. The letter reads, in part:

> I should like to bring to your attention the following resolution of the East Edmonton District Association of the United Farmers of Alberta, as it may serve as a reliable guide to anyone thinking of coming to western Canada in the spring.
> Speaking as a farmer myself, I advise all to stay away, as farmers are producing everything at a loss and are only staying on the land because they are too poor to move elsewhere. The reports in the papers of great crops, etc., are only put there in the interests of the grain speculators.

I do not think I am going too far, Sir, when I brand that letter as a gross libel on western Canada in particular and on Canada as a whole. The farmers of western Canada are not raising everything at a loss, and they would not all move out if they had the means of doing so. There are thousands and thousands of farmers in the West who are comfortably situated—as comfortably situated as is the capitalist in Montreal or Toronto. Therefore, I have no hesitation in branding such propaganda as a gross libel upon the fair name and status of Canada.

Mr. KELLNER: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? I should like to ask him what line of farming is paying a profit in Canada to-day, and also where those prosperous farmers are located.

Mr. CARROLL: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I know enough of western Canada to tell my hon. friend where there are prosperous farmers. I can tell him that in a twenty-five mile circle around Winnipeg he will find the most comfortably situated farmers in the world; I can tell him that stretching from the international boundary line to the city of Regina and from Regina to ten miles north of Saskatoon he will find the same class of farmers. I am not so well acquainted with farming conditions in the great province of Alberta, but I can tell him that there, too, he will find comfortably situated farmers. Surely in a country where every twelfth man owns a motor car, such as is the case in the province of Saskatchewan, there must be some farmers who could get out if they wanted to—they could readily use their motor cars. I find in a report issued by the government of the province last fall the following:

> Saskatchewan now has one car for every twelve of its population, according to provincial government statistics. The total amount collected in license fees for the past ten years is reported as $4,226,642, while for the same period there has been spent by the government from revenue alone $6,918,517 in providing for the construction and maintenance of main market roads, ferries and revenue bridges. During the same period the provincial government had expended on capital account on main roads, bridges, etc., a total of $7,870,514.

Here is a province which in ten years has spent approximately $16,000,000 on improvements to its highways; here is a province which in the past decade has paid into the treasury $4,226,642 in automobile license fees; here is a province in which every twelfth man owns a motor car. And yet the contributor to the Weekly Scotsman says that every person in the three prairie provinces would get out if he had an opportunity of doing so. I have no doubt that the farmers of the prairie provinces have probably more difficulties to contend with than any other class of people in the Dominion. It is a new country, but it is a splendid country. It has perhaps been retarded somewhat in the past for lack of transportation facilities, and it is to-day suffering agony —may I say?—because the transportation rates are not what they ought to be. But notwithstanding all that, it must never be forgotten that our forefathers, especially in the eastern provinces, went into the woods, hewed down the trees, and raised their potatoes in the burnt lands, and their descendants forty or fifty years later were able to send their sons to college—pioneers from whom have sprung one of the most virile races not only on the North American continent but in the world—these men met and overcame every discouragement and difficulty, and remembering this, I believe that our friends should not be discouraged by the reverses of a year or two and lose faith in the prospects of the great Canadian West.

The thought has occurred to me that we may have in one of the present government departments some means by which the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) may be assisted in his immigration policy. This thought is not, perhaps, original with myself. I have had it in mind for some time, but I see that a gentleman who spoke some days ago at a dinner in this city expressed a similar view. In the past, as I understand it, the great difficulty in bringing immigrants into this country, especially to the Canadian West, has been the fact that they were simply thrown on the prairies; they were not told that certain land in Alberta was suitable only for grazing, that certain land in Saskatchewan was suitable only for a particular kind of farming, that certain land in Manitoba was suitable only for another kind of farming. In short, they were strangers in a strange land. I say that we have in a department of the government the means by which at least this difficulty may be overcome. We have in that department persons whom we should send to the old country as our agents—persons who are good farmers, and not merely able to talk glibly and smoothly with a view to inducing immigrants to come to our shores. I am referring particularly to the Soldier Settlement Board. That board, anybody to the contrary notwithstanding, has done and is doing a splendid work for Canada. Their work must continue for some years, and I do not think the government can do better than engage the services of members of the staff of the Soldier Settlement Board, especially of the field men, in connection with any policy of inducing immigrants to come to western Canada. My experience has been wholly in the East, where we have a large number of the field men of the Soldier Settlement Board, every one of them a practical farmer. These men know the soil of the various sections of the Maritime provinces as no other men know it. In most cases they are graduates of our best agricultural colleges; and I have no doubt that the same is true of the men who have been operating in the central and western provinces. These men we still have; might we not use their services? Send them to the United States and the old country—and by the old country I do not mean England, Scotland and Ireland alone; I mean Europe or any place where good immigrants can be got. Send them over there and let them explain the conditions of farming in this country as I am afraid our present agents there are unable to do. Then, when the immigrants come to our western country, field men of the Soldier Settlement Board can meet them and explain the different conditions in the various sections. If that is done we shall not have the trouble that we had from 1900 to 1910, when people who were brought here, hoping that in a few years they would become rich on the western prairies, were simply thrown into the wilderness of the West, in complete ignorance of the conditions existing there. The result was discontent, and if the same system is now followed the same discontent will be produced, and in the end there will be the same discouragement and the same emigration from the country.

The question before the House, Mr. Speaker, is, first, the motion of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam); then comes the amendment of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), and then the amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw). The amendment to the amendment simply asserts that the House should view with alarm the substantial increase in the national debt and make every possible effort to economize. I do not think there is an hon. gentleman on either side of the House who will have any fault to find with that amendment to the amendment. So far as the public debt is concerned, which goes into the billions, the question should be asked, have we assets to overbalance those billions? If we have, then the public debt is not such a very bad thing. As to economy, there are two kinds of economy, true and false.

I noticed on the order paper a day or two ago a notice of motion which indicates that the government proposes to expend $5,000,000 on the improvement of Vancouver harbour. Now, that is a large sum of money, and there are people who will say that that is not economy. But I ask my farmer friends from the West, I ask hon. members from British Columbia on both sides of the House, what they think on that subject. Is that sound economy, or is it false economy? Undoubtedly it is sound economy, and they will answer, that better facilities will be afforded on the Pacific coast for shipping their grain around by the Panama canal and thence to Europe. I say, therefore, that no government should be alarmed at this continuous cry of economy, economy—so long as our economy goes in the right direction. Last year the government undertook an expenditure of, I think, $5,000,000 on Quebec harbour —a large amount of money. But, surely that is true economy, because such expenditure will result in better transportation facilities for our products. Years ago the Conservative government spent millions of dollars in the equipment of the harbours of Halifax and St. John, thus making it possible for the farmer, the fisherman, the lumberman, all classes in the country, to send their products to foreign lands in the best, easiest and cheapest way. So that the government should, to my mind, look after the public services even at the cost of adding a little more to the national debt. They should not let the magnificent harbours of Toronto, Vancouver, Montreal, Halifax or St. John go into disrepair because, forsooth, the expenditure of money upon them adds a million dollars to the public debt. The government should not, through the fear of adding a few million dollars to the national debt or because they are afraid of the bogey of economy, refrain from expending large amounts of money on new undertakings which are for the national good.

There is, Mr. Speaker, a problem in this country which I think the government should do something at the present time to solve. I refer to the fuel problem in this country. I am sorry that I have no really effective solution to offer myself. This present year we are told by our good friends the Americans that we can depend upon receiving only a certain number of tons of coal, and if that amount does not satisfy our demands, then we and our children may freeze. I say that is an unfortunate position for a nation such as Canada to be placed in, and it is one that the government of this country assisted by all parties should tackle and attempt to solve.

We have great coal resources in Canada. Our coal mines in the Maritime provinces are illimitable; in the West there are also magnificent resources; and I believe that they are sufficient to fill all the fuel demands of the country. Is the problem so great that it cannot be solved? I fear that we Canadians are sometimes led astray by ourselves. We are too prone to criticise conditions in our own country and to enlarge upon the beauties and fine conditions in other countries. Four years ago, if you were to ask a citizen of Ottawa to throw a scuttle-full of soft Nova Scotia or New Brunswick coal into his grate, he would look at you and say, I suppose: "Do you want an explosion in my house? Do you want the beautiful faces of my children to be blackened and besmirched that their mother will not recognize them when she comes in from ski-ing?" There is a tendency in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, to disparage the qualities of western bituminous coal and of our soft maritime coal. However, a little advertising is going on. I see my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) smiles, and I am bound to say it is a smile of pleasure. To-day this building in which we are seated and all the surrounding public buildings, which are heated by a common heating plant, are being heated by New Brunswick coal from Minto. Are we any less comfortable? Are our faces less clean than formerly because we are using maritime coal, instead of the American anthracite which we cannot get?

The Public Works department is also doing good work, and has been doing it for some years, though not very many, I am sorry to say, in introducing bituminous coal for heating the public buildings as far east as the city of Ottawa, and this maritime coal was selected after very close competition with American soft coal. The Public Works department gave the contract to the Minto mines, and that was made possible through the adjustment of the freight rates that was made. If a campaign was undertaken to show the people of this country that maritime and western soft coal is just as good, if not so clean, as American anthracite, and much cheaper, we should have solved to a large extent the fuel problem in this country. I see that the government has appointed a commission to investigate this fuel problem, and I hope that it will arrive at some sensible solution. It is undoubtedly a problem which should be settled, and if it be a political problem which could be put into the hands of the present Board of Railway Commissioners, the government at Ottawa should tackle it. Freight rates must be brought down in this country in order to solve the fuel problem. It will be practically impossible for us ever to be safe as regards fuel until we are self-supporting in that respect. I am one of those Canadians, Mr. Speaker, who do not wish to be at the mercy of a foreign nation, however friendly that nation may be, for the bite that I eat or the coal or wood that I burn to keep myself and my family warm.

The Welsh miner is taking advantage of the conditions in Canada to-day. Of course, I would far rather see the Welsh miner making inroads upon the coal trade of Canada than the coal operators of some other country. A few days ago there returned to England Sir D. R. Llewellyn, one of the greatest coal owners in Wales. He had just made an extended business tour in this country to investigate fuel conditions, and I understand that as a result of his investigation immense depots are to be built at Montreal and other places in Canada for the handling of Welsh coal. They have transportation down to a nicety, because he reports that on the question of freightage coal could be carried from British Channel ports to Canada and the New England States for $2.50, as against $4 for transport from Pennsylvania.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the government of this country, assisted by the representatives of the people in parliament, could undertake no more pressing problem in Canada to-day than this one of our fuel requirements and how they may be supplied. No better service could be done by this parliament for the present and future generations than to give some of its time during the present session to the solution of this problem.

The standing committees of this House include a committee on mines and minerals. I have been a member of that committee for seven years, but the remarkable thing is that during that period it has never met except for organization purposes. And yet that committee, among other subjects, deals with one of the very essentials of Canadian life. Might it not be a wise thing for the government to consider the advisability of placing before the Committee on Mines and Minerals, as now constituted or otherwise, the question of a fuel supply for Canada? I advance this suggestion in all earnestness, believing that it deserves a fair meed of consideration at the hands of the government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken somewhat longer than I intended. The hon. member who preceded me—

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Before the hon. member leaves this question, which is a very important one, may I ask him to give the House his views regarding the possibility of preventing the stoppage of mining through strikes. I ask my hon. friend, could a method be devised for overcoming this difficulty?

Mr. CARROLL: That is a big problem, and I am not going to tackle it just now. Strikes have been resorted to in this country for many years, and I have no doubt there will continue to be strikes long after my hon. friend and myself have passed away. I agree with the hon. member that the problem is a serious one. I agree that there are times in certain industrial fields in this country where strikes do some good. I also know there have been times when strikes in other industrial fields in this country have ruined operators and men alike. I am not against the strike as a weapon in the hands of men to better their conditions in life. Neither am I against the strike as a weapon for any legitimate purpose for which the various unions my think proper to invoke it. However, the question is a big one, and I shall not undertake to discuss it any further at the present time.

The hon. member who preceded me referred to the wants, the ambitions, and the aspirations of the farmers in this country, and assured us that these were never looked after or considered until a few years ago, when they themselves undertook to organize a political party. I am bound to say that the farmers themselves best know their own requirements and how to fulfil their own ambitions and aspirations. Nevertheless, I would point out to my farmer friends that the Laurier government went down to defeat in 1911 fighting the battles of the farmer. I am also bound to say that when we talk of the East being against the West, and the West against the East, that was not the condition during the reciprocity campaign of 1911. The Liberals carried every seat in the island of Cape Breton, which is an industrial, coal mining hive, notwithstanding the fact that the reciprocity agreement made provision for the reduction of the duty on coal. At that time we fought the battles of the farmers of the West and of the farmers of the East—we fought for the farmers generally throughout the country. I have no doubt that to-day the farmers, organized as they are, are well able to fight their own battles, but where are they going for better markets? A year ago the country to the south erected a tariff wall against the products of this country, a tariff wall which is absolutely prohibitive so far as the products of the farmers are concerned. Where are our farmer friends going for larger markets? They cannot get into the United States at the present time; and surely they do not ask us as free born Canadians to let down the tariff walls of Canada at a time when our products are debarred free entrance into the country to the south? Speaking solely for myself I consider that the government have undertaken to solve this problem by the best method which lies in their power. Our neighbours to the south met us with high tariffs. The Minister of Finance went to Washington a year ago, but there was no use in dickering any longer, the Canadian people having turned down the reciprocity pact. Accordingly members of this government crossed the seas to Europe, hoping to find there some solution that would afford relief to the farmers of the West as well as of the Canadian people generally. There lies the solution of the problem with respect to wider markets if wider markets we need.

The question of whether there should be a reduction in the tariff is one for the government of this country to consider. I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues will be able to advance adequate reasons why no mention has been made of the tariff in the Speech from the Throne, but I wish to say this: As good Canadians, as broad-minded Canadians, as Canadians who have at heart the interest of our country as a whole, we should unite in every possible way in order to find a solution for the problems which confront us. For only in that way may we hope to fulfil the aspirations of those who made Confederation possible. In that way we shall best develop this country and make it a happy and prosperous land for our children and our children's children. In that way likewise we shall be doing the work we were sent to this parliament to perform.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, at the very outset of the Speech from the Throne His Excellency the Governor General refers to his visit to the Yukon territory, the constituency I have the honour to represent in this House. I am sure it will be very satisfactory to Yukoners to learn from this public declaration that Their Excellencies retain pleasant memories of that distant country, and to know that the willing efforts of the people of Yukon to make the viceregal visit an interesting and comfortable one evidently met with success. I can assure you, Sir, that the keen appreciation displayed by Their Excellencies in the somewhat unique conditions under which the people up there are living, in the history of the country, and in the hopes and plans of the people for the future, won the hearts of all with whom they came in contact. The name of General Byng, Commander of the Canadian Corps, national hero, was already a household word in Yukon; but by meeting Lord and Lady Byng, the man and the woman, hundreds of Yukoners were able to understand and to share the admiration in which the distinguished soldier is held by so many thousands of Canadians who served under his leadership.

I join with the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) in regret that the Speech from the Throne is of necessity so barren of any statement of substantial achievement by the government in the improvement of Canadian affairs. I cannot say that I am very much surprised at that necessary absence, because I am not one of those who expected that a change of government would usher in the millennium. Coming into this House for the first time as a member at the last session of parliament, at a time when industrial conditions in Yukon were in a most unsettled condition, when the great industry of mining was in a transitory state, when new developments undertaken up there were of somewhat doubtful results, I hesitated to call the attention of members of this House to that part of the country, and I think members of the government with whom it was my duty to negotiate for assistance in development will bear me out that I did not paint to them a too glowing picture of the prospects of that country. To-day, I am happy to say, the situation is different. I can speak with assurance that the existence of a very highly mineralized area has been demonstrated; no failures have been encountered. Everywhere that development work was undertaken in that area rich high-grade permanent mines have been established and the returns have been highly remunerative. The population of that section of the country has greatly increased and the general population of Yukon Territory is also increasing. Prosperity is returning and the people are filled with an optimism for the future. That is the condition of affairs in at least one section of Canada.

Now just a few words to give a general idea of that country. I find that the members of the House of Commons are, after all, just representative Canadians, and that the average Canadian has a very hazy idea of conditions in that northern section of Canada. That is not to be wondered at, in view of the unwarranted quantity of slush that has been published on the subject, some of it very readable, highly entertaining and unduly sentimental, having somewhat the same effect in conveying ideas of the country as the eloquent language used by the mover of the Address here a few days ago in regard to the Acadians and their unfortunately necessary removal from the land of Evangeline. Doubtless those and similar ideas were founded on or greatly influenced by the picture so beautifully painted in that poem of Longfellow's, written, in my opinion, on false premises and by no means conveying a correct impression of actual conditions in that place at that time. Beautiful to look at, but not quite accurate. Many people associate the Yukon only with the Klondike gold excitement of a quarter of a century ago and think of it as a land of icebergs and fearful hardships. Most of those yarns of hardship were told by early gold-hunters, and more recently by globe trotters seeking to attract attention to themselves. I will give the House an instance. In 1914 at Dawson I met a lady going through the country on the ordinary tourist's trip. She had come up the coast in one of those palatial coast steamers operated by the Canadian Pacific Company. She had crossed the pass in an up-to-date observation car and come down the river in a very comfortable passenger steamer. She was well received and accepted the hospitality of the people. In 1917 I heard her addressing the Royal Canadian Institute in London, and I was astonished to hear her state that she was the first white woman who ever made that trip, as late as 1914 and when in fact thousands of women had preceded her to that country. She told of the perils of crossing the pass. She did not mention the observation car, but she stated that on going ashore at the very peaceful town of Port Simpson she was obliged to fly for her life to escape from hostile Indians. Of course such a thing never occurred; you could not blame the Indians if it had. I have told this story just to show how these yarns are started. The Yukon is the extreme northwestern point of Canada. Its northern boundary is the Arctic ocean, on the south British Columbia, on the east the Northwest Territory and on the west Alaska, that long strip or pan handle of Alaska that cuts us and a large portion of British Columbia off from the sea. The Yukon has no seaboard except the Arctic ocean. Everything taken in or out of the Yukon must pass through Alaska either through the port of Skagway at the head of Lynn canal, that wonderful arm of the Pacific ocean, or around by the coast of Alaska to the Bering sea and up the Yukon river from the port of St. Michaels. Owing to international bonding privileges, we have not suffered up to date any great inconvenience because of having to pass goods through the United States territory, but at the present time a rather awkward situation exists in that regard.

Yukon handles the liquor question much as it is handled in the province of Quebec, or, perhaps, more correctly stated, on the same system as British Columbia. It abolished the bar; it allows no private sales of liquor. The local government sell it all, and do not permit liquor of any kind to be sold in the hotels or restaurants. They differ from British Columbia in that they are willing to stick to the goods of the Old Country distillers. They do not try to put off on the public any home brew of the local commission as liquor. The United States interpretation of the Volstead act prohibits the transportation of liquor across any part of the United States, consequently they block the Canadian government in Yukon from taking liquor into that part of Canada. It is an arbitrary stand not taken for cause so far as Yukon is concerned, for the liquors were imported from British dealers, unloaded from British ships direct to the railway cars and within three or four hours crossed the Alaskan pan handle into Canada again. There has been no illicit dealing in Alaska from those shipments, and the United States' laws have been strictly complied with. How long the United States intend to maintain that, in my opinion unreasonable, position, we cannot tell. That remains to be seen, but I am in hopes that this government will be able to induce them to recede from their present position.

The area of Yukon is about 200,000 square miles, and I should like hon. members to note that, of that area of 200,000 square miles, only about one-third has been explored. Of that one-third, only about one-half has been prospected for mineral, and from that one-sixth of that territory, we have produced to-day over $200,000,000 in gold, or almost one-half of the total output of gold from Canada. When you realize that that amount comes from that small area, you will understand what wonderful possibilities there are for the future in those thousands of miles which show indications of mineral deposits.

The Yukon, as such, was created by act of parliament in 1898. Its boundaries were defined; it was cut out from the Northwest Territories. The Yukon Act became its constitution. The country was given a court and a local government. The court had three judges, the three sitting in appeal from judgments of any one of the three. Later that was changed and the court reduced to one judge, appeals now being made to the Court of Appeal of the province of British Columbia. The local government was composed of a commissioner and council. At first the council was appointive, consisting of the senior judge, the officer commanding the mounted police and other officials. The commissioner is directly under the authority of the Minister of the Interior of the federal government. In time the appointive council was done away with and an elective council introduced. The council has practically the same legislative powers as the legislatures of the provinces. It has no cabinet; the executive power is entirely in the hands of the commissioner. During the war, for purposes of economy, the membership of the council was cut down to three members, although it should be four, more properly to represent the whole country. I understand the government has that change under consideration, and I strongly recommend its adoption. During the war, the office of commissioner was discontinued, the duties of that office being vested in the gold commissioner or chief mining recorder without additional pay, and this arrangement still continues. The official residence formerly maintained in the territory for the accommodation of the commissioner was closed up during the war, and it remains closed. The number of officials was materially reduced and offices were co-ordinated. All this was done in the interest of economy and to reduce expenditure of public money and the cost of government.

The climate of Yukon has always been a fruitful source of story telling. We really have there about five months of warm, bright summer weather. The rivers open early in May and do not close again until late in October or early in November. For three months of the summer we have continuous daylight and for two of those months we have almost continuous sunlight. This accounts to some extent for what is considered the remarkable speed of plant growth; but when one considers the quantity of sunlight to which a plant is exposed, the speed of growth is not so wonderful. The winter season on the whole is not so bad. Each winter we get a few weeks of extremely cold weather with the thermometer down to about sixty below; but that does not last and, indeed, some winters we escape the extreme cold weather altogether. The snow fall is light.

The Yukon is almost exclusively a mining country, everything else, including agriculture, depending upon the mining industry. It is true that agriculture can be successfully pursued, but that depends entirely on the success of mining. The country is so situated that there is no possibility of raising agricultural products for export; therefore you are limited by your local market. All sorts of vegetables can be grown splendidly. Wheat, oats and barley may be ripened, cattle are successfully bred and raised for beef; hogs locally bred and fattened on locally grown barley can be had on the market, and during the past year farmers have undertaken the experiment of sheep raising. Horses are wintered out, and without any artificial feeding or artificial shelter come through in good shape in the spring. That cannot be done in eastern Canada.

The Yukon is not looked on as a country to settle in; but a great number of splendid families have been raised there, and fine healthy children have been given their primary education, up to and including examinations for entrance to the universities. Upon entering the universities or going into the various walks of life in other parts of the world, they are found to be as well equipped with education as other young people of their ages. Good schools have been maintained in Yukon from the very earliest days.

Yukon, as a big game country, is unsurpassed; it abounds with moose, caribou, mountain sheep, bears and, unfortunately, wolves. The fur trade is an important factor and large shipments of marten, mink, fox, ermine, otter, wolf and bear are made annually. Game birds are plentiful and myriads of migratory birds breed there every year. Fur-farming is assuming important proportions. Fur-farming struck the territory as a fad as it did other parts of Canada; fabulous prices were paid for breeders, and some investors were stung. But it is down now to a business proposition and some people have persevered with intelligence and are now producing annually good silver-gray and black pelts at a handsome profit.

As I have said, however, mining is the chief industry, the back-bone of the country, the industry to be fostered and encouraged. It had its hard knocks during the war. A very interesting statement was made yesterday by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) in regard to the reduced purchasing price of a bushel of grain. I could give just as interesting and, I think, a more startling statement as to the reduced purchasing power of an ounce of gold on account of war and general conditions. The cost of everything used in mining went up 100 per cent, and in some cases more during the war. The value of gold, the price of gold remained stationary; it did not go up with that of other commodities. Consequently, the miner was hard hit; but those conditions are changing, and prosperity in the mining business is returning.

With the news of the big discovery of gold in Yukon in 1896, thousands of people rushed in there from all parts of the world. There was plenty of gold; it was easy to get by the most primitive methods. The wilderness was transformed into a hive of industry. Many fortunes were made by individual effort. Gradually the cream of the rich "pay" was taken off, then capital stepped in and purchased practically the whole known mining area. Good cash prices were paid, coal mines were opened up, hydro-electric power plants were established, fleets of gold-mining dredges were put to work in the valleys, and water was brought to the mines from long distances by a system of ditches, flumes and syphons. Tons of gold were dredged from claims which had supposedly been worked out. The operation of the mines by dredging and hydraulic did not entail the employment of nearly as many men as the old method did, consequently those who had become rich or obtained a competence by their own efforts in mining, or from having disposed of their holdings, removed to other parts of Canada and to the United States. The output of gold from twenty million dollars a year gradually lessened until now and for some years past it has remained stationary at about a million and a half dollars a year. It will remain at that figure for many years to come, although liable to be increased at any time by new discoveries. The history of other placer gold camps is repeating itself up there—lode mining is developing. In 1919 a wonderful discovery of silver ore was made about 150 miles from Dawson city, and as I said at the outset of my remarks silver mining is fast assuming large proportions and is bringing an increase of population.

The chief difficulty to be contended with is the cost of transportation and lack of telegraphic communication. I have brought these and other matters to the attention of the ministers in whose departments they are dealt with, and I am free to say that I obtained fairly satisfactory results from the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). But the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) before authorizing the modest expenditure required to connect the silver camp with the government telegraph line preferred to "wait and see" how those mines turned out. That was characteristic caution on his part. Well, I am glad to be able to tell him that the most optimistic predictions in regard to those mines made by miners and engineers are being realized and the time has arrived when he is amply justified in giving those people communication over the government telegraph line.

Now, hon. members may say: How does the prosperity or otherwise of Yukon affect the rest of Canada? Let me show them. The Yukon is part of Canada. Its people are one hundred per cent British and proud of it. They are a healthy, energetic people, maintaining themselves at the very outskirts of civilization—true pioneers developing a wilderness. There is no poverty there; there are no paupers, there is no distress. There is no unemployment; there is work for all who want to work—and no one can stay there who does not work. There is no returned soldier problem. Yukon's returned soldiers who were lucky enough to get back have all been re-established. They were welcomed back by employers and by the people generally. The percentage of enlistments from Yukon was very high indeed, as also were the money contributions to patriotic purposes during the war. Unfortunately the casualty list was correspondingly high, and the war left its scars on Yukon families just as it did on other Canadian families.

The Yukon has produced hundreds of millions of dollars in gold and silver, and will proceed to increase that output. As a business proposition the Yukon is a good thing for Canada in this way. We have up there nothing but mineral resources and sufficient timber to carry on our mining and build houses. We have to buy everything else from other parts of Canada. We have the mineral, but you have to feed us and clothe us. In return, we have the gold and silver which we can dig up to pay for our food and supplies. All our flour, bacon, sugar and everything else in the food line, our clothing, our boots and shoes, our mining equipment, our machinery and tools have to come from other parts of Canada. These figures are impressive. The Yukon has imported and used over 300,000 tons of Canadian-made goods, and paid for them, $100,000,000 cash. We have to have your goods, and you have to have our cash. That is a home market worth having and worth keeping. Over a thousand tons of goods went into that new silver mining camp last year. They will all be used up by spring, and then we will have to get more from the manufacturers and merchants of Canada. In addition to that 300,000 tons of Canadian goods taken in there, probably a greater quantity of foreign goods was purchased, for the American west coast cities are very active in following up that trade, an example that might very well be followed by our own people. You can see at a glance what a customs revenue that importation means.

The Yukon is not a tradition or a thing of the past, it is not a played out or worked out mining camp. It was hard hit by the war, but it is coming back. It has a community of wonderful people, face to face with nature, developing the great mineral resources of the country, and their success of necessity redounds and adds to the general prosperity of Canada.

TREATY WITH ITALY

On motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance), the debate was suspended and the order for Motions called to permit of the following message from His Excellency the Governor General being presented:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a copy of a convention respecting commercial relations between Italy and Canada, entered into at London the 4th day of January, 1923, between His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas and His Majesty the King of Italy.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, the House reverted to the Order of the Day.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire to review generally the Speech from the Throne or the debate which has arisen on the Address in reply thereto. Much that has been said during the debate might, I think, properly be said at a later stage in connection with the budget. However, we must deal with some of these questions now.

Let me say that with the eloquent tributes that were paid by the three leaders to the memory of our departed comrades; with the good words of welcome offered to the new members; with the cordial congratulations offered to the member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam) and the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Rhéaume) in regard to the moving and seconding of the Address, and last, but not least, with the tributes paid to the sterling Scottish character of our friend, the member for Brandon (Mr. Forke)—with all these things I would desire to associate myself.

I wish now to proceed to the subjects which I think, call for special mention on my part. First, I want to invite the attention of the House to the remarks of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in relation to the tariff. My right hon. friend had a good deal to say about averages. Averages are often useful, but sometimes they are misleading, and I am inclined to think that in his search for averages my right hon. friend allowed himself to be misled and unconsciously helped to mislead the House so far as the impression has been conveyed that there had been no material reduction of customs duties. My right hon. friend says that the government collected $88,000,000 of customs tax on an importation of $506,000,000 as against a collection of $78,000,000 on an importation of $502,000,000 the year before. Then with some other remarks he proceeds to say:

A tariff that averaged 15¼ per cent up to the end of 1921 for that fiscal year, now averages . . . when the sales tax is put on at the boundary, 17.5 per cent over the whole scale.

As my right hon. friend puts it, it would almost seem that he was including the sales tax in the first year but not including it in the second. However, I think perhaps he said a little more than he intended, for I find the figures he gives with regard to customs duty, apart from sales tax, work out the increase to 17·5 to which he has referred. But my hon. friend forgot to mention several things which are necessary to a proper understanding of his averages. In the first place, he forgot to mention that in giving the figures for the calendar year it should be had in mind that, at the most, during only six months of that year was the new tariff in application. For at least six months of the twelve on the basis of which he made his computation, the old tariff, with all its virtues—if they were virtues—was still in operation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not have reference to the twelve months at all; my figures were for the first nine months of the fiscal year, from the first of April to the end of the year. I had them officially from the department.

Mr. FIELDING: I think my right hon. friend's figures were for the calendar year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, only from the first of April.

Mr. FIELDING: I think my right hon. friend is mistaken. He may look into that, but my impression is that the figures he gave were for the calendar year. However, that is only one point, and perhaps not the vital one. But another point is that the valuation of the goods is a very important consideration in the working out of averages. If all our duties were levied on the ad valorem principle it would be easier to make fair comparisons of averages. But a large portion of the duties is collected under the system of specific duties; we levy so many dollars or so many cents, as the case may be, per ton, per barrel, per pound, or according to whatever unit the trade is accustomed to handle. When the value of these goods varies you get a very different result in the matter of averages—a result that may easily be most misleading. For example, in the year 1911 the duty on the staple article of refined sugar, converted into ad valorem—for it is a specific duty—yielded a rate of 24 per cent and a fraction; in 1921 the duties showed an average of 13 per cent. Apparently, then, there was a great reduction of duty—24 per cent in 1911; 13 per cent odd in 1921. But in reality there was no reducton of duty—on the contrary, the sugar duties had been doubled. They were 87 cents per hundred pounds in 1911, producing an ad valorem rate of 24 per cent; they were $2 per hundred pounds in 1922, producing an ad valorem rate of only 13 per cent. What is the explanation? When the valuation is high the specific duty works out a small percentage, but when the valuation changes your percentage changes. Take an article costing $100. A specific duty which, converted into ad valorem, produces 25 per cent, remains the same when the same article later costs $200, but your average is reduced because it is applied to $200 instead of to $100. Now, all through these calculations it is necessary to observe the variations in value. We had high valuations, and the duties imposed on the basis of those valuations produced certain results. We are now passing through a time of low valuations. Prices are falling; some of us are glad, and would like to see them fall still further. But when the value of goods falls, then undoubtedly there is an apparent increase in your average rate. As a matter of fact, you may have a low average rate when your taxation is high, and you may have a high average rate when the taxation has been reduced; and so it will be found in this case. I say it is important, therefore, that in looking at this question of averages we have regard to the changes in the values. With the exception of tobacco, cigars and cigarettes, every change made in the customs tariff last year was a revision downward.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me before he goes further? Will he not admit that it was when valuations were high, and consequently the incidence of duty low, that he moved to reduce the duty?

Mr. FIELDING: The motion to reduce the duties has been carried out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With regard to sugar?

Mr. FIELDING: No, not that particular item. I do not think I ever moved to reduce the duty on sugar. I did vote for a resolution that it was desirable to reduce the duties upon as many articles as possible, and we did reduce a large number, we did reduce a great many duties last year. My right hon. friend told us at one time that the reductions were microscopic and at another time that they were molecular. But I noticed that, having described them as microscopic, he turned to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) and warned him that these changes in duties were going to cause the workmen of Brantford to be idle in the streets. So my right hon. friend easily adapts himself to conditions.

Now, that view of matters may easily be enlarged, but I think I have said enough to show that before you treat seriously these values one needs to look into them more carefully and make an analysis—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may say I have here the figures from the department showing the months I quoted, and the statement I made in interruption of the hon. gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. FIELDING: Does my right hon. friend say that his figures were not for the calendar year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. They were only from the first of April—the fiscal year, just as I said.

Mr. FIELDING: Well, even so, there would be three months of that year under the old tariff; is that correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: April. May and June? No.

Mr. FIELDING: The change was not made until the last of June.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In May.

Mr. FIELDING: The tariff bill making effective the changes embodied in the last budget was passed, I think, on the last day of June or thereabouts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But does the budget not take effect from the time of the making of the budget statement?

Mr. FIELDING: In some respects it would. There were many changes; but my right hon. friend must know that tariff changes do not immediately produce reductions. Increases of tariff reach the consumer very quickly, but reductions are slower to reach them. The good results of the reductions that were made in the tariff last year will become manifest from time to time. If they were not fully manifested in the short time between the date of the passing the tariff bill and the close of the calendar year, there is very much reason to believe that if we are only patient in the matter we shall find good results still following.

Now I turn to a statement made by my right hon. friend regarding an increase in the national debt. He said we increased the debt last year by $45,634,000. He will admit that in that case he did certainly refer to the calendar year. Am I not correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I gave the dates.

Mr. FIELDING: Now for purposes of comparison it is always better to take the fiscal year. These statements are published from month to month and have some value, but they really ought not to be taken very much as a basis of calculation. There are periods early in the year perhaps when the revenue comes in freely and expenditure is not very large. Indeed, there have been cases where at such a time you will show a decrease in the public debt; but it would be very unfair to assume that that represented the whole business of the year. But since my right hon. friend prefers to take the calendar year I am going to take the calendar year too.

According to his statement we increased the public debt in that year by $45,634,000; but he overlooked an important point. Of that calendar year only nine months at all events were under the fiscal control of this government. For the first three months of the year this government had no power over the finances. The right hon. gentleman and his friends made the estimates, they carried them through committee here, and carried the Supply Bill. They enacted all these things; they gave directions for the expenditure, they made contracts, they carried on all the business for the fiscal year, and all we had to do coming into power in mid-winter was simply to pay the bills as they came in. Down to the 1st of April the finances were controlled under the budget and tariff and policy of my right hon. friend and his friends, and for three months of the twelve at all events, this government had no particular responsibility. However, I am going to waive that.

But my right hon. friend forgot to mention something more. He forgot to mention the part that the railways played in this matter. He says that we added in that period $45,634,000 to the public debt, but he forgot to mention that in that year we provided for the railways—I have the exact sum here, but I cannot find it at the moment—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Far less than the year before anyway.

Mr. FIELDING: If we added $45,000,000 to the public debt for that twelve months, for only nine months of which were the expenses under our control, may we not place it in comparison—I shall not go back to the war years—with the year 1921, when there was an addition to the public debt of $92,000,000. Then in the year 1922 there was an addition to the public debt of $81,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, 1922 was the year I gave. The hon. gentleman was in power then.

Mr. FIELDING: The year my hon. friend gave was the calendar year 1922, not the fiscal year I am giving now the figures for the fiscal year. In 1921 the administration of my hon. friend increased the public debt by $92,000,000, and in 1922 to the 31st of March by $81,000,000, and if we in the last year have got the increase down to $45,000,000, as compared with $92,000,000 and $81,000,000, I think it is a record we need not be ashamed of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You did not have 22,000 miles of railway to put in shape.

Mr. FIELDING: Unfortunately the 22,000 miles of railway which was willed to us is the cause of our troubles every year. Without these railway obligations we would be able easily to provide for all our public expenditure and have a balance to the good. I say that in this present year—I do not want to anticipate the budget and speak too positively—but speaking broadly, and subject to later correction, this year we shall be able, if you leave aside the railways, to provide for all the ordinary expenditure and all the capital expenditure and all the war expenditure, for everything but the railways, and have a balance of some thirty odd millions to the good. That is the amount we shall be able to show as a surplus, if you care to call it a surplus under these conditions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will not the hon. gentleman be good enough to say that last year on the same basis of comparison the surplus was $35,000,000?

Mr. FIELDING: No, the comparison I have given my hon. friend is correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Thirty-five million dollars, if you leave out the railways.

Mr. FIELDING: This year we are providing $67,000,000 for the railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Far less than before.

Mr. FIELDING: If you separate the railways from the other expenditure we could conduct the affairs of the government this year and provide a surplus of about thirty odd million. I do not want to enter into a long discussion of who is responsible for the railways. I think there is a large degree of responsibility resting on my hon. friends opposite. They at all events were responsible for wishing upon us the Canadian Northern, and for taking over the Grand Trunk under conditions which have landed us in the midst of great trouble.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that his government did not authorize the construction of the Canadian Northern and the Transcontinental and that the contracts were not all made under his government?

Mr. GRAHAM: Not in British Columbia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the best part of the system.

Mr. FIELDING: I have already said that there would be differences of opinion upon that point. I do not think the Laurier government made any mistake when they decided to have a second transcontinental.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A third.

Mr. FIELDING: The time had arrived when we wanted competition, when we wanted a real transcontinental railway from ocean to ocean on British territory—and we did not have it before. The Laurier policy in that respect, in the main, was a sound one. The cost was more than was expected; we all know that. Practically every public work costs more than the original estimate. This building, under the administration of my right hon. friend, has cost twice as much as was estimated. Every public work has cost more than was expected, and nobody is going to be much alarmed about that. But I say that the Canadian Northern as a prairie enterprise was a good enterprise, and if the promoters had been content to operate it as a prairie road, utilizing other connections with the East, things would have gone much better for them and the public at large. I say that the second transcontinental was all right, but the third transcontinental railway was regrettable from every point of view. For the first stage of that, for the eastern part at all events, the Liberal government was responsible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear,' and it is true. But I want to say that the hon. gentleman and his friends were responsible for carrying it through to the Pacific coast, and incurring all the expense of mountain construction. Does he say, "hear, hear," now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. That to-day is the best part of the system, and most essential of all.

Mr. FIELDING: I say, like Mr. Mantalini, it is the "demnition total" that is the cause of the trouble with which we are dealing. The result is that for this present year of our Lord we have to provide $67,000,000 for the railways, and but for that we could come to the budget and show a surplus of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. If we are going to have this question of debt talked of all the time, let us never forget that this debt is upon us year after year because of the railway obligations.

My hon. friends sitting in the Progressive district are very warm sympathizers as a rule with national ownership, but when they come to an expression of their views, let them bear in mind that national ownership may be a good thing, but like many other good things, it is rather expensive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman explain then why he does not get rid of national ownership and carry out the pledges of so many members of this government?

Mr. FIELDING: I cannot speak for anybody but myself. I do not understand that there was any pledge on the part of this government to get rid of national ownership. I have understood that some members doubted the wisdom of it, but they are all prepared to give national ownership a fair trial. That is the attitude they have assumed from the beginning towards national ownership, and that is the attitude they are assuming to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is the right thing, do not complain about the cost of it.

Mr. FIELDING: Well, there are differences of opinion as to whether a thing is the right thing or the wrong thing; men may honestly differ in that respect. What one man may think right, another thinks wrong. I am not enamoured of national ownership myself, but I realize that we are in for it and we had better make the best of it honestly and give it a fair trial. I have grave doubts as to whether national ownership can be as successful as some hon. gentlemen would like it to be. If you advocate taking our railroads out of politics, do you know what it means? It means taking them out of the control of the people, out of the control of the people's representatives, and putting them into the hands of some irresponsible body. The idea seems to be that this parliament of Canada would be content to vote sixty, seventy or a hundred million dollars every year—turn that money over to the National Railway Board and ask them to make the expenditures. I can tell my hon. friends who are so full of national ownership that the time will come—it may come at any moment—when they will find difficulty because of this board set up between the people and the government. When that time comes the people will brush aside the board and they will come to the government, and whether you like it or not you will discover that these railroads have to be in politics, because politics is the business of the people.

Another point in connection with my hon. friend's speech. Not only did he say that we are increasing the debt but—shocking to say—we are increasing our obligation to the United States instead of getting the money at home from the Canadian people. That is based upon a fallacy which I want to dissent at once from. The idea that you ought to get your money at home—and it is a good thing to get it at home—may be carried too far. It was a good thing during the war. When we needed money so desperately it was a good thing to appeal to the Canadian people, and we are all proud of the response that came, we are all proud of the revelation it gave us of Canada's financial strength. But that was a war effort. The war stirred the patriotism of the Canadian people; but if you were to renew the appeal to-day you would not get the same response. Now, there are several reasons why it may be wise to go abroad for your money at times. You may go abroad first for the simple plain business reason of getting it cheaper. We, for example, quite recently adopted the rule of going to our own people for our money. We offered a conversion loan of $178,000,000 among our own people. The greater part of it was taken up, but we had to pay our own people 5½ per cent, and we had to pay certain expenses,—large advertising expenses. I have not attempted to figure it out, but I am afraid the money cost a good deal more than 5½ per cent. We placed $100,000,000 five per cent bonds in New York a short time ago. We sold them at a price which made the cost a little over five; I think 5.12 or 5.13 was the computed rate; and I am going to put it to cold blooded people—to Scotch people in view of what I have said about my good friend the member for Brandon—that when you get good honest money in New York for 5.12 per cent why do you want to pay nearly 6 per cent for the privilege of asking your own people for money?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member will do me the justice to say that I introduced that with reference to the speech made by the Minister of Justice, who stated that we owed the United States so much in 1921 that we were drifting towards annexation.

Mr. FIELDING: No, my right hon. friend did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes.

Mr. FIELDING: I think I have what my right hon. friend said. What he may have had in the back of his head I do not know, but what appears on Hansard is the simple statement that we were increasing our obligations and increasing our obligations to the United States. That was our great offence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I referred to the speech of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend, in the speech to which I am replying, to the best of my knowledge, made no allusion to the Minister of Justice. However, it does not matter whether he did so or not. At all events he preferred the charge against us that we were borrowing money in the United States, that is the plain thing. I want to say it may be good policy to borrow money there simply because you get it cheaper. Another reason: Canada must continue to be a borrowing country. A country that is only partially developed needs money for many things. We want money. Capital is necessary for our development. If you are going to lock up the surplus money we have at home in government bonds, where are you going to get the money for mortgages, farm improvements, for business enterprises, for the thousand and one things we need for the development of Canada? Therefore I say, both on the ground of economy,—having regard to the rate of interest and having regard to leaving a reasonable capital at home for the development of our country—from either of these viewpoints it is good policy at times to go abroad.

But I want to tell my right hon. friend that his practice was better than his preaching. He preaches here against borrowing money in the United States, but in practice he and his friends borrowed in the United States and they borrowed a great deal more than we borrowed too. The Canadian government, in a period of a few years, issued in the United States securities, I think, to the amount, including our own, of $490,000,000, and $370,000,000 of that, if my memory serves me, was issued by the Conservative government. I think they were wise in issuing those securities. We have issued $100,000,000 in one general loan, which I have described, and we issued a couple of small loans. I admit there was a little difference in the way the thing was handled. My hon. friends opposite, a few months before they went out of power, issued two guaranteed railway loans and—shocking to say—they sold them in the city of New York. My right hon. friend must remember that. He and his colleagues committed the great crime of selling in New York. That is not all; they sold in New York at a price which gave to the buyer the opportunity to make $4 on the hundred in one case and $3.50 on the hundred in the other. When we had a similar loan we sold on terms which gave the buyer a profit of 59 cents on the $100. There are at this moment about $210,000,000 of securities outstanding in New York, and about one-half of this almost was issued by the late government. So again I say to my right hon. friend that his practice was better than his preaching. He condemned us for borrowing money in New York but he also borrowed money in New York and I am glad he did so because I think it was a wise policy to pursue.

I notice too that my right hon. friend made a statement with regard to the sales tax which I think he ought to regret. He stated:

> They have added to the revenue of the country something, I have not the exact figures, but it must run into tens of millions, by the imposition of a sales tax fifty per cent greater than the sales tax they found when they came into power. That is a tax that is placed upon the backs of everybody in this Dominion. All who use the necessities of life must pay their share of the sales tax.

It would have been inconvenient if I had asked my right hon. friend to mention what are the necessities of life which are paying this sales tax—he might have difficulty in doing so. I am going to weary the House a little by giving a list of the exemptions from the sales tax, and it is fair to say that these exemptions, in the first instance, were given by his own government. All we did was to increase the volume of the tax—as we had to, and I am going to speak of that again—and we increased the exemptions. We are told by my right hon. friend that we have imposed on the people of this country tremendous burdens that bear on the necessaries of life. Will the House bear with me for a few minutes while I read the list of exemptions. I think it is just as well to publish the list. It is one of those things buried in public documents, and not very easily understood by the public generally.

> Provided also that the taxes specified in this section shall not apply to sales or importations of:—
> Bread; flour, including self raising flour, oatmeal, rolled oats and cornmeal; rolled wheat, buckwheat meal and pea meal; animals living; live poultry; meats and poultry, fresh; milk including buttermilk, condensed milk, evaporated milk, and powdered milk; cream; butter; cheese; oleomargarine, margarine, butterine or other substitutes for butter; lard, lard compound and similar substances, made from animal or vegetable stearine or oils; eggs; vegetables, fruits, grains and seeds in their natural state; bran, shorts, middlings, alfalfa meal; oil cake, oil cake meal; grains mixed or crushed for cattle or poultry feed; hay, straw; hops; nursery stock—and so on. I will not read the whole list, it would take me ten minutes to do it. Practically all the necessities of life, including fuel and feed, are exempt from the sales tax. Yet my right hon. friend, in a moment of weakness, said that the taxes on the necessities of life under the sales tax, are breaking the backs of the poor people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With my hon. friend's experience in the House, I do not think he should mis-state what I said. I said that everyone who used the necessaries of life paid his share of the sales tax. Those words are strictly and literally true. All necessities of life are not taxed. Those who use the necessities must pay their share of the tax. Clothing is a necessary of life and it is taxed, and many other necessaries of life are taxed. My words are strictly true.

Mr. FIELDING: I am going to take what Hansard says on the subject. It is a misfortune for some of us that we have a Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. FIELDING: Outside of parliament, when some unhappy public man has said some foolish thing he can afterwards blame it on the reporter. We cannot do that here. We have to be held responsible for our words. Referring to Hansard I see what he said was—

That is a tax which is placed upon the backs of everybody in this Dominion.

The word "everybody" includes himself and myself.

All who use the necessities of life must pay their share of the sales tax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear hear. Is not that true?

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend seems to enjoy it so much I am going to give him the pleasure of listening to it again. He said:

That is a tax which is placed upon the backs of everybody in this Dominion.

He used the word "all" in one case and "everybody" in the next case. You cannot use any two more comprehensive words in the English language. He said:

That is a tax which is placed on the backs of everybody in this Dominion. All who use the necessities of life must pay their share of the sales tax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that not true?

Mr. FIELDING: I have read a long list and my hon. friend will almost tempt me to read the whole of it now, but no, I will not do it. Nearly all the foodstuffs, light, fuel and practically what was broadly speaking called the necessities of life are free from the sales tax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated that everybody paid his share of the tax. Will the hon. minister tell me of one individual who does not pay his share of the sales tax?

Mr. FIELDING: All who use the necessities of life must pay this tax. I say that all who use the necessities in the case of the articles I mention pay no tax.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are the three things that I particularly desired to draw attention to. First, my hon. friend's remarks on the tariff, and secondly—

Mr. MEIGHEN: What remarks?

Mr. FIELDING: On the increase of trade, and the horrible crime we committed when we borrowed money in the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member be good enough to read my statement where I said it was a crime, or where I criticised it at all? I have looked up Hansard and I do not see it.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member said distinctly "They have increased the obligations of the country"—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: "—and they have done it by increasing their obligation in the United States."

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is true.

Mr. FIELDING: Surely, that is a compliment if he puts it that way. Was he contemplating moving a vote of confidence in us for doing it? Are we to take all the other statements in his long speech in a Pickwickian sense?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, in the sense I made them. I said they had increased our obligations to the United States. That is absolutely a fact. Why does he read into it a criticism on account of going to the United States instead of going into Canada?

Mr. FIELDING: What was the object of saying it if it were not by way of criticism?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I stated the object a moment ago.

The SPEAKER: Order, order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will not allow the hon. member to read anything into my speech. He can take any sentence from beginning to end and he will fail to prove it incorrect, just as he failed a moment ago.

Mr. FIELDING: I must confess that when I made that remark it never occurred to me that my hon. friend all the time was making these statements as a compliment. I thought he was delivering a criticism of our action.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So I was.

Mr. FIELDING: I see now it is a mistake. He said we were doing all these things, and he meant them all in a Pickwickian sense, and probably that being the case it is hardly fair that I should take them seriously, but I have been paying him the compliment of believing he was serious.

I want to say a few words regarding the two amendments which have been submitted to the House. The general sentiment contained in these two motions is largely of a sound, sane and sensible character. In its proper place, much that is contained in these amendments—in their general sentiment rather than in their exact words—we might be able to subscribe to. Much that may be said at the proper time, in its proper place, with approval cannot win approval when it is said in the wrong place. The hon. members who have moved these resolutions have, I think, made a mistake as to the time and place of moving them. They are the best judges of that. The resolution of my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Hoey) follows largely a resolution moved in the interests of the Liberal party in the House several years ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Two years ago.

Mr. FIELDING: I would like to remind my hon. friend that there was another motion made by the Liberal party at a later date which he would do better to take as a model if he wants to take a model. In the year 1921, which was the last year of opposition, the year preceding that in which the Liberal party came into its inheritance, we moved a resolution in the House, and I am going to read it, because that is the resolution on which we appealed to the country. We went to the country in the period following the adoption of that resolution, and not only did we of the Liberal side vote for it, but my hon. friends of the Progressive party who were then in the House did us the honour of voting for it also. It recites in general terms what we supposed to be the condition of the country. I think perhaps I had better read the whole of it. It reads:

> That, while recognizing that existing financial requirements of the Dominion demand the maintenance of a customs tariff, the House is unable to concur in the declarations by the government that the tariff should be based on the principle of protection; the tariff is a tax, and the aim of legislation should be to make taxation as light as circumstances will permit;
> That the aim of the fiscal policy of Canada should be the encouragement of industries based on the natural resources of the country, the development of which may reasonably be expected to create healthy enterprises, giving promise of enduring success;
> That such changes should be made in the customs duties as may be expected to reduce the cost of living, and to reduce also the cost of implements of production required for the efficient development of the natural resources of the Dominion.

Now comes a paragraph to which I desire to invite attention and which had escaped the attention of my hon. friend from Springfield when he prepared his amendment. If he had had the resolution of 1921 before him he would have noticed this very important last winding up clause, and you know the last clause, like the postcript of a lady's letter, is the most important thing. That clause reads:

> That while keeping this aim clearly in mind, the House recognizes that in any readjustment of the tariff that may take place regard must be had to existing conditions of trade and changes made in such a manner as will cause the least possible disturbance of business.

The policy set forth in that resolution was the policy adopted by this government. It was adopted and carried out in the budget of last year, and it will be the policy we will keep in mind where circumstances will permit. I am sorry to find my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has tried to convey the impression that the reductions that were made were of no importance. I showed you a moment ago that there were stages in the debate when he thought they were important. There were considerable reductions, which, if looked upon in a fair manner, would, I think, entitle this government to a large measure of credit. With the exception of the duties on tobacco, cigars and cigarettes every item in that long list of changes was a revision downwards. It is important to note that. Shall we have further reduction? That is a question upon which I am going to have an open mind, and I am going to advise all others to have one.

With regard to the tariff problem to-day, especially when we consider what is going on in the neighbouring republic, there are conditions which are going to present the tariff question to us as a matter of more than ordinary difficulty. Therefore, I think every man in this House will be wise if he maintains upon this question an open mind. For myself, it is my desire to approach the question with an open mind, ready to hear everything that can be said for or against reduction, and then to come to the House and give the matter the best judgment that I can. I think there never was a time when it was more important that we should realize the truth of that remark attributed, I think, to an American statesman, that I have quoted more than once—"It is a condition and not a theory that confronts us." There are in the life of Canada to-day conditions which are not to be disposed of by any mere reference to theory or to what A, B or C may have said at some time or another. There are difficult conditions, in the handling of the tariff, more difficult, more serious, probably, than we have had in former times. So I ask

hon. members to agree with me that this is not the proper time to consider them, and when the proper time comes, we will give hon. gentlemen opposite an opportunity to bring forward these motions if they so desire.

So far the only thing that we have been able to present to the House in the way of tariff proposals is the treaty with France. I am not magnifying its importance; but whatever change it makes, it is a reduction of the tariff, and, therefore, it is a carrying out of a promise. There is set forth in that treaty a long list of articles with regard to which we provide that the intermediate tariff will govern, subject to a discount of ten per cent on the duty that would be collected. In the case of a duty of 30 per cent, supposing $30 were due and you take off 10 per cent, you reduce the duty to $27. On another list, not so long, but very comprehensive, there is provision for a discount of 15 per cent. Therefore, even this session we are acting in line with that resolution by trying to reduce the duties where we find it possible to do so.

My hon. friends who have moved these resolutions have, I think, failed to understand the gravity of the position that is presented. There are times and subjects upon which a government can well afford to accept suggestions from any quarter, because none of us has a monopoly of wisdom. On a thousand questions that may come up in the House any sensible government is aware that it may learn from members who may be opposed to it; and so in cases of a minor character, the government is willing to receive suggestions and amendments, and even on the critical question of a motion for supply there are cases where a government may, without humiliation, accept amendments. Those are cases which are provided for according to our constitution. But I cannot conceive—and I think such a case would be rare—of a self-respecting government which is prepared to accept any amendment on a motion for an Address in reply to the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General. What is the motion before the House? It is a simple resolution, politely acknowledging the Speech which His Excellency has kindly addressed to this House and giving him an assurance that whatever matters are brought before us will receive our respectful consideration. Are there any fireworks in that, any dynamite in that, any alarm in that, anything that any member in the House cannot properly vote for without any amendment? The first duty of the government is to provide that the Address to His Excellency shall pass, and things which would be accepted on their merits at another time cannot be accepted then. I say at once, I do not believe you will find a case, certainly not in our Canadian political history, where any government has accepted amendments of that kind on a motion to pass an Address to His Excellency. I think the hon. gentlemen who moved these resolutions have acted hastily—I am not presuming to judge them—for several reasons. I think they are not taking the best opportunity of discussing these things. There is a time and a place for everything, and the time for discussing the questions which they have raised would be in the budget debate, much better, I think, for them and much better for all concerned. But of that they must themselves judge.

What do these resolutions call for? Economy and tariff reduction. Lower tariff, economy—these are fine sentiments. We all recognize the desirability of economy. Last year I had occasion to point out the different angles from which the question of economy is viewed. I pointed out that sometimes an hon. member is found advocating economy in loud tones, and then coming in and wanting a large expenditure in his particular constituency. My hon. friends of the Progressive party are only human after all; they are not free from that little weakness. They proclaim they want economy, and at the same time they tell us they want large expenditures on terminal elevators at Montreal and Vancouver. These cost money. How are you going to have economy if you are going to build them? Then we had the charge of increasing the public debt. My hon. friends of the Progressive party talk about economy. They are sincere; they want economy; but there is a motion on the order paper for an expenditure at once to finish the Hudson Bay railway. They are only human like the rest of us.

Mr. HOEY: That would be an economy.

Mr. FIELDING: Some years ago when I was campaigning with the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Ontario, I passed through a little country town where they paid us the compliment of putting up a quantity of decorations. On one which was set across the street I read this motto, which I have never forgotten: "Wise expenditure is true economy." That is sound. My hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) gave us some splendid illustrations this afternoon; but when hon. gentlemen ask for these expenditures, how can they be regarded as consistent if they vote for this resolution condemning an increase of the national debt? How can you reduce your national debt if you are going to carry on all these things?

Mr. MORRISON: Building the Hudson Bay railway is not really an expenditure; it is an investment. We contend that it will pay for itself.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, it is an investment, my hon. friend says. My hon. friend reminds me of a chap in our boyhood days who had a pitch and toss arrangement. He would cry: "Come up, boys, it is not your money we want, it's your patronage."

Mr. MORRISON: All we have been getting so far from the government is promises, instead of patronage.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is hard to please. We have given him large and numerous reductions in answer to his demands for them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And notwithstanding his vote against them.

Mr. FIELDING: He did not mean to vote against them in detail. He only voted against them in their totality, which he thought was a different thing. I am not saying that everything has been done that everybody has asked. Few of us get all we want in this wicked world, but I think it would be well for us that we should express appreciation of what we do get. We may well be thankful even for small mercies, coupled with the expectation of better things to come.

Let us not be afraid of the debt. My hon. friend from South Cape Breton treated that this afternoon in a very serious way. Canada is a country requiring a great deal of development; we are not a new country, but we are still a partially developed country, and if we are to meet the demands arising in all parts of the country, I do not hesitate to say that you cannot reduce the public debt at the present time. I take the responsibility of saying that. The late government—and I am not throwing any rocks at them—had to increase the public debt by $92,000,000 one year, the next year by $81,000,000, apart from war matters, and we confess that we shall have to increase the debt this year largely, though not to quite as large an amount. It is folly to pretend, in these pressing times of development and great needs, that you can carry on the business of the country without any increase of the public debt. Such a thing is an ideal to have in mind; we are all the better to have such ideals and to strive for them, even if we cannot reach them, and it is the duty of any Minister of Finance to make an earnest effort to see that the national debt is not increased more than is necessary. The figures which I have given you will, I think, show that we are acting on that principle. If we had to be afraid of somebody coming every year and saying: "Oh, you are increasing the public debt," then we would be at a standstill. This is a new country. This is a live, go-ahead country. New problems are arising.

> New occasions teach new duties;
> Time makes ancient good uncouth;
> They must upward still, and onward,
> Who would keep abreast of truth.

There are things to be done in Canada, and I hope and trust the government will have courage to do them, in the belief that wise expenditure is true economy.

There is a more serious side to these amendments. I was amazed to find my hon. friend from Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) say that this is not a vote of want of confidence. It is an extraordinary idea for my hon. friend to entertain. I want to tell him and all others that, as I said before, while there are many questions upon which a government may properly invite and welcome suggestions, when you come to a matter of passing this simple, respectful Address to His Excellency the Governor General, there can be no compromise, and I say again that no self-respecting government will stand and accept an amendment anything like that. When all these things are considered, I hope that the hon. gentlemen who moved these resolutions under the impression that they do not involve want of confidence will accept my statement when I say frankly and sincerely that they do involve a vote of non-confidence, with all the consequences that may arise therefrom.

This much is clear, Mr. Speaker. If this government does not possess the confidence of this House and of the country, there is no other group in this House that can. That much will be admitted. So if either of these motions should pass, it would impose consequences upon this government of the gravest character. Are we to have political chaos in this country? Are we to have political conditions such as may be found in some of the turbulent states of Europe where governments rise and fall, and come and go, and their supporters fight each other on the floors of their legislative chambers, and do such other things as bring parliamentary institutions into contempt? No. This is:—

> A land of settled government,
> A land of just and old renown,
> Where Freedom slowly broadens down
> From precedent to precedent.

And precedent tells us that we cannot accept these amendments. If my hon. friends on futher reflection think it is their duty to move them, it is not for me to find fault. I hope they will see their mistake and withdraw them. Again I say, if these amendments are carried, there is one course open to the government. You will produce a condition of political chaos in Canada which is not good for the Conservative party, which is not good for the Progressive party, which is not good for the Liberal party, and which is not good for the state. But, whatever the consequence of this may be, this self-respecting government cannot accept the amendments referred to.

On motion of Mr. Bancroft the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Before the House adjourns, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. Mr. Fielding.

That on Wednesday, the seventh instant, and subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the House will meet at three o'clock in the afternoon.

That is instead of two o'clock as the Rules at present prescribe. I have spoken to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) and neither of those hon. gentlemen will take exception to the government moving this motion if it assumes responsibility for so doing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under ordinary circumstances, according to the Rules, I would have to ask the right hon. gentleman to give two days' notice, but by unanimous consent the motion may be put.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 6.15 p.m.

Wednesday, February 7, 1923.

BY-ELECTIONS IN 1922

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Chief Electoral Officer the statutory report of the by-elections held during the year 1922, printed pursuant to section 72 of the Dominion Elections Act.

REPORT PRESENTED

Detailed statement of all bonds and securities registered in the Department of the Secretary of State for Canada, as provided by section 32, Chapter 19 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Putnam for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Hoey, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Shaw, resumed from Tuesday, February 6.

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate in reply to the Speech of his Excellency, I wish first to deal briefly with the speech delivered yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll). I want to compliment my hon. friend upon that speech; it was a good one, and I heartily agree with nearly everything that he said. But I cannot quite agree with some of his remarks in connection with matters concerning western Canada, and I wish, if I may, to make some reference to that part of his speech.

Referring to a letter written by someone in Edmonton to a Scottish newspaper, my hon. friend asserted that the statement contained therein was exaggerated. I agree that it was exaggerated, but I contend that my hon. friend's comment in that connection was exaggerated also. He stated, according to yesterday's Hansard:

There are thousands and thousands of farmers in the West who are comfortably situated—as comfortably situated as the capitalist in Montreal or Toronto.

If the farmers of western Canada, of Manitoba particularly, are as well situated as those gentlemen to whom my hon. friend referred, why is it that the Manitoba reports show that there were 4,000 fewer farmers in that province last year than there were the year before? The reports show that there were 55,000 farmers in Manitoba in 1921 and 51,000 in 1922. I submit, therefore, that the figures do not agree with my hon. friend's statement. In designating the location of the farmers who, my hon. friend alleged, were so prosperous, he described a circle with a radius of twenty-five miles around the city of Winnipeg. Now, the constituency which I have the honour to represent adjoins Winnipeg on the north, and I have an intimate knowledge of at least a great part of the district included in that circle; my own farm, in fact, is very close to it. I would invite my hon. friend, when the session is over, to come west and look into this matter for himself. I will show him around a part of that circle and I will defy him to find a farm there, with the exception, perhaps, of a few dairy farms, that has paid operating expenses in the last three years.

My hon. friend referred also to the number of motor cars in Saskatchewan. Some of my hon. friends to the right say, "hear, hear." It is a common idea on the part of certain people in this country that a farmer should never sit on anything but a wagon box. I do not believe in that, Mr. Speaker. Being a farmer myself I maintain that a serviceable automobile, obtainable at a reasonable price, has become a necessity in modern farming. My hon. friend said that every man in twelve in Saskatchewan had an automobile. I do not think that is enough. In a province where farming is the basic industry—it is practically the only industry there—in a province of great distances—and I know something of those distances, for I homesteaded there thirty-two miles from the nearest town—in respect to a province such as that I would reverse my hon. friend's statement and say that only one out of every twelve had a motor car. I think that would be nearer the mark. Furthermore, in giving those figures, he did not state what proportion of these cars had passed through the hands of the bailiff. He gave us no idea of the number of motor cars owned by men who had moved in there, and purchased perhaps with the money they brought in with them. I maintain again that the motor car has become a necessity on the modern farm.

Another question with which my hon. friend dealt was the United States tariff on farm products; and in dealing with that he asked in effect, what could the Canadian government do to remove the United States tariff against our farm products. I would make this suggestion to my hon. friend and to the government: that the best way to get rid of the American tariff against our products is to reduce the cost of production in this country, and if you do that, there will be a clamour in the United States against the tariff which raises the cost of production in that country.

The condition of agriculture in Canada to-day is not wholly the result of the reconstruction period through which we are passing, nor is it due to post-war conditions generally. If you go back to the years prior to the war, you will find that agriculture at that time was on the down grade. In the years 1912, 1913 and 1914 the farmers of western Canada were selling their grain below the cost of production, and had it not been for the war intervening, the government would have had to deal several years ago with this same situation that confronts us to-day. The net prices received for grain on the farm this fall were similar to those of 1911. Yet in 1911, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Victoria, Alta., (Mr. Lucas) yesterday, we could buy an eight-foot binder for $180 and to-day the same binder costs us $276. I submit that about the same comparison could be made in connection with most of the articles that enter into the cost of production on the farm. Coupled with this was the fact that in those years many immigrants were coming into the country, and many young men who were taking up homesteads were willing to work on the farms at a very reasonable rate in order to acquaint themselves with the local methods and conditions. When we compare the period before the war with the present time, and realize that in those earlier years men were being forced off the farm in no small numbers, it will give us some idea of the deplorable condition that agriculture finds itself in to-day. It is a well-known fact that for years in this country success or failure on the farm has depended largely on the amount of free labour a man could command in his farming operations. When a man's family was small and he had to hire every bit of help required, he invariably had a hard time getting along, but as his family grew up and furnished for a few years free labour on the farm, that was the time the farmer got ahead if he ever did get ahead. I submit that there can be no permanent prosperity in this country while this condition exists, so long as the great basic industry of Canada is dependent for its success on free labour. The fact is, the fiscal policy of this country is not a sound one for the development of our natural industries. That policy was evolved at a time when the Red River valley the most fertile valley in the world, was the principal grain-growing area of western Canada. It was evolved at a time when municipal taxes were negligible, when labour was cheap, when the land was clean; and all these things contributed to a low cost of production. But to-day municipal taxes in Manitoba are in the vicinity of one dollar per acre, due to the extension of roads, and the building of bridges, drainage and schools; and the high cost of transportation and of the necessities of life has raised the cost of production to a point where farmers are quitting the farms in large numbers. There are four thousand less on the farms in Manitoba to-day than a year ago. I submit that that is a serious situation, and one that requires careful analysis, and until we have found out the reason why these men are deserting the farms in such large numbers, it is useless to talk very much about immigration.

May I deal for a moment, not with immigration, but with emigration, and some of the causes that have contributed thereto? There should be no tax in this country on woollen clothing, which is a necessity in a climate such as ours. Yet we find that clothing and blankets are taxed as high as 35 per cent under the general tariff, and from 20 to 25 per cent under the British preference. That is little short of a crime in a climate such as ours. We find that boots and shoes are taxed from 20 to 30 per cent. Take the case of a farmer with a large family, situated two or three miles from school—the average distance in western Canada being two miles. Consider the difficulty this man has in trying to clothe his family to withstand the rigours of the Canadian winter in the face of these taxes; and the figures I have quoted do not tell of all the taxes that the farmer has to pay, because the tariff tax is added at the factory, and the factory price increases something like 100 per cent by the time the product reaches the consumer through the ordinary channels of distribution. Therefore, the consumer pays about double the amount of the tairff tax quoted in the schedule. Can we conceive of anything that would tend more to drive men out of this country than the hardship this man's family is forced to endure under these conditions? I maintain that the tariff tax on woollen clothing has done more to drive people out of this country than any other single factor. The whole tax on necessary clothing and boots and shoes should be wiped out in the interests of humanity and in the interests of common sense. A tax on woollen goods might be all right in Florida, but it is decidedly poor business in Canada. The Canadian people voted overwhelmingly at the last election for low tariff, and I submit that they are in no mood to be trifled with. The government should start their reductions at once, and start them on the great necessities—cotton and woollen goods, and boots and shoes.

I have followed with interest the statements of those who suggest mixed farming as a remedy for our economic ills. Many of those who advocate such a policy however overlook the fact that the problem of mixed farming is inseparably bound up with the problem of wider markets. Take the live-stock industry for example. In the Winnipeg stockyards last fall cattle sold for as low as 4½ cents a pound for prime steers, and one cent a pound for fairly good cows in an unfinished condition. In the city of Winnipeg also, potatoes sold for as low as 20 cents a bushel. The American tariff practically prohibits the shipment of these products to the United States. Now, in view of these facts, to suggest a wholesale reversal from grain to mixed farming is simply adding insult to injury. Furthermore it is well known that thousands of farmers in this couniry are prevented from keeping hogs and sheep because of the tax on woven wire fencing which, through the medium of tariff and sales tax approximates 25 per cent. I say that the whole problem of mixed farming is inseparably bound up with the problem of wider markets. If you will give us markets and reduce our cost of production, there will practically be no limit to Canada's capacity to produce farm products. Better trading and better international conditions go hand in hand. International commerce tends to bring about a better feeling among all nations. Every satisfied customer that Canada has in foreign countries constitutes a bond of peace between us and those countries; and I think the idea of a bond of peace can be applied also to Canada in a national sense as well as internationally. If the manufacturer in eastern Canada felt that he was getting the farmer's products at their real market value and if, on the other hand, the farmer felt that he was getting the products of the manufacturer at their value in the markets of the world, it would result in creating a bond between them which would make for national solidarity—a bond, Mr. Speaker, which would strengthen the chain forged by the Fathers of Confederation, which is now gradually weakening.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): It was not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to intervene in this debate, but in the course of the discussion things have transpired which have made me feel that it is my duty, representing as I do an agricultural constituency in the province of Nova Scotia, to say a few words from the standpoint of a member from the Maritime provinces. It is customary, I believe, to extend congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. I am sure that while I am a young parliamentarian I can do that with a great deal of gratification. Particularly do I feel that I have the right to congratulate my next door neighbour in the political arena in the province of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam), in the course of his very excellent disquisition, paid a tribute to the honour that was bestowed upon his constituency by his being selected to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and as a Nova Scotian I sincerely congratulate my colleague from that province upon his speech. Most worthily did he uphold the honour of the province from which we both come. Unfortunately I am not familiar with the language of old France, and therefore I could not comprehend all that was said by the seconder of the Address. It certainly must seem rather a paradox that I, descended from French Huguenots, cannot understand the language of my forebears; but judging from the fluency and grace displayed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Rhéaume), and from the manner in which his remarks were received by his colleagues from Quebec, his address was both eloquent and convincing.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard many references to those of our membership who have passed beyond the veil since last we met. When I came into this House last year—although I am the baby, so to speak, of the Maritime representatives—there were some four or five members with us who to-day have passed beyond the veil because "the finger of God touched them and they slept." I was not exceedingly well acquainted with the late hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Stewart), with the late Hon. Mr. Kennedy, and with the late Mr. Lafortune, but of the late Dr. Blackadder, I can speak with authority. We had stumped together in promulgating the principles of Liberalism as followers of the great chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and to-day it is to me a great sorrow that he is with us no longer. In thinking of him, the words of the poet recur to my mind: "Although he is absent in body, he is present in spirit." Perhaps I can best give expression to my regard for Dr. Blackadder in these lines:

How can I cease to pray for thee dear heart!
Where'er in God's great universe thou art to-day
Can He not reach thee with His tender grace;
Can He not hear me when for thee I pray?

Somewhere thou livest and hast need of Him,
Somewhere thy soul seeks higher heights to climb,
And somewhere too there may be valleys dim,
Which thou must cross to reach the heights sublime.

Then all the more, because thou canst not hear
Poor human words of blessing, will I pray,
O true brave heart! God bless thee
Whereso'er in His Great Universe, thou art to-day.

Divers things find mention in the Speech from the Throne. It is true that criticism has been uttered by some hon. gentlemen opposite because certain matters have been omitted; but the Speech from the Throne is not supposed to contain all the legislation that will probably come before parliament. There is, however, one particular matter upon which we are to legislate this session in which I, as a representative of one of the most historic constituencies in the Dominion, am personally interested—that is the question of redistribution. I stand here representing the historic constituency of the county of Hants. With the prosperity that has come to various sections of the Dominion, Hants, through no fault of her own, has lost in population, with the result that the constituency which in days gone by was the scene of Joseph Howe's greatest battles is to be amalgamated with some other constituency in the province of Nova Scotia. In this regard there is one plea I wish to advance: At the time confederation was brought about it was undoubtedly understood that the representation in this parliament should be founded upon the basis of the four original provinces. It was never intended—I do not believe, Sir, it was ever in the minds of the Fathers of Confederation—that any of the four original provinces should lose part of their representation. The other provinces which were subsequently carved out of the western country are going to get a greatly increased representation, and that increase will be at the expense of eastern Canada which has borne the burden and heat of the day. So I believe, Sir, that this is the proper time for us to take into consideration and endeavour to secure for the older provinces an irreducible minimum as regards representation. True, some of us will be told that we are governed in that particular by the British North America Act. I admit that that is the case. But if we have borne the burden and heat of the past, if we at the expense of the East have built up the western country, in return the western country should be prepared to come to our aid and to say: The Fathers of Confederation did not foresee there was a danger of the West overruling the East, and we are prepared to come to your aid and join you in any petition asking for an amendment of the British North America Act which will guarantee to the people of the East an irreducible minimum of representation in the House of Commons.

My hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) yesterday in the course of his very excellent address dealt with the problem of immigration. You will permit me, Sir, to be somewhat laudatory of Nova Scotia and to say that I was extremely proud of the fact of being a Nova Scotian after hearing his address, eloquently delivered and replete with sound logic and good common sense. After listening to him, the hon. Minister of Finance, and other speakers of the day it was pleasing for me to recall the words of Tenny-son so far as the Minister of Finance is concerned:

> At last the Master Bowman, he,
> Did cleave the air;
> Who but bent to hear
> His rapt oration, flowing free.

I was indeed proud of my native province as I listened to one of our youngest members from Nova Scotia and to our grey-headed veteran who is our leader in the Maritimes.

Some hon. members in the course of their speeches referred to our railway problem. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that whether our National Railway system should be under government ownership or not is no longer a debatable question. The government is pledged to a fair trial of government ownership in respect to our National Railways. It is not my purpose to give expression to my own personal views, but if I were to do so I would say, without fear for the consequences, that I am absolutely opposed to government ownership of our railways; but as the government is pledged to give a fair trial to government ownership I, as one elected to support that government, am bound to see, so far as the power within me lies, that the government is supported to that end.

My friends from the West are clamouring for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway; in fact, they want railways built for themselves. You know, Mr. Speaker, that our western friends are in no way sectional: They do not ask anything for the West; they want it for the whole Dominion. If you are going to put a fair interpretation on what they say, that is what they apparently intend to convey, even though some of their advocates may appear sectional. But so far as government ownership of our railways is concerned, so long as we, the tax-payers, have to vote the money to carry on these railways, then it is all very well for Sir Henry Thornton or any other person high or low in the social or political scale to say there shall be no political interference. I am thoroughly in accord with the dictum that no member of parliament or of the government should have the right to interfere in the ordinary management of the system; but so long as you have to come to parliament to obtain the funds to carry on these National Railways, the matter is of urgent public interest, and the people's representatives in parliament have the right to discuss the management of the system. The government some time ago appointed Sir Henry Thornton president of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways. Of Sir Henry I know but little. He undoubtedly is the best man that the government in their wisdom could secure. However, as the humble representative of the people in the county of Hants, I have one piece of advice to offer that gentleman, namely, that instead of going about the country attending banquets and repeating "Politicians, hands off!" he should remember the old biblical injunction: Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off. Sir Henry Thornton is confronted with a great problem. He is endeavouring to make the Canadian National Railways successful. In the course of his administration he will find that he cannot run a railway system here under the same conditions as obtain in England. Our winter climate is altogether different, the railway system is incomparably more extensive, and the conditions generally vary throughout the whole Dominion. So I have one other piece of advice to give Sir Henry Thornton that I trust will help him to make our National Railways successful, namely, that he follow another biblical injunction: Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

Our people are going to be called upon to pay for the upkeep of these railways, and therefore they should be administered in the interests of Canadian ports. I claim, Sir, that it is the bounden duty of Sir Henry Thornton and of the present government to see that freight rates are so regulated that shippers shipping by way of the great ports of Halifax and St. John be given a preference. You may say that I am sectional when I advocate that, but I claim that our public moneys should be expended towards the development of the Dominion—the upbuilding of our ports. If the operation of our government owned railways results in deficit after deficit, then in the name of every thing that is fair, the money which we have to provide to make good these deficits should go towards the improvement of Canadian ports and so give employment to our people.

We have been told by certain hon. members that we should practise economy. My hon. colleague from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) yesterday afternoon referred to what might be termed the difference between true and false economy. True economy is the expenditure of money, as I understood him, whether it adds to the national debt or not, so long as that expenditure provides increased facilities for trade, and so stimulates and makes that trade easier. False economy is the locking up of our money in a miser's bag, so to speak. Now, we in the Maritime provinces need full and adequate facilities in Halifax and St. John for carrying on all sorts of export trade. True, nature has endowed us with excellent harbours, but to-day there is need in Halifax for better terminal facilities, for grain elevators, for abattoirs, for cold storage plants to take care of fruit and other products of the farm. To-day the farmers of the Annapolis valley have apples which they cannot dispose of except at prices which practically bring them no return whatsoever. Cold storage plants in Halifax would enable these growers to store their fruit and place it on the market at prices that would bring them a fair return for their labour. In that regard I want to tell my hon. friends from western Canada that they are not the only people hit by the present conditions obtaining in this country. We hear a great deal about, not the unproductive farms, but the production of the farms of the West not yielding a great profit to the western farmers. We undoubtedly have the same conditions in eastern Canada; but you do not find the farmers of Annapolis, King's and Hants coming to the government and saying: "It is true that there has been dire distress as regards trade in this country; things are not prosperous, but we want the government to be our fairy god-father and to pay us for all these things." That seems to be the attitude of hon. gentlemen from western Canada.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think so.

Mr. MARTELL: They come here and they want everything. In other words, they say: "We want the cash; let the people of the East pay the piper." I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft) upon his very excellent address, because he comes from my own county of Hants. But in the course of his remarks he took occasion to disagree with my hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll). He said that the farmers of western Canada were not prosperous. No person in this House is saying that the farmer of western Canada is prosperous to-day. What the hon. member for Cape Breton South said yesterday was that the farmer of western Canada was as prosperous as any other person in the Dominion of Canada. Will my hon. friend tell me that the farmers of Saskatchewan are all, as the hon. member for Victoria, Alta. (Mr. Lucas) said yesterday, willing and anxious to get out of the country, when last year over 2,000 of them were able to pay income taxes? What about the people in Manitoba who were able to pay income taxes? If the farmer of western Canada comes here with a fair demand, asking for increased facilities for trade, and if he meets us in the same spirit as the farmer of eastern Canada is prepared to meet this parliament, he will get what is coming to him from this government in a fair and equitable manner.

It is all very well to talk about the tariff. An hon. member who spoke yesterday quoted from Holland in a very elaborate and eloquent speech, and he almost insinuated that the men of the old parties were political crooks. Undoubtedly, he made the words of Holland his own—"Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy." Can my hon. friend point to any member of this government or any member of the late government who was purchased by the spoils of office? Surely, the time has come in this country when men of all political parties shall be given credit for some measure of political honesty and shall not be called rogues and purloiners because they do not happen to agree with the particular member who is giving utterance to his sentiments.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend calls "order". Go ahead and call the order if you wish. We hear constantly in this House attacks made upon men who have become prominent in the industrial life in this country. Yesterday afternoon, one of the speakers did not hesitate to make a few little insinuations about the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). I am sure that if my hon. friend were sincere, if you could look into the innermost recesses of his heart, you would find he was not so much against the Minister of Justice as he was envious of men who, through their greater ability, secured and occupied greater positions in life than he. I want to tell my hon. friend who made that address yesterday that the present Minister of Justice was for many years leader of the people of the province of Quebec; and if my hon. friend wants to know the opinion of people outside of Quebec, he can come down to the old blue-nose province of Nova Scotia, and he will find there what our opinion is of the Minister of Justice. In the 1921 election, when it was said that the present Minister of Justice was coming back into politics, that statement aided every man in every constituency in Nova Scotia in securing his seat in the present parliament. That is the opinion which the people of Nova Scotia have of the present Minister of Justice.

Again, we were told yesterday that the Liberal party came into power on a platform of lower tariff. That is not the case. On every political platform that I had an opportunity of speaking in the province of Nova Scotia, wherever I heard a colleague from Nova Scotia speak, and wherever I heard any of our leaders in Nova Scotia speak, no pronouncement whatever was made upon the tariff. What we said was this, that we had it on good authority that if the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government were returned to power, Mr. Fielding would be Minister of Finance, and that was all that the people of Nova Scotia wanted. That was our tariff policy — Mr. Fielding as Minister of Finance. I might go on and elaborate on this. It is true that there is a tariff wall in the Dominion of Canada to-day; but what have we to offer in its place? It is all that the people demand. It is said that Solon, the Athenian law-giver, said that the laws which he gave to the Athenians were not the best laws, but they were the best laws the Athenians at that time could stand. So it is in connection with the present tariff. It is not the best tariff; but it is the best tariff that Canada, under present conditions, can stand.

I am not going to intrude further, to any great extent, upon your valuable time, but I wish to say simply this. As I have already stated, the time has come in this country when public men should get a fair measure of justice meted out to them. My hon. friends opposite stand in their places and say that the two old political parties of this country have gone into desuetude. I want to tell my hon. friends who sit opposite that the grand old Liberal party of this country and the historic Conservative party will exist in the Dominion of Canada when there will be no Progressives occupying seats in this House.

Mr. HOEY: Will the hon. member tell me if they are going to exist together or separately?

Mr. MARTELL: Whether they exist separately or together, they will exist for the making of good government, government in the interest of all the people all the time, and not in the interest of any particular class or group.

I want to be local for one or two minutes and to call the attention of this House to conditions which exist in my constituency. The other day my hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. Putnam), in speaking had only one fault that I can remember, and that is that he arrogated to his constituency the historic place from which the expulsion of the Acadians took place. I would claim that my constituency is the most historic. There is in my constituency of Hants the town of Windsor and in that constituency also are great lumbering and gypsum industries and farming interests. We are the fourth port in the province of Nova Scotia as regards shipping and to-day we are absolutely devoid of any method of getting our commodities to market. I am, therefore, going to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) to look well to the demands of Windsor for improved trade facilities.

Before I conclude, I want to refer for a moment or so to the subamendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw). I do not know whether that is the fruit of the brains of that hon. member or not. But it seems to me if I read the times aright, that there has been a sort of morganatic alliance between him and some other members in the House, not of the Progressive faith. I believe he has taken sweet counsel of some of the friends of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) who leads the opposition. The amendment reminds one of the deception practised in the case of Jacob and Esau in the days of old: the hand was the hand of Esau, but the voice was the voice of Jacob. There is no reason to-day why there should be any pessimism in this country. True, there is a cry of unemployment all through the country. But, Sir, this notwithstanding, I do not think we have any reason whatsoever to be pessimistic. Canada is rich in her natural resources; she has diversified industries; and all we have to do is to be cheerful and have faith in our common country, looking forward to the day of prosperity, for already we can see and Canada rightly taking her place as one of the foremost parts of the British Empire.

> The roseate hues of early dawn,
> The brightness of the day—

I was going to refer to some remarks made concerning Canada and the Near East situation, but I shall not say much on this point. I have only this to observe, that the people of my province are, I believe, absolutely in accord with the attitude taken by the government in the matter. I believe that the issues of war and peace in the Dominion of Canada should be determined entirely by this parliament. We do not want to drift away from the Old Land, but Canada does want to be mistress in her own house. It is for us to say what shall become of the moneys of the Canadian people, and what stand Canada shall take in all matters, national or international. I can do no better, before I close, than to quote the words of Sir Allen Aylesworth, who was appointed a short time ago to the Senate:

We do not ask for independence or closer legislative union, but the right to work out our own destiny, with Canada taking a leading part in that galaxy of nations that will forever surround the British throne.

It is not by lip loyalty that we shall retain our attachment to the Old Land. We must show ourselves capable of shoulder-
4 p.m. ing the responsibility which devolves from that independence which we have. For

Whilst the language, whilst the arts
That mould a nation's soul
Still cling around our hearts,
And between, let oceans roll
Our joint communion, breaking with the sun.
But still from either beach,
The voice of blood shall reach
More audible than speech,
We are one.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (East Edmonton): As a representative of one of the constituencies which were honoured with a visit from Their Excellencies last summer, I am glad to know that our poor efforts at hospitality were appreciated. Before I say anything further, Mr. Speaker, I would tender a word of commendation to the mover of the Address (Mr. Putnam). Unfortunately, I cannot do the same so far as the seconder is concerned, for I do not understand his language. I was just a little bit surprised at the tenor of the address of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell). That hon. member devoted himself particularly to a criticism of the Progressives for their attitude towards the two old parties. While I listened the other afternoon to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in his very brilliant address, it occurred to me that the right hon. gentleman endeavoured to prove to the House that the present administration are incompetent, unreliable and unfit for office. I think you will agree that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) came right back. He claimed that in any instance where the present government had failed, it was because of some hopeless and impossible policy which had been wished upon them by the past administration; and he emphasized the fact that his government had done all that could reasonably have been hoped for, so far as anything they had personally undertaken was concerned. He also tells us that we are criticising the government.

Well, if the claim is advanced that both governments have been as good as could have been expected, it seems to me that no one will deny the truth of the statement that, in spite of this claim, Canada to-day is in a worse condition than it has ever been before. I believe that the rank and file of the people are finding it harder to get the necessaries of life than they have ever done at any previous stage in the country's history. However, I am not one of those who blame either the present or the past government for this. I think they both largely follow the same policy; their course is to a great extent dictated from the same sources, and the results would be much the same, regardless of what party might be in power. The present state of affairs, in my opinion, is due to the culmination of an impossible, a false, and an unfair fiscal policy; and I sometimes think that we take rather a short-sighted view of the situation when we go back only to the years of the war to get an angle from which to draw our conclusions regarding present conditions.

In order to understand the present situation correctly, we should go back over a period of about forty years to what might be termed the inauguration of the industrial epoch. At that time, practically throughout the English speaking world, a new method of business was being introduced. New machines were invented, expert mechanics were contriving devices for expediting commerce, railroads and transportation companies were extending their activities, agriculture took on a new impetus, with improved machinery to replace the old and worn out systems of production. The result was an increase in production in many ways. At the same time there sprang into being a large number of financial institutions to finance these increased operations. Now, I believe that these financial institutions had a dual purpose to perform. It was necessary for them to organize and build up their own business, and it was necessary for them also at least to look after the credit standing of those to whom they were lending money. The result was that early in the game, if one may so refer to this development, it was realized that if competition went on to its logical conclusion many of these financial institutions would be ruined. They therefore encouraged the system of fixing prices in order to eliminate competition; and to-day, in consequence of this price fixing, we have a spread between the cost of manufactured goods and their selling price which is perhaps greater than it has ever been before in the history of the world.

No doubt this is a topic that has been largely dwelt upon by previous speakers, so I will not do more than cite one instance in this connection. Recently in the city of Edmonton a farmer brought four horses to market, and there was no doubt that they were good horses, the kind which the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) tells us ought to fetch good prices. The auctioneer brought out the first two, and under the hammer they went for $20. He went back and got the other two and they brought $15; or, in other words, the four horses, good animals, were sold for $35. The next article put up was a second-hand wagon which had been in use for five or six years. When the auctioneer called for bids the first offer was $25, which was increased by bids of $5 until the bidding stopped at $40. Then the auctioneer made a little speech, to this effect. He said: "Gentlemen, what would a wagon cost you if you bought it new to-day? Put a little paint on this wagon and it will be as good as new." The bidding was resumed and the wagon finally brought $90. Now, here were four good horses which were sold for $35, while an old second hand wagon could fetch $90. I do not think it is necessary to dwell on the point further. However, I would ask the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) who stated a few moments ago that there were a large number of unsaleable apples in his constituency, why they do not bring them to Ottawa and sell them, where they are retailing at five cents apiece.

Following out the theory of industrial expansion which this country has experienced, I would point out that by 1912 a certain amount of distress in our business operations had become apparent. In 1913 and the early part of 1914 the conditions were rapidly becoming worse, and by the time the war broke out we had practically the same conditions in Canada that we have to-day. Of course, since that time we have added materially to our public debt, and in that respect the condition has become a little more acute. I notice that if you speak about this matter to a banker in western Canada he will say it is the manufacturer who is to blame—that they have kept their prices so high that the people are unable to buy their goods; and if you speak to a manufacturer he will say that the bankers and loan companies are to blame because they lent money at exorbitant rates of interest which it required all the production of the country to pay. That is another case of "passing the buck," somewhat the same as the ex-government and the present government do in evading responsibility. I believe that government has one function to perform, that is, seeing that there is fair play as between the different classes of the people. If they are going to extend advantages to any it should be to the weak, to those who are unable to look after themselves—these should receive first consideration. That, however, has not been the case in the past. Any patronage that has gone out has invariably gone out to the big concerns, to those who are well able to look after themselves.

Speaking yesterday afternoon, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll), referring to conditions in the West, produced a telegram from the East Edmonton U.F.A. an organization with which I have the honour to be connected, that had inspired a letter which he seemed to question the truth of. I take it that he was trying to argue that the West had had a very big crop last year. I have here a report from the Alberta government covering the crop averages in that province. It states that in respect of spring wheat there was an average crop of 11.40 bushels to the acre; of winter wheat, 11.60 bushels; of oats, 21.50 bushels; of barley, 14.90 bushels; of rye, 10.30 bushels.

With regard to the matter of a suggested immigration policy, I would like to quote what the present provincial government is sending out in regard to the conference recently held in this city respecting immigration. The statement says:

> Hon. R. G. Reid, Minister of Health and Municipal Affairs, returned last week from Ottawa where he attended the conference of Dominion and provincial cabinet ministers on the problem of immigration. Mr. Reid made it plain to the conference that Alberta was not in a position to encourage any wholesale immigration at the present time but was prepared to absorb new settlers with sufficient capital to establish themselves. He also pointed out that the province was seeking irrigation farmers particularly for the new irrigation districts being opened up in the south.

If the reports we get about Canada being in the most favourable position of any country in the world are true, what is the sense of our going to other countries and trying to get farmers to come in here who have money? I do not see that there is any country you can go to with much hope of getting them. Every country has unoccupied farm lands. Most assuredly the United States has them; every country in Europe has them. There is no doubt that any persons in these countries who wanted to farm could find a good opportunity to do so in their own home land, and if we transplant them to Canada there is little prospect of their remaining here very long. Probably seventy-five per cent of the people who live in our urban centres to-day have had experience in farming, and the reason they are not on the farms to-day is because they tried it and found it did not pay, so they moved off.

Canada is a young man's country, a strong man's country. We cannot afford to take any class of people who may wish to come here. The only men who can hope to make good in our country are men who are physically robust and strong.

I was a little amused the other afternoon when the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) suggested that the redistribution which is to take place this session should follow the lines of the redistribution policy of 1912. I think when he made that request he strayed a considerable distance from the paths of intelligence. In 1912 it was unquestionably the policy to make as many safe Conservative seats as possible, and this time I do not doubt, it will be the policy to make as many safe Liberal seats as possible. Whether or not this government is responsive to the needs of the country I do not know, but I do know that the opinion is held that a small group control and largely dominate the business of the country. That is a dangerous tendency. The people are losing heart; they are becoming dissatisfied, and unless confidence can be restored and the spirits of the people brought up to a higher level, the position will become even more dangerous. That was virtualy admitted yesterday when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) said that our debt would probably not be paid during the lifetime of the present parliament. That is practically the condition that the individual finds himself in today, except that he is a little worse off, because he has not the taxing power of the country in his own hands. If his business requires new money, he invariably finds that he cannot get it, whereas the government can levy additional taxes to meet the country's requirements. It is the duty of the government, Sir, to see that there is fair play as between the different classes that comprise the people of Canada, a duty which I am afraid in the past has not been faithfully carried out.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and after listening to the number of excellent addresses which have been made on the motion of the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam), I feel that it is not necessary for me to take up the time of the House at any considerable length. However, I feel it my duty to refer for a few moments to certain matters contained in His Excellency's Speech, as well as to try and answer some of the criticisms made by certain members who have preceded me.

I presume I am in order with the other members of this House in offering, as is usual, my congratulations to the mover of the Address (Mr. Putnam) and the seconder (Mr. Rhéaume). We in Nova Scotia, as was so ably said by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) are very proud of the honour the government has done us in selecting one of our number to move the Address. We are proud, Sir, of the hon. member for Colchester, and proud also that he comes from one of the old historic counties of the province of Nova Scotia.

Since the opening of this parliament reference has been made to the deaths of certain members which have taken place since last session. Whilst we all lament the four members who have passed away, I wish particularly to refer for a moment to one who for the last four or five years was a very dear personal friend of mine. It is said that if you sleep with a man you come to know him, and I had the honour and the pleasure during an eight weeks' trip to the West in the year 1920 of coming in close contact with one of the hon. members of this House who passed away during the recess. I feel it my duty at this moment to express my deep sorrow that a personal friend of mine in the person of the Hon. Mr. Kennedy, the late Minister of Railways, is with us no more.

His Excellency in his Speech has given us some very valuable information. The second paragraph says:

> It is gratifying to note that in a period of world-wide trade depression following the Great War, Canada has made substantial progress towards recovery.

It is quite true, of course, that conditions in Canada are not as bad as they were a year ago; but still every business man in this country realizes that we are not yet out of the woods by a long way, and it is desirable that there be not only public economy, but private economy by every man, woman and child in Canada if we are ever going to get back on a proper business basis. While conditions are not just exactly what they should be, yet there is hope for this great country. We have great natural resources, and if our people apply themselves and work, not merely six or eight hours a day, but from daylight till dark or as long as there is work to be done, I believe that we shall pull Canada out of the condition in which she finds herself today.

The government seems to be coming in for a great deal of blame for the present conditions. I cannot agree with this statement. It is to be remembered that this government only took office a year ago, and it was faced with certain conditions at that time. I do not blame the conditions altogether upon the late government, but this government was faced with certain conditions, and it is certainly going to take a year or two—in fact, it will take, not decades, but centuries to overcome certain things which have taken place in the last few years.

The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) has moved an amendment to the amendment, in which he deprecated the fact that the public debt had increased by $45,000,000 this year. Well, Sir, there is good reason why the public debt should have increased that much, and one reason is what took place, not last year, but several years ago. Whilst the war is responsible for a great deal of the increase in the public debt, my opinion is that most of our troubles are due to what was known as "Union government' 'in this country. If instead of having a Union government in 1917, we had had either a Conservative or a Liberal, we should not find ourselves half as badly off as we are at the present time.

I notice that the hon. member for Calgary West, in speaking of the public debt, offered no solution of our difficulties. He talked, of course, about economizing, and how fine a thing it would be to reduce the public debt, but he did not make any concrete suggestions how it could be done. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), who also moved an amendment, talked about the economic conditions in this country and endeavoured to tell us that those conditions should be bettered. It is all very well to get up and criticize, but unless your criticism is constructive it is an absolute waste of time to get up on your feet before an intelligent assembly of this kind and make statements which you are unable to back up.

Let us look into this question of the public debt for a moment, and see what can be done with regard to expenditure in this country. I hold in my hands the Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1923. These Estimates were passed last year by the members of this parliament, and totalled $466,983,000. If we look at the Estimates for a moment we shall see why the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Springfield did not show us where this government and this parliament could save money for the taxpayers. What do we find? The very first item is "Interest on public debt, $140,000,000." Now it is impossible for us to get around that expenditure. The interest on the public debt has to be paid until such a time as Canada is capable of paying off all or part of it. This charge, of course, was largely brought about through the great expenditure during the war years. It was also brought about by other causes. Some of the amounts which have been spent were not in my opinion absolutely necessary, but, of course, there were certain amounts that had to be expended, and some of them very large amounts.

I spoke a moment ago of the cost of the war. Nobody objects to any legitimate expenditure in that connection, but during the past few years the amounts which have gone to make up our public debt have been expended all over this country. For instance, in the city of Halifax, which is the greatest port in Canada, a large amount of money was spent some few years ago. Some $20,000,000 was expended on the port of Halifax, and I say that that amount of money was wasted. It was an unnecessary expenditure. It should not have been expended where it was, because the eastern terminals where they at present exist are really of no benefit to the port of Halifax or to the shipping which comes there. The whole city was cut in two. I say that instead of spending $20,000,000 upon that work, an expenditure of $2,000,000 in another part of the city would give us far better terminals.

Take the city of St. John, where also a large amount of money was spent in development work. Whether the expenditure was wise or not is a moot question. Some people contend that in order to develop the port of St. John it was necessary that that large amount of money should be spent; but I have heard criticisms, especially with regard to the dry-dock in Courtenay Bay. I have heard it said that the money spent there was absolutely wasted because a ship cannot be hauled out to be cleaned or placed in dry dock unless you have a high tide in the Bay of Fundy, and as those who read the Nautical Almanac know, the tide is some 35 feet.

There were other great expenditures. This government and the late government have voted large sums of money to the Montreal Harbour Commissioners, for instance. I think everybody will agree that that expenditure has been for the development of the port. Perhaps more money has been voted than was absolutely necessary, but Montreal is a great port, and it seems to me if we are ever to develop the business of this country large sums of money must be spent where development work is necessary. So, when members of this House or people outside regret the increase in the public debt, they should bear in mind that no criticism should be offered to legitimate expenditure.

Then we have been spending for the last few years large sums of money on harbour works in Quebec. Large amounts have also been expended on harbour improvements in Toronto, and we are told, in criticism of this expenditure, that no inconsiderable sum voted for that purpose was spent last year in building boulevards and parks in that city. If that statement is correct the money spent for such a purpose was an unwise expenditure. On the other hand, any expenditure for properly building up the port of Toronto I should say was a wise expenditure for which neither the present government nor their predecessors should be criticized.

Turning our attention to the Pacific we find that a large sum of money has been spent in Vancouver during the past few years. I had the pleasure of visiting that city two years ago, and of visiting it again this year, and I want to say that it is one of the principal cities in Canada. It is a city that every Canadian should be proud of, and not simply the people who live in its immediate vicinity. The port of Vancouver in my opinion is, in the near future, going to equal the city of Montreal—no, I should not say that, but it will go a great length in that direction; and I admit that any moneys spent by this government, or any other government, for the development of that port is in the best interests of Canada. I heard my hon. friend from Skeena (Mr. Stork) speak of Prince Rupert and he extolled that port very highly. The port is certainly an excellent one, and I am told is 600 miles nearer the Orient than Vancouver. In the port of Prince Rupert there is one of the best drydocks in the world, and a drydock which is not being used either by the general shipping of Canada, or by the government vessels when they need to be hauled out and repaired.

I find that in the city of Victoria a sum of four or five million dollars is to be spent on a drydock. Now, I have nothing to say against that city, and I congratulate the hon. member who represents it upon getting such a large sum of money voted; but I am doubtful, Sir, of the wisdom of such a vote in view of the splendid dock to be found at Prince Rupert. I doubt whether the late administration, or the present government is justified in expending such a large amount of money for such a purpose in the city of Victoria in view of existing accommodation, the huge burden of public debt and the tremendous amount of money we have to pay in the form of interest and for other purposes.

For example during the war there was expended for what was termed naval expenditure and which was almost entirely unnecessary the sum of $30,000,000. This amount was practically wasted; no benefits whatever were derived from the expenditure. Before I came to Ottawa I went through the dockyard in the city of Halifax. Some of the citizens of Halifax called my attention to the great quantity of stores that was to be found in that dockyard. In order to convince myself of the truthfulness of the statements of these gentlemen I went down and inspected the dockyard and I now make this statement: Whoever are responsible for the great quantity of stores in that dockyard—whether it is the officials of the Naval department under the present government or under the last government—are not fit to continue to hold any office of public trust in this country. Would you believe me, Sir, when I tell you that there is almost enough rope in store in the dockyard of Halifax to reach practically all round the world, and that, too, notwithstanding the fact that within half a mile of the dockyard, in the city of Dartmouth, rope works exist where supplies could be purchased whenever needed, and at very short notice. Well, some official, at the instance of some government, deliberately purchased from some friends sufficient rope to fit out the entire British navy, the vessels of the Canadian government merchant marine and all the shipping that will come to Halifax for the next twenty-five years. Worse than that, there is enough wire rope in that dockyard to rig practically every ship in Canada. Furthermore there are 800 suits of oilclothes hanging up in an upper attic. These are practically burnt and will not be fit for use. Permit me to mention that the dockyard stores contain these among other items—7 tons of pepper; 1,300 dozen teaspoons; 1,500 dozen tablespoons; also knives, forks, teapots, and soup tureens—everything you can think of. I went into one branch and inquired "What is in those boxes?" I received the reply "They contain black ink". I inquired "How much is there?" They said "One hundred and forty boxes of ink, twelve quarts each." Now here every day we have to ask a messenger to go and get us a bottle of ink, and yet in the Halifax dockyard there is enough ink to keep the members of parliament supplied for the next five years. This affords some idea of the wasteful expenditure which has gone on. It is about time the present government set to work and sold at auction or otherwise the great quantity of stores in the Halifax dockyard.

There is another item, and a very big one which goes to make up our public debt on which such a large sum of interest is payable at the present time, and that is the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, which cost the tax payers of this country some $80,000,000. This money should never have been spent, and the taxpayers of Canada should never have been called upon to bear such a heavy burden. If the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries had taken the advice of certain members of this House he would have been able to sell these vessels at a fair price, or practically at cost. But instead of doing that he has kept the vessels in operation for several years with the result that year after year they involve a loss of large sums of money. Last year the loss was about $9,000,000; this year I am told the loss will amount to $10,000,000, and that is where the money is going, to increase the public debt. In the Speech from the Throne it was announced that these ships had been passed over to Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors. I say that it is a mistake for the government to put these ships under the control of the Railway department or under the control of the board of directors of the Canadian National railways. In my opinion they should have remained under the manage- of the Minister of Marine, and I would advise the government at the earliest possible moment to cause them to revert to his control. The minister should then sell them as quickly as possible so that the people of the country will not have to pay any further deficits on the service.

There are other expenditures, and to some I would like to direct the attention of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) and see if he objects to them. For example we passed an appropriation of $8,000,000 last year for agriculture. I am sure my hon. friend will not object to that one, he will not say that that appropriation was not necessary. For my part I certainly think it was necessary and very likely was expended to good advantage.

Mr. GOULD: It was too small.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member for Assiniboia, says it was too small. That is the selfish westerner speaking.

We have a vote of $2,000,000 for immigration and colonization, and in the Speech from the Throne there is a reference to the desirability of getting immigrants for Canada. With that I agree, but I also want to sound a note of warning to the government. While it is desirable to secure immigrants, and while it is true that, in view of the burden of our public debt and the existing taxation, we must increase the population of this country, yet it seemes to me that we ought to endeavour as far as possible, to retain our present population as well as attract new arrivals. During the last year, and it is not the fault of the present government, a great many people have left this country. It may surprise you to know that some of the very best blood in the province from which I come have gone to the United States—this exodus consisting not of old men and women, but of young men and young girls from 18 to 25 years of age. These are the people we should try and keep in Canada; and yet because of certain conditions which now exist, and for which I say the present government is not responsible these young men and women are forced to go to the United States. As far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned I do not believe we have had a square deal since confederation. One reason why we cannot get the same measure of justice meted out to us as the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, in particular, enjoy is this—on account of our distance from these great provinces we are practically compelled to buy from Ontario and Quebec but we are unable to sell our products to them. Certain people talk about home markets, but so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned, we have no home markets except within our three Maritime provinces. Our destiny is on the sea and to the south, and unless we get fair terms from the great republic so we can sell our products there, and unless we can also sell our products in the West Indies and abroad, there is not very much hope for Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

Some of my hon. friends on the other side were talking about our railway problems and high freight rates. Well, if anybody in this country has reason to complain about our freight rates it seems to me it is the people of the Maritime provinces. In view of what happened last year—I refer to the generous treatment meted out to the western provinces by the Maritime provinces—I think our western friends should endeavour to help us in the Maritimes as much as possible. I happened, Sir, to be a member of the special committee on the Crowsnest pass agreement, and I had the honour, as the representative of the Maritime provinces on that committee, to move the adoption of a report in committee which was to bring some relief to the western provinces. This report was filed in parliament on the 24th June, 1922. I think the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) said that by that agreement the people of the West saved $30,000,000. Well, if that be so, we in the East who got no redress in the matter of freight rates had to pay our proportion of that saving, because if no reduction had been made in freight rates, and if the Canadian Government Railways had received, say, half of that $30,000,000, there would have been $15,000,000 less increase of the national debt. Therefore I say the people of the Maritime provinces had to pay their proportion of that amount.

I want to read to the House one of the clauses of that report. It will be found on page 496 of the Journals of the House of Commons for 1922. Here it is:

> Representatives of the Maritime provinces urged that their situation was one of special character, because of the conditions under which the Intercolonial Railway has been constructed as a result of the Confederation agreement. They contended that there was an implied obligation necessarily attaching to these terms which guaranteed to them special consideration in regard to railway freight rates, on account of their distance from the central and Western provinces. It was claimed that the increases in rates of the Intercolonial Railway since 1916 were in excess of rates allowed by the Board of Railway Commissioners on many of their products, which excessive rates greatly interfered with inter-provincial trade, and are contrary to the obligation accepted by the Government of Canada at Confederation. The Government was, therefore, asked to take cognizance of the situation and endeavour to arrange such reductions of rates as will, having regard to the actual cost of operation of these railways, remove as far as possible the difficulties complained of, and that the Board of Railway Commissioners should, for the same reasons, and in so far as their jurisdiction extends, restore the differential rate formerly applicable to traffic to and from the Maritime provinces, and we recommend that the Minister of Railways and Board of Management take steps to meet the situation in these provinces by a substantial reduction in rates.

Now, while this part of the report was adopted by the House, practically nothing was done by the Railway Commission to give redress to the Maritime provinces, with the result that we in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick are at the present time suffering by reason of the high freight rates which we have to pay, and as long as these high freight rates exist it is impossible for the people there to do very much business with the central and western provinces. It is true that a new board of directors of our National Railways has been appointed and are at work, and I sincerely hope that before they get very far in their deliberations they will take into consideration the fact that the Maritime provinces have certain rights under confederation, and if they expect the people there to be prosperous and to be able to pay either their share of the interest on the national debt or of the public expenditure, they will have to put them in a position where they can do more business with the central and western provinces.

But, as I said a moment ago, in my opinion our destiny is not with these provinces. If we are going to get increased business we have to get it either in the United States or in other foreign countries. While the western farmer has been suffering on account of low prices for his products, the same thing applies to the farmer and every other producer in practically all the other provinces, and applies perhaps to a far larger extent to those in the Maritime provinces. Last year United States congress passed what was known as the Fordney tariff bill, increasing the tariff on goods which we sell to that great country, and that increase has been a great handicap to the farmers, the lumbermen and the fishermen of the three provinces of the Maritimes. Candidly, I do not know what is going to happen. Some people talk of retaliation, of putting up a tariff wall against goods from the United States. I am opposed to that course because I cannot see the wisdom of it. My hon. friends on the other side want lower tariffs. I am in hearty sympathy with them. I think that if it were practical I would go a great deal further than they are prepared to go, because from a business standpoint, if conditions in these countries were normal, I cannot see why there should be any tariff between the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick any more than there is between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. But unfortunately there are certain conditions which we have to face. This government has been left a legacy, if I may so term it, by other governments, and they have to carry on and raise sufficient moneys to meet our national expenditure, and therefore it is impossible at the present time to adopt free trade or substantially reduce the tariff. Consequently I do not think my friends from the West should be in such a hurry. They should give the government a chance, and I feel confident that if they have patience everything will work out all right. As I said before, if it were possible I would have no tariff barriers at all. But I think it is useless for any hon. member to rise in his place and endeavour to convince us that at the present time we can either very much lower our tariff or abolish it altogether. The Fordney bill, as I said, was very injurious to the people of Nova Scotia. For instance, the business in which I am mostly interested, fish, is hard hit, a duty of $1.60 per hundred pounds having been imposed on salt dry fish, and on salt fish, herring, mackerel, and so on, a prohibitive duty of two cents a pound. The result is that anybody who ships these goods to the United States receives that much less for them, because the price governing fish is not fixed in the same way as the price on grain or on manufactured products, that is, the price of fish is fixed in the foreign market, and consequently the shipper has to pay the duty.

Unless this government does something to make an agreement with the United States whereby the tariff on fish is reduced or abolished, I regret to say that the great fisheries of Nova Scotia will soon be a thing of the past. In my own county to-day we have something like 150,000 quintals of fish unsold, representing under normal conditions about a million and a half dollars. It is no wonder that all over Nova Scotia and the other two Maritime provinces the fishermen are leaving for the United States, because they find that under the Fordney tariff they cannot make a living from the avocation they have followed in the past. Therefore, while I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) on concluding commercial treaties with France and Italy, it seems to me that after the session is over one of the first things to engage the attention of the government should be the making of an agreement with the United States whereby the tariff on some of the commodities we export to that country will be reduced to the point that will enable us to recover our trade with that country.

I was speaking to the House, and particularly to the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) with regard to our national expenditures, and was asking him if he objected to any items which were contained in this great list totalling $466,000,000. One large item is $33,000,000 for pensions. I am sure that neither the hon. member for Springfield nor any other hon. member is going to object to that expenditure so long as the money is properly spent, and therefore when he or any other hon. member urges the necessity of economizing I am confident they do not want to economize on this item. There is an item, however, which I am now going to express myself freely upon. The next item I notice which we voted last year was for Militia and Defence, $10,000,000. Personally, I am with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) with regard to a great reduction in that item. I believe there is no necessity to spend $10,000,000 in this country on Militia and Defence. As long as we have a skeleton organization which might cost anywhere from $2,000,000 to $5,000,000, I think Canada is doing her share. I noticed in the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) the other day—and I should really congratulate him upon that speech, because it was a very mild and good one—he mentioned the fact that Canada had certain duties in connection with the defence of the country. That is quite true, and Canada, I think, is willing at any time to do what is necessary; but in view of the large public debt, in view of the interest and other expenditures that we have, we should, for the next few years at least, economize as regards expenditure in connection with Militia and Defence.

Last year, we voted some $90,000,000 for Railways and Canals; and as I said a moment ago, if this House had given relief to the agriculturists of the West, we would not have to raise so much money in other ways to pay the expenses of Railways and Canals. The next item is Dominion Lands and Parks, $4,936,000. This is an item where, in my opinion, this government could economize. In view of present business conditions in this country, I cannot see why almost $5,000,000 should be spent on Dominion Lands and Parks. Another item is Soldier Land Settlement, $12,000,000. I am sure neither the hon. member for Springfield nor anybody else will object to that amount of money being spent, if it is spent properly in the interest of the returned soldier. Then there is Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Nobody, I am sure, will object to that item. Then, under the heading of Miscellaneous, we have the large sum of $14,000,000. I am going to be frank with the government, frank with myself and frank with the House. In my opinion, under that heading, this country can save some money.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." I hope he will not ask for several million dollars to be expended in the western provinces for something which we cannot afford. Before I pass from the amount which was voted last year for Railways and Canals, I notice an item of $4,360,000 lent to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited. I do not think the present government was responsible, because we were compelled to vote that money last year, and I do not wish to criticize very much the former government. But we have arrived at a time and a condition when, in my opinion, no more money should be voted by this House for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Instead of voting more money to be wasted and lost, this government should sell those ships at the earliest possible moment, pay any debts that have been contracted in connection with them, and place the balance of the money towards the payment of the public debt.

Mr. NEILL: Is the hon. member aware, or will he tell the House, that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine on the Pacific coast is a public benefit and a profitable one? It is only in the effete East that it has proved unprofitable.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend has stated that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships on the Pacific coast are beneficial and profitable. I do not know if they are profitable or not, but I doubt that very much. I cannot understand why they should be beneficial, when millions of tons of shipping are lying idle in almost every principal port in the world, ships that would be very glad to carry the cargoes which the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are carrying from Vancouver and other Canadian ports.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They would not be Canadian ships.

Mr. DUFF: They would be British.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): American.

Mr. DUFF: This government has no right to vote the people's money to pay the deficit of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine ships when there is tonnage to carry every dollar's worth of goods on either the Pacific or the Atlantic coast.

I want to refer for a moment to some of the items under Miscellaneous which amount to $14,000,000. This is a very large amount, and of course some of it is necessary. I am sure nobody will object to the item of $2,200,000 which it voted and spent to provide for the administration of the business profits war tax. Everybody realizes that a large amount of money is collected through this source, and it is necessary to have a large staff of officials to collect this amount. The only regret I have is that there are not more farmers in this country, especially in the West, who can pay a business profits tax and an income tax.

There are, however, several amounts on which I think we could save this year. First, there is a grant of $15,000 to the Canadian General Council of the Boy Scouts' Association. I believe under present conditions that money should not be voted and should be saved to the ratepayers of this country. There is a grant of $3,000 in aid of the Dominion Council of the Girl Guides. Of course, it is very nice for certain religious bodies in this country to get together the young ladies in their congregations and to put them through certain physical training; but under present financial conditions in this country, these churches should arrange to pay the expenses of these organizations themselves and not come to this government for any grant.

Another item is Purchasing Commission, $72,000. I believe there is no necessity for paying $72,000 for a Purchasing Commission, when in the Public Works department, Marine and Fisheries department and every other department there is a purchasing agent. It seems to me that these purchasing agents should be able to purchase the goods that are required, and that this $72,000 could be saved to the taxpayers of this country. I feel sure the hon. member for Springfield will realize, on consideration, that when the government has to raise practically $500,000,000 and most of it can be spent economically in the best interests of this country, it is pretty hard for the government to retrench very much in the matter of expenditures.

Mr. LEADER: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question—and I am asking it in a friendly spirit—does he not think that the grant of $5,000 to the boat race off the coast of Nova Scotia might be done away with this year?

Mr. DUFF: I agree absolutely with the hon. gentleman, and since he has brought up this point, I might say that I consider the $5,000 voted last year for that purpose was the best expenditure that this government or any other government could make.

Mr. LEADER: You beat the other fellow.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, we beat the other fellow. But let me tell my hon. friend that this is not an ordinary yacht race; it is a fishermen's race. This race is run by fishing vessels; the boats are manned by actual fishermen, and it is a good thing for the country because it develops a spirit of rivalry. Last year no less than fifteen new fishing schooners were built because the owners and captains wanted to compete with the vessels which won the race in 1921. In spite of the depression in Nova Scotia to-day, in my constituency sixteen new fishing schooners are being built practically as a result of that fishermen's race.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Are they needed?

Mr. DUFF: I do not quite understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My question is in reference to my hon. friend's last remark. Are these fishing schooners being built for the purpose of racing only, or for fishing purposes?

Mr. DUFF: I am sorry my hon. friend does not read the newspapers. I have explained the matter in this House, and the newspapers contained many columns about it last year. These vessels are not racing vessels; they are fishing vessels. They, with their crews, leave the ports of Lunenburg, LaHave and Mahone in the month of March when my hon. friend and I are comfortably seated in the House of Commons. They go out and anchor off the Sable island banks where they fish for about a month.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My hon. friend referred to the fact that the holding of this race caused an additional shipbuilding effort to the number of fifteen ships. Presumably it was because it was felt that the grant would stimulate interest in fishing. All I am asking is whether these ships were built purely because of the stimulus and the advertising which would result from the race, or whether they were built because they were actually needed.

Mr. DUFF: They are built for both purposes. The race gave a stimulus to young men to go and secure owners to put up money to build the new schooners. The result is that the fleet has been increased by fifteen or sixteen ships in the last year, and the same number this year. These vessels are not racing yachts; they are ships that are on the ocean from the 15th March until the middle of October or later. They fish on the Sable island banks, the Grand Banks of Newfoundland and elsewhere, where fishermen, to the number of about twenty on each vessel, spend the whole summer, returning with fish to the value of some $30,000 in each ship. Every vessel added to the fleet brings into the country yearly product valued at some $30,000, and I certainly think that a grant of $5,000 voted for the purpose of promoting this industry does just as much good as a similar grant voted for agriculture.

Mr. BROWN: I want the hon. member to understand that the matter is one that has my sympathy. But he apparently does not see any inconsistency between his advocating this grant and the statement that fishermen are going to the United States. Does it not seem that we are building up at one end and allowing the industry to go down at the other? Does the hon. member not see any inconsistency there?

Mr. DUFF: I do not think there is. The people who are going to the United States are young men and women. The men who are going are not fishermen.

Mr. BROWN: You mentioned fishermen as well, I believe.

Mr. DUFF: There are a few from Cape Breton and the counties along the shore, but most of the men who have been fishing in these vessels of which I speak will remain at home. Now, because of the depression in the fishing industry, a number of fishing schooners of the type of that which won the race last year have been sold, as my hon. friend says, to gentlemen who are in a more profitable business and who hail from the United States. And the joke is that these vesels hail from Lunenburg, although they are owned and operated from the United States, because Americans cannot go into that particular business with ships of their own.

My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) raised some question with regard to this grant of $5,000. Of course I am quite willing to take this criticism in the right spirit. But I would call his attention to some of the amounts that have been spent in agriculture. In my opinion the $5,000 voted for the schooner race was just as beneficial in the interests of this country as some of the moneys voted for agriculture. We vote some $8,000,000 all told for agriculture.

For instance, for seed and fertilizer we grant $260,000, and for live stock $1,000,000. We on this side of the House do not complain about the votes to agriculture which the western provinces receive. I noticed somewhere the other day in looking over the estimates that a large amount was voted for seed grain as well. It seems to me that if this government and past governments can have voted large sums of money for seed grain and for other agricultural purposes, my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie should not complain if a certain amount is granted to the fisheries of the country; because, in my opinion, neither this government nor any other has done what it should have done to encourage our fisheries. I see that while in the Speech from the Throne His Excellency speaks about agricultural depression he makes no mention of the depression in either the fisheries or the lumber industry. I think that the sooner His Excellency is made aware of the conditions in the Maritime provinces and is shown the opportunity we have for development there, he will see the wisdom of including in the next Speech from the Throne some practical reference to fisheries and lumber.

One hon. member yesterday spoke about the Hudson Bay railway. Now, this is something on which we have spent a large amount of money, and I understand that our western friends are asking that still greater sums be expended to construct this railway. In my opinion, and I have some knowledge of the matter, this undertaking should never have been started in the first place, and it would be a mistake for this government to spend one dollar on the Hudson Bay railway. It is regrettable, but still true, that every dollar spent by either this government or any previous government in endeavouring to build a harbour at either Port Nelson or Fort Churchill has been absolutely wasted. By reason of currents and the condition of the bottom of that large bay; the millions of dollars that have been spent in dredging since operations were first started have been practically wasted. I have some knowledge of this locality because I have been at the mouth of Hudson bay as far as Mugford and Nain, and it is impossible to get ships into the bay for any lengthy period. They may get in for four weeks out of the whole twelve months of the year, and no shipping man will send a vessel there unless he gets a higher freight rate, because he has to pay higher insurance. But what is the use of spending millions of dollars in building a railway to Hudson bay when it is impossible to keep the ports open on account of ice and the conditions that prevail at these places? I think it is about time that the people of the West, while we are all in sympathy with them, realized the futility of asking the government to spend money for the purpose of building the Hudson Bay railway when it can never be a success. Even if the railway were built, very little shipping would come to these ports.

I think I have said about as much as is necessary in regard to this matter. I feel that if this government is given a chance to prove its worth it will satisfy the taxpayers of the country that it is endeavouring to do its best under very trying circumstances. The government has been in power only a year, and it is impossible for any government to do very much in that time. We should bear in mind that when the Liberal party was in power from 1896 to 1911 this country was very prosperous. And I would remind my friends from the western provinces that any relief in the matter of taxation that has been given by the governments of this country has been given by the Liberal party when in office. That party went down to defeat in 1911 in an effort to provide some relief not only to western agriculturists but to all the people of Canada, when the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the late Mr. Paterson tried to get through a reciprocity agreement.

I think that we should at the earliest moment try to negotiate with the United States another treaty of that kind. I am not scared of the bogey of one hundred millions swallowing nine millions. Now, the people of the Maritime provinces are all good Canadians who believe in confederation, but unless some relief is given them, I fear to contemplate the future. Thousands of people have left those provinces during the last year, and if something is not done to retain the present population the Maritime provinces will lose thousands this year and next year as well. I do think that our western friends should unite with the members from the East in an endeavour to find some solution for the problem of the Maritime provinces. If that solution lies in a lower tariff and it can be provided without any injury to any of the rest of the people I am with the western members. But I do not think that this is the right time to move an amendment such as has been submitted by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey). The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in his speech the other day said that this tariff was 2½ per cent higher than it was when the government of which he was leader went out of power. I always take with a grain of salt anything the right hon. gentleman says, and I shall not dispute his words now; I could not, perhaps, hold my end of it in a controversy with him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: I beg pardon? I would try it, of course, if necessary. I want to read an extract from an editorial published in a Tory newspaper. The right hon. leader of the Opposition has said that the present tariff is higher than it was when the Union government, or the National Liberal and Conservative government, was in power. Nobody has any doubt about the politics of the Mail and Empire, a journal which is published in Toronto, the great home of Toryism, and is regarded generally as a loyal Tory newspaper. In an editorial which devotes a good deal of attention to the hon. leader of the Progressive party, the Mail and Empire says, referring to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke):

> Does he regard the present tariff of Canada as a highly protective one, considering the fact that it is the lowest tariff Canada has had in a generation?

These are the words of the Toronto Mail and Empire, yet the right hon. leader of the Opposition said a few days ago, and I think he repeated it yesterday, that the present tariff was higher by 2½ per cent than it was when his government went out of power. I leave the matter to the right hon. leader of the Opposition and the editor of the Mail and Empire, but everybody knows—it was stated yesterday by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding)—that the tariff is lower than it was before; that reductions were made on a great many articles. I feel that if this government is given a fair chance it will reduce the tariff, even at this session, wherever possible.

Mr. IRVINE: If this is not a proper time to move the amendment, when would the proper time be?

Mr. DUFF: Well, I am only a backbencher; I am not a parliamentarian of many years' standing, any more than my hon. friend is. But my idea is that the proper time to bring down the resolution moved by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) is when the budget is brought down —that is, if he is not satisfied with the budget.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask further whether the hon. member would guarantee to us the right to move an amendment to the amendment on the budget?

Mr. DUFF: I do not have to guarantee the hon. member any rights at all; he has certain rights in this House just the same as any other hon. member. I do not think he need worry. The Speaker will be delighted to allow him or anybody else to move any amendment that is in order.

Mr. IRVINE: We had to worry about it last year, and did not get it.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member did not worry very much; his hair has not turned grey. Now, while I have a good deal of sympathy with the sentiments expressed by this amendment, I feel that this is not the proper time to bring it forward. Every hon. member agrees that the burden of taxation is high; that many people are suffering from that burden, and that there is a good deal of unrest and dissatisfaction. But what can we do? We have to face a certain condition. We have a very large debt, the expenditures of the country are great, and the only thing for us to do is to bear our burdens cheerfully. But I repeat that this government, wherever possible, should endeavour to economize and save money for the people. I have faith in this government. I believe that if they are given an opportunity they will pare down the expenses so that not only my hon. friends sitting opposite, but every ratepayer in the country will realize that under a Liberal administration Canada's affairs are conducted in an economic manner. I submit that in all the circumstances it would have been far better if my hon. friend had not moved the amendment which he has introduced.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): Mr Speaker, it has been a pleasure to me to listen to such a moderate speech from the hon. gentleman for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). I remember that last session he was far more fiery and had far stronger statements to make respecting the party to the right of me and also this party. But to-day his tone is a moderate one, and we cannot therefore extend to him the criticism that we can extend to the other two hon. members who have spoken and who also come from his province. However, some of the things he said certainly demand an explanation.

In the first place, speaking of economy, he says that $6,000,000 was spent on the agricultural interests of this country—and he was continually looking at us as if all the agricultural interests were centred in western Canada. Only a few moments previously one of the members from Nova Scotia had said that his constituency also was an agricultural one. I think my hon. friend will find that some of that money was spent in the Maritime provinces.

Mr. DUFF: If my hon. friend will allow me, I did not object to any expenditure for agriculture. I did not say it was all for the West, either.

Mr. LEWIS: I understood the hon. member to say that $6,000,000 was spent in connection with agriculture, that we were demanding economy, and that we would not want any smaller expenditure in that regard.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend should remember that he and his friends are not the only agriculturists in this country. There are better farmers in Nova Scotia than there are in any of the western provinces.

Mr. LEWIS: I am quite willing that the hon. member for Lunenburg should blow his own horn; that has nothing to do with me. I am not saying there are not better farmers in the East, nor am I saying that all the farmers who have left Saskatchewan are failures. But if $6,000,000 is spent upon the agricultural interests of the whole of Canada, representing practically half the whole population, it is a very negligible sum to spend when we consider that $481,000,000 are spent for the rest of the Dominion. Let us remember also that we, the common people, are paying into the public treasury over $80,000,000 in connection with the manufactured goods which we buy, and are putting a further like sum into the pockets of the manufacturers. So that $6,000,000 is a very small sum compared with other expenditures that are made.

Another thing I could hardly understand as being consistent was the assertion of the hon. member for Lunenburg that as a result of the duties on fish many of his people were going out of business, coupled with the later statement that sixteen new schooners were being built, not for the races but to engage in the fishing industry. Wise and intelligent men will not make the necessary expenditure to the building of sixteen schooners for the purpose of engaging in a trade that is declining. My hon. friend, therefore, is hardly consistent in his remarks respecting the fishing industry.

I am reminded that the three previous speakers from Nova Scotia who have addressed the House have spoken about the "tale of woe" of hon. members on this side. I ask, has any hon. member in this House ever heard a greater tale of woe from any province than we have heard from Nova Scotia? If he has, I have yet to hear it. In that connection I am reminded of the formula of Dr. Coué, which I might paraphrase thus: "Day by day and in every way we are putting more things before you," and if there is an effort to effect a remedy analogous to that which is supposed to be effected in the human body by the application of that formula, it may be that in the body politic we shall get a feeling of health and strength so far as the Canadian West is concerned.

Mr. MARTELL: May I ask a question? Last year you got certain reductions in railway rates. What did we get in the Maritimes? How much have you in the West paid for the building up of Canada?

Mr. LEWIS: I am quite well aware of those reductions and we are thankful to the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) who brought in that report. We do not say a word against that; we consider it our due; and the very fact that the Crowsnest pass agreement was suspended for a number of years was due to our patriotic effort to help Canada in the past. But now, when the same conditions no longer prevail, there is no reason why we should not go back to the agreement we had before the war.

There are a few criticisms I wish to answer. So far as redistribution is concerned, my sympathy goes out to the hon. member for Hants who mentioned it, because possibly his own constituency will be amalgamated. That seems to be inevitable as a result of the numbers of people leaving the province of Nova Scotia. It does seem rather hard that a province that entered into confederation should find its population decreasing day by day, and that it should have its representation in parliament reduced. I for one would be glad to see Nova Scotia placed on the same plane as the province of Quebec in that regard, because it does seem to me that the Maritime provinces, so far separated from us, should not be denied a voice and proper representation in this Dominion parliament. So I will be willing to support the hon. member in that respect.

He mentioneed another matter on which I cannot altogether agree with him. He said that the West should remember the Maritime provinces, because the people from those provinces had borne the burden and heat of the day. It seems to me that we also are to-day bearing the burden and heat of the day, and in some cases it has been too much for the frail body of humanity, with the result that large numbers of them are getting out.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll) in his speech yesterday referred to a letter that was written to the Scotsman, of Edinburgh, and he took it in absolute sense. I fail to find that it speaks of "all the farmers" or "every farmer", but only "the farmers," and so for that reason I think he was speaking generally, and not in an absolute sense. He was speaking of conditions generally as he knew them, and although my hon. friend contradicted the information in that letter, he will find on referring to Hansard that the previous speaker gave it correctly. It was to this effect, that he knew farmers in western Canada who were just as comfortably situated as the capitalists in Montreal or Toronto. I have had the pleasure of visiting some of these western homes. I have lived in the West for twenty years. I was a missionary out there eighty miles from the railways, and I visited hundreds and thousands of homes, and I want to say that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it would take the average farmer ten years to furnish even one of the rooms that you find in the palatial homes of eastern Canada, and as for the Canadian farmer living in the same comfortable circumstances as the capitalist in Montreal or Toronto—why, it is simply absurd. It seems to me that the man who made that statement knows absolutely nothing about western conditions.

The hon. member for Lunenburg also spoke of the Hudson Bay railway. He may have spent a day or two up around the bay, but I would point out that the two commissions that were appointed by this Dominion parliament have reported that the route is navigable for at least three or four or five months in the year, and not four weeks, as has been quoted. I shall deal with this in a few moments.

In regard to what has been said of western Canada, we will not play second fiddle to any man in regard to our eulogy of the Canadian West. We believe that the land is all right; we believe it is one of the finest countries in the world; we believe it is one of the most fertile soils that can be found; we believe that we can grow the finest wheat in the world. But in spite of having the finest soil in the world, in spite of it being one of the finest countries in the world, in spite of our growing the finest wheat in the world, we are not in a prosperous condition and men are leaving the country in large numbers. What we say is that there must be something seriously wrong when in a country that has been endowed with the finest possibilities, and where production has been granted to us by Providence above, and through the hard work of the individual, circumstances are such that a man almost fails to subsist. It is not a matter of a year or so: it is a matter of a number of years. I have heard the statement made outside by a member of this House that possibly it is the failures who are leaving the country, and if so, we are better off without them. So far as my district is concerned, if that were true, you would have to say that the men who have spent their lives farming, men who know all about the conditions, are all failures. That is impossible. They have farmed in the East, and they have farmed in the West, but owing to the economic conditions under which they have to farm they find it impossible to keep home and body and soul together, and it is for that reason we raise our voice; not that we are pessimistic, but because we feel if we do not raise our voice and warn these eastern men and present the real facts so that you may understand and sympathize with us and help us in every conceivable way, the confederation that was brought about in this great Dominion for the advancement of the North American continent will one day go on the rocks, and great will be the fall of it. That is how it seems to us at the present time.

The hon. member for Lunenburg said that no man had the right to get up in this House and tell a tale of woe or complain of conditions unless he had some remedy to suggest. He said that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) and many other members who have spoken had not offered any solution of the problems they presented. We believe that we have tried to solve the problem; we believe we are trying to solve it day by day, and we are showing you the means whereby it could be solved if you would listen to us. But that seems impossible, because we are speaking to a large extent to deaf ears. The hon. member for Springfield has clearly shown, so far as we are concerned, how prosperity and peace and harmony and unity can once more be brought to this Dominion. I may speak of that in a few moments.

The immigration policy of this country has been dealt with to a large extent, and I want to say this: Travelling on the train one day I met a man who said, "I have watched the proceedings down in parliament a great deal, and it does seem to me that the Dominion immigration agents are something like this. In a certain insane asylum, if they want to test a man's sanity, they have a great trough filled with water and then, with the tap still running, they give the man a bucket and tell him to empty the trough. If he starts bailing out the trough before turning off the tap, they say he is fit for the insane asylum and he is detained. But if he first of all turns off the tap, and then gets his bucket and bails out the trough, they say he is fit to enter into the commercial life of the land. Now if we could reverse that process and apply it to the immigration policy it might be of practical utility. In 1911 we had 7,206,643 people. The natural increase over deaths —in spite of the losses of the war, the losses caused by the epidemic of influenza, and the great mortality which took place during that period—was approximately 1,500,000. In the same time we received 2,000,000 immigrants from different parts of the world, making a total of 10,706,643. So that we actually lost two million people, just as many as came in. In other words we are not making any progress. What is the use of men trying to raise families in this country, what is the use of our trying to keep pace with the natural development of the country when, despite all the people that are coming into the country we are getting no further ahead? There must be some reason for it, there is a leak somewhere. I believe it is up to the Dominion authorities to stop that leak and to so remedy the conditions that people in Canada will be rendered happy and contented. Either they should do that, or else they should give way to others who will take their place and solve the problem.

There are some things I want to say in regard to the farmer. I happened to attend a sale the very morning I left my home town to come to Ottawa. This sale took place at ten o'clock, and was similar in character to a great many other sales that are taking place in that community—it was a sheriff's sale. That sale was forced by the bank upon a certain farmer, and nine of his horses had been seized. The sheriff came along and inquired "What am I bid for these horses?" I said "Two hundred dollars". He said "We are not taking them as a whole. What bid is made for them individually?" Well, the horses eventually realized the sum of $187. Then we turned to that farmer's sheet of expenses, to the expenses of the sheriff, the expense of keeping those horses in the livery barn, and the expense entailed by the judgment, and what did we find? So far as the judgment was concerned the farmer's liability was not reduced in the least—he had lost nine horses and his liability under the judgment remained the same. I am told that is the condition generally throughout the West with respect to sheriff sales.

I am not reciting this tale of woe merely for effect, but I want to state what I think will be the remedy. First of all I have no objection whatever to bringing in all the men that can be found to settle on the vacant land in order, as we are told, to help to bear the burden which is crushing us. But we must bear this in mind: In western Canada we are located at least 1,500 miles inland and we have to produce wheat in competition with the rest of the world. Unfortunately, owing to the long railway haul, and other expenses involved in getting our wheat to Europe, it is impossible for us to, at present, compete with others in those distant markets. And if you have an immigration policy whereby thousands of persons are entering upon and cultivating those western lands, can you not understand that it will have the effect of increasing the supply of wheat on the world's market? What does that mean? The greater the supply of wheat the less will be the price paid for it; and instead of the thousands and thousands of new arrivals proving a help to us, their labours will have the effect of detracting from the price we receive for our produce. We are told that our western wheat is demanded by millers generally throughout the world, that it is a product that cannot be equalled or duplicated anywhere, that it is a hard wheat different from any other wheat grown elsewhere. If that is true the fact of our being located 1,500 miles inland is not of so much importance, provided the identity of our wheat is preserved and specified in such a way that the buyers in the world's markets will know they are getting a Canadian hard wheat. I think this provision is one of the things which is essential to the prosperity of western Canada. Another condition, has reference to possible outlets for our produce. We have been told that the Hudson bay route is not feasible, and a damper has likewise been placed on the Vancouver route; but we believe that if the identity of Canadian wheat is preserved on the markets of the world, and if these two outlets are made available for export, the existing problem will have been, to a very large extent, solved. I do not believe that we are in reality selfish in seeking our own preservation.

There are other matters to which I would like to refer. The practice of economy in the administration of government has been urged, and it is very desirable that we should observe economy. But let me point this out: If the proceedings of last session are carefully studied it will be found that during the first part of the session non-contentious items were brought forward and much time was occupied in discussing them, so much so that two, three and four days were devoted to the consideration of a matter of $500,000. But when the session was drawing to a close and members were growing tired, the government brought down late at night, or in the early morning, estimates involving the expenditure of millions of money, and many members were too tired to care much what went or "slipped" through. It seems to me that when they are dealing with a body of sensible and intelligent business men, the government should be actuated in its policy by sound business principles, and should bring down these large amounts of estimates early in the session when the proposed expenditures can receive thorough and adequate discussion.

I want to say a word or two in regard to the Near East question. I notice that almost every member who has spoken has eulogized the government on their position to that question. Now, I am one of those who are not afraid to declare that they are not prepared to eulogize the government for the action they took at that particular time. I will state my reasons why. We were told that this parliament is the proper authority to decide any big question of foreign policy, and whether we shall send forces to the Near East or any other foreign point, or engage in any large expenditure for such a purpose. I agree with that contention, but the point I wish to make is that we were denied the privilege in this case—we never had an opportunity of saying whether we should support Great Britain should they go to war or not. I think that is a question for parliament to decide; it is not one which should be left for decision to Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, or the Hon. T. A. Crerar. I make this further point: The Canadian parliament did not decide that question, or the government of Canada either. A message was sent to the British government, and they replied that they thought there was no necessity to call parliament together. Now then, in the ultimate analysis it was neither the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) nor his government, nor the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), but the British government that decided whether the Canadian people should have the right to say whether we would back up Great Britain in her foreign policy. I am not supporting any party in reference to this matter, but I assert that the people of Canada, through their representatives assembled in parliament, have the sole right to decide a question of such magnitude and of so much importance to the peace of the world.

In regard to the conditions now prevailing in this country, I notice that one hon. member speaking yesterday said:

> I hope that when legislation is brought forward the legislators will see to it that it does not enhance the price of the commodities representing the necessities of the common people.

That is a very good statement, I think it is well worth commendation from this side of the House, and I would commend it most heartily to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) when he brings in his budget. He is the person to whom we should commend that statement—not to hon. members, but to the master hand, to the minister who brings down the annual budget. In that connection, when he is speaking of the necessities of life, I would ask him to remember that he increased the burden upon the common people last year by fifty per cent through the sales tax. We would commend to his consideration the necessity of seeing that not only monopolists, not only combines and other predatory organizations, but this government itself do not enhance the price of the commodities which we all have to buy to feed and clothe ourselves. Why, it is becoming almost impossible for a family man to supply all the needs of his family. We know that no matter how you try to tax those higher up, as one member said in the Imperial parliament the other day, in the last analysis the tax is passed on from one person to another until it rests on the ultimate consumer. I believe it is the same in Canada. You may say that the capitalists, the manufacturers and the upper classes are paying the bulk of our taxes, but in the final analysis it is always the common people who are bearing the heaviest burden of taxation,—a burden which is driving them out of the country.

In regard to the stamp tax, although some men think it is an excellent thing, I have nothing to say about the tax itself; I shall confine my remarks to the manner in which it is collected. This year we find there has been an increase in the sale of stamps. When you buy a war tax or an excise tax stamp you know that you are paying a specific tax the aggregate return from which will be earmarked; when you buy a stamp and place it on a cheque you know it is going to help reduce the war debt, but in the great majority of instances you may affix an ordinary postage stamp. A banker told me some time ago that at least eight cheques out of every ten that passed through his hands did not bear the proper revenue stamp at all but merely a postage stamp. No wonder the hon. Minister of the Post Office Department can show a surplus this year in place of the deficits of former years. I believe that if a stamp is to be placed on cheques and other documents a special stamp should be provided, so that the returns from that particular tax can be ascertained.

Now, as to economy. We have been told that it is almost impossible to have economy in our public expenditures. The Minister of Finance spoke yesterday to that effect, and other hon. members from the Maritime provinces adopted the same tone. But their arguments were fallacious. They said that it does not make any difference how much we expend as along as we have assets—as long as our natural resources enable us to show a balance on the right side of the ledger. But is that true economy? In the final analysis this heavy burden of a great national debt is placed upon the people and must be met by taxation, not by our natural resources. Although Great Britain has a far greater war debt per capita than we have, she is living within her income, and not only is she meeting current expenditure, but she is reducing that expenditure day by day and setting aside substantial sums in reduction of the national debt. We find that the great nation to the south of us is following a similar course. Therefore I am not the least bit surprised that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) should move an amendment to the amendment that economy is necessary in the administration of our national affairs. It does seem to me that if the Liberal party is going to live up to the tradition that it stands not for the welfare of one particular class but of all the people, the government will see to it that when it has ascertained the approximate national revenue for the coming fiscal year—its cloth—it will cut its coat accordingly. In other words, the government should strive to keep the national expenditure within the national income, and also reduce the national debt. I would be only too willing to support any proposals to this end. But it must be remembered that last year, although there was a decrease in our expenditure on the navy and militia, and $30,000,000 extra was produced by the sales tax, we were not living within our income; and whether an individual, a community, or a nation endeavours to proceed on this false premise, that our assets are greater than our expenditure, bankruptcy must follow. And besides, we have no right to consider that our undeveloped mines and other natural resources belong to this generation, not at all. They are the inheritance of the Canadian race in the years to come, and if we are going to exploit them now what are our children going to do in ten, fifteen or twenty years' time when they take our places? I see no reason why we, as a people, should expect to develop the whole of this country in a few years when that development normally should take at least a hundred years. This is the last Great West in the world, the only place where people from other nations can settle. If we are going to take the surplus millions of European nations and populate this country in a very short period of time when normally, through natural increase, it should take a century, what are our children going to do, what is their outlook? Let us examine the situation carefully. Do not let us be afraid of it. Let us realize that we have Canadian-born children growing up at the present time with not one foot of free land that they can settle on, it having been nearly all alienated in carrying out the policy that we evolved some years ago. If there is no room for these people, then they will have to flock to the cities; then they will flock to other parts of the world, and not only bankruptcy stares us in the face, but as far as I can see we are going to depopulate the prairies, instead of on the other hand having prairies that are filled with beautiful homes where is heard the tramp of the children's feet as they come with their laughter and song. That is the vision that we western men have. It is true we are putting this condition before you day by day in the hope that men with vision, men with intelligence, will realize that if there is one thing in the world to-day that will stop fanaticism. that will stop Bolshevism, that will stop any of those isms that disrupt governments and cause men to fight across parliaments, and one parliament after another to go out of existence, as we were told yesterday, it is unity among the people of Canada and a square deal for every man.

[Mr. Lewis.]

On motion of Mr. Hughes, the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, February 8, 1923.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Certain amendments to Radiotelegraph Regulations approved by the Governor in Council.—Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

REVISED HANSARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to call the attention of the government to the delay in printing the bound volumes of Hansard. One cannot get the bound volume of Hansard of last session. I am informed that not for many, many years has parliament met without the advantage of the bound and indexed volume of Hansard.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am obliged to my right hon. friend for bringing this matter to the attention of the government and I shall have it looked into at once.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): On Monday last I sent to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition a bound copy of Hansard, and sent copies also to the Prime Minister and the leader of the Progressive party. The other volumes will be ready for general distribution on Monday next, I am informed. There was some delay in getting the index proof down to the Printing Bureau. It did not reach there, as I told my right hon. friend on Monday last, till the 5th of January, hence the delay.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. Putnam for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Hoey, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Shaw, resumed from Wednesday, February 7.

Mr. JAMES J. HUGHES (King's, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne which was read by His Excellency contains an outline of the legislation which the government intend to introduce and pass during the present session, and the debate on the Address in reply gives hon. members an opportunity of presenting their views on this proposed legislation and on any other matters which they think should be brought to the attention of the government. The debate should therefore serve a useful purpose. The members, being fresh from their constituencies, should have first-hand knowledge of the needs and requirements of the nation as a whole, but should have as well the latest views of their constituents upon the public questions of the day.

One paragraph in the Speech from the Throne reads as follows:

> During the course of the session your attention will be invited to other agreements of an international character and significance, and to other matters requiring legislation.

This is pretty broad, and may contain many things. But it is more in connection with the specific legislation promised that I intend to speak. Several important subjects are engaging the attention of the people of Canada at the present time, but I shall refer to only three. The first of these, as I group them, is the financial question, or the question of ways and means, which since the war has been brought home to every taxpayer and to every householder in Canada in the most direct and impressive manner possible. But, as another and perhaps a better opportunity for discussing this important subject will occur later, when the budget will be delivered, I will reserve any further remarks until then.

The next question to which I will allude is our social and industrial unrest, and in which, of course, is included the labour problem; and the third, is the question of transportation in which is involved the great railway problem with all its far reaching consequences and influence on every phase of our national life. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to present my views on the second subject to which I have alluded. While there is comparative industrial rest in Canada at the present time we have had our labour troubles and we may have them in the future; and it may well be that even during this session some legislation on this subject will be introduced, so that the remarks which I now make may perhaps be in order.

In the early days of society all or nearly all things were held in common. Then, as the race increased and multiplied and spread out over the earth new conditions arose. The old patriarchal order of society gave way to a new form of autocratic government. It was no longer the father but the king who ruled. Still further and further went the divisions and sub-divisions of society, until the last vestiges of the feudal system, with all its vices and virtues, disappeared until now in all communities called enlightened democracy in some form holds the balance of power. With the passing of the feudal system came greater freedom of opportunity, and fuller reward for labour to the mass of workers; but no one was now responsible for the welfare of the employed or the unskilful. Even the skilled labourer found himself unable to cope with the power of the successful commercial or industrial leader, who was often assisted by some direct or indirect privilege denied to the mass of his fellows, so that the last state of labour became worse than the first. From out of this oppressed and almost hopeless condition grew the organizations which have since spread over all the world, known as labour unions. Animated at first by a desire to secure justice, and reasonable opportunities and rewards for manual workers, the movement spread, and by force of circumstances, became militant in nature. The status of labour was tremendously improved in consequence, and its organization was perfected. But over-organization often defeats its own well-meant purposes by destroying individual freedom of thought and action. As soon as unionism approached this stage of its existence, it became less concerned with the welfare of the unemployed and more concerned with the maintenance of its own place and power. The age of the professional labour agitator and the professional labour boss had arrived, and a new tyranny was born, more relentless and more destructive than anything that preceded it, as witness the horrible butchery at Herrin, Ill., some months ago, and the terrible upheaval in Russia.

Few, indeed, could be more sympathetic than I with every honourable and lawful effort that labour could make to improve its own condition, and conditions generally, but at the same time few would be more resolute than I in opposing its unlawful aims and aspirations, or in preventing it from imposing the decrees of its sometimes badly-informed leaders upon the rest of the community. And I take this stand in the best interest of labour itself, because if labour, or any other group of men, should succeed in establishing a tyranny, destroying organized and regulated society, the first and the last and the greatest sufferers would be the poor and the lowly.

It is often said, and I think generally admitted—often admitted in this House—that organized labour has the right to order strikes, tie-ups even in the production of those things that are necessary, or almost necessary to the life of the state. This proposition I deny, and having denied the proposition I, of course, deny still more emphatically the right of any man, or group of men, to prevent another man from working when, where, and for whomsoever he pleases. The family is the unit and corner stone of the state—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask my hon. friend to make that rule apply to all groups, whether of employers or of labourers?

Mr. HUGHES: Before I sit down I will answer my hon. friend on that point and give my opinion without any equivocation or reservation whatever. I have said that the family is the unit and corner stone of the state, and the father or head of every family has the right and duty of supporting his wife and children by the work of his hands or brain; and no other man, or no other group of men combined, have the right to take that right away from him, or hinder him, in the discharge of that obligation because it is inherent, it is fundamental, it is God-given. Whenever and wherever that right is taken away, and that duty interfered with the foundations of society are either injured or destroyed.

I have said that I absolutely deny the right of any labour union to order a strike, because I cannot give to labour unions greater rights and privileges than are accorded to other men and groups of men. If any man, or group of men, in the state get more than justice, some other man, or group of men, necessarily get less than justice. I think it has long been the law that a strike or mutiny on board ship is punished by the most severe penalties, because of the tremendous risks involved and the terrible suffering inflicted upon the innocent. For somewhat similar reasons a strike or mutiny in the army is punishable with instant death. No community can or should allow its firemen or policemen to go on strike—they must arbitrate. What would be thought of the doctors of a city, or the nurses of a hospital, who went on strike even against hard conditions? And it would be still worse if they went out on a sympathetic strike. If such a thing happened public opinion would be so outraged that these men and women would be driven from the country of their birth or adoption, and no other country would allow them to enter. And what if the farmers and fishermen struck, or loafed on the job, and produced only enough food for their own sustenance? Of course such a thing is unthinkable; as well might the feet and hands strike against the head and refuse to work, or the head strike against the feet and hands and refuse to direct their operations. The fact of the matter is that modern society is so complex, and so complicated, we are all so dependent upon one another, that no nation can properly exist to-day without the hearty, sympathetic, honest co-operation of all its citizens; and no group of nations can prosper without the hearty, sympathetic and honest co-operation of each and all of them.

From what I have said it may be readily inferred that my condemnation of strikes though severe is mild compared to what my condemnation of lockouts would be, or even the bringing about of such a condition of things that strikes would be inevitable or probable. No punishment would be too severe for men who would or could be guilty of such crimes, because the head that would deliberately plan mischief against the feet and hands should be cut off from the body.

In this connection labour, and the community generally, have a grievance which I am prepared to voice. Labour says, with much truth I fear, that the over-capitalization and stock-watering of industrial corporations, and on which such excess capital or watered stock, dividends are often paid, gives money or value to men who are not entitled to it, raises the price of the things produced beyond their fair market value, and thus reduces the rewards of labour below the fair wage level. If this argument be sound, —and I feel there is much truth in it,—the policy or the manipulation which gives such results presses unfairly upon all classes in the community and helps no one except those who are its special beneficiaries. Legislation that permits such things is defective, legislation that encourages such things is bad, and will end in destruction, because, I repeat, if any man or group of men in the community get more than justice, some other man or group of men must necessarily get less than justice.

Mr. IRVINE: Which group does the hon. member think has got less than justice in the past few years?

Mr. HUGHES: If the hon. member will follow my remarks I will endeavour to explain that.

When we see men, who by manipulation of the stock market, by the cornering of the necessary things of life, by the promotion of mergers with a capital far greater than the combined capital of all the companies merged—when we see such men become millionaires and multi-millionaires in a few years we may be quite sure that the community as a whole has been wronged. I recognize the fact that rich men sometimes usefully employ part of their wealth. They establish libraries, they build hospitals, they endow universities and other seats of learning, they contribute to scientific research work, they even give alms to the poor, and such things are highly commendable. But the good done in these ways never compensates for the wrongs done the community as a whole. Better by far to raise the standard of living generally than to make a few millionaires and a multitude of paupers. Better by far to have justice and charity in the proper meaning of these words than almsgiving. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you".

Strikes and lockouts are civil war which must be prevented by the organized power of all the people. Because, the first and greatest duty of the state is to protect the lives and the property of its citizens, and particularly to protect those who are honestly endeavouring to make a living. Organizations or groups of men, labourers or millionaires, to extort more than justice must at the very least be controlled or the state will eventually perish. It is hard to draw the dividing line, but when we see labour unions demanding for their members far higher wages and shorter hours, than unorganized men doing somewhat similar work in other callings can receive, we may be sure that injustice is being done. And on the other hand, when we see other men seizing the natural resources of the country, calling these resources their own, exploiting them for their own personal advantage and by means of this exploitation become millionaires, then we can be equally sure that injustice is being done. There can be no doubt but the earth and all it contains was made by God for the use of the human beings he placed upon it. If some men can seize greater portions of the earth's surface than they can by any possibility ever make use of, and will only let other men live upon it by paying them rent for it, then manifestly there is injustice. And what applies to the earth's surface applies, as well to the minerals, the water powers, the forests and every other natural resource. If some men could seize the air and the sunshine, and only let other men use them by paying for them they would certainly be seized and sold, but as they cannot be readily fenced around they are comparatively free.

And yet the results and rewards of industry and economy must belong to him who exercises these great virtues, or you destroy energy, initiative and ambition, and produce stagnation and decay. The true division should be the giving to man the full ownership of everything he produces by his hand and brain, and the giving to the community everything God created for the benefit of all. It might be hard to draw the dividing line in all cases, but when correct principles are once recognized details become easier. And many difficulties would disappear if men and Christian nations would only remember the Sermon on the Mount; would only remember and practise the Golden Rule—to do unto others as they would that others should do unto them.

But in all probability it will be a long time before men and nations come to practise this rule. Then, why would it not be proper for the state to make laws to regulate the conduct of groups of men in the same way that it makes laws to regulate the conduct of individuals? If my neighbour and I have a dispute we will not be allowed to settle it with clubs or guns, we must take our dispute to a properly constituted tribunal, when, in all probability justice will be rendered—at all events we must be satisfied with the decision, because it is the best that can be done. As I have stated we must not be allowed to settle our dispute with clubs or guns, neither must we be allowed to settle it in a way to suit ourselves, and to bring injury to other people and to innocent people, the way in which strikes are often settled. All disputants no matter how few or how many, should be bound by the same laws, and if the state be unable to establish tribunals that will render justice, and if the state be unable to enforce the decrees of such tribunals, our civilization, as I see it is near an end. In short, I favour, with all my heart, compulsory arbitration. I know some of the arguments that are advanced against it,—that you cannot force men to work and should not try. I agree with that, but in my judgment the man who will not work, who refuses to work under reasonable conditions at all events, should not eat bread at the expense of the community and I have the highest authority in the world in fact the highest Authority in the universe who said in addressing men: "In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread." And work is not a penalty but idleness is. There are only two classes of men in the world; the working man—and nearly everybody is a working man, —and the parasite or the beggar.

And now Mr. Speaker, I will take up the third question to which I alluded in my opening remarks, namely transportation and the railway problem with which the best and most highly trained experts in the country are hardly able to cope, and which is pregnant with the possibilities of great success or colossal failure. The ordinary layman should, I suppose, hesitate before entering upon a discussion of this question, still we must discuss these things. I know Sir Henry Thornton has warned the politicians away from this subject, but an older man than Sir Henry, Euripides I think, has said "That is true liberty when free born men having the right to advise the public may speak free." Now I happen to have the right to advise the public, and whether I do it badly or otherwise I cannot shirk the duty.

Some few years ago a working arrangement was entered into between the railway executives of North America and the railway brotherhoods, which arrangement is known as the McAdoo award, and I venture to say that nothing like this arrangement was ever before known in the heavens above, on the earth below, or underneath the earth. I shall not attempt to describe this arrangement, but I have my own opinion of the sanity or the business ability of the railway executives who entered into it. Suffice it to say that it provides for promotion by seniority and by seniority only, and it pays a premium for loafing on the job, it holds out inducements to men to loaf. I shall try to give a few examples of how the thing works out in practice before I conclude. There is no business under the canopy of heaven that could be a success handicapped by such conditions. Railwaymen are not angels any more than the rest of us, and they would be more than men if they failed to take advantage of some of the inducements held out to them to get overtime and other rewards from the extraordinary schedules under which they work. But, to their credit be it said, many of them do not take full advantage of all their privileges, and hence conditions are not as bad as they might be. Sometimes there are strikes by the railway brotherhoods in the United States, and sometimes the newspapers convey the information that there is talk of strikes by some of the brotherhoods in Canada. But I have more faith in the common sense and common patriotism of the railway men of Canada than to think they would be guilty of any such folly or crime. And against whom would the railway men strike? Why, against their own government, against their own brothers and fellow-countrymen, who are carrying a railway burden that is well-nigh crushing them to the earth.

Since more than half the railways in the Dominion have become the property of the people, what need is there in Canada for railway brotherhoods except for benevolent purposes? If a portion of the people of Canada must organize themselves into a brotherhood to get justice from their own government, that is from the rest of the people, what kind of a country have we? And if the railway brotherhoods want more than justice for their own members, they are a menace to the rest of the community and should be disbanded.

When Sir Henry Thornton was in Charlottetown some weeks ago, I heard him speak and I heard him emphasize the necessity of willing co-operation in all branches of the service and among all the officials and employees. I heard him say there must be esprit de corps among all officials and men from the president down to the last office boy. I also heard him say that capable men should be selected for divisional superintendents and upon their shoulders should be placed large responsibility. With all of this I heartily agree, and I will go further and say that to these things should be added a desire and a willingness on the part of officials and employees to serve the public; otherwise there can be no proper efficiency. I do not think the Canadian National system has these things at the present time, and I do think the Canadian Pacific railway system has them, to a measurable degree, at all events.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me give you my reasons for the belief which I hold. A little more than a year ago, travelling from Montreal to Prince Edward Island, we changed engines at Moncton. The engine attached to our train broke down before we got clear of the Moncton yard. The next engine we got, broke down as we entered the yard at Sackville, a few miles further on. A month or two before that, while travelling from Sackville to Tormentine, the train stopped a few miles out of Sackville—cause, a hot box. Upon examination it was found that there was no waste in the box to hold the oil, and no waste on the train. After some delay we got started again; but soon another box became warm for the same reason and another stop ensued. Finally, a third box showed signs of undue caloric pressure, and this necessitated further delay. By stopping at every brook and pouring water on the boxes, we controlled the heat somewhat and got to Tormentine several hours late. What kind of efficiency did that indicate? Was that an isolated occurrence? I do not know. It apparently was not. While travelling from Halifax on the 30th day of October last by the Ocean Limited, I had a seat in one of the first class coaches. The day was cold and the car in which I sat was very cold and draughty. The officials, of whom there appeared to be a great number on the train that day, frequently passed through the car, and invariably they left both doors open. I shut the doors two or three times and some of the other passengers also shut them. I spoke to one of the officials as he went through the car and stated that, in my opinion, there was no use trying to warm the province of Nova Scotia with the little heat we had in that car. He scowled at me and shut the door; but in a moment another official came along and opened it; then a fellow-passenger told me that it was better to leave them alone, because a few days before he had drawn their attention to the coolness of the car, and they made it so warm that the cure was worse than the disease. I know that the temperature in the chair cars and the Pullmans is kept comfortable; but should not the comfort of the men and women who have to ride in the first and second-class coaches be considered and should not everything possible be done to make them comfortable?

The editor of one of the Charlottetown papers told me that he was in Halifax last summer and travelled to Sackville by the Ocean Limited. He had two fairly heavy grips and wishing to get them checked he went to the checking room in the Halifax station and made known his wants. There were two men working there and they were moving more slowly than the mourners at a funeral. They paid no attention to him. After a little while he repeated his request, adding that he would miss the train if they did not attend to him soon. Still no attention, so he had to pick up his grips and run, and as he was going out the door they jeered at him.

I was in the rotunda of the Brunswick hotel at Moncton last fall, and ten or twelve men were sitting there, most of them commercial travellers, I think. One of the men was talking over the telephone, and when he had finished his conversation he turned to the others and explained that he wanted to go to Montreal and wished to travel via St. John if it did not cost him any more than going direct by the Canadian National railway. He stated that an official of the Canadian Pacific railway had arranged the matter for him in less than ten minutes, and that it would take a day or two to make a similar arrangement with an official of the Canadian National railway, because it would be hard to find one who had the authority to act. And all the men in the hotel agreed with him. Last summer three clergymen residing in the eastern part of Prince Edward Island wished to spend a few weeks in western Canada. They desired to travel by the National railways because they were national. They wrote to the then District Passenger Agent at Charlottetown for information. A week passed before they got an answer, and then a telegram came with thirty-three cents to collect. The money was paid under protest, not because of the amount, but because of the principle involved. The station master at Souris reported that the money had been paid under protest, and later a telegram came back stating that a mistake had been made and telling him to refund the money. In the meantime the agent of the Canadian Pacific railway had been communicated with. A reply with all information came back at once followed by letters soliciting the patronage. These men travelled by the Canadian Pacific railway and they state that they received every kind of attention and civility. In nearly every city they were met by an official of the railway who inquired if he could do anything for them, and who informed them that they could stay off at any point as long as they wished, and could change their route if they so desired without any additional cost except the added mileage. In short, every official of the Canadian Pacific Railway seemed anxious to please. Moreover, the information they got in the West in regard to trains was to the effect that while the Canadian National trains would likely leave on time, there was no certainty when they would arrive at their destination. On the other hand, the Canadian Pacific trains not only left on time, but in nearly every instance, arrived on time. These men in common gratitude feel it to be their duty to recommend the Canadian Pacific railway to any friends who may contemplate a trip.

I have heard it mentioned during this debate that there were sufficient cars in Canada to take care of the traffic and that the government need not have given an order for more cars. Well, I know there was a shortage of cars in eastern Canada last fall. I know there were not enough cars to carry the coal from the mines to the people who needed it. I know that the mines were held up for cars and the dealers in coal could not supply their customers. And I further know that at that season of the year it took from four to seven weeks for a car of coal to come from Sydney to Charlottetown, a distance, I suppose, of about three hundred miles. Now, I do not think that it was efficient management for a car to have been six or seven weeks on the road, coming a distance of some three hundred miles. Cars, I believe, are worth four, five or six dollars a day to the railways, and the car that is twelve or fifteen days out of commission means a loss to the railways of sixty, seventy or eighty dollars, not to mention the loss which is entailed to the people.

So much as regards general conditions on the Canadian National railway system. And now, Mr. Speaker, I will ask you to bear with me while I relate some of the conditions on the Prince Edward Island division, with which I am personally familiar. During the last few years the management of that division has greatly reduced the train service and the train accommodation and has at the same time, I am convinced, increased the cost of the service. I refer more particularly to the eastern part of the division. Owing to the complicated schedules governing the wages of railway men, it is difficult for a layman to accurately estimate the comparative cost of operating trains, but I shall try, in a general way. For instance: Eight hours or one hundred miles constitute a day's work on a freight or a mixed freight and passenger train, whereas, ten hours, or one hundred and fifty miles constitute a day's work on a passenger or express train, the employees, in all cases, having the right to calculate the day's work by the mile or by the hour whichever method of calculation would give them the higher pay. Moreover, the men on the freight, or the mixed freight and passenger trains have not only shorter hours and fewer miles, but they have higher pay per hour or per mile, as the case may be. And further, when the hours which constitute a day's work are exhausted, every hour after that is called an hour and a half.

From the time the Prince Edward Island railway was opened some fifty years ago till a few years ago we had a daily freight train in summer between Charlottetown and Souris, and a daily passenger train as well. A few years ago the freight service was reduced to a tri-weekly train. This tri-weekly train is unable to carry all the freight offering, the overplus, or some of it, has to be sent by the passenger train which thus automatically comes under the shorter hours, the fewer miles, the higher pay, the overtime, and what should be a day's pay for the train crew is changed into a day and a half or a day and three-quarters. But, there is more than this. The passenger train that carries freight is always late, and when this happens day after day, passengers who can travel by auto or in any other way will not travel by train, and the passenger service is greatly injured.

But this is not all. The daily freight train between Souris and Charlottetown some years ago took care of the freight originating on the Georgetown-Montague branch. This the tri-weekly freight cannot do. The consequence is that the Georgetown-Montague train, which according to the schedule, has its terminus at Mount Stewart, has to be ordered into Charlottetown, some eighteen miles farther, as a special freight. Now, according to the schedules, when a special train is sent out, no matter how short the distance, or the time, it is a full day's pay for the train crew. There is therefore a day's pay from Mount Stewart to Charlottetown, another day's pay from Charlottetown back to Mount Stewart and of course a day's pay between Mount Stewart and Georgetown, or three days' pay in one, for that train crew. But even this is not all. The tri-weekly freight train between Charlottetown and Souris, trying to take all the freight, is often overloaded and therefore makes very slow time. It is sometimes out on the road sixteen hours. The first eight hours constitute a day, the second eight hours a day and a half, or two days and a half in one. And this kind of thing is called management by railway experts. To be just to the men I don't think they want this kind of management, they would prefer to have regular working hours and regular pay.

Mr. Speaker, I have not yet told all the story of the peculiar railway management we have in Prince Edward Island. There is a branch line of railway, extending from Souris to Elmira, some ten or twelve miles long and known as the Elmira branch. Before last summer Elmira was the terminus of the eastern line. Last summer, Souris was made the eastern terminus and a motor bus, or a little gasoline car locally known as a "jitney", with one man in charge, was put on the Elmira branch to carry light freight, baggage and passengers, and a regular freight train once a week. The motor bus, or jitney, was a complete failure. The car was too small to carry the cream the farmers wished to send to the butter factory and any baggage or other light freight at the same time. The engine was constantly getting out of order, so that no one could be sure the little thing would ever get to its destination. It frequently broke down when about half way between Elmira and Harmony Junction, where it was supposed to meet the regular train, leaving the cream it had aboard at a side station for a day or so, and compelling the passengers who started by it to walk back to their homes and miss their train connections that day. The repair parts were kept at Moncton, N.B. and when the thing would break down a commnunication would be sent to Moncton to send new parts. Sometimes these parts would fit when they came, but sometimes they would not. This necessitated further communication with Moncton and further delay. The consequence was the jitney was out of commission about half the time. When it was out of commission the train had to be ordered out from Souris as a special. I have already stated that every time a special train was ordered out, no matter how short the run, it is a full day's pay for the crew, so when the train was ordered out from Souris in the evening it was a day's pay to Elmira, another day's pay from Elmira to Souris the next morning, and, of course, a day's pay between Souris and Charlottetown or three days' pay in one. But this is not all; when the train crew would be ordered out from Souris to Elmira on Saturday evening there would be a day's pay for that evening, another day's pay for Monday morning and a day's pay for Sunday, because the men were away from the terminus mentioned in the schedule; and in addition to all this the man in charge of the jitney was on full pay all the time. And this is the kind of management we have on the Canadian National railways and this describes what the country has been paying for a domoralized service. If this is any indication of the kind of management we have over the system or over any large part of it, all I can say is; God help the country. And Mr. Speaker, I have some fears that it is an indication of the kind of management that may be found outside of Prince Edward Island.

When the jitney of which I spoke broke down for the last time, and when it had been thirty or more days out of commission, and when there was no hope of it being able to do any more work last fall, I spoke to the divisional superintendent, Mr. Grady, and suggested that he put Elmira back on the train schedule and let the people know they would have a train every day, thus improving the service and decreasing the cost. He informed me he had tried to do this, that he had put the whole matter before Mr. Kingsland, the general manager at Montreal, and the reply he got was to mind his own business, and that he would make no more suggestions. My statement to Mr. Grady was that if I were in his place I would not take such a reply from Mr. Kingsland, I would say to him that I was minding my own business and the public business as well, and that I would go beyond Mr. Kingsland with my suggestion. Later in the year, in the month of December, the Elmira branch was put back on the schedule and a daily train service re-established, but this was made a mixed freight and passenger service, the most expensive train service that could be established. During the summer and during the months of October and November, when a considerable quantity of freight would be moving, the people served by the Elmira branch had to be satisfied with a weekly freight train, while during the month of December, when there would be much less freight moving, a daily freight was put on. The only possible explanation of such conduct is that the local management wished to so increase the cost of operating the Elmira branch that the general management would allow him to close it altogether; and this has been done. Apart altogether from this incident, which should be sufficient to condemn any management, I know that the Prince Edward Island division of the Canadian National Railways is not run on either railway or business principles, but on sectional and personal prejudices; and if Sir Henry Thornton or any member of the board should wish to get further information on this point I shall be glad to supply it.

When Mr. Grady told me that Mr. Kingsland had given him the answer previously mentioned, I was surprised, because I knew it was not the way the officials of any large business concern act towards one another. I spoke to some of the other officials of the Prince Edward Island division in regard to the matter and they informed me such an answer was possible because "that is the very answer Mr. Grady would give to any of his junior officials who would dare to make a suggestion to him." Not only would they be told to mind their own business, but one or two strong adjectives would be placed before the word "business".

I ask you Mr. Speaker, and hon. members to picture to yourselves the kind of co-operation, the kind of esprit de corps there must be in the Canadian National railway service when language of this kind passes between the officials. No business on the face of the Foot-stool could be a success managed under such conditions. I am afraid a general housecleaning is required.

Perhaps it will be a good place here for me to say that I think Sir Henry Thornton will make the Canadian National Railway system a success, if any man can. I think he is a big man in every sense of the word. He has had railway experience on two continents; he has met railway men in the United States, in England and on the Continent. He is personally and favourably acquainted with wealthy men in the United States who may be willing to invest some of their wealth in Canada and so help forward the development of our natural resources and our industries. Because of the peculiar position he occupies, and because of having been born in the United States and now being a British citizen by adoption, he may have much to do in bringing about a condition of things which will mean much to our country; in fact, he may be a contributor in establishing better trade relations between Canada and the United States.

There are a few other things I wish to mention in connection with the Prince Edward Island section of the Canadian National railway system and I will then conclude my remarks. When Prince Edward Island entered confederation in 1873 it was on the distinct understanding that efficient steam service would be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial railway and the railway system of the Dominion. In fact "it was so nominated in the bond." This promise has never been fully implemented, either in the letter or the spirit. The establishing of the car ferry was a step in the right direction, but the benefits of that step will be almost nil till the Prince Edward Island railway is standardized, and I was therefore glad to hear Sir Henry Thornton say in Charlottetown a few weeks ago that this work would be taken up without delay.

Confederation has undoubtedly benefited the two central provinces, Ontario and Quebec. It has been injurious to the provinces on the Atlantic sea-board, and very injurious to Prince Edward Island. In proof of this statement many facts could be given, but a few will suffice. When Prince Edward Island entered the confederation fifty years ago, we had several small flourishing industries, now we have none, except a few small lobster canning establishments, which could not be moved away because the fish have to be canned where they are caught.

Mr. JACOBS: What about fox farming?

[Mr. Hughes.]

Mr. HUGHES: Fox farming is another industry. All our industries save those I have mentioned have gone to Ontario and Quebec. Then our population was increasing every year, now it is decreasing and to-day we have some six thousand souls less than we had in 1871 and some twenty thousand less than we had two decades ago, which is equal to one-fourth or one-fifth of our total population. This is surely a startling and challenging fact. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are not increasing in population as they should, but they are not actually decreasing. Our people are engaged entirely in farming and fishing, and I sometimes ask myself whether a burden has been put upon these industries which they cannot carry. Our climate is healthful, our soil is fertile, our fisheries are productive, and we think our people are mentally and physically equal to others, in fact many of them do well when they go abroad. Then what in the world is wrong with us? I ask the members of the railway board, I ask the members of this honourable House, I ask the people of Canada generally if they can be indifferent while one province, small though it be, slowly bleeds to death. We think our transportation difficulties have much to do with our dwindling population, we think the railway freight rates are unjust to Prince Edward Island—I shall give examples. We also think that no railway board composed entirely of men from the other provinces can fully understand or sympathise with our local difficulties. We therefore think we should have a man on the railway board. I put this matter as strongly as I could before the government, and I now put it before the parliament and the people of Canada, and hope for good results.

If it be thought that representation on the railway board would give Prince Edward Island too many men in public or semi-public life, so far as I am concerned, I would gladly give up part of our representation in this House and in the Senate for representation on the railway board. We have the Railway Commission and the Civil Service Commission, and if Canada is to be governed by boards and commissions we of Prince Edward Island want representation on some of these bodies, where power and responsibility rest, and where there is work to be done.

I said I would give examples of unjust freight rates so far as Prince Edward Island was concerned, and I shall now try to carry out that promise. I find that the rate on grain from Montreal to Halifax, local, is 32 cents per 100 pounds; while on the same article from Charlottetown to Halifax, much less than half the distance, it is 31 cents. Charlottetown to Sydney, still less than half the distance, it is 35 cents, while from other points on Prince Edward Island the rate to Halifax and Sydney is 37 cents and 38 cents respectively. If we take potatoes, the discrimination is still worse. We have seen that grain is carried from Montreal to Halifax for 32 cents. The rate on potatoes from Charlottetown to Montreal is 38 cents, and from other points on Prince Edward Island to Montreal the rate is 40 cents, and from Prince Edward Island to Sydney, 38 cents. It does not cost the railway any more to carry 100 pounds of potatoes than it does to carry 100 pounds of grain. Moreover, I always understood that railway freight rates were based, to some extent, on the value of the commodity carried; in which case potatoes should be carried cheaper than grain, but so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, it is just the other way round.

The soil and climate of Prince Edward Island are admirably adapted for growing potatoes, and the farmers of that province are therefore much interested in their production; but it would seem as if the National Railways management wished to discourage such farming, because for every two bushels of potatoes grown, the railway gets five pecks for carrying them three hundred miles to market, and the farmer gets three pecks for preparing the soil, providing the seed, providing the fertilizer, planting, spraying, digging and marketing. Of course, the farmer who grows potatoes gets nothing at all for his labour. I am quite safe in saying that the farmers of Prince Edward Island do not get more than a dollar for a day's work of twelve to fourteen hours, while the coal miners and the railway men get from one to two dollars an hour for their work—and yet these men, or some of them, listen to labour agitators who tell them they are slaves, and that they should strike for higher wages and shorter hours.

Modern civilization has turned our economic system upside down. The basic industry of agriculture has a load that it cannot carry, and some of the young men on Prince Edward Island who understand farming will not take farms from their fathers as a gift, if they are obliged to live on them, and the young women will not marry young men who intend to follow farming as an occupation.

Lord Shaughnessy, the president of the Bank of Montreal, the president of the Bank of Commerce, and other men of large affairs in this Dominion, have said that a large immigration of agricultural workers would cure or at least help to solve many of our difficulties. Perhaps they are right. But we are producing more food products now than we can readily market, and if we produce two or three times as much, would it help the situation? It appears to me that conditions are such that men of British descent and perhaps men of French descent in this country, if not the world over—it may not be peculiar to Canada—are leaving the land and flocking to the cities to take up industrial occupations and professional work. It might be that men from some of the countries in Europe who are accustomed to a lower standard of living would be satisfied if they came to Canada and went on the land. That might be a better arrangement. These are the men who, if they were satisfied with a lower standard of living than we are accustomed to, might make a success of farming. I do not know whether that was the idea of Lord Shaughnessy and the others who spoke of immigration as being a cure for our troubles. It is the trend, at all events, of the British people to flock to the cities. Whether other people will come on the land and take possession of it, I do not know; but in the long run the men who possess the land will own the country, for the cities cannot renew their own lives. In three generations they die if they are not renewed from the country, and if that is the tendency of people of British and of French descent in this country, then other people will come in and take our place.

There is another thing in connection with the railway service on Prince Edward Island which tends to make young men discontented with farm work, and so far as I can learn, it is not found in any other province of the Dominion. Eight hours constitute a day's work for a stationmaster. This regulation, or something like it, may perhaps be all right in large cities where there is heavy traffic and the men are kept on the jump, and where enough men are employed to make a shift; but in small villages and country places where only one man is employed, it is simply ridiculous. When the stationmaster goes on duty at seven o'clock in the morning, his day ends at three o'clock in the afternoon, after which the station and the freight shed are locked and no more business is transacted that day. Just imagine a man driving in some miles from the country to deliver or receive some freight and arriving ten or fifteen minutes late and finding all railway business suspended for the day. Again, imagine a trader or business man in the town or village who is loading or unloading cars having to quit work at three o'clock in the afternoon, if he can't get a special permit to continue the work at his own risk. These things are of daily occurrence on Prince Edward Island, and this is the method pursued by the railway to get business.

There is another aspect to this kind of thing which has a most injurious effect. When three or four o'clock arrives the station master runs out his car—he can afford one—and takes his wife or his sweetheart as the case may be for a drive through the country. The young men working on the farms see what is being done, they contrast their toil and work of twelve or more hours per day, with that of the station master, and they decide to get into the railway service or leave the country, and they are leaving it by the score and by the hundred.

There are stations on the Prince Edward Island railway where the train leaves or passes early in the morning, say six o'clock, and returns about seven or eight in the evening, and the station master is not there, either when the train leaves or when it returns, to sell tickets, to look after the freight, or do anything else. He comes for a few hours in the middle of the day—when there is nothing or very little to do—after which he locks up and leaves. I know one station, Elmira, where the train left at six o'clock in the morning. The station master was not obliged to open the station at that hour, and did not open it. The station master at that place was the agent for the Dominion Express Company. Before these regulations came into force the fishermen in that locality shipped a good many smelts to the United States by express. This business gave the fishermen employment and gave them some money to enable them to support their families during the winter months. After the regulations came into force there was no station master or express agent there in the morning to take charge of the goods and give a receipt for them, and in any event the little jitney of which I spoke was unable to carry heavy goods such as fish. The consequence was the Dominion Express Company closed the office, the fresh fish industry was killed, the fishermen lost this means of making a living, and the railway lost the business.

A man sitting in his office in Chicago, or in some other American city, who is the head of this branch of the railway brotherhood, has the power to enforce these regulations, and the power to protect the brotherhoods in this kind of thing. In my opinion the time has come when Canadians will have to be master in their own house, and will have to manage their own business and their own industrial activities.

I have not, however, despaired of my country or of my fellow-countrymen. I think if the matter were put before the railway brotherhoods and the labour unions as it really is, if it were shown to them that unless we all pull together we shall all be destroyed together, they would act the honest patriotic part and we would all acquit ourselves like men.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue the debate on the Address, I would like to pause to say just a word with reference to those who were with us during the last session and are with us no more. Individual references to our deceased colleagues have been made by the leaders of the three parties in the House, and I could add nothing to what has been said. But, I would like to express the feeling that our late colleagues, no matter which party they represented came here as Canadians believing that it is part of a man's duty to do his share of the work in the public service of the country. And in these days it is all too necessary to impress upon the people who have time to give, who have ability to give, who have force of character to lend, that they should come, even through the dusty ways of politics, to this Chamber to help in the solution of the very real and very grave questions from which we shall not be free, perhaps, during the span of a generation. The men who have passed, saw their duty. No matter what feeling of personal ambition may have influenced them, they came here and did their duty according to their lights, and I trust that we may take some inspiration from their example, for there were among them men of strong character, men of real energy, and men, above all, of absolute sincerity. It was said by a great Imperialist in the last moments of his life: "So little done, so much to do!" That is true here and now as it was when uttered by Cecil Rhodes the Empire Builder; and it ought to be with some feeling of the gravity of that statement that we should approach the work of this session. And may I suggest, Sir, that in approaching the work of this session we get at it manfashion and not consume merely three hours a day, or less, as we have been doing for the last five days? Real work needs real energy and real attention from real men; we cannot handle the problems of this country by merely playing with them, or dawdling from day to day and occupying our time in other pursuits, letting the business of the country wait until we can rush it through some months later on when we are all anxious to get home and are a bit tired of—shall I say?—passing our time rather helplessly here. There is much to do, and I would ask of those who have the programme in hand that they should let us get at the doing of it. We are going to differ, we are going to disagree, about the doing of it; the people of Canada are going to differ and disagree about the way we are going to do it; but let us get at it for we come here for the purpose of settling or solving problems, and we can only do that by being in action.

I would like to be able to refer to the Speech from the Throne in happier terms than it was referred to by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), who once again donned sacerdotal vestments and inveighed against the barren figtree with traditional severity. He found it barren, and I do not think that the group which sits to his right will be able to gather any more figs from it than they could even from the thistles which adorn the wayside. He gave it a good cursing; and I hope that my hon. friends opposite will realize that, after all, there comes an end sometimes to the hopes—the dazzling, sparkling, scintillating hopes—which may be held out before the eyes of even the most trustful of mortals. My hon. friend from Springfield, after one session's experience of the scintillating hopes, comes back this year, gets on mount Ebal and gives the cursing which always came from that celebrated spot. Of course, he gives a little flicker towards us, but I did not think the group of which I am a member had been doing anything in particular, I did not think we had been irritating him, I thought that we had left him alone pretty well this session. We had not, as yet, reminded him of those most unfortunate results which I predicted last year would flow from that morganatic alliance into which he had plunged. However he has perhaps discovered something about the Conservatives—he may think he has found something such as has been found in the tomb of King Tutankhamen. I may tell him that we are not yet quite buried, and that he will find that, even with us, we endure for a good many years, and that, like the celebrated Pharaoh, we have remained in the same place. He may look around about, and he may find another party which has not stayed in the same place with regard to its policy. I think he has already discovered that fact. Or, if he would like something a little lighter, something in the poetic vein, he might be induced to look up the quotation given by our dear friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) when he was not occupying his present position, but when he was a critic of the then government, and quoted, I have no doubt with admirable zest and fervour, some lines that, although not appropriate then, are at least very much in place to-day. We can quote them back. They were as follows:—

> They promise, prepare, propose, postpone,
> And end by letting things alone.

I trust that my hon. friends to my left can fully appreciate the vagaries of government policy which in two sessions have gone through the whole course indicated so pathetically by the hon. Minister of Finance. One hon. member says he does not appreciate it. In last year's Speech from the Throne I find the following paragraph—

> It is intended at an early date to co-ordinate the Government-owned systems in the manner best calculated to increase efficiency, and to effect economies in administration, maintenance and operation.

And I have just had the pleasure of listening to a very interesting speech from the other side of the House in which the effect of economies in administration, maintenance and operation has been set forth in a most salutary manner for the government to hear. I learned, however, with surprise the other day from the hon. Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) that this co-ordination had not been effected. I judged from what he said that there was some serious legal obstacle. What legal obstacle there could have been that was not in existence when the Speech from the Throne was delivered last year I utterly fail to conceive, but apparently things are put in the Speech from the Throne without very much reflection, and possibly in the hope that the ambition of the late P. T. Barnum may be comfortably realized, in fooling all the people at least part of the time until the next session. My hon. friend apparently did not know there was an obstacle, but they had a whole session in which to find out and introduce any legislation which was necessary and we come here and find, I think it was after the opening of this session —I am not sure of the exact date, but very close to it—that they did get through the order in council co-ordinating these systems. Why the delay? I do not want to be misunderstood. I never speak as an enthusiastic advocate of government ownership. I look upon government ownership as an unfortunate necessity, as something that cannot be avoided, as something that we have got to make the best of. It is no use to go back into the reasons that led up to it. There is no use travelling through the years when my hon. friends were in power, and when their unwise acts with regard to railway building rendered ultimately necessary the steps that had to be taken with regard to these railways. But we are facing, as some one said the other day, a condition and not a theory—we have the railways. I would like to hear something—and I speak in all seriousness; if we are going to face this problem from a national standpoint, I would like to hear something more hopeful, something more helpful and more trustful than I have heard from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance the other day. He did not speak of this, and I had assumed, perhaps wrongly, that he was an ardent public ownership man. He certainly did not speak as such. I would think however that it would be better, for the education of the people of this country as to the necessity of vital co-operation of all interests in this country, to make the best of the amalgamated roads. I would think it would be well for a man of the high standing of the Minister of Finance to give us some hope and some light in dealing with this problem, instead of rather reprobating it and treating it as if it were something nobody could ever hope to accomplish. If that is the real view of the government, if they have made up their minds on this important subject, if they feel we can never make a success of these railways, then I would invite them to put an end to the farce at once and let us proceed to get rid of these railways before the burden on the country becomes more and more intolerable. There are just the two courses to pursue, one is to go ahead and make good with the railways, and the other is to get rid of them. Whatever course the administration sees fit to pursue, let us have energy and force back of it, and do not have any cold water thrown on the proposition by any member of the administration. The order in council has been passed, and we have co-ordination to some extent. Whether we have within the system the real desire to make it effective I do not know.

I am not going to criticise the choice made by the government of the administrator of the railways. I believe every man has a right to a chance to make good, and I propose to reserve any remarks or any criticism of that appointment until we get a full, fair opportunity for a demonstration and see what the gentleman can do. Let him be judged by his works. In the meantime I might enter a little plea for somewhat more action and somewhat less speech. This country is probably unknown to Sir Henry Thornton, and I trust he will be able to grapple with the tremendous problems that he has to face. But I would rather hear him tell afterwards, if that will be necessary, what he has done, than hear quite so much about what may be done. While touching on this subject, I do not think that the attitude, perhaps, of some public men is altogether wise, when they tell us, both in this House and out of it, that you cannot keep the railway system out of politics, or rather, that you must have politics in the railway system. I am going to be extremely candid and say that I am afraid they are right. But I would rather have them say to the public the thing that they do not mean than say the thing that they believe. They do so on other occasions, why should they not do it on this? They are telling you, or they are telling us, that there is this higher class of politics, this general direction of the affairs of the railways, that is necessarily political, and that this House which, after all, means the government, must control. I cannot quarrel with that. The administration for the time being, must settle things. I think, perhaps, our criticism is that they do not quite settle things enough. What I do object to are the suggestions that come in this very chamber, and that I have heard in Sir Henry Thornton's presence at public meetings from prominent members of the Liberal party, that you cannot keep the road out of politics; that the country is paying for the services of the men who are on the road, and that they are going to have some control. That means just this to my mind: perhaps not all the leaders, but certainly those who control the political activities of the party, have made up their minds that, under the guise of public declarations that there shall be no politics, there shall be a very effective and very operative political programme permeating the whole course of the National railways. We have some evidence of this in the province of New Brunswick. I do not care how far they go; all I want is that the thing shall come out in the daylight. If they are right in what they say, that you cannot keep the railroad out of politics, then we ought to get together in this House and get the railroad out of the hands of the people as quickly as possible. If you can run the railway without politics, then we ought to use the whole force of all political parties in this House to keep politics out of the railway administration.

When, a little over a year ago, the party of which I am a member was making efforts to obtain or to retain the confidence of the people, in which effort we were not as sucessful as we would like to have been, in the Maritime provinces we told the people frankly what our programme was, not that we had the direction of the railway system, but that as far as we could exercise influence, we thought there ought to be large regional divisions of the government railways for the purpose of effective administration. That was approved by the then general manager, the president of the road, and a statement was made publicly; but our statement, I will be frank enough to say, was absolutely beclouded and derided, and the people apparently did not believe it. It was, however, like all our other public pronouncements upon the platform, or of the platform of the party, absolutely true and sincere. The other side were prepared to go to any length, and a railway millennium would dawn if they got back into power. Well, they got power as regards the province of Nova Scotia, got it abundantly; they got it as regards the province of Prince Edward Island to the full extent that that province was capable of giving it. And you have heard the result to-day. They did not get it quite so largely in New Brunswick; but they did get many of the counties in which the old Intercolonial operates, and I will say that, in the city of Moncton and through the counties of Nova Scotia where that railway runs, the people had absolute faith and belief that a Liberal administration would give them a regional administration that would extend at least as far as the city of Montreal; that that portion of the railway would be managed from the common centre of the city of Moncton. Hon. members will recollect that originally the Intercolonial railway ran only to the city of Quebec; but that under the administration of the late Hon. Andrew G. Blair, when he was Minister of Railways, the Drummond County line was bought and the road was extended to the city of Montreal. Now, I am told to-day—my hon. friends will correct me if I am wrong—that this eastern region is to end at Riviere du Loup. I am sorry the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) is not in his place, but I would like to know whether that statement is or is not correct. On the assumption that it is correct, I want to point out something which is of a good deal of importance to us in the Maritime provinces. If the bookkeeping of that railway system is to charge up against that particular region the overhead expenses of the general staff, that will be just one nail more in the coffin of the Maritime provincial railway administration. If you take a line from Halifax to Montreal, you can administer, as regards the supervisory portion of the management, with exactly the same number of men as if it were merely from Riviere du Loup to Halifax. But, if you are going to pay as many men for a smaller portion of the road, why necessarily the overhead is distributed over a smaller amount of receipts and a smaller mileage of the railway. We do not, after all, want something for nothing in the Maritime provinces, but we do want the most efficient use of that railway which was built for us as part of the compact of confederation. We do not want to put an unnecessary dollar of burden upon the country to do that, we want it to be as self-sustaining as it may be, having regard to the absolute necessities of the people in the Maritime provinces, and having regard to conditions of Canadian business as well. But we do not want to have any part of the system loaded up with more unnecessary expense than any other. I think that is a fair business proposition, and I trust that before the session ends, I shall hear from the Minister of Railways whether this statement is a correct one and if so, what reasons have prompted the Government to allow that limited distance to become a regional system.

Last year my hon. friend, whose absence from the House this year we all very much regret, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), wanted the Intercolonial railway to be restored to its former status. I do not know that I agree with that. I want to see the Intercolonial railway of the best possible benefit to the Maritime provinces, and I believe, whether in public hands or in private hands, it would be better that the whole 22,000 miles of railways should be under one and the same management. I believe that in that way we can get better results, and I believe the people of the Maritime provinces will have faith that under one system or the other we shall get better results by having unified management and control, provided that the local necessities of the railway situation are given fair and sympathetic consideration by that management, whatever it may be. My hon. friend from Cumberland, however was probably relying on the Speech from the Throne for that year, which said:

> Conferences have been arranged between the railway authorities with respect to the reduction of rates upon basic commodities.

Last year the government had a programme until the Speech from the Throne was delivered. Then that programme, whatever it may have been, was put under the table and the whole matter was referred to a committee. On the 22nd of June that committee adopted a report which never saw the light in this chamber, and a portion of which was as follows:

> Your committee therefore recommend a suspension of the Crowsnest pass agreement for one year, from sixth July, 1922, with power to the Governor in Council to suspend for a further period of one year, if in its judgment the then existing conditions justify the same. And your committee recommend that suitable legislation be enacted to make effective this recommendation.

That was, in clear terms, a recommendation for a general suspension. It carried out the provisions of the Railway Act, which otherwise would have expired on the sixth of July, 1922. The recommendation of that committee was made, as the report stated, in view of the great necessity for a general reduction in freight rates on basic commodities as a whole, and in what was considered to be the general public interest, and not in consequence of the proposals for rate reduction made by the railways. We had that point of view, then, from the committee, that there was a great necessity for a general reduction in the freight rates on basic commodities. Our friends in the West were, quite naturally, striving to hold an advantage that they had, an advantage which had been purchased not by them alone but by all the people of Canada, and purchased under conditions very materially differing from the post-war conditions in connection with the railways. Now, the very fact that we meet here in a parliament duly convened emphasizes this other fact, that there always is, always will be and of necessity must be, sectionalism. I do not mean sectionalism in the improper sense by which one section tries to get something to which it is not entitled. I mean sectionalism in the fair sense in which it ought to be used in parliamentary institutions,—that sectionalism which presents its local difficulties, and its means or want of means of meeting these difficulties, and comes to parliament in a general conference to decide what can best be done in the common interests of the whole country, from east to west and from north to south. We do not always accomplish that, but I trust that, even though there are misunderstandings, we always have that point of view in mind. And it is with that point of view in mind that I address some remarks to this Chamber this afternoon. As I say, the West came here feeling that they had a right to something, to wit, certain rates lower than anybody else in the country could enjoy for the movement of commodities. They felt it was not fair to deprive them of that advantage. They felt that it was a difficult matter for the people of the West to market their wheat crop, and that, transportation being so vital an element, they ought not to be asked to give up the privilege they had been enjoying. Now, I am not saying that their point of view was correct. Indeed, I do not think it was wholly correct, but I say it was a point of view that had a right to be presented and to be taken into consideration in framing any policy. But it had a right to be taken into consideration only along with the requirements, the difficulties and the needs of all other portions of Canada served by the railways. And in considering this matter it was for the government to formulate a policy which should do as equal justice to all sections as it is possible for any policy to secure. The government shrank from taking up that burden. They felt they were not strong in the House, and they proceeded to make a bargain with my friends to my left, by means of which they got all the political support they could obtain and gave in return—I will not say lavishly, but nevertheless they gave—rights or privileges in utter disregard of the Maritime provinces, of the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario and the province of British Columbia. That may sound harsh, and I do not want to put anything bitterly; but it seems to me that it is just a fact. I am going to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to follow me, while I discuss the case of my own province of New Brunswick although I can only do it in the most imperfect manner. Without trying to get anything for New Brunswick that it should not have, I think it is my duty to put before this House the difficulties under which that province labours because of that very bargain which the government entered into for the purpose of obtaining political support. If that agreement did not hurt the province of New Brunswick, I suppose I would not say anything about the matter; and I presume that some hon. members may say that New Brunswick was not hurt. Now, I think that, from the very evidence taken by the committee that considered this matter and which was then shut off, I can demonstrate to the House that New Brunswick in some particulars was rather cruelly hurt. We do not pretend down there to be grain growers. On the other hand, we do not allege that grain growers have no rights; we think they have a right to fair treatment; But we think we have a right to fair treatment ourselves, and we cannot see why a large section of New Brunswick—I will refer particularly to the counties of Carleton and Victoria, where potato growing is largely carried on—should be injured by reason of any agreement with any other part of the country. We cannot see why any man in this House possessed of a fair mind should vote to destroy, to hamper or to impede the potato growers of these counties in order that some portion of the middle West might derive a tremendous advantage. One hon. member from the province of New Brunswick belonging to the group to my left did vote so, carried away, again, by the party spirit. The party meant more to him than his constituents, and he voted to sacrifice the potato growers of his own constituency in order to help out the, no doubt unfortunate, grain growers who were, in the higher circles, pocketing the spoils in the way of overages, shortages and these other things.

Mr. EVANS: Does the hon. member infer that the West is getting a service for which it does not pay?

Mr. BAXTER: I am not inferring anything of the kind, and I am not even going to discuss that point elaborately. What I want to get at is, that if the West wants, as the West has said it wants, all sorts of commodities to come in free of customs duties, and if it wants all commodities hauled as cheaply as can be on the railways, then, if there is an agricultural industry down in New Brunswick that is vital to us, we do not want to have our rates raised above the cost of haulage in order to make these other things possible for the West or the East, the North or the South.

Now at the time this parliamentary bargain was made last year the railways had already lowered their freight charges, taking about three million dollars off the general cost of railway haulage of grain; another fourteen million dollars was taken off by the retention of the Crowsnest pass agreement; making about seventeen million dollars of a reduction on one commodity alone, and paying no regard whatever to any other class of freight.

Mr. FORKE: There was more money made by the railways out of that one commodity than out of any other class of freight they carried.

Mr. BAXTER: Perhaps a greater quantity of that commodity was handled than of any other freight. Perhaps my hon. friend will also recollect the suggestion that of this seventeen million dollars saved to the grain growers by the action of this parliament, a very considerable portion was taken by the lake transportation companies.

Some hon. MEMBERS: All of it.

Mr. BAXTER: Was it? Then perhaps my hon. friends to my left will contrast the action of the autocratic government of my right hon. friend here (Mr. Meighen), as it has been termed, when its leader took the bit between his teeth and suspended the navigation laws in order to afford relief to the West, with the want of action on the part of a government so friendly to them, but which refrained from granting my hon. friends similar relief. I am not fighting my hon. friends to my left and I am not working with them, I am simply putting forward the case of the potato growers of New Brunswick, and I am going to ask my hon. friends to my left to examine their consciences and say if the New Brunswick potato growers have received a fair, square deal.

In the parliamentary agreement of last year potatoes were not mentioned. Now, can you tell me anything that distinguishes the man who grows grain from the man who grows potatoes? Is there any reason why a burden should be even partially lifted from the one and yet allowed to remain upon the other? I know my hon. friends will not say there is any reason. Well, then, what happened? The government's action paralyzed the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the potato growers of New Brunswick could not seek relief in that quarter. Railway rates were so much reduced that the railway companies, which have to pay their bills like every other company, had to get money from some source and the only source of course, of their revenue is the passengers and freight they handle. Therefore the Railway Commission could afford no relief by lowering the freight rates on potatoes or lumber, except upon one commodity only coming under the classification of building materials, namely, bricks, and in this instance the reduction was very small.

Now then, the action of the government, in combination with my hon. friends to my left, shut out the potato growers of 5 p.m. New Brunswick from any redress at the hands of the Railway Commission, a tribunal whose purpose is to see that there is no unjust discrimination in railway rates. That is the tribunal to which we go for justice in transportation matters. The Railway Commission said: We cannot give you any relief by reducing the freight rates on potatoes or other commodities without reducing the revenues of the railways to such a point that they will not be able to meet their operating expenses, and such an unsound financial position would only bring ruin upon the railways of Canada a little sooner. Remember, the government interfered with the Railway Commissioners, otherwise they would have taken up the case of the potato grower, of the lumberman, and of the shipper of all other classes of freight. No one class would have got all they wanted, but the most expert railway brains in the country would have been put to work upon the freight rates problem, and we would have got the best attempt possible to do equal justice to all classes of freight shippers—a far better attempt than can ever be made by any government or any parliamentary committee, no matter how able it may be.

Denied that recourse, the New Brunswick potato growers put their case before the parliamentary committee. I do not say that that committee was unsympathetic, for even in its first report—the report that was suppressed—a chance was afforded for equal justice. But the action of the government deprived us of that chance. The rates on potatoes from June 7th, 1917, to December 1st, 1921, were laid before that committee, and I have no doubt it will astonish some hon. members to hear how these rates were increased in that period. These rates which I am about to quote are in cents per hundred pounds of potatoes, and are calculated on the same basis as grain rates. In 1917 the rate from the potato shipping points in New Brunswick of Debec, Hartland, Andover and Florenceville to Montreal was 19 cents; in 1921, 34½ cents. In other words, it had been increased 81 per cent.

Mr. SHAW: Can my hon. friend give the House any idea of the distance involved?

Mr. BAXTER: It does not matter as to the distances. I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend the exact figures, but I could make a rough calculation.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to have it just roughly for comparative purposes.

Mr. BAXTER: I think from those points generally to Montreal the routing followed would give about 500 or 600 miles. To Brockville it was 21 cents in the earlier period, 37½ cents later—an increase of 78 per cent; to Ottawa, 21 cents as against 37½ cents—78 per cent increase again; to Kingston, 22 cents as against 40 cents—an increase of 81 per cent; to Peterborough, 24 cents as against 43 cents—an increase of 79 per cent; to Toronto, 25 cents as against 45½ cents—an increase of 82 per cent; to North Bay, 27 cents as against 49 cents—an increase of 81 per cent; to Hamilton, 26 cents as against 47 cents—an increase of 80 per cent; to London, 29 cents as against 52½ cents—an increase of 81 per cent; to Goderich, 30 cents as against 54 cents—an increase of 80 per cent; to Windsor, 31 cents as against 55½ cents—an increase of 79 per cent. Now, the 19 cent potato rate from the New Brunswick points mentioned to Montreal may be compared with the 18 cent rate on grain from Weyburn to Montreal. The Montreal rate, at the time parliament considered the question, had gone up to 34½ cents; the Weyburn rate had gone up to 29 cents. In other words, the Montreal rate was increased by 15½ cents, while the Weyburn rate was increased 11 cents. Now, parliament by that action took off 9 cents from the 11 cent increase of the Weyburn rate. That left the Weyburn rate only 2 cents higher than the lowest rates they had ever enjoyed from that place on grain; but the Montreal rate on potatoes, which I say is fairly comparable, was left increased by 81 per cent. The Board of Railway Commissioners, tied as their hands were, did the best they could. They made a reduction of from two to three cents per one hundred pounds in the potato rates; that was all they could do. I will ask hon. members, when the rate on grain is cut so low as to be almost restoring it to the very minimum rate, while the rate on potatoes is cut by such an almost infinitesimal amount, does it strike them by and large, without regard to personal considerations, without regard to local considerations, as having even the semblance of being quite fair treatment towards the potato growers in an important potato section of the province from which I come? I do not think they will feel that it is.

Well, what did my friends the potato growers in New Brunswick get? Oh, they got the sop thrown to them of a few thousand dollars which was expended in connection with their potato warehouse in St. John. Not a bad thing; it is all right to help them export potatoes, but it was to send potatoes out of the country. They were not helped to send potatoes within the country; and yet we want our railways to get a sustaining trade between one part of the Dominion and the other. We want the people of all parts of this Dominion to trade reciprocally. We have nine provinces, between which there is interposed no customs barrier, nine provinces populated by a people who, after all, approximate being one in thought and action upon the ordinary concerns of life. We want to trade together. It is vital to our interests that we should. Why then merely help us—I am not going to reprobate it, for it is not in itself a bad thing—why merely help us build up an external trade, why make a fuss about a few thousand dollars to help external trade when you have left on an embargo and a penalty on the internal trade within the bounds of this Dominion? I wonder if my friends to my left or my friends in front of me, because I am really addressing the whole House on this subject, appreciate the fact that to-day in those very counties I mention, the splendid counties of Victoria and Carleton, there has been a practical failure of the potato crop, so far as prices are concerned. They grow no better potatoes in the world than are grown in those two counties, but they cannot get their price, and the potatoes have rotted there. The fertilizer companies have sold them large quantities of fertilizer, and they have the notes of the farmers, and, in some cases, even mortgages. The mortgages are being foreclosed, and the notes are being sued. The farmers cannot meet them, and what sort of spirit can they have towards a government that bargained away for the chance of temporary political support, their opportunity to sell their products in the markets of Canada?

I have no doubt there is distress in the West, and I would be a poor Canadian if I did not sympathize with the tales I have heard, but do not forget, hon. members of this House, that there is distress in the East and difficult conditions there. We are not all in the class of the financial magnates who have been referred to by some hon. members in this debate. We are not the moneyed power in the East; we are not the people that were meant to be assailed by my hon. friends. I am trying to represent, not as from that constituency, but trying to represent as from New Brunswick the pitiable plight of some other human beings who have been striving just as hard as my friends from the West to make a decent, honest living and to stay in the land where they were born.

Is it any better with lumber? I will summarize this. The low point of rates was on May 1, 1908, and the high point on December 1, 1921. The increases ran, according to mileage—I shall not weary the House with a long tabulation; I think they will take my word for it; it was all before the committee—the increases ran from 63 per cent up to 116 per cent. You are getting a pretty good increase even at 63 per cent. You can average it fairly, I fancy, at 100 per cent. Absolutely no relief either from this parliament or from the Board of Railway Commissioners. The board could not, and this parliament would not. This group to my left protests when we say that protection is a vital and an important thing for the industries of this country. I would suppose that my hon. friends would not take protection for themselves, surely, unless they were prepared to give it to other people; but so far as I have heard their attitude in this House, and I am saying this in all charity, they say to us as Conservatives: You are wrong; your protective policy is a fallacy, and we invite the whole House to join with us and to submerge the government by adopting an amendment which will go as far as it possibly can go towards destroying customs barriers. Somebody applauds. I did not expect very much, but I know that is the attitude of mind of my hon. friends. We say: We stand for protection, and it is right. They cannot expect us to join with them and assist in giving them, or admire the giving to them, of protection that would mean actual dollars and cents taken directly out of the exchequer of this country. And yet that is the proposition that was made last year, as I understand it. Now, let us look at these things from both sides, let us try to be fair. All that we ask is that a consideration of our local difficulties should be had when those of the other parts of the country are considered as well, and we would ask that business ideas and the principles of fair play, rather than the exigencies of politics, should determine the solution.

I think I may revert for a moment or two to the general question of the railways, and as to how the interests of the Maritime provinces are affected. My attitude in this regard may seem intensely sectional, but I am under the obsession that it is fair. I trust that my remarks will commend themselves to hon. members of the House as being perfectly fair to this extent—that if we have in the Maritime provinces a port, or ports, capable of utility in the development of Canada and the handling of Canada's business, those are the ports towards whose development all the energies of our government-owned railway system should be directed rather than towards building up ports in foreign countries. I think that is a doctrine which can be readily subscribed to by any Canadian who is not merely seeking for some selfish opportunity for an outlet for his particular business, regardless of the welfare of his fellow men within the Dominion. During the last election, quite unfairly I thought, the party of which I am a member was bitterly attacked by the Liberal press in St. John on the ground that we had, by taking in the Grand Trunk, made Portland, Maine, the gateway of Canada, and the logical result of our action would be the diversion of all possible traffic to that port, and that it would mean irreparable injury to the port of St. John. If that had been true the same thing would be equally true of the port of Halifax; and my own view is that there ought to be no government policy with regard to the railways that would not treat one of those ports just as well as the other. Now what do I find this year? In a newspaper article published very recently I see that one Henry F. Merrill, the chairman of the state commission which built a large pier at Portland, Maine, says that in his opinion the simple matter of dollars and cents will defeat the efforts made to divert traffic from Portland to St. John and Halifax. Mr. Merrill also says that Boston is after some of Portland's traffic. Mr. Merrill states that the Maine Central—this is a very important thing if true; I am not able to guarantee the truth of it, but I want to know, and I want to know as early as possible, and as nearly as possible, whether the statement by Mr. Merrill, which I am going to read, is true or is not true—his statement is that the Maine Central, the Boston and Maine, and the Grand Trunk railroads have come together and given a preferential rate over their lines for freight going to the state pier at Portland, Maine. Already, he declares, this has meant a saving to the people of Maine of $75,000. He says further that the railroads have promised that as business develops they will make a further differential. This pier cost the state of Maine $1,150,000, and the cities of Portland and South Portland gave the site, which is valued at $350,000. I am not in a position to say that the statement in question is true, but hon. members will understand that I am vitally interested, as is every other resident in the port of St. John or in the port of Halifax, in knowing whether there is any, or the slightest, foundation for such a statement as has been made by Mr. Merrill. Last winter I ventured the suggestion that the differentials should be imposed the other way, and that there should be practically a prohibitive differential imposed by this country upon the haulage of goods from Montreal to Portland, Maine. In other words, just say to the people who want their goods carried out by a foreign port: "We will take them if you route them that way, we have got to do it for you, but it is going to cost you more, and definitely more, than it will to take them through the port of Halifax, or the port of St. John, over our own railways, all the way in our own territory." That is what I say would be one of the fair things to do in order to help to build up the ports of the Maritime provinces.

Another suggestion I ventured to make was that we should limit the British preference—not in amount, let us have the best arrangement with the Mother Country we possibly can, but limit the customs preference we give to the Mother Country to importations in British—and in that I naturally include Canadian—bottoms, sailing directly from the United Kingdom ports to Vancouver, Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, Sydney, St. John, or any other port in our own territory. This puts no burden on any one. It does not lessen the quantity of goods that will come into Canada or it does not enhance their price, but it does say to the steamship owners: "There will be more cargo for you. If you are taking a cargo of grain and mixed supplies out of St. John you will get more package freight put into your holds when you come back because the importer will get the benefit of the lowest scale of duty by doing that, and we are not going to let him send it in by New York, Boston, or Portland and let these ports derive the same advantage as the ports of this country." That is what I suggested last year. I see that it is the very principle that the government, and I give them credit for it, introduced into the commercial treaty with France. I think they have taken a long step in advance in doing that. I think they are entitled to credit for it. I think that whatever we may condemn them for, whatever fault we may find with them in other matters, we will say they are right in that. But let them make it general, and thus help to build up all our ports and use our railways to the very fullest extent of their capacity.

A little more reference to the Speech or the omissions from the Speech and I shall have done. We are being told—not in the Speech itself, you would not expect to find it there—that we have a wonderful government. I have heard some hon. members opposite tell us that, and I am sure they were convinced of the truth of the assertion. There were not so many members in the House then on the government side as there are to-day; but we are all aware that a little fire broke out in a place not very many hundreds of miles from the city of Ottawa, and some of the fire department—I think even a gentleman of very eminent judicial talents, and perhaps gentlemen associated with the custom house and the naval service—went down to squirt water on that political fire in Montreal; and they did not put it out. We have a wonderful government here, but some of the gentlemen who engage in this laudation may perhaps see, by the flickering of the light of that fire some traces of the handwriting on the wall.

I am very glad of the results that we witnessed in the provincial field the other day, because they demonstrate that the assertions that have been made are not well founded and that the old Conservative party of Canada is still potent, active, and influential in all parts of Canada in the same sense that it always has been. It is broad enough, strong enough, and representative enough for all. The old party is absolutely alive in the province of Quebec and I am proud of it. I am glad to see that the verdict given the other day, though it did not turn a government out of power, yet demonstrated to the rest of Canada that there was unity in the Conservative party, and that we are only traduced when our opponents say that in that province we have no sympathy and no following. There have been hundreds of thousands of splendid Conservatives who have gone, election after election, to the polls in that province, and those who have gone down have taken their defeat like men, but to-day they begin to see the dawning of a better time, and clearly within their vision is the day when the Conservative party, by the aid of that grand old province, will once more take its rightful place as the exponent of all the people in the country.

This wonderful government that has been acclaimed, has been acclaimed for what? Not for last year's Speech, because that had gone into discard; not for this year's Speech, because it has twelve headings and no substance, and has been destroyed by a malediction from the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey). But the great thing in the Speech was the thing that was not in it—the splendid government that had not got us into war. I did not want to go into war. I do not know who was consulted about going into war or staying out of it, and I do not know what were the reasons that were determinative in the government staying out or going into war, or any other way they may phrase it, because it is all contained in confidential documents that have not been exhibited to us, cannot be exhibited to us and would not have been exhibited to us if parliament had been called together. If parliament had been assembled, all we would have had would have been a despatch-case set up on a desk in the House, and we would have been told "The reason for doing what we are doing or not doing or not attempting to do is contained in that case. If we could show you what is in that case, we could show you the reasons for what we are doing, but we cannot unlock that case and cannot show you what is in it." We would have had to trust the government.

How far does the government trust us? I notice that the right hon. leader of the government took into his counsels my hon. friend who was formerly the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar). I did not notice that he called upon my right hon. friend the leader of the party to which I belong (Mr. Meighen). Was it only a portion of Canada that would be interested in going into war or staying out of war? or is the thing really that which its appearance would indicate, namely that the most solemn, the most tragic, the most terrible thing that could come before this country, the danger of another awful conflict, was to be made a matter of party negotiation and party politics? Was it in this way that they were to decide whether there should be war? Would a telegram have gone forth that we would go into war if the Progressive leader had said he wanted it? It is too solemn, I think, to be dealt with in that way. We do not know yet what the government's policy was. It looks to us as if Lloyd George, seeing he was not getting any definite answer, recalled his proposal, and I am very glad that he did, because as I see it, if the Empire is really in peril once more, if it is not the political swash-buckling of Downing street, if it is real peril, there will be no question about the answer of real Canada. But I would like to suggest to the hon. leader of the government to get away from any party politics in connection with this. Do not merely talk about calling parliament together, when practically all the issues are determined, and there will be only one thing for us to do if parliament is called together, but let us as a nation try to strike at the very root of this accursed European diplomacy and insist upon sitting in and taking part in the very inmost councils of the Empire and having our share in the determination, not at the moment when war is about to burst upon us, but long, long before, and let us have our say about the path that the Empire shall tread, and the direction in which it shall lead the feet of the people. Did the hon. member for Brandon wish to ask me a question?

Mr. FORKE: No, I was listening for some applause after that statement.

Mr. BAXTER: I was not expecting any, and I do not desire any. I was not making my address for the sake of applause, nor did I think that I was at the moment travelling on a plane that would invite any bucolic sarcasm. I wanted to go a step further—and there may be some in this audience who will be willing to listen to me—and say that after one hundred years of showing the people of the world how peace can be kept over a great water area and over a great land area, I think there are men in Canada of sufficient brain power and sufficient vision to teach something, even to the best of the statesmen of Great Britain, and I think that the homely common sense that has characterized our men on the frontier, and the rugged common sense that has characterized our men in the cabinet, might be of some utility, if brought into some of the European chancelleries and might have its effect upon the course to be pursued by some of the nations. I would think that the Mother Country herself might be none the worse of a bit of good, sturdy Canadian and colonial advice, but you have got to give that advice soon enough, it must be early enough, so that the successive steps taken shall be along the line of common sense, of arbitrament, of good feeling, and away from war, for this part of the world wants no more war. My proposition is simply that the government should endeavour to have direct representation, not merely of a high trade commissioner, but direct representation by someone of cabinet rank and authority, who would sit in the inner counsels of the Empire, would give his views, and report to Canada what was being done, so that long before war would even be in prospect, we would know whether or not all had been done to avoid a possible conflagration. It may be my hon. friend who interrupted me derides that point of view. It may be that he prefers to see Canada sailing on, fatuously content with her lot, until the moment when the red fire spreads above the horizon, and then he will call parliament together to sit down and talk about putting out the conflagration.

Mr. HOEY: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question and I do so in all seriousness. Does he not think that the League of Nations, properly functioning, will accomplish all that he has in mind, without the idea of Imperial centralization in the sense in which he has expounded it? I am putting the question candidly for information.

Mr. BAXTER: I am not able to answer my hon. friend as to that. To my mind, the League of Nations will have no power unless it is backed by the fighting power of a number of states, matchless in their strength. But before you get the League of Nations doing what it ought to be able to do, you will have to have the bigger nations inspired with a proper view towards the rest of the world. The League of Nations, to my mind, will be a valuable power for keping in awe and restraining the minor nations. I fail to see how the League of Nations can ever restrain a major nation. At the same time, like my hon. friend, I have given such little adhesion to it in Canada as I have been able to give. I wish its purposes God-speed, and I will do anything I can to further its aims.

We shall have to consider the amendment and the subamendment because we shall have to vote upon them. This may not interest any one else, but it did interest me a little; I have before me a comparison of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), who certainly does not expect me to vote for it:

That in view of the increased burden of taxation and of the hardship which many of the people suffer from this burden, and the unrest and dissatisfaction arising therefrom, and in view of the desirability of adopting measures to reduce the cost of production, and effect such relief to consumers and producers as may be within the power of Parliament, the House is of the opinion that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation should be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance:

(1) Diminishing the very high cost of production, which presses so severely on the primary producers of the country at this time;

(2) Reducing the cost of living to the great masses of the common people, many of whom are being forced out of the country by the prevailing economic conditions.

Then I turn to the Debates of 1920, where, at page 2510, I see the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) moved, amongst other things, seconded by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King):

That in view of the continued increase in the high cost of living, of the greatly increased burden of taxation, of the hardship which many of the people suffer from these causes, and the unrest naturally arising therefrom; and in view of the desirability of adopting measures to increase production and effect such relief to consumers and producers as may be within the power of Parliament, The House is of opinion that, pending a wider revision of the tariff,—

That has been left out of this amendment. Apparently my hon. friend for Springfield has no hope for any wider revision of the tariff.

—substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation should be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance; first, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

I never thought my hon. friend for Springfield was such a plagiarist, for this is really the grossest instance of plagiarism that I have yet seen in this House.

Mr. HOEY: All the great poets have been plagiarists.

Mr. BAXTER: As I said, I hope the hon. gentleman will not expect this group to vote for his amendment, because we stand where he does not like to have anybody stand. We stand where we have always stood, whether we are right or wrong—and we believe we are right—on the ground that a fair, reasonable, proper measure of protection should be given to the industries of the country in order to build up an urban population which will draw its sustenance from the rural population, both being interdependent. We do not believe in building up one side of the country at the expense of or ignoring the other side. We have to have a symmetrical country, just as we have a lake region, a river region, a coastal region and a mountain region. So I believe we have to have industrial occupations as well as agricultural occupations, and our vision—and we think it is a grand vision—is that of a country made great by the development of all its parts geographically, and of all the opportunities industrially which it possesses. We do not believe we can attain that result by adopting this amendment, however excellent a copy it may be of that which the Minister of Finance produced a few years ago. We have, perhaps, the misfortune, judged by the standard of politics of the present day, to have been sincere and to remain sincere still. My hon. friends to my left have never had any difficulty in knowing where we stand on this subject, and that is why, though personally friendly enough with us, politically they have been at more than arm's length. The fact was not that they did not trust us; they trusted us. They more than trusted us; they knew exactly where we stood and where we were going to stand; they did not like our stand, and they were not going to stand alongside of us. But they knew we had convictions and the courage of them and that that courage was not abated, even though we came back to this House the smallest group after the last election. But what have they found on the other side? Gentlemen with convictions? They were expressed in 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All varieties.

Mr. BAXTER: They had an opportunity last session to put those convictions into realization, and now they need the spur and the goad of my hon. friend for Springfield, cursing the barren fig tree to try to make it bring forth some fruit.

We have the amendment to the amendment, moved by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw), who wishes to add to the amendment:

> That this House views with alarm the substantial increase in the national debt and urges Your Excellency's advisers to exert every possible effort to economize in the expenditure and administration of government and to lessen the burden of federal taxation which bears so heavily on the people of Canada.

To my mind,—and I think I speak for the group with which I am associated—that amendment expresses, not merely our view of what the government of the day should do, but very much more. It expresses something that should be heard and heeded by every administration within Canada, federal, provincial, civic and municipal. Before the war, in the luxurious ease which Canada enjoyed, she was becoming prodigal; and you can travel through the West from which my hon. friend comes, and you will find marble palaces, which,—though I have no business to criticize, may I express the opinion?—were scarcely needed. All over the country there was a riot of display and of expenditure. But it was easy. We could stand it in those days. We had not the railway problem, we had not the war loan; and either of these, perhaps, we could have stood without the other. But during war time, when everything was moving under pressure, it was a question for this country and for every other country engaged in the struggle, not of what things cost but to get things done. If a shipload of supplies went to the bottom the obvious and the instant thing was to start another ship off. Men could not wait; money did not count. And part of a generation of Canadian people has grown up under that urge and that impetus. Necessarily money was distributed in order to look after the families of men who were suffering for Canada, and the standard of living was perhaps somewhat augmented. So that the country to-day is still expecting to live in the riot, the waste and the luxury, or at least the extreme comfort that we enjoyed when the world was in course of a tremendous upheaval.

Sir, we cannot do it; and if the supreme government in Canada does not set the example of absolute retrenchment in the cutting off of all except the things that are vitally necessary for the development of the country, how shall we expect the ordinary man in the street, the man working for his day's wage, to be content when someone says to him that he must take less? He will say, your government is spending money all the time. He will ask, and I will stand with the rest of hon. members in this House in this regard, because there is no distinction between us: how much work have you people done in the last five days? Some of you make a great fuss about limiting the hours of labour to eight per day. But what is that when you spend only three hours a day or less at work?" Let us stop a bit of the waste here. We can sit at night and on Saturdays, and we can put the business of the House through, instead of in four or five months, within the space of two. I say this in the light of experience. I have had some experience in other places, and I know that I have helped, in a leading position in opposition, by collaboration with the leader of the government, to reduce an eight-week session to one of four weeks, with some spare time out of that. And no one was hurt, either, while a better example was set for the transaction of public business. The same can be done here. There is a man in Italy, Mussolini is his name, who is tackling the problems of his country man-fashion. He says that, beginning with himself and his government, all those working for the government shall have to work some more hours. Now, I do not want to turn anyone into a galley slave, but at the same time I think that the plain people of this country who are bearing the burdens—for after all it comes down to them, no matter through how many degrees you finally reach them—expect something else at the capital than an exhibition of a waste of time and of funds.

I am in hearty sympathy with every word of the resolution of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw), not because it is an attack on the government, but because I believe it contains a great deal of common sense that needs to be taught and emphasized in this country at the present time. I am sorry it is mixed up as an addition to the amendment of the member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey). Personally, I am in favour of and shall vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary, with the distinct understanding that I do not thereby commit myself, if it should carry, to vote for the amendment of the member for Springfield, with the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary incorporated in it. This part of the House does not stultify itself: we do not vote for free trade when we are standing under the flag of protection. But we will vote to emphasize the necessity for economy in the public administration, and we believe that the hon. member for Calgary is doing the country a good service, apart from all politics, when he brings his amendment to the attention of this House. It seems strange, however, that it should be necessary to have either the amendment or the sub-amendment. It seems strange in view of the declaration of policy of the Liberal party. It seems strange in view of the fact that men in public life are supposed to have some regard for the spoken as well as for the written word, and that a pledge is supposed to be binding. Honour is not supposed to depart from a man merely because of his entering into the political arena; and if faith had been kept, if honour, instead of the love and the lust for power, had been the dominating factor in the mind of the government, there should have been no need, there should have been no opportunity, for my hon. friend for Springfield to have cursed the barren fig tree, nor for my hon. friend from Calgary to have pleaded for a government which, without being parsimonious, would be decently economical.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to several very interesting speeches during the course of this debate, none more so perhaps than the carefully prepared address of the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) delivered this afternoon, with the main parts of which I agree, especially those passages relating to agriculture.

The Speech from the Throne strikes an optimistic note, but the improvement in our economic condition there noted is due entirely to the increased production and export of agricultural products, and if this year does not bless us with good crops—for which the Speech from the Throne has a prayer—we may find ourselves in a worse position than last year. It is surely plain to all concerned that agriculture is the basis of our national prosperity, and were it not for the many handicaps and unjust burdens placed upon that one basic industry, it would not be long before all classes would again experience increased prosperity. But despite the fact, acknowledged in the Speech from the Throne, that agriculture is in a depressed condition, no government has tightened the screws to such an extent as has the present administration during the past year. Nothing has been done to dispel the doubt and uncertainty in the minds of our agriculturists except in one single instance, the lowering of the freight rates in the West, which has been more than offset by the machinations of a combine among the lake shipping companies. In fact, Sir, I think nothing has been left undone in the way of unjust laws to more completely than ever before deliver our workers over to those who enjoy the privilege of filching the earnings from their pockets.

As to the tariff system, I say it is a system of legalized robbery, more true to-day perhaps than ever before, and is responsible for the stagnation of agriculture and the driving out of the country of thousands of our best farmers. And the shortsighted policy of those privileged people for whose benefit the tariff was instituted has finally shut off their own home market. In last year's Speech from the Throne a promise was made to deal with this system of trade restriction, and the hopes of every Progressive member were raised in the belief that the Liberal party intended to be true to its own platform and principles, which every one of my colleagues was prepared to help the government put into effect. But the subject is not mentioned in the present Speech, which I take to mean that in the opinion of the government and their supporters the tariff, as it now stands, is as perfect as it can be made.

We are promised this session a bill to safeguard the interests of consumers and producers from the undue enhancement of prices or unfair restriction of trade by combines, mergers, trusts and monopolies. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that somehow I have failed to become enthusiastic over the foreshadowing of such legislation, seeing that the government by one amendment to the tariff act last session completely delivered every consumer and producer over to the tender mercies of a skilfully organized minority, composed of these very combines, trusts, mergers and monopolies which are now threatened to be controlled. In fact, I do not think there is a member in this House so gullible—not even a Progressive—as to believe that the present government can by any further legislation control the machinations of these trusts, mergers, combines and monopolies. Since the session of 1909-10, when the right hon. Prime Minister, then Minister of Labour in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's cabinet, introduced a bill for this purpose, which was duly enacted, we have seen that legislation fail in its object; indeed, that very same year the Grocers' Guild and other combines openly laughed at and defied the law, and from that time forward such organizations have, according to their interpretation of the statute, evaded its provisions in a perfectly legal way. What this country suffers from at the present time is the iniquitous system of the distribution of goods which is a product of protection which makes the cost of everything we need out of line with the prices of what we produce.

In defiance of any anti-combine bill there was then forged the last link in a perfect chain of combines which, so far as the consumers of this country are concerned, encircles the whole Dominion, and still remains unbroken. It is not new legislation that we need to control combinations that are restricting trade and preventing competition and legitimate enterprise, but the elimination of the legislation now on our statute books that is responsible for these very combines and mergers formed to restrain trade and unduly enhance the price of everything that we need to eat or wear. It is not possible to enact any new legislation to achieve that end that would not be simply a joke on our statute books. It would be a travesty on the intelligence of the electors of this country to tell them that we were, by a new act of legislation, going to control the profiteers and at the same time leave untouched the very legislation which has given them that power, and under which they are so completely organized for their vicious work of exploitation. They have been aided rather than repressed, in this, I know, by a succession of governments for many years.

I think the intentions of the present Liberal government in this respect are plainly seen in an amendment to the Customs Act artfully put through parliament in the closing days of last session—an amendment of which even the Minister of Customs himself declared he did not know how far-reaching the effects would be. It was an amendment that entirely destroyed the right of the purchaser to have the goods valued at the actual cost plus a reasonable profit, and substituted a valuation dictated by the minister or by the producer of such goods in Canada—goods which are already enhanced in price by a protective tariff, and which pass through the hands of several combines, mergers, and trusts, operating defiantly in restraint of trade. Surely that is a fine basis for valuation, from the profiteer's point of view. It is an amendment that destroys entirely the whole tariff schedule as it stands as to rates of duties to be levied, and places the power of valuation entirely in the hands of the Minister of Customs or others who may be interested in the very line of goods he is called upon to value. In my opinion it is an amendment that is aimed directly at the trade activities of the co-operative companies, of agricultural and city workers, in their endeavours to keep down the cost of production on the farms and the cost of living in the cities, to a figure commensurate with world prices and the lower trend of wages. It is an amendement that at one stroke forms into one great combine every manufacturing and distributing concern in the country. The anti-dumping clause as it stands, puts the trade of the whole Dominion on the basis of the company-store system, and divorces the worker entirely from any interest he should have in the country. I think it certainly establishes a man's right to rebel. And all this by the Liberal party with a free trade plank in their platform!

Only a short time ago I heard one of the most prominent Liberals in our province declare that Liberalism stood for liberty, and even the Premier himself declared that the platform of the Liberal party was exactly the same as the platform of the Progressive party, that Liberalism, in fact, stood for progress. Yet this party of liberty and progress has closed up the last gap of liberty that the consumers of this country had left open to them. What pressure was brought to bear between the date of the budget speech, May 23, when the Finance Minister declared that this clause was to be left out as it was an unnecessary interference with trade, and June 22nd, when it was revived by the Minister of Customs? I do not know; but it must have been something worth while that could turn practically the whole Liberal party at one stroke into a body more Tory in its actions than even the Conservative party itself, and quite as amenable to the same influences that dictated that measure in the first place. Outside of the explanation given by the Minister of Customs at that time, no argument was made in behalf of that clause, except a statement by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), who reminded the right hon. leader of the Opposition that they had slaughtered him anyway.

The Tariff Act as it stands is perhaps the most vicious piece of legislation that has ever stood on the statute books of any country in modern times. I question if there is anything quite so complete of its kind anywhere else in the world. As it stands it has closed up the trade activities of one of our largest co-operative companies, and an attempt was made this year to bring the United Farmers of Ontario under its deadly ban. Is this the kind of Liberalism that the Progressive party is invited to join? It is true that two who were with us last year are with us no more, but are now sitting on the other side. I have no word of reproach for these men, but rather pity, and it is indeed pitiful to think that they have failed to grasp the ideal underlying the formation of the Progressive movement. It is pitiful that after being elected to support Progressive principles, and after sitting for one whole session with us here and in our caucus, they should have failed to realize their obligations to their constituents. They must present a pitiful spectacle to those who elected them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. EVANS: Since they have failed to realize their obligations to their electors, and failed to realize the principles on which they were elected, it is well that they have changed sides. They will be more at home over there. I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, a political party apart from a group of men who have gathered themselves around a set of principles so that, acting together, they might propagate and put those principles into practice. Whatever party is in power there are certain attributes of government that ought not to be overlooked. These are four in number—justice, legality, publicity, liberty. Justice denotes that no citizen or class shall usurp power prejudicial to the interests of any other citizen or class. Legality implies that every enactment shall have the sanction of law. It is hard to think that in these enlightened times in this country, any measure should be made legal without any regard for justice or liberty. Liberty implies that every citizen should have the privilege of asserting his individuality, for his own or his fellows' welfare, in any way which is not prejudicial to the rights of others. Yet the Tariff Act, with the amendment before mentioned, actually deprives one class of its right as citizens, and gives another class the right by law to exploit them. Under legislation of this kind we cannot wonder that the cost of living does not fall with the cost of farm produce or natural products. To-day there is actually no relation between the price of raw material and that of the finished article in the case of anything produced in Canada. Take for instance hides with harness, wool with clothing and blankets, wheat with flour and bread. They have actually no relation in price one to the other. I was in England last summer and stayed a few days at Ealing, one of the suburbs of London. I saw there a four pound loaf actually distributed at the homes of the people for eight pence half penny. That is sixty-four ounces of bread for seventeen cents. To-day in cities in western Canada we are paying seventeen cents for forty ounces of bread, or twenty-four ounces less for the same price. And speaking of flour, Sir, a gentleman who was asked last year to head the wheat board refused to do so for the reason that the control of flour was not given in the legislation creating the board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman say who that was? I do not wish to press him for the information if he would rather not give it.

Mr. EVANS: I would rather not say. However, he gave the reason I have mentioned, I can vouch for that. Now, we grant our millers an advantage of 60 cents per barrel protection on flour. Under this protection they enjoy a monopoly of the home market, while their large export trade is carried on in competition with millers in all other countries in Europe; and they can cut prices whenever they choose in foreign countries, depending on the profits they filch from the home consumer to recoup them. Not only this, but we producers in Canada who find our market in foreign countries, where our prices are made, have to meet this competition at the other end as well. Any time they choose our millers can lower the price of flour in competition with our wheat on the British market, and so set the basis for procuring their supplies of wheat at home. It is not fair, it is unjust. But the whole tariff system is a one-sided, vicious piece of legislation, with everything free for one class, while the other class is by law exploited. Even were it the ideal state of affairs to make Canada a manufacturing country, one would think that this could best be attained by reducing the cost of living and thereby lessening the cost of production. It is this class privilege, which stands on our statute books to-day, which is fast depopulating the farms of Canada. And in saying that I am not speaking for the West in particular. Colonel Dennis, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, is responsible for the statement that last spring 5,000 farms in old Ontario which ought to be producing were vacant. Another fact. Nearly half a million dollars worth of mortgages were thrown back on the hands of one company operating from Saskatoon last fall, and the superintendent told me himself that over 90 per cent of these farms are abandoned.

Perhaps that is not the worst feature of it after all. There is a bitterness caused by these conditions. The bitterness which exists amongst the agriculturists of Canada to-day is not born of hard times caused by world conditions and bad crops, but to the fact that anything the farmer has to sell is out of line with world prices, and that owing to artificially made conditions at home due to class privilege the price of everything he has to buy is enhanced. Now the farmer is willing to take his hard luck as well as any man, but he will not forever make fortunes for others, for skilfully organized minorities who are able to get legislation through this House to suit themselves and are placed in a position to exploit the masses to pay for it. Our cabinet ministers can traverse the whole world making treaties of trade with foreign countries, and by one amendment take away the inalienable rights of the people to buy and sell where they can to the best advantage.

The dissatisfaction with our economic system is not peculiar to the West. I will now come to that wonderful province by the sea of which the member for Hants (Mr. Martell) spoke the other day as being so prosperous. The Solicitor General for Nova Scotia on the 18th January last year, when speaking before the Halifax Board of Trade, declared that the relations between the Maritime provinces and the rest of Canada would become so weakened that dissatisfaction with confederation would become general, and would lead to serious results. I think it will be admitted that the Solicitor General for Nova Scotia knows as much about that province as the hon. member for Hants.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman is referring to me I would say that I would have liked to have had the honour of addressing the Halifax Board of Trade but I never did.

Mr. MARTELL: Like all the hon. member's complaints.

Mr. EVANS: My mistake, I should have said Attorney General. I got this from one of the most reliable newspapers.

Mr. McKENZIE: I doubt its reliability.

Mr. EVANS: I did not know the hon. member was Solicitor General for Nova Scotia. In parts of the Maritime provinces to-day there is tremendous unrest, and in the West many are asking the question: "What good is Confederation to us?" I want to warn the government now that this feeling will not down until we have the complete elimination of class legislation and class privilege.

Mr. McBRIDE: Will the hon. member explain, when he says there is a combine in the fruit industry of British Columbia, how it is, when we are selling fruit for 75 cents a box, the Grain Growers at Battleford are charging 60 cents a box for handling the apples?

Mr. EVANS: That statement has occasioned considerable laughter, but he laughs best who laughs last. I have for many years been connected with the particular concern he has accused of profiteering. I have been connected for years with an association which has handled British Columbia apples. We have handled all the way from three to seven hundred cars of apples in one season, and never once did we charge 60 cents a box, or the half of it, for handling apples.

Mr. McBRIDE: I have a letter here in my hand from that company which states that that is the profit made.

Mr. EVANS: No grain growers' association in any province has ever charged 60 cents a box for handling apples.

Mr. McBRIDE: Have I the privilege of reading this letter?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes, yes, read it.

Mr. EVANS: I have said that this feeling of bitterness will not down until the complete elimination of class legislation and class privilege is accomplished. How far the advocates of trade penalties in this House will deem it safe to obey the dictates of skilfully organized self-seeking minorities is for them to determine. I can only hope that the present class legislation will not be carried on to such an extent that it will further endanger the unity of this country, separating, as it does, different classes and different geographical areas and vocations. Certain parts of the Dominion are better adapted than others for particular products. These different areas are actually separated, one from the other, by a system of class privilege, which has prevented the people from thinking along national lines. They say Canada is a hard country to govern. It is only hard in proportion as class legislation has made a cleavage between the different areas. Perhaps one of the finest acts of statesmanship in Europe in the nineteenth century was the unity of Italy. This was brought about by placing all parts, north and south, and all classes, on an equal basis. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it will be an act worthy of the greatest statesman to so place this country on an equitable basis for all. We are inevitably driven to a decision of this kind. We must arrange some sort of an agreement for the different classes in the different geographical areas, if we are going to live together in this Dominion. An economic system must be found on which freedom can be built.

The Speech from the Throne mentions the lifting of the British embargo on our cattle. This is one place surely where our government will take a broad view of things, and, with the Government Merchant Marine, create some competition for our steamship lines operating on the Atlantic; so that the lifting of the embargo may be of some use to us. It still costs over $51 to land an animal from Saskatoon in Liverpool. I think it must be plain to all that as things stand the removal of the embargo to-day is of very little use to us. It is surely reasonable to expect that, with the greatest railroad system in the world, and a Merchant Marine in connection with it, freight and transportation rates will be such as will allow the commerce of the country to move freely over these lines, whether it be the potatoes of New Brunswick or the grain of the West. The needs of the producer surely should be considered first. If agriculture is choked to death—and it is already gasping—what will our railroads and steamships do for an income? In fact it will take many years to again reach the point we had once attained in agriculture and in the production of all things, particularly live stock. However much our highly protected industrial magnates may emphasize the surpassing importance of the home market, and be able to embody their will in the statutes of this Dominion, they must surely realize how vitally essential it is that a prosperous foreign trade in agricultural products must be carried on, and to this end I say that agriculture must be encouraged and every incubus that prevents its growth, and, since the produce of our farms is sold in competition with the produce of all other countries, every undue charge that puts the cost of production out of line with the world's prices must be removed. The handicap of freight rates, of which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) complained so bitterly this afternoon, is also a product of class legislation in our trade penalty system, and it is unfair to expect the wage earner to accept the remuneration for his services altogether out of relation to the price of what he has to buy.

I desire to reply to a few of the statements made by different members of this House before I close. The hon. member from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) said that one in every twelve persons in Saskatchewan owned an automobile, and he made this statement as evidence of great accumulation of wealth on the farms there, and that the farmer was living in ease and luxury. If the hon. member knew anything of western conditions he would know that a car is a necessity on the farm. He also spoke as though all the people in Saskatchewan were farmers, and forgets that we have fairly good sized towns and cities in that province. Quite two-thirds of all the cars are owned by urban dwellers, and after all, it is only the small cars of the most inexpensive kind that are owned by the farmers. My hon. friend does not know either, and he did not tell us how many of these cars are not paid for. An automobile firm that I knew, not operating in my constituency, but which I was friendly with, after having $80,000 out, was able this fall to collect only $300. My hon. friend says that we have spent $16,000,000 on road improvements in one year. Most of the work is done in our province by the farmers themselves, working their own taxes out, and when you divide $16,000,000 amongst 125,000 farmers, that amounts to only $128 apiece. To make such glaring statements without any qualification is not an honest argument, to say the least. My hon. friend says that the farmers around Winnipeg are prosperous. He does not know that, and he can bring no proof to show it. It would be a wonder if a few dairy farmers around a big city would not be fairly well off; but I know Saskatchewan better.

The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) stated that because we had the Crowsnest pass agreement again in force, the East lost $15,000,000, or one-half of what the West would have gained by the saving in freight rates. Does he mean to say that the price now charged for that service does not cover the cost, or what? Does he mean to say that the rates as fixed by the commission, after the suspension of that agreement, should still be in force? Why? I can tell this House that the hauling of grain is yet the most remunerative work of any that the railways are engaged in, and a glance at their net earnings during the months that the grain is chiefly moving will convince anyone of that fact. Do we in the West not bear our share of the national debt? One would think, since coming here to this session, that some of our eastern members, such as the hon. member for Lunenburg and the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell) in particular, seems to think that Canada owns a strip of territory somewhere between the Great Lakes and the mountains. I want to tell these gentlemen that we are in Canada when we are up there, and we are bearing our share of the national debt as much as they are. The East, as the East, has not sacrificed anything for the building up of western Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EVANS: That makes some of our hon. members groan, but it is true, nevertheless. It is rather a big argument which I will not enter into now.

We heard a very excellent speech from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) the other day, and I certainly congratulate him on the strength and vigour that he showed in delivering that address. He appealed, at this time, not to create political chaos in this country. Even he does not realize the chaos that class privilege, with all its great penalties, is creating amongst the homes of this country. He was here in 1910 when we came 800 strong down to this city and filled this House in an endeavour to secure relief from these burdens. He is pleading for the party. We are pleading for the people. It is time at last that the rights of the people were respected, and the party must take care of itself. I will repeat, Sir, that I cannot understand a political party, apart from a group of men who have gathered themselves around a set of principles for propagating and putting into effect those principles. He says that no self-respecting government can accept such an amendment. That amendment was not made to embarrass the government; it was made in all good faith to show what we are after, what we believe in and what we want. But I ask, can a self-respecting people stand to be bandied about by false promises made by a succession of governments for many years, and say nothing? It is time that Canada was governed, not by one class with their eyes on their bank accounts, but in equity and righteousness for all classes, when sectionalism will disappear and confederation will yet become a true confederation and not merely a name, as it is at present.

Mr. FRED STORK (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speeches that have been made in this debate, and in the main, we have heard a great deal of complaint as regards conditions which obtain in various constituencies. Coming as I do from the far-off constituency of Skeena, which is bordered by the northern Pacific ocean on the west and by the Yukon Territory on the north, I would say, Sir, that the same disabilities and disadvantages which obtain throughout the Dominion of Canada and, in fact, throughout the entire world, are just as much in effect in Skeena as they are elsewhere. But I bring to you, Sir, I think, some little ray of hope, and some degree of sunshine in the brief report which I beg to convey to you from the constituency of Skeena. We are carrying on there, and I believe it is a tribute to any section to be able to maintain its industries and to carry on its progress and development in the face of such difficulties as are receiving such tremendous advertisement in this House. The constituency of Skeena is and has been a pioneer constituency ever since the day when the great pioneer, Alexander Mackenzie, within 300 miles of the city of Prince Rupert, painted on a rock at the mouth of the Bella Coola river where it falls into Burke channel "Alexander Mackenzie overland from Canada, July 22, 1793." Pioneer countries require some attention, and I have every sympathy with the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black) when he requests certain telegraphic communication in the Yukon Territory. Without prospectors there can be no mining industry. There can be no mining prosperity unless the prospector takes his pack on his back and hikes it into the hills. Without the rugged pioneer there can be no development and no building up of trade centres, and the pioneer, therefore, is entitled to some consideration. In that connection I would review very briefly some of the utilities which are of great importance in a pioneer country. In the first place, the pioneer expects that he shall have access to the centres of business. He must have methods of communication with the outside world. A great many years ago the Western Union Telegraph Company, in their endeavour to reach Europe by telegraph, prior to the laying of the Atlantic cable, tried to establish communication by way of Siberia. They started the construction of an overland line and got the work completed as far as the fourth cabin north of Hazelton. Repeated attempts had been made to lay the Atlantic cable, and at last, after the construction of that wonderful ship the Great Eastern, another attempt was made to lay the cable, and the transatlantic cable became an accomplished fact. The company therefore abandoned that overland line, and many years afterwards the right of way of that line as far as the fourth cabin north of Hazelton was utilized for telegraphic communication with the Yukon Territory when it was opened up. That line was completed some twenty-five years ago. Wireless was not even dreamed of as a possibility at that time. Had wireless been a commercial fact then, I am thoroughly satisfied that the overland line would not have been built. It was built, however, and to-day the upkeep of that line is a tremendous drain on the resources of this country. From Hazelton north to the Yukon there is one thousand miles of territory. This wilderness of a thousand miles is divided into stations twenty miles apart, each of which is manned by two men. The supplies that are needed for that telegraph line are largely carried on the backs of pack horses. Now, when you consider that the specifications in calling for tenders for those supplies stipulate that each package must not exceed a certain dimension and must be of a certain width so that it may be properly handled and be easily carried on the backs of these horses; that each parcel must be sewn in burlap and properly stencilled for the particular cabin for which it is destined; when you consider that the sugar and flour intended for these cabins must be packed in sacks each separately sewn in strong canvas, and when you take into consideration the value of canvas to-day—when you consider all these things you can easily appreciate the tremendous cost entailed in the upkeep of that overland service from Hazelton to Dawson city. I am told that in the interests of true economy this line cannot be kept up under something like three-quarters of a million dollars per year. I am fully satisfied that this line could be abandoned and a better service instituted if there were placed along the coast of British Columbia, at Stewart, at Alice Arm and at White Horse, wireless stations, the initial cost of which would not be greater than the cost of one year's upkeep of the present line. Such a system as I suggest would give the Yukon an uninterupted telegraphic service that could be kept in operation at all times and under all conditions of weather.

Among other things which a pioneer country requires are lights, buoys and aids to navigation. It was my privilege during the recess to visit Queen Charlotte Islands, and I was struck by the wonders of that country. I found in Queen Charlotte Islands a vast inland sea known as Masset Inlet, which to-day is just as dark as when Columbus discovered America. A great deal of development is in process there. The country around Queen Charlotte Islands is wonderfully rich in timber. A company is operating at Buckley bay and is doing a big business exporting lumber. It is highly essential that there should be placed in Masset Inlet some aids to navigation, for they are badly needed. But all pioneers are not clamouring to the government to have something done for them. I notice with a great deal of pleasure that some of the railroad employees along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific have organized a company of their own under the direction of Mr. Len Bell and Mr. George Biernes. They are true pioneers in every sense of the word. Believing that up-to-date methods are the order of the day, they have filled a tremendous want in that country by inaugurating a hydroplane service between Hazelton Head and Finlay river. The locality around Finlay river is very rich in minerals, and I have seen splendid samples of gold from that region. But it has been almost impossible to reach that country in the past, because the only means of transporation has been by pack train. The snow does not disappear from the trails until the middle of June or early in July, and the rivers being in flood it is difficult to ford the streams. It therefore takes six weeks by pack train to make the trip from the railway into the mining district. These people, however, have inaugurated a hydroplane service, and the trip that formerly took six weeks now occupies but two hours. They are so enterprising that at the present time,—they have taken the pontoons of the hydroplane, fitted them with skiis and will—beginning next week—make the trip over the snow. This hydroplane of theirs will carry 1,500 pounds of supplies, so that we can expect a great deal of development in that region. I am particularly interested in this matter because in that district are located the great coal deposits of the Groundhog country. There is an unlimited field of semi-anthracite coal that should prove a tremendous asset to western Canada. We have to-day, as it were, a river of money flowing out of Canada for the purchase of oil. Canada is not an oil-producing country, and we should make every effort to see that we burn just as little oil as possible and as much coal as we can in public utilities. We have steamboats plying on the Pacific and most of the railway trains are burning oil. This is not as it should be. Now, in developing our own coal mines we are only developing Canada. We are providing labour for our own people, providing a market for our own producers, and providing tonnage for our own railroads.

In this district of Skeena alone I am sure that the natural resources are of such a magnitude that they would be sufficient to discharge our national debt. In the mining locality of Stewart we have a gold mine known as the Premier, which in my opinion is the richest mine of its kind on the American continent. Last year it paid a dividend of three million dollars. In the same locality of Stewart there are a great many valuable mining properties; and the same can be said of Alice Arm, Anyox, and Surf Inlet. At Anyox one of the greatest industries of this country is in steady and continuous operation. The town of Smithers has blossomed out as a new mining centre, and excellent mines have been developed there. In far-off Atlin the miners are still carrying on the operations that have not ceased since the days of the early Klondike rush. At Telkwa we have coal mines, and at Ocean Falls there is located one of the greatest and best pulp and paper plants to be found anywhere in Canada; while a magnificent pulp mill is in operation at Swanson Bay.

The development of these resources is being carried on in spite of the difficulties confronting the country. In my own home town of Prince Rupert I am delighted to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that last year we produced and shipped 26,000,000 pounds of halibut. Eleven hundred refrigerator cars were required to convey it to the eastern market, and each car earned approximately $1,000. The fishing industry of the Maritime provinces was touched upon by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) yesterday, and the same disabilities that he complains of are also troubling our fishing industry in Prince Rupert. Recently the American tariff has imposed a duty of two cents a pound upon our halibut. This is not the time nor place to discuss this matter, but I hope that steps are being taken by the government to remove this disability.

Allow me to say a word to the western Progressives and the growers of grain on the prairies. Complaint has been made that the benefits which accrued from the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement have been largely nullified by the action of an alleged combine of shipping interests on the lakes. I would say to the grain growers of the West that I believe they have right now a remedy in their own hands to meet that handicap. If you will ship your grain through the port of Prince Rupert you will find that no combine exists there; you will find that you can ship your cars right on to the wharf instead of their being stopped twenty-five miles from tide water and transferred to another railroad; you will not have to pay tolls to cross any bridge; you will not be called upon to again transfer your cars to a third railroad and be subject to switching charges; and moreover there will be no danger of your wheat being mixed with inferior grades. We have heard something recently in regard to the adulteration of western wheat when it gets into New York city. Let me assure you that when your No. 1 hard is shipped from Prince Rupert it will still be No. 1 hard when it reaches the foreign market for which it is destined.

But you may ask: What port facilities have you got? We have at present the most up-to-date ocean-going freight warehouse on the Pacific coast. Not in Los Angeles, nor in San Francisco, nor in Seattle, nor in Vancouver is there such an up-to-date warehouse as we possess to-day. This warehouse is 800 feet long by 200 feet wide and is equipped with the most modern machinery. If your wheat is in sacks, we can handle it more expeditiously than any other port in Canada. If it is in bulk, our facilities can take just as good care of it as those of any other port in the Dominion. And the Canadian Government Merchant Marine would be glad of your business. Further, when your wheat is taken by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, or by any other shipping organization, you will not be subject to any pilotage charges from Prince Rupert, for there is no dangerous entrance to be navigated, and it follows that no high rate of insurance is charged. Let me add that if you give your business to the port of Prince Rupert, and if the present facilities be found inadequate, our northern people will see to it that adequate facilities are forthcoming. Allow me to quote an article from the Financial Post of January 29 last dealing with the same question:

> The Winnipeg Grain Exchange has ascertained from actual transactions in 1922 that the farmer can get twelve cents per bushel more by shipping his wheat through a Pacific port than by the Fort William and the Great Lakes route. This is on the basis of the present railway rate discrimination against the Pacific coast whereunder wheat is hauled 1,400 miles eastward for the same rate charged to haul wheat 700 miles westward. When the present discrimination is removed, the permanent advantage to the farmer will, it is said, be about sixteen cents a bushel, and the total gain to the farmers as a result of shipping by the Pacific coast reach $40,000,000 a year.
> Prince Rupert has been working for months on an elevator project, and business interests in that city believe that the government is likely to co-operate with them in this enterprise. The fact that Prince Rupert is the northern terminus of the Canadian National Railway (G.T.P.) and closer to the grain country of northern Alberta and Saskatchewan than the southern seaports of British Columbia is strongly in that city's favor, as well as the fact that the route between Prince Rupert and the Far East is considerably shorter than the route between Vancouver or Victoria and the Far East.

I think this will give our farmer friends some indication of the faith we have in the development of our northern port. We in Prince Rupert do not intend to see this port terminal of the Grand Trunk Pacific with all its advantages overlooked. This road was built for keeps, and we propose to keep it. We have a grade only four-tenths of one per cent, and at that we have compensated curvature. It was stated in the House yesterday that the Canadian Northern end of the Canadian National system in British Clumbia is the best part of the road. Well, I believe that the hon. member who made that assertion was conscientious and made it by reason of having some report placed in his hands; but that report to my way of thinking must have been prepared by a Canadian Northern official. On the face of it, it might appear as if the Canadian Northern end of the National Railways into Vancouver was all that the report claimed for it; however, I do not believe that that is the case. The Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific run over the same tracks from Edmonton as far west as Red Pass Junction. The Vancouver people take it upon themselves to term their portion the main line, and our portion a branch or stub line from the junction to Prince Rupert. They have not half as much right to term their portion the main line as we have to claim that distinction for our portion, for the reason that the Grand Trunk Pacific line into Prince Rupert is much better constructed than the Canadian Northern line ever was or ever can be.

We have been put to some disadvantage by these comparisons. On my way down here the porter of the car in which I was riding told me of an incident that happened on his previous trip. The train for the West is made up at Edmonton and includes a sleeper for Vancouver and another for Prince Rupert. This train is run through as far as Jasper, where it is split up, one part going to Vancouver and the other part to Prince Rupert. There were two travellers on the train going west on this particular occasion, one for Vancouver, and one for Prince Rupert, and both were placed in the Vancouver car. The Prince Rupert car was pulled empty as far as Jasper. When one of the travellers got his ticket at Edmonton, he was advised, "When you get to Jasper, transfer there, because the Prince Rupert car will be waiting for you," and when he arrived at Jasper he was transferred from the Vancouver car into the Prince Rupert car. Undoubtedly the reports will show that the traffic going into Vancouver received credit for that particular sleeping car accommodation from Edmonton as far as Jasper, when in reality it belonged to the business going into Prince Rupert. I am fairly satisfied that the freight traffic is handled in the same way.

When the Montreal Board of Trade paid our coast a visit last summer they came to Prince Rupert in sixteen heavy Pullman cars. One of the Grand Trunk officials was ordered to put two engines on that particular train, but he did not do so because in his judgment one engine was enough. I suppose he since may have been dismissed for his insubordination, but be that as it may that train of sixteen heavy Pullman cars was hauled by one engine from Prince Rupert right through to Winnipeg, and there is no other road on the North American continent that can equal that feat. If they had put on two engines, as the official was ordered to do, I suppose the statement would have been made that they had to use two engines. But no, they did not. One would have done it, and if one would have done it, why would they use two? That is the kind of game we have had played on us ever since the inauguration of the Grand Trunk Pacific. In the early days of the construction of the Canadian Northern railway, a train coming out of Vancouver was headed off by a slide in front and hemmed in by a slide in the rear, and for five days that train stood stalled on the track on the banks of the river. The outcome was that they had to sling a cable across the river and rescue the passengers. That is a deplorable accident that may happen on any road, but picture, if you can, the advertising it would have received if it had happened on the Grand Trunk Pacific. Why, every man, woman, and child in this Dominion would have heard about it, and would not have been permitted to forget it. They would have had moving pictures of it, showing the rescue of the passengers from the Grand Trunk Pacific.

I have spoken at much greater length than I intended. I simply wish to say in closing that the people of northern British Columbia are, many of them, carrying on their part in the face of adverse conditions and unfair freight rates, but they have faith in the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as expressed in the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and we hope and expect that that road will still come into its own.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, at the opening of my remarks, may I associate myself with those members who have spoken so many words of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Putnam) and the seconder (Mr. Rhéaume) of the Address. May I also associate myself with the expressions of condolence in respect of members who are now no longer with us, and with the words of welcome to our new brethren.

It was not my intention at all to weary the House with a speech on this Address, but the speech made the other day by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has made it necessary that I should trespass somewhat upon the time of the House.

I want first to say something else in the way of congratulation. I want to congratulate the House and the Minister of Finance upon the results of that trip of his overseas. He has come back to us in great shape. He is in splendid form, and is looking ever so much better than when he went away. We are all very happy to see him looking so well, and to find him so vigorous. I think we are all at one in that respect. I only wish, Mr. Speaker, that I could say as much for the substance of the speech as I can say with all truthfulness of the speaker.

We have not from this side of the House done anything to prolong this debate. I think I am the third speaker from the official opposition. Nor indeed did our leader in opening the debate enter the field of—what shall we call it?—the field which might be reserved for very contentious political matters. Why, he was so mild and so quiet that the Prime Minister congratulated him upon his utterances, and said how pleased he was to be able to agree with so very much that the leader of the Opposition had said. Then a change took place. Amendments were made to the Address. Something had to be done to revive the party spirit, and the government called to their assistance that gentleman above all others who was most capable of performing that very necessary function: and he did it well. They called to their assistance that member of the government who was the most likely to command the respect of my friends to my left, to whom his appeals were really directed. Yes, and for the purpose of making those appeals more pointed, attacks were made upon the leader of the Opposition growing out of his address.

I want to say in the first place, Mr. Speaker, that in every point taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition he was correct in his information. I want to say that just as bluntly and as plainly as I can. What did he say? He said that there was an increase in the debt. Is there any doubt about it? His figures were the figures of the hon. Minister of Finance. He also said that there had been more collected through customs taxation. Is there any doubt about it? The figures, again, are the figures of the hon. Minister of Finance. He also gave certain percentages. Again is there any doubt about his figures? The percentages are correct. It may well be that percentages do not amount to much. The taxpayer, after all, is not so much interested in percentages. But the fact is that a considerably greater sum of money has been taken from the people of the country for customs this year than was taken last year, and that is the gravamen of what the hon. leader of the Opposition said. It is quite true. It is also true that, over and above that, increases were made in the sales tax.

There is another thing. Although corrected by my hon. leader, the hon. Minister of Finance stuck to it that a direct charge had been made against him of floating money in the New York market, that that of itself was a crime, and he maintained that it was a charge, not simply a remark which had grown out of something said by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) during the election campaign. Let us have no doubt about this matter. During the speech of the Minister of Finance, as reported at page 99 of Hansard, the leader of the Opposition is thus reported:

> Mr. Meighen: The hon. member will do me the justice to say that I introduced that with reference to the speech made by the Minister of Justice, who stated that we owed the United States so much in 1921 that we were drifting towards annexation.

The following discussion then took place.

Mr. Fielding: No, my right hon. friend did not say that.

Mr. Meighen: Oh yes.

Mr. Fielding: I think I have what my right hon. friend said. What he may have had in the back of his head. I do not know, but what appears on Hansard is the simple statement that we were increasing our obligations and increasing our obligations to the United States. That was our great offence.

Mr. Meighen: I referred to the speech of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fielding: My right hon. friend, in the speech to which I am replying, to the best of my knowledge, made no allusion to the Minister of Justice.

With the consent of the House I propose to read exactly what was said by the leader of the opposition, and I quote from page 21 of Hansard:

In that speech—

Referring to the Speech from the Throne of last year—

—the government which had described our national condition as perilous, as bringing forbodings into the minds of masters of finance, in the words of the present Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), as making even rich men uail with fear, as indeed making patriotic men dread the day when, because of our obligations to the Republic to the south, we would drift into annexation.

Again, I say, Mr. Speaker, that there was not a single thing said by the leader of the Opposition which was not literally and accurately true.

Why, we had another issue, Sir. The leader of the Opposition stated that as a result of this sales tax everybody that bought the necessities of life contributed to that tax, and a list of food stuffs and other things was read by the Minister of Finance as showing that there are exemptions to that tax and therefore everybody did not pay. He put emphasis upon the "all" and upon the "everybody". The emphasis is put entirely in the wrong place. The leader of the Opposition did not say that the purchase of every necessity, of all necessities, was accompanied by the tax—not at all. We have practically exempted food stuffs, food in its raw condition, products of the mine, and products of the forest. I wonder if the minister will say now that a pair of boots is not a necessity of life.

Mr. FIELDING: Does my hon. friend wish me to answer?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend thought it was a necessity of life why did he not include it in his list of exemptions?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am very much gratified at the answer. We have never pretended that all the necessities of life were exempt from that tax, we knew they were not. We were honest about it—they are not exempt. What we did do was to exempt the articles of primary production. We were not exempting manufactured articles, we were not exempting the articles which had been advanced to a high state of manufacture and value, whether it be food, whether it be clothing, whether it be anything else.

I would like to put another question to my hon. friend. He evidently has another idea of the sales tax. His idea evidently is that the necessities of life are exempt. He added somewhat to those necessities of life—not very much, and they were never described as the necessities of life but he added somewhat to them. If he considers boots as necessities of life why did he not exempt them? I think, perhaps that question also deserves an answer. However, I will not press it. The thing is so perfectly ridiculous. The leader of the Opposition did not say that all the necessities of life are subject to a tax, but he did say that those who bought them paid a tax; and in this climate of ours are not boots, clothing and the like, necessities of life? I am inclined to think that what the Minister of Finance said as to my leader, in connection with some of his statements, should be applied here: I fancy he was so anxious to get his message to the Progressives, so anxious to sound that note of warning, so anxious to get up some avenue which would entirely disassociate him and his party from this iniquitous group here, that after all he did not waste very much time considering just exactly what was being said.

Another thing. The Minister of Finance talked about the tremendous additions to our New York indebtedness. I agree with some of the things my hon. friend said. I agree with him that we cannot do everything ourselves, I agree with him that sometimes we have to go out of the country in order to meet our demand. Yet I think, again, that he will agree with me that to the greatest possible extent practicable Canada's loans ought to be held in Canada. But to return for one minute to the tremendous burden of this country's obligations in the New York market. My hon. friend last year brought down the public accounts and I am going to quote from appendix No. 3, on page 56 of that blue book, and I am going to give the House the position of our New York loans at that time. We had two different sets of loans in New York then—I am speaking of this country's obligations and our own loans. The first are loans bearing 5 per cent, and the second loans bearing 5½ per cent issued at a time when money was dear. We had, roughly speaking, I do not give the old amounts, 50 millions on the New York market of 5 per cent money; we had 60 millions on the New York market of 5½ per cent money; we had in all 110 millions of direct obligations on the New York market. That is the showing made by the Public Accounts for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly wonderful, absolutely remarkable, to see the Minister of Justice sitting there calm and composed to-day. Where is that dread of annexation that possessed him? The rich are no longer quaking. Patriotic men now are sleeping. The extraordinary thing about it is that the Minister of Justice sits there, calm, quiet and undisturbed, although in the short time of one year there has been a direct increase of Canada's obligations in the New York markets of 90 per cent.

Well, there was another thing said, and that is what my right hon. leader stated about the debt. These figures are true; they are the government's figures, they are the exact figures and, therefore, they are true, so far as we know. We accept government figures, but while that is so, the hon. Minister of Finance says, "Oh, if it had not been for these awful railways we would have had a surplus of thirty to forty million dollars". I think, to be frank, he would have had more than that. I am amazed that he is not going to have a very much larger surplus. What was the taxation in the past compared with the taxation to-day? We have had government newspapers talking about the wonderful way in which revenues are kept up. Well, they have been kept up. Where has the money gone? In the last year which has just closed, in which we had very marked deflation, a year of tumbling prices and restricted credits, we nevertheless had a surplus, as reported by my hon. friend in the same accounts of 1922, of thirty-four and a half million dollars, without asking all the people of the country to lick stamps pretty nearly every time they turned around. We had a thirty-four and a half million dollar surplus without the 50 per cent increase in the sales tax. I am amazed that my hon. friend does not give a very much larger figure than the one he has given. Let us go back and take my hon. friend's basis which he says will give him a surplus of from thirty to forty million. On the same basis in the year 1919, I learn from the accounts, there was a surplus of eighty million dollars, at a time when we were attacked right and left by gentlemen now sitting on the other side of the House who at that time were on this side. The figures that year showed a surplus of eighty million dollars. In the year 1920, on the same basis, the surplus was forty-five million, nine hundred thousand, in the year 1921 the surplus was fifty-eight million, and I have already given you the surplus of 1922 on the same basis, which was thirty-four and a half million.

Then I take another statement that my hon. friend has made. Of course there is an addition to the debt—no getting away from that. But my hon. friend asks: "What is that compared to your additions to the debt?" I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if really at the present time it would not have been somewhat better if the non-partisan attitude of the leader of the Opposition in his address could not have been maintained. Is it really a question of what past deficits were? Is it really a question as to how the money was spent in the past, here, there and everywhere? Is the wrong of to-day right because we had a wrong last year or the year before? Would it not have been better, if recognizing the condition of affairs, recognizing the condition of the country, we were at liberty to forget all party differences, forgetting what has been done in the past and addressing ourselves to a really wise consideration as to how matters to-day can be mended. But, as I said these remarks call for replies. My hon. friend said "why look at the increase in the debt of 1921 and the increase in the debt of 1922." Well, of course, there were increases then; there were very heavy increases. There was not so much said about the size of those increases then as is said now.

But there is another story. Let us again see what is troubling my hon. friend to-day. It is the railways. Why he thinks he may have to spend as much as sixty-seven millions on the railways this year. Well, he has the railways to-day—lines that are functioning. He has them in such a condition that trains stay on the track. He has the deferred maintenance all caught up. He no longer has to think about the rehabilitation of lines of rusty metal. Something has been said to-day about equipment. Why, in the old days when we took those lines over there was every need for equipment. The locomotives were not there to any great extent and the freight cars were practically not there at all. While it is perfectly true that hon. members can in any country—I do not care how big the supply of cars is—at certain times find a car shortage, it is also true that in this very year there were locomotives greased up and laid aside, and cars parked by the hundreds simply because there was no work for them.

If equipment is to be bought to-day, it is nothing compared to the necessities for equipment in the days that have gone by. Why, when we took that road over, even taking one of the best lines, say the line between Toronto and Ottawa, not only could the trains not make their time, but trains went off the track. I myself have been in a wreck on that line. There was an immense amount of work to do. The line practically had to be rebuilt. What is it to-day? How is the bulk of the business between Toronto and Ottawa going to-day? Why, by the Canadian National road, by the best equipped, the safest and best graded line. That is where it is going, that work has been done, and that was carried out by this country, and carried out, through the operation of the public accounts.

Let us go back and see what was done in those two years my hon. friend refers to. He points to an increase of debt in 1921 of ninety-two million and he is absolutely right. There was that increase, and it was a very very bad thing we had to have it—a most regrettable thing. But as against the $67,000,000 that my hon. friend now talks about, the special payments in that year, over and above consolidated fund expenditures, amounted to $150,000,000. Yet to-day, with taxation doubled and multiplied, there is difficulty with this $67,000,000. Next year the deficit was not quite so bad, but it was too bad altogether. The increase in debt in 1922 amounted to $81,000,000, and again, if we go back to my hon. friend's basis, dealing with these extraordinary payments, payments made that year, outside of consolidated fund expenditures, amounted to $115,000,000, as against the $67,000,000 that my hon. friend refers to. Why, Mr. Speaker, the work has largely been done. I am frankly surprised and amazed when I hear from my hon. friend that he expects, in the next year, that the railways will cost this country $67,000,000. They ought not to cost anything like that sum. I do not know what the present directors fear; I do not know what the present organization are afraid of, what benumbing influences they have been subjected to; but I know this, that with the improved facilities which they now have, with the business worked up as it has been, subject, of course, to this most regrettable delay that has taken place and the consequent disorganization, if the betterments shown in the past two years of $20,000,000 and $16,000,000 are maintained, if the ordinary downward curve is followed on deficits and if the ordinary upward curve of business is followed, we ought to have but very little deficit on the railways next year.

In order, however, that that may be the case, the railways must be left in the position in which these hon. gentlemen got them. I am a great deal puzzled by this whole question. I want to believe that everyone is acting in good faith. I want to believe that we are getting to a point in Canada when party objects, party aims, party desires, are much smaller than the general weal of this country. I would love to be able to think that, but I confess I am wholly puzzled. On the one hand, Sir Henry Thornton tells us that politics has absolutely nothing to do with the line; that it is entirely free of political influence. He has made that statement often, and the newspapers describe how at the minute of making this declaration, Sir Henry Thornton would stiffen his chin and stick out his chest. He has a first-rate stiff chin and a grand chest, but I hope they will stay stuck out as described. I am, however frankly puzzled. I was very much interested in a speech made by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), when he was addressing, I think, the Ladies' Club in Montreal. Perhaps it was the Gentlemen's Club, but my recollection is that it was the Ladies' Club.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. member is quite right. It was the Ladies' Club.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He touched on the question of the railways and he was rather mournful about them; but one thing he said was: "We have a new board and they are all Grits." And he said: "If Grits cannot do the impossible, no one can." Of course, that is a difficult thing to do. The Prime Minister says: "These railways are going to be kept out of politics," and so as to keep them out of politics, so that there can never be any political discussion around the railway board, he sees to it that the directors are all Grits. Consequently, this puzzles me a little, but I am much more puzzled at what the Minister of Finance says. He says frankly: "The railways are in politics." If the idea be that the railways are to be in politics, had we not all better stop and do a little thinking? In the other board, they were not; there were Liberals and Conservatives on the other board.

Mr. JACOBS: Unionists.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend may say "Unionists." Is there anything particularly bad in being a Unionist? But there certainly was no politics in the former administration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hon. gentlemen laugh and hon. gentlemen sneer. It is very easy to do that. They have had a good opportunity of going over this whole question since they came into power. Mr. Speaker, do you think if anything wrong had been found out we would not have heard about it? There was no political interference, and I challenge any evidence apart from a laugh or sneer.

Mr. CANNON: Sir Joseph Flavelle was no politician.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, I have my hon. friend's statement to that effect, and I think everybody will agree that Sir Joseph Flavelle was no politician. We are getting confirmation every minute. As I say, there was no politics, at least that I knew about, in connection with the railways, and if there is to be politics, we should stop and do a little bit of thinking. Can we afford to own a glorified Intercolonial of 22,000 miles, with passes everywhere and anywhere, with deficits always and eternal, very often hidden as, I admit, it is so easy to hide these things. You know, one way in which you hide your deficits instead of reporting them, as has been done by the dismissed directorate, is to add to the capital cost of your road. You just pass it to capital. I remember one time when the capital cost of the Intercolonial was $24,000 a mile, and under the wonderful political management, in some way or another, it reaches something like $70,000 or $72,000 a mile. Who is right? Is Sir Henry Thornton right, or is he wrong? Nothing, whatever, has been said about the former management. I do not know of any charge the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) now wants to make against the former president. If he wants to make any, he has not made it yet.

I am reminded how one of the gentlemen who was approached in connection with the presidency, reported his conversation. It is well known that eminent railroaders were offered that position, and the government, determined on getting rid of Mr. Hanna, went originally to the right place. They went looking for a gentleman who understood the transcontinental business; they went to Chicago. And this is how the conversation is reported to have gone. After the proposition had been made, this gentleman said: "I used to know Hanna; he was a pretty good railroader. He was competent. Is he incompetent now?" Well, there was no evidence of any incompetence adduced and the admission was made that so far as it was known he was competent. "Well," continued the gentleman, "he used to work pretty well. Is he on the job now or is he beating the clock?" And again, so far as was known there was no charge of any lack of diligence. "Well, he used to be honest. Is he honest now, or has he been taking moneys of the system?" And again there was no charge; on the contrary there was absolutely no evidence of anything like that. "Well," said this gentleman again, "just let us see how the situation stands. Here you are, offering me a position from which you now discharge a man whom you describe to be competent, diligent and honest. What the dickens do you want to hire me for?" Now, Mr. Speaker, if there was any real reason for Mr. Hanna's dismissal we should have known it before now. The reason there was none; it was just the result of hectic politics from one end of the business to the other. There was also the idea on the part of some gentlemen in the government that the man who knew something about this system, the man who had started to develop it and turn deficits towards profits was the man who was likely to make it go and who was likely to make it impossible for pre-election pledges in certain parts of the country to be fulfilled.

My hon. friend referred to another thing. But before I go on, I am just reminded of something that shows how right the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is and how wrong Sir Henry Thornton is. We had an election the other day down in Lanark and this document I hold in my hand was circulated in that constituency:

> Vote for the Liberal candidate, and help to build up local industry.

A very praiseworthy sentiment.

> The W. R. Automatic Train Pipe Connector is manufactured by the Smith's Falls Malleable Iron Company and the Frost and Wood Company. The Canadian Government—

Oh, yes, is the government that runs the railways.

> —are testing out this device on a train between Montreal and Ottawa. It has given such satisfaction that they are about to place another order in Smith's Falls for the equipment of some passenger coaches for further experiment. If the W. R. Connector is the success which the railroad men claim it will be it means the building up of a great industry in the town of Smith's Falls. Vote for David Findlay, the candidate of Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and "Jim" Murdock.

The Prime Minister was there, Mr. Speaker, the man who tells us that these railways are to be left entirely out of politics. Yes, he was there and spoke in Smith's Falls after the circular had been doing its work for three days around the streets and wherever it could work. But you did not hear a word of reproach from the right hon. the Prime Minister. Besides him there was, as stated by the circular, in quotation marks, "Jim" Murdock, the Minister of Labour. Why, he was going around saying to all these fellows to whom this circular was distributed: "Oh, the government is running the railways; the government is conducting this test." There was no kick from him. Oh no. The election was not over. I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friends across the way have already been but too successful in launching this business into politics.

Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance speaks about the domestic loan. He does not like it. I do not blame
10 p.m. him for not liking it. Indeed, I should be surprised if he did like the refunding loan. It is quite true, as he says, that he offered good terms. He offered 5½ per cent and a month's interest. But then, having offered that, my hon. friend, I think, made a great mistake. He did not try to sell those bonds; he did not try to get the new subscriptions in the ordinary way of business. I do not know, of course, what occurred between him and the bond brokers, but I should think it very unlikely that my hon. friend approached the bond brokers and they refused to have anything to do with him and his business. I am sure they think more of him than that; I know I do. I should be glad to do anything for him myself except in a political way, and I am quite sure that the bond brokers would have liked to accommodate him. But, no; the ordinary, proper and approved methods of doing business are not followed. I am confident that in a large matter of this kind my hon. friend could have arranged for the taking up of the whole issue by the brokers on the basis of a quarter of one per cent. That is what they are handling business for just now. Rivalry is getting keen in the bond broking business and there is a very narrow margin in the business to-day. It used to be large, but to-day it is small, and I have no doubt my hon. friend could have made that arrangement. Of course, if he tells me that he offered them a quarter of one per cent and they declined his offer, I shall immediately accept his word and admit that he did everything in the matter. But I feel fairly confident that he will not say that. He does not like the loan. Well, the loan was $194,000,000, and we got rid of $12,000,000 through the former loan stabilization committee operations. If I remember rightly—my hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong—there was $182,000,000 to be refunded, and—again he will correct me if I am wrong—he managed to refund $110,000,000 of it. He does not like it, and he is quite right. Why, it is the first domestic loan in Canada that has ever been a failure. All the others have been oversubscribed.

Of course, my hon. friend does not like it, he prefers the New York market. Indeed, I think he prefers the New York broker too, because he sells to him at 97½, and to the public at 100—2½ per cent commission for what the newspapers said next day was two hours' work; and the whole loan was taken up. My hon. friend says it is very expensive to float a loan here—there is a lot of advertising to be done. Well, there are expenses in New York. I do not know what his expenses are here but I would like to give him the expenses of floating our war loans. Our 1915 loan of $100,000,000—just the same amount as he placed in New York—cost here ·425, less than ½ of 1 per cent as against 2½ per cent he paid in New York. The 1916 loan cost ·797; the loan of 1917 ·888; the Victory Loan of 1917, when we had the first big advertising campaign and raised a tremendous sum of money, cost 1·185—the first time you get over the decimal mark, Mr. Speaker; the loan of 1918 cost ·903. My hon. friend says that the impetus of war was on. Well, he is quite right, and there is no doubt that it was easier by reason of making appeals to our loyalty and the like to raise money then than is the case now. But the first taxable loan in Canada was floated more than a year after the war was over, in 1919, and we had subscriptions up to $638,000,000, and we accepted $607,000,000. The cost of that loan was only 1·061.

Now, my hon. friend points to other loans in the New York market. We did not like the New York market as well as he does; I admit that. We felt that we could do better at home, and we did do better. But I would ask my hon. friend if he is responsible for the low price of wheat. It is just as reasonable and just as sensible to say that this government to-day is responsible for the low price of wheat, as it is to say that the Union government in the days of the war was responsible for the high rate of interest in the New York market. Why, there is only one thing a trustee can do: discharge as best he can the job that is entrusted to him. That is all he can do, and if you are going to make comparisons, it is only fair to make them when they are of some use and cover the same relative period of time.

I thought I would not hear anything more about this loan business, and I still feel that my hon. friend did not look into the matter as carefully as he might have. Last year we discussed it and then I dealt with the issues by the British government which were made in New York relatively at the same time as our issues. I admit at once that that money cost a lot, in fact a great deal more than it ought to have cost. I wish I had had the fixing of the terms instead of the New York bankers. But we had to have the money. In connection with some of those loans that my hon. friend refers to—and they are railway loans—the moneys were not required in Canada, but mainly in the States and in Great Britain. On one of those loans, by making the issue at the right time and taking advantage of the condition of sterling exchange, we saved on capital account, if my memory is correct—the Department of Finance has the figures; I have not—we saved $16,000,000.

I refrain from again troubling hon. members with the details of these loans, but I want to say that we stand prepared to justify every single loan that we made, having regard to the conditions then obtaining, the price of money, and the commissions that other borrowers were paying. I go further. I assert, and I challenge my hon. friend to deny me, that Canada got better terms in the New York market at that time than did any other nation in the world. I assert also without fear of successful contradiction that Canada's loans were made on a more favourable basis than even were Great Britain's herself. This was all gone over in the course of last year's budget debate, and was never answered. Until these figures were flung at us here without any further substantiation, no attempt was made to answer my statements.

I am going to ask my hon. friend: Will he be content to have his New York loan judged upon the same basis as we are very well content to have ours judged? Great Britain paid bigger commissions than we ever paid; she paid 4.4 and then sold at a discount. It is not because she paid those tremendous commissions and interest during the war, and now is getting a very much lower rate of interest from the American government, that her financiers can be regarded as guilty of wrongdoing at that time. But that is exactly where the hon. gentleman wants to put us.

I give some illustrations of the commissions paid the very day that his $100,000,000 New York loan was issued. The government's issue cost them—you will see there is two and a half million dollars they do not get and on which they pay interest—something like 5.18 or 5.20. I have not the exact calculation before me, and I am quite content to take any corrected figure that my hon. friend gives me. This issue was heralded as a great financial feat, but that very day the Greater Winnipeg District sold bonds on the New York market at a rate of 5.1. The city of Des Moines, Iowa, sold its bonds at 4.2. But I want to be fair with my hon. friend; I am inclined to think that in connection with that particular issue there is a partial tax exemption. Either the day before or the day after the city of New York sold $45,000,000 of bonds to a syndicate, which took them over on a basis of 4.12. Again I want to be absolutely fair, Mr. Speaker. In connection with the New York bonds there are certain tax exemptions to the American bondholder. But that is not the point I am getting at. It does not matter so much what the price is where you have your tax exemption; I am referring to the question of commission at that time. One hundred million dollars of Canadian bonds were sold at a commission of 2½ per cent, and forty-five million dollars of New York bonds were disposed of on a basis of profit of .06 per cent. And yet these things are said to us. I only bring these things up because I am taunted with commissions of four and three per cent. I do not know whether these figures are right or not; I have not the figures; my hon. friend has. I do not go into them. I am quite sure my hon. friend did the best he could, but he did not get anything like what the market at that time afforded, having regard to other commissions paid. Why, everybody knows that the Americans to-day are suffering from a glut of gold. They want to get securities. But how difficult it was to get moneys at times when we sometimes had to get them.

Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House feel that the situation is grave. We feel that the one thing that ought to be done, here and everywhere, is to practise economy. I am perfectly aware that it is a difficult thing to do. It is an easy thing to talk about, but difficult to do, and I have much sympathy with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. It is a difficult thing for him to do, but he wanted the job, and he has got it, and he was going to economize before he got the job.

Take, again, the public accounts for last year. The Minister of Finance himself said that last year there had been a saving in expenditure of $12,500,000. Well, so far this year we practically have no saving at all. The consolidated fund payments this year down to January 31st amount to $263,000,000. Last year they amounted to $269,000,000. But just consider the expenditures which have dropped off by themselves. I shall not give them all, but shall mention only three, which are sufficient to account for that $6,000,000 reduction: Pensions, $3,046,574 less; Soldiers' land settlement, $354,987 less; Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, $2,945,429 less, or a total reduction of $6,346,990. If you add that amount to what is being spent, the expenditure this year is actually greater than the expenditure last year, and that from a government pledged to practise economy. Why, their expenditure is greater than ours, and we were economizing in a very difficult time, when there was unemployment, when you had shrinking of values, and disarranged conditions. The government now face better conditions in some cases, because they have denuded the country of the people who were troubling them. They are not worried because of unemployment now, because having done nothing for the unemployed, because, drifting as Canada has drifted for a year without the slightest idea of any fixed fiscal policy, so that no one could come in here with clean, new money and start the wheels of progress, the government has got rid of our people. You hear it said of all parts of Canada, of the West, of the East, and of the Maritime provinces. They are driving them out of Prince Edward Island, too, as the hon. member told us who spoke from that province this afternoon. Yes, the government have less troubles, and yet they are not economizing. Mr. Speaker, something ought to be done.

I just want to give another figure. It is not simply the cost of government, but costs everywhere have gone up so much that somebody has got to start something, and I think we are the people who will have to start it. I want to refer for a moment to railway operations. The increase in the cost of carrying on business in Canada by the railways constitutes to-day a greater burden than was placed on the railways by the war. Hon. gentlemen talk an awful lot about the war debt, but do they realize that the gross earnings from operations from Canadian railways in 1917 were $310,000,000, and in 1921 $458,000,000, or an increase of $147,000,000—more than the whole of our war interest. You have that increase on a business less in amount than we had in 1917, and on the other hand you have operating expenses growing up in a far greater degree. The increase in operating expenses is 89 per cent, as against 32 per cent gross earnings from operations.

Something, Mr. Speaker, certainly is necessary, and the thing that is necessary is economy, and we cannot too much stress it. So far as I am concerned, I propose to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw). It is at least one thing: it is a clear, direct call for economy. I am forced to vote for it after hearing the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance, who assures us that increases in the public debt are apt to be necessary. He thought so differently a year ago when he brought down his budget. Then he was not only going to stop deficits, but start doing something towards reducing the war debt. That is why we are licking so many stamps. That is why they put on the luxury tax, and why to-day we are being taxed in every conceivable way we can be taxed and still allow things to carry on. Notwithstanding all that taxation, he says the debt must go up. Under these circumstances I am forced to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary West. At the same time I intend to vote against the main amendment. Sir, we have too much unemployment, we have too much de-population to-day. I am reminded of the appeal sent out only two weeks ago by the Department of Agriculture in connection with the dairying business, in which it was pointed out that there were only two markets and that the real market for the whole of that industry was the home market, and it is shrinking, shrinking sadly. Mr. Speaker, we can stand no further shrinkage. We vote against the main amendment.

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, in order that I might not appear to be transgressing one of the rules of the House, I might perhaps be permitted to say that through the kindness and courtesy of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who has exchanged places with me, I am not in the place I previously occupied.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the wide range the debate has taken, and the many opinions that have been expressed by the various members—representing a territory stretching all the way from the Yukon to the Atlantic coast—as they have spoken, and I must say it has been very interesting to note the various views that have been given expression to. With the congratulations that have been extended to members entering the House for the first time, I would like to associate myself as well as with the compliments that have been passed, which I do not consider necessary to repeat at this time.

I was very much pleased to hear one hon. gentleman opposite in particular last night. He was giving us a very interesting story of a sale that took place in the West in which two teams of horses—such horses as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) would consider fine, I understand—sold for the sum of $35, and one second hand wagon sold for $90. I expected to hear that gentleman say that the wagon in question was made in Brantford because, Mr. Speaker, in Brantford are made the most durable farm wagons that are produced in this country. I do not think that there is a wagon of any other manufacture that could be used in the manner described and then be sold second hand for $90. I felt it was a compliment to my constituency, and I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman make the allusion. But I would have liked him to have gone on and stated the origin of the wagon to which he referred. With reference to the price of the horses he later answered his own question. He stated that only $35 could be realized, as I understood it, for two teams of good draught horses—good young horses—and a little later he said that they had to pay 5 cents here for apples that were much cheaper in the Annapolis valley. Now if he had taken the horses in question to the market where they were in demand, he would have obtained a better price for them, or if he had gone to the place where the apples were produced he would have got the apples cheap, at the price at which they are grown in Nova Scotia.

I think that the mistake that has been made, perhaps, in the minds of some of the hon. gentlemen opposite is in painting the part of Canada from which they come—that is the three prairie provinces—in too dark, too gloomy, too unattractive colors. Those of us who have not had the pleasure of visiting that part of the country, and have to judge of it only by their description, would not, I think, form a very pleasurable picture of it or of its attractions. In fact, if we compare that description with the one that was given of the Yukon we find the latter of an altogether different character. Although we were told that the temperature was sometimes minus 60, yet the whole tenor of the address of the gentleman from that part of Canada was cheerful and optimistic, as compared with the utterances of those who live in the more fertile parts of the prairie provinces. I should like a more cheerful spirit inculcated by those who wish to see the country filled up with immigrants.

I must congratulate the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) on the fact that he has been elected to the leadership of the Progressive party. During the time he has been in this House I feel sure that hon. gentleman has received the confidence, and has justly earned it of every member in the Chamber. He certainly has the universal respect of this House, and I am sure will always enjoy the respect of gentlemen on this side. But there is one little suggestion that I would make, if I may, to that hon. gentleman. In his criticism of the Speech from the Throne he alluded to the omissions from it, and said it was notable for what it did not contain, and I observe that many of those who saw fit to criticise the Speech took the same ground. While I have not examined the Hansards extending back to confederation I believe, and I am assured upon the best authority, that there have been very few Speeches from the Throne since that time of which exactly the same remark has not been made—that they are very notable for the omissions from them rather than for what they contain. It is a remark that is hoary in its age, but I do not know that it would indicate any particular originality in the gentleman who makes it.

Then when the hon. member went on to express condemnation because there is no allusion in the Speech to a still further reduction of the tariff, and expressed the desire of his party that there should be a still further reduction of the tariff, I would like to say this: I am, of course, but a new man in this House, and I can only judge of things as they appear to me, but it does seem to me that when the hon. member was elevated to the leadership of the Progressive party that elevation brought certain responsibilities with it that do not belong altogether to the position of a private member of the House. I mean in this way, Sir, that when he undertook to say that a certain section of the revenue of this country, amounting to $88,000,000, should be removed it was his place, as a statesman, to suggest to the Finance Minister some way in which that loss of revenue could be made up. But there was no suggestion as to what should take the place of those taxes that would be taken off by removing the tariff; and we know, as everybody knows—I believe the gentleman who has just taken his seat, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) knows—that the great difficulty of government to-day is to raise enough revenue to meet the requirements of the country—that instead of removing taxes—because the tariff is, of course, a tax—the difficulty is to raise enough money to meet the national requirements. They are large; we have heard them explained from all points of view. It is difficult to take them up now without consuming a great deal of time; but we have heard the various speakers allude to the existing charges, the interest on the debt, and the necessity of raising more money; and therefore it seems to me that when it is suggested that a certain amount of money now raised through the tariff should be taken from the revenues of the country, it would be only fair and reasonable to expect a man, who is looking at the country's interests, to specify in what manner that money could be replaced in the public exchequer. It was a matter of regret to me that the leader of the Progressive party did not in his very able address indicate how that was to be done.

There is another matter to which I wish to allude. The hon. gentleman who introduced the amendment, which we understand is to be supported largely by the Progressive party, took, it seems to me a rather peculiar stand. When an amendment is introduced into this House by any serious minded member, it is surely introduced in the hope that it will carry. If this amendment carries the effect of it, I think, must be apparent to hon. members opposite. I do not know that the question is as to whether or not there is an exact precedent for it, but the amendment, if carried, would be equivalent to an expression of want of confidence in the government, and that would mean immediate dissolution. Hon. members must know that this is so, and I have no doubt they will endorse my statement. In that case, we would find no fault whatever with them. But this is the position in which those who support the amendment, whoever they may be, would find themselves; they would force the government to the country before they had time to introduce a redistribution bill. I presume they have their reasons for such a desire, although they have not explained them. I presume they could explain if necessary. In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, they would have to explain to those people who expect, and who are, by constitutional right entitled to greater representation when the redistribution bill is passed, and they would have to justify themselves in causing a dissolution and a general election before a redistribution bill had been passed. It seems to me that is very plain. Members from certain provinces expect additional representation. Their increase in population entitles them to it. There would have to be an adjustment of the representation in the cities. The representation of the city of Toronto, for instance, is based, I think, on a population of some 300,000. In the redistribution the representation would have to be based on a population, I think, of 507,000. Manitoba, I understand, would be entitled to an increase of some three or four members, and the province of Saskatchewan would have an increase of five members. How would these hon. members answer the people who live in the cities and provinces if they brought about a general election, which postponed for five years the redistribution which would give them the additional representation to which they would be entitled?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does it not follow from the hon. member's reasoning that as long as the government neglects to pass a redistribution bill nobody should vote against it?

Mr. RAYMOND: If I understand the hon. member aright, he stated that as long as the government failed to pass a redistribution bill nobody should vote against them? The answer is that the government has not had an opportunity to pass a redistribution bill, and you would have an opportunity to vote against them after they had passed redistribution.

I think that it is worth while to bring this matter to the attention of hon. members opposite and the members of the House generally. It does not seem to me that it is a contentious question particularly. I think it is a very plain question. I do not observe any legal quibbles or anything of that kind in it. It is a plain proposition; it is common sense and good judgment. If an election is brought on before the redistribution bill is passed, certain parts of the country will not be represented, and it will not be the government that will be responsible, but it will be the hon. members who forced the government to resign and go out of office. That is plain enough.

Another matter has been alluded to in various ways, and the omission of it from the Speech from the Throne was referred to by more than one hon. member who spoke on the other side of the House. No particular reference was made in the Speech from the Throne to the Near East troubles which occurred last September. The discussion on this question in the House and in the press rather tends to show what a variety of views may be taken of it. Some made it a ground of attack upon the government. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) in referring to it, described himself as a patriot and a lover of peace, and at the same time wished to place himself with those who would condemn the government because they avoided war. It was a position which was hard for me to follow, as were other things in the hon. member's address. I thought, however, that it was very difficult to see how a man could be a lover of peace, a conscientious man and a patriot, and at the same time find fault because war had been avoided by the government of the country in connection with the embroglio which occurred last September. He said, as I understood it, that parliament should have been assembled. Now, I do not know that it is advisable on every such occasion that parliament should be assembled. It would rather tend to indicate that we had not the confidence in the administration that we should have. Nothing has transpired since to show that it was necessary that parliament should have been called together, and when he or some other member who criticised the government action, said that the only one that was consulted then was the then leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) and suggested that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) should have been consulted, it seemed to me that the member's mind was going back to 1914. I think hon. members might well go back and consider who was consulted then. Was the opposition at that time taken into the confidence of the government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, they were.

Mr. RAYMOND: The right hon. member says, "yes, they were," but if they were, why was it necessary afterwards to form a Union government? If the opposition had at that time been taken into the confidence of the government, we would have had a united government, and never would have had any cause afterwards to remedy the mistake, or to pretend to remedy it by forming what was called the Union government, but it will forever be looked upon by future historians as the greatest mistake that ever happened in the history of Canada, that party politics—I can call it nothing else—prevailed to such an extent that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party were not taken into the confidence of the then government of Canada, in order that they might turn their attention to winning the war. To me that is and always will be one of the most regrettable incidents in our history, and I think there is no man who remembers those times who will not say that the action of the then government was strongly coloured by that partisan spirit that hon. gentlemen have this afternoon deplored, or pretended to deplore from their seats in parliament.

But to go back to the incident of last September, I understand—and I think I do—the events that happened then and their sequence, I will endeavour to describe them without meandering through the circuitous paths of diplomatic language or crossing the plain highway of thought. I would ask the House to consider carefully this circumstance, because it was the actual circumstance by which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had to be governed at the time. A telegram came, which was as a bolt out of the blue, asking the extent to which Canada was prepared to back up the British policy in the Near East. I think hon. members will agree with me so far that that is what happened. The Prime Minister had to consider from whom that telegram came. It did not come from the coolest-headed member of the British government; it came from one who has been considered rather impetuous, a very Hotspur, one who said, if you remember, Sir, at the beginning of the war, that he would send the British navy to dig the Germans out of their holes like rats if their fleet stayed in port. That was a bold statement; but it was one at which the First Sea Lord and the men of the Admiralty smiled with their tongues in their cheeks. It was from a man of that impetuous disposition that this telegram came, and the reply of the Prime Minister, when he asked for further information that he might be informed more distinctly what the policy of Great Britain was in the Near East with regard to Turkey, sprinkled upon the ardour of the one who had sent the message those few cold drops of modesty that were necessary to cause a more deliberate consideration.

If as the event proved, it became unnecessary either that Canada should signify her distinct acquiescence in the policy of Great Britain with regard to Turkey, or state whether she would send a contingent to assist in the execution of the British plans in the Near East, it would have been absurd or ridiculous for the Prime Minister or the government to commit this country to anything of the kind. We should know exactly what we are going to do before we undertake to support any commitment. Some say: "Well, Australia did this, and New Zealand did it." I do not want the action or the attitude or the mind of Australia or New Zealand ever to influence the mind of Canada with regard to her destiny. We have a right to say that, amongst the various dominions of the Empire, this Dominion, which was the one which solved the problem of Imperial government and made it possible for those other dominions to come into existence and exist as a commonwealth of nations, is not called upon to heed to their actions. Each one must act for itself, and it is for Canada to take her own place, her own part, to look at her own future and destiny in the decisions which she makes.

Some say: "It should have been done for the moral effect." Mark the use of the word "moral"— the moral effect. If bluffing is a moral game, then it would be done for the moral effect. In effect, to back up a bluff, was what Canada was asked to do, and I should be very sorry if it ever was in the history or nature of this people to become bluffers, to become rattlers of the sabre, and in a great crisis to take that kind of attitude that would be brow-beating and boastful. I would rather that Canada were a nation that does not say too much, but that acts right up to what it says and does it. That is what the people of the nation after which we claim to model our institutions, to a great extent are noted for—not saying more than they will do, but thoroughly doing that which they say. That was the attitude of the Prime Minister of this country at that time, and we have every reason to be proud of him that he acted in the good old traditional way in which we would expect a Canadian government to act. It is not always hasty action, the showing of alacrity, that is the wisest course. There is an expression that came to me often in 1914 when I thought of the great crisis and how much was in the balance, when I thought how deliberately Britain took the stand that she did. I would apply those same words to Canada in September last and through her future history, and I hope it will always be the idea that will govern her statesmen. The words are these:

> Rightly to be great
> Is not to stir without great argument,
> But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
> When honour's at the stake.

Was honour at the stake? Our government did not stir without great argument. They did not see the argument in the matter, and they did not stir; but had honour been at stake, I feel sure they would have taken those steps that would have been necessary to protect the honour of this country. No, there was a reversal of policy. Almost immediately that those few drops of cold modesty were sprinkled upon the ardour of the British ministers, their policy was reversed, and newspapers came out in England applauding Canada for the stand she had taken. Resolutions were passed by city councils and other bodies, congratulating this Dominion that she was able to take the wise stand that she did. The election came off, and hon. gentlemen know what happened. That policy was reversed by a majority in that election, and that showed that the people did not back up the gentleman who was then Prime Minister of England, nor the gentleman who sent the message.

When the gentleman who sent the message, who was known, I believe, as I said, as a Hotspur, to be of an impetuous nature, and who wished to play this game of bluff in the East, went north to his constituents in Scotland, why, Sir, he was beaten. The people showed him that they did not approve his policy.

An hon. MEMBER: By a prohibitionist.

Mr. RAYMOND: That is just what I was going to say. It is bad enough to be beaten at any time; but when hon. members consider the bitter irony of the position of being beaten in Scotland by a prohibitionist, they will realise the strength of feeling that was in the hearts of those voters must have been much more than usual. I consider the fact that these incidents were not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne was rather a good thing than a bad one. Why should these incidents have been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne? If you are going across the Atlantic and you pass a dangerous rock or reef, and if the captain or the pilot were to point it out to you and say: "We passed that rock safely," you would think he was looking for credit for passing it. Had this matter been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, we would have had the criticism that the government was looking for credit for having saved the country from the dire calamity of war, the most dire calamity that could have befallen it. The government did not mention it in the Speech from the Throne, not desiring to have that criticism, and hence its absence is commented upon. I think it is a good thing that no reference is made to it. It was an event that sank deeply into the hearts of all the Canadian people. It was one of the events that will help to make and mould the public mind of this country, so that whenever the eventuality faces us, whether we shall be at war or at peace, those who are rulers at the time when this may happen, will consider the matter so carefully that they will not stir without great argument; that they will form their decision very resolutely, carefully and wisely; that they will count all the costs; that they will count the cost in money.

There is no one who will not admit that even the enormous sum that the war cost us was very little indeed to what it cost Canada in other respects. We cannot forget those graves which you, Mr. Speaker, went over to visit last summer; and he who would commit this country to war at any time must do it so that he can look the widow and the orphan in the face afterwards. The Prime Minister did not feel that he could do so last September, and naturally, until the necessity should present itself with overwhelming force, he shrank from any appearance of committing this country to war, or anything of that kind. We have every reason to be proud of a government that could take such a step, and we hope that successive governments in Canada will always follow that example and avoid in the future as far as possible any entanglements in war.

Are we to be responsible for the foreign policy of Great Britain, whatever it may be, without knowing what it is, without its being clearly defined? Why, the question is not worthy of being discussed here. I do not think there is a man who would take that stand here. If so, we have gone back to a position of tutelage, as a colony, from which we thought we had escaped many years ago. As a part of the commonwealth of nations or, as you please, of the dominions that form the great British Empire, we in the future are going to take our own position on these matters. We are going to form our own opinions, and are not going to be bound to follow the foreign policy of Great Britain in every matter that would entangle us in war. Nor do I think that the statesmen of Great Britain feel that we should be so bound. They have no right to think for a moment that we should be bound by their foreign policy without some say in the matter. Of course, if the occasion arose again as it did in 1914, when the principles of liberty, and honour and justice were at stake, Canada could be depended upon to perceive her duty by instinct, as she did then. But let it be known to those who are ambitious to prosecute certain policies in certain parts of the world in which we are not interested, that we are not going to spend either blood or money to further their designs. The revulsion of opinion showed after the event that the policy of Great Britain in regard to the East had not been of the wisest. When the military headquarters were at Chanak on the south side of the Dardanelles, had Canada sent any message, such as Australia despatched in regard to the situation that then existed, so as to strengthen the hands of those who were carrying on this bluff, and had there been the least conflict between those armies that were then face to face within gunshot distance of each other, had there been a few rifles discharged on that occasion, the consequences would have been inconceivable. We did not know for certainty then, but we know now, that at once Turkey would have plunged into war against us; and she would have been joined immediately by Russia, whose soviet government is as anxious to drive Britain out of those states as Britain is to drive Turkey out. Then that combination of Turkey and Russia would have been joined by Germany, who would be only too ready, if she had the allies, to take some military position that would enable her to repudiate all her enormous responsibilities of debt and reparations and depreciated currency. I am not overstating the case, for subsequent events have actually proved it; had the action of our Prime Minister at that moment been rash there was a possibility that the world might have been plunged again into a war not much less serious than that of 1914. Now, I hope that the same temperate course will always be followed by the rulers of this country. It was Victor Hugo, I think, who said that moderation is the very breath of judgment; and I believe it is. And judgment is the quality that is required in all such cases.

I trust we shall always beware of entering into any quarrel, but that having entered it, we shall so play our part that the opponents may beware of us. But those who impute any lack of loyalty in the fact that we did not make some boastful or threatening declamations do not know the history of this country. Certainly, such a statement could never be made by an Englishman or by any other Briton, because he knows what Canada did in the late war, and he would never think that she lacked loyalty. I should be very sorry to think that such a statement could ever be made by a true Canadian, because the history of no country is more inspiring so far as the courage of its inhabitants is concerned. Canada's people have always shown themselves a brave people from the very earliest days of its history until the present time. Of course, we have had but few wars, but in her record Canada has never shirked her duty, and her sons could never be called cowards. There is not a more interesting event in modern history than the fact that after the Treaty of Paris in 1763, when this country was invaded from the south and no British troops were here to defend it, the French Canadians rose and repelled the invaders and saved the country to the British flag. In the war of 1812 all the inhabitants took an equal share; and in all succeeding struggles down to the last great war there has not been a time when Canada could be accused of failing to take her rightful place when occasion called. Anyone who suggested the contrary could not be either a true Briton or a true son of Canada. We have, I think, every reason to congratulate ourselves on the stand which the Prime Minister took, and which shows that he possesses that particular kind of wisdom that is required in men who have the responsibility of governing a great country and of meeting issues that are fraught with terrible consequences.

Mr. T. H. McCONICA (Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to participate in this debate but circumstainces are such that I deem it my duty to myself, to my associates and to the members of the House to make some pronouncement as to where I stand. I should like to go to some extent into the discussion of the Speech from the Throne, but I have decided under the circumstances to forego that pleasure. I am admonished that it is the desire to conclude this debate to-night and I shall certainly not weary the House. I want to congratulate the mover (Mr. Putnam) and the seconder (Mr. Rhéaume) of the Address on the excellent speeches they delivered in discharging that duty. I concur in all that has been said in commendation including the speech that I was unable to understand when the seconder delivered it I do not think it is entirely my fault if I could not understand it. I spent long hours in my younger days trying to master the French language, and I failed. The trouble was not that I did not study with sufficient diligence, but that the Almighty did not seem to have intended me for a Frenchman. But I would say to the hon. member that I have since given myself the pleasure of reading the translation of his able remarks, and I most heartily congratulate him.

I would say a word with regard to those who are not with us. I was well acquainted with but one of our late members, who have crossed the dark river, and I feel that I should say something as to him. I refer to the hon. member who formerly represented Lanark (Mr. Stewart). My acquaintance with him was all too brief. Soon after coming into the House I met him as an inexperienced, green member meets the experienced member who has reaped the reward of occupying a high position among those with whom he is associated, but I found him to be a considerate, kindly, courteous, polished gentleman. A gentleman in all that the term applies. I had the pleasure of being associated with him as a neighbour on this side of the chamber and in committee work for one session, and I came to esteem him as a statesman, careful, industrious, painstaking, honest, efficient and able—a most valuable member of this House. I esteemed him as a citizen worthy in every respect, patriotic, and devoted to the best interests of his country. In a word, Mr. Speaker, such a gentleman, such a statesman and such a patriot as we may well honour, and therefore I desire to add my tribute to what has been so well expressed concerning him.

I would touch on one or two matters that have arisen in this debate. I am still from the West, Mr. Speaker, and I am still proud of the West. I am proud of her people, and I would admonish you that they are not a whining, complaining set of people out there; they are men with good, strong nerves, they are patriotic, they are intelligent, they are industrious, they are courageous, and they are bound to fight to the bitter end. This they are doing under most adverse circumstances. I can assure you. I am not here to retract anything that has been said as to the arduous conditions existing there. Indeed, I am personally in such a position that I dare not attempt anything of the kind. We are not getting enough for our wheat; that is what is the matter with us. Wheat is the thing we must depend on in that country. My esteemed friend, the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) says he can see that there is a relation between 75-cent wheat and an exhausted, bankrupt Europe with exchange demoralized and credit gone. We can all see that. But I want to remind the right hon. gentleman that Europe has bought all the wheat we could send them. There has been no trouble to find a market for our wheat over there. And they have paid for it. But if the papers are to be credited, the spread between what they pay to-day for our wheat and what we get for it is from 40 cents to 50 cents more per bushel than it was before the war when conditions were normal, when money was plentiful, and when exchange was in their favour rather than otherwise.

Now, where is the trouble? There is a leak somewhere. That is what is the matter with us. The two parties that are interested in this business, the producer and the consumer, are not receiving proper consideration. They are the real parties in interest, and the gap is too wide. We are informed by my esteemed friend from Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) that bread costs about a third less in London than it does in Saskatoon where we raise the wheat from which the bread is made. There is something wrong. I am not going to emphasize this now, although I should like to discuss it fully, and I may say to my hon. friends that I am still for the Wheat Board. We intend to have a board of that kind some of these days, but I won't weary the House with that subject to-night. We must have some relief. We are promised in the Speech from the Throne that a committee will be appointed to investigate, with power to make recommendations. I have lived in Canada quite a considerable number of years, for fifteen years I have been trying to raise wheat, and I think I have put in about one-half of my spare time reading reports of investigations by committees, Mr. Speaker, and yet to-day we are still in worse shape than we ever were in respect to the wheat business. We want investigation, but we want something more.

But it is to the amendments that I desire to speak. We have offered an amendment through the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), raising a question which we still think is vital to Canada. We attempted to raise that same question last year, and were ruled out. I am not disposed to question that ruling. However, we had no opportunity of bringing that question to a discussion. Now it is objected that we are attempting to embarrass the government by introducing the amendment at this juncture. Nothing of the kind is intended. Here is a proposition upon which the people of this country are divided, upon which the members of this House are divided. Now if we can bring that to a square-toed issue and draw that line, and this government is defeated, then I am willing to accept the consequences, Mr. Speaker. That is where I stand on that proposition. There are two sides to that question, and I am here to maintain the platform upon which I was elected and the principles in which I believe, namely, that the tariff should be reduced. I do not believe that this country can continue to exist and prosper half free trade and half high protection. The farmers must sell their products in the markets of the world in competition with the cheapest labour imaginable, they must encounter everything that tends to pull down their prices, including an exorbitant spread between them, the producers, and the consumers, and they, the producers, must buy what they require at high protective tariff prices. As I say, we are selling our wheat cheaper than we did before the war. And what are we getting? We are getting a dollar which is worth sixty cents as compared with the dollar we got before the war. The reason for that to my mind is not that Europe cannot buy, for she is buying our wheat. I say we are here to support the amendment offered by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), and we are ready to accept the consequences, even if the government should decide in the event of the amendment carrying, that it was ready to retire from office. We do not want that, I will admit. Personally I do not want it. It would interfere with my plans to some extent, and I do not believe the country wants it. But I believe the country does want a pronouncement on this question, and if the majority of members in this parliament are in favour of a radical reduction in the tariff, and say so, I do not know but what we could form a government out of that element and run this country in pretty good shape. Therefore, I am going to support that amendment, and I hope everyone here will.

We have another amendment, offered by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw). In presenting his amendment to the House, he was good enough to relieve the Progressives from all responsibility in connection with it. He defined his position in the House, which we have well understood, and with his definition and attitude we fully agree. It is perfectly proper that he should take the position he did; he was so elected. We would like to co-operate with him fully in such legislation as we think should be enacted, and in that respect we would like to co-operate with every member in this House. But we would like it understood that when he says it is not our amendment he is proposing, that that is the position exactly. We have a notion on our side that we will vote as we please on a thing of that kind. What is the amendment of the hon. gentleman? He says:

> The House views with alarm the substantial increase in the national debt.

In that sentiment I fully agree. I apprehend we are all of one mind upon that. We must view with alarm the fact that the national debt has been materially increased. It has been fashionable with me to view with alarm any increase in my own indebtedness or any indebtedness of the country, so I think we are all a unit on that. But is it the office of the Speech from the Throne to catalogue all the things we view with alarm? If that is its function, I submit that the list is far too short. The hon. gentleman seems rather to insist on limiting it to one thing. If he would submit the list to my good friend for St. John (Mr. Baxter), who delivered that Jeremiad this afternoon, I am sure he would view with alarm conditions with regard to the potato growers, lumbermen, and everything else in that part of the country, and my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Martell) could also add a lot of things that he views with alarm. My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Hughes) could also furnish him with a list. When the cars on his line, are hot they are too hot, and when they are cold they are too cold. If the hon.

gentleman really wants a substantial list of woes, let him consult his own associates from the province of Alberta. Why, they could furnish him with an unvarnished tale of woes that would make each individual hair stand up like the quills upon the fretful porcupine, and the pity of it is they would all be true. That is the tragedy of it. They would all be more real than the rather academic and thumb-worn general proposition which he has seen fit to include in his pronouncement. I think he would have been well advised to have left out that part of his amendment, because it is a proposition with which we all agree, and the list is not in any way complete when he limits it to the one thing. He says:

> This House views with alarm the increase in the national debt and urges Your Excellency's advisers to exert every possible effort to economize in the expenditure and administration of government.

I agree with that. It is proper that we should have economy in the expenditure and administration of government; I think they mean about the same thing. But I want more economy than that. I want to see economy in the management of our railways, that great enterprise that has passed out of the hands of the government and in which the people of Canada are vitally interested. I want to see economy in the management of our harbour commissions and terminal elevators, and in all our great quasi-public institutions. I go further, I want to see economy in all the railways and among all the people of Canada. We must have economy everywhere. The trouble with that part of the amendment is that it does not go far enough. It is limited to the expenditure and administration of government. My friends to my right seem to think that is all we should economize on in this country, but I do not agree with that at all.

The amendment goes on to say that the purpose of this economy is "to lessen the burden of federal taxation." That is a very commendable thing to do, and I am in favour of it. I think we would be very wise indeed if we were to practise economy everywhere and lessen the burden of taxation. But I would go further than that. I would say that we should conserve our resources to such an extent that we can not only cut out this deficit but pay something on the national debt and carry on all the great public improvements that are needed. We might improve the harbour at St. John, for instance, and at Quebec and Montreal. We should complete the Hudson Bay railway. Let us economize to that end. We should send out feeders to our railroad lines on the prairies—build branch lines. My good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) some little time after the new Board of Railway Directors was appointed, and before they had had their first meeting, I think, certainly long before Sir Henry Thornton came from England, is reported to have said out in the West that they were going to build a lot of lines on the prairies. I do not know how he got his information. I thought Sir Henry Thornton was the man to make a statement of that kind. It embarrassed me a good deal, because I could not back it up. I did not know, and I did not know whether he knew or not. If he did, I would like to know how he found out, because I do not think Sir Henry Thornton knew as he had not then seen the railways.

But I want to see economy. It will assist us in that respect, it will assist us in the building of the terminal facilities out at Vancouver. I do not want to limit our economy to merely relieving the burdens of taxation. The qualifications that the hon. gentleman has put in here are words of limitation. They cut down the scope of our aims. If I had drawn that amendment I should have said, "I am in favour of economy," that is all. Economy is what we want—economy in administration and expenditure, economy in the operation of every public enterprise, and in our own private lives, and to the end that we may not only reduce the burdens of taxation but that we may build up this country to the future that certainly lies before us. When that is done we shall have the results which are spoken of here, and many more blessings will follow in its train. So I say this amendment does not commend itself very much to me.

Now what is the pronouncement of His Excellency? He says that the public accounts will be down soon, and declares that a strict economy in all public expenditures continues to be a necessity. Now, does not that cover the matter pretty thoroughly? Is not that just about as broad as you can make it? I ask the hon. gentlemen on my left, does that not mean a lot more than the statement of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw)? I think it does, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in the first place this amendment is not germane to the amendment of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey); it does not touch a single thing that is contained in that amendment; it is not relevant in the most remote degree; and I do not quite understand how it was held to be in order. It is also a contraction of the declaration of His Excellency. The Governor General declares that economy in all public expenditures continues to be a necessity. That course we are admonished to follow, that rule is set up for us to adhere to. What more do we want? I apprehend it would hardly do for His Excellency to intrude into our private lives and tell us what we should do there; he was instructing parliament. My platform is a litle broader than his. I want economy to begin right in my own household, and then to permeate this whole great country of ours, permeate public and private bodies, permeate every enterprise and every interest; and when that time comes I believe that the clouds that lower upon our horizon will be buried in the deep bosom of the ocean.

That is all I care to say, but I think I have made myself clear as to the position some of us occupy upon this matter. But we are not going to be unanimous—some voting one way and some voting another. I do not propose to cast a vote that will dissolve this House unless I mean it. Suppose a vote on the second amendment had the effect of dissolving parliament, as I infer it would from the excellent speech of the Minister of Finance, what does it mean? What would we be going to the country on? On something as to which we are all agreed—that is that we want economy—and what good could result? I think the hon. gentleman would be well advised to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I must apologize, as a comparatively new member, for intruding myself into this debate at this late hour. However, I shall endeavour to be brief, and I have to a large extent condensed what I proposed to say on this occasion. I feel some embarrassment in speaking as a new arrival and I entertain a greater sense of responsibility in discussing such matters as we are considering at this time.

I wish to join with the other speakers who have extended their congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address, and to associate myself with the congratulations that have been extended to the new leader of the Progressive party. I would also extend a warm word of welcome to the new members to this House, and express the hope that they will all take the active, intelligent interest in the proceedings which the older members have taken.

In the Speech, His Excellency has been pleased to refer to the pleasure which he has derived from his extended tour through Canada, and the many courtesies he has received at the hands of the Canadian people. We are very grateful indeed that Their Excellencies have taken such a kindly interest in our welfare, and that they are making themselves so familiar with all parts of the country. We would recognize in the office of the Governor General one of the bonds of Empire, and we are sure that so long as the occupants of that high office display the same intelligent, active interest in our affairs, as the present incumbent and his predecessors have done, they will continue to receive our expressions of appreciation and gratitude. We wish Lord and Lady Byng success and happiness in their continued visit with us.

Some extended reference was made by one hon. gentleman who has spoken to the Near East question. I rather thought that he gave it more attention, perhaps, than it deserved. Some of the cablegrams exchanged with the British government were read, and a summary of others given, by the Prime Minister. I think it is perfectly clear to all that the British Empire was not preparing for war, that the British authorities were endeavouring to bring about peace in the Near East. Yet the hon. gentleman to whom I have referred, approached this matter as if the British government were endeavouring to launch a new war. Quite the opposite was the intention. I am sure nothing could have been more calculated to prevent war than the knowledge that all parts of the great Empire stood together united for the same purpose. I am sure that the answer which went from Canada did not make for peace, that it was very disappointing to the British authorities, and to many people in Canada itself. I am likewise sure that a prompt cablegram assuring the Imperial authorities that we, with the other portions of the British dominions, were united with the Mother Country would have had a very good effect indeed. In short, a cablegram of that nature, promptly sent, would have been better than a contingent despatched months afterwards.

I think, Sir, it is very fortunate indeed for all concerned that this crisis has passed, but it is no more fortunate for anyone than for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government of this country.

The Speech from the Throne has referred to an increase in our commerce. It is true it is not very substantial, but it is a step in the right direction. It is encouraging and it is satisfactory to us on this side of the House to know that that increase in our commerce was accomplished without any change in the fiscal policies which had been pursued by the predecessors of this government.

There is a belated acknowledgement that our financial depression is due to financial conditions in Europe following the war. I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that that explanation should have been given to this country much earlier by the Prime Minister and the members of this government, because I am sure that explanation was not made by him before the last election and I know that all of our troubles, financial, commercial and otherwise, were attributed to the alleged shortcomings of the then existing government.

Some reference has also been made to the trade conventions with France and Italy. It will take time to study these, and it will also take a considerable period of actual working to know whether the results will prove beneficial or otherwise. We will have to leave that to those who are more familiar with the trade question, and await results.

The removal of the cattle embargo or the alleged approaching removal of the cattle embargo, has also been referred to, because it does not yet appear that it has been entirely removed. In the province of Ontario we have been told that the credit for this action is due in a very large measure to the Minister of Agriculture for that province, the Hon. Manning Doherty, who, as we recall, went to the Mother Country and engaged in a campaign there in support of the removal of that embargo. He offended public sentiment in that country, received a well merited rebuke, and, I think, his activity retarded rather than helped the removal of the embargo. Yet in that province they are claiming for the provincial government and for the Minister of Agriculture in that government a large measure of credit for this removal. There is, of course, a difference of opinion as to the value of the removal of this embargo. I think that it has been exaggerated. But again, we will have to await its complete removal, the regulations that follow, and the results also that will follow the removal of the embargo. The ultimate removal of the embargo will come in fulfilment of a promise secured by Sir Robert Borden at an Imperial Conference.

Some reference is also made to immigration, and upon this very important question I believe it is well understood that there are two views or two opinions fairly strongly held in this country, one in favour of practically unrestricted immigration, and another in favour of restricted immigration. As far as we can judge from the speeches of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), and from the record, the government has not yet made up its mind upon this very important matter. They have not yet adopted a policy, and we are without any knowledge as to what their intentions are in this respect. Speaking for myself, Mr. Speaker, I favour restricted immigration, restricted both as to quantity and as to quality—restricted as to quantity to the extent that we shall receive into Canada only those who can be well placed when they come here, only those who can come with advantage to themselves and with advantage to those who are already here, and restricted as to quality in that they shall be suitable for agriculture and for the industrial occupations which they may desire to pursue in this country. I submit that it is the duty of the government to bring down to this House and submit during the course of this session a well considered and well rounded policy upon this important matter. We have, I am afraid, been drifting, we have been losing time and losing opportunity, and immigrants have been going to other parts of the Empire, when they should have been coming to Canada. We should also, if possible, do something to prevent the emigration from this country which has been so pronounced in the last year.

I think it is only fair Mr. Speaker, that the government should have credit for having decided to make use of the Soldiers' Land Settlement organization in connection with the placing of immigrants in Canada. This excellent organization formed by the late government has rendered invaluable services to the returned soldier, and is, I believe, capable of equally valuable service to immigrants. I say the government are entitled to credit in this respect for their expressed intention of making use of this organization.

Then we are promised a revision of the Bank Act. It comes to us in the ordinary course. It is not a matter for which the government claims or, I think, is entitled to claim any credit. The act has in the main worked well, but changed conditions and certain occurrences of the last few years have demonstrated the necessity for some amendments to it. I wish to suggest an amendment which, I think, will give some relief to agriculture in this country. At the present time, as I understand the provisions of that act, a bank cannot lend upon the direct securities of farm products or chattels, it must be done in a roundabout way, and I know that in the province of Ontario there is a strong feeling on the part of those engaged in agriculture that too much of the funds that are received on deposit are not available for the immediate requirements of agriculture in Ontario. I would suggest that an amendment be made which would permit banks to loan to those engaged in agriculture and others requiring advances the amounts which they require on the direct security of chattels. A simple form comprehensive in terms could easily be made a record, and when made of record would create a lien on the chattels. In this way there would be a fair, proper, and safe extension on banking accommodations, and agriculture would receive a stimulus. I submit this for the consideration of those who may have this matter in charge.

Another matter that is referred to in the Speech is an investigation into the alleged combine in connection with shipping rates. That brings to mind the allegation, particularly, of the member who now occupies the position of Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) in this government in the last election campaign, that combines were rampant, that they were numerous, and the Dominion Textiles Corporation was mentioned. It was pointed out that they were simply eating up the poor people of this country, and he promised that there would be investigations; that there would be prosecutions, and that this matter would be attended to at once. Since he has come into the House, we have not heard so much about the matter. We have not had any investigations; we have not had any prosecutions, and if these combines did exist, they have been allowed to continue and to flourish.

Redistribution is in order, and this suggests a subject of considerable difficulty and possibly of bitter strife. I hope this will not be necessary, and I do not think it is necessary if the government who will have the measure in charge, is prepared to follow well-established lines, to make a fair distribution, to adhere to county boundaries, and to appoint a committee of all parties represented in this House who will, upon these general principles, settle the details of this troublesome matter. I think it was one of the members of the Progressive party who suggested that we might have proportional representation in some of the cities. I do not know why this experiment should be wished upon cities and not upon other parts of the Dominion. I suggest that it might as well be tried out in Manitoba or Saskatchewan or Alberta; but I am not in favour of it at all. I think, when you consider the fact that only about sixty to seventy per cent of the electors vote in any general election, you will find, if you ask them to adopt a new and complicated system, that a smaller proportion of the vote will be cast. The results of this are uncertain; it leads to groups and to group government with all its compromises, with all its uncertainties, and with the difficulty of fixing responsibility. What I think the Canadian people desire is that they shall, by a direct, simple and positive method, be able to cast their votes in favour of a government which they approve or against a government which they do not approve, and the present method is the best calculated to accomplish that result. I admit, of course, that there are anomalies and inconsistencies in connection with the present method. Sometimes the majority of the voters do not elect a majority of the members of this House. But then again, I think this is due to some faulty redistribution of the constituencies. This may be overcome, and there are anomalies and difficulties also in connection with the system that has been proposed. We had better, I submit, "bear those ills we have, than fly to others that we know not of." Therefore, I submit that proportional representation should not be adopted, either in the cities or in any other part of Canada at this time.

I was pleased with the address of the last speaker (Mr. McConica) who dealt with the subject of economy in such an illuminating manner. I was pleased to hear him say that he was prepared to go the whole way in connection with this very important matter; but really if he was prepared to go as far as he outlined, I could not see how he could be hurt very much by voting for the principle that is involved in the resolution of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr Shaw). I can see, however, how he might fear, and his party might fear, that this would embarrass the government of the day, and of course they do not wish to do that.

I wish to refer to another statement that was made during the course of the debate. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) moved the amendment, and I have before me Hansard at page 69 of which he is reported to have made this statement. He seemed to go a little bit out of his way, I thought, to make some references to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and to this party. In order that we may have exactly his words, I will read a sentence or two of Hansard. He said:

> I could not help but think as the right hon. gentleman concluded his remarks that he himself was rapidly becoming Canadianised. But what of his immediate followers? I trust the Canadianisation of my right hon. friend will not lead to the fossilization of his immediate followers. Why this ominous silence? The country did not expect much from them, we know, but surely the country expects something. Well might an angel exclaim "Why seek ye the living amongst the dead?"

I wish to assure that hon. gentleman that this party is neither dead nor sleeping. I wish to tell him that it is resting and recuperating from a long period of arduous activity, both in peace and war, in the interest of the people of this country. I wish to point out to him that these professions of superior virtue from his following, these reflections that are, from time to time, made upon both the old parties, would come with better grace if my hon. friends had to their credit some slight achievement in the interest of Canada. After hearing the address of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), I think my hon. friend will revise his opinion and come to the conclusion that this party is not dead after all. No, Mr. Speaker, we are not dead; we are not sleeping; we are observing everything that is happening in this House.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Keep on observing.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We are rejoicing in the vindication of the policy and the programme of our party that is coming through the merciless logic of events and by the action of our successors in office. I repeat that we are not dead, nor sleeping; and when the time comes—and it may not be very long—we shall be found ready and well equipped to resume the conduct of the complicated and difficult affairs of Canada, keeping her, with all her obligations, national and international, in a position of respect and responsibility in that great family of nations that go to make up the British Empire.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak in this debate; but the placing in the discussion of the two amendments, and my attitude to one of them, makes it, it seems to me, incumbent upon me to utter a few words. As regards the last amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) in favour of economy, I find these words in the Address itself:

> A strict economy in all public expenditures continues to be a necessity in the existing financial situation.

These words being incorporated in the Address, I cannot see the raison d'être or real necessity for the sub-amendment and therefore I will vote against it. As regards the amendment moved by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) I find myself obliged to take another position. I do so with considerable regret because I shall have to run counter, I am afraid, to the greater number, if not all, of the members of my own side of the House. Is there any objection to the material of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Springfield? The amendment merely deals with the question of the reduction of customs duty and the desirability of having a downward revision of the tariff at this time. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in his instructive and most able speech the other day, himself said:

> The general sentiment contained in these two motions is largely of a sound, sane and sensible character.

With this certificate of character of the amendment given by the Minister of Finance himself, it is unnecessary, it seems to me, to labour the point and to insist upon the desirability of the amendment. The question which has been brought up by the Minister of Finance is the propriety of urging this resolution at the present time. I have taken some time in studying this question and I have come to a conclusion somewhat different from that arrived at by the minister. I advance my arguments with a certain amount of diffidence in view of the long experience and the great public services which the Minister of Finance has rendered to this country. The Minister of Finance takes the view that the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne and the debate connected with it are really a matter almost of form rather than a matter of real importance. "It is simply a resolution," he states, "politely acknowledging the speech which His Excellency has kindly addressed to the House and giving him the assurance that whatever matters are brought before us will receive our respectful consideration." That is quite accurate as a statement of form; I respectfully submit that it is not accurate as a statement of reality. In reality the Speech from the Throne does not emanate from the Governor General at all; it is merely put into his mouth by his advisers. The Speech from the Throne is the more or less sketchy pronouncement of the government as to their legislative programme for the session; and our discussion of it is not, I take it, merely a courteous interchange of compliments with the Governor General. It is a debate in which the mind of the nation is to be expressed, and I think that it is the more modern reality rather than what may have been and no doubt was in the past the fact. The question is to my mind an interesting one and I would refer the House to three authorities that I have before me. The first is Parliamentary Government in England by Todd, Vol. II. I find therein expressed the view which has been so well placed before the House by the Minister of Finance. On page 364 the author states:

> Accordingly, it has gradually become the practice to refrain from moving an amendment to the Address in answer to the royal speech unless some great political objects were in view, and likely to be attained—

Even under that interpretation of the situation, I take it that there is some great political object in view in the desire of a great number of the members of the House to have a downward revision of the tariff.

—or unless some assertion were made in the address to which the opposition found it impossible to assent.

And just while I am referring to this authority I should like to point out that amendments to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne have been moved and been accepted by the government.

On January 16, 1840, the Duke of Wellington moved an amendment to the Lords' Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne wherein Her Majesty's approaching marriage with Prince Albert was announced, for the insertion of the word "Protestant" before the name of the Prince. Having shown that it was in conformity with precedent, the amendment was agreed to, notwithstanding the opposition of the Prime Minister. But the success of this amendment was attended with no political consequences, though the matter gave rise to much discussion, both in and out of Parliament.

I would next refer the House to a very much more modern authority, Anson's Law and Custom of the Constitution. In Volume I on page 67 I read:

To this Address—

The Address we are now discussing—

—amendments may be moved, and thus the general policy of the government, as indicated by the Speech from the Throne, is brought under discussion.

This thought is more fully developed in another modern authority The Procedure of the House of Commons by Redlich, with an introduction by Sir Courtney Ilbert, who was one of the Clerks of the House of Commons at Westminster. At page 59 I read:

The King's Speech gives in broad outline the legislative programme of the session, comments upon the position of foreign affairs and the state of the Crown Colonies, and, in a special paragraph, of nearly invariable form, addressed to the Commons only, it promises an early submission of the estimates for the wants of the coming year. The course of the deliberations of Parliament is thus indicated, and they begin regularly with a debate upon the Speech and the Address in reply thereto. The general political character of the King's speech leads to the result 12 m. that the course of the debate upon it is untrammelled as to subject matter, a circumstance to which the modern adoption of the principle that general debates should be as much as possible avoided has given great importance. General criticism of the government from all imaginable points of view, demands for redress of grievances, the statement of aspirations and proposals of all kinds, are rendered possible. The whole policy of the country, domestic and foreign, is open to discussion. The form of procedure adopted is that, immediately upon the speech being communicated to the House by the Speaker, a motion for an Address in reply is proposed, by some member chosen beforehand, generally some young member on the government side, and seconded by another. Formerly the Address in reply followed closely the wording of the Speech, but in recent years it has become usual to frame it as a brief expression of the thanks of the House.

The further debate is carried on in the strict formal manner characteristic of English parliamentary procedure. Any body of political opinion represented in the House, any member who wishes thus early in the session to influence the Government's legislative programme at any point, or to call the attention of ministers or the public to any question, brings up what is desired in the form of an amendment to the address, proposing the addition of some words having reference to the question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully submit that those are precisely the circumstances which confront us to-night. I take it that when this book of Todd's was written, some fifty years ago—the author's note to the introduction is dated Ottawa, February, 1869—it was considered proper even at that time for the government to accept an amendment. Surely when this custom has developed into the holding of a general debate and the making of proposals of all sorts, the government is not precluded from taking any of these suggestions which they may deem best and making them their own. That leads me to the conclusion that those of us who think it is proper to introduce this resolution at this time are not only following what, it seems to me, is indicated by common sense, but also is sanctioned by the best modern constitutional practice.

Why is it wiser to introduce this resolution now rather than during the budget debate? It would seem to me, and I submit it with a considerable degree of confidence, that the budget is reached as a rule somewhat late in the session and represents generally the final decision of the government as to the manner in which it proposes to raise money for the use of the state, and that when that moment has arrived it would require a considerable amount of grace and forbearance on the part of the government, after all their plans had been laid and arrangements made for the raising of money for national purposes, to revise their plans and accept suggestions coming from another quarter. Therefore it does seem to me that this is the time when we can hope by respectful representations to influence the government in taking the view of the matter which a number of men in this House do take.

I am very anxious that this should be done, for two reasons. First, because I think it is of primary necessity in the interests of the whole country that there should be a downward revision of the tariff. At this late hour I am not going into the reasons which lead me to that conclusion. They are precisely the same reasons which have led the Liberal party since 1878 to hold that lower tariffs were in the interest of Canada; the same reasons which led the Liberal party in the great convention of 1893 to take that position before the country; the same reasons which led the Liberal party in 1919 to reaffirm those same principles; the same reasons which led the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) within the last few years to place on the pages of Hansard his reason for believing that the protective principle was not the proper principle on which to base the tariff laws of this country. That is one main reason. The other is this: I am afraid that if the government do not accept this proposal they lay themselves open to the charge which has already been made, that in refusing to put this proposal of tariff reduction in the Speech from the Throne, and in neglecting to make any firm statement that that is their idea, they will leave the door open for people to say that they have abandoned their trade principles. That, I think, would be an unfortunate thing for the Liberal party. That, of course, is something which I, as a humble member of that party, can do no more than respectfully urge my leaders to follow. But although I have no power more than any other member to influence them, I have the power to see that no one can throw that charge in the face of the member for Brome. I think at this time when parliamentary institutions, nay, representative government, are on trial, it is of the utmost importance that there should be no possibility in the public mind for even the suspicion of the thought that public men say one thing in opposition and do another when in power. I am making no charge that that is done or is being contemplated. I do say that the adoption of the suggestion which I make with all seriousness, with all respect, would obviate the very possibility of such a contingency.

Mr. Speaker, I know the hour is late. I have said what I have got to say on this subject. I commend it to the attention of the House and trust that those who have listened to me will be impressed with what I regard as the soundness of my argument.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will excuse my speaking from a seat that is not my own, but, owing to this bedroom drapery effect that has been wished upon us in our absence, we miserable members who are condemned to sit on the back benches are perpetually in a state where we are deprived of light—either the light of day or artificial light, and when we do wish to speak we have to emerge from our caverns and stand blinking in the light of day or artificial day. The same condition prevails with my hon. friends on the back benches opposite, and I think we will soon qualify under the description contained in the lines of that favourite old hymn:

> The race that long in darkness pined
> Have seen a glorious light.

While I am on the subject I also wish to enter a protest against the colour scheme of this arrangement. It is a well-known scientific fact nowadays that in cases of mental or nervous diseases and disorders the colour of the apartment has a good deal to do with the patient's condition. For instance, red irritates a man and blue has a soothing effect. I cannot conceive of any effect that perpetual association with this colour scheme will have on the unfortunate member except to lead him to commit suicide. I never saw a colour like it except in an undertaker's parlour. If the government find the percentage of suicides is greater on the back benches than on the front, they will know the cause.

Now, it is late, and my state of health prevents me dealing with the subject matter of the Speech from the Throne at length. I only wish to touch very briefly on the two amendments, but before I do so I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the Independent party in this House on the large and important accession to its numbers of late. I say to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) that he will find in that party great opportunities for preferment and promotion. The position of whip to that party is vacant to-day. It can be had at a word. The position of chairman of the caucus is also vacant and I would even dangle before him bright hopes of becoming leader of the party. No doubt at the first caucus that will be a subject for our most earnest consideration. I recall some years ago in British Columbia a similar condition occurred. There was a party there of two; I was not one of them. The party consisted of two Liberals, and a divergence of opinion arose between them as to who should be the leader. Unfortunately they brought their dirty linen to wash in the House, and it was described how they had squabbled as to who should be leader. One man said to the other, "Look here, Tom, the position of leader is one of some social standing, and you have to be able to wear a dress-coat and talk to the Lieutenant-Governor. I have a dress coat, and you know, Tom, you have not. Therefore, I think I should be the leader." The other man retorted, "I do not know about dress-coats or about the Lieutenant-Governor, but I can swing a better paint brush than you anyhow." They quarrelled so bitterly over the leadership that one of them became the leader, and the other left the party and affiliated himself with the Conservatives, since when he has never been heard of politically. In view of his youth and Apollo-like figure, and the fact that my friend is a bachelor—I think he is; he looks like one—I am prepared to make this deal with him, for I am always ready to make a deal and to make a public one: I will give him the social element. He can be the leader at society functions. I will yield the party's dress suit if we find we have only one, to him on such occasions, if he will leave to me the more arduous but to me the more congenial task of carrying on the leadership in the House, and then we will have that most beautiful of things, peace and harmony in our young and vigorous party.

Coming to the amendments the one that will be taken first, I presume, has been well termed the economy amendment. I rather fail to understand why the government might not have accepted it. It is one of such a purely academic nature that nothing particular would happen if the government accepted it. It is true we want economy and thrift and honesty and virtue. These are all admirable qualities, and an academic recital of them would not have done the government any harm, and possibly would have pleased a certain number of members. However, I presume the government have a good precedent when they take the stand that it must be regarded as a vote of want of confidence. Before I pass from the subject of economy, I might mention that during the last recess I have been instrumental through representations to the government in having four official positions cut out in my district, and if I am left alone I will have some more cut out, in the direction of economy. These men have not been discharged, but their positions have been done away with, resulting in an aggregate saving of $4,000 a year, and I have only begun. I have saved the amount of my salary, and if the members of the Progressive party have done the same—perhaps they have, I do not deny it—the aggregate saving would be a quarter of a million dollars. I think that would be an evidence of a more genuine demand for economy than coming before this House with a brick loosely wrapped around with a resolution for economy in one hand, and a demand for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway in the other. Of course, I only take a small view of these things, but that is my idea of economy, putting it into practical effect as we go along.

As regards the other amendments, what is known as the free trade amendment, there is a form of free trade policy to which I would heartily subscribe as I heard it enunciated in the House the other day by my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft), whom I have the honour to sit beside. In his excellent speech, short, but full of sound common sense and logic, he enunciated the tariff proposition that he was in favour of wiping out the present high tariff tax on woollens and boots and shoes, and like a true diplomat he stopped there. I am prepared to go with him any length along these lines. Like Agrippa, I was inclined to say: Paul! Paul! Almost thou persuadest me to be a Progressive. If he and his party had stopped there I would have been with him, to use a vernacular expression in the West, "till Hell froze over"; but it does occur to me that perchance the fact of my hon. friend and myself being perhaps fair-minded men, open to reason and argument, occupying the same desk for the last twelve months day by day and month by month, perhaps indulging in quite friendly arguments, has at last resulted in a sort of compromise frame of mind between us by which he was led to modify his earlier extreme political tariff views to a point where I could meet him half way. I submit, without any desire for recompense in my behalf, that idea to the government. It might be worked out along similar lines next session. We might find the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) associated with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and see what effect that would produce, or the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) with the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), or even the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) with the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter), or the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) with the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). Such an arrangement might produce a new and desirable frame of political mind in this House. At any rate, the idea is one that is possibly worthy of consideration by the government.

On the economy resolution, I propose to vote with the government, but with a good deal of reluctance, but on the other amendment, I shall certainly vote with the government with great cheerfulness, because I cannot come down here and stultify myself as regards the people who sent me here to look after their interests, and not play a political game. I have been here zealously in season, and, possibly some members of the government will say, out of season, clamouring at the door of the Finance Minister for protection for various infant industries in British Columbia, demanding from the Public Works department appropriations for my large district—and not only large, but growing. When you get a district with between 9,000 and 10,000 miles of waterfront and the people are active and progressive, the first thing they need is wharves, and wharves mean a large expenditure of public money. I can hardly come down here and ask for appropriations and tariff protection on the one hand, and then vote for the very opposite under these amendments. For that reason I feel justified in supporting the government. It is all too true, I am sorry to say, that I have not received anything like the measure of justice my district is entitled to. I say it with regret and reproach, and perhaps with the secret idea that the reason may be that too large concessions were being given to my friends to my left. Perhaps that is why British Columbia has had to go more or less hungry in these matters.

Let us glance for a moment into the future and see where the passage of this amendment would lead us. Suppose—what shall I call it?—this unnatural union—between the party of high tariff on the one hand and low tariff on the other, political inexperience on the one hand, and political subtlety on the other—suppose it produces a majority against the government to-night, what will be the result? We know that under constitutional law the government will have the right to appeal to the country. That will mean loss—loss of money, expense and loss from the derangement of business, and as an hon gentleman sitting on this side of the House said, "It does not agree with my personal arrangements either". But there are moments when we have to place the benefit of the country before your own particular desires. I feel that it is desirable here and now that the question should be settled, at least for two or three years to come, whether the minority in this House is going to dictate the tariff policy of this country. If it were any other party but the gentlemen to my left I might be inclined to say it was only a political gesture, that they do not intend this resolution to pass. But I know so well the character of the hon. member for Springfield who moved it, and many of the other gentlemen behind him, that I realize they are sincere. I say it with all sincerity myself, I believe they are sincere and absolutely prepared to take the consequences of their action, and therefore it is the more fitting, the more necessary, that we should have a show down to find out in this country just where we stand, at least for some years to come.

I admit that the amendment is modestly worded—that is to say it does not go the whole length to ask for free trade. I confess that it is different from what I think they had in mind; but when we come down to a question of this kind we have got to go beyond the present amendment, we have got to get down to the final analysis, and I think I am justified in saying that the fiscal policy of the Progressive party is one of absolute and unadulterated free trade. I do not think that can be gainsaid. You have only to look at the debates of last year to prove that. But you do not even need to do so—the speeches that have been made this evening bear me out when I say that in the final analysis the aim, the aspiration, the goal to which the Progressives are finally committed is free trade and absolute free trade. They have served notice on the government that if they wish to secure, or to have continued, the ever wavering and always uncertain support of the Progressive party, they must carry out the fiscal wishes not only of an extreme party but the fiscal wishes of the extreme members of that extreme party; and it is for the government and for the country to decide whether a party which, after all, numbers only 27 per cent of the total membership of this House is to dictate to the other 73 per cent. That is the question which presents itself to me in connection with this matter. If it was any other party I might use the term political "extortion" but I do not do so because I have too much respect for these gentlemen to my left. Many of them are men of my own kith and kin, we are of a common origin, and I share their views to a very large extent except on the question of the tariff. We have many views in common, and have learned our lessons in the bitter, grinding school of experience; that is why we have so much in common on almost every point of view with the exception of the tariff. Therefore I will not use the phrase "political extortion," but rather the milder term of "political extraction." But, Mr. Speaker, there are times when we weary even of the painless dentist.

Now I have spoken of the situation as it presents itself here to-day. A number of years ago—too many years ago I am afraid, at any rate a long time ago—in Australia in the state—it was before the period of the Commonwealth—of Victoria, of which Melbourne is the capital, there was an election where the new premier of the day found himself in office with a very slim majority. He had been elected on a popular policy but the party which he opposed was strongly entrenched. Being in power he proceeded to carry out the policy on which he had been elected. The opposition were fully aware that it was dangerous and fatal for them to go to the country, but at the same time they proceeded to aggravate, and annoy, the new ministry, and to obstruct to the fullest measure of their ability. They would bring in amendments and the government would not know if they were going to be defeated or not. The opposition endeavoured in every way not only to embarrass the government in carrying out its policy, but at the same time by insidious propaganda to represent that the more or less vacillating conduct of the government was due not to their obstruction but to its inherent weakness. The premier was supposed to be a man lacking in political experience and they thought they could play that game with him. He went along with the policy he had outlined but one fine night the opposition found to their intense surprise that they had defeated the government. In six weeks, however, the administration was back in power again with a sufficient majority. The premier had arranged the thing with a couple of his followers, and, in slang parlance showed the opposition "where they were at," and it has been a lesson to me ever since.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEILL: Had hon. gentlemen opposite allowed me to finish my remarks they would have heard me say it was a lesson to me not merely politically but in all phases of life, for I have ever found that a bold progressive policy always gets a man farther than one of hesitating for fear he gets his feet wet. I believe—and I believe it is as true here to-day as it was in Australia at that time—that this country wants a policy of moderate protection, a policy of protection to the young and struggling industries in all parts of the country, particularly of the West, also a tariff policy that will ease up and reduce the heavy protection now existing on the older and better established industries. I believe that if the government appealed to the country on such a policy they would get an ample and sufficient mandate to carry it out.

Main motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, seconded by Mr. Fielding, it was ordered that the Address be engrossed and transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this House as are of the honourable the Privy Council.

SUPPLY

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House resolve itself into committee to-morrow, to consider of the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not suppose it is really intended to go into committee to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING: No, it is the usual formal motion made at the opening of the session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I merely call attention to the fact that it does not seem necessary to be made. It is not in order now, we are not under motions.

Mr. FIELDING: This motion is always made at the beginning of every session. It is merely a declaration on the part of the House that it will grant supply at a later time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I just call attention to the fact that it should be made under motions. We are under the Orders of the Day now.

Mr. FIELDING: It always follows immediately after the adoption of the Address. My hon. friend will see that if he consults the record.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but under motions.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

On motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) it was ordered that the House resolve itself into a committee to-morrow to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Mackenzie King moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What will be the business for Friday?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We propose to take up to-morrow government notices of motion if the House will give its consent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What government notices of motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those that appear in to-day's order paper. According to Friday's procedure they will be the first on the Orders of the Day to-morrow, and they have been on the order paper now for some days. I think members are all familiar with them, and I should imagine would be ready to proceed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it intended to take up all the government notices of motion? There are six or seven of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will depend entirely upon the length of the debate in each case. I think some of them are noncontentious and will occupy but a short time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the Prime Minister give the order in which they will be taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that they be taken in the order in which they appear on the order paper.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 1.28 a.m. (Friday).

Friday, February 9, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Northwest Territories Act. He said: The purpose of this proposed legislation is to permit the trial outside of the Northwest Territories of persons charged with crimes committed within those territories, and to provide for such trial by the same court and according to the same procedure as if the trial took place within the said territories. The amendment is of particular importance in view of the necessity which confronts us of bringing to trial next summer a number of Eskimos charged with murders in different parts of the Northwest Territories. These Eskimos are now under guard at Herschell Island where we propose to try them on account of facilities which we find at that place for their confinement and trial. Furthermore, provision has to be made so that the decisions given pursuant to that new and large jurisdiction may be enforced, by execution or otherwise, at the place where they are made outside of the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Criminal Code. He said: The purpose of this bill is to abolish the death penalty for all crimes for which it may be imposed under the present criminal code, and to substitute therefor life imprisonment. I may add that the bill I am now introducing is exactly the same measure, in every particular, as the one which was introduced in this House by Mr. Bickerdike on February 9, 1915.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VIMY RIDGE MONUMENT

FRANCE'S GIFT OF MEMORIAL SITE GRATEFULLY ACCEPTED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the Speech which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament at the opening of the session, mention was made of a gift by the Republic of France to the Dominion of Canada of a tract of land on Vimy Ridge. His Excellency referred to this gift in the following words:

> The Government of France has graciously offered to the Canadian Government a tract of land of 250 acres on Vimy Ridge, at the site selected for the erection by Canada of a monument commemorating the exploits of Canadian troops in the Great War. This gift has been gratefully accepted, and a bill approving the agreement has been duly introduced in the French Parliament. An appropriate resolution expressing Canada's appreciation of the action of the French Government will be offered for your acceptance.

There would appear to be something peculiarly appropriate and gratifying in the circumstance that His Excellency, whose name and fame are so inseparably associated with the achievements of the Canadian army at Vimy Ridge, should be the one whose privilege it was to announce to the members of our parliament this gift of the Republic of France to the Dominion of Canada.

I have the honour, Mr. Speaker, to move:

> That it be resolved by the House of Commons,
> That Parliament do approve the acceptance by the Government of Canada of the gift graciously made by the Republic of France of a tract of land 250 acres in extent on Vimy Ridge at the site selected for the erection by Canada, of a monument commemorating the exploits of Canadian soldiers in the Great War and in so doing records its sense of gratitude for and its high appreciation of the motives which prompted France to associate herself with a project so dear to the hearts of the Canadian people.

Hon. members will recall that in the consideration last session of the appropriation for the Battlefields Memorial Commission a general wish was expressed by the leaders of the different parties in this House that if at all possible the commission should acquire a tract of land on Vimy Ridge which would form a suitable environment for the monument to be erected at that place in commemoration of the heroism of Canada's soldiers overseas. It was in pursuance of that wish that you, Mr. Speaker, during the interval since last session, visited France and conducted on behalf of the Battlefields Memorial Commission negotiations with the French government for the acquisition of this tract of land. The fact that we have received as a gift, what we should gladly have acquired by purchase, while due to the generosity of France, which we acknowledge in the fullest measure, is no doubt also due in part to your well-known tact and diplomacy in dealing with international affairs.

I would like to read to the House the text of the agreement with respect to this grant of land. The agreement was drafted on the 5th December, 1922, and concluded as between the French government, represented by Mr. Charles Reibel, Minister of Liberated Regions on the one part, and the government of Canada, represented by Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, Speaker of the House of Commons on the other part. It reads:

Whereas the Government of Canada desires to erect on Vimy Ridge (Pas-de-Calais), in the centre of a park which they intend to lay out, and the maintenance of which they will assume, a monument to the memory of the Canadian soldiers who fell on the field of honour in France during the war of 1914-1918, the French Government put at their disposal the necessary land which will remain the property of the French Republic.

Whereas, on the other hand, France desires to associate herself in the tribute which Canada wishes to pay to the victims of the great war, and as moreover, the land concerned, comprised in the red zone, is to be acquired by France in conformity with section 46 of subsection 7 of the Act of the 17th April 1919.

Article I

The French Government grants, freely and for all time to the Government of Canada, the use and free disposal of a parcel of land of 100 hectares on Vimy Ridge in the Department of Pas-de-Calais, the boundaries of which are indicated on the plan hereto annexed.

Article II

The Government of Canada pledge themselves to lay out this land into a park and to erect thereon a monument to the memory of the Canadian soldiers fallen on the field of honour in France during the war of 1914-1918.

They moreover pledge themselves to provide for the maintenance of the park and monument, in default of which the French Government would resume the free disposal of the park, except however the land on which the memorial is erected.

Article III

The land granted to the Government of Canada by this agreement will be exempt of all taxes and imposts. The French Government will take the responsibility of all difficulties with the borderers, except those arising from damages caused by the personnel or the material belonging to the Government of Canada and kept in France for the maintenance and protection of the park and monument.

Article IV

There shall be obligatorily mentioned on the monument the names of all units of the same class of the Canadian army having fought on Vimy Ridge during the same period of time.

Article V

This Agreement will become effective by the passing, by Parliament, of a bill approving its provisions which the French Government has laid on the Table of the House.

In testimony whereof, on the day and year above mentioned, this agreement was drawn in four copies, each copy having the same force and effect as an original by the French Government represented by Charles Reibel, Minister of Liberated Regions, and the Government of Canada represented by Mr. Rodolphe Lemieux, Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada.

It is the purpose of the Battlefields Memorial Commission to erect, in all, eight monuments, three of them in Belgium, the other five in France. Of the eight monuments to be erected, the most important, indeed one of the most imposing and noble monuments in the world, will be the Allward monument to be erected on Vimy Ridge. As mentioned in the agreement I have just read, this monument will record the names of other units which fought at Vimy Ridge of a like standing with the Canadian army. There is, however, another record to be placed on that monument which will, I imagine, touch even more deeply the hearts of all Canadians. It is the names of some 20,000 Canadians who were numbered among the missing, and for whom there are not individual graves in either France or Belgium. Happily their names will for all time be recorded on this monument to be erected at Vimy.

I need not say anything to the House of the significance of Vimy Ridge. There were many battles fought in the great war; and for many purposes, it would be unwise to seek in any way to draw comparisons between them. This possibly may be said of Vimy which could not be said of the others: that it was at Vimy that the Canadian corps first fought as a unit, composed of men from every part of Canada. It was at Vimy that the Canadian army was welded into an efficient fighting organization, so strong that no opposing armies could resist it; and that Canadian soldiers were able to achieve what no other army had been able to do in the meeting of the enemy at that point. Vimy Ridge stands as one of the world's great altars of sacrifice. As one reflects upon the significance of the Great War, one cannot but feel a resemblance, albeit on a world's scale, between that colossal tragedy and the tragedy of 1900 years ago, when the best life which the world has ever known was sacrificed through the materialism of its day that mankind might enjoy a wider measure of spiritual freedom. In the tragedy of the late war, it was not one life only, it was an appreciable portion of humanity, which was sacrificed for the sake of the larger freedom of mankind. History will look upon the battlegrounds of the Great War as the places of sacrifice. Among the number, no altar will be more conspicuous through the years than that of Vimy Ridge.

There is something which is more deserving of recognition in the gift of the French Republic. It is not so many years ago, as history records time, that Canada was a part of France in the new world, and that, in what was considered enlightened opinion of the day, Canada was referred to as so many acres of snow. To-day, under world conditions as transformed as any the human imagination can well conceive, the Republic of France, in a spirit of gratitude, grants to our Dominion, no longer her possession, not a few acres of land covered with snow, in some remote and unknown part, but a tract of land, as sacred as any in Europe, consecrated with the blood of human sacrifice of Canada's own sons in the cause of the world's freedom. This is the gift which we to-day as a parliament acknowledge with gratitude to France, and this we do, deeply moved by all that it implies of a close relationship between the British and French people. We recognize in the gift this larger significance, that above and beyond all the changes that time may bring, changes of the past and uncertainties of the present, there is an enduring friendship between the French and the British peoples, which stands for all that is best in the maintenance of human liberty, and the freedom of the world.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my warm approval of this resolution. The site of Vimy is, beyond comparison, of the various battlefields of the war, the most closely associated in the hearts of the Canadian people with all that the war involved in story and in sacrifice. I am moved by one regret, that the feelings of this parliament, as embalmed in the resolution, feelings of undoubted gratitude and appreciation, cannot be expressed, rather than by me, by one who like yourself, Mr. Speaker, or many others assembled here, is linked by memories more sacred with all that sacrifice. I stood on Vimy Ridge four years ago, and again in 1921. As an observer, I could see something of the story of turmoil, of blood, of terror, of heroism, in which the sons of this country bore so conspicuous a part, and I know that Canadians returning there in the years to come, will be filled with feelings of gratitude to the nation for whom the boys of this country fought so gallantly and who, in recognition of all that has been accomplished, have given us this historic site. It is not in any way related to the question of overcoming a difficulty of purchase that we recognize the value of this gift; the significance of it all lies in the feelings that prompted the French parliament and the French people. That is what makes the gift infinitely more valuable than would be its acquirement in any other way.

Since the war ended, in the tragedy of the events that have ensued, differences of view, differences that I cannot help but think are intellectual and intellectual alone, have unfortunately, in some degree, parted the pathways of Britain and of France. I think I can say that notwithstanding differences of conclusion as to methods that have arisen, the heart of Britain is to-day in sympathy with France, and if the test were necessary, would be shown to be in sympathy to a degree equal to that which prompted her efforts in four years of war.

I believe the action of France in this regard will meet with fitting response throughout the whole of this Dominion, and I hope that years will not measure the time before the heart of Canada will be severed from France. We fought that France might be free; we fought as well that Britain might be free; we fought as well that Canada might be free. In the memory of the common struggle and the common sacrifice, we are linked, and linked forever.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I should like, in a few words, to associate myself with the sentiments expressed in this resolution. In these trying days, when troubles surround us on every hand, incidents such as these reveal to us the inherent goodness and kindness of the human heart. I know there is an enduring memorial inscribed in the breasts and hearts of the Canadian people to those splendid men who went overseas and sacrificed so much for us. The passing years will, no doubt, obliterate in some degree the memory of those great gifts bestowed upon the Canadian people, and I rejoice in the fact that there will be erected upon the soil of France a monument to those sons of Canada; and that—lest we forget—that monument will still stand during ages in the future. I also agree that it is fitting that you yourself, Mr. Speaker, should have had a part in the negotiations in connection with this splendid gift which France has seen fit to make to the Canadian people. I will not add any more than to say that I am sure that once again this day we remember with gratitude the heroism and devotion of those who sacrificed their all for the freedom of the world and for the good of our Canadian land.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, Canada, to-day, in the eloquent terms uttered by its Prime Minister, sends forth to France the acknowledgement of its gratitude. The leaders of the other parliamentary parties have associated themselves with these sentiments; perhaps it is befitting that a French voice should join in this unanimous expression of the heartfelt feelings of the Canadian nation. This plot of land that we possess in France has been rendered illustrious and sacred by the heroism of our soldiers, they have written there a page of history that the sons of Canada will always read with pride and emotion. By granting it to us, France wished that it should ever be dedicated and consecrated to the glorious memory of those who came there to fight and die so that she might be free and victorious. It will be a bit of Canadian fatherland in the greater fatherland of France, an everlasting pledge of the sacred union and close friendship which must always subsist between our two countries. Mr. Speaker, it was your acknowledged privilege to negotiate, in the name of Canada, this gratifying concession which was granted to us. On more than one score you were entitled to this honour and you were particularly qualified to make such a request. By granting it, France wished to pay you a personal homage whilst bestowing an honour on our country. I feel fully confident that the monument which will be erected on the historical ridge of Vimy will recall to future generations the great ideal for which our soldiers so valiantly battled. Sixty thousand Canadians had died so as to establish a reign of justice and peace; all fought to prevent any further war and it is our ultimate hope that the civilized nations of the world will respect their sacrifice by not rendering it fruitless and illusory.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that perhaps someone much more worthy than myself would say a word in this connection as representing rather the men who were over there than the people of this country. However, as a returned soldier, as one of those who had the honour of being at Vimy Ridge on April 9, 1917,—and let me assure the House that I say this with no thought whatever of self-glorification—I should like to say a word—although without the authority of the returned soldiers in the matter—by way of associating myself and them with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) and the Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe), in the acceptance from France of the site for the erection of a monument by this country. I do not think that there has been exaggeration on the part of any of the speakers who have referred to the glorious deeds of the Canadian boys, and I doubt whether any situation could be chosen by the Canadian government, if the choice were left to them, that would be more emblematic of the deeds of the Canadian soldiers than the site which has been offered so generously by the French government to the government of Canada. May I also congratulate you, Sir, on the part you have played in this matter, and express the opinion that you deserve the thanks of this country both as its honourable representative and as one who has made very great personal sacrifices in the promotion of peace and good government in the world. I congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman through whom the French government made this offer, and I cherish the hope that the erection of this monument may help in some small way to bring about that "parliament of man, the federation of the world," which was so eloquently spoken of by an English poet many years ago.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The spendid gift of the French government, in the negotiation of which you, Mr. Speaker, had such a useful and honourable part, is evidence of the gratitude of the French nation—because I am sure that in this case the gratitude comes not only from the French government but from the people of France as well—for the service which Canada rendered the world in the great war. I rise now only that I may be permitted to mention another incident which illustrates the feeling of the French people. Of course, every Canadian who goes to France now makes if possible a pilgrimage to Vimy, and naturally I did so. And I recall the fact that on the way to Vimy we passed through the town of Cambrai. There the Canadian visitors were met by the mayor and town council of the town who desired to express in a very formal way their recollections of the services rendered by the Canadian soldiers in and about their town, and to give utterance to their gratitude, in order that the Canadian people might learn that the French people were not unmindful of what our soldiers had done. In terms of the warmest commendation they spoke of the service rendered by our men and of the great part they had played in the battles in that stormy region; and then, to mark their feelings in a more tangible way, they brought us a magnificent wreath of flowers that we might use it as expressing their sympathy. It was placed in one of the graveyards, which are too numerous, I am sorry to say, in the Vimy region. I do not know whether this incident was ever recorded in Canada, but it is one of the indications that the part played by the Canadian soldiers in that great drama is fully and gratefully remembered not only by the French government but by the French people as well.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): There will be no resolution introduced into this House at any time with which we shall be more proud to associate ourselves than the one which has just been moved. When we remember the circumstances under which the great war broke upon the world; when we remember the fear that took possession of us for a time: when we remember the call that went forth to all the world to join in the battle for freedom; when we remember that from among ourselves there went out young men who had known nothing about war, it is not surprising that we wondered at that time whether, when the great trial came in actual battle, our young men would prove equal to the demands that would be made upon them. It was but natural that such a thought should enter our minds, for our boys had had no experience of such events as they were soon called upon to participate in. But when the time came and they were actually face to face with the enemy, they proved, Mr. Speaker, as I believe it will be proved again and again in human history, the falsity of that old Satanic cynicism that "all that a man hath will he give for his life." And should such occasion arise again our men would undoubtedly give similar proof that there are things men hold dearer than life when, in the course of their days, they are called upon to make great decisions, not for life, not for personal honour, nor for glory, but for the cause of God and the cause of right. Our Canadian boys fully met that demand that was made upon them. In all ages men have been pleased to set up stones of commemoration to remind their children of the deeds performed by their forefathers. And for centuries to come there will stand on Vimy Ridge a stone of remembrance to which the French people of future generations will point their children and say: Here is the place where men from far over the seas came in order that they might help us preserve not only for France, not only for Europe, but for the whole world, the great benefits which have been won for us and which we enjoy through our civilization of to-day. Again, Mr. Speaker, let me say it is a proud moment in my life to be able to associate myself with this resolution.

Mr. J. G. ROBICHAUD (Gloucester) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I cannot allow this occasion to pass by without making the voice of the Acadian people heard. If, in the past, the Canadian people had misgivings and underwent sufferings, we, in Acadia, received the crown of martyrdom, and this is the reason why I feel it is my duty to say at least a word in behalf of our dear Acadia.

When the trumpet sounded summoning all the civilized nations of the world to take part in the great war, the Acadians from the Maritime provinces answered the call. In the county of Gloucester, which I have the honour to represent in this House, whole villages answered the call of the Motherland. For instance, in a village numbering twenty-two young men, twenty had fought overseas while the other two had been found unfit for military service.

Mr. Speaker, it gives me much pleasure to mingle my humble voice with those—far more eloquent—we have just heard in order to second this resolution, and, in the future, when the Acadians together with the other elements of the Canadian population will visit "la belle France", they will find there, as it was so happily expressed by the speaker who preceded me, a diminutive fatherland which they can admire.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING thereupon moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House has adopted a resolution approving the Government's acceptance of the gift made by the Government of France of a tract of land on Vimy Ridge for the erection of a monument commemorating the exploits of Canadian soldiers in the Great War, and requesting that Their Honours will unite with this House in the approval of the said acceptance by filling up the blanks therein with the words "Senate and"

Motion agreed to.

COLD STORAGE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Cold Storage Act, chapter six of the statutes of 1907, and to provide that the Governor in Council may enter into contracts with properly constituted co-operative societies or associations, for the construction, equipment and maintenance in efficient working order of public cold storage warehouses in Canada equipped with mechanical refrigeration, and suitable for the preservation of any food product.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General has been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution and recommends it to the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The bill to be introduced shortly, based upon this resolution, is an amendment to the Cold Storage Act of 1907 and the amendments thereto. The act provided for certain subsidies to encourage the construction of cold storage plants throughout Canada. During the first few years after its enactment very little advantage was taken of these subsidies. However, as the people become more familiar with the act, and less fearful of cold storage, advantage was taken of the opportunities offered by that legislation, and during the war still greater advantage was taken. After the war, in 1919, the government of the day, and, I think, quite correctly, amended the act and made it apply to municipal cold storages only. Before that it applied to all and sundry, but the activity under it began to absorb a good deal of money to pay the subsidies earned. In the meantime the local authorities went ahead with the construction of a cold storage plant at Montreal, and we now have one of the best plants at that harbour to be found on this continent. But that was four years ago, and in the interval no subsidies have been earned under the amendment providing for the encouragement of municipal cold storage plants. It would appear as if municipalities are not anxious to construct cold storage plants even with this encouragement. Only one other municipality has attempted to comply with the act, but up to date it has not got sufficiently far on to earn the first instalment of the subsidy, neither do I know if it ever will be able to reach that point.

Mr. HANSON: What plant is that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: At Sydney, Cape Breton. In view of that, Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come when we should amend this act so that it will function. The proposal is to make these subsidies apply to co-operative cold storage plants. This is an age of co-operation, as to the advantages of which, however, there is some difference of opinion. A certain number of municipal cold storage plants had been constructed before the act was amended in 1919. Now, it is proposed to revert, though not entirely, to the old act of 1907, which applied to all kinds of cold storage plants, including those constructed by private enterprise. The proposed amendment will make the act applicable to co-operative cold storage plants, preferably to those of a non-profit-making character that pay out a portion at least of their profits to their patrons in proportion to the business they have brought to their respective plants.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is it intended to apply to municipal cold storage plants?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That would be a matter for the committee to consider. Personally I do not think it should; the application to municipal cold storage plants has been given a fair trial, and nobody seems to want it. These municipal plants have not, perhaps, been so successful as to justify our subsidizing them, but I suppose there would not be much objection to retaining that option in the bill. I do not feel strongly on the question, though. The point is that the Cold Storage Act should be permitted to function some way, preferably in the direction of co-operative activity.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): On what basis is it proposed to distribute these subsidies?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They will be distributed on the basis of the old act—in four annual instalments, at the rate of 30 per cent of the cost of construction.

Mr. SALES: Do I understand the minister to say that there was no change in the act until 1919?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was an unimportant change in 1909.

Mr. SALES: Was there no suspension of the act until 1919?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The act was made to apply to municipal cold storages only. It was not a suspension, but it had that effect.

Mr. SALES: The minister is, of course, aware of the conditions in Saskatchewan. I understand that the Saskatchewan Co-operative Creamery undertook work at Saskatoon and at Melville, at considerable expense. They did not get the assistance they expected to get under the act, and they consequently ran into difficulties. Has the minister any information on that subject?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend is not correctly informed. The erection of that cold storage plant was started by a private institution; it was subsequently purchased by the Saskatchewan Co-operative Creamery as a going concern, and they went on with the construction. The government of that day decided that the subsidy should follow the new ownership, and the company received $32,400 on that account. The cubic measurement of the building was 98,832 feet, and the total cost of construction was $108,000.

4 p.m.

Mr. SALES: Can the minister give me the figures for Melville as well?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was after the suspension, as my hon. friend calls it, that the Melville cold storage plant was constructed.

Mr. ANDERSON: This amendment will not interfere with any private persons going into the abattoir or cold storage business as a joint stock company?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: The words are used here, "properly constituted co-operative societies or associations." What is the minister's idea of a properly constituted co-operative society?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, there are differences of opinion as to what constitutes co-operation. Some people take the ground that ordinary joint stock companies with benevolent intention may be looked upon as co-operative, and frequently they are so classed —not without jurisdiction. Strictly speaking, a co-operative organization is one which distributes at least part of its profits. But the intention is to make the definition elastic. If we make a rigid definition in the act we may find that it will not apply to certain enterprises that may be quite worthy. The matter will be determined, therefore, by regulations that are flexible and may be changed from time to time.

Mr. BRISTOL: Will incorporated companies be shut out by this amendment?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Joint stock companies?

Mr. BRISTOL: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not necessarily. That will be a proper subject for consideration by the committee—whether a co-operative concern may be defined as a body organized in the ordinary way under the Companies Act.

Mr. BRISTOL: I think incorporated companies are excluded now.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Everything is excluded now except municipal plants—though not, of course, in the original act.

Mr. HODGINS: Are the provinces giving any assistance along this line?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not that I know of. Perhaps some of the members from British Columbia would be better able to answer that. I believe that the British Columbia government has assisted the fruit industry by certain loans, but I do not think any subsidies are paid. Hon. Manning Doherty, of Ontario, has it in mind to introduce a bill—if indeed, he has not already done so—providing for provincial assistance to cold storage plants by way of loan, but not, I believe, by way of subsidy.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If this resolution carries in its present form, how will it be possible in committee to enlarge it to include incorporated companies? It seems to me we should insert the words "or other companies" so that the Committee on Agriculture will have power to enlarge it if they see fit.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a proper question, but the idea is not to tie ourselves down to anything too specific. The explanation now being given is of a general character, and the details can be dealt with either in the Committee on Agriculture, or later in Committee of the Whole. I think it is the custom, as a matter of expediency, to first introduce a resolution that is to be the basis of a bill. As to the details I do not think we should be tied right down hard and fast at this stage. The bill itself is ready, I think.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if this resolution passes we are absolutely debarred from enlarging the scope of the bill.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is not my understanding. I have often wondered why it was necessary to introduce a resolution at all, because you have to go over the same ground on the second reading, but we have to follow this procedure as a matter of parliamentary practice. However, the passage of the resolution is not supposed to tie us down in the matter of the changing of the bill at a subsequent stage. The second reading of a bill simply expresses the approval of the House on the general principles embodied in the measure. Then you go into committee and the details of the bill are dealt with. That is the procedure as I understand it.

Mr. HODGINS: I would draw attention to the expense which the proposed legislation will involve if it is taken advantage of all over the country. It has always seemed to me that it is our duty to provide for terminal facilities, but to make provision for co-operative associations all over the country will involve tremendous expense.

Mr. TOLMIE: The cold storage principle has rendered valuable service in connection with our range beef production in the West, and is of great utility at the present time in connection with our fruit industry, particularly as regards shipments for a distance where it is necessary to pre-cool the fruit. I would ask the minister to define the kind of company whose business would be of sufficient importance to entitle it to a grant. How many tons output would he consider necessary before such a company could receive aid?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the past the act has provided that mechanical storage must be supplied. The cubic contents of the building has not been defined nor yet the total cost upon which to base the subsidy

As I understand the working of the act in the past, the grant has been made in the case of a business sufficiently developed to want to establish a mechanical cold storage, or that would be sufficiently large to justify the erection of such a plant. Compliance must be made with the conditions on which the grant is earned, by the installation of mechanical cold storage. The plans and specifications have to be supplied to the Department of Agriculture before the grant is made. I may say to the hon. member (Mr. Tolmie) that if a provision as to minimum size was necessary it could be inserted in the bill. It has not, however, proved to be necessary in the past because the stipulations with regard to mechanical storage have taken care of it.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will the application of joint stock companies and municipalities for cold storage be included?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Personally I do not think so. At the same time I shall seek the advice and counsel of the committee later on in regard to these details. I may say to the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) that the first cold storage plant taken over by the co-operative creameries in the West was one that was constructed in Regina and operated municipally. It was a magnificent failure, and it was with a great deal of trepidation that the co-operative creameries took it over, because they were afraid that the bad reputation it had earned in the past would follow it under the new ownership. Notwithstanding that, twelve months after they took it over and operated it on a business basis, they made it pay. I would not like to condemn cold storage in all individual cases. As a general rule, however, they have not been successful, and I could not advise, from my knowledge of them, that we should grant subsidies in all such cases, particularly as money is so scarce at the present time.

Mr. SPENCE: As I view the matter the municipalities are to be deprived of the right of taking advantage of this grant for cold storage purposes, and it looks as though this assistance was intended to be limited to co-operative societies. That, I think, would be an actual injustice. I claim that the municipality has just the same right as any co-operative organization in this matter. I would like to know specifically from the minister where he intends to establish these cold storages and what existing co-operative societies they are intended to benefit. What is the idea underlying this legislation?

Mr. CARROLL: Some years ago I interested myself in the matter of cold storage—

Mr. SPENCE: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I asked the minister where he intended to establish these cold storages and if the co-operative societies sought to be aided are in existence.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In answer to the hon. member's last question I would say that they are not in existence. The regulations stipulate that the institution must be established before a subsidy can be paid. As to where they are going to be established that is something with which we have nothing to do at all, it rests with those who are going into the enterprise whoever they may be. They can get together and put up an institution of this description, and when they comply with the regulations and the law they will get their subsidy. I think my hon. friend wants to know whether the bill, when passed, will be retroactive, and whether it will apply to institutions of any description? I hope it will not be retroactive because the dear knows where that would lead us. It would not be encouraging anything new at all, it would be subsidizing something already in existence. Consequently the law will apply to new plants, or possibly the extension of old ones. That will give additional accommodation and service to the country. As to including municipal cold storages, in view of the fact that this grant has been held out as a drawing card for four years to the municipalities of Canada to influence them to construct cold storage plants, and has not resulted in one earning a dollar under it, and in view of the doubtful reputation that these institutions have as an economic success, surely we would not be justified in continuing such aid, but we should rather take such moneys as we have at our disposal and develop something else that is more urgently required at the present time—that is, the co-operative institution.

Mr. MORRISON: During the last four years municipalities have been going through a series of hard times, and have been hearing that word "economy" a little bit in their midst. They are all overtaxed, and the people have been crying for rigid economy, and perhaps that has militated against municipalities taking advantage of this act. I for one would not exclude them from the benefits of the act, but I am not much of an advocate for subsidizing anything. In the past the system has been abused, and the people have had to pay for it. If it was desired to help the cold storage business the government might consider the matter of facilitating a good credit system. That would be more advantageous and would not cost the country anything. If those who are engaged in co-operative movements had a good line of credit supplied to them on security, they should be able to get along. With reference to people who are co-operating for their mutual benefit, I do not believe in giving anybody something for nothing. My experience is that it is bad practice. I believe in giving them credit facilities, and if they obtain those facilities and cannot manage their business, I do not know why they should manage it on the public money.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The benefit of cold storage facilities is so great that it seems to me remarkable that greater advantage has not been taken of the opportunities offered. My recollection of the situation as it was in 1919 is that the co-operative companies who had earned the bonus which was given by the government did not afford the facilities to the public that the Cold Storage Act was intended to afford, and it was hoped that by confining it to municipal bodies the general public would have access to the facilities afforded by cold storage. It appears that there has not been very much done along that line during the past few years. I would like to ask the minister: Will those who do not belong to co-operative companies be permitted to use the cold storage plant, provided they pay for it? I would like to know whether the public are being safeguarded in that respect.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that is the intention, although I might say that after the subsidies are all paid it will not be an easy matter. It is difficult for the federal authorities to extend jurisdiction over certain activities, and this is one of them. As a rule these institutions are very submissive to federal control as long as any unpaid subsidies are still due them, but after the final payment has been made, I think no method has been discovered of controlling them to the extent some people want. You can control the rates, but just to what extent you can control them and say what amount of space shall be allotted to the public is hard to say. There is some doubt about our constitutional right to so control those institutions. That is a matter that we run up against in the administration of several of our acts—the Grain Act, for instance, and several others. So far as we have jurisdiction, we propose to have control over these institutions.

Mr. ANDERSON: Has there been any demand from the co-operative companies for cold storage plants, and if so where did it come from?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On the spur of the moment, the only one I can name—although I can recall discussing it with many farmers—is the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario, Hon. Manning Doherty. People would come and ask what is being done in the matter of cold storage; I would refer them to the act, and on further discussion I would have to admit no money was being spent over it. I have to take the responsibility of asking for money here in parliament, and I do not want to come back here year after year and say that I am not spending the money. The act must be made to function, or we might as well let it lapse. In fact, it has been lapsing. I have personal knowledge that these subsidies in the past have been given to co-operative storages, and in answer to the hon. member from Weyburn (Mr. Morrison) I think if my hon. friend had his money invested in cold storage plants a few years ago, and had to administer the cold storage plant, with the sentiment that existed in the country at that time against cold storage and cold storage produce, he would find he would not get very large return on his investment, and some form of assistance and encouragement in the way of a subsidy would be required to get him to put his money into it at all. That has been my experience. Of late years people have become more familiar with cold storage and not so alarmed about it. I did not care to state any reduction in this resolution, but I intended to raise the question whether so high a rate of subsidy as 30 per cent was required to encourage people to take advantage of the act at this time—possibly 25 per cent would be enough. That would be a fluctuating matter, and I am not committed to it in any way, in fact, I think it could be argued that if it required 30 per cent of the cost of construction to encourage a man to go into the cold storage business fifteen years ago, it could easily be argued that 25 per cent should be enough now. These are details and this is not exactly the proper time to go into them, but I have no objection, if the hon. members desire, to taking the matter up.

Mr. MILLAR: What security, if any, is it proposed the government should take? If one of these co-operative associations should become financially embarrassed and close its doors, what security would the government have for the money advanced?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is not a loan but a subsidy, and none of it will have to be paid till after the building is constructed and the store is open for business. If the company should fail, and cease to give the service, we would not go ahead with the payments. That is one reason why the instalments are divided into four.

Mr. MORRISON: I would like to suggest to the minister that, instead of giving a subsidy, he should give a loan. Then he would have control of the service for all time. When these people refuse to give patrons reasonably good service, if they were to get notice that their loan expired, I think it would be a pretty good equalizer for a government that is participating in this building business. You need to have some control over your money invested, and I think the government, as representing the people and putting up the people's money, should have a say in the service, and that would be a leverage for the government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that is a very proper suggestion.

Mr. CARROLL: With reference to the control of cold storage warehouses, I think it is time that this government and parliament, if they are giving any sums of money, whether large or small, towards the establishment, maintenance and working of cold storages in this country, should have some control, at least as regards the health of the people. I believe that cold storage has done considerable good for Canada. On the other hand, I fear that people who have taken advantage of the Cold Storage Act of 1907 have not given as much attention as they should to the care of the products put into the cold storage warehouses. Some question has arisen as regards the jurisdiction of this parliament to make regulations governing cold storage. I have in my hand an opinion given by the Deputy Minister of Justice in 1919, in which he expresses grave doubts as to the jurisdiction of this parliament to make general regulations regarding cold storage. On the other hand, he does express an opinion that this government may make regulations regarding the goods that go into cold storage, as affecting the health of the people of Canada. When this bill comes down, I think I shall take the opportunity of moving some amendment which will preserve, to some small extent at least, the health of the people. There is no doubt in the world that articles of cold storage have been foisted upon the public as being fresh. I do not know whether that is a criminal action or not, but it is absolutely wrong. In the first place, cold storage articles should be so labelled that persons who are using them may know exactly what they are getting. In the second place, regulations should be made governing the removal of articles from cold storage to an outside wholesale place, for example, because there is no doubt that such a change is calculated to injure the article, if it is meat or any farm product. As I said before, I did not have an opportunity of telling the minister my opinions upon this matter; but I mention to him now that when this bill comes before the House, I shall be prepared with some amendments to the Cold Storage Act of 1907, in addition to the ones which he has brought down in this resolution.

There seems to be some doubt whether or not municipal corporations have a right to take advantage of the act of 1907, and to get the 30 per cent which this and other governments have given to persons going into the cold storage business. As a matter of fact, the Cold Storage Act of 1907 placed no limitation upon people or corporations that decided to take advantage of it. The Governor-in-Council accepted applications from municipal corporations and private corporations. If in the good judgment of the Governor-in-Council, applicants could properly carry on a cold storage business, they gave them 30 per cent of the cost of building and equipment. It may be interesting to note that, prior to the outbreak of the war, a sum amounting to $722,506 was paid to persons and corporations that took advantage of the Cold Storage Act. For one year after the war there was only one applicant, and the government of that day thought it was time they should place a limit upon persons or corporations to whom this advantage should be given. I find Order in Council, P.C. No. 1103 of the year 1919, which recounts various transactions, amounts of money paid, and so on, in connection with cold storage, and one of the closing paragraphs states:

> In view of the above, it would appear inadvisable to continue the payment of subsidies, except in the case of warehouses to be erected by municipal or other public governing bodies.

I am not prepared to say what the effect of that order in council is as against a statute; but at least it shows what the policy of the government was at that time. It shows also that the government of the day had particularly in view the matter of extending those privileges of cold storage to municipal corporations or other public governing bodies. I am afraid the matter of administration of cold storage under the act of 1907 has not been exactly what it should be. I take the same stand as the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Morrison), that if this government is going to contribute sums of money, large or small, to help out private individuals, municipal corporations, public bodies or others, for the public good, it should have absolute control over the general working out of that scheme. Unless this government is amply aware of the fact that it has the power to make regulations which will give it control over such bodies, I am afraid I am one of those who will be obliged to vote against the resolution of the Minister of Agriculture. We must not be hampered by laws as to jurisdiction; we must not be hampered in respect to technicalities. I think I know one way of getting over the legal technicality suggested by Mr. Newcombe, and that is to introduce a new bill to amend the Cold Storage Act. Instead of making regulations which may or may not have the force of law, this parliament has ample and plenary jurisdiction to pass an amendment to the Cold Storage Act to preserve the rights of this government, this parliament and this country in the matter of cold storage. I would suggest to the minister that he should ask the law officers of his department or the law officers of the Justice department what their opinion is regarding my suggestion, because we, as legislators here, should realize to the full that the time has come when, if we are going to distribute public moneys over this country, we should have a great deal to say as to the purposes for which they are to be expended, and the regulations under which they are to be expended.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The point brought up by my hon. friend (Mr. Carroll) is a very important one. Shortly after I came down here, I took this matter up with the Deputy Minister of Justice. I had been familiar, in a general way, with the limitations of the federal laws with respect to matters of trade in provinces and similar matters, but I was not sufficiently familiar with them to have any opinion worth while on the subject. In discussing the question of making amendments to the Cold Storage Act, we very soon ran up against the limitation to which the hon. member refers. Since then, on further consultation with the Deputy Minister of Justice, we think we have discovered a solution. I was not intending to discuss it and I do not think I should discuss it here, because the matter is still in a tentative state. I think it will work out. It is along the line of supplementary legislation on the part of the provinces. That is, one way of getting over the difficulty is that to the extent that we have not authority, they, if they are willing, delegate to us that authority. The solution is not sufficiently advanced to discuss it any further just now than to say that I have the matter in mind, and I hope, before any cold storage institutions are established and are eligible to draw any subsidies, the solution will be at hand. We shall have to act on faith in the meantime. I think we should get the advantages of these subsidies; I think corporate institutions require to be built, not only in the dairy industry, but even more in the fruit industry, for example, in the Annapolis valley and in British Columbia. If we find that we cannot control these institutions—but I think we can—we can consider some subsequent action to take. I think, after that statement, I may hope for the support of my hon. friend. I recognize the limitations that the law had before, and I can see the absurdity of subsidizing an institution, if after the last instalment is paid, you have not full control. We hope that we have found a solution that will meet the situation; otherwise I would not be unfolding this proposition to the House to-day. As my hon. friend (Mr. Sales) knows, we have had some experience with these matters, and fortunate, too, notwithstanding the limitations. But we were working from the provincial standpoint then; now we are dealing with the matter federally. In reply to my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Morrison), I might explain that when we started to prepare the bill we had the alternative of either a loan or a subsidy. Now, it is not considered quite the thing for a new minister to upset the work of his predecessor to too great an extent at the beginning, and as a compromise with that idea I at first thought of giving assistance in the shape of 15 per cent of a loan and an equal amount by way of subsidy, the loan of course returnable, the subsidy not. However, on more mature consideration I thought it best to re-introduce the matter in the same old way, and as time went on we could make any necessary changes. Personally, I do not like the idea of the federal government going into the loaning business; and if we were to give a loan I should have to consult the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who I am sure would be obliged to weigh the matter very carefully. On the other hand, the subsidy basis was established away back in 1907, and we thought it would be best just to make the old act begin to function again. That, no doubt, was taking the line of least resistance, but I think that in that direction we may hope for the best results in the immediate future. As time goes on modifications can be introduced. I am ready to modify the act now and accept my hon. friend's suggestion of half loan and half subsidy, or, if he likes, all loan. But I question very much whether the Minister of Finance would care to take up the loaning proposition, and I do not want to run counter to his views on an important matter like this that devolves so largely on his shoulders. For the present I prefer the subsidy. Government loaning of money, even in the provincial arena, has never appealed strongly to me. I believe that people can get into debt easily enough through the ordinary channels without becoming obligated to their respective governments, with all the objections that are implied in such relationships. And there are a whole lot of objections to governments loaning money to people.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I desire to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll). In 1914 an order in council was passed safeguarding to a certain extent the rights of the general public. I believe it was the original intention of those who drafted the act to afford the public every access to the cold storage plants that were receiving bonuses from the government; and an order in council to that effect provides that owners of cold storage warehouses with whom contracts have been entered into for the payment of subsidies shall give refrigerator space to the public when such space is available. The minister said he doubted whether control could be exercised over these cold storage warehouses after the subsidy had been earned. But this order in council goes so far as to provide a penalty of $50 in any case where the public are denied cold storage space when spare space is available. So that I think the rights of the general public can be safeguarded. As to "co-operative associations," I think the word "co-operative" is very misleading as applied to many organizations to-day. As a matter of fact, the great majority of the organizations known as co-operative associations are in effect joint stock companies. I know of some that are nothing else than joint stock companies; and no doubt when the bill is under consideration in committee we shall have a clearer definition of just what co-operative companies are. I merely want to point out, however, that control has been exercised in the past over the plants that have received a bonus from the government, and evidently the amendment passed in 1919 was intended to make it clear beyond doubt that it was the general public who were being taken care of rather than the joint stock companies, the co-operative associations, or any other organization of that kind.

Mr. THOMPSON: The minister might explain what a properly constituted co-operative society is. In the past, and particularly during the last two years, we have had some experience with co-operative societies in Ontario. I have in my hand the Trade Bulletin of February 2nd, and I shall quote briefly from it. In this journal, which is described as "a national business newspaper", there appears the following:

> Insufficient business was given as one of the reasons for failure by 200 farmers' buying and selling associations out of a total of 243 organizations which have ceased to function since 1913, a survey by the United States Department of Agriculture shows. Some of the other reasons given were, inefficient management by 148 organizations, insufficient capital by 73, over extension of credit by 35, dishonest management by 29 and concentrated control of the organization in the hands of a few members by 12.
> The organizations included creameries and cheese factories, co-operative stores, fruit and vegetable associations, grain elevators, cotton organizations, tobacco organizations and miscellaneous co-operative associations. Of 219 organizations, 70 were creameries and cheese factories having an average life of 7.69 years; 20 were cotton associations with an average of 5.23 years; 37 were co-operative stores with an average life of 4.78 years; 38 were grain elevators with an average life of 4.39 years; 4 were tobacco associations with an average life of 4.25 years; 46 were fruit and vegetable associations with an average life of 3.07 years, and 4 were miscellaneous co-operative associations with an average life of 1.54 years. Of the organizations which failed, 170 were incorporated. Of the associations, 168 had capital stock and 58 organizations had no capital stock.

Until these co-operative societies are on a more stable basis the government I think would do well to be very careful in the spending of money along this line. Speaking for myself, I am opposed to the subsidizing of cold storage companies. The hon. minister stated that the reason for the change in the act of 1919 was the fact that it had ceased to function, that municipalities were not taking advantage of the act. The hon. minister has also stated that there has been no demand from co-operative societies. The government, it seems to me, is too anxious to spend money. We heard a lot yesterday about economy and I think they would be well advised to practise economy. For my part, I am opposed to expenditure along these lines. I am opposed to discriminating against the municipalities in favour of the co-operative societies.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9 to amend the Cold Storage Act, 1907.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LIVE STOCK ACTS AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting Live Stock, and to provide for the establishment and regulation of live stock exchanges in connection with stock-yards, the making and amending of by-laws, the issuing of licenses for commission merchants, the creation of Exporters' Associations, the regulation and issuing of licenses therefor, the equipment and regulation of stock-yards, the fixing of tariffs of fees therefor, the prescribing of general regulations of stock-yards by the Governor in Council, the requirements for shipping of live stock, the creation of inspectors and the providing for ports of importation; and to provide penalties for violations of the Act.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, the bill that is to be introduced, based upon this resolution, is a consolidation of the Live Stock and Produce Act of some years ago and all the amendments thereto. The new features of the bill are important though not numerous.

First, the bill provides for the removal of members of live stock exchanges when they are expelled by their fellow-members. In the past, live stock exchanges, although able to discipline members for misdemeanors, have had no authority to carry their decisions into effect. This provision will give the Department of Agriculture the necessary authority to carry out the wishes of live stock exchanges in that respect.

The bill also provides for the establishment of an egg-breaking plant to take care of inferior eggs, of which there are always some in Canada. A good many of these eggs in the past have been imported from China for baking purposes. We think now we have sufficient domestic supply of these eggs to satisfy our own requirements if they are taken care of in such a plant, where after being broken they are dried or frozen.

Exporters' associations are also provided for. As soon as the cattle embargo is taken off by the British authorities we expect our present exporters' associations will be supplemented by the organization of others, and by this amendment these institutions are brought within the provisions of the act.

We also propose to supervise imports of live stock and live stock products as to grading and such like to see that they comply with the standards set up under our own grading system.

I think that in a general way outlines the main features of the bill, which, after all, is largely a consolidation of the laws that we already have, merely supplementing them by giving additional authority to the department. It is not a money bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Do I understand that the words "to provide for the creation of Exporters' Associations" do not apply to the department, or is it the intention of the government to organize such associations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is intended only to supervise the regulations of these associations and by incorporating them in our own regulations thus giving them the authority of law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The wording of the resolution is "to provide for the creation of Exporters' Associations."

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have a number of these associations now, but they are more or less disjointed, and we are providing for them to be recognized as legally constituted institutions. We have found a disposition in certain of our live stock yards to challenge our authority over their administration. The purpose of these changes is to make it quite clear that the Department of Agriculture has full jurisdiction over them, and that when any violations of the regulations occur we can give full effect to the law. In a word, our intention is to put the O.K. of parliament on the by-laws and regulations of these organizations and so incorporate them as part of the regulations of the department.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it proposed to provide against discrimination in the unloading of cars at stockyards throughout Canada? In some cases railway companies have to unload the stock in the yards of competing companies, and I could produce evidence to show that where a railway sends its stock into the yard of a competing company, say after six o'clock at night, and the company owning the yard brings its stock in perhaps in the middle of the night or early in the morning, the company that owns the yard sees to it that its stock is unloaded first. I was wondering whether provision would be made in the bill to do away with that discrimination.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If this has to do with alleged discrimination on the part of railways, I should think it would have to be taken up in connection with the provisions of the Railway Act. I will make a note of what my hon. friend says and see whether such a provision can be incorporated in the bill, but I do not think it can.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest that the Minister take the matter up and consider it carefully, because it is very important. He can readily understand that one railway can discriminate very severely against another in this respect, and that is not a very satisfactory condition so far as stock-raising is concerned. I would ask the minister also whether under the provisions of the bill it will be possible for an owner to take his own stock into one of these yards and sell it on his own account if he so desires, after he has paid the necessary tolls and fees. Further, will it be possible for a farmer desiring to buy, say, a carload of stockers, to go into one of these stock-yards and buy from a farmer who may have stock there, without having to consult the commission men?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has stated that some of these exporters' associations are in process of organization in Ontario.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In eastern Ontario and Montreal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Will this legislation affect the individual shipper?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These associations are organized bodies of shippers, having mutual benefit in view, like any other organization.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And they are to be licensed by the department?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They will have to submit to certain regulations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The individual shipper will not have to submit to those regulations?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He will have to submit to the regulations in connection with this bill. Of course, the provisions with regard to the exporters' associations will not apply to those who do not belong to them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: A year ago we had quite a discussion on the live stock business of this country, and the minister stated that certain persons were employed by the department who might have to do with the exportation of Canadian live stock. Has it been on the recommendation of some of the persons engaged by the department that these provisions have been enacted?

5 p.m.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As a rule, all these enactments are the result of recommendations made by those who are interested in the matters concerned, and who know what the rquirements are.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is provision being made to prevent the exportation of any particular classes of live stock?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know of any.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: About a year ago, I believe it was, great hopes were held out for the building up of an export trade in live stock to South America. Has anything developed along that line?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. TOLMIE: The resolution refers to provision for ports of importation. I may point out that we already have certain ports through which live stock may enter Canada from foreign countries. These are well defined in connection with the work of the Health of Animals Branch and the operation of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. Are these words used here in connection with the working of this bill only?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to Amend and Consolidate the Acts respecting Live Stock.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SALE AND INSPECTION OF FRUIT AND FRUIT CONTAINERS

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to regulate the Sale and Inspection of Fruit and Fruit Containers, and to provide for the fixing of grades for fruit in closed packages, and apples, crabapples and pears in boxes; for the marking and repacking of fruits grown in Canada; for the packing and branding of such fruit; for the regulation of dimensions of all packages, barrels and other containers of fruit; for the defining of the powers of inspectors; for the different penalties in consequence of the violations of the Act; and for the procedure to be followed in the enforcement of the Act and of the penalties prescribed.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may say briefly that the new provisions of this legislation were asked for last year by the various fruit grower's organizations throughout Canada, but the request came in too late to be operative during last year's fruit season and so the bill was not brought into force at that time. Now it has been again asked for, and we are bringing in a consolidated bill taking care of all the amendments, numbering some five or six, which have been made since the passage of the original act, known as the Fruit Marks Act, I think in 1901. The proposed bill in its entirety was asked for and agreed to by the different interests involved, including the growers and packers of fruit, the wholesale dealers, and all parties directly concerned in the fruit industry. The principal changes deal with the size of container. It has been found that our berry containers are only about four-fifths of the size of the American containers, and the result is that the surplus of our crop that is shipped to the United States has to be presented on that market in smaller containers than the United States containers, and consequently appears at a disadvantage. The request has also been made for a package of apples containing one-half of a barrel. It is said by those in the trade that many sales could be made of half a barrel when a full barrel could not be sold. It is therefore proposed to make provision for a container equal to the contents of half a barrel. None of these changes will take place arbitrarily until the year 1924. All material that is now cut awaiting manufacture into containers of the present size may be used in the meantime if so desired.

The bill will provide for a new grading of apples. Our apple growers have found that with apples graded as No. 1 and No. 2 they are regarded as inferior when competing with fruit styled "fancy", and "extra fancy" as it is styled in the United States. Now it is often said there is nothing in a name, but having had something to do with the naming of our grades of wheat under the standards board many years ago, and even quite recently, I know there is something in a name. I know that if an article on the market is given a bad name it is handicapped with a bad getaway. Accordingly it is proposed to make a new grade for some of our fruits, particularly our apples, and also to have new-sized containers so that they will compete favourably on the American market when we ship any of our apples over there. I think that covers fairly well all the contemplated new provisions of the bill all of which, as I have already explained, were agreed to by the conference that met in Ottawa last February. The only thing that those attending the conference were not unanimous on at first was with respect to the size of berry boxes, but even in that matter they eventually reconciled their difference, and unanimously made the recommendations which I have outlined.

Mr. BROWN: In the proposed legislation is it made any easier for those who buy fruit and find they have been deceived in the grade to secure redress? I know that sometimes when we used to buy apples by the car load and distribute them co-operatively, we would find they were not up to standard, and it was almost impossible to get any redress, despite the fact that there were regulations in effect.

Mr. CALDWELL: Were those British Columbia apples?

Mr. BROWN: I shall not tell you where they came from.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may say, the producers were in strong force at the conference referred to, but I cannot recall whether the consumers as a body were represented. I think they were, I believe I have a list of the representatives here.

Mr. BROWN: It is the consumers I am thinking of in this respect.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend will bear with me for a moment I think I have a list here of all those who were present at that conference. I observe that those represented were—the growers' shipping organizations, the wholesale dealers, the barrel manufacturers, the box manufacturers, the basket manufacturers, and others including nurserymen and retailers. I am sorry to admit that the unfortunate consumer does not seem to have been represented. Therefore, if my hon. friend has any representations to make on the consumers' behalf I will be very pleased to take it up in committee. My proposal is that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture where we shall have lots of time to thresh out the contemplated legislation in detail.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if it is the intention of his department to change the marking of the Canadian package to conform to the marking in use, for example, in the state of Washington, where they have "extra fancy," "fancy" and so on, and to eliminate from our law the provision requiring that the grades be No. 1 and No. 2?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We propose to make the change in accordance with what the grade may be over there. If the committee decides that to use the names "extra fancy" and "fancy," as in the United States is preferable to our system of grading apples as No. 1 and No. 2, then, of course, the packages will be marked accordingly.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I repeat my question—is it the intention to make the grades here the same as the United States grade, "extra fancy," "fancy," "choice" and so on?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, I thought I had made that quite plain.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, to regulate the sale and inspection of fruit and fruit containers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SEED INSPECTION

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to regulate the testing, inspection and sale of seeds, and to provide for the regulation of the sale of clover, grasses, seed grain and fodder seeds, rape, field root and garden vegetable seeds in lots of over one pound, of one pound or less, and of seeds for export when purporting to have been inspected and graded; for the regulation of the importation of seeds; for the fixing of the powers and duties of inspectors, the time limit for complaints, the method of taking official samples, of making official reports and the publication of the same: for the fixing of penalties in connection with the violation of the act, the liability of certain purchasers, the costs of proceedings, the rights of civil process, and the evidence acceptable in all cases.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like to make a short explanation. The original Seed Control Act was passed in 1905. It was preceded by two years of considerable educational work and some opposition. When the bill finally did pass—I think my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will recall the circumstance—it caused a great deal of discussion and was a long while going through the House. It was the first and the most advanced act of its kind up to that date. However, it stood the test of time until finally in 1911 it was replaced by a new act embodying certain new features and bringing the legislation up to date. That act of 1911 has not been amended since and it is proposed that its place shall be taken by the bill based on the resolution now before the committee. Hon. members will naturally ask: In what respect does it differ? In 1911, when the last act was passed, it was the most advanced act of this nature. Other countries have however come up to its provisions, and are now a little in advance of us. That is one argument why we should again take the act of 1911 and make it the basis of a new act. It is rather significant that the act has continued for this length of time and has never been amended, but instead of being amended from time to time it is now being repealed, and a new act has been framed containing the portions of the old act that were found to be good with such amendments as are deemed necessary.

The old act made the grading of grass and clover seeds obligatory. The new act extends that principle and makes the grading of cereals obligatory when sold in the ordinary way by the dealers, but it does not interfere with trading transactions between farmers. That is distinctly understood. If a farmer goes into the seed grain business and goes into advertising he will have to comply with the act, but with reference to transactions between farmers it does not affect them in any way whatever.

With regard to the grading of clover and grasses, the standards are fixed by statute exactly as the grades of wheat are. Then, with regard to the grading of cereals, in order to take care of the fluctuations in climatic conditions, the grades are fixed by an advisory board from year to year, in the same way as the standards board in the West regulates the standard grades of grain. I think my hon. friends from the West will understand the distinction. I will go more fully into it when the bill is in committee, but it is the same principle that obtains in regard to our commercial grains in the West. The grade of seed clover is fixed by statute and the cereals are regulated by the advisory board in the same manner as the commercial grades are regulated by the standards board. The law also provides for an advisory board which can be referred to from time to time instead of going to parliament for legislation as to details.

There is a departure here which I would like to put before the committee, as it was inserted entirely at the instance of the seedsmen and producers who were here about three weeks ago in conference on this question. Many of the members of the committee will recall at some time or other new varieties of grain being thrown on the market, given fancy names, advertised extensively, and sold at fabulous prices, when they probably had no commercial value whatever. I am sure there is not a farmer in the committee who has not been stung at some time in respect to some of these varieties of grain or grasses, particularly grain, because in order to prevent the exploitation, not only of farmers but of others, good business demands that before any new variety of cereals be put on the market, advertised and sold it be tried out as to its merits at some of our experimental farms. Then, if proven to be good, the introducers or originators are permitted to sell it to the public. We have that principle recognized in certain provinces in connection with the floating of joint stock companies and wildcat schemes. These proposals have to go before a local government board in some provinces before they can sell stock, and this resolution is simply carrying out that principle. I can see disadvantage, but I can also see some advantages. There was a wheat called Alaska sold very extensively in the West as being a fabulous producer, running up as high as 100 bushels to the acre. It had its day and passed away. We grow older but I am not sure that we always grow wiser. Somehow the next fellow who comes along will get somebody else. The idea is to provide against a repetition of that and incidentally to keep up the reputation of our seed merchants that are doing a legitimate business. The conference recommended this; it was in the original bill. When the bill comes before the committee I will be glad to have the benefit of the advice of those who are most concerned and I shall leave myself with an open mind as to whether such a provision shall be incorporated in the bill or not. There is one disadvantage. Take a real bona fide plant breeder who is developing a new variety; it may have a rather restraining and discouraging effect on him if he finds he has to put the results of his experiments in the hands of someone else for a year or two before he can place his product on the market. On the other hand if he believed his product was good, it should be a tremendously valuable medium of advertising to him if, after having tried it for two years on an experimental farm, he found that it was a good thing and he could sell it like hotcakes. So the matter has two sides to it, and I will leave it there with the committee at the present time. It is one of those details which I do not think I should mention at this stage, except that I want the committee to think about it between now and the time when we discuss it more fully in committee.

Provision is made in the bill to protect the quality of our seeds for export so that our reputation abroad will be safeguarded. We want our certificate to be as good as our bond, so that when we say that our seeds are so-and-so and they are accompanied by a certificate, the goods will be found to be the same as the certificate says. The same may be said with regard to a provision respecting imported seeds, to provide that they comply with our standard also. The provisions with respect to the enforcement of the act are practically the same as those in the old act. This is not a bill dealing with money, and therefore it does not require anything further to be said about it in that respect.

Mr. BROWN: In this measure, as in the old one, I suppose the definition of a commercial dealer will hold. Is it recognized that a farmer becomes a commercial dealer when he advertises that he has certain seeds for sale?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. The question of what constituted advertising was discussed for a long time at the conference in my deputy's office. While it would take too long to give the committee all the details which are contained in the bill, a scheme has been worked out that will safeguard the farmers in that respect. The whole question was threshed out thoroughly at that conference. For example, the question of advertising in a farm paper that a farmer had seed for sale as it came from the threshing machine, was discussed. I myself have sold large quantities of grass seed to the seed houses of Brandon and Winnipeg, and that did not in any way infringe upon the provisions of the act.

Mr. BROWN: That is satisfactory.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But if you went out to sell seeds, graded and specified by name and also complying with the conditions of the Seed Control Act, then you would have to come under the provisions of, and have to comply with the act, just as the seed merchants have to do, with respect to the provisions dealing with advertising. In other words, if a farmer became a seed merchant, he would have to be a seed merchant.

Mr. LOVIE: Will there be in this measure a provision to prevent the sale of quack-grass mixed with brome-grass?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a very important question, and I do not know of any act that could provide for such a contingency. Unless the brome-grass is hand-picked and grown on some experimental farm or university farm, I do not think there is on the market any brome-grass that is not more or less mixed with quack-grass. It comes to us from Europe in that way. You may not notice the fact when it arrives; it may take several years before you detect the quack-grass; but it is not very long after you detect it before it becomes a serious menace. It is so like brome-grass that an ordinary observer cannot detect the difference. This legislation is exactly for the purpose of protecting the quality of seed. Our seed analysts will take the seed under a proper light on a sheet of paper, and by the methods known to them, by segregating the different kinds of seeds, picking out the noxious weeds, such as quack-grass or any other weed seeds, they will leave the residue clean. This measure provides for just so many weed seeds to the pound, but it should not and does not provide for any quack-grass being there. It is extremely difficult to safeguard commercial seeds that are being put on the market from being contaminated with quack-grass, I have grown brome-grass for thirty years, the first seed coming from Austria. It was ten years, indeed more, after I started growing it, before I saw first signs of quack-grass. I had forgotten what Ontario quack-grass looked like, and I attributed this to some of the native quack-grass which you find so prevalent on the prairies and which are not nearly so harmful as the old-fashioned quack-grass. After a time, it got thicker and I had to go out of the business altogether in order to save my farm from pollution and my customers from charging me with selling noxious weeds in grass seed.

Mr. WOODS: What safeguard has the farmer as regards the retail merchant? Have retail merchants to label all grades of seeds conspicuously on the bag containing the seeds so that the farmer may know exactly what he is buying?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The seeds are all graded and named—"Registered, No. 1, 2, 3, 4." There are four grades and the parcels must be so marked. If, upon examination, the contents do not prove to be so, why, you have an action in the usual way in the courts against the seed merchant who supplied you with the seed. The courts are constantly applying for the seed certificates that are given by the Seed branch, as evidence in case of charges in our ordinary courts.

Mr. GARDINER: Does the minister contemplate reducing the number of weed seeds to the pound as under the old Seed Control Act?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I cannot just recall that. That is a detail which I do not have at my finger-tips. But you can understand that, in a whole wagon load, you cannot get seeds absolutely free from weed seeds. You have to stipulate a certain quantity of weed seeds, and I do not know whether that has been reduced in number or not. In 1911, when the act was introduced, it was thought to be a very severe act, and I would imagine, now that it is twelve years since then, the restrictions have been tightened up a little more.

Mr. GARDINER: I would like to say, for the minister's benefit, that my experience is that under the Seed Control Act, the number of noxious weed seeds allowed per pound in the average seed is much too high. I have been connected with municipal work in western Canada for something like seven years, in a district where I have had to supply from year to year much seed grass to the settlers of that particular district. I want to impress upon the minister that it is important that he should look into this question and see to it that the Seed Control Act, as regards the number of noxious weed seeds to the pound, is tightened up much more than it is at the present time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that is right.

Mr. CALDWELL: In the old Seed Control Act I always considered that there was one very great fault. Seed men were allowed to have three No. 1's, for instance, three No. 1 Timothy—No. 1 Sun, which had a very small percentage of weed seeds; No. 1 Moon, which would be allowed a larger percentage of weed seeds, and No. 1 Star, which would have a still greater percentage of weed seeds. I have known merchants to be selling No. 1 Star, which was actually a No. 3, or should be, as No. 1. It was the third grade of Timothy; but this was marked on the bag as No. 1 government standard and was sold in competition with the actual No. 1. Our agricultural society used to buy for its members No. 1 Sun. A local storekeeper would be able to sell No. 3 grade marked No. 1, government standard, and assert it was the same, while as a matter of fact it would be two grades lower in quality. In this new act there should be no misunderstanding in this matter. The grades should be marked 1, 2 and 3; there should not be three grades of No. 1, which would have a misleading effect.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think so.

Mr. GOULD: In western Canada many initial elevators in the spring advertise that they have different kinds of cereals for sale. Will these initial elevators come under the provisions of the act and be regarded as dealers in the sense of this proposed legislation? In my town there is a firm that does an extensive seed business, so extensive, in fact, that the other elevators compete with it. It provides seed grains in quantities of 100, 200, 300 and 400 bushels. I myself am a patron of this company, and while I am not particularly complaining of the brand of grain I have received from these elevators, knowing it to be more or less a local product, yet I have wondered whether, in the broad sense of the act, the initial elevators throughout the country that make a business of supplying seed to farmers should not come under the provisions of the act as dealers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I take it that seed supplied by these elevators is what is called commercial seed. I cannot imagine the seed growing in the district my hon. friend refers to, cleaned with the average machinery that we find in elevators, being such as would come under the provisions of this legislation. If they advertise their seed to be of certain standards and it is not, then they violate the act.

Mr. SENN: The resolution calls for a regulation of the importation of seed. Is there any provision in the bill that the place of origin shall be stated? The value of the seed depends on where it is grown. Alfalfa seeds grown in southern countries would be of little use to us in Canada because the varieties are not hardy enough, and I think it would be well for the minister to provide in the bill that the place where the seed comes from shall be stated.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There will be a provision to that effect. One of the things that gives Canada its good reputation for seed grain is its northern location, and the bill makes provision for that not only with respect to home grown grain but with regard to imports as well.

Mr. GOULD: There is a clause with regard to a time limit for complaints. Has the minister in mind any specific time within which complaints shall be registered against any defaulting seed firm?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is a time limit, but I do not recall having seen it in the draft. A farmer might not know until after harvest whether he had been sold grain of the wrong grade; and, in fact, in the case of grass seeds, he might not know for a couple of years. This is important and I shall make a note of it.

Mr. STEEDSMAN: In the cases of vegetable seeds sold in packages of less than a pound, will the weight of the package be indicated on the package itself?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Seeds, like any other grain, are sold by weight, and if the package does not come up to weight requirements, of course the usual action will hold. There is no recognized container for seeds except very small parcels. Seeds are usually put up in sacks which are very often marked, although at times the weight is not indicated. The principal thing is the variety and quality of the seed.

Mr. STEEDSMAN: I was referring particularly to seeds sold in packages of less than a pound.

Mr. MOTHERWEL: There is a provision with respect to packages of less than a pound. There is also a provision with regard to garden seeds. I do not know of any law that determines all the things we should know with respect to the seed packages we get from these seed houses, but I shall take a note of this point and look into it.

Mr. BROWN: The seed houses disclaim any responsibility in regard to seed that does not come true to description. Is that taken into account?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They must be responsible for the variety.

Mr. BROWN: But they disclaim this responsibility in their advertisements.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, respecting the testing, inspection and sale of seed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide,—

1. That the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay to the Corporation of the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners, hereinafter called "the Corporation," such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of five million dollars, as are required to enable the Corporation to carry on the construction of such terminal facilities as are necessary to properly equip the Port of Vancouver.

2. That during the period of construction of the terminal facilities mentioned in these Resolutions the interest payable on the debentures receivable by the Minister of Finance in exchange for such advances shall be deemed to be money required to construct and to be part of the cost of construction of the said terminal facilities, and such interest may be paid out of the said sum of five million dollars.

3. That the Corporation shall submit to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for approval, monthly applications for such advances, with statements showing total expenditure on different items in detail, and upon approval, authority for the payment of the amount applied for may be granted by the Governor in Council.

4. That the Corporation shall, upon any advances being made, deposit with the Minister of Finance debentures of the Corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-five years from the date of issue, and bearing interest payable half-yearly at the rate of five per centum per annum.

5. That the principal and interest of any sums advanced under any Act founded on these Resolutions shall be payable by the Corporation out of all its property, assets, tolls, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income whatsoever, and shall rank as a charge thereon and have precedence in regard to payment next after the payments provided for in Section 27 of Chapter 54 of the Statutes of 1913.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I would suggest that the hon. minister allow this resolution to stand until Monday. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who is well informed on this important matter, desires to discuss it, and there are features of it which I think it would be of interest to the House and to the country to have him deal with.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite willing to accede to the request of my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting.

Resolution stands.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As it is a few minutes to six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. We rather expected to take up and dispose of the several government notices of motion on the order paper, but as the last resolution has been postponed, the government orders had better stand over until next week.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 5:50 p.m.

Monday, February 12, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Cape Breton South and Richmond) presented the report of the select committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the standing committees of the House as follows:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the report of the special committee appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed the list of members to compose the select standing committees of this House during the present session, presented this day, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That the select standing committees of this House shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to the House, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons papers and records, with the exception of the committees on the Debates and on the Library of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House has appointed Messrs. Béland, Carmichael, Deslauriers, Euler, Garland (Carleton), Gauvreau, Good, Gouin (Sir Lomer), Johnson (Moose Jaw), King Mackenzie (York), Lapointe, Lovett, Lovie, Maclean (Halifax), Meighen, Pritchard, Robinson, Ross (Kingston), Sheard, Sinclair (Oxford) and Walsh, a Committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as Members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I observe the name of Mr. R. M. Johnson, of Moose Jaw, on this committee. Is it the ruling of Mr. Speaker that he is a member of this House?

[Mr. Kyte.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Sub judice.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes. I do not know that the hon. member is not a member of this House. Last session, he was, at all events. I dare say that there is a case before the courts of the country, but no report has been made to the Speaker.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So long as you, Sir, do not receive definite notification cancelling his election, he is officially a member of this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will not press the matter.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the Members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz.: Messrs. Baldwin, Cardin, Charters, Chevrier, Coote, Copp, Euler, Fansher, Hocken, Humphrey, Jones, Mackelvie, McConica, Malcolm, Marcil (Bonaventure), Michaud, Preston, Prevost, Raymond, Rinfret, Robichaud, St. Père and Thurston, will act as Members on the part of this House, on the said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Report for Parliament under section 7 of the Reclamation Act 9-10 George V., showing drainage works constructed, etc.—Hon. Mr. Stewart.

Supplementary rules, regulations and forms subscribed to under the provisions of section 54 of the Irrigation Act.—Hon. Mr. Stewart.

Statement of lands sold by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company during the year ending September, 1922, in accordance with 49 Victoria, Chapter 9, section 8.—Hon. Mr. Stewart.

Report of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment for the year ended December 31, 1922.—Hon. Mr. Beland.

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 13, respecting the Nipissing Central Railway Company.—Mr. Lapierre.

Bill No. 14, to incorporate La Banque des Cultivateurs.—Mr. Parent.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 3, respecting The Royal Guardians.—Mr. Mitchell.

Bill No. 4, respecting certain patents of Leonard Clayton Ridge.—Mr. Harris.

Bill No. 5, respecting certain patents of Charles A. Channell.—Mr. German.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FUEL SUPPLY

Mr. MICHAUD:

Is it the intention of the Government to try and secure fuel supply for Canada independent of the United States?

Hon. Mr. STEWART: No steps are being taken to import fuel as a government undertaking either from the United States or elsewhere; but investigations are being carried on further to develop our domestic fuel resources especially in those parts of the country where fuel shortages occur with a view to reducing the amount of fuel imported. It would appear also that some steps are being taken by private interests in Great Britain to secure a permanent place in the Canadian market for domestic coal.

MECHANICS

Mr. MICHAUD:

Is the Government aware as to whether or not Canada is in need of more mechanics?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK: Information reaching the Department of Labour does not suggest the need of more mechanics for the Dominion at large. Local difficulties occasionally arise and these are frequently met through the agency of the Employment Service, by obtaining workmen found unemployed in other localities. The situation necessarily varies from day to day, and it may be found impossible in a particular case to meet in this way a demand for highly skilled workmen in a particular craft.

MONCTON AND BUCTOUCHE RAILWAY

Mr. HANSON:

1. Has the purchase price of the Moncton and Buctouche Railway been paid by the Government?
2. If not, what is the cause of the delay?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to see that the creditors of the said railway company are paid in full before anything is paid to the railway company?
4. What steps, if any, are being taken by the Government or the Department of Railways, to compel the railway company in question to pay its creditors?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. No.

2. Failure of owners to convey the railway free of encumbrances.

3 and 4. The obligation is on the company to convey the property free from encumbrances. Upon this being done to the satisfaction of the Department of Justice, purchase price will be payable to whoever may be entitled. When agreement to sell was reached, in 1918, the Bank of Montreal filed with the government power of attorney from the company to receive all moneys due or to become due.

TIMBER PERMIT

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

Having reference to Order in Council No. 2614 published in The Canada Gazette, December 22, 1922, amending section 47 of the regulations governing the granting of licenses to cut timber on Dominioin Lands, etc.:—

1. Have any permits been granted without competition to cut timber adjoining licenses previously granted? If so, at what location?
2. If such permits have been granted, was an inspection made and a report made in writing by the timber inspector of the district?
3. What quantity of timber is it estimated will be cut in each case?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

No permits have been granted without competition to cut timber under the order in council referred to.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY — LIFTING OF RAILS

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Has an order or other instructions been issued by the Government or by the Canadian National Railways for the taking up of rails from the Hudson Bay road?
2. If so, by whom and for how much mileage and where?
3. What is the weight of these rails?
4. Have orders been issued to replace said rails?
5. If so, within what time and with rails of what weight?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1 and 2. Lifting of rails on unused portion of line (Mileage 214 to end of steel at Mileage 334) for use elsewhere in West was recommended by Vice-President and General Manager, Canadian National Railways, approved by the Board of Directors, and authorized by order in council of November 24, 1922.

3. 80 pounds per yard.

4. No; as a result of representations made to Sir Henry Thornton, when in the West recently, it was decided to let matter stand pending further consideration.

5. See answer to No. 4.

TUG—MURRAY STEWART

Mr. HANSON:

1. Has the Government or any department thereof purchased a tug called the Murray Stewart?
2. If so, what department, and what was the purchase price?
3. From whom was the said tug purchased?
4. When was it built and by whom?
5. What is her, (a) gross tonnage, and, (b) registered tonnage?
6. Who negotiated the sale to the government?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1 and 2. The Department of Marine and Fisheries purchased a tug called the Murray Stewart to replace the lighthouse tender C.G.S. Lambton lost on Lake Superior in the spring of 1922, and for the additional purpose of being stationed at Georgian bay ports at the end of each season of navigation to render such assistance, in the event of ice formation, as may be necessary to enable vessels handling grain to move freely. The purchase price was $80,000.

3. From the registered owner, James Frederick Martin Stewart of Toronto.

4. 1918—by the Port Arthur Shipbuilding Company, Limited.

5. (a) Gross tonnage 234.46. (b) Registered tonnage 92.25.

6. James Frederick Martin Stewart.

CARAQUET AND GULF SHORE RAILWAY

Mr. HANSON:

1. Has the government completed the purchase of the Caraquet and Gulf Shore Railway?
2. Has the purchase price been paid?
3. If not, what is the cause of the delay?
4. Have the claims of creditors of this company been satisfied?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.

2. Yes; with the exception of $550.

3. The Department of Railways and Canals, at the request of the Department of Justice, retained $550 of the purchase price to protect the claim of the Post Office Department against the railway for loss of registered mail before the road was taken over.

4. One claim filed with the department was withdrawn; others were not considered valid.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER CANAL

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

Referring to the following statement concerning the proposed St. Lawrence Power Canal, attributed to Charles P. Craig, Executive Director of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, in the Toronto Globe, of December 9:

"All further governmental action is impossible until Canada signifies its desire to enter into an agreement on the navigation project," Mr. Craig said. "I am vexed, but not disturbed, at the delay of Canada. There is no doubt in my mind but that Canada will act definitely within the next few days."

1. Is the statement of Mr. Craig correct?
2. What action, if any, has the government taken regarding the project since such statement was made?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I confess I do not quite understand what my right hon. friend is asking for. This question reads:

Referring to the following statement concerning the proposed St. Lawrence Power Canal, attributed to Charles P. Craig, Executive Director of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, in the Toronto Globe, of December 9:

[Mr. Graham.]

Then it quotes a statement and says—"Is the statement of Mr. Craig correct?" I notice the statement reads:

I am vexed, but not disturbed.

Is that the part of the question which the right hon. member wants answered?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first part Mr. Craig said, also.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question does not so read. If my right hon. friend will indicate just what information he wants, I shall be glad to give it to him; but I confess I do not know how to give it to him from these questions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The quotation is quite clear: It reads:

All further governmental action is impossible until Canada signifies its desire to enter into an agreement on the navigation project.

That is in quotation marks, followed by the words "Mr. Craig said." Then it goes on with Mr. Craig's remarks:

I am vexed, but not disturbed, at the delay of Canada. There is no doubt in my mind but that Canada will act definitely within the next few days.

What I desire to know is: Are his remarks correct? Is all further governmental action impossible until Canada signifies its desire, and is it, no doubt, correct that Canada will act definitely within the next few days?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think, to the first part of the question, as my right hon. friend has just put it, I might answer, No. To the latter part, as well, I might answer, No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all right. Of course, with the exception of the first part, this question cannot be considered answered, the second part still remains unanswered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As regards the second question: Since the statement was made, a deputation waited on the government, on the 24th January, making certain representations concerning the deep waterways project, and the government mentioned at the time that their representations would be taken into consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No action?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Nothing further at present.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES AND BONUS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Is it the intention of the government to inaugurate a general revision of the Civil Service salaries?
2. If so, will Parliament be informed, and when?
3. Will such revision incorporate existing bonuses with present salaries?

4. Is it the intention of the government to continue existing bonuses during the coming year or pending the anticipated revision?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The government does not deem the present time opportune for a general revision of the Civil Service salaries.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. It is the intention of the government to continue existing bonuses during the coming fiscal year.

RENFREW POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. SHEARD:

1. On what date of the year 1922 did the postmastership of Renfrew fall vacant?
2. After such vacancy, was an appointment made by the Civil Service Commission? If so, of whom?
3. Was such appointment by way of promotion? If not, why?
4. Is the present appointee a returned soldier?
5. Is the appointee of the Civil Service Commission in office? If not, why?
6. Is a returned soldier now occupying the position?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. On 23rd February, 1922.
2. Yes—Dan. W. Stewart.
3. No. Employes of Renfrew post office are engaged and paid by the postmaster, Renfrew; they are not appointed under the Civil Service Act and have not been subject to the Civil Service Act or regulations based thereon.
4. No, but he lost his son overseas.
5. Yes.
6. No.

MILITIA AND DEFENCE ACCOUNTS

Mr. BOYS:

1. What expenses, payments or disbursements of any kind have been made since 1st April, 1922, out of other moneys than those included in the amounts voted by Parliament for the Department of Militia and Defence in respect of items or charges paid in the fiscal year 1920-21 out of moneys voted for the Department of Militia and Defence?
2. Under what authority were such moneys so paid from other votes, and why was the change made?
3. Were objections offered by the Department of the Auditor General to payments being so made or to other attempts to make similar payments? If so, in what cases?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: I have read this question several times, and I cannot quite grasp what is required. If any hon. gentleman can tell me definitely, I will try to get the answer. As the hon. member, in whose name this question stands, is not in his seat, perhaps we had better let the question stand under those circumstances until he comes in.

Question stands.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL

Mr. BOYS:

1. Are there any bridges over the Trent Valley Canal which have not been taken over by the Department of Railways and Canals?
2. If so, where are they located.
3. What bridges have been taken over?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.
2. Railway bridges at Trenton (3), Hastings, Campbellford, Peterborough (2), Lindsay (2), Fenelon falls, Talbot, Gamebridge, Atherley (2), Washago, Ragged rapids, Severn falls; also the fixed portions of highway bridges at Glen Miller, Campbellford, Healey Falls, Trent bridge, Hastings, Bensfort, Wallace point, Locks, Peterborough; Chemong, Balsover Boundary road.
3. Highway swing spans over excavated channels at Trenton, Glen Millar, Campbellford, Healey falls, Trent bridge, Hastings, Bensfort, Wallace point, Locks, Peterborough; Young's point, Chemong, Lindsay, Wellington street; Lindsay, Lindsay street; Lindsay, Ops.; Rosedale, Balsover, Boundary road.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BANK ACCOUNTS

Mr. HARRIS:

1. What bank accounts of the Canadian National system or any of the component parts thereof have been transferred since January 1, 1922?
2. From what bank, and to what bank, and on what dates, were such transfers made?
3. Has notification been given of the intended transfer of other accounts? If so, what accounts and to what bank?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Canadian National Express Company; Canadian National Telegraphs.
2. From the Canadian Bank of Commerce to the Royal Bank of Canada: Canadian National Express, on December 1, 1922; Canadian National Telegraphs, on December 30, 1922.
3. No.

MR. JAMES STEWART

Mr. HARRIS:

1. Is James Stewart of Winnipeg a director of the Canadian National railways? If so, when was he appointed?
2. Is the same James Stewart a director of the Bank of Montreal? If so, when was he appointed?
3. Are there any other bank directors who are Canadian National Railway directors? If so. who and of what bank?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes; October 4, 1922.
2. The Department of Railways and Canals has no information.
3. See answer to No. 2.

LATE LT.-COL. W. P. MALONE

Mr. DUNCAN:

1. Was the pension of Colonel Willard Malone cut off from his widow and four children after his death in a London military hospital?
2. If so, why?

Hon. Mr. BELAND:

1. The Board of Pension Commissioners reports that the late Lt.-Col. W. P. Malone was not at any time in receipt of pension, and that as the disability which resulted in his death, was not attributable to military service his dependents are not entitled to pension.

2. Answered by No. 1.

SOLDIERS' LAND SETTLEMENT

Mr. MILLAR:

1. How many returned soldiers have been salvaged by the Soldiers' Land Settlement Board year by year since the inception of the Soldiers' Land Settlement scheme?
2. What sums, if any, have been collected by the Board from said soldiers after they have abandoned the land and engaged in other employment?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. No separate record of soldier settlers who have been "salvaged" is maintained. The number of "adjustment" cases which includes "salvage" due to death, recurrence of physical disability, abandonment, etc., and also those cases where properties have been transferred to other returned soldiers, and cases where settlers have assigned their interest to civilians, is, year by year, as follows:

Since the inception of the scheme to December 31, 1920, 1,153; 1921 (calendar year), 1,114; 1922 (calendar year), 826.

2. No record available.

LAKE TRANSPORT INVESTIGATION

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

4. Was W. T. R. Preston requested by the Government to undertake an investigation in the cost of lake transport or into any subject connected with transport of freight on the Great Lakes?
2. Did Mr. Preston make such investigation? If so, when?
3. Has Mr. Preston been paid for such investigation?
4. If not, is he to be paid for the same, and how much?
5. Why was Mr. Preston's report not made public?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. He was paid at the rate of $15 per day for each day employed, and per diem allowance of $15 in addition to his actual transportation expenses.

[Mr. Graham.]

5. The preliminary enquette was for the information of the ministry. The investigation will be continued by a royal commission consisting of S. J. McLean, Assistant Chairman, Board of Railway Commissioners; Levi Thomson of Qu'Appelle, Sask., and Brig.-Gen. L. T. Tremblay, a member of the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec. When completed the report will be submitted to parliament.

COMPENSATION FOR DESTROYED CATTLE

Mr. TOBIN:

1. What compensation is allowed for cattle destroyed under the accredited herd system: (a) for pure-breds, (b) for grades?
2. Does the law apply only to pure-bred herds?
3. If not, is it the intention of the Government to extend the regulations so as to include herds composed entirely of grade cattle?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. (a) Pure bred cattle: maximum valuation $200, maximum compensation (⅔ of maximum valuation) $133.33.

(b) Grade cattle: maximum valuation $60, maximum compensation (⅔ of maximum valuation) $40.

2. No. Herds accepted under the accredited herd plan may contain any number of grade cattle, but in addition there must be at least ten pure-bred registered animals, one of which must be a bull.

3. No. I might add that these answers, while strictly correct, do not give all the information. In addition to the pure-bred herds that are taken under the accredited herd system, compensation is paid for certain municipal herds and also for grade cattle under what is known as the restricted area system of compensation.

TORONTO VIADUCT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to carry out the commitments of the Grand Trunk Railway as set out in the Viaduct Agreement for the erection of a Viaduct in Toronto dated 1913, towards which the city, the C.P.R., and the G.T.R. were to contribute one-third each of the capital cost?
2. Did a deputation wait on the Government in the spring of 1922, urging the carrying out of this agreement and the opening of the new Union Station in Toronto, and what will be done by the Government to give effect to the viaduct agreement?
3. Will the Government, as requested by the deputation, use its best efforts to get a settlement of this long standing question in the public interest?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The board of directors of the Canadian National Railways will deal with any commitments of previous managements.

2. Yes.

3. It is hoped that negotiations with respect to terminal arrangements at Toronto, the possible use of the new Union Station there, and related matters will shortly be inaugurated by the Canadian National Railways' management.

EIGHT HOUR LAW CONFERENCE

Mr. NEILL:

1. What steps, if any, have been taken by the Government towards calling a conference of all the provinces on the eight hour law recommended by Article 427 of the Treaty of Versailles?

2. If any invitation was issued by the Federal authorities what was the response from the different provinces?

3. What further action is contemplated by the Government towards getting the provinces together on this matter?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK: The answer to this question has been prepared, but the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I believe, desires to have it withheld for the present in order that he may change the question, or for some other reason.

Question stands.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON RE-ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Has the Government received an interim or other report from the Royal Commission appointed nearly a year ago to inquire into and report on matters concerning Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment?

Hon. Mr. BELAND: I may answer this question orally. No interim report has been received so far, but one is expected shortly.

GRAND TRUNK COMMITMENTS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to carry out the capital commitments of the Grand Trunk Railway in various parts of Canada for new terminals and capital expenditures in various places as provided by agreements made by this railway before it was absorbed into the National Railway System?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to expend $4,000,000 on the Grand Trunk Railways for grade separation at Detroit, and is the following despatch substantially correct to the Toronto Globe?

"Detroit, January 12.—Negotiations of twenty years standing between the city and the Grand Trunk Railway were completed to-day when the Council gave tentative approval to a $4,000,000 grade separation programme presented by John W. Reid, city engineer."

3. If so, what amount will Canada be asked to provide for this work?

4. What amount of money will Canada have to furnish for the use of the Grand Trunk System for the new $100,000,000 passenger terminal at Chicago to replace the Dearborn Street structure recently destroyed by fire?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Such matters will be dealt with by the board and management of Canadian National Railways:

2 and 3. Grade separation at Detroit will involve an expenditure of $4,600,000, spread over a ten-year period. The Grand Trunk Railway will be responsible for approximately $3,000,000 and the city of Detroit for the remaining $1,600,000.

4. The terminal in question is used by the Grand Trunk Railway which, with four other railways, own the holding company—the Chicago and Western Indiana Railroad Company. No definite action in regard to a new station is expected for several years. Meanwhile, published estimates of possible cost are mere guesses. Should a new structure finally be decided on, it should be financially self-sustaining.

LACK OF CONFIDENCE VOTE

PROPOSED AS NECESSARY TO FORCE GOVERNMENT RESIGNATION

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a defeat of a government measure should not be considered as a sufficient reason for the resignation of the government, unless followed by a vote of lack of confidence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it might be truly said that this resolution is for the good and welfare of the House. As the hon. members of this House will notice, it deals with a situation in which every individual member is to some extent interested, some more and some less. I heard an hon. member of this House quote an American statesman a few days ago, to the effect that we were not dealing with a theory but with a condition. My resolution does not deal with any theory but with an actual condition; and I am disposed to think that if there is any objection offered to the passing of this resolution it will have to be offered on theoretical grounds, for I believe it would be difficult to maintain by argument that there is anything of re democratic value to be gained by the continuance of the practice against which this resolution declares. The condition with which we are dealing is that in the process of development our system of government has finally come to be government by a cabinet. Here it will be unnecessary, I hope, to explain that I am not making any reference to the present government or the present cabinet; I am dealing with the system of governmen and the practices appertaining thereto. Parliament has lost its old supremacy, if indeed it ever really was supreme. The course of our constitutional development has been one leading from an absolute autocracy on to that measure of democracy which we now enjoy, some may argue that parliament is as supreme to-day as it has ever been, which if true, would simply prove that parliament has yet to attain its supremacy, for certain it is that we have now government by cabinet.

When we consider the development of our constitutional system, it is not to be wondered at if we find there are still influences of autocracy present, for every bit of the freedom which we now enjoy has been slowly and laboriously wrenched from autocracy. Indeed, it is clear that it would be difficult for us to be completely rid of those influences. Parliament to-day, I maintain, is dominated by the cabinet through the party caucus, and much of our boasted democratic liberty is pure theory. Theoretically, the Cabinet is responsible to parliament, and parliament, in turn, is responsible to the people. The actual condition, however, is that the cabinet is responsible to those who appoint it, and as the cabinet brings forward its policies and ensures support of them by a pre-arranged majority, it is not in any real sense responsible to parliament. Of course, parliament is allowed to discuss the policies of the cabinet, but an effective majority has been arranged for. The policies of the cabinet have been already drawn up, they are outlined in the Speech from the Throne, and will be carried through in the manner and to the extent desired by the cabinet, provided that the majority party is strong enough numerically to outvote the rest of parliament.

It is contended, that such a party, namely, the majority or government party, represents the voice of parliament because it is a majority. Again theoretically, this is perfectly true; but practically it is not true. A mechanical, mathematical majority may not represent the voice of parliament. Under the conditions that exist to-day members of the majority party may be compelled to vote contrary to their best thoughts and their declared principles. A system which puts a member of parliament in that position is defective both from the point of view of the mentality and the morality of parliament. This practice of cabinet control by threat of election has a tendency to confuse the issues upon which members are called upon to decide, and it has the effect of placing them in a position which to say the least is at times very uncomfortable and very embarrassing.

But, it may be asked, what magic power has the cabinet over the majority or government party so as to ensure that its measures will be upheld at all times. That magic power is exercised by confusing the issues which may be brought before parliament with the life of the administration, so that the government party is left with the alternative of supporting the issue or saving the administration, and it is only natural if the desire to save the administration should take precedence in the minds of most members of a government party. It is commonly understood to be the practice in Canada that if a government is defeated on a matter of policy, or on a measure considered by the administration to be of importance, that such defeat is tantamount to a vote of no confidence, and that the resignation of the government should follow. Not only is this so, but a government may at any time declare an issue to be a vote of no confidence. That declaration has the effect of a whip—not the party whip, but the real shillalah held over the heads of all the government supporters—the possibility of defeat and the bringing on of a general election. But it has the effect also usually of defeating the measure, no matter what merit there may be in the measure, because in such a case the salvation of the government is considered first by the majority party and the measure afterwards. So really while the government party may vote against a very good measure in order to save the government, their action is no indication of what they really think about that measure.

If the majority party had been free to vote upon such issues as have been declared by governments to imply no confidence, it is very likely that in most cases those issues would have received majorities. But in every case I believe in the history of the Canadian parliament when the government has treated such a vote as tantamount to a vote of non-confidence the issue has been defeated. That there is no instance so far as I am able to find—I am subject to correction of course—in our parliamentary records of a government having been defeated under such circumstances, tends only to prove two things. It proves, in the first place, that the governments of the past have always had a fairly safe majority; and it proves further that the majority party has given the life of the government first consideration.

Now, this practice of confusing an issue with the life of the government is not a mere formality such as we have in the ceremonials incident to the opening of parliament, though the practice is equally as far out of date as is the ceremonial feature—perhaps those ceremonials are not altogether useless as they represent a tableau of an important and glorious period of history. But this is of greater importance in so far as the members of this House are concerned, and in so far also as the country is concerned, because it has a very real and immediate and, I think I might also say, a pernicious influence. It is superfluous to recall the various steps which have been taken to bring parliament to this practice. There is no doubt that at one time this system served the purpose of those who introduced it, and there is little doubt that other methods might have done equally well to secure the aims desired had any one thought of them. To-day it is used chiefly to keep governments in office. It is used also for the purpose of defeating measures which the people's representatives may desire, but which for some reason or other the cabinet does not want.

This practice is not at all an aid to responsible government, as some would have it, indeed, it is rather a hindrance to that desirable end, for we find that by this practice the principle of responsible government has been inverted. To-day the individual members of the government party are responsible to the Cabinet instead of the Cabinet being responsible to the individual members of the party. What chance has the courageous individual, who can still think clearly even under threats of a general election between the merits of a government measure and the defeat of the government, and who is prepared to stand up for the principle in which he believes—what political future in a party has such an individual? He is really held responsible to this Cabinet for his action on the vote, instead of the Cabinet being held responsible to him for their action when he votes. That, I maintain, is an inversion of the principle of responsible government.

I want to turn briefly to a few instances in the history of the Canadian parliament in which this practice has been seen in action; and I am going to take the most recent instances so as to be within the memory of hon. members of this House. I shall first refer to a resolution which was introduced when Sir Robert Borden was in power, embodying a proposal to discontinue the granting of titles in Canada. According to page 2364 of Hansard of May 21, 1918, Sir. Robert Borden said, referring to the proposal contained in the resolution:

> I can only say, so far as I am concerned, that if the House does not propose to accept the course which I have asked them frankly and with much respect to take, I should consider that I am relieved from my duty of carrying on any longer the government of this country, and I should ask His Excellency the Governor General to seek other advisers.

I knew personally a number of members of the government party of that day, and am convinced that they were just as anxious for the abolition of titles in Canada as the hon. member who moved the resolution was, yet I find that they voted with the government against the resolution in which they believed. There we have a concrete example of this practice. One might, of course, comment upon the attitude of the government in associating the trivial matter of a motion regarding titles with the defeat of the administration; but that is not a point to be considered here. The fact is that by confusing the issue of the abolition of titles in Canada with the life of the government, those who supported the abolition of titles voted against their principle in order to protect the administration. That was the situation then, and it is often found to be the situation even to-day. Hon. members who, forced under such conditions to vote against their principles to save the government have to meet their irate constituents and explain the phenomenal change of mind which they so suddenly experienced. Which one of us has not had the—I was going to say opportunity, but that is not the word—experience of hearing a politician trying vainly to explain why he was driven from his acknowledged principles and forced to do something entirely different.

The next instance to which I wish to refer is that which had to do with the amendments moved to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne at the present session. You will remember that when the amendments were moved, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) declared that no self-respecting government could possibly accept them. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) moved an amendment to the amendment, in which, I may point out, he was expressing the opinions of the Minister of Finance as set forth last session. Speaking on the budget last year, the Minister of Finance said this:

> I must to-day present two thoughts which are of paramount importance. The first is as to the need, the deep and earnest need, of economy. That means that we must appeal both to members of Parliament and to the people to pass what I may call self-denying ordinances. They must not expect all the things which in the good old days they got so readily.

The amendment to the amendment as submitted by the hon. member for Calgary West was as follows:

> That this House views with alarm the substantial increase in the national debt, and urges Your Excellency's advisers to exert every possible effort to economize in the expenditure and administration of government, and to lessen the burden of federal taxation which bears so heavily on the people of Canada.

With regard to the amendment, I wish to read a resolution moved by the present Hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and seconded by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1920:

> That in view of the continued increase in the high cost of living, of the greatly increased burden of taxation, of the hardship which many of the people suffer from these causes, and the unrest naturally arising therefrom; and in view of the desirability of adopting measures to increase production and effect such relief to consumers and producers as may be within the power of Parliament, the House is of opinion that, pending a wider revision of the tariff, substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation should be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance; first, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

The following is the amendment of this session to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, which was regarded as constituting a motion of want of confidence in the government:

That in view of the increased burden of taxation and of the hardship which many of the people suffer from this burden, and the unrest and dissatisfaction arising therefrom, and in view of the desirability of adopting measures to reduce the cost of production, and effect such relief to consumers and producers as may be within the power of parliament, the House is of the opinion that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation should be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance.

(1) Diminishing the very high cost of production, which presses so severely on the primary producers of the country at this time;

(2) Reducing the cost of living to the great masses of the common people, many of whom are being forced out of the country by the prevailing economic conditions.

This amendment is the same as the resolution moved by the present Minister of Finance in 1920, and there is no excuse that I can see for the government party voting for it a couple of years ago and voting against it to-day. It may be presumed that both these resolutions embody the viewpoint of the Liberal party upon the questions with which they deal. If so, how did it happen that hon. members opposite voted against that very proposal a few days ago? The Minister of Finance declared that that resolution, which was really his own resolution that he moved two years ago, must be taken as a vote of no confidence. He indicated that no self-respecting government could take it otherwise. My humble opinion is that the government would have been really more self-respecting if it had accepted these amendments. Of course, I could not presume to tell the hon. Minister of Finance what he should and should not do as a parliamentarian, but that was my humble opinion. However, the hon. gentleman did declare that the resolution moved by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), and also the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw), constituted motions of no confidence, and that complicated the situation so much for the members of the party that they found themselves on the horns of a dilemma, and most of them stuck on the horns. The fact is, we know as well as we can know anything with respect to anybody, that there are a great number of hon. members on the other side of the House who do believe in the reduction of the tariff, and who under different circumstances would vote for such a resolution; yet only one of them remembered his principles on that occasion, and all the rest voted with the government I am not blaming any hon. gentleman on the other side for voting with the government, I am not insinuating that their votes were any less honourable than mine was. Indeed, I believe that they voted just as I did, weighing these issues in their own minds as best they could. I am not speaking against the actions of the hon. members on that particular occasion: I am speaking against the practice, the system, which forces them into this unfair and embarrassing situation—I believe that hon. members of this House will agree with me that this is a very undesirable position in which to be placed.

I notice that the opposition made a good deal of capital out of the dilemma of the government in connection with the amendments quoted, but there was really no need for them to do so, for I am quite certain that the opposition would do likewise on a similar occasion— I know it has done so before. I am quite sure the Progressives will do the same if only they get the opportunity, and I believe the Labour party would do the same under the present system. It is pretty well accepted, by sociologists at all events, that the generality of humanity under similar conditions will act in pretty much the same way. So, what I am trying to correct by this resolution is a parliamentary practice which embarrasses the members of parliament, and particularly the members of the government party, by confusing the issue under discussion with the life of the administration, and thus forcing hon. members at times to vote against their own ideas and their own principles.

Mr. McQUARRIE: May I be permitted a question? If this resolution passes, what is to prevent the government from considering any particular motion as a want of confidence motion in the government, and acting accordingly? What would prevent the Minister of Finance, for instance, whom my hon. friend has mentioned, from making a similar statement to the House on another occasion? What is to prevent the government from advising the whips that they will consider a certain motion as a want of confidence motion? Then, what good can follow the passing of this resolution?

Mr. IRVINE: I think the hon. member has misunderstood the resolution. If I have got his question correctly, the resolution will prohibit the very possibility which he anticipates.

Mr. McQUARRIE: In what way?

Mr. IRVINE: In this way. If this resolution is carried, it will not be left in the hands of the government to say when the government shall be defeated. That power will be in parliament. At the present time the Cabinet has the decision as to whether a resolution shall or shall not be considered as a want of confidence motion. We want to take that from the hands of the Cabinet and leave the decision with parliament.

Mr. McQUARRIE: One further question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Of course, the question can only be allowed with the consent of the hon. member who has the floor. Do I understand that the hon. member is willing?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Would the hon. member tie up the government so that it could not hand in its resignation if it saw fit at any time?

Mr. IRVINE: I do not know anything that can prevent any government or any member of any government from resigning at any time they wish to do so. They may do so now, singly or in a body, and they may do so after such a resolution as this passes; but I scarcely anticipate a stampede of that character if the resolution should pass.

I believe the practice against which this resolution declares should be abandoned because it is humiliating to the representatives of the people. In instances such as I have given they find themselves forced at times to abandon the principles under which they have been elected; and being forced thus to abandon their principles, they are considered in the public mind as being untrue and unfaithful servants of the people. Good men in this way find themselves robbed of their good characters in the eyes of the public. I do not think it is amiss to emphasize here a fact that we have all met with, that the politician in Canada has a very low status indeed in the estimation of the public, and it is the present practice that has helped more than anything else to undermine the confidence of the people in their representatives. I think it should be part of our duty as members of this House to raise the status of parliamentarians, that we may be as noted in the coming years for standing firm to our principles and true to our word, as we have been noted in the past for forgetting about them in such instances as I have just given to the House.

But there is another side to this question that is as bad or even worse than the personal side. By this practice now prevailing, bad issues may be passed in order to save an otherwise very good government, and on the other hand, a good issue may be defeated to save a bad administration. By confusing these two things, namely the issue before the House and the fitness of the administration to govern, the members of parliament are often placed in a position where they must either defeat the measure in which they believe, or defeat the government. But even if a good measure were passed to save a good government, that would not balance the sheet. We had better put governments in a position where they do not need to be saved, and that is the purpose of this resolution. The life of the administration and the merits of legislative proposals should not be confused. If the administration is to be responsible to parliament, it should allow parliament a free mind to come to a conclusion on resolutions, or bills without embarrassment of any kind whatever. I believe a reasonable, clean, energetic, efficient and courageous administration has nothing to fear from a Canadian parliament. Parliament, however, does have something to fear from the supremacy of the cabinet. I believe that a bill brought in by the cabinet should not be considered in any way different from a bill brought in by a private member. But such is not the case as things are now. Here, then, is a protection which I would invite you anti-protectionists to consider. Here is a practice by which a cabinet protects itself by its very threats to carry through what legislation it may wish to promote, or defeat what legislation it might desire to defeat. That is a protective wall which it might be in our interests to-day to break down by the passing of this resolution. I urge the passing of this resolution in the interests of every member of this House. We are all interested, and we are all concerned. It is true, those of us who happen to sit in the so-called opposition benches are not so directly affected by a vote of no confidence as the hon. members on the other side. But still we have to consider it too. I do not know whether it would have been a very wise thing for this parliament to have decided to bring on an election on the last issue on which we voted. We had to consider that in connection with the issue, for it is not only the government that is affected, but everybody is affected.

Look at it from another point of view. I do not believe hon. members on this side of the House, from the left wing of the opposition down this far at least, are particularly anxious to defeat either this government or any other government. I believe their attitude as expressed is one of co-operation. Personally, I do not wish to defeat any government. I want to help every government to do the best they can. I want to vote for the government when I think they ought to be voted for, but I do not want to be called upon to vote for the government when that means voting against something that I want to vote for. But until the present practice is changed I may be called upon, and every other hon. member may be called upon, to vote against the government that they do not want to defeat, in order to save a principle or to vote for a measure in which they have declared their belief. That is one of the points I would ask hon. members on the government side to consider. I believe the passing of this resolution would have the effect of stabilizing governments. We are living in a time when government majorities are not as large as they used to be, and their tendency seems to be to grow smaller, which leaves the life of an administration more precarious than heretofore. It would be better, I think, for all concerned, if Cabinets would look for a majority on the issue rather than counting heads before the issue is proposed. If hon. members will review the history of the Manitoba government in the last session or two they will find that, because it failed to take the short practical step which this resolution suggests it was in a position where it could not do any business for the people. It was afraid to move for fear it would be defeated. The consequence was that ultimately it had to be voted out of power. On the other hand, the province of Alberta, and Nova Scotia I believe also, passed resolutions similar to the one which I am here introducing, and, so far, I have heard only praise of their action. I have heard members of the Alberta legislature speak of the new freedom which they feel when they are voting on a measure, because they feel they are not voting to oust a government nor to keep one in power.

Again, this proposal will discourage parties from seeking power as an aim. While the present practice continues, parties will seek to build up a power for themselves, because they know that they will not be able to do anything unless they have assurance in advance of sufficient support. And so, whether it is an opposition party or a new party, or a group if you like, most of them look forward to the time when they will have power, when they will command enough support to carry the legislation which they desire. I suggest this is not democratic. Indeed it is very undesirable that any group or class should have power in parliament. Some of the hon. members on the government side demurred last year when I said that the present government represented a class. I said that, not by way of criticism, but merely as a fact,—they do represent a class; and they have built up a power by that class to serve that class. I believe that the other party represents a class. I believe that the new party represents a class. I do not think it would be wise for this House to encourage classes to build up their strength with a view to obtaining power in this House. I look forward rather to the co-operative spirit in parliament. And let me say here, as I have said in my riding during the summer, that in my opinion more real respect for parliament has been shown by the present Cabinet than by any other Cabinet in recent Canadian history. But I believe that this is due as much to the fact that we have a different alignment of groups in this House, as to the democratic intentions of the Cabinet itself. However, I hope that the hon. members of this House will see the value of this resolution, first of all in leaving each member, whether in the government party or in any other party, free to consider every measure that is brought before this House on its own merits and to vote upon it according to his own intelligence or according to the desires of his constituents.

I have tried to personally outline the condition as it exists in our parliamentary practice at the present time, and have tried to show how embarrassing and how unfair it is to individual members especially on the government side. I have tried to show that good legislation might be defeated by this practice, or bad legislation might be enacted in the interests of the administration. I ask hon. members, then in their own interests, in the interest of parliament, and in the interest of progressive development of our constitutional system of government, to free themselves by voting for this resolution.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (Calgary West): The principle involved in the resolution before the House, Mr. Speaker, appears to me as worthy of serious consideration, and more especially is that the fact when, as we have been informed, the legislators of Alberta and the legislators of Nova Scotia have adopted similar resolutions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my hon. friend copies of the resolutions to which he refers, and would he give them to the House?

Mr. SHAW: I regret to say, I have not. It is well established that executive government in this country rests upon two vital and essential principles: First, the selection of a select committee from the Privy Council, called the Cabinet, all members of which are, theoretically, at least, aligned together and agreeable to a definite political platform, and second, there is a very definite and clear responsibility of the Cabinet for its actions to the wishes of a majority of the House of Commons. There was a time, indeed not so many years ago, when the Cabinet was something less of an executive body than it is now, more particularly confining itself then to administrative functions. The Cabinet in these latter days has become the very mainspring of government. Upon its efficient functioning largely depend the welfare, prosperity and contentment of our people. There is no doubt that in the exercise of every power and in the performance of every duty, the Cabinet is amenable and answerable to parliament. The Cabinet must admit, as it does admit, its responsibility to parliament for every administrative act and every legislative proposal. It similarly follows, that lacking the confidence of the membership of a parliament, the Cabinet must, of necessity, resign or ask for a dissolution of parliament. What is the accepted constitutional principle or practice in connection with these matters? It has sometimes been urged that when a ministry suffers a defeat in supply or on any other subject, it should forthwith resign or request a dissolution of parliament. There are a number of instances in which that view has been accepted. There are other cases in which that view has not been accepted. It is a singular fact that Canadian parliamentary records are particularly barren of incidents which might illustrate the problem at present before us; but on the other hand, the English practice has many instances, indeed, many of which are very illuminating, and I propose to take just a few moments of the time of the House for the purpose of giving some of the illustrations which have occurred, perhaps within the last hundred and fifty years, indicating the constitutional principle and its variation from time to time.

In the year 1741, Sir Robert Walpole declared that his excise scheme was of the greatest importance and indispensable for meeting the particular exigencies of the time. Despite the defeat of his scheme, he did not resign.

William Pitt took office in December, 1783. From that time until the month of March following, his government was in a minority some thirteen or fourteen times. Some of the votes passed against his government were as follows. One was an address for an administration having the confidence of the House and of the public. Another was a resolution asking for the removal of the ministers. A government bill, the East India bill, was defeated, and a resolution was presented by the House to His Majesty, asking that the services of that ministry be discontinued. Despite all these resolutions in that period of some two or three months, Pitt did not resign.

About the year 1828, Lord Liverpool's government was decisively beaten on the question of continuing the property tax, a defeat on a proposal to supply some £12,000,000 of revenue. There was no resignation in that case, and no attempt to force a resignation of the government. The same government opposed the repeal of the Test and Corporation Act, which was considered a matter of state policy and a very vital reform. The resolution carried, but the government did not resign.

The Earl Grey administration was defeated on two occasions in the year 1831, first on a motion to reduce the membership of the House, and second, on a question of an adjournment. Earl Grey advised dissolution, not only that, but he secured it. But reputable historians point to the fact that if Earl Grey had not been so impulsive, the House would have agreed to an Address to the King against dissolution.

Sir Robert Peel suffered many defeats during the term of his office, beginning in 1834. Might I point to a very interesting incident? There was moved to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, in the year 1835, an amendment expressing the regret of the House that more progress had not been made in certain important reforms. The amendment was carried, but Sir Robert Peel informed the House that he did not intend to resign. His government was, however, on numerous occasions, subsequently defeated, and he ultimately resigned.

Melbourne's administration began in 1835, and during the six years of its history, it was defeated in the House of Commons some fifty-eight different times. It did not resign until 1841, when Sir Robert Peel moved a vote of want of confidence, which was carried.

Lord Derby, in 1852, having an admitted minority in the House, quoted Sir Robert Peel in these words:

> I hold there is nothing unconstitutional in the post I fill and in the fulfilment of my duty to persevere in the discharge of those duties to which my Sovereign has called me in defiance of the majority that is against me upon any abstract question, and in the defiance of any declaration of the House of Commons that I ought to bring forward a particular question and settle it in a particular manner. I shall perform my duty until the House shall, by its vote, refuse its sanction to some measure of importance which I think necessary to submit to its consideration.

His administration was subsequently defeated on its financial policy; but leading opponents of the government held the view that such defeat did not warrant a resignation. His administration was defeated again in 1858 on its financial policy, and Mr. Disraeli, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer in that government, used these words:

> Ever since the commencement of the session, the government has found itself frequently in the minority and that too in many instances on questions of no mean importance, but they have overlooked these matters, and they consider a vote on the second reading of the reform bill to be a censure upon the government which virtually deprived them of all authority. They advised the Queen to dissolve Parliament.

In 1865, under the premiership of Disraeli, the government suffered, at least, three serious defeats. Mr. Disraeli requested dissolution, but his request was not agreed to. Mr. Gladstone at that time denied the right of a minister to inflict penal dissolution on the country. He argued that there were two conditions necessary to justify an appeal to the country by a government whose existence is menaced by an adverse vote in the Commons. Firstly, he said that there should be an adequate cause of public policy; secondly, that there should be a rational prospect of a reversal of a vote of the House. He denied the propriety of a dissolution merely to determine a question concerning the administration of the party in office.

In 1873, Mr. Gladstone was himself defeated on the Irish University Education Bill, and he desired to resign. His resignation was opposed by Mr. Disraeli. During the period of the Gladstone government of that time the administration was defeated three times within one week on important motions, but did not resign.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Were they government measures?

Mr. SHAW: Yes. May I, take the liberty of quoting a reference made by Mr. Balfour to the action of Mr. Gladstone? He says:

> Mr. Gladstone was defeated on a motion which he declared vital to the life of his government, and he consented nevertheless to resume office in the very House of Commons which had so treated him. Whether his reasons were good or bad I will not pretend to say; but I may parenthetically remark that, in my judgment, the three great cases in which a ministry had resigned, have not been able to induce their opponents to take office, and have then resumed office themselves, have alweys been—I will not use such strong words as disastrous or discreditable—but certainly have been unfortunate, and do not hold out much inducement to their successors to follow the same course. Lord Melbourne, who resumed office after the Bedchamber controversy, as it was called, in 1839, did, I think, nothing but harm to himself, his ministers, and his party. Sir Robert Peel, under circumstances which I admit are wholly different, resumed office in 1845, and by so doing destroyed the Tory party for more than twenty years.
> Nor do I beleive that anybody looking back upon the decision at which Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues arrived in 1873 would think that so far as they are concerned that course either was one which deserves the flattery of imitation.

I would direct the attention of the House to another incident which occurred in the year 1894. In that case an amendment was moved to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The amendment was moved by Mr. Labouchere, and it proposed that certain restrictions should be applied by the Commons with reference to the action of the House of Lords. In moving that amendment he spoke as follows:

> No one could complain that this would be a vote of want of confidence. As he understood it, a vote of want of confidence would be if it were proposed to strike out any particular point on which their minds—

Referring to the ministry, of course,—

> —were bent, or to add anything with which they did not themselves agree. Surely it was mere vanity and red-tapeism to say, "We do not agree with you, but we think the moment ill-chosen—we do not like to have our beautiful Address interfered with, and we will therefore vote against you."

In another place he said:

> To look upon this as a vote of want of confidence was as though a slave owner, raving at a philanthropist who was seeking to strike off the chains of his slave, were to represent that the efforts of the philanthropist amounted to a vote of want of confidence.

The amendment was carried by the House and formed part of the Address. The government, strange to relate, voted against their own motion, and after its defeat they brought in a subsequent Address, which appeared to meet the desires of the House, and which was carried. The next incident of which I have a note is that in connection with the so-called cordite vote of 1891. Lord Rosebery's government was in power, and an amendment was proposed in supply that the salary of the Secretary of War, I think, should be reduced by the sum of £100.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Was it not a money vote for the purchase of cordite?

Mr. SHAW: Perhaps. At all events, the amendment carried and Lord Rosebery resigned. Now, Lord Rosebery's action in resigning as a result of that vote met with hostile criticism not only in the House but to a great extent in the country. Mr. Gladstone himself described it as entirely pusillanimous. I might remark in passing, in this connection, that no vote of want of confidence followed the action of parliament in carrying the amendment.

The next incident to which I shall refer arose in 1905. John Redmond moved in supply that certain estimates be reduced and his motion carried. Mr. A. J. Balfour, who was then leader of the government, used these words some few days afterwards as indicating the position which his government proposed to take:

> Now I think it is evident from this brief, and perhaps too rapid, survey of recent constitutional history that the only divisions which, taken by themselves, and in isolation from the general circumstances of the time, from the feeling of the parties in the House, form the question of union in the cabinet—the only parliamentary issues which, taken in isolation from these attendant circumstances, have always been regarded as conclusive are those in which there has been a trial of strength between the parties with all the circumstances of notice and other attendant incidents required to make it clear that the issue to be decided is one of "confidence" or "no confidence".

Further on he says:

> I think that is the whole truth with regard to votes taken in this House considered in their isolation. But I quite admit that there are circumstances in which you cannot take a vote in its isolation. You have to take it with all its attendant circumstances, and a government if it is conscious that it cannot carry on the business of the House, may be perfectly justified in taking a vote which, under different circumstances, it would regard with relative indifference as the formal occasion of its termination of office.

With all respect, I suggest that this last statement of Mr. Balfour indicates, perhaps, the status of this matter at the present time. There have been incidents subsequent to that, but they are of more or less minor importance. Now, having ascertained, in the words of Mr. Balfour, the generally accepted rule, what is the effect of the proposed resolution before the House It seems to me it may be put shortly in this way: that it simply transfers, from the Cabinet to parliament, the responsibility of determining whether or not an adverse vote, together with the attendant circumstances, is such as to justify the government in resigning or in seeking dissolution. I think it simply means the transference of responsibility, and the question for the House to determine, then, would be whether or not such a transference of responsibility is desirable. Is not the House of Commons as a body in a better position to determine a question of that character? Not only do its members come from all parts of the country, not only are they larger in number than the government, but they have a better idea of the public pulse than the Cabinet could have; and it seems to me that in the last analysis they would give, generally speaking, a truer verdict than the government could give on a matter of that kind.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Would not the fear of an election put them in a less independent position than the government?

Mr. SHAW: I think not. I see no reason why the prospect of an election should act as my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): It is very powerful sometimes.

Mr. SHAW: I defer to the judgment of my hon. friend in that regard. In the second place, so far as the membership of the House itself is concerned, the member is now very frequently placed in a position where he cannot disagree with a government measure without imperilling the life of the government. He knows not what particular measure may be considered as vital and important and a vote against which will be considered by the government as a vote of want of confidence. The adoption of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) will, it seems to me, allow members to escape that embarrassing situation where frequently they vote against their convictions and, perhaps, in many cases, against the interests of their constituents.

Under our present system private members lose much of their independence of thought and much of their freedom of action. Not only will this suggested change be beneficial in so far as the membership of the House is concerned, but it seems to me that oppositions whose real function is that of constructive criticism will realize that it is useless to seek to embarrass a government by any snap decision. Further, I think the ministry itself will benefit as the result of this proposed change. The constant fear of defeat of a government measure, with the resultant loss of prestige, tends to timidity on the part of the Cabinet both as to its administrative acts and its legislative proposals, with the inevitable consequence of governmental inaction, and particularly is this so where a government holds office by a slim majority.

It seems to me therefore, Mr. Speaker, in view of our constitutional practice, that the proposed resolution is in harmony with our developing political institutions, and will assist in an increasing release from partisanship in the consideration of our national affairs.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all express to the hon. member who has moved this resolution (Mr. Irvine) my appreciation not only of the thoughtful manner in which he has dealt with this important subject, but also of his generous reference to the government in its relation to the House. I wish to assure him that so far as this government is concerned he will, I believe, always have reason to feel that the consideration which we realize is owing to hon. members with respect to every question that comes before them is something which will be continued throughout its tenure of office.

The resolution which my hon. friend has introduced is perhaps as important as any which can be brought forward in this House, inasmuch as it has to do with what is really the corner stone of our constitutional structure—I mean the responsibility of the ministry to parliament. Our present constitution and parliamentary practice are not the result of any sudden arrangement effected without mature and deliberate consideration: they come to us with all their attendant features as perhaps the greatest inheritance which the peoples of British descent hold. Britain has been rightly called the Mother of Parliaments, and at Westminister, as nowhere else in the world, there has been worked out a parliamentary practice which tends to preserve liberty and freedom as no other parliamentary practice even begins to do. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I think we should approach any change—I use the term "any change" advisedly—in parliamentary practice with the utmost caution. Customs which have stood the test of years, which have been found in different parliamentary assemblies to be of advantage, not for five or ten or twenty years, but for a hundred years or more, are customs which must have much to support them, and we should move carefully and very slowly in any effort to alter them, or to substitute something in their stead.

May I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this of all times is a period in the world's history when we should be particularly careful about adopting innovations? It is an age of unrest in many parts of the world, and customs and practices which have been found to serve mankind well have been thrown overboard in some quarters of the globe. With what result? In those countries where men have dealt lightly with their accepted constitutions and methods of procedure, we find today not orderly development but in some cases chaos in an extreme form. One has but to contrast the conditions as they exist today in some of the legislative bodies in Europe with what they were before the recent war to appreciate why great caution and great care is needed in accepting any proposals which make for a radical change in parliamentary procedure.

It might be expected, as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) has just said, that the government would be the first to welcome this resolution. And possibly a government that has the very slender majority which this government has might be expected to be among the first to desire to accept it. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a defeat of a government measure should not be considered as a sufficient reason for the resignation of the government, unless followed by a vote of lack of confidence.

When one considers that the present administration has behind it a majority of possibly but one or two over that of the other parties in the House, one might readily assume that the government would welcome any kind of change which would justify it, in case of the defeat of some measure before the House, in holding on to office and refusing to go to the country. Were we to give our support to this resolution, the first criticism that would be levelled against us would be that we had accepted it because we had at last found some means whereby we could retain office in the face of an adverse vote. That, Mr. Speaker, would be a most unfortunate situation, it seems to me, for the country to permit any government to get itself into.

My hon. friend who has introduced the resolution spoke about autocracy and democracy. He said that our present system of cabinet government lends itself to autocracy on the part of Cabinets. May I ask my hon. friend: what is the one check by parliament on possible autocracy by a Cabinet other than that when a government brings in a measure, and is defeated, the government must regard itself as no longer possessing the confidence of the House? My hon. friend is helping autocracy rather than furthering democracy in government when he leaves it open to an administration, once it has been shown by the votes of the members of the House that it no longer enjoys their confidence, still to retain office. It gives an autocratic government a second chance for its life. To my way of thinking, in these days when we wish to have democratic principles prevail in matters of government, the very first chance to put an autocratic government out of power, is the chance to seize; it should never be let go by. That is the position we take in regard to this resolution.

The reason that the practice has prevailed in British government that a ministry must be supported by the people's representatives, or otherwise go back to the people, is that such a practice is the most effective in keeping a ministry true to those principles which are the ones the people wish to have regarded in legislation.

Now, may I say to my hon. friend that I fear his resolution, well intended as it is, would have an effect entirely different to that which he believes it would have? It is in the interests of the government in any country that every precaution should be taken to see that a ministry in bringing down legislation does so only after the most careful deliberate and mature thought, and that in presenting their legislation to parliament they present only legislation which they believe to be necessary in the country's interests. Permit the ministry to use its own judgment in the matter of whether or not it shall resign upon its legislation being defeated, and it will soon begin to introduce all kinds of legislation without very much thought. You open the door to the introduction of measure after measure that is half-baked, once the ministry know that if defeated on particular measures it may, by skirmishing about and by conferences here and there with different members of the House, get itself re-established in a position where it can continue to carry on. That would be much against the interests of good legislation; it would tend to make a ministry not more careful, but possibly indifferent, with respect to some of the measures it might bring before the House.

There are, after all, times and places for every thing. There are times when confidence in an administration should be expressed, and when any contrary attitude should have serious consequences. One of those times is on the consideration of government measures. Our parliamentary practice, which, as I have already mentioned, is the result of wide experience extending over many years, has fixed certain times and certain places for the expression of confidence, or the reverse, in a ministry. My hon. friend mentioned three instances, I think, which he regarded as supporting his resolution. The first was the attitude of the government of Sir Robert Borden in the matter of titles, he said in this connection that he thought in some way the members of parliament had been precluded from freely expressing their views on that subject. But I ask my hon. friend, what was the view that the parliament of Sir Robert Borden's day took on this very matter of titles? It was the parliament of that day that adopted a resolution abolishing titles altogether. The members of parliament were not prevented from expressing their views on the subject of titles. They had ample opportunity to do so, but there was a time and place for a resolution of the kind. When it was brought in at the appropriate time and at the right place, the resolution carried, notwithstanding the fact that the government had at another time felt that the adoption of such a course with reference to a government measure would have placed it in a false position in view of a stand it had previously taken or pledges or promises it may have made. The government has a knowledge of its obligations which others cannot begin to have. I do not know what the motives of the government of Sir Robert Borden were in making an issue of the question as they did, but I do know this: the fact that they did take that stand in regard to titles helped to defeat the Tory party at the last election; it was one of the things which helped to show the existence of that very condition of autocracy to which my hon. friend has referred. It helped to reveal something more—the servility of the following that the Prime Minister of that day had; and these two things coupled with a like set of circumstances on the part of the administration that succeeded it, account in part for the defeat at the polls of the late administration.

There was in virtue of the government's attitude towards a government measure no denial of the right of any individual member to give expression to his views, nor as the facts prove was the power taken from parliament to do the very thing my hon. friend says they ought to have done in such a case, namely, abolish titles altogether.

Take the other instances to which my hon. friend has referred, the amendments to the Address. One has but to reflect for a moment to see that in view of the limited duration of parliament it is desirable that matters of great public concern should be dealt with at appropriate times and seasons; that if amendments of all kinds are to be considered in order on all occasions, the time of the members, the time of the country, may be used to very little effect in the interests of the people as a whole. I cannot but believe that that is one of the reasons why under the British practice it has generally been maintained that an amendment to the Address must be considered in the nature of a motion of want of confidence in the administration. The Address is presented at the very opening of parliament. It is in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is considered before hon. members have had opportunity to obtain all the information they should have before they express what may or may not be in the nature of want of confidence in the administration. Take the two amendments to which my hon. friend has just referred. One of them related to the question of economy. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that had the hon. member who moved that amendment waited until the government had presented to parliament the estimates for the present year, he and other hon. members of this House would have been in a better position to express themselves on the question as to whether or not the government was seeking to effect economies. Yet before the estimates are brought down; before, under our parliamentary procedure, the government had had any opportunity to lay before hon. members of the House a statement of what its expenditures were likely to be, hon. members were asked, through the amendment introduced, to express themselves in a manner which seemed to imply that the government had not been doing its utmost in the matter of effecting economies.

Take the other resolution that was moved. At the time of the presentation of that motion hon. members were not aware of what the government's policy in respect to trade matters was likely to be. They were informed in the Address that certain trade conventions which had been adopted would be presented to parliament, and it was to be assumed that those treaties would have some relation to questions of trade and duties. More than that, it is known by everyone that there is a time particularly set apart for the discussion of matters pertaining to tariff, and that is when the budget is brought down. Why, then, should a debate be precipitated on tariff matters before parliament has before it in the regular way the information which it ought to have in passing upon a matter of the kind? Furthermore, it is open to any hon. member, when the House is being moved into committee of supply, to introduce a resolution to discuss the various subjects to which I have referred. If the question were one of taking away the right of hon. members of the House to a full expression of their views on all matters, I would support my hon. friend in any measure which would increase the freedom of debate. But where our procedure affords ample opportunity to hon. members on appropriate occasions to bring to the attention of the House and of the country matters of great public concern, then I think we are wiser to pause and endeavour to discover the reasons which have made our parliamentary practice what it is, before introducing innovations which tend to strike at the very heart of ministerial responsibility.

May I say a further word, Mr. Speaker, in regard to what my hon. friend has said on the subject of party caucuses? Here again we notice a tendency which has become all too prevalent in recent years, that of finding fault with old customs and methods of doing public business. The caucus in the minds of some people today is supposed to be a very wicked kind of thing. In some way, it is assumed that, through this instrument the cabinet can do what it wishes with its followers, but many of those who have been strongest in condemning the party caucus so-called have been among the first, I have noticed, to recognize that they can get nowhere in understanding the views of their own following until they have a caucus themselves and discuss questions before its members.

Now what is a parliamentary caucus, when one comes down to it? It is nothing more than a gathering of a certain number of members of parliament. In a case of a government caucus it is a bringing together of the majority of members in the House of Commons supporting the government. It is the means whereby a government can ascertain through its following what the views and opinions of the public, as represented by the various constituencies may be. It is not a means of over-riding parliament. It is a means of discovering the will of the people through their representatives in a manner which cannot be done under the formal procedure which is required in this chamber. That is what a party caucus amounts to. A government ought to seek continually to give expression to the public will. A government has to be careful in the matter of the legislation it brings into parliament, to be sure that it is in accord with the public will. How can that best be ascertained? Wait until the legislation is brought down in parliament and put on the Table; or by a conference with the government's own following, if there is any doubt one way or the other in regard to any phases of the legislation? After all, what a government has to keep before it, if it is to be worthy of the name of a government, is first of all the support it will receive in the country for the measures it introduces; secondly, the support it will receive in parliament. The government should continually endeavour to bring in legislation which it feels is in accordance with the needs and desires of the people at large, but there may well be occasions where a government may be obliged to have a further conference with its own following to ascertain whether or not the particular views which it is about to present in the form of legislation are to all intents and purposes in accordance with the wishes of the people, as they understand them. That is in the interests of democracy. That is not taking away any rights from the people's representatives in parliament. It is simply coming into closer consultation with the people's representatives in a manner that permits of the greatest freedom of expression on their part.

May I say this to hon. members of this House? I cannot imagine a more intolerable situation for the government; I cannot imagine anything better calculated to destroy confidence in an administration throughout the country, than that a government should come to parliament with legislation which it is prepared to stand up and fight for, and still permit the slightest doubt as to its securing from parliament what it believes to be necessary in the public interest. Failing this it should be prepared to take its appeal from parliament to the country. A Cabinet has carefully to consider all aspects of public questions before it introduces any legislation. My hon. friend says that to all intents and purposes a government measure should be the same as a private bill. Well, then, may I ask him, why have any Cabinet at all? Why not let us have a Soviet at once, because that is what it amounts to; no head whatever, no directing agency, anyone free to get up and propose any measure with just such knowledge as he may have, free to spring it on the House at any moment, and, with such eloquence as he can muster, carry it through if possible. I do not know what will happen to the legislation of the country if we proceed in that way. Government measures are not brought down lightly. They are the result of long and careful consideration. Government measures are brought down in the light of carefully matured policy, and an administration that brings down its legislation in any other way should not be entitled to expect from parliament a second opportunity once it meets with defeat on a matter which it is prepared to say to the House it regards as all important in the public interest.

There are other aspects of this question to which I would like to refer, but I think perhaps I have said enough to indicate the point of view of the administration on this resolution. I might, however, mention one or two points that I have made a note of lest it might be thought I was passing them over.

My hon. friend says that without the adoption of his resolution bad legislation might be passed to save a good administration, and good legislation defeated to save a bad administration. There is a passage that my hon. friend will recognize and remember—"By their fruits ye shall know them," and the only way you can tell whether an administration is good or bad is by what it does. I cannot well imagine a good administration bringing in bad legislation or a bad administration bringing in good legislation. I think you must judge an administration in large measure by the class of legislation which it brings in.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

My hon. friend from Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) cited a number of instances where governments had not resigned when they were defeated. Well, that I think ought to be an answer, to all intents and purposes, to what my hon. friend has in view in this resolution. He wants the administration to have some freedom. The cases that have been cited are the exceptions which prove the rule. What my hon. friend by his resolution seeks is to lay down a general principle, not an exception. I can conceive of times where, owing to unforseen circumstances, a thin House, or some minor phase in legislation, or for some special reason not generally understood at the time but which, once explained, is easily understood, it would be unwise for a government, if it suffered defeat under such circumstances to regard defeat as a vote of want of confidence demanding resignation or a request for a dissolution. Circumstances such as those would have to be considered each on its merits, but they should be considered, not as the rule, but as the exception to the rule, and in my opinion ought very seldom to be considered. More than that, the more slender a ministry's following, the more necessary I believe it to be that the ministry should have a full sense of its responsibility to the people's representatives and to that larger public outside the halls of parliament whom they represent.

Mr. GOOD: May I ask a question? If there were three parties of approximately equal strength, and only one of them was represented in the Cabinet, what would be the situation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The position to my mind is exactly the same whether there are three parties or thirty. A government that cannot bring together a group of men, no matter where they are taken from, sufficiently strong to command the confidence of those who compose a parliament has no right to exist. How is public business to be carried on in a manner which will inspire confidence in the country unless a ministry is able to say to the public: With our knowledge of affairs, acquired as only a ministry can acquire it, we believe such and such legislation necessary for the country; we think this or that measure absolutely essential to meet a situation we are face to face with to-day; we give our reasons, give them publicly on the floor of parliament, and if our reasons are not accepted, we shall appeal to those from whom our authority is derived and ask them, if they are unable to give us their support, to put someone else in our place. The idea that the ministry should be in any way restricted in its appeal to the people at any time is the very antithesis of democracy. The whole effort manifest in the evolution of government has been to bring the ministry to the point where, if for any reason whatever, it ceases to hold the confidence of parliament it will be obliged to go to the people. Once you take away that safeguard, you have substituted possibilities of autocracy for what is after all the strongest factor in the maintenance of democratic principles of government. May I say this to my hon. friend,—and say it as the result of such experience as I have thus far been permitted to have in the management of parliamentary affairs,—that I should not wish to have anything to do with a government which I did not believe had the confidence of the people. I should not wish to belong to a government that would introduce measures which it did not regard as essential to good government and to the needs of the people, and I should not wish to belong to a government, nor would I think of retaining in a Cabinet for a day, which, bringing into parliament a measure which it believed to be in the public interest, which it was prepared to say was in the public interest, would think of continuing in office after a vote of want of confidence was expressed by a refusal by the House of Commons to pass legislation deemed essential by its directing head. That is the position we take as a government, and we take it in the interest of democratic government, in the interests of government by the people, and as a means of maintaining responsible government, which, as I said in beginning these few remarks is the corner stone of our whole constitutional structure.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I have been particularly interested in the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on this resolution. He has, in fact, given a speech which can be justly and appropriately applied to a resolution on proportional representation, and I was particularly pleased to hear his words when he said, "In this age of disturbance we should be particularly careful about adopting innovations". Last year this House had a debate on proportional representation in which I took some part, and the Prime Minister also took a part, and how he would be able to harmonize his arguments to-day upon this motion on the theory of responsibility of Cabinet to parliament with the motion which was made last year will only be disclosed when the new motion on proportional representation is introduced into the House some time in the near future. This resolution, Mr. Speaker, is of a kind of which it can be properly said that it is good in theory but poor in practice, and I say so because the whole structure of the constitution is based on the responsibility of the Cabinet to parliament, and any who have given a study to that question must realize that just so soon as we take the responsibility from the Cabinet we revert to another system of government which is not the British system, but which is more nearly analogous to the system which has been adopted in the United States and in France, where the responsibility of the executive is direct to the president and not to parliament.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask if the hon. member considers this resolution takes the responsibility from parliament? If so, in what way does it do so?

Mr. LADNER: This resolution, in my judgment, has the effect in practice of a dissipation of cabinet responsibility, because all a cabinet would need to do, instead of taking the high plane which the Prime Minister has suggested and studying carefully the problems which are to be presented to parliament, would be to go in a haphazard way without consideration, and sometimes perhaps without regard to the best interests of the people, and place the matter before parliament, and say afterwards, "Well, in any event, it is the members' fault, and not the Cabinet's fault." When you come to work out a practice of that kind you are going almost as far back as the time of Charles I. when cabinet responsibility rested directly with the sovereign, and when, as a result of the famous Cabal, it was taken from the sovereign and placed directly upon parliament. A similar situtation existed, if my recollection serves me right, as late as 1842, when the cabinet responsibility in Canada was direct to the Governor General, and afterwards the responsibility was direct to parliament. In short, Mr. Speaker, the responsibility of the Cabinet to parliament is the keystone of our system of government. It has developed over a long period of time. It has been practised in Great Britain and in many of the dominions, and it has been proven to be the most practical method by which the will of the majority of the people can be expressed in governmental policy and in legislation. Ours has proven to be the flexible constitution, as opposed to the non-flexible or rigid constitution, such as we have in the United States, and just as soon as we take from the Cabinet that responsibility which it should have for all the measures which it undertakes and give it to the members at large, just so soon do we depart from the principle of government which has been laid down after years and years of practice and experience and has been found to be the soundest of all democracies in the world. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I would oppose this innovation and the resolution which has been introduced.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I have tried to approach this question with an open mind, and I must confess that the speeches of the last two hon. members seemed to me to be very far from convincing. May I present the situation as I see it in a very homely illustration? A good many hon. members here will have had the experience in times past of hiring men to do certain work, and they will have gone to those men at times and asked them to do certain jobs in a certain way. Now, possibly on such an occasion, the hired man will throw up his hands and say, "Well, if my way doesn't suit you, get somebody else." I do not think that attitude is a creditable attitude. It is an attitude that any man might take, that some men, a good many men possibly, do take; but it reflects no credit, as I see it, upon any man who engages to do a job, to resent criticism. He has a right to ask his employer at such a time "Does this criticism mean that you wish me to quit?—I want to know"; and he has a right to an answer. But he has no right as I see it, if he is an honourable right-thinking man, to quit because there is a little criticism, or even more than a little criticism.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that little illustration suggests to me the question of the relationship which exists between the electorate, this House of representatives, and the Cabinet. Theoretically, I know, the Cabinet is chosen by the Prime Minister, by the leader of a so-called majority, section or party, at the request of the King's representative. Theoretically the Cabinet is responsible to the King, or the King's representative; but I think we shall all agree that at the present time, such is largely, if not wholly, a fiction, and that parliament, representing the people, is in the position of master and not servant of the Cabinet. I take it that the Cabinet is asked to look after our executive business, our administration, the business affairs of this country, by and under this parliament; that this parliament is for the time being judge and master; and that going back another step, the people are the judges whether or not this parliament holds the Cabinet properly responsible for the discharge of its duties.

The right hon. gentleman who leads the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke about this being a time when we should be very careful as to innovations. That is—what shall I say?—a time-honoured plea, yet not, I think, honoured by time; but a plea often advanced at such a time as this on behalf of the status quo. In the city of Winnipeg a few years ago we saw something happen which, as I see it, was a very admirable example of the foolishness of that policy. If there is a time when innovation, carefully considered, is desirable, it is at a time of unrest. Any other policy leads only to social explosions and not to social progress. The rigidity of our institutions is always a source of danger, and in my opinion one of the features of the British constitution which is of tremendous importance is its flexibility, its adaptability to changing conditions. Surely, the world moves! In fact, I heard it said once, and, I think, said with a great deal of propriety—"there is nothing changeless in the world but change." If conditions are constantly changing, then we must adapt ourselves to those changing conditions.

As I understand the resolution before the House, it is but an expression of the best practice under conditions as they exist at the present time. Even in Great Britain, as was shown by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw), for many years it has been a very common practice for governments not to take any particular judgment of the House on a specific issue as a vote of no confidence, and it seems to me that, looking at the matter from a commonsense standpoint, the British practice is right. It is particularly necessary at the present time to take cognizance of conditions prevailing. We have now a situation which is very different from what it was a few years ago. We have three very considerable groups in this House, and we have not yet evolved a system of representation in the Cabinet from more than one group. We have no coalition government here, nor have we yet developed a system or method of selecting cabinet ministers out of different groups. If the proportion was somewhat different from what it is at the present time, we would have a minority government. Let us suppose for example, that the government is represented by about one-third of the members of this House, and also that the two other groups constitute one-third each of the membership. How is this policy of cabinet responsibility going to work out under such conditions? We are face to face with a condition, not a theory, and I maintain that the passing of this resolution, the acceptance of it as a general principle, while it could not possibly compel a government to keep office if the government did not wish to do so, still would liberate them and all the members in the House from a most embarrassing, unfair bondage which exists at the present time.

It was said a few minutes ago that we must judge an administration by the legislation which it brings down. That is absolutely true; but good servants sometimes make mistakes, and if, as I said a few moments ago, a hired man should refuse to work at all because he was criticised for making one or two mistakes, he would not be, in my opinion, in a proper frame of mind. A good administration may make mistakes. Why should they, at any time, say to this House: "Now, this is our policy; you can take it or not; if you do not vote this thing through, we are going to quit the job." They may be simply making a mistake; there may be nothing sinister or malevolent on the part of the administration. While I think all respect and consideration should be given to government measures, it does not follow that every measure is given the greatest consideration by the Cabinet. If such was the case, what would be the purpose of this House to discuss these questions? If a government has all knowledge, and can always decide wisely on all questions, why then have any body superior to the government, to pass upon government measures to criticise, to ask questions, and all that sort of thing? I do not think the argument advanced in that case is valid.

The right hon. gentleman who leads the government also advanced the opinion that this change which we are proposing would increase rather than decrease the danger of autocracy. I cannot feel that that is so at all. It seems to me that the difficulty which the right hon. gentleman conjured up is met by the provision in the latter part of the resolution requiring a specific vote of confidence or no confidence in the government. Supposing a government brings down a measure, and says: "We believe this is a very important measure; we commend it to your consideration." And supposing it is given consideration by the House and it is turned down. The government has a right to say then: "Does this mean that you wish us to resign?" The government has a perfect right to do that; in fact, it ought to do it, and then it will get its answer as to what this House decides it should do. In my opinion, the difficulties and dangers of greater autocracy are met by the requiring of a specific vote of want of confidence after a government defeat.

Nor do I think that such a change as is proposed would, in the natural course of events, lead a ministry to be careless as to what it brought before the House. I felt when that point was raised that there was really very little in it. Surely a self-respecting and competent ministry would not, because it was liberated from a difficult position, bring down for the consideration of the House all kinds of questions regardless of whether they were worth considering or not. To suppose that would be to assume that the government had very little sense. No assemblage of people, I take it, would make a practice of doing that sort of thing. Now, it seems to me that this question was pretty forcibly presented to the House the other day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and I want to read one little quotation he gave. Referring to the two amendments that were presented on that occasion he figuratively held up his hands in horror at the impropriety of the action which was then proposed, and he quoted Tennyson as follows:

> A land of settled government,
> A land of just and old renown,
> Where Freedom slowly broadens down
> From precedent to precedent.

Everyone here, I think, will subscribe to that; it is what we want. But we do not want stagnation. We want freedom to broaden down, and this is the time when this particular step in the broadening down, or rather the broadening out, of freedom ought to be taken. The Minister of Finance, I think, answered his own objection very properly just a few minutes earlier when he quoted another extract, which I shall read to the House, and which I think is exceedingly pertinent:

> New occasions teach new duties;
> Time makes ancient good uncouth.
> They must upward still, and onward,
> Who would keep abreast of truth.

Conditions are changing, and I maintain that this is the next step, not a revolutionary step that would produce chaos or insurrection or anything of that kind, but something that would free us from a very humiliating, disagreeable and embarrassing kind of bondage. I think, Sir, that some support can be secured for the case which we are presenting from the attitude of the government last year. Every hon. member here, will recall the debate on the oleomargarine question. The Prime Minister, I think, stated, when that matter was submitted to the House, that the government was divided and had no policy. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) was apparently stricken with horror that suggestion, but to me it seemed a very proper and very desirable attitude on the part of the government. In presenting the problem to the House in that way the government asked for an expression of opinion, which it received, and subsequently it brought down a bill to embody that opinion in legislation.

Mr. LADNER: Did the government carry out that expression of opinion?

Mr. GOOD: I think it did. There was some criticism when the bill was brought down by reason of the fact that it was only for one year; but apart from that I think the government did carry out the opinion expressed by the House on that occasion. At that time a very sharp exchange of compliments took place between the right hon. gentleman who leads the Conservative party and several other members of the House. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall just read a part of that colloquy. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) spoke in part as follows:

> I do not quite hold the same view that my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition does in his criticism of the government for failing to accept full responsibility and bring down its measure. I think the position taken by the government in asking the judgment of the House on this question, as it did a few weeks ago, was a fair and a very defensible position. If that were done a little more frequently in parliament—
>
> Mr. Meighen: We would get into this mess more frequently, would we not?
>
> Mr. Crerar: No, I do not think so at all. I think we would have better results. My criticism of the government in this case is that once the judgment of parliament was taken they did not implement that judgment to the full and make this measure permanent.

I shall not read the next few sentences, but a little further on the hon. member for Marquette is reported as follows:

> That is all very well, but if the view of my hon. friend is held to the letter, it simply means that a dozen gentlemen composing the government of this country will decide in cabinet council what is good for the country, and then come to parliament and say, you must take this or turn us out.
> Mr. Casgrain: Toryism.
> Mr. Meighen: That is right.

Now, the situation last year was very interesting to me. I may say that a great many things that have happened here have seemed to me, as a new member, rather absurd. Possibly I could get used to them if I were here long enough; I dare say people can get used to anything. But if we are to interpret history and human life correctly, it seems to me that we must beware of being tied down to conventions. I am not a hare-brained fanatic. I do not want to see startling and very rapid changes in legislation or constitutional practice. But I do think that we are in constant danger of keeping the lid screwed down too tightly on free speech, on matters of constitutional change, and on everything that encourages or promotes change. And the effect of that will be upheavals and explosions.

Let me give another illustration which seems to me to fit the case under discussion at the present moment. There comes a time in the development of every fertile egg in the hatching process when the imprisoned chick begins to break the shell and to emerge. If the chick did not break the shell at a certain period in its development it would die; and it is just as natural for the shell to be broken at a certain stage as for any other change to take place in the organic world. Our customs are very often something like the shell that surrounds the chick—we have to break them or we will die. It was said many years ago, as all hon. members know, that the new wine would burst the old wine-skins. I think that in this chamber at the present time there is a good deal of new wine trying to burst the old skins—old customs which tie us down, cripple and embarrass us and, as far as I can see, do us no good whatever.

I take it that there are two ways in which an administration can carry on. One is by having a solid, and what tends to become a servile, majority behind it. In that way a group of men can ram down the throats of their followers and the country any policy they choose. I think we do not have to look very far back in our history to see something of that sort. The other method is for the government to conform its policy, not only before it brings that policy down but afterwards, to the will of the elected representatives, and through them to the will of the people. I see nothing in that attitude which would indicate any lack of self-respect on the part of a government. In fact, it seems to me that it indicates an attitude the very reverse. I know it has been maintained by many that the self-respect of this parliament would be taken away if a constitutional check were placed upon it such as might operate through the optional referendum; but, Sir, I do not believe that that is so. We admit that we are here subject to the surveillance and guidance of the electorate, because every four or five years we go back to the fountain-head of power and ask for further instructions and for a fresh mandate. Now, we do not consider that we demean ourselves because we do that. Nor would we, I take it, be any more lacking in self-respect if we were subject to a continuous oversight by the people, which we might have through such a device as the optional referendum. So that the attitude of a government in coming to this House, as the present administration did last year in connection with the oleomargarine question, and asking for instructions, and then carrying out those instructions. would not, I think, indicate lack of self-respect. For my part, I would esteem a man or a group of men much more highly who adopted that attitude rather than the other attitude of: "Well, if you don't like it we'll quit".

Attention has been drawn already, Mr. Speaker, to the serious danger of confused or blended issues. I wish to point out again, and to emphasize as much as I can, the tremendous danger which resides in that fact. In all our general elections we have, most unfortunately for this country, a great variety of issues confused or blended. In some places one issue is uppermost, in some places another; and the result is that very rarely are questions considered on their merits. Now, I maintain that anything we can do to disentangle issues, to consider and decide every issue on its own merits, is a step towards better legislation and a truer democracy. But when the fate of an administration is linked up with the acceptance or rejection of a particular policy, I think it is highly unfortunate. It has been maintained, of course, that no harm has resulted by following what has been the general practice in this country; but I submit that a great deal of harm has been done. In fact, I am inclined to think that if we could read the hearts of hon. members opposite we would realize that a great deal of harm was done not long ago by their acceptance of an obligation which no doubt compelled many of them to choose what they took to be the lesser of two evils, and to maintain the government in office at all costs, even at the sacrifice of their own principles.

While I would disagree with very little of what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said by way of general comment on constitutional practice, at the same time I do not think that his remarks were entirely relevant, nor did they constitute any really valid argument against the adoption of this principle. If all parties in this House could only see their way clear to adopt it, I am convinced that we would all feel a great burden taken off our shoulders. Last year I recall that on the budget vote some hon. members were extremely embarrassed by a conflict between their own opinions and what they thought was their duty in regard to the specific situation that faced them. Surely we can get away from that. Surely we are not so tied to custom but what if it is binding and galling we cannot change the custom to give us freedom and relief. And if we made the proposed change, and it did not work well, we should still be at liberty to restore the present practice. Therefore, taking all things into consideration, I feel that this is a very, very necessary step towards the liberation of all hon. members, and I shall heartily support the resolution.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I should not have taken part in this debate, but during its course it has occurred to me that there is presented an aspect of very great importance to a third party in this House. I was somewhat amazed to hear the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) express his attachment for things that are antique. I do not know that it becomes him as a Liberal prime minister to have that sentimental attachment to practices and customs by virtue of their ancient character. It seems to me that he presented no argument that can be considered valid by such a House as this that has come to be what it is through the gradual elimination of things antique and their replacement by others that are modern and more in keeping with our present day thought and action.

With respect to his deprecation of adopting any innovation at the present time in view of world conditions and the very uncertain state of our civilization, well, I modestly put it up to him, assuming that he had reference to Russia: Is the condition of things in Russia due to innovation, or is it due to the resistance of innovation? Does he not think that reasonable concession to progress would have had a very marked influence upon the progress of events in Russia? Every right thinking man believes that it would; it was the unreasoning, blind opposition to reasonable improvements that brought Russia to the condition she finds herself in to-day. It is a well known statement of a famous British philosopher that perverse resistance to reasonable innovation is one of the chief incitements to revolution; it always has been and always will be.

Now with respect to the argument regarding responsible government, that is one of the phrases that it is very easy to conjure with, because it has become part of the mosaic of our British parliamentary stock of ideas. "Responsible government,"—what does it mean? Reflect upon it for a minute. Originally —I put it to you—did it not mean the supremacy of parliament? Is that not what it means in the first place? I prefer to look at it in that light. I prefer to do away with that slippery phrase, "responsible government", it has no place in rational argument, because it immediately gives rise to many phases of meaning that you can conjure with and that you can use to obscure the purpose of a debate like this. The original idea behind responsible government was simply the supremacy of parliament, and I think that that is the idea we have before us at the present time—the supremacy of this House, not the supremacy of any part of it; not the supremacy of the government or of the governmental party, but the supremacy of this body of elected representatives of the people. That is the idea that we have to hold before us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend a question? How does he make out that it is in any way interfering with the supremacy of parliament to give parliament the right at any and all times to turn the ministry out of office?

Mr. BIRD: I agree that parliament ought to maintain its right to turn the ministry out of office, but it ought also to have the right to say whether a minister shall resign office or not. I mean that parliament ought to be the court of last resort in all instances, on all questions. Originally, as I understand it, responsible government applied to administration only; it meant that a government should be responsible to the House for its acts of administration, and had no reference at all to any transaction that took place within the House itself. That was a very reasonable view, as things were in times past. I hold that the Prime Minister's view of responsible government is out of harmony with the supremacy of parliament as we conceive it, because it simply means that the Cabinet is responsible not to parliament, but to itself. The Prime Minister resents the suggestion that the responsibility of the Cabinet to itself should be interefered with in any way and seems to maintain that the Cabinet should decide all questions that come up, and that nobody else should influence its decision.

Our contention is that the supremacy of this House is the supremacy of its majority—not of the majority of the Liberal party in power at the present time; not of the majority of the present cabinet, but of the majority of voices on the floor of the House. The liberties of the people cannot be preserved in any other way. This cabinet supremacy, which is altogether out of harmony with parliament's supremacy, is a thing of latter-day growth. We have seen, by slow development, the powers of parliament filched from our hand. I noted especially last session some expressions of the Prime Minister himself which indicated that he was sensible of that condition—some very remarkable expressions, as I thought, which showed also that the Prime Minister was a good deal better than his creed. His expressions on that occasion indicated his belief that an unhealthy kind of power had come to reside within cabinets, and he intimated that with a view of remedying the condition he was going to see that the Cabinet acted in future more as a committee of the House than it had done in the past. But how is it going to act as a committee of the House if it does not consult the House, if it does not extend to all sections in the House the right to be consulted—the latter, by the way, being a very famous phrase in the history of our constitution.

As I said at the outset, the really important aspect of this discussion is its bearing upon the third party in the House. We came here last year as a third party, important in point of numbers, and important, too, in respect to the impulse that sent us here—an impulse, which. I conceive, has not estranged it from the forward-looking members of the House, whatever party they belong to. Apart altogether from the sectional matters that we have to bring before you, you will recognize that behind us there is a true democratic impulse. Well, coming here last session we found that a place had by no means been prepared for us, and that when we naturally sought free discussion on many questions we found ourselves trammelled, our hands tied. In the budget debate we saw that come to a head when the third party was tied hand and foot in respect to a free expression of opinion upon matters which were important to the members of that party and to their constituents. That sort of thing is intolerable, and I say that if the Prime Minister and his Cabinet turn down this resolution, it is up to them to see that a greater degree of hospitality is extended toward this third party, this new factor in the parliament of Canada. They should see that we are given greater freedom of expression, that we are not trammelled in any way, in the matter of presenting to the House those things that we are sent here to lay before it.

Mr. MARTELL: Does my hon. friend not think that it is more in accordance with democracy that he should have the right, if he does not agree with the government, to move a resolution which could result in the defeat of the government, rather than that the way should be opened to the moving of all sorts of academic resolutions which would mean nothing?

Mr. BIRD: I do not know whether I understand the question aright, but it seems to express what I am contending for—that we should have the right to free expression of opinion. We are the court of final appeal on all questions.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker, to my mind the attitude taken by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is in accordance with all precedents of parliamentary government in the British Empire. If I were on the opposite side of the House and opposing the government, I should regard it as in the best interests of the country, and would consider that I had been given ample opportunity to express my views, if the defeat of a government bill or resolution was regarded by the administration as a vote of want of confidence. If the government cannot carry its legislation through, if the majority of the members of the House are opposed to a government bill or resolution, then that is a matter of want of confidence; that has been the practice in every country where British parliamentary usages have prevailed.

So that I claim that in spite of the present condition of things, in spite of the different groups in this country, it behooves us to consider well before we alter anything which is in accord with British parliamentary institutions. I do not believe it is in the best interests of this country for my hon. friends opposite to get up and move all sorts of academic resolutions, or to have them try and defeat government measures without taking the necessary consequences.. If the right hon. gentleman who leads the government cannot command a majority of the members of the House, then I think that in accordance with British parliamentary institutions and British practice it is his duty to resign and go to the country and let the people decide. We are sick and tired of hearing academic questions discussed. We want realities, and my hon. friend and his friends opposite would be well advised to advocate something that is in accord with British parliamentary institutions and with parliamentary practice in this country, instead of constantly bringing up precedents which exist only as a figment of their own imagination.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I am opposed, Mr. Speaker, to the resolution of the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine). At the same time I really do not apprehend that if the resolution were to pass we would immediately be precipitated into a condition of chaos, or anything resembling the unfortunate plight of Russia to-day. I am disposed to think the resolution might pass without anything more disastrous happening than the declaration of a mistaken principle, a principle that the experience of years has shown not to be to the advantage of democracy. I do not think Canada is liable to be plunged into chaos because of such an assertion as this obtaining the approval of parliament. Indeed, even had one of the amendments to the Address or both been passed, and the government consequently suffered defeat, I was really inclined to doubt—and as the nights and days have passed since that time, my doubts have been intensified—whether this Dominion would as a consequence be smouldering in the fires of revolution or even of despair, such as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) threatened us with the other night. My reasons for opposing the resolution are by no means of so startling or determined a character as that. The resolution in its words says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a defeat of a government measure should not be considered as a sufficient reason for the resignation of the government unless followed by a vote of lack of confidence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, even should the resolution pass, I really do not think even any difference in the present practice would then obtain. The government is at liberty to resign any minute. The government is ultimately the sole judge of what shall be sufficient or insufficient cause for its continuance or discontinuance in office; nor does the hon. member for Calgary suggest that a government in this regard should be finally restrained at all. In answer to the very pertinent inquiry of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) the mover said: "No, I would not suggest the rights of a government to resign should be abbreviated. I am quite prepared that these rights shall remain just as ample as they are to-day." Even should the resolution, as it is understood by its sponsor, carry, a government could then take any vote of the House as a vote of want of confidence and retire. Its liberty of action in that regard would not be restrained in the least.

Then I am asked: What would be the consequence of the resolution carrying? Well, it would simply be a declaration by the House that the government would be wrong—even though it had quite a constitutional right—it would be wrong in exercising liberty of action, unless an adverse vote were followed by another vote declaring want of confidence. I am not prepared to subscribe to that declaration. I do not think such a declaration would have any appreciable effect on the action of a government at all, but I am not prepared to subscribe to an assertion that a government would be wrong in exercising its undoubted right of resignation and determining for itself when a vote in parliament was such that it made it in the public interest not wise for the government to continue. Why do I say so? Hon. members to my left argue that this suggestion is merely an expansion of democratic principles, merely an elaboration of democratic right, namely for parliament to declare when a government is morally right in exercising its liberty of resignation and when it is morally wrong. Is that really an expansion of democratic right? I am inclined to think the contrary.

In this regard, I come to the similar conclusion to that of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), though I must say that I did not understand the process by which he arrived at his conclusion. I come to my opinion, I think, by a much more direct method, not quite the same opinion either, because if the conclusion that a government's right of resignation should be ample, unrestrained by any declaration of parliament; if the conclusion is that a government should always exercise that right, and resign as stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), when it is defeated on its own measure in this House, if that is to be the invariable course, and if such a conclusion is Toryism, then really I must be allowed to subtract from the Toryism of the Prime Minister in expressing my own. I think this an extreme statement of the situation.

The history of the British parliament is illuminating. It has been well reviewed by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw); but I wondered, as he spoke, if he did not realize that the tendency of the last century and a quarter had been entirely away from the conclusion embodied in this resolution, rather than approximating to it. A century and a quarter ago, this theory much more resembled the practice of Parliament than it does to-day. Then, that is to say, in the latter half of the eighteenth century, it was considered quite the constitutional right of a government to continue in office year after year, although on vital measures it met repeatedly with an adverse vote of the people's representatives. But that was in days when the direct answerability of the House of Commons and of the government to the people of the country was in no way as well established, in no way as perfected as that answerability is to-day.

Such a course could never be tolerated in a British parliament at this time. I do not say that it would not be tolerated in a British parliament that a government may suffer defeat and still judge that that defeat is not of a character to warrant its resignation. Even yet that is possible; but the ambit of cases in which that is possible is far more restricted now than it was in the days of Pitt, Walpole, Grey or Peel. What was considered right for those statesmen would, in the days of Asquith, Lloyd George and Bonar Law, be considered a practical usurpation of power. The tendency all through the century and a quarter has been to restrict the privileges of government in this regard, to restrict its right to hold on to office after the general principles of its policy, after its legislative proposals in essence have met with an adverse vote of the House of Commons. To pass this resolution, however well intended it may be, would be not to advance the measure of democratic power and control, but very perceptibly to contract and diminish it.

I stated that there had survived even to the present time—and I think it will always survive—the doctrine that a government is not required, merely because of an adverse vote, under certain limited circumstances, to take that vote as a want of confidence and to retire. In the last thirty years, there have been in the British House of Commons four cases where an adverse vote has been taken on measures of more or less consequence, in one or two cases mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary West, of considerable consequence. But in three or four cases, the government saw fit not to retire; in the one case, it saw fit to retire. Nevertheless, in the three cases, there were circumstances present which were of an important character and which, undoubtedly, detracted from the obligation of the government to take the vote as a want of confidence.

Every case must be judged in the light of the circumstances that surround it, and I would mention some of the pertinent circumstances as these: First of all, the importance of the measure; that is to say: Does it form an integral part of public policy of the government, or does it not? If it is merely incidental, then that would be a factor to take into account and would tend to lead a government not to take an adverse vote as necessarily fatal to tenure of office. But that alone would not be the only factor. A government would also have to inquire how far that particular piece of legislation, or that adverse vote, perhaps, on a resolution from the other side, affected the commitment of the government to the people of the country, upon which commitment it was returned to office. That would be a fundamental factor as well.

Another factor would be this: How long has the government been in office? If a government is newly returned with a strong and popular majority, then it would not be affected by as light considerations as might be regarded of moment under other circumstances. Still, a fourth factor would be this: How far do indications within parliament and beyond parliament reveal the support of the government in the popular mind? If, by the evidence of by-elections, if by what other evidences might be prominent, a government felt that it was losing popular support, then it would not take so important an adverse vote in parliament to justify its accepting that vote as want of confidence and resigning. All these things must be taken into account; but the tendency of the years has been to restrict the right of government to hang on to office rather than to amplify that right in the presence and under the mandate of an adverse vote of parliament.

As the Prime Minister, however, was speaking, and as he pictured a rather chaotic and dismal future for us if this resolution should pass, I could not help but think how appropriate, perhaps how embarrassing to his followers, that speech would have been just a few months before when the Minister of Militia and Defence, (Mr. Graham) came before this House with his estimates for his department. When the Prime Minister was stating how carefully a government reviewed its proposals before they were submitted to the House of Commons, how thoroughly the needs of the country were canvassed, how deliberate were all those considerations and all that premeditation, how final was the conclusion when the government came before the House of Commons and presented its proposals there, and how those proposals had to be supported or the government was bound to retire or be guilty of autocracy, that awful crime, I wondered how that speech would have sounded last session, had it been made just following the submission of the Minister of Militia and Defence to the rebellious mandate of a few of his followers behind.

I remember how, last session, the government declared that it had considered its proposals with the utmost finality, how it had reviewed the condition of the country and had come to the conclusion that if those militia estimates were reduced at all, then they were below the margin of safety in Canada and the government could not take the responsibility. But within just a few short days the Minister of Militia came and he said: "I have decided to reduce these estimates; I have decided to drop about one million dollars from the margin of safety for Canada." How appropriate the speech of the Prime Minister to-night would have sounded had he risen to answer his Minister of Militia and Defence on that occasion. It would have been more appropriate and more to the point than it is in answer to the Address and the motion of the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine). There the government declared that was vital; there it declared it stood and had to stand for the safety of the Dominion. Could anything be more vital than that? But having stood there, it dropped away and did so in order to accommodate itself to the wishes of a mutinous section behind. There was a case where the government should have stood, if ever such a case existed in the parliament of Canada. There is a case where this government receded and surrendered.

I do not subscribe to the viewpoint, I might say to the general theory or principle that seems to animate certain hon. gentlemen in this House. I do not for a moment challenge the sincerity of their attitude; in fact I know that their viewpoint is the viewpoint of the majority, at least it was, of those they represent, for this very principle has been under consideration at popular assemblies of their followers through this country many a time, and I think it has usually received approval. I do not subscribe to the viewpoint that the government of Canada is in the nature of a hired servant whose only duty is to obey the directions, the orders, the mandates of the representatives in parliament who support it, of parliament as a whole, and of the populace of the country. I do not subscribe to the theory that the government is in the relation of a hired man to this House. I do not believe in the hired man theory at all; I did not believe it when I was in office and I do not change my belief when in opposition. Such a theory is entirely at variance with the whole idea of constitutional government. The government is in no sense the hired man of the House of Commons; it is not a committee of the House of Commons. We had that theory brought forward last session, and these words came from the mouth of the Prime Minister, although we did not hear much to that effect this afternoon. The fact is that the theory is wrong; it is not British at all. I repeat, a government is not a committee of the House of Commons: it is the responsible body of officers of the King in this country. The duty of the government is to lead public policy, domestic and foreign. The government must submit their proposals to the people's representatives and must abide by the verdict of those representatives, favourable or unfavourable, whatever it may be. And a country that is accursed with a government that has not within itself the power of leadership, of showing what the right road is in the light of information that only a government can have, is going to suffer in the race in this world. It is not going to enjoy what it ought to enjoy; it is not going to get the service it ought to get from the government that leads it. A government must submit legislative proposals and must take the leadership, because it is in a position to take leadership; and those who hold the theory that leadership can be taken by the rank and file are opposed to a principle which it seems to me has been vindicated by the march of centuries, of ages. Those in authority must lead. The British constitutional practice has led to this result. While they lead, they may be checked, they may be directed, they may be hurled from power as the penalty of failure. But failure to lead is just as great a failure as any other. The government is answerable for its legislative proposals to this House in just precisely the same way as it is answerable for its administrative acts; it is responsible for the one as it is responsible for the other. It is charged with the responsibility of initiating both, and the government that fails in either respect does not do its duty by the people of the country which it is supposed to lead.

Now, I do not deny for a moment that some of the difficulties which hon. gentlemen to my left have expatiated upon to-day do arise as a consequence of that practice. I do not deny at all that times arise when members of this House have to decide between the support of a measure, on which perhaps the balance of influence, in their own minds, say, would be favourable, and voting against it, when they know that a vote against that measure is a vote of want of confidence in the administration. I know that the consequence is that the question of confidence comes into the question of the merits of the specific proposal or the specific legislation. If that is confusion, then to that degree there is confusion. But that we must abide by. There is no way by which that can be surmounted, except at a cost that would be far greater than any possible results of confusion which hon. gentlemen may have in mind. If a government could come into the House and, either through one of its own members or through a private member, propose a course of fundamental public policy going to the very root of the prosperity of the country, going perhaps to the very root of our national destiny, and then, having been defeated upon that and having found that it does not meet with the favour of the House, say, "Very well, we will wait a few weeks and come back again with another proposal and see whether it will not meet with approval at the hands of parliament; after we have tested the situation we will come again,"—if that could be done, I say, then the moral authority of government would be gone. If that could be done no government could command any respect. There are times, on matters of minor consequence, where perhaps it is justifiable for an administration to leave to the general vote of parliament, without the lead of government, the direction of its course. But necessarily that must be in regard to a matter of minor consequence; and necessarily, also, it must be rare. For if even that were to occur frequently—and I am making no reference to the present administration, because so far they have not done it frequently—if the government were to come frequently to parliament and say, "Upon this subject we cannot unite, upon this subject we have no opinion, we will leave it to you and will act merely as your messengers and carry out whatever you say, because we have no opinion to offer ourselves," then, I repeat, the moral authority of government throughout the country would be impaired day by day. And no government could long last in this Dominion or in any other British country that frequently submitted itself to the exigencies of situations such as that. Occasionally, I say, it is possible.

Let us for a moment just review the ocasion last session when it did occur. The government had no united view on the question of the admission of oleomargarine into this country. Consequently, they said to parliament, "We cannot unite; we have no opinion as a government. You discuss it now and decide what you want and we will carry out your wishes, whatever they may be." Parliament discussed the matter and decided on the permanent admission of oleomargarine into the country. The government found that they could not accept that decision. A division in the government made it impossible to carry out the recommendation. What did they do? They came and said, "We promised to carry out your wishes but we cannot. However, if you will meet us half way we will meet you and admit oleomargarine for twelve months."

And we had the spectacle in the House of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) standing in his place, the sponsor of a measure which he described in his own classical language as a rotten old bill. Now, that was a consequence of one of the departures from the constitutional principle. Let these instances be rare; and especially, I suggest, let them be rare on the part of the present administration. For any moral authority which it may have enjoyed a year ago is very seriously reduced just now. Do not let that moral authority be prejudiced by failure to unite on important measures of any character. Let the government show to the country that it is united and that it can advance opinions that are government opinions and policies that are government policies. The more we follow that course the more we shall lead to the result where there shall be the most immediate answerability of government to parliament. And that, as I understand it, is the perfection of British institutions.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this debate, because I imagine that the arguments from this part of the House have been pretty well presented. But I almost felt compelled to express my appreciation of the very mild and generous criticism which we have had to-night from the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). I must compliment him upon his changed attitude; I hope he will continue as he is doing. If he does, I can assure him we will reciprocate. I am not at all afraid of the consequences that are likely to ensue if the proposal now submitted to the House is accepted. I was reading to-night an article in the Manitoba Free Press, when we offered that amendment to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) pointed out to us the dire consequences that would ensue should that amendment be carried. Nevertheless we persisted, and I find to-night when I take up the most influential paper in the three prairie provinces that it has nothing but praise for our action and declares that we have once again demonstrated to the country that there are only two parties in this House: the party that sits in this quarter of the chamber and the members of the other parties scattered on both sides of the house. Sometimes I have wondered, Mr. Speaker, if there is a reason for our existence, but as the days go by I feel pretty sure that we are exercising a good influence on the government of this country.

I do not know that I have felt exactly pleased with our position in many instances. Some people imagine that to hold the balance of power is a good position to occupy in this House. I am not one of those. I do not want to occupy a position where we must simply sit and wait and throw our influence on one side or on the other as it pleases us. I do not believe that that makes for the best system of government. I should like the privilege and opportunity of having at least some share in formulating the principles and ideas that shall come before this House, and I cannot but believe that the move we are now taking is in that direction.

The right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has said that you cannot prevent a government from resigning. I do not think any one has ever entertained an idea of that kind. We are perfectly aware of the fact that the government can resign any day they choose. But that is a different thing altogether to what is contemplated by this resolution. Very recently in this House we were called upon to decide between voting with the government or forcing an election upon an issue, not of national importance, but in some respects almost trivial.

Now, we are sometimes twitted with being afraid of precipitating an election. I want to put the House right upon that matter without further delay. I take up the newspapers now and then that are not very friendly towards members in this part of the House and I find they indulge in rather cheap talk about our being afraid to go back to our constituencies to fight an election, and consequently the government is quite sure of our support at all times. I want to tell hon. members that in no part of the House are the members so sure of their seats as those in this section. On the amendment to the Address—

Mr. STEVENS: You divided.

Mr. FORKE: I could go back to the constituency of Brandon, Mr. Speaker, and probably I would get an acclamation. So I hope our opponents will not waste any more time twitting us with being afraid of another election, because we are pretty nearly sure of the ground we are taking. The hon. gentleman to my right (Mr. Stevens) says we are divided. Well, he and his friends are never divided. That is one virtue they have, anyway, they are unanimous.

Now, as to parliamentary government. I listened with a good deal of admiration to the speech of the Prime Minister. He went back a long way into British parliamentary history, for of course the British constitution and parliamentary practice play a large part in all these discussions. The right hon. leader of the Opposition also went back into British parliamentary history. I quite agree with them to a great extent. I am a great admirer of British institutions. But at the same time we are moving forward day by day, and new conditions demand new methods. I took the following extract from Lowell's Government of England, to be found at page 80:

> No serious changes in the structure of the cabinet are probable so long as parliamentary government retains the present form; and it is too early to speculate on the changes that may occur if the parliamentary system itself becomes modified under the pressure of political parties acting in a democratic country.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that that time has arrived, that we are living under new conditions, and that we must carry on our parliamentary institutions under new conditions. The British parliamentary practice has been founded on the two-party system. In this House we now have three parties. I know there have been third and fourth parties in the British House of Commons, but they never exercised any large influence on the government, certainly nothing to the same degree that this party exercises upon the government in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FORKE: I am a very modest man. I repeat again, new conditions require new methods. Reference has been made to the British parliamentary system. I do not know but what that system has been breaking down for almost half a generation now, and we see at times an almost chaotic condition prevailing in the Mother of Parliaments. I believe that one of the tragedies of our modern system of government is the lessening of the people's faith in parliamentary institutions. Why has this occurred? Simply because cabinets, through custom, have become autocratic, forcing their policies through parliament with the help of an obedient majority, so that parliamentary government has largely become a farce. I believe that a great deal of credit is due to the Prime Minister for some of the methods he adopted last year, and it would not do any harm if he proceeded further along the same path this year. I for one would be quite ready to give assistance and advice in many cases—again I speak with all modesty, Sir,—before the government committed itself irretrievably to any measure upon which there may be a difference of opinion. That, I believe, would be true parliamentary government.

I have no fear if this resolution should be given effect to: on the contrary, I believe that government will move along a great deal more smoothly and in the better interests of the country. In conclusion, Sir, let me say that I do not want to hear any more of those taunts that we are afraid to vote against the government for fear there should be a dissolution of parliament.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter contained in the resolution is somewhat circumscribed, and there is very little new that one can say regarding it. However, the discussion has been quite interesting and should do considerable good. But that discussion having taken place, I venture to submit to the House that little benefit could come from forcing a vote upon the resolution.

The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr Shaw) I think stated the constitutional question very well this afternoon; but I do not think he spoke in support of the resolution. Every argument he adduced, every parliamentary precedent that he referred to, was evidently and obviously in support of the position taken by hon. gentlemen who oppose him. Some hon. members opposite have insinuated that to oppose this resolution is to be unprogressive and that such opposition would disclose an illiberal tendency. On the contrary, I assert that the adoption of this resolution would be unprogressive and reactionary in its effect.

The leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) has referred to the fact that parliamentary practice is always developing new phases. This is quite true. That being so, why attempt to circumscribe and make rigid parliamentary practice by the adoption of a set formula and expect it to be applicable to-day, to-morrow, and afterwards? That is not characteristic of parliamentary practice under British institutions, and I believe we will make sounder progress by following the old paths than by attempting to lay down procedure to guide future parliaments.

The actions of the legislatures of Alberta and Nova Scotia have been referred to. I deny the right of Alberta to establish parliamentary precedents which we must follow. I really do not know what action that legislature did take. My attention was called this afternoon by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), who sits beside me, to the fact that on the occasion of the first motion, similar to that which we are now considering, being made in the legislature of Alberta it was ruled out of order; possibly it was later adopted. I cannot recall the circumstances under which the Nova Scotia legislature adopted, as it is alleged, a similar resolution. Academic resolutions get us nowhere when we are discussing serious questions. The arguments advanced in these legislatures may have been weak or irrelevant, and it is hardly to the point to cite the action of these legislatures in support of arguments on behalf of the motion now before the House.

I quite agree with the position taken by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) regarding the argument advanced this afternoon that legislators are not in the position of hired servants; it is time we abandoned that theory. I think it is regrettable that hon. gentlemen opposite in the Progressive party, who, I admit, contribute a great deal to the public life of this country and to progressive legislation and progressive ideas, display a disposition to be guided too much by the dicta and the resolutions of commercial or occupational organizations in their several constituencies. It will be unfortunate for this country or for parliament if members of parliament feel that they are bound by the academic resolutions passed by bodies within their constituencies upon the various questions coming before us from time to time for consideration.

Reference has also been made to the two amendments which were moved upon the consideration of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I did not speak upon that occasion, but I do not hesitate now to say that the first amendment was clearly a vote of want of confidence in the government. I hardly know what to say about the sub-amendment of the member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw). I do not impute to him any improper motives; it was his absolute right to make the motion. But after all, it was no more than a pious wink, or a yawn, or a purposeless gesture. I do not see how he could have expected the House to support it. Still, in the abstract one would not have liked to condemn it; the hon. member was merely asserting something that everyone believed in. I think the point was taken that the Speech from the Throne did make reference to the question of economy in public expenditure.

Some hon. gentlemen this afternoon attempted to give expression to the view that because in this parliament we have several groups, parliamentary practice will have to be changed. If the group system persists, and if in any parliament the government party constituted a minority of the House, that is, were not equal in numbers to the opposing groups—and we were desirous of having settled, well-ordered, continuous government, some changes in our constitution might be necessary. I have often thought there is a good deal to be said in favour of a fixed period of parliament, such as obtains in the United States and in France. If the electors should in the future decide that the two historic parties have to be abandoned and that we are to have in parliament four or five or six groups, it is quite conceivable that the constitution would have to be amended in order to ensure some degree of permanence in the government charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of the country. However, I do not think it is necessary to consider that just at the present moment.

There is not much reason, Mr. Speaker, for a lengthy debate upon this resolution, still less for a vote upon it, because it is merely declaratory of that which is now parliamentary practice here and in Great Britain. I understood the right hon. leader of the Opposition to take that position, and I think he was right. If that is so, then a discussion of the issue is purposeless.

I have already stated that in my judgment it would be a mistake to attempt to lay down any rigid formula for the guidance of parliament so far as its practice is concerned. We would find that unsatisfactory. From day to day things would be occurring that could not be squared with this formula; so I think it is wiser to deal with questions of parliamentary practice in their concrete form as they arise. Now, the resolution says:

> That in the opinion of this House, a defeat of a government measure should not be considered as a sufficient reason for the resignation of the government.

Nobody can challenge that statement; the member for Calgary West cited ample authority this afternoon in support of it I have never heard anything to the contrary asserted in this parliament; it has always been the practice here. Perhaps in this country we have construed it a little too narrowly, and frequently governments have not extended to their supporters quite the measure of freedom that they might well have done. I think that in England they are a little broader in their interpretation of this parliamentary practice. However, the portion of the resolution that I have read is now the accepted parliamentary practice in this country, and there is nothing to be gained by reasserting or implementing it or supporting it further by a vote of parliament. If the government were defeated to-night, it would not necessarily follow that they would resign. Parliament would hardly expect that to follow; the country would not expect it. The question of whether or not the government should resign would depend upon the importance of the resolution and a great many other considerations; it could be properly decided only upon a full consideration of all the attending facts.

The constitutional position, I think, was well put by the Hon. Mr. Balfour in the statement quoted by the hon. member for Calgary West, and I would like briefly to refer to it again. Mr. Balfour was Prime Minister of Great Britain at the time, with a parliamentary majority of seventy. His government was defeated on a vote which had some relation to Irish issues, and the opposition naturally called upon him to resign. He made a review of the constitutional history of the question, and after referring to the precedents he concluded as follows:

> Now I think it is evident from this brief, and perhaps too rapid, survey of recent constitutional history that the only divisions which, taken by themselves, and in isolation from the general circumstances of the time, from the feeling of the Parties in the House, from the question of union in the cabinet—the only parliamentary issues which, taken in isolation from thse attendant circumstancs, have always been regarded as conclusive are those in which there has been a trial of strength between the parties with all the circumstances of notice and other attendant incidents required to make it clear that the issue to be decided is one of "confidence" or "no confidence". A case which I have just alluded to in another connection shows how rigidly this rule has been drawn; because, while it is the ordinary view—and I think, broadly speaking, the sound view—that a hostile vote on the Address is regarded as a vote of censure and is supposed to be fatal to the government, I have just reminded the House that such a hostile vote was actually given in 1904 on the Address, and all that the then leader of the House and the then Prime Minister did was to reintroduce the Address in a somewhat abbreviated form.

The substance of the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Balfour which I have just quoted to the House means that only under exceptional circumstances, where the issue has been clear-cut between the parties, is the resignation of a government contemplated under obtaining British parliamentary practice, and that is what this resolution in its former part asserts, namely:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a defeat of a government measure should not be considered as a sufficient reason for the resignation of the government.

All the authority which my hon. friend from Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) quoted this afternoon was in support of that position, which I say is the prevailing parliamentary practice.

The resolution, however, goes on to say, "unless followed by a vote of lack of confidence." Clearly that is the parliamentary practice to-day. It could not be otherwise. If a government is defeated upon a measure and declines to resign, there is only one method by which its opponents can force the issue, and that is by immediately moving a vote of want of confidence. That is what happened in the case which Mr. Balfour was discussing in 1905. Some hon. gentleman put on the order paper a notice of motion of want of confidence in the government, after its defeat. Mr. Balfour, however, anticipated that by moving the adjournment of the debate after he had made the statement from which I have just quoted; it was the same thing, of course. I again say that when a government meets with an adverse vote in parliament, if it does not of its own volition resign, if it does not itself regard the circumstances as of sufficient importance to justify its immediate resignation, and if the contrary view obtains among its opponents, it is the duty of those opposing the government immediately to move a vote of want of confidence. So, therefore, I say that this resolution is merely declaratory of what is the present sound parliamentary practice in this country and Great Britain. I further say that it would be a great mistake on our part to attempt to make an inflexible rule regarding such matters. Parliamentary practice, as every hon. gentleman knows, is a growth, a development, and I think we shall best meet the needs of our time and of the future by allowing the practice of our parliament to grow and develop in the future as it has in the past.

I agree with the hon. gentlemen who have enunciated the proposition that after all it is the government, the executive of this country that is best able to judge how it should interpret an adverse vote in parliament. But this resolution, in effect, says that if a government after an adverse vote secures a vote of confidence, it should not resign. That is not sound parliamentary practice. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman in that same debate took the position that because a government happens to have a parliamentary majority, it does not follow that it should retain office. It is quite obvious that selfish interests, personal interests, might induce members of parliament to disregard what was obviously a public opinion adverse to the government in office. But if this were the rigid and inflexible rule it would be very difficult to say whether an administration was acting improperly if, after having secured a vote of confidence from parliament, it should still retain office. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman replied to Mr. Balfour in the debate from which I have quoted, and discussing the precedents referred to by him, he said in part:

Some of them are of an important character, and some are of no importance at all; and they depend, as he himself had to admit, upon the circumstances in which they occurred as well as upon the merits. I will say at once that this was no ordinary occasion of the defeat of a government. The right hon. gentleman has endeavoured to make light of the indication of the feeling of the country afforded by the by-elections. He has done so on many occasions before; and the attitude he has taken is this—that as long as he was not deprived of the support of his friends in the House, he considered that he was entitled to retain office, notwithstanding any amount of by-elections or other indications of a change of popular feeling. In that he takes up what I believe to be an entirely unconstitutional position. It is common for us to say, and it is true constitutionally, that the Minister of the Crown in this country is selected and appointed because he is the man who commands a majority in the House of Commons. But what does that mean? It means that the command of the majority of the House represents the feeling of the country. The moment the House of Commons get out of touch and harmony with the country then that plea for retaining office dissolves; and the right hon. Gentleman has no right to entrench himself behind the confidence and support of his friends here after it is known to all mankind and to himself, as well as to any of them, that he has lost the confidence of the country.

I think that is a sound position. It does not follow, it should not follow, that because a government is able to secure the 9 p.m. passage of a vote of confidence in parliament, it should therefore retain office.

In conclusion, I wish to say that there is nothing particularly new in this resolution. It merely asserts what is the parliamentary practice at the moment; but apparently it seeks to make rigid this practice, and to establish it as a permanent and fixed parliamentary rule, instead of practice. I think it would be a great misfortune for parliament to adopt this resolution.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have but a few words to add to the present debate. This resolution is of the utmost importance. Its aim, indeed, is to amend a parliamentary practice by introducing means of lessening or removing altogether the responsibility of the government. I am entirely opposed to this resolution. I do not need, Sir, to invoke principles which are well known to the members of this House. The government must have the confidence of parliament and especially of the House of Commons. The government cannot conduct the public affairs of the country the moment confidence is withdrawn from it. The means which are at the disposal of the House to signify to the government that it no more enjoys that confidence, are as follows: First, a motion of non-confidence; secondly, the rejection of legistion brought down by the government and on which the government insists, and, lastly the adoption by this House of legislation, against the will and consent of the government. These are the recognized principles of parliamentary practice and procedure. What does this resolution contain? We are told that the rejection of a government motion should not be considered sufficient to bring about the resignation of the Cabinet, unless it is followed by a vote of non-confidence. It is therefore evident that, if this resolution was adopted, we should be departing from principles established for ever so long in our parliamentary practice and by which it is recognized that, if a government bill is thrown out by the House, the government must retire. Therefore, I contend that this resolution should certainly not be adopted.

Some members who spoke on this resolution have stated that times have changed, that we should adopt new methods to meet the present needs, and they alluded to the existence of three parties in this House: the Government, the Opposition and the third party, the Progressives. They contend that owing to this third party our parliamentary procedure should be modified and that a new constitution should be given us. I answer: No.

It is not only in this country that different parties exist in parliament. The British House, for ever so long, has been divided into many parties. Yet, did they think it proper to amend parliamentary practice and procedure? No more in England than here was it thought proper to change the existing state of things to suit more than two parties, and following in the footsteps of England, Canada will not undertake this innovation and destroy those ancient customs that we have cherished for centuries and that we must preciously maintain in our country.

Moreover, it was argued that if we introduced in our parliamentary practice the change proposed in this resolution, it would help the members to initiate resolutions and give, so to speak, new life to the administration of this country. Are the members, Sir, of the opposition—in fact of any opposition whatever—deprived of the opportunity of discussing and opposing the measures brought down in this House? I contend that they have that privilege much more so than the partisans of the government, for it is much easier to criticize than to praise a sound measure. Those who form part of the opposition can certainly not contend that they are deprived of the right to consider and discuss any proposed legislation. Under the present parliamentary practice, the opposition has not only the privilege of debating the proposed government measures, but also has the right to propose amendments which under certain conditions may be accepted by the government. I have here Mignault's hand-book on Parliamentary Procedure, and I find the following quotation at page 147:—

> Up to a certain stage the government may accept certain amendments that the House has approved, even contrary to its wishes, but you cannot force it to sanction motions which would change the nature of an important measure; under such circumstances its duty would be to beg leave to withdraw the measure or resign.

That is evident and it has been in almost continuous practice ever since the existence of our parliament, that the opposition, criticizing a government measure, may force the latter to include amendments which are in the interest of sound legislation; however, these amendments must not go to the extent of changing the nature of the proposed legislation, because if so, the amendments proposed by the opposition would evidently amount to a vote of lack of confidence.

The present debate on the important question of government responsibility recalls to my mind another period of our history. I think we should watch with a jealous eye over the prerogatives which were then obtained by our forefathers. If I glance over the past, during the first days of Union government, when parliament met at Kingston, in 1841, I come across parliamentarians—and they were of our race—like the Vigers and the Morins, who joined the reformists of Ontario to demand from the Draper government, an acknowledgement of the principle of government responsibility.

It is due to their untiring efforts and just claims, that the Draper government found itself forced to resign and to make way for these illustrious men, Baldwin and Lafontaine, who secured for us responsible government.

Some of the reasons brought forth by these statesmen are as follows:

> The immediate advisers of the representative of the Crown must enjoy at all times the confidence of the representatives of the people, so as to maintain between the different branches of the legislature the harmony so necessary to peace and the security of the public, whose well understood wishes and interests must be the rule of the government of this province.

Such were the contentions put forward in 1841, during the first period of Union government, and these contentions were in favour of responsible government.

Monuments to Baldwin and Lafontaine have been erected close to here and the visitor has but to walk around this building to admire those who obtained for us responsible government. This resolution stands in the way of this responsibility and I am therefore opposed to it.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of National Defence): I think that probably I cannot add anything to the debate which has taken place, but one or two things have struck me. It makes a difference whether you are in the government or out of it, which way you look at these things. A man that is a sworn adviser of His Majesty, with all the responsibility he has to carry as to what that advice shall be, cannot lightly pass that responsibility on to another. On the other hand, the man that is not in the government has in his sphere, a full responsibility just as far-reaching as that of a member of the government and—I say this in all kindness—he ought to be prepared, no matter what the consequences may be, to accept that full measure of responsibility in every vote that he gives. If the result be the defeat of a government, then let the government be defeated. But it rests with the member himself to take that responsibility and, if this resolution passes, I submit that any member who desired to make himself popular in his constituency, could do so and escape the responsibility that ought to be his if the consequences of that vote meant the defeat of the government.

I agree with the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that a government itself must largely decide whether a vote is of sufficient magnitude or importance to justify that government in resigning; but if a majority of the members of parliament vote against the government that indicates that it has not the confidence of parliament, no matter what may be said by the member who moves the resolution or members who vote in favour of it. To declare to the House that a motion is not a want of confidence motion does not make it so. The government, in a large measure, must decide that for itself.

Another point that has struck me is this. On this continent there are two distinct forms of government which we can contrast. In the United States, the members of the cabinet do not sit in either the Senate or the House of Representatives. Their cabinet is a distinct and separate body, whose members do not appear in congress to propose or to defend their measures. We have, we think, the advantage in that respect, in that the members of a government in Canada must have a place in one House or the other to explain the legislation or to defend the measures of the government. If we are going to depart from that, then we must accept the other form of government. To my mind, there is no happy medium such as is proposed by hon. gentlemen in this resolution. We have always prided ourselves in this country on the fact that our people could have their views put into force more quickly than could be done in the United States. If the sentiment of the country changes one year after an election, the members of parliament can vote out the government, and the people can at once elect a parliament from which will be selected a government, the views of which will be in harmony with the views of the people.

There is, in the world, no system by which the views of the people can so quickly be put into action in a parliamentary sense as the old British system. I agree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that if we are going to depart from that system, the only other practical alternative is to have a fixed parliamentary term. Then, no matter whether government measures are defeated or not, that government stays in power until its term expires. I am not in favour of that; I believe in the old British system under which nobody has suffered, but under which as the years go by, improvements have constantly been taking place which have proved beneficial to the people. You ask me: How are the people of Canada under our system of government enabled to get their views represented so quickly in a parliamentary election? Only in one way, and that is when parliament ceases to believe in the government in power and its policy, and by a majority vote puts that government out. We cannot well say that it is practical for a government to maintain the respect even of parliament, much less of the country, if every three or four days, government policies should be voted down in the House. It would be government in name but not government at all in reality. It would be merely a combination of men, acting within their rights, getting together each day, or on stated occasions, or whenever they felt like it, springing some motion to which everybody in the world might agree on some other occasion, and placing the government in a minority. I appeal to hon. gentlemen who are in favour of this motion —if they were in the government, would they like to attempt to carry on government under such circumstances? Members of the government would be advisers of His Majesty, the King, but they would have to wait until somebody advised them what to say. I see no real, practical value in this resolution, although, of course, every member has a right to move any resolution he likes. I do not think I am a Tory.

Mr. FORKE: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not like to be one; I would not like to be considered one; but what has been good enough for the Mother of Parliaments is good enough for the Dominion of Canada, and unless we propose to adhere to what is obviously sane and sound parliamentary practice that when a government loses the confidence of parliament, it should resign, then we must go to the other form of government and accept that form which prevails in the United States, and by which a government does not have to resign, but has a fixed term.

Does this give parliament greater freedom? Does it follow the line of Tennyson which was quoted, I think, by two or three members about "broadening down from precedent to precedent?" I think this restricts parliament, restricts the government in a wrong sense, adversely, in this way. You place a government, that wants to be in such a position and that is not overly sensitive to its self-respect, in a position where it could hang on day after day, week after week, where it could say: "That is not a vote of want of confidence; we do not intend to resign until you absolutely kick us out." Under present circumstances, when parliament gives a majority on any serious question against the government, the government, no matter how we may argue, is expected to do something—either to ask for a dissolution of parliament or to resign. If you give a government the right to hang on day after day, week after week, and month after month, as this resolution would do, until some person gets up and says: "Well now, this is our resolution, and if we carry this, you are to go out"—I think that would be a most humiliating spectacle. There is nothing progressive in this resolution; what is new in it is of a rather retrograde character.

I want to make it clear again that I believe in the old British parliamentary system. The practice of the Mother of Parliaments upon which our constitution is based is good enough for us. We followed it for some years, and while I believe in things new I do not believe in adopting them merely because they are new, unless they are an improvement on the old. I stand for the old principle, and I believe there is only one alternative. If we abandon that principle let us adopt the term system, so that a government may not be defeated except at such time as is indicated in the act.

Hon. C. A. STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I had hoped that some other members on the opposition side would have spoken to the motion. It is not a new one to me. It is one that we had under consideration in the legislature of Alberta some years ago, although in a form somewhat modified as compared to the resolution presented here to-day. The motion considered in the Alberta legislature provided that on all matters except those pertaining to finance the government were not to consider themselves defeated unless on a vote of want of confidence. On that occasion the motion was defeated. Subsequently it came up in the House under a new government, and the motion was carried, the premier, the attorney general and the minister of agriculture refusing to vote. That in itself is an innovation. Formerly it was the duty of every member in the legislature to record his vote. That is not now compulsory if the member does not feel it incumbent upon him to vote. That, however, is not what I particularly wish to speak of to-night. What I want to point out especially is that if we are to have constitutional government in Canada —and I think we are all agreed that we want constitutional government in this country, and that we want to preserve that government in its entirety—we should be taking a rather grave step if we supported a resolution of this character.

It is not, nor would the government so look upon it, a serious thing to have hon. gentlement opposite vote against a policy or a principle introduced by the administration. That would not be considered a serious matter at all. But the resolution clearly points to another aspect of the question, namely, the affording of full freedom—because, after all, that is what is behind the resolution—for the supporters of the government to vote against a government policy. And in no other way could the government be defeated. Now, a great deal has been said by my Progressive friends with respect to caucus and the evils of caucus. But under responsible government we shall always have to have a caucus; and, indeed, my hon. friends themselves resort to the caucus for the purpose of discussing matters of importance to them as a party in this House. And they will always have to do that. Any party that wishes to present a united front upon matters that are of importance to the House and to the country will of necessity have to get together and discuss them. Therefore hon. members of the Progressive party pursue, as the old parties have pursued throughout the years, the system of calling their members together in caucus. After all the government of the day are the responsible source from which must emanate the agenda that is to be submitted to parliament for consideration; and no one will go the length of saying that in caucus all members of the party agree with the agenda submitted by the government to them. I think my hon. friends of both parties opposite will concede that matters submitted by their leaders are not always acceptable to all the members of the party to which they owe allegiance. But what is agreed to by the majority—and usually the great majority—of the members of the party in caucus is ultimately, so far as the government is concerned, the legislation submitted to the House for discussion. All I have to say, after some twelve or fourteen years of experience in public life, is that unless we are to have a somewhat chaotic condition, we must have unity of parties. Not always can we have our own way about different matters, but acting in unison we shall make the greatest progress with legislation and in the interests of the general welfare of the people. The resolution, as I see it, would to a large extent undermine the stability of government.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is inevitable. It is an utter impossibility for anything else to ensue from such a resolution. But suppose a government measure were defeated. The resolution distinctly declares that this must not be regarded of necessity as a defeat of the administration. Why, it puts the government at the mercy, perhaps, of a very few of its own members. This government has a majority of only two or three, and such a resolution might place it in such a position where it would find itself in the hands of two or three of its following upon any occasion. Now, that does not tend to stability. My hon. friends make the statement that we have a new order of things; that we have in this House three parties who have a right to be heard.

Mr. IRVINE: Four.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, it does not matter whether three or six. There is no difficulty about any party being heard. If a government is to be allowed to continue in office after having lost the confidence of the members of the House of Commons, who are the people's representatives, besides having lost the confidence of the men who are elected to support it, then in my opinion it is in a very unattainable position; and I have simply to say, what I have said on former occasions, that any government that finds itself in that position is in duty bound to go to the Governor General and tender its resignation and appeal to the people who, after all, are the final arbiters in matters of this kind. There can be no question about that. In my opinion, far from having a democratic intent, the resolution tends in exactly the opposite direction. It seeks to allow the government to stay in office after it has lost the confidence of its own supporters—

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): —until a vote of want of confidence is proposed. I cannot interpret the resolution in any other way, and so far as I am concerned I should not want to remain in office one moment after having lost the confidence of the supporters of the government or of the House itself upon any important government measure.

Something has been said this evening in regard to the government's obligation to assume full responsibility. Well, it should take responsibility. But that does not necessarily mean that the eighteen or twenty members who constitute the government of the day should take upon themselves, in an autocratic spirit, to dominate the policy of 234 odd members in the House. That, I take it, is not the spirit of responsible government. But it undoubtedly means that after consultation with their followers they have decided upon a policy, but they have not sufficient strength to carry it in the House of Commons, and they are defeated. Then they have lost the confidence of the people's representatives and they ought to resign.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, I certainly make no pretence at being a student of constitutional government, but I think I can pass a fair judgment upon the opinions of other students of the subject, and therefore I would say that if the present government never gets nearer to unanimity of opinion upon a government measure than its ministers and supporters have reached upon what they consider to be the constitutional form of government, it would be better if they entrusted matters of policy entirely to this House.

The Prime Minister tells us that this is a Bolsheviki, Sovietical proposition; the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) tells us that this is nothing more nor less than a mild declaration of a policy that has been recognized in all British history by the constitution, and therefore it is useless to vote on it because it has always been in vogue. Then another hon. member tells us that this is making straight for the United States system of government; and still another tells us that it is something else. I am beginning to wonder what this thing is anyhow. I am referring, of course, to the British constitution—that admirable thing which does not exist.

The hon. member for Halifax reminded me of that ancient school of Greek philosophers who undertook to eliminate space and motion by metaphysics. They argued thus: space looks like nothing; nothing does not exist; therefore space does not exist. Motion must have space in which to move, but if space does not exist, then motion has no place in which to move; therefore motion does not exist; and therefore neither space nor motion exists. He begins by a metaphysical process to eliminate any meaning from the resolution whatsoever, and then he concludes that it is a statement of the British constitution, and he finishes up by telling us that it is not entirely like the British constitution, because if it were the government would be bound to resign after receiving an adverse vote, which point he spent considerable time in rebutting. So I do not know if I should take his argument seriously. Obviously either the resolution or the British constitution is not understood by the hon. gentlemen who have undertaken to criticise this motion.

The hon. Prime Minister surprised and rather disappointed me with the nature and spirit of his argument. This is no time or place for change. That is the argument of the Prime Minister of a Liberal government. We are to be cautious of all innovation, because the world is filled with unrest; and we are to be careful lest a Soviet system might be born here, as we understand that one has been born somewhere else. These are unworthy arguments in connection with a matter of this kind, as the right hon. leader of the Opposition so ably pointed out.

I do not think to-day that anyone regards seriously an argument which tries to put a tag of some kind or another upon any proposition that may be put forward. There is manifestly nothing of the Soviet character about this resolution, although I am not so absolutely sure whether the Prime Minister meant that as a compliment or as a reproach. It would be perhaps calamitous for some public men if it should transpire after a few decades that the Soviet system of government is a very good system. For the present, however, I neither advocate nor defend it. This is a proposal which I understand is in keeping with the spirit of the British constitution, and I submit that no argument has been adduced to-day to disprove it. Neither is there anything Bolsheviki about this resolution. The reason why we have so much unrest to-day to which the Prime Minister referred is because we have parliaments that are afraid to take up so-called innovations; that is the chief difficulty.

The Prime Minister centered his argument chiefly upon his defence of what he calls "responsible government." That was well characterized by one of the Progressives as a "slippery" phrase. It is an extremely slippery phrase, and it slips away from us sometimes before we can get our eyes on it to know just exactly what it looks like. But at any rate the Prime Minister would have it that we are trying to take responsibility away from parliament; whereas the meaning of the resolution is to place responsibility upon parliament. We are opposing the present system which gives all the power to the Cabinet and places responsibility rather with the Cabinet than with parliament, where it belongs. We are asking that parliament have the right to take that responsibility, which again we understand to be the practice and privilege of the British constitutional form of government.

Both the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Vanvouver South (Mr. Ladner) either misunderstood the import of the resolution in this regard, or else they both fear granting to parliament that power in reality which they both so eloquently pictured we have in theory. The Prime Minister seemed to be afraid that governments would not resign at all if we had such legislation as this. As a parliament I think we would be quite prepared to see that governments did resign if we found there was anything weak about them. But we are differentiating between a legislator and an administrator. The Prime Minister could not understand how a good administration might pass bad legislation. But a good administrator might be a very, very poor legislator, a man might be able to discharge the duties of an executive office with marked ability, yet notwithstanding this parliament might not be prepared to accept his recommendation on all matters of policy. I think we have to distinguish between these two functions, that of legislation and that of administration, whether we will or not.

The hon. member for Halifax also assured us that we of Labour and the Progressives were paying too much attention to what people are telling us through their organizations. Then he proceeded to show that all the precedents quoted by the hon. member for Calgary West prove that the kind of government this resolution proposes has always been and always will be according to the British constitution, and is in effect a declaration of our acceptance of the policy and spirit of that constitution. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, I should expect the hon. member for Halifax to vote for this resolution; otherwise he will be voting against what he terms is a statement of the British constitution. I wonder whether he recognizes that that is the position in which he placed himself when he made that declaration.

Then, the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Graham) thought the suggested method would be like the United States system of government; that there was no possibility of striking a happy medium between what they have and what the British constitution contemplates. He believes, he says, in the old British parliamentary system, and he goes on to say that there will be no more freedom for the individual member, no more freedom for parliament, if this resolution is adopted than is accorded under present practice. Then the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) comes and tells us that the adoption of this resolution would give so much freedom to parliament that the government would be entirely robbed of the authority which they must have under the British constitution. Now, I have no doubt that the hon. Minister of the Interior made that argument when this matter came before the Alberta legislature, he being Premier of the province at the time. But legislation asserting this principle is now on the statute books of that province, and the government has not suggested that it has lost any of its power to do efficient work of administration, nor that there has been any great upheaval as a result; on the contrary, everything seems to be moving along reasonably and satisfactorily.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) accepted the resolution as at least having some sense in it. He said there were certain practices that he deplored in connection with the present system, but suggested that by introducing such a practice as is proposed by this resolution we should be likely to bring upon ourselves more difficulties than we could get rid of. He went on to say that he opposed the motion chiefly because the principle it involved was a false or a mistaken one. But you will all notice that the right hon. leader of the Opposition came to his great faith in the present system by a contemplation of its march through the centuries. Well, he cannot speak with such confidence until at least some other proposal has had a trial—a beginning. If it takes a march through the centuries to prove that the present system involves difficulties and mistakes, one should not speak so positively about something that has not yet been tried; because if this proposed system were to march through a couple of centuries, patterning itself in its working out, it might prove to be a very good system indeed. I am not sure, therefore, that that argument is conclusive. In fact, had that argument been applied to the British constitution we should never have had one—if, indeed, we have one now. That is, we would not have had it in practice, if those who originated our boasted constitution had required such assurance as that seemingly looked for by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I say, that if we are going to allow this thing to march through a couple of centuries, it is well nigh time we began.

Both the right hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Halifax agree on this: that the government is not in the position of a hired man; there is no hired manism about it. No; if there is going to be anything like the hired man about it, some of them are going to have nothing to do with government. Now, I am not so sure that that is a strong position. I think you will agree that he who is the servant of all is the greatest of all, and it is surely not too much to say that the people who pay the expenses of government, the people whose business is being managed in this parliament, should have something to do about it. I think the highest position of the government, whether it wants to recognize it or not, is analogous to that of a hired man. And if the hired man is not distinguished enough for the comparison, I would substitute the architect, and say that the government is, in relation to the people or to parliament, what an architect is to a job.

Mr. McMASTER: But the architect tries to boss the job.

Mr. IRVINE: When the architect tries to boss the job; when he tries to make the cost more than the man who is building can pay, or to put in more rooms than the builder wants, then the architect will be fired. He is hired as an architect. It is true that the man who hires him will not presume to deal at all with the technique of architecture.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): He gets his commission on the additional rooms.

Mr. IRVINE: But the architect will not be allowed to do what he pleases. If I hire an architect to prepare plans of a dwelling house for me and he draws plans of a parliament building, am I going to pay him, or am I going to make the expenditure necessary to build a parliament building, simply because my architect was fool enough to draw the plans for it? Would any member of the government pay an architect under circumstances of that kind? Would any government hire him to do their work? I do not think so. That should be the relation of government to parliament. I readily agree that as practice goes, governments are not hired men. They are not architects, neither are they a committee of parliament. But we contend that they should be as hired men, that they should be as architects, that they should be a committee of parliament. If that is not British constitution, we can make it British constitution, because we have the same powers here to make British constitution as they have had over there. We can move from precedent to precedent with the same alacrity and with the same vision that they moved in days of old. So I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if the proposal embodied in this resolution is not part of the British constitution, there is no reason why it should not be made so by practice. If the British constitution is anything at all, it is practice; it is what has worked, and if this works it can become part of the constitution.

Now, I do not wish further to prolong the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friends opposite say, "hear, hear"—and for obvious reasons. If I prolonged this debate for another half hour, as I could very easily do, I should have to review some more of the statements that my hon. friends have made, and if I did so I am not sure that it would be a great addition to the discussions of British constitutional practice.

I submit that the reasons that we have put forward on behalf of the resolution have not been successfully refuted by any hon. member who has spoken on the question. Neither the right hon. leader of the Opposition nor the right hon. Prime Minister has given us sufficient reason—nor has anybody else—for relieving parliament of part of that responsibility which rightly belongs to it. Parliament should take all the responsibility; the executive council should become the hired servant of this parliament as representatives of the people. That, I believe, is the soul and spirit of this resolution.

Mr. PUTNAM: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. IRVINE: Two, sir.

Mr. PUTNAM: This resolution contemplates that vote number two would declare that vote number one, which would ordinarily constitute a defeat of the government, was really a defeat of the government. Is there a limit in his mind to the time when or the stage at which vote number two could be invoked?

Mr. IRVINE: I am not sure that I have caught that question. I am afraid I shall have to ask my hon. friend to repeat it.

Mr. PUTNAM: I am asking the hon. member, purely for my own satisfaction, this question: We will suppose that vote number one has taken place, wherein the government is outvoted. Under the proposal contained in my hon. friend's resolution, he has the right to follow that with vote number two, in which parliament would say categorically that vote number one was a defeat of the government —that is, a want of confidence vote. In other words, is there any limit to the time in which vote number two can be invoked against the government?

Mr. IRVINE: Do I understand the hon. member to ask whether my resolution fixes the precise number of days during which the government shall hold office in the event of its being voted out by an adverse vote?

Mr. PUTNAM: I certainly did not suggest any such foolish thing. I asked if there was any limit to the time or stage in our proceedings when parliament could say to the government: Though you were outvoted some time ago and have gone on doing business in good faith since, we are now going to say that that vote taken a week or ten days ago was a vote of want of confidence.

Mr. IRVINE: There is no necessity for any such thing. In fact, it would be foolish to have any stated time so far as the vote of no confidence is concerned. That could be moved at any time, even when there was not an issue under consideration. We might discover, for instance, that the government had run off with a hundred million dollars. In that case we would immediately vote that the government resign. That is all it means. The no-confidence vote need not necessarily have any connection with the other vote at all. A government might be defeated on a measure, but we would pay no attention to that. The government would carry on, and might be defeated on some other measure, but so long as parliament felt that they were carrying on the country's business fairly efficiently, they would go on.

Mr. PUTNAM: The resolution does not contemplate a specific vote declaring that the former vote showed a want of confidence in the government?

Mr. IRVINE: Not necessarily.

Mr. BUREAU: Then why the word "followed"?

Mr. PUTNAM: Does the hon. gentleman mean that a specific vote defeating the government is per se a want of confidence vote?

Mr. IRVINE: Does the hon. member mean under the present practice or under my resolution?

Mr. PUTNAM: Under the resolution.

Mr. IRVINE: This resolution simply says that the government shall continue to do the business of this country until parliament tells it not to. The defeat of a measure brought in by the government would have nothing to do with the administrative efficiency of the government, and the existence of the government would therefore be disassociated from the fate of the measure. But if the government showed inefficiency or dishonesty, or any other characteristic that did not meet with the approval of parliament, it could be voted out of power at any time, just as it could be under the present practice. There is nothing complicated about that. It is not nearly as complicated as the British North America Act giving us our constitution.

Mr. PUTNAM: I do not want to take up the hon. member's time captiously, but I want to understand his purpose clearly. Am I to understand that if this resolution is put into effect in the most drastic way we can imagine, there will be no specific vote declaring that a former vote was a vote of want of confidence?

Mr. IRVINE: Why should you want that providing this resolution should be adopted as the practice of this parliament? The resolution plainly says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a defeat of a government measure should not be considered as a sufficient reason for the resignation of the government.

That is all there is to that part. The other part of the resolution means that the government may be voted out of office by parliament at any time.

Mr. EULER: That is not necessary. It is taken for granted.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Putnam) understand the resolution now? Nobody who has spoken on this resolution has proved that parliament is now free, that the individual member of parliament is free to vote on issues as his conscience, or his constituents, dictate. I made the charge in my opening remarks on this resolution that the present practice, by confusing the life of the administration with the issue under consideration, left a member where he did not know exactly what to do. Two principles confronted him, and sometimes he was forced to vote against a principle in which he believed to save the government to which he had given his allegiance. But if we did away with that practice so that the government would not have to resign even if it had not had a majority on a certain measure, then that member would be free, and I have a suspicion that that is the chief reason why there is so much objection to this resolution. I can understand that such a power would not readily be given up by any government, or by those who aspire to government. It might be very handy at times. I can also conceive possibilities arising when it might be very dangerous for any cabinet to have such power.

No one has refuted my argument that bad legislation, owing to this confusion of issues, might be passed in order to save a government, nor has any one tried to refute my argument that good legislation might be defeated in order to save a government. The Prime Minister speaking with regard to the incident which I quoted from the adminstration of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, tried to say that because a resolution was brought in afterwards by that government, that nullified my argument. On the contrary, it proved to the hilt that men sometimes vote against their beliefs. Let me reply to the Prime Minister in this way: All governments do not do as the government of Sir Robert Borden did, neither when a vote has been taken which has been considered a vote of no confidence, nor at other times. Here is the point to be remembered: whether the government resigns or not, it always holds over the heads of its members the threat that a general election might not be very far off, and a general election is not something that any of us is anxiously looking forward to now or at any other time, and the people generally do not want it until the expiration of the term of office. The members do not want to be defeated, and there you have the real whip that governs party majorities in standing behind government legislation.

In conclusion, I object to any government having the right to decide to go to the people just when it wants, whether it has been defeated by a vote in the House or not. That practice places in the hands of the government a great political weapon, which it does not hesitate to use. This present government might decide to go to the people to-morrow, and no one could gainsay it; but it will very likely decide to go to the people when it thinks it has a political advantage, and it will not consult with the leader of the Opposition as to the proper time, nor with the leader of the Progressives, nor with the leader of the Labour party. Only the Cabinet will be consulted, and when they think the chances are good, they will declare for a general election. That is another thing that would be wiped out by this resolution. So I urge hon. members in the interests of the glorious British constitution to vote for this resolution and free themselves from the difficulties I have outlined.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Irvine) which was negatived on the following division:—

GREAT LAKES DISARMAMENT

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

For a copy of all papers, letters, writings, correspondence, documents, etc., of any kind, passing between the government of Canada and the government of the United States relative to the Great Lakes Disarmament question.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government would have no possible objection whatever to bringing down the papers asked for were the negotiations completed. But I think my right hon. friend will hardly press for the papers when I tell him that some of the matters contained in them are at present being considered by the United States authorities and that it would not be in the public interest to have them laid on the Table at present.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I gathered from a statement, apparently given to the press on the 30th December, that famous anniversary paean of praise, that the treaty was already negotiated. If the statement given the press was wrong, or if the Canadian Press got it wrong from the government, I am ready of course to accept my right hon. friend's statement. Certainly, I do not think the papers should be brought down in the course of the negotiations.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to hear my right hon. friend use the word "apparently". There was no such statement given to the press.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is somewhat late to have the press corrected, but better late than never.

CORRESPONDENCE REGARDING CANADIAN RAILWAYS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York) moved:

1. For a copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, documents, or other writings of any kind since December 31st, 1921, passing between (a) members of the government or officials of the departments of the government and the Canadian National Railway Company or Canadian Northern Railway Company or any other railway company owned by Canada or any of their officials; (b) members of parliament and the Canadian National Railway Company or Canadian Northern Railway Company or any other railway owned by Canada or any of their officials.

2. A copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, documents, or writings of any kind between members of the government or officials of the government and the late directors of the Canadian National Railway Company relative to the resignation of such directors.

3. A copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, documents, or writings of any kind between members of the government or officials of the government and the late directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company relative to the resignation of such directors.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways): It would take considerable time to get the returns asked for, the details of which, perhaps, my hon. friend has not fully considered. With regard to paragraphs 2 and 3 there would be no objection, but to get the information asked for in sub-section "b" of paragraph 1 would mean going into the files from every road master up to the highest official. It would take a good many weeks to do this and would cost a good deal of money. My hon. friend might confine his question to something more definite.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We certainly do not want the government to go to road-masters or do anything of that kind. From our experience the return would not be very long.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot agree with that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So far as I know, there was very little correspondence before the date referred to. It is only for the year. I do not want my friend, of course, to refer to the section men and similar grades; his officers are quite sufficient.

Mr. GRAHAM: I understand my hon. friend will allow the use of the word "officers" instead of officials. I understand from his explanation that he does not mean to go down the line.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be covered by using the words, "officers and directors," Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The motion will be amended by using the words "officers and directors" instead of the word 'officials."

Motion as amended agreed to.

SHIPPING AND RAILWAY STRIKES 1922

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, documents, and other writings relating to the strikes of workers in shipping, railway and other crafts in 1922 and also for copy of the opinion of the Department of Justice given in relation to the conduct of either employers or employees affected by such strikes.

He said: Before this motion is put, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) draws my attention to the fact that the words "and other crafts," will make a great deal of work in connection with this order. I have no objection to the return being limited to strikes in shipping and railway crafts, striking out the words "and other." I understand that that meets the objections he raises.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in that case I would call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that although there were strikes in other crafts there were not any in the shipping or railway crafts that I recall at the moment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then we will let the motion stand. Perhaps we can arrange as to the papers required.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Motion stands.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT 1915

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a select committee of this House be appointed with instructions to conduct an enquiry into the operation of the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, having particular reference to the sales tax and its difficulties of administration and collection and alleged inequities, with power to summon witnesses, to call for documents and information from government departments and to report its findings or recommendations, from time to time, to the House.

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Minister of Customs): May I ask my hon. friend to let that motion stand. It covers the operation of the special War Revenue Act since 1915. We might get together and try to limit its rather large scope.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite willing to let it stand for the time being.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Motion stands.

TREATY WITH AUSTRALIA

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN moved:

For a copy of the treaty referred to by the Prime Minister in his statement to the press of December 29th last as having been concluded between the government of Canada and the government of Australia.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sure I do not know what my right hon. friend refers to when he speaks of a statement having been given by me to the press. Any statements to the press I have usually given in writing in a form in which they could be quoted. I have not gone to the trouble which my right hon. friend has apparently gone to of searching all the newspaper files to see what they contain. I must confess he seems driven to a far point when he is obliged to look for a flaw in the government from what may appear in some press report. I have, however, looked up the Ottawa papers, and I find that the Citizen and the Journal each have articles somewhat similar, and yet so dissimilar as to make it perfectly apparent that whoever wrote the two articles used what they thought appropriate and proper to put into them. Certainly they contain nothing to indicate any statement made by the government.

I mention this because my right hon. friend has one motion referring to Australia, another to Belgium, another to Great Lakes Disarmament, and another to the Lake of the Woods levels. He makes mention in one motion of treaties having been concluded. I find the report in the Ottawa Citizen is in this form:

Reviewing the work of the government during the past year, treaties have been concluded with France, Italy, Belgium and Australia, and negotiations are now proceeding with Spain.

Possibly that is the statement my right hon. friend has in mind. On the other hand, the Ottawa Journal mentions that:

Treaties have been arranged—not concluded.

—with France and Australia for the betterment of trade conditions between the Dominion and those countries, and other treaties seeking the widening of markets in other directions are in course of negotiation.

I have no doubt at all that if my right hon. friend wishes to search through the press to find some little comment that he can bring to bear upon the work of the administration, he will find plenty to serve his purpose, but I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is somewhat beneath the dignity of the leader of a great political party to come to this House and ask for a return in virtue of a general statement which bears no evidence of having been issued in any official way by the administration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I will not debate with the Prime Minister on the subject of dignity. It is one on which he talks much. I will allow my own record to stand in that regard. The statement appeared not only in the Ottawa newspapers, but in almost all the Canadian papers. While it is not exactly the same in all, it is very similar in each and bears every evidence of having been given verbatim or of having been inspired by the Prime Minister. It was an attempt on the 30th of December—on the 29th, appearing in the issue of the 30th—to catalogue the various achievements of the government for the purpose of impressing the country with its activity on behalf of the nation. That was the plain purpose of the article. No one could read it in the press without coming to the conclusion that it had received its inspiration, if not, indeed, it is ipsissima verba, from the government itself. There is a little difference between the wording taken down by one and that taken down by the other; that is to say, there is a little left out of one that is in the other, but in all the statement appears that a treaty has been arranged with Australia. I do not know myself the difference between arranging a treaty and concluding a treaty. If a treaty has been arranged with Australia, this House ought to know what the arrangement is; that is all I am asking for. If no treaty has been arranged with Australia, the House should be told, and I do submit that no statement should be given to the press, whether a written statement or merely an inspired statement, leading the country to think that such a treaty has been arranged when no such treaty has been arranged.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In view of what I have just said, I must take exception to my right hon. friend's remark that no statement should be given to the press that a treaty has been arranged or concluded. I have told him that no such statement was given to the press.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said "inspired".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, if my right hon. friend is going to fall back on the use of such words as "inspired," I am quite prepared to leave the matter in the judgment of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not fall back on it; that is the word I used—either given or inspired. It is very hard indeed to think that this would appear in all the press of the country if there was no source whatever for the information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give my right hon. friend the source, I will tell him exactly what occurred. I was asked by representatives of the press what progress the government had made in the matter of negotiating trade treaties, and I stated that a treaty had been come to with France, that we were negotiating with Australia, that we were also endeavouring to negotiate with Belgium and Spain, that we were negotiating with Italy and hoped to be successful there. I mentioned four or five countries with which the government was negotiating, I did not say anything about finally concluding these treaties, or that they had been concluded. Day after day representatives of the press were asking me if the treaties had been concluded, and the reply I invariably gave to them—and I think every representative of the press concerned will bear me out—was that as soon as a treaty had been concluded announcement would be made to parliament and a statement given to the public. I never stated to the press at any time that any treaty had been concluded if the arrangements with respect to that treaty had not actually been brought to a conclusion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Apparently the press has universally got it wrong. I am ready to accept the Prime Minister's statement in that regard, adding only once more that as this statement was spread all over the Dominion, the public should have been set right at once. Nor have I catalogued here all that the statement refers to; there are other things referred to in it as accomplished which have not been accomplished either.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Motion dropped?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Motion dropped.

TREATY WITH BELGIUM

On the motion of Mr. MEIGHEN:

For a copy of the treaty referred to by the Prime Minister in his statement to the press of December 29th last as having been concluded between the government of Canada and the government of Belgium.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the same thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has been nothing negotiated there? If that is the case it will be dropped.

Motion dropped.

GREAT LAKES DISARMAMENT

Mr. MEIGHEN moved:

For a copy of the treaty referred to by the Prime Minister in his statement to the press of December 29th last as having been negotiated by his administration between the government of Canada and the governement of the United States looking to settlement of the Great Lakes disarmament question.

He said: Well, the Prime Minister stated that nothing had been negotiated there, but there has been no statement yet in regard to No. 36, with regard to control of waters in the Lake of the Woods area.

Motion dropped.

LAKE OF THE WOODS—CONTROL OF WATERS

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

For a copy of all papers, letters, writings, correspondence, documents of any kind passing between the government of Canada and the government of the United States relative to the control of the waters in the Lake of the Woods area.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There are some papers with respect to control of water in the Lake of the Woods area which there is no objection to bringing down. There are others, however, relating to the same subject which are matters at present under consideration as between the two governments and which it would be unwise to bring down. If my right hon. friend leaves the motion in the form in which it is drafted, to include all papers relative to the control of the waters in the Lake of the Woods area, I would feel it to be in the public interest that these papers should not be brought down until the transactions are finally consummated between the two governments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of course every motion that passes is subject to the reservation that any document that is confidential will not be included. But I really understood that negotiations in this regard had been concluded; in fact I think they were concluded before the late government left office. For myself I have never understood the delay in putting into treaty form the consensus adidem that had been arrived at between the two governments. However, if the motion passes I will not expect documents to be brought down that still constitute the subject of negotiation—if, unfortunately, negotiations are still pending; I thought they had been concluded.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let it stand.

Motion stands.

LAKE OF THE WOODS—NATIONAL LEVELS

On motion of Mr. Meighen:

For a copy of the treaty referred to by the Prime Minister in his statement to the press of December 29th last as having been negotiated by his administration between the government of Canada and the government of the United States looking to settlement of the Lake of the Woods National Levels.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Dropped.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the same words apply that apply to the others.

Motion dropped.

LAKE TRANSPORT CONDITIONS

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, writings, telegrams and other documents authorizing investigation into conditions or costs of Lake Transport by W. T. R. Preston, and for a copy of Mr. Preston's report.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend doubtless knows, the subject matter dealt with in this motion has been referred by the government to a royal commission for investigation. Before that commission had been appointed the government had a special inquiry made to ascertain whether the grounds for investigation by royal commission were as substantial as the government had been given reason to believe they were. Naturally, this preliminary investigation did not involve the hearing of sworn testimony, and I think it would be inadvisable to bring down the report prepared for the government as a guide to its determining whether or not a royal commission should be appointed—not, at least, until after the commission has had a chance of investigating the matters referred to in it. Mr. Preston is secretary of that royal commission. The information contained in his preliminary report will be placed at the disposal of the commission. I do not think it is in the interests of the public that its contents should be disclosed before there is opportunity of having the evidence which he submitted in that form taken under oath before the commission itself.

Mr. BAXTER: A short time ago the Prime Minister rather emphatically endorsed a certain constitutional principle. I think involved in that principle is the idea that the House is entitled to all possible information with regard to the way in which government is carried on, and I think this House is fairly entitled to know whether what Mr. Preston discovered justified the appointment of a royal commission. The commission itself will never discover that fact. It is quite impossible for members on this side of the House or for private members on that side of the House or for the public to pass any judgment upon the correctness of that act unless they have this material laid before them. I do not see that it will in any way prejudice any action the commission may take, and I would ask the Prime Minister if that report is to be a sealed book to this House and the public.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government will be only too glad to make public Mr. Preston's report at the right time, but I think my hon. friend, if he reflects for a moment, will agree with me that while there are charges in Mr. Preston's report made against certain companies which charges the government believed were substantial enough to warrant its appointing a royal commission, it would hardly be advisable that those charges should be published broadcast before there is an opportunity for the commission itself to investigate.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why should there be any charge levelled against any man until he has had an opportunity, with such protection as is afforded him by a court of law properly constituted, to defend himself against that charge?

Mr. ARTHURS: That is not the ordinary procedure.

Mr. BAXTER: You appoint a commission and their report is acted upon without any investigating commission making a preliminary inquiry. As far as making a charge against a man is concerned, many a man has to undergo a long period of examination before he can put in a defence. Sometimes a man's character seems to be irretrievably blackened before the public by the ordinary process of our courts, though he may be declared innocent eventually. It is something we have all to stand as citizens, because you cannot have everything take place at the same moment of time. What we ask now is not the investigation of some individual. We are not asking the condemnation of any individual, but we do want to know on what information, whether it is correct or not, the government proceeded in this matter. I would think we are entitled to it. I do not wish to put it in an offensive way, and I am trying not to look at it from a partisan standpoint, but I cannot see any difference in principle between this motion and a large number of returns that have been ordered by the House.

¶Mr. Baxter.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say to my hon. friend, the government will be pleased to give him the report which Mr. Preston has made at the right time. He will then be in a position to judge whether the government has acted wisely or not in having had a preliminary investigation made, and constituting a royal commission to investigate the matters brought to its attention.

I mentioned only one aspect in reply to my hon. friend at first. There is another aspect. From many sources an effort has been made to obtain this report from the government by some of the parties that are appearing before the commission. Now the government does not feel that the information which has been gathered, and which will be presented to the royal commission, should be given out at this particular time. The commission itself is the best judge in that regard.

Mr. STEVENS: Will this report by Mr. Preston to the government be submitted to the royal commission If so, and presuming it refers to certain companies and individuals, will such companies and individuals have full opportunity of knowing that the commission is in possession of a report of this kind and have an opportunity to reply to it? Thirdly, I would ask, if they do not have that full opportunity, would it not tend to prejudice the commission in arriving at its conclusion to be furnished with a report making certain statements which have never been replied to by the parties affected?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can reply to my hon. friend that I have not the slightest doubt at all that Mr. Preston's report will be submitted to the commission. Indeed, I think it already has been. I am sure the every representation which that report contains will be made public by the commission itself, and the parties affected by any of the representations will have every opportunity to make their reply and to bring out whatever evidence and make whatever statements they wish to make in regard to what is alleged in the report. But I think my hon. friend will agree that to give to the parties, in advance, information of this kind is only to enable them to take advantage of a situation which it is in the public interest they should not take advantage of.

Mr. BAXTER: Perhaps I do not understand my right hon. friend clearly. Was I correct in thinking that he said that the publication of the report now might be taken advantage of by what I might call the interests that are to be investigated? Is that the meaning?

Mr. BUREAU: If my right hon. friend will allow me, there is a rule of the House which provides that, when a minister of the Crown desires to lay on the Table a return which is not the subject of an order a motion for return may be opposed on the ground of public policy. Such, for instance, as that it is not in the public interest. The object of Mr. Preston's inquiry was to find out whether there was ground for an investigation by a commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was Mr. Preston appointed under the Inquiries Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He was appointed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to gather information with a view to ascertaining, in the first instance, whether the government would be justified in going the length of appointing a royal commission to make this inquiry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what statutory authority there could have been for his appointment as investigator, and the payment of salary, unless it was under the Inquiries Act.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not the question I am discussing now. The question is whether it is in the public interest to disclose the report made by Mr. Preston, and the ground taken by the government is this. We desired first to know whether there was ground for an investigation, as the result of complaints made by shippers that they were not being treated properly by carriers. We did not want to go to the expense of having a commission appointed to go fishing, as was so often the case in past years, and so Mr. Preston was appointed to make a preliminary report. We have this report, and we do not think it is in the public interest, and I think my hon. friend would agree with me, that the facts on which we decided that an investigation should be held should be given to the press at this time to inflame public opinion. Their publication would, of course, give rise to a general discussion by the public. If you are going to apprehend somebody, you do not advertise that fact. You do not tell a smuggler that you are going to the magistrate to get a warrant out. The Prime Minister has already stated that when the commission makes its report, the facts upon which we saw fit to have a commission appointed will be made public and if the facts given by Mr. Preston do not justify the appointment of a commission, then will be the time to criticise.

Mr. BAXTER: I do not want to appear in any false position with regard to this. I have asked for information that I think the House is entitled to. If the Prime Minister is putting it on the ground that it is against the public interest to make this disclosure, I can understand that. He and his government will take the responsibility and they will be perfectly correct in that course. But what I do not understand is why the first answer should have been that the publication of the report might injure the accused, and the second answer be that to bring down this report might help the accused to get some information.

Mr. GRAHAM: Both are possible.

Mr. BAXTER: My object, as one member of this parliament, was if there are combines or irregularities going on, to help bring the facts to the light, and I want to know what is being done towards that end. If it is not in the public interest that I should know at this time, I am content to let the motion drop.

Motion dropped.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NOVA SCOTIA—RULE OF ROAD

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, documents, and other writings relating to the disallowance of an act of the legislature of Nova Scotia changing the Rule of the Road, and for a copy of the opinion of the Department of Justice respecting the question of disallowing such legislation.

NOVA SCOTIA STATUTE

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, documents, and other writings relating to the disallowance of a statute of the legislature of Nova Scotia, being Chapter 177 of the statutes enacted in the year 1921, and entitled "An Act to Vest Certain Lands in Victoria County in Jane E. MacNeil."

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, writings, documents, etc., passing between the Minister of Labour and John L. Lewis since the taking of office by the present Minister of Labour.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To-morrow we will take up the resolutions appearing in the name of the hon. Minister of Finance under Government Notices of Motion, relating to trade treaties, and if we conclude with those motions, we will proceed with Government Orders taking up the bills that are in the name of the Minister of Agriculture, and the resolution appearing in the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Tuesday, February 13, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Report on the Agricultural Instruction Act, 1921-22.—Hon. Mr. Motherwell.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Explain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce a measure to effect a readjustment of the membership of the House of Commons. In doing so, I need not remind hon. members that the government is not exercising any discretionary right, but is rather performing a constitutional duty which is imposed upon it. Under our constitution, the redistribution of the membership of the House of Commons must be made after each decennial census. There have been, since confederation, several redistributions. The first was made in 1872, the next in 1882, the next in 1892, the next in 1903, and the last redistribution was made in 1914. There have been in the interval partial redistributions for the purpose of providing for representation of territory and provinces which were not in the Dominion when confederation was originally formed. There was a partial redistribution in 1871, to give Manitoba representation, and a partial redistribution in 1887, to provide for representation of the Northwest Territories. There was a partial redistribution in 1907 to provide for representation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, which were subsequently formed out of the Northwest Territories. In 1915, an amendment was passed to the British North America Act, relating more particularly to the province of Prince Edward Island. It was in the nature of a partial redistribution affecting that province, and added to the British North America Act as section 51a thereof the following provision:

Notwithstanding anything in this act, a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators representing such province.

By section 1, subsections (1) paragraph (ii) of the Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867, being 5-6 George V, Chapter 45, the representation of Prince Edward Island in the Senate was fixed at four members. The census prior to that partial redistribution would have affected the representation of Prince Edward Island to the extent of the loss of one member, but for this amendment to the act, which provided that no province shall have in the House a smaller representation than it has in the Senate.

Another partial redistribution was made to give the Yukon Territory representation in the House of Commons. The Yukon Territory obtained its right to representation under the act known as the Yukon Territory Representation Act, 1902, assented to on the 15th May of that year. The clause that relates to this matter reads:

The Yukon Territory, as that territory is defined and constituted by section 13 of, and the schedule to, chapter 41 of the statutes of 1901, shall be an electoral district and shall return one member to the House of Commons of Canada.

The Yukon Territory received its representation under the redistribution of 1903.

The time has now come when a general redistribution should be made under the last census. The sections of the British North America Act which have to do with numerical representation by provinces in the House of Commons, and which are pertinent to the present redistribution are as follows:

Section 37. The House of Commons shall, subject to the provisions of this act, consist of 181 members, of whom 82 shall be elected for Ontario, 65 for Quebec, 19 for Nova Scotia, and 15 for New Brunswick.

Section 51. On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules:

(1) Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members;

(2) There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained);

(3) In the computation of the number of members for a province a fractional part not exceeding one-half of the whole number requisite for entitling the province to a member shall be disregarded; but a fractional part exceeding one-half of that number shall be equivalent to the whole number;

(4) On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards;

(5) Such readjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing parliament.

Section 52. The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

I think it will be of interest to hon. members, in connection with the redistribution we are about to make, were I to incorporate in my remarks a statement showing the representation of the various provinces in this House of Commons after the several redistributions that have taken place:

Province	Census 1911 (Unit 30,819)			Census 1921 (Unit 36,283)
	Population	Quotient based on Unit	Actual Representation	Population	Quotient based on Unit	Actual Representation
Prince Edward Island	93,728	3·04	4	88,615	2·44	4
Nova Scotia	492,338	15·95	16	523,837	14·44	14
New Brunswick	351,889	11·40	11	387,876	10·69	11
Ontario	2,527,292	81·90	82	2,933,662	80·86	82
Manitoba	461,394	14·95	15	610,118	16·82	17
Saskatchewan	492,432	15·96	16	757,510	20·88	21
Alberta	374,295	12·13	12	588,454	16·22	16
British Columbia	392,480	12·72	13	524,582	14·46	14
Quebec	2,005,776	65·00	65	2,358,412	65·00	65
Yukon	8,512	.....	1	4,157	.....	1

The representation of Prince Edward Island was increased from three to four by partial redistribution in 1915 under the amendment to the British North America Act to which I have referred.

May I say a word now with respect to the application of the recent census to the redistribution about to be effected. First of all I would point out that the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act, which was passed in 1912 and which enlarged the boundaries of the province of Quebec, contained a provision under which the population of the additional territory brought into the province was not to be counted, for the purposes of redistribution, as part of the population of the province of Quebec in determining the unit of representation in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act on that point. The Quebec Boundaries Act contains the following section:

That the population of the territory hereby added to the province of Quebec shall be excluded in ascertaining the population of the said province for the purposes of any readjustment of representation of the other provinces consequent upon any census.

Account of this provision must necessarily be taken in determining the unit of representation according to the census. The population of the province of Quebec—exclusive of the area added by the Quebec Boundaries Act of 1912—enumerated in the sixth census, June 1, 1921, numbered 2,358,412, which, divided by 65, gives a unit of representation of 36,283;—the unit was 30,819 in 1911. The quotient obtained by dividing the population of each province, except Prince Edward Island, as shown at the date of the census, by the unit 36,283 indicates, except where section 51 subsection 4 of the British North America Act applies, the number of members to which each province is entitled. The result is as follows. I shall give for sake of comparison the figures of the redistribution effected after the census of 1911 as well as the figures of the 1911 census, and the figures of the redistribution to be effected under the last census that of 1921 and the census figures themselves. The House will kindly bear with me while I put these figures on record:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did not the Prime Minister make a mistake? Has not Ontario 81 members instead of 82?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is misinformed; I am quoting figures given by the Dominion Statistician.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My right hon. friend gave the unit as 80·86 and the actual representation as 82. Should it not be 81?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is forgetting the sections of the British North America Act which bear particularly on the proportion of reduction in population of each province relative to the total population of the Dominion as between the census figures of 1921 and 1911.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right. That is the 120th section.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I shall refer to it in a moment.

Now I come to the point to which my right hon. friend referred a moment ago. Before there can be any reduction in the representation of any province the provisions of section 51, subsection 4, of the British North America Act have to be considered. Let me repeat the subsection. It is somewhat involved, but I think its meaning perhaps will become clear if I afterwards express it in different words. This is the subsection:

> On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one twentieth part or upwards.

In other words, the proportion of the population of the province to the aggregate population of the Dominion must fall below one-twentieth less than the proportion of the population of the province to the aggregate population of the Dominion at the last preceding census before a reduction in the representation of that province can result.

The application of these provisions to Ontario and Nova Scotia is shown by the following table:

The proportion which the population of each province bears to the total population of Canada:

Ontario; According to the census of	1911	.35069
	1921	.33380
Nova Scotia: According to the census of	1911	.06831
	1921	.05960

That is a decrease in proportion from 1911 to 1921 in the case of Ontario of .01689; in the case of Nova Scotia of .00871.

The ratio of decrease in population from 1911 to 1921 in proportion to 1911 in the case of Ontario was .0481, which it will be observed is a little below the one-twentieth mark, .05. Nova Scotia is .1275, which unfortunately is just above the one-twentieth proportion. In the case of Ontario the proportion is less, in the case of Nova Scotia it is greater than the one-twentieth to which the Act refers.

These figures show that under the provisions of section 51, subsection 4 of the British North America Act, no reduction should take place in the representation of Ontario, because the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada, based on the census of 1911 is ascertained at the census of 1921 to be diminished by less than one-twentieth part. The proportion for Nova Scotia, having diminished by more than one-twentieth part, the provisions of subsection 4 of section 51 do not apply, and the representation of that province must therefore be reduced in accordance with the provisions of subsections 2 and 3 of section 51.

May I in brief form give to the House the net result of the effect of the census upon the redistribution as it will be under the legislation of this year as compared with the legislation of 1914. The unit of representation as I have already mentioned, this year is 36,283 as against 30,819 in 1914. The total membership of the House of Commons will hereafter during the next ten years be 245 as against 235 during the past ten years, or an increase, in all, of ten members.

In the case of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and the Yukon the representation will remain the same as it is at the present time, respectively 82, 65, 11, 4 and 1. In the case of British Columbia, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, the representation will be increased—in the case of British Columbia by 1, from 13 to 14; in the case of Manitoba by 2, from 15 to 17; in the case of Alberta by 4, from 12 to 16; in the case of Saskatchewan by 5, from 16 to 21. In the case of Nova Scotia, unfortunately there will under the provisions of the British North America Act be a reduction of two, from 16 to 14.

I need hardly say, particularly to our friends from Nova Scotia, that in this matter of redistribution the government is not, as I mentioned at the outset, exercising any discretionary right; nor, indeed, has it any discretionary powers. It is simply obliged to accept the law as it is and to apply its provisions as set out in the act. In the application of the law it is very largely a matter simply of mathematics.

That, I think, is all I need say with reference to the representation of the several provinces so far as its numerical aspect is concerned.

I come now to the method whereby the government proposes to effect the redistribution of the various constituencies or electoral districts under the measure which is being introduced. Prior to 1903 the government of the day in introducing a redistribution bill brought down a measure which it had previously prepared in a complete form. The measure outlined the electoral districts as the government of the day had prepared them in advance. The bill was submitted to the House in that form, and as all who are familiar with Canadian political history will recall, the redistributions effected in that manner gave rise to perhaps the bitterest controversies which have taken place in this Chamber and in our public life. Too often those redistributions suggested an element of unfairness, and endeavour on the part of the government of the day to profit at the expense of its political opponents in virtue of the power that it possessed.

In 1903, under the administration of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a new principle was adopted. Sir Wilfrid brought into the House, not a bill which contained the boundaries of all the constituencies as originally drafted by the government itself, but a bill which set forth the number of members to which each province under the redistribution was entitled, leaving blank for subsequent determination the delimitations or definitions of the several constituencies to be represented. Sir Wilfrid proposed when in power what he had suggested when in opposition. He maintained that in seeking to effect a redistribution, a larger measure of satisfaction in the House and greater confidence throughout the country would result if the government invited the opposition to join with it in a committee to work out the details of redistribution. The hope was expressed that the conferences in the committee room would be carried out in such a spirit of fair play and goodwill that the bill could be brought back to the House of Commons and passed without contention or dispute. The adoption of that principle by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1903 had beneficial results, so much so that when the government of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden had occasion in 1914 to introduce a redistribution measure, Sir Robert followed the principle that Sir Wilfrid had adopted and invited the opposition to name members on a committeee to join with the government members in determining the boundaries of the constituencies which were to be arranged under the redistribution. We propose to follow the example set by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and later followed by Sir Robert Borden, and I think in doing so we shall meet what my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), when speaking on the Address, said he hoped the government would do, namely, have the details of the redistribution measure worked out by a joint committee of hon. members of this House.

The bill which I am about to introduce sets forth the number of members to which each province is entitled under the redistribution and makes provision for the division of the province and the territory into electoral districts as provided in a schedule to the act. The schedule to the act, however, is being introduced, so far as this bill in its present form is concerned, in blank. It is the purpose of the government, if hon. gentlemen opposite will meet us in the same spirit in which we approach the matter, to refer this bill after the second reading to a committee on which there will be representatives of the three parties at present comprising this House, the committee to have power to work out the details of the redistribution. Except for the changes in wording and figures which are necessary as a consequence of the census, the bill that I am about to present is to all intents and purposes the same in form and wording as the bill which was introduced in 1914, which in itself was a copy of the bill introduced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1903. Its provisions are not long, and as I have observed that on previous occasions the bill has been read in its entirety at the time of its introduction. I will venture to read its provisions. They are as follows:

An act to readjust the Representation in the House of Commons. Whereas the results of the census of 1921 necessitate a readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, and the other statutes in that behalf; Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. This act may be cited as The Representation Act, 1923.

2. The House of Commons shall consist of two hundred and forty-five members, of whom eighty-two shall be elected for the province of Ontario, sixty-five for the province of Quebec, fourteen for the province of Nova Scotia, eleven for the province of New Brunswick, seventeen for the province of Manitoba, fourteen for the province of British Columbia, four for the province of Prince Edward Island, twenty-one for the province of Saskatchewan, sixteen for the province of Alberta, and one for the Yukon Territory.

3. The said provinces and territory respectively shall, for the purposes of election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts, and be represented as provided in the schedule to this act.

4. Every city, town, village, township, parish or place, or part thereof, lying within the territorial limits of any electoral district, and not specifically included in any other electoral district by the said schedule, shall be and be taken to be part of the electoral district in which it is so locally situate.

5. Wherever in the said schedule any word or expression is used to denote the name of any territorial division, such word or expression shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be construed as indicating such territorial division as it exists and is bounded at the date of the passing of this act.

6. Wherever in the said schedule a municipality or place is wrongly referred to as a city, or a town, or a village, but there is within the territorial limits of the electoral district, in the description of which the reference occurs, a municipality or place of the same name which is a city, or a town, or a village, but is not of the class,—city, town or village, as the case may be,—specified in the schedule, the reference shall be taken to be that municipality or place.

7. This act shall take effect only upon the dissolution of the present Parliament.

I have nothing further to add, Mr. Speaker, except to emphasize what I have already said, that in adopting this method of working out the details of redistribution the government has in view but the one object of bringing about a measure of redistribution which will be regarded in this House and throughout the country as eminently fair and just. I believe that all parties, working together in a joint committee, having the common object of arriving at a fair and equitable basis of redistribution, should be able to send back to this House a bill which it will be possible for us to accept without controversy or discussion; a bill that will meet with the general approval of all hon. members, a bill that will help to inspire throughout the country a greater measure of confidence in our parliamentary institutions because of a realization of the accuracy and justice of the foundations on which they rest.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

ASH WEDNESDAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this House adjourns on Tuesday, the 13th of February instant, it stand adjourned until Thursday, the 15th instant.

Motion agreed to.

COMBINES AND THE COAL SITUATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, it was stated in the Speech from the Throne that a bill would be submitted to safeguard the interests of consumers and producers from undue enhancement of prices or unfair restriction of trade by combines, monopolies, trusts, or mergers. I have information from the city of Montreal that there is an extreme situation there at the present time with regard to coal. The coal situation is bad in all our cities, but the Montreal papers say that $25 per ton is being charged there for coal in small lots, and that one householder was unable to obtain coal though he had offered $35 per ton. The suffering among certain sections of the populace has been great. I should like to ask whether the measure that is being introduced will protect consumers during this present season, when protection is so much needed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): That will depend very largely upon the length of time that it takes to get the measure through the House. The government will endeavour to expedite it, and perhaps my hon. friend will help us.

THE BANK ACT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Some few months ago the Canadian Council of Agriculture, representing the farming interests of Canada, held a meeting and passed a resolution calling on the government to appoint a commission to inquire into banking matters in Canada, and particularly into the merits or demerits of the Commonwealth system of banking in Australia, and the Federal Reserve banking system in the United States, with a view to the possible embodiment of their good points in the Canadian banking system. I should like to know, in the first place, whether the government have received such a communication from the Canadian Council of Agriculture, and if so, what action has been taken, or what the attitude of the government is at the present time in connection with this matter.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I think the communication was received in due course from the Canadian Council of Agriculture. The view of the government is that the decennial revision of the Bank Act should be taken up, and at a very early date we hope to introduce a bill to revise the Bank Act. We shall then, with the consent of the House, ask that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce with a view to being fully investigated. That committee will then have the opportunity of receiving suggestions from any quarter bearing in any way upon the banking system of the country.

THE FINANCE ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Does the government purpose any legislation affecting the Finance Act?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I think at a later stage it will probably be necessary. The Finance Act is not necessarily associated with the Bank Act, but it has some relation to it. My impression is that it will be desirable to continue the Finance Act in whole or in part, but that is a matter which can arise a little later.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide,—

1. That the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay to the Corporation of the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners, hereinafter called "the Corporation," such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of five million dollars, as are required to enable the Corporation to carry on the construction of such terminal facilities as are necessary to properly equip the Port of Vancouver.

2. That during the period of construction of the terminal facilities mentioned in these Resolutions the interest payable on the debentures receivable by the Minister of Finance in exchange for such advances shall be deemed to be money required to construct and to be part of the cost of construction of the said terminal facilities, and such interest may by paid out of the said sum of five million dollars.

3. That the Corporation shall submit to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for approval, monthly applications for such advances, with statements showing total expenditure on different items in detail, and upon approval, authority for the payment of the amount applied for may be granted by the Governor in Council.

4. That the Corporation shall, upon any advances being made, deposit with the Minister of Finance debentures of the Corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-five years from the date of issue, and bearing interest payable half-yearly at the rate of five per centum per annum.

5. That the principal and interest of any sums advanced under any Act founded on these Resolutions shall be payable by the Corporation out of all its property, assets, tolls, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income whatsoever, and shall rank as a charge thereon and have precedence in regard to payment next after the payments provided for in Section 27 of Chapter 54 of the Statutes of 1913.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish at once to approve the minister's action and to congratulate him upon his sound business sense in continuing the harbour development work at the port at Vancouver. I think, however, the committee ought to be made aware of one or two matters in connection with this work in order to appreciate the wisdom of this move.

It will be remembered that a similar bill was passed about three or four years ago, and I think that the House will be interested to know that the Board of Harbour Commissioners for the port of Vancouver has provided for the interest on these bonds, and has provided also a sinking fund for their retirement at maturity. It might be interesting to know also that this sinking fund has been properly kept up, and that if the same policy that has been followed by the Vancouver Harbour Board up to this year is continued, the bonds will be met and retired.

This is a loan by the federal government to the harbour commissioners. It is not an item of public works. It does not come out of the general funds of the country to be spent in the usual way; but it is a loan properly provided for and secured, and it will be repaid.

I would ask the minister to be good enough to give to the committee a brief explanation as to how this money will be expended. If I remember correctly, the harbour board on the previous occasion submitted their plans and proposals to the government, and after they had been approved, the money was expended on a definite programme.

I also wish to make reference to a very important matter, one which I am sure will be of interest and which has already been referred to by a number of the hon. members from the western prairie provinces, and that is, the total inadequacy of the facilities at the port of Vancouver for handling grain from the prairie provinces. I think it was in the year 1913, or 1914, that an elevator was constructed. No grain moved that way for several years, and there was a question in the minds of some whether or not the previous government had acted wisely in constructing this elevator. But there was a definite reason why the elevator was not used, and I think it will be well to make a brief explanation on that point, and also to point out the requirements at the present time. The reason the elevator was not used to any great extent was simply this—that owing to the war there was no tonnage on the Pacific; practically all the tonnage, with very few exceptions, was taken over from the Pacific ocean to the Atlantic for war purposes, so that there were no shipping facilities. On the conclusion of war, however, and with the readjustment of tonnage after the war, grain commenced to go westward and in the last two years there has been an increasing flow of grain in that direction. Last year, owing to the congestion at the port of Vancouver, a permit or embargo system had to be inaugurated at Edmonton and Calgary. That is, cars were not allowed to go forward unless the elevator was clear, and there was opportunity to handle the cars and transfer their contents to the shipping. Now, this meant that there was difficulty in handling wheat by that route. There was another difficulty, and that was in handling damaged, smutty or tough wheat. There were no facilities at the coast at that time for cleaning, drying and treating damaged grain. Very often bins would be occupied with grain more or less damaged in one form or another, thus curtailing the capacity for storage. Provision has been made to remedy this by the installation of cleaning and drying plants in connection with the elevator. This year—and this is what I wish to point out particularly to the minister, and I know I am appealing to sympathetic ears—there was such a flow of wheat directed to the Pacific coast, arising from purely sound, economic reasons, that the congestion was not only marked but became quite startling, and again they had to inaugurate the embargo system and only ship grain that way by permit. Up to about a week ago nearly eleven million bushels of grain had been shipped by the Pacific route, and had there been storage capacity sufficient to handle what was offered there the amount would easily have been doubled. That route, as we know, is open the year round, and upon the closing of the eastern route there would be a continuously increasing amount flowing westward.

Another point I wish to make is this: Doubt has arisen in the past as to the wisdom of installing extended facilities there, and this question has presented itself—that the facilities would only be used during the closed season. I would draw the attention of the committee, and of the minister, to the fact that right from the opening of the grain season, that is, right from the commencement of threshing operations on the prairies, grain has flowed westward, thus fully demonstrating that the route had certain definite advantages to all the sections of the prairies lying westward of a line drawn approximately between Prince Albert and Regina. What I wish to call the attention of the minister to is this: At a very moderate cost the existing elevator could be increased in capacity by about two million bushels, the present capacity being 1,250,000 bushels. The working house, the conveyors, and the other paraphernalia necessary to handle grain effectively and rapidly are all there. By the increase of the storage capacity by, say, another two million bushels we could meet, in a slight degree at least, the congestion which occurred this year and last year. I do not know whether the minister contemplates to do that work out of this $5,000,000. I understand that the elevator which originally was built by the government, under the Grain Commission or Department of Trade and Commerce, has been turned over to the harbour board for operation, and, indeed, I believe, for ownership, by them. The harbour board, I understand, pay a certain sum into the exchequer for this transfer. If the minister would be good enough, when he is speaking, to explain the exact state of this elevator at the present time, and the intention in regard to the increasing of its capacity, we would appreciate that information.

Before I sit down I would further draw attention to this—that we are just about completing a large pier, one of the best on the continent, called, I think, the Ballantyne pier. That pier will be completed, I should judge, this season. Unfortunately there is no elevator provided for in connection with that pier. I am not offering my opinion in any arbitrary fashion, but after consulting with some of the best qualified advisers on the subject the suggestion is made that another elevator might be constructed, adjacent to this pier, which would add very much materially to the grain handling facilities without too much cost. That is to say, you have the pier and there will be at least four first-class deep-water berths, so that a very large portion of the cost has already been provided for, and all that would be necessary would be the construction of the elevator itself. If the government would construct another elevator equal in capacity to the enlarged existing elevator it would supply a very excellent facility, I think, for the handling of grain. That, of course, does not interfere with the establishment in that port of other elevators by private interests if they so desire. I believe that one or two private concerns are at present contemplating establishing elevators there, but the establishment of government elevators exercises a very wholesome influence on the grain handling business. A port perhaps wholly under the control of private grain handling concerns might give some cause for complaint by way of charges of monopoly, imaginary at least if not real, but with the existence of government elevators, such as I have mentioned, such complaints would be very largely obviated.

We have, of course another subject which will be discussed under another resolution and I do not wish to interject that matter here. That is, the question of the adverse freight rates. All I intend to say in that regard here is, that in spite of this adverse rate from the prairies to the coast of approximately seven cents a bushel we have been able to handle grain by that route, giving to the shipper an advantage over the eastern route, on some occasions, of as high as six and seven cents a bushel; that is, to those shippers from the western part of the prairie provinces. This is a distinct and real advantage to the producers of grain on the prairies. It is an advantage that they are entitled to, and I think this parliament is now ready to recognize that fact and is prepared to support the government in any reasonable effort to give that advantage to the producer on the prairies. As the discussion proceeds, other points may arise, but that is all I wish to say at this moment in connection with the resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad, indeed, that the resolution which I have the honour to introduce commends itself to the support of my hon. friend. As he said, prior to a very short time ago there was very little grain going through Vancouver,—prior to 1921, I do not think there was any. In 1921, a little over one million bushels was shipped via Vancouver, and in 1922, the quantity so shipped was 14,000,000 bushels. In the first days of January of this year, there were orders for upwards of 5,000,000 bushels of wheat to be shipped through Vancouver. It is in order to meet these requirements and to give better facilities and larger accommodation—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the hon. gentleman not wrong as to the year? I understand there was a substantial traffic in 1920.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My information is that it started in 1921.

Mr. CLARK: Can the minister state how many bushels altogether were shipped prior to the end of July, 1921?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot give those figures now, but I shall be pleased to give them to my hon. friend when the bill comes up for second reading.

Mr. MANION: How much of the 14,000,000 bushels went to the Orient and how much to Europe?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have not that information, either.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I could assist the minister for a moment. I am not sure of the exact figures, and in my figures I quote rather seasonal than calendar year shipments, to which latter the minister is now referring. Last shipping season, that is about a year ago, about one-half went to the Orient and about one-half to Europe, chiefly to the United Kingdom. This shipping season, say from September to January, less than one-half went to the Orient; but in the month of December, a large number of contracts were entered into for oriental shipment, and these, perhaps, would bring the ratio of later months up to approximately 50 per cent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: All this shows that from now on, increasing quantities of grain will find their way through Vancouver, and it is, therefore, necessary and important that more facilities should be provided there, especially in the way of further elevator accommodation.

The Vancouver Harbour Commission was organized in 1913. In 1919, this parliament authorized advances to be made to the commissioners to an amount of $5,000,000, and I think this country is entitled to know what has been done with that money. First, an amount of $300,000 was paid to redeem bonds which had been issued by the harbour commissioners. Then they acquired property for the site of the pier to which my hon. friend has referred, called the Ballantyne pier, for an amount of $672,900. Other expenditures included:

Repairing foundations and dredging, berthing and turning basin for the main pier	$ 512,095
Work to December 31, 1922, on construction of pier and sheds	2,814,871
Engineering and contingencies	121,583
Development of other harbour property and acquisition of plant and tools for harbour work	35,319
Interest during construction charged to capital account	68,032

This makes a total expenditure of $4,524,800. There remains a balance of $475,200 available for future expenditures from this loan of 1919. The Ballantyne pier is not altogether completed, and a further amount of $1,760,765 will be required to complete it—that is, in addition to the $475,200 which remains of the loan of $5,000,000. As to what will be done to increase elevator accommodation, the commissioners have engaged the services of an expert, Mr. Rolph, of the J. S. Metcalf Company, of Montreal, who is studying the question with them presently in order to take the best course, and especially the most speedy course, for the handling of grain,—if possible, the next crop. What is proposed now—but it is not definite—is that the present elevator, which has a capacity of 1,250,000 bushels, should be enlarged by an extension which would give a further capacity of 500,000 bushels, or a total capacity of 1,750,000 bushels. That would cost $400,000. Then, another elevator would be built at the place suggested by my hon. friend, on Ballantyne pier, this elevator to have a capacity of 2,000,000 bushels and to be built at a cost of $2,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Could the minister at this point say what the existing elevator cost?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Between $800,000 and $900,000. The other works which would be constructed with the money which would be advanced to the commissioners are as follows:

Log booming ground	$171,000
Marine ferry terminal	155,375
Ballantyne stage yards	76,000
Railway equipment	81,000
Strips of land adjacent present Government elevator	50,000
Lumber assembling wharf	190,000
Grenville Island Harbour	27,000
Overhead approach to Ballantyne pier	65,000
Contingencies	23,860

As to the financial condition of the harbour, I might say that it is excellent, indeed, and I have no doubt that within a very short time the Vancouver Harbour Board will be self-sustaining and that interest will be paid to the government on all the money which may be advanced to the commission.

Mr. LADNER: Is it not a fact that last year's operations disclosed a profit above operating expenses of some $38,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. The receipts last year amounted to $423,307.98 while the expenditures totalled $131,240.75. While there was an increase in the revenue of $82,370.10 over that of the previous year; the increase for the year of receipts over expenditures on revenue account amounts to $292,067.23. The expenditure on revenue account showed a decrease of $34,123.16. This is certainly creditable and shows that the traffic in the harbour, which I have no doubt will continue to increase, entitles the harbour commission of Vancouver to the help which this parliament and the government intend to give them.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Do I understand that there was a surplus of revenue over expenditure of some $290,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, last year.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): That being so, why should the interest be paid out of capital?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Under the law authorizing the loan of $5,000,000 the interest is considered a part of the loan.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But, if the surplus earnings were sufficient to pay the interest on the guaranteed advances, why were those earnings not applied to that purpose? It would not appear to be necessary to add interest account to capital expenditure.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The commission took advantage of the provision of the statute, that, during the period of construction of the works the interest payable on debentures in respect of such construction shall be deemed to be money required to enable the corporation to carry on that construction and pay for part of the construction thereof. It is therefore provided that the interest may be paid out of the $5,000,000.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I understand that there is authority for paying the interest during the period of construction. But where there was a surplus of earnings sufficient to pay the interest there would not appear to be any reason for paying that interest out of capital. The showing, I admit, is an exceedingly good one, and I merely wish to know why the interest should be paid out of capital under the circumstances.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it not the interest paid during construction, on the moneys invested in the harbour, that is charged to capital? That, of course, does not need to be taken into account in the annual returns. The interest after that is taken into account is paid and there is still a surplus for last year's operations.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is right. We are still in the period of construction.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): But the authority to pay interest out of capital during the period of construction does not necessarily require that it shall be charged to capital, if the public works in the meanwhile are earning interest, as apparently they were in this case.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will agree that in all works of this kind, during the period that the building or construction is under way, the interest is always added to the capital cost.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Usually.

Mr. STEVENS: In this case we are constructing a very large pier, which is not yet earning anything. It is not yet completed; it will probably be completed this coming year. During the period of construction, necessarily and in all fairness, the interest is added to the capital cost of construction. The moment that pier is completed and put into use and is producing revenue, then the interest will come out of the earnings of the port. I may add, to supplement what the minister has said, that the earnings of the port have been derived from tonnage dues and dues upon cargoes, as well as from charges for foreshore leases and other things of that nature. The object of the commission in the past has been to establish a strong financial position, which I think they have shown they have succeeded in doing. But it would be wholly unfair to ask them, before the completion of the pier, to pay the interest on its capital cost out of the revenue produced from other sources in the harbour.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): That, of course, offers some explanation. Does my hon. friend know whether a large proportion of the net earnings came from other sources?

Mr. STEVENS: All of it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): None from the pier under construction.

Mr. STEVENS: None from the pier at all.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): That makes a difference.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In the figures I gave I stated that the sum of $4,524,800 had been advanced to the commissioners out of the loan of $5,000,000. In that amount is included the sum of $68,032 for interest during construction charged to capital account. We are supposed to have given them back that amount for purposes of construction, and it is deducted from the $5,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The interest on the harbour proper—that is, on the constructed part —is not added to capital; it is paid out of earnings?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. Now, while I do not know that I have anything to add, I might say this much. I should be obliged to the members of the committee if they would try to expedite the passing of this legislation in order that the works may be undertaken as soon as possible, and that at least a part of the proposed added accommodation may be open for the traffic of the next season's crop.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I hope my questions will not leave the impression that I am opposed to the expenditure, although I do think that hereafter, when large expenditures are contemplated in public harbours, they should be very closely examined. I know from experience in my own province that local interests are very insistent in making very large and unwarranted capital expenditures in harbours, and in many cases they turn out entirely useless and unjustifiable. It is very gratifying indeed to learn that at the present moment the port corporation of Vancouver is in a flourishing condition financially; and it is equally gratifying to hear the minister give the committee the assurance that he anticipates that that port will be able to earn sufficient to pay the interest upon the advances which the government proposes to guarantee under the legislation contemplated. I think it would be well, however, for the minister to indicate to the committee what are the estimated earnings of the port after the projected expenditures are completed. Is it possible to make any estimate, or have the officers of the department made any? I suppose it is quite possible that the very things that have happened in the East can well happen on the Pacific coast. Persons resident in Vancouver may have a very vivid imagination of port developments that are not very likely to materialize in the early future, and I think the minister should be extremely careful, before authorizing these expenditures, to ascertain that there is a reasonable certainty of interest being earned upon the loan.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I do not find myself in opposition to this proposed loan, although I cannot say that I am heartily in sympathy with the method of raising the money. Possibly it is safe enough for the government to advance five million dollars to the Vancouver harbour commissioners, presuming that they are a responsible body and that the money will be repaid. But, in addition to what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has said, it seems to me that there needs to be a reorganization of the Vancouver harbour commissioners so that we may be reasonably sure of a continuous development of the harbour. I do not speak in this way with the idea of opposing the loan, because I happen to come from a section of the country that will benefit very materially from the development of the Vancouver route. I live in the centre prairie province, Saskatchewan, which is the greatest wheat producing province in the Dominion. In 1921 we produced over two hundred million bushels of wheat, and I am not sure but that our 1922 crop exceeded that figure. I live in Kindersley, about forty miles east of the eastern boundary of Alberta, and during the past year a great deal of grain grown in the vicinity has been shipped via Vancouver. We might wonder why that is the case. Our trouble on the prairies is, not that we cannot grow grain, not that the land is not good enough to grow grain, not that the people out there have not faith in their country; we have faith in our country, we know we can produce the grain, but what we are up against is inadequate transportation facilities—these are not as good as they should be. Heretofore the bulk of our grain has been going via Fort William and Montreal to the European market. That route is fairly well established, but it is only a summer route; at least in the winter time not a very large amount of our grain can be moved. And it cannot be moved very cheaply by that route. It so happens that from where I reside we can ship grain westward and save considerable money. From Kindersley to Vancouver the rate is 17 2-5 cents per bushel, from Vancouver to Liverpool 22 cents, making a total charge of 39 2-5 cents per bushel. Now take the rate the other way. From Kindersley to Fort William the rate is 15 3-5 cents per bushel, from Fort William to Montreal by water 20 cents, by rail 21 cents—we will take the cheaper rate—from Montreal to the European market 12 cents per bushel; making a total of 47 3-5 cents per bushel. The difference represents a saving of 8 1-5 cents for every bushel of grain shipped from Kindersley via Vancouver. Is it any wonder that the farmers of western Saskatchewan prefer to ship their grain via Vancouver? During the past season a great many cars were shipped from my home town and from towns immediately west.

I have no doubt as to the future of the Vancouver route, if the harbour commissioners there are as energetic as the harbour commissioners of Montreal, for instance. There is just a query in my mind—and possibly in the course of the debate it will be answered—as to why, seeing that the Panama canal was completed in 1915, it has taken seven years for the Vancouver people to have sufficient faith in their harbour to make agitation for its development. Possibly they are beginning to become progressive in their ideas. If such is the case, Mr. Chairman, within another seven years we may hope to see progressive representatives from Vancouver.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interrupt my hon. friend? The elevator to which I referred a few moments ago has been constructed and standing in Vancouver since 1914.

Mr. ROBB: Since 1916.

Mr. STEVENS: It was completed in 1916. I explained a few moments ago the reasons why grain did not move that way at an earlier date. First, there was no surety that the route would be a successful one; secondly, the Panama canal was blocked for a year and a half; thirdly, there was no tonnage available on the Pacific until about eighteen months after the conclusion of the war. My hon. friend will remember, if he reflects a moment, that for over a year after the war, until August 1920, tonnage was fully occupied on the short Atlantic route bringing troops back. In 1920 we started to ship wheat or grain through the Vancouver route. In 1921 more grain was flowing that way than we could handle because of the lack of facilities, the elevator being used to capacity. And the same condition obtained last year.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Thank you. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that our hopes for progressive representatives from Vancouver are not very good. Now, there is perhaps one other point that might be mentioned. While the application for this loan is made to the Dominion authority, and while I have every hope that it will go through, yet in my opinion it would be preferable if the citizens of Vancouver and British Columbia and the western half of the prairie provinces contributed the major portion of the money necessary to develop these harbour facilities. Possibly that course will be followed along with the present procedure.

One other point. This is the first application that has been made, I believe, for a development that is going to continue. Now, I wonder if this is only the first "bite" and if there are many more applications to follow. When the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) was eulogizing the beauties of northern British Columbia and pointing out the advantages of the fine harbour of Prince Rupert, he took occasion to remind us that the prospects of shipping grain from the prairie provinces were never better than by the port of Prince Rupert. Are we to expect that a board of harbour commissioners will be organized at Prince Rupert and an application made here for another five million dollars to develop that port?—and then possibly in the near future another loan of five million dollars asked for the further development of Vancouver harbour? Will the good work continue in this way? If such is the case, I for one would not be very strongly in favour of lavishly expending Dominion money or loaning it out with the likelihood of not getting it back in the near future. I would rather favour the citizens of the interested cities and provinces getting together and contributing the money—I am sure it would be forthcoming in that western country—and so developing the ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert and opening up for the prairie provinces further outlets for their grain.

Mr. MacLAREN: I take this opportunity of supporting the resolution, and I do so not because I am a western man, but because the result will be to encourage business through the port of Vancouver and to assist in bringing about the carrying on of Canadian business through Canadian ports. The adoption of this resolution will be a step in that direction; it will be evidence of an effort to do what means so much for the prosperity of our country, namely, to ensure the employment of our railroads and of our seaports.

It has been stated once or twice in this discussion that grain can be exported through Vancouver during the winter season and that navigation is during that period closed in the East. Now—I was going to say, unfortunately, but rather I should say, fortunately—that is not a correct statement of the facts. At the present time grain is exported from the city of St. John, where the elevator capacity is two million and a quarter bushels, a million more than the elevator capacity at Vancouver. However, the same difficulties exist at the port of St. John that are met at the port of Vancouver; that is, there is lack of accommodation and facilities. It is not a case of creating business. The business is there, but it is being refused; it is being lost on account of the lack of accommodation. That is one reason why I am in favour of the encouragement of all ports in this Dominion that are suited to the handling of the business which presents itself. A few days ago in the port of St. John there were six steamers lying in stream awaiting to be loaded; the business was there, but the accommodation was insufficient.

There is another thing that I wish to emphasize about this business in the East, and that is that it is not closed in winter. It is true that the St. Lawrence route is closed, but the port of St. John is always open. But there is another large port through which grain is sent in streams during the winter, and that is Portland. In other words, a foreign port is handling a great deal of our Canadian export trade. In view of the fact, therefore, that we should be doing this business through our own ports, I am glad to do what I can to support Vancouver or any other Canadian port with a view to our handling this export trade to the best advantage.

Mr. LADNER: The government is to be complimented in engaging upon this national undertaking, not only because of its benefit from the point of view of a market in the United Kingdom for our western grain, but also because of the developments which are now taking place in Japan and China so far as our grain trade is concerned. I happen to be in touch with interests in Vancouver which handle more of that oriental trade, perhaps, than any other concern, and I am informed that most of it must necessarily be handled through Vancouver. The larger Japanese and Chinese concerns dealing in grain have their head offices in Seattle, and we have now reached the point where there is keen competition between United States and Canadian dealers for the markets of the Orient. I say again that the government are to be commended for taking time by the forelock and establishing these elevator facilities in order that Canada may not be behind in the great development which is bound to come in the Orient, as she was behind when the development took place in Alaska. It is well known that on the coast at that time —and this particularly relates to Vancouver— the facilities were lacking for handling trade to the Yukon and Alaska, with the result that Seattle received a great impetus in her development. She had the facilities and was therefore able to take the trade when we had scarcely waked up to its advantages. Grain is to some extent replacing rice in the oriental diet, and as time goes on the trade and traffic in grain between Canada and Japan and China will grow more and more.

Reference has been made by one hon. member to contributions made by the people of the West for works of this kind. But I submit that this is a national undertaking, not merely an undertaking for Vancouver; the people of St. John and of Montreal are just as much interested in it as the people of Vancouver. Certain private enterprises are contemplating the construction of elevators there. As trustee of an estate I sold the first two water frontages for private elevators, and thus I have come in contact with actual dealers in grain, the men who are going to develop elevators there in order to carry on the grain business. I learned from them that it was essential that some large undertaking in the way of elevator accommodation such as is contemplated by this resolution should be carried out; that it would help private enterprise as no other method would. When grain men see the government interested in establishing a sound and permanent business in grain traffic, they themselves feel safe in going on with it. I was advised by one of these dealers that the presence of a large number of export grain dealers in the city would help not only the port itself, but also the producers of grain in the West. As the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has said, it is a fact that notwithstanding the discriminatory freight rates to which the people of British Columbia have been subjected, there is an advantage of nearly ten cents a bushel on grain going from Edmonton to Liverpool via Vancouver as compared with the rate on grain going from Edmonton to Liverpool via eastern ports. The Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) has stated that some 19,000,000 bushels of grain went through Vancouver last year. So, it is evident that with proper grain facilities there will be no blocking of the grain, and the farmer will be able to get a maximum of advantage. I am told that one of the reasons why the producers got nearly $2,000,000 less than they should have got was because of the conditions under which the grain dealers were able, by manipulating the cars and so on, to get this ten cents a bushel which really should go into the pockets of the farmers. One purpose this resolution will serve will be to eliminate those opportunities, and thereby directly contribute to the advantage of the farmer. If two hundred million bushels, which is only one-half of the grain crop of Canada, should go via Vancouver, the farmers of the prairies would have on this basis an additional revenue of something in the neighbourhood of twenty million dollars. I see some hon. gentlemen smile at that, but it is a fact. I have the data and can establish the point which I am making. There is an advantage of ten cents a bushel in favour of the Edmonton-Vancouver route to Liverpool over the Edmonton-Montreal route, and the establishment of a grain elevator will be one method of diverting that ten cents a bushel from the hands of the grain elevators into the hands of the farmers.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Is my hon. friend supporting this expenditure at Vancouver on the ground that it is justified by anticipated wheat exports, or does he hope for some general port development there?

Mr. LADNER: I thought that the immediate justification had been well explained by the minister showing the actual net profits which are now produced, and not wishing to duplicate his remarks I took up another point, the development of trade. I say that it would enlarge the possibilities of oriental trade, and greatly increase the possibilities of still larger profits, and at the same time private enterprise would be encouraged to go in when the people saw the government step in whole-heartedly. The idea that this expenditure is to be a continual drain, that we are going to come back here year after year and ask for another appropriation, is quite unreasonable and quite unfair, because once you get the volume of business going through the port and the trade established, it is more than likely that private enterprise will be able to carry out what it is unable to carry out at the present time.

Mr. MILLAR: I am pleased indeed to see this western route opened up, because I believe that when we get a great deal of our grain going over the Pacific route, as well as over the Hudson Bay route, many of the abuses now alleged of the St. Lawrence route will pass away. I know there has been very little said in the way of searching into the difficulties and perhaps the objections, and I would like to ask for a little information.

I have not been able to find out from the remarks made by the minister whether it is the policy of the government to make of the port of Vancouver a storage port or simply a transfer port. I should also like to ask what information the government has in regard to the amount of moisture that is consumed by grain passing over the Pacific route and through the Panama canal to the Old Country. I believe that a great deal of our grain that goes through Fort William in a damp condition is mixed with dry grain, and while the farmer pays for the drying, I believe that a great deal of the grain is not dried. I submit this opinion, in connection with the Pacific route. I believe that if grain is taken to the port very early in the season, and left lying there for many months before it is shipped, and passes through the Panama canal for London or Liverpool, it will be necessary to be very much more careful about the drying facilities, because a great deal of the grain that will pass readily and without much damage over the other route would not pass undamaged over the Pacific route.

Mr. STEVENS: That was thoroughly tested out on several trial trips. Scientific experts accompanied the vessels and took tests of the temperature, moisture, and everything else on the trip, and they say that there were no bad effects whatsoever.

Mr. MILLAR: I am quite well aware of that, provided the grain travels quickly to the port of Vancouver and quickly to England, but I doubt whether tests have been made of grain that has been shipped very early in the season and stored for many months before being shipped across the water. The European countries taking our grain and the grain of other countries require about twelve million bushels a week all the year round, so naturally the grain must be stored somewhere. I will not say that Calgary and Edmonton are the proper points at which to provide storage facilities. Lethbridge is mentioned by an hon. member. I think the location should be very carefully considered. Much has been said about the lack of facilities during the past season. I believe it was stated that twice the grain would have gone over that route if it had not been for the lack of facilities. I do not think I am disclosing any information I should not disclose when I say that I had a conversation with some members of the grain commission on my way east from which I gathered that a great deal if not all of the difficulty was caused by the fact that some people had space leased and had not grain, while others had grain and no space, and each class was holding up the other. That occurred also on the eastern route last season. Men who had much space leased on the Great Lakes vessels were able to sell it at a very great advance and made considerable money thereby. So you can see that there is always a difficulty of a port being held up and a blockade being caused in that way. That being the case, I would ask if it is the intention of the government to place this port under the board of harbour commissioners or under the grain commission. During this last season, I suppose, right up to the present time, it has been under the harbour board. Is it the intention of the government to continue that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The elevator is under the grain commission just now, and will be until 1st August next, when it will pass under the management of the harbour commission.

Mr. MILLAR: Let me add that the blockade to which I have referred was broken up by the grain commission taking active steps and using authority and powers that the harbour board would not have. That is one argument for placing it under the grain commission.

There is also the matter of freight rates. I believe that at the present time the freight rate is fixed on the high grade of the Canadian Pacific, while on the Canadian National the grade, I understand, is better westward than eastward. I hope the time will come when the rates from the west will be lowered. I believe that one of the reasons why there has been such an advantage in sending grain westward this season is because of the rates eastward, and that has been caused by a blockade at Montreal. I think the government should look into this matter, and I should like to know whether the blockade at Montreal this past season was caused by the fact that the harbour board had control. Has it been caused by some people leasing storage who did not have grain? These are matters that should be considered when we are deciding whether it should be under the grain commission or the harbour board. Then again, the rates on grain going eastward this past season have been very, very high. An hon. member a few minutes ago, I think, gave the rate as twenty cents to Montreal. Now I have in my room a statement giving the rates during 1909. I took the figures from the books of grain companies and figured out the average of a whole page of actual shipments, and the average was just a little less than four cents. I believe the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), who is in favour of opening up the St. Lawrence deep-water ways, claimed on one occasion that a great saving could be made; I think some even talked about a saving of six cents. If we could ever get back to anywhere near the 1909-10 rate, which is less than six cents by a considerable amount, then I think it would be just a question whether any saving could be made by shipping through the West. However, I am convinced that the West can well compete with the East. I am glad to see the proposition and I am prepared to give it my support.

Mr. HOCKEN: There is one feature of this proposal which astonishes me, and that is the unusual modesty of the city of Vancouver. That city is asking for a loan to improve its harbour, and I ask if any Canadian city ever made so modest a request before. There have been millions of money spent on the different harbours of this country by the Dominion government. Large sums of money, for example, have been spent at Fort William making improvements to the harbour, but all that Vancouver wants is a loan. Certainly, I would support a motion of this kind very gladly. I am of the opinion that most of the troubles of our friends in the West—and I think they seem to have more troubles than all the rest of the population put together—may be remedied by the improvement of marketing conditions; and if, as has been alleged here to-day, a saving of eight cents a bushel can be effected by using the route under discussion then I think it is up to the Canadian government not only to make a loan but to make an appropriation, to reach so desirable an end. I think that every proposition that offers lower rates for the marketing of the produce of the West should be exploited, because it is in the marketing of the products of our land that such a tremendous cost arises and that is the direction in which a reduction can be made. I am not very hopeful of being able to reduce the cost of production, at least for very many years. Because men are not going to work for less money than they are now working for, and there does not seem to be any inclination to do any more work in a specified time. The only way that I can see to relieve the situation of our friends in the western provinces is to devise some plan by which their produce could be marketed at lower rates. I believe that the improvement of the St. Lawrence canals would do a great deal in that connection, and at a later stage I hope to have an opportunity of saying something more definite on that question. What this country ought to do—not only for to-day but for the future—is to improve all its machinery and all its facilities for getting its products out of the country. We are growing a crop of three or four hundred millions of bushels of grain in the West. Why, Sir, if that western country is fully settled there ought to be surely four or five times as much produced as is the case to-day. If, then, the prairie provinces increase their production to that amount the present means of export, as any person can see, will be absolutely insufficient, and with inadequate means of export we are practically limited in our production. The statement has been made that a block existed at Montreal. I am not surprised at that, it is practically the only outlet we have for all the stuff that is grown in the West. I would have two or three outlets, because I think the time is not far away when we will need more facilities than we possess at the present time to handle the produce of Canada. We must remember that it is not only the produce of the West that has to pass out from Montreal, but all that is grown in the great province of Ontario which produces, I suppose, twice as much as any other province in the Dominion. The only existing outlet is either New York or Montreal, a little going, perhaps, to Portland. But my feeling is that it is wise on the part of this government and this parliament to consider carefully and sympathetically every proposal that is made for increasing the facilities for handling the produce of the western prairies. There is no man in this House who is more anxious, or who desires more ardently, to serve the interests of western Canada than I do. In that respect I am practically prepared to go the limit. It is not only wheat for which better
5 p.m. means of export are desired. The cattle industry, especially in the province of Alberta, ought to become a very large and very important one to Canada and particularly to the West.

Now I cannot speak with any definiteness as to the exact saving to be effected in the cost of transportation, not having gone into the matter as deeply as some hon. members, but it seems to me that there must be a substantial reduction in the cost of handling the produce of the West by the Vancouver route when it is remembered that the distance from Edmonton, I think, is only about eight hundred miles as compared with a distance of well on to three thousand miles to Montreal.

Manifestly there must be a very great saving in the case of a route so much shorter, especially with proper facilities and a fair and reasonable use of the Yellowhead pass as against the Kickinghorse pass. If the Canadian Pacific railway cannot haul grain through the mountains at the same cost as the National road then the latter and not the former is liable to get the business. And why should it not? Why not deal with transportation in the same manner as one would do when making a purchase of any commodity? If a man makes as good a pair of boots for $4 as a man does who charges $6 for footwear, it means that the former will sell more boots; and if the National road can haul grain through the mountains at a lower rate than another system can, by reason of better grades, it is likely to get the business. That is a very important item to consider in dealing with this quesiton.

I am very much in favour of the motion but I would go to the extent of suggesting to the minister that he should make a grant rather than a loan to the city of Vancouver.

Mr. COOTE: I want to disagree with the sentiment expressed by the last speaker that the government should make a grant rather than a loan to Vancouver harbour board. I would much prefer that the minister adhere to his proposal, that is, to loan this money to the board.

As far as the transportation of wheat is concerned, which will be carried through the port of Vancouver, I am sure that the men who raise that wheat are quite willing that the elevator at Vancouver should receive whatever reasonable charges are necessary. I simply want to mention one or two points that were not brought out this afternoon, and then submit one or two questions to the minister.

The first thing I wish to point out in regard to wheat production in Canada is that we have all the production that the present outlets can take care of. We are very close to the danger line. Last season we had a crop in Canada, we are told, of 399,000,000 bushels of wheat, an average of 17¾ bushels per acre. In the year 1915, we had an average crop in Canada of 26 bushels per acre. If in the year 1922, we had had the same average that we had in 1915, instead of 399,000,000, we would have had 582,000,000 bushels, or another 183,000,000 bushels, which would have had to be taken care of. We are also told that there was a blockade on the one big outlet, that is by the Great Lakes. What would the blockade have been like if we had had to market another 183,000,000 bushels this year? —and hon. members can see that that was quite a possibility.

One other point which, I am sure, will interest particularly members from the Maritime provinces is this, that if additional facilities are not provided at Vancouver for handling the wheat, particularly from Alberta, there is in the United States another Portland—Portland, Oregon—which in a few years will be taking a large quantity of our wheat, and then members from British Columbia will roar just as much about Canadian wheat going through Portland, Oregon, as members from the Maritime provinces now complain about wheat going through Portland, Maine. This last year, a representative from the city of Portland, Oregon, came to Alberta endeavouring to divert some share of our wheat to that city, and assured us that this would be to our advantage. This House should think seriously of that phase of the situation before doing anything which might hinder development of grain-handling facilities at Vancouver.

I am glad to note that there is so much unanimity in this House on this question, but there are a few points which I think we should be a little careful about. From expressions of opinion which I have heard so far this session, I notice that the demand for economy is very general in all quarters of this House, and I hope economy will be exercised in building facilities of one kind or another at the port of Vancouver. I sympathize very heartily with some of the statements expressed by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), for instance, that a great deal of money has been wasted in Canada, particularly on ocean ports or even ports that are not on the ocean, and I want to ask the minister a few questions. After he advances this money to the Vancouver harbour board, will he exercise any supervision whatever over the expenditure of it by the board? If a new elevator is built, would the work be done by tender? Does he expect to have any of this additional elevator capacity at Vancouver ready for the 1923 crop? Once these elevators are put under the board of harbour commissioners at Vancouver, will the department, through the board of grain commissioners, exercise any supervision whatever over their operation? I understand the minister assents. I am glad to be advised of that. Is the elevator at the present time under the Vancouver harbour board?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. WARNER: I am glad to have an opportunity to support this resolution. It is a pleasure, to western members at least, to see so much support throughout this House for this proposition. I would that all questions could be considered on their merits, and it seems to me that the considerations which have been put forward by previous speakers as regards this proposition of improving the harbour facilities at Vancouver in order to take care of the western grain by way of the Pacific, have been founded on the merits of the question. We are glad to have this support.

I live at Edmonton, which is, one might say, on the western edge of the great grain producing district, and we are close to the Pacific coast as compared with even the lake ports. We have held for years that it was rather an injustice that we should not be permitted to ship our grain west when we felt that that was our natural route to the world market and our natural outlet. As has been said this afternoon, that route has the advantage of being an all-year-round route. Any time that you want to send grain that way, you can do so. I also live on the line of the National railways, and I have no hesitation in saying that I am partial to having grain travel over the National railways. I believe, too, as a previous speaker has said, that an opportunity is given to ship grain more cheaply on those National roads on account of better grades. Why not patronize the National roads? We have them; we have to make the best of them. Moreover, if any part of Canada will do something towards making those National roads a success, it will be the undeveloped part of Canada in the West which is lying there ready for the hand of man to make productive.

I do not know that I should, at this moment, introduce more than this one idea; but I want to tell the committee, as I told hon. members last year, that in Edmonton we live half way between the Pacific and Atlantic oceans. If the Hudson Bay route is opened up at some time or another—I do not know when that time will come—we are about 800 miles from tide-water in Hudson bay, and we are from 700 to 800 miles from the Pacific. We hope that as this route develops there will be established at Edmonton storage elevators and all the facilities for handling, cleaning, drying, keeping and taking care of grain that may be shipped either way. I do not see that that should interfere with present development at Vancouver. The other proposition I have referred to is practically untouched just now. Now, all we ask is that the government should have an eye to the future in order that western Canada may get its share of the development that must be carried out if the whole dominion is to become a really great country. We believe that we have a great country to-day, but our opportunities are so vast when compared with what has already been achieved that we cannot help feeling that we are only beginning to develop Canada. We want more wheat growers in the West, and we must provide for them, and enable them to put their products on the market.

One hon. member has observed that nothing has been said about the other products besides wheat. But if hon. members could understand the conditions in the West they would appreciate the other resources we have and perhaps they might view our future with more optimism. But people living in that part of the Dominion have some reason to hesitate about endorsing an immigration policy until they can be assured that intending immigrants will have a better opportunity than they themselves at present enjoy. Personally I do not share that view to any great extent, but I do feel that the work of taking care of the crops which future immigrants will raise in that part of the country is just as important in the interest of Canada as is the question of getting immigrants into the country. We must provide for that work or we shall not be able to hold the people when they do come. But I believe that all this can be done, and I am pleased this afternoon to note the broad view that has been taken by those hon. members who have spoken on this question. I do not think it is too much to hope that the representatives in parliament of the Canadian people may soon learn to appreciate the great value, and the crying necessity, of developing the western part of the country. That development is essential if a market is to be found for the products of the factories of eastern Canada. If the people in the West had been getting better markets and better prices there would have been a better sale for the manufactured goods of the country to-day. I do not like to recount the bad conditions that prevail out there to-day, but I must say that the reason why the manufacturers of the East are not selling their shoes and clothing in the West on a larger scale than they are now doing is simply because the people cannot buy them. I have reason to believe that we may be able to add eight or ten, indeed fifteen cents, a bushel to the price of our wheat when the rates are as they should be, and when other necessary conditions are brought about along with reduced freight rates. I do not hesitate to suggest that we could effect a reduction of fifteen cents a bushel on the handling of wheat, which of course would naturally go to the producer. If that can be done, why should we not do it? As I said before, I do not see why elevator capacity should not be provided at Edmonton if the western route is opened up. I do not believe that the government would need to invest money there for taking care of the grain and storing it, in fact, the government in the present case are doing nothing more than making it possible for Vancouver to establish those facilities which it needs. We do not want the government to make any donation; I believe that any business ought to pay for itself. I think we are paying for the transportation of our wheat, no matter who carries it; and all that is asked is that the government loan what moneys are necessary to provide that transportation which shall pay for itself. I am pleased to associate myself with those who are supporting the resolution, and I have hopes for the government when they bring in a resolution that is as fair and reasonable as this one, and undertake a development that is so badly needed in Canada to-day.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It does not seem necessary for me to extend the discussion. It is pleasing to find a resolution of this character so well and so unanimously received by our friends opposite. I have a pretty close knowledge of the conditions that led up to the desirability, in fact the urgent necessity, of the government bringing this resolution before the House. It has been shown during the last few years that it is possible to ship the grain of the western provinces particularly Alberta and western Saskatchewan, through the Pacific ports. It has been found that that grain can be taken to these ports and transported across the Pacific to the markets that apparently are waiting for it. It has also been proved that by utilizing the Panama canal this grain can be sent to the world's markets, particularly the United Kingdom. As demonstrating that possibility, the present elevator at Vancouver has served a very useful purpose. But it has been seen, particularly during the operations of last year and this year, that if that western route was to carry in competition with the eastern routes and was to serve the purpose it ought to serve for our grain products, then additional facilities would have to be provided at Vancouver. An hon. member has suggested that he does not altogether like the idea of the government voting money in chunks of $5,000,000 for expenditures of that kind. I will call his attention to the wording of the resolution. He will notice that although parliament will, as I have no doubt, grant the proposed sum of money, the resolution provides that each of these advances shall be made from time to time and must go through the department concerned, namely the Department of Marine. This money is not handed over in a lump sum, but is advanced as the work progresses. It is also well understood, I think, that the harbour commission is under the authority and control of the government of Canada, so that their activities in the harbour of Vancouver are at all times subject to our approval. It is true that as a commission they may initiate policies and advise the department, but after all the moneys advanced by parliament do remain in our control and are advanced as the occasion requires.

Now, in regard to the port of Vancouver, in fact to our Pacific ports generally, we find, due to the expansion of trade in the Orient and the operation of the Panama canal, that there is going to be a great change in shipping on the Pacific coast. We believe the day is not far distant when freight will be moved to the Pacific coast by water and thence transported into the interior of Canada. And in the handling of this grain traffic we will find that as the grain movement increases to the Pacific coast there will be a larger tonnage coming into that port bringing imports and taking return cargoes in the way of grain and other products of this country.

As to the transfer of the elevator from the grain commission to the harbour board, that matter was very carefully canvassed between the two departments of the government, and owing to the fact that the harbour commission not only controlled the pier over which the elevator is served, but also the movement of ships in the harbour, it was felt that the harbour commission would be in a better position to serve the handling of grain at that terminal point than a grain commission operating either in Port Arthur or Fort William. There is no complaint to make as to the activities of the grain commission. They, in conjunction with the harbour commissioners, did make regulations last year which rendered it possible for the harbour facilities to serve the grain traffic to the utmost limit of their capacity.

I am satisfied that this loan will do much to improve not only the grain handling facilities but other facilities at the port of Vancouver. It has been stated that it is not the intention of the harbour commission nor the people of British Columbia to come back to parliament for further grants. I would not promise that, because I believe that the development in the port will be so great and so profitable that the harbour board will be able to come back and ask for further loans, and that this parliament will grant their requests, knowing that it is good national business and in the interests of the whole Dominion to make such expenditures.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, I support this resolution, and I wish to congratulate the minister on bringing it forward at this early sitting. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has asked whether we support this expenditure because of anticipated developments in the grain trade. I would answer: No, because of the actual demand which exists to-day on the part of the grain growers of the prairies. They demand facilities for handling their grain through the western port. The facilities at present are not sufficient to accommodate their demands, and consequently an immediate increase is necessary. To-day there are many grain growers on the prairies who would like to send their grain via Vancouver—I know many of them myself—and they cannot avail themselves of that outlet because there are no facilities to handle more than a certain quantity of grain. I repeat, the necessity for greater facilities exists now.

I think I can illustrate by the general growth in trade through the port of Vancouver that there is a necessity for increased facilities in handling this commodity, and I will use the Panama canal as the basis of my illustration. The canal was opened for traffic in 1915. From that year to 1920 the freight rates were so prohibitive that no traffic moved from Vancouver via the canal—practically none. In 1920, however, the rates became normal and traffic was resumed. If we go back to 1913, that is before the Panama canal was opened, we find the total number of ocean-going vessels which docked in Vancouver was 132. We can eliminate the intervening period up to 1920 because no bottoms were available. In 1920, the first year after the war in which ocean rates began to fall, a total of 333 ocean-going ships entered the port. In 1921 a total of 496, of which 103 used the Panama canal. That is practically the first year that the Panama canal was used in so far as shipping from the port of Vancouver is concerned. In 1922 for the first nine months—I do not think the figures are available for the full year—509 ocean-going ships used the port of Vancouver.

Now for the imports from and exports to Europe through the port of Vancouver via the Panama canal. In 1921 the exports were 154,513 tons; in 1922 they increased to 470,272 tons—more than three times the amount in one year. The imports in 1921 via the Panama canal were 20,416 tons; in 1922, 149,553 tons—or practically a little over seven times the amount in one year. I use that illustration as a basis to demonstrate why it is feasible to ship grain via the Panama canal. Some doubt did exist as to whether or not grain would heat and thereby deteriorate in its passage through the canal, but I am assured that that theory is completely exploded, as pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens).

The member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) stated, I think, that he did not approve of the method of loans. But I would point out, first, that this money is essentially for the benefit of growers of grain on the prairies, and, secondly, that Vancouver is going to pay for these facilities—and we are not complaining. As the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) pointed out, we are extremely modest and we could not adopt any other course than that of paying for the facilities which are required for the western grain growers.

Mr. COOTE: The hon. member says that Vancouver will pay for these facilities. Is it not a fact that the shipments that pass through Vancouver harbour will eventually pay for them?

Mr. CLARK: The harbour commissioners will run this thing as a business. The port of Vancouver will pay through their collections.

Mr. COOTE: And the wheat that goes through there will pay its share.

Mr. CLARK: Oh yes, it will pay its share

Mr. DUFF: It is the business that will pay, not the port of Vancouver.

Mr. CLARK: The question of economy has been raised, and I certainly support that principle. But I would point out that the present elevator capacity of the port of Vancouver is 1,250,000 bushels, and it is proposed to increase that capacity to the extent of 500,000 bushels. Now, we got that capacity of 1,250,000 bushels at a cost of from $800,000 to $900,000, but in order to get an increase of 500,000 bushels we must pay $400,000, or half the original cost. I understand also that the original cost included the working plant, whereas this is only storage. I think the minister should give us some light on this point.

There are one or two other things which surprise me in connection with the use to which this money is to be put. There is vital necessity for terminal railway facilities if this grain is to be handled economically and with despatch. I am surprised that no mention is made of the harbour railway facilities. At present all railways other than the Canadian Pacific are handicapped because the Canadian Pacific has all the water frontage where the elevator is and where the proposed elevators will be built. It is important, therefore, that the harbour commission should have under its jurisdiction at the earliest day the harbour facilities so that all railways will have a chance and so that the grain can be handled with the utmost despatch.

The port of Montreal, which is a much greater distance away from the grain-growing country than Vancouver is, handles nearly 200,000,000 bushels a year; therefore it is a moderate estimate that the port of Vancouver, given the necessary handling facilities, should handle 100,000,000 bushels a year. But even with this increase we shall not have more than one-third of the facilities offered at Montreal, so I anticipate that at a very early date the western grain growers will be demanding additional facilities. I recommend to the government an immediate consideration of the necessity which is obviously in front of us.

Mr. PORTER: Is it contemplated that this proposed advance will be sufficient to enable the commissioners to complete and efficiently equip the intended improvements in this harbour, or is this merely a commitment, so to speak, in connection with which further expenditures will have to be made later? I would also like to ask whether the government is in possession of plans and specifications necessary to enable it to determine whether the expenditure of this $5,000,000 will be advisable. That information ought to be in possession of the government, and we should know whether the proposed expenditure will be sufficient without the placing of further obligations upon the people.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The amount which it is proposed to lend to the harbour commissioners of Vancouver will, it is anticipated, meet the estimated immediate requirements. Of course, it is impossible to say definitely that this will be sufficient to meet all future requirements. We have had a rather prolonged discussion and many questions have been asked; I would ask that the resolution be allowed to pass and when the bill comes back before the committee after its second reading I shall be in a better position to give the information asked for this afternoon from various quarters.

Mr. SALES: Will the minister give me again the name of the engineer he mentioned?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Rolph.

Mr. SALES: Is there any particular difficulty with regard to the site at Vancouver? The minister gave a lot of figures—$171,000, $155,000, and so on; some of these amounts will no doubt be for preparatory work on the site. My question is this: Is the $2,000,000 for the 2,000,000 bushels merely for the construction and equipment of plant? The minister need not answer immediately if he does not wish to do so. Another point: the amount of $400,000 for the extra 500,000 bushels, as mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) certainly seems very high. I am sure that the estimated storage costs—merely for bins, without any working plant—at the elevators at the head of the lakes are very much below that amount per bushel. I would also draw the minister's attention to the fact that there is one man, a resident of Port Arthur, who does practically all the planning of the terminal elevators. It is very necessary that this elevator should be equipped with the proper machinery. Terminal elevators very soon become obsolete, and if they are not efficient it becomes too expensive to handle the wheat going through them. This gentleman has devoted practically the whole of his time to devising new methods and new machinery for these plants, and I would certainly suggest that in order to make this Vancouver elevator an efficient and economical plant, the government should consult with Mr. Howe and with Mr. Fennel, who, in my opinion, has in Montreal a very efficient and economical organization.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interject that Mr. Howe is the engineer who designed the existing elevator?

Mr. SALES: Yes, also the ones at Calgary, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon and our own co-operative terminal, as well as the new one for Mr. Stewart and a number of others. I think he is probably the best man in Canada to-day for that work. I do not know the gentleman you have named here but I would suggest that you have the two men work together in order to get the most up-to-date plant possible.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, to provide for further advances to the Vancouver harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7 to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

On section 1—Jurisdiction and powers of stipendiaries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose this merely carries out what the hon. Minister of Justice told us a few days ago was the purpose of the bill. I have not studied it very closely, but I will accept his assurance.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Exactly. I gave the explanation the other day in introducing the bill. It is to provide for the trial of Eskimos who are now under guard at Herschell Island.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I notice that this section provides that a man may serve as a juror although he is not a British subject. Is that not a new thing? Is it not an improper precedent to create?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It is not a precedent. If my hon. friend will read clause 44 of the Northwest Territories Act, chapter 62 of the Revised Statutes of 1906, he will find that a judge has unlimited jurisdiction in choosing jurors. It provides:

> Persons required as jurors for a trial shall be summoned by a stipendiary from among such male persons as he thinks suitable in that behalf; and the jury required on such trial shall be called from among the persons so summoned as such jurors, and shall be sworn by the stipendiary who presides at the trial.

This provision my hon. friend mentions is to remove any doubts which might arise in this case. These men are to be tried in the Yukon district, where there is a provision that no one can serve as a juror unless he is a British subject. In the Northwest Territories there is no such restriction. These are offences that were committed in the Northwest Territories, so the procedure is not being changed; but the trial having to take place in the Yukon district, where there is a restriction, we feel that we should first remove that doubt.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not follow my hon. friend at all. I understood him to say that he was not creating a precedent. It seems to me now that he is. He says that in the Yukon district it is necessary for a man to be a British subject before he can serve on a Canadian jury. I should think it was necessary everywhere, without any qualification, that before a man has the right to take part in the administration of Canadian justice he must be a Canadian citizen. I should have thought that a primary qualification. My hon. friend says the provision is necessary here because while that general principle applies in the Yukon, it does not apply in the Northwest Territories. I venture to suggest that unless there is an express exception such as we have here, it would apply in the Northwest Territories. What my hon. friend is doing here is saying that in the case of a trial which is to take place in the Yukon, where you have British subjects and the proper machinery for the administration of justice—it is because of that very fact that this bill is being introduced to change the venue of the trial—the procedure in the Northwest Territories, where there might not be those facilities, shall apply. Unless the minister can give us some explanation, I can see no reason why the general rule should be departed from.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The hon. member says that there is on Herschell Island a population from which we could get British jurymen. It is exactly because we have no such population there that this provision is made. The population of Herschell Island is very small. It is of a transient character and it is only in case British subjects cannot be found that we shall need the provision that it will not be necessary to be a British subject to act on the jury. This, let me say, is the law under the existing Northwest Territories Act, but there is a difference with respect to Yukon district. My hon. friend knows very well that the qualifications with respect to jurors are prescribed by the provincial legislature. This, however, is an exceptional matter inasmuch as we are legislating for an entirely different district, and the Revised Statutes of 1906 for the Northwest Territories gives unlimited jurisdiction to the judge to select any man residing in that territory to act as a juror. But having to try cases outside of the Northwest Territories, we have to make this provision that a man need not be a British subject. I have no desire to insist upon the provision if the committee objects to it. I repeat that it is not an exception we are making, we are simply transferring to that particular district the procedure of the Northwest Territories.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I understand it, this legislation is for the purpose of securing efficient administration, saving money, and the like, and we all want to help my hon. friend in those matters. He is asking to change the law so that an accused man can be tried in a different territory, and we are all agreeable. In making that change the minister changes the venue and he says that the venue shall be at a place where, as he himself admits, the necessary machinery and people are to be found. He changes the law so as to apply to the Yukon Territory, and he himself says that in the Yukon territory the law is that a man should be a British subject before he is qualified to serve upon such a jury. And yet my hon. friend says he is not changing the law. Why that is changing the law entirely. In the first place the accused has a right to his local venue. He may not be hurt very much by the change but his right is gone. Having changed that venue, then my hon. friend declares that the laws which apply to the Yukon administration shall not apply to the place to which the change of venue applies.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I shall again try to make the matter clear. These people will be tried under the procedure of the Northwest Territories Act, and by that statute the judge has the right to choose any citizen that he finds as a juror. What objection can there be to our proceeding under the law as it obtains in the territories? The reason for the proposed legislation is that there is a very small population, and unless the amendment is accepted we shall, in all probability, have to send British subjects with the judge to act as jurymen in the cases in question.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 13, respecting the Nipissing Central Railway Company.—Mr. Lapierre.

Bill No. 14, to incorporate La Banque des Cultivateurs.—Mr. Parent.

COLD STORAGE ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Cold Storage Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is a very short one consisting of only two sections, and yet it is capable of rendering a great deal of service and usefulness, especially in connection with fruit, dairy, fish and other perishable commodities throughout Canada. But before going on with the bill itself, might I refer just for a few moments to the working out of the original Cold Storage Act of 1907, because I think this House, when it is asked to vote subsidies for a certain activity of this nature, is entitled to be placed in possession of the facts with respect to the expenditure of subsidies that have been granted under the original act since its inception? I have in my hand a full report of those activities, thirty-four in number, that have been organised throughout Canada under the subsidy act of 1907. They are scattered throughout all the provinces as follows: Prince Edward Island, 1; Nova Scotia, 3; New Brunswick, 2; Quebec, 2; Ontario, 16; Manitoba, 1; Saskatchewan, 4; Alberta, 2; British Columbia, 3; total, 34. We cannot assume that all these are due to the subsidies given to encourage construction; but I think we can reasonably assume that a very considerable proportion of these cold storage plants are there to-day as a result of those subsidies. The quantity of cold storage space furnished by these thirty-four plants amounts to 5,244,215 cubic feet. The total cost of construction was $2,408,-354.85. The total amount of subsidies that were voted for these various plants during those twelve years was $722,506.46, or less than three-quarters of a million dollars.

For a number of years after the act was first passed, not very much advantage was taken of it. At that time cold storage plants generally were the subject of a good deal of suspicion. As a matter of fact they were looked upon as almost an evil, if not a menace to society; and a great many people, if they wanted to secure a good hearing, would expatiate upon the alleged heinous conduct of cold storage plants as a whole. As time went on, however, people got more familiar with the great service that these institutions afforded, especially if properly controlled and regulated; and as the years passed more advantage was taken of the subsidies, with the result that there were established 34 plants altogether during the twelve years that the old act was in operation. When the war came on we discovered, as other countries did, that we were very short of cold storage facilities, and at the conclusion of the war the government of that day amended the act so that the subsidies should apply to municipal cold storages only. I went over this matter fully when the resolution was introduced, but as there are a number of hon. members here to-night who were not present last Friday when I made the statement, I shall cover the same ground to some extent this evening.

The effect of the change in the act was practically to suspend its operation, because during the four years that it operated in its amended form no subsidies were paid because no municipal cold storage plants were organized nor were any moneys earned under subsidy. During that period the government that preceded us undertook the construction of one of the best cold storage plants, if not the best, in Canada, at the port of Montreal. I had the pleasure of visiting this institution and in my opinion it is one of the finest not only in Canada but on this continent. I do not know whether that government's policy was to converge on that plant to the exclusion of others, but the policy, if that was the object, was a sound one. Be that as it may, the plant is a credit to Canada. But that period has gone by. The present act is not operating and we are voting sums of money from year to year which we are unable to spend because apparently no municipality is desirous of taking advantage of the grant to build municipal cold storages. The proposal therefore is to amend the terms of the act so that it shall apply to co-operative institutions.

When the resolution was before the committee there were two criticisms offered, which I think had a useful object. The first was the fact that the bill did not provide for any proper regulation of these cold storage plants after the instalments had all been paid. It had been my intention to provide for this in one of two or three ways, preferably at that time by way of regulation. It is very difficult to get a bill sufficiently flexible to apply to all the meritorious institutions when you incorporate such a regulation in it. But you can have regulations sufficiently flexible to suit the conditions and the times as necessary. However, I am not committed to that method. If the committee to which I purpose referring the bill, that is, the Committee on Agriculture, has any method of regulation, without making it too rigid, for incorporation in the bill I shall be pleased to consider it favourably.

Another suggestion was that there should be a more specific description of what constitutes co-operative associations. Now, the bill was left open on that point purposely. We may differ as to what constitutes a co-operative association. Sometimes semi-philanthropic joint stock companies may be real and valid co-operative organizations. On the other hand, a great many people hold the view that no institution is strictly co-operative unless its profits are at least partially distributed on the basis of business supplied by each patron. It occurred to myself and my staff, and to those who had the charge of drafting this short bill, that it would be better to leave the point open as to just what constituted a co-operative society, because it might be considered that a joint stock company that had as part of its objective profit making, when it was in fact semi-beneficent in its character, had just as much right to be recognized for a subsidy under the act as if it were a full-fledged co-operative organization with at least part of its profits distributed on a business contributing basis as regards its patrons. However, if any change can be suggested without being too rigid and confining the application of the bill to too small an area, I shall be pleased to consider such a suggestion. As a matter of fact, all we desire is to get the bill functioning. We are not satisfied with merely voting $50,000 a year in the estimates without having the money spent in providing proper cold storage facilities, and the primary object of the bill is to afford such facilities. I do not know that I have anything further to add, Mr. Speaker, and I would now formally move the second reading of the bill so that I may refer it to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): The minister stated that under the act three plants had been subsidized in Nova Scotia. Are they still in existence and what are the names of the companies? Further, can the minister tell us whether the Montreal cold storage plant was a municipal institution?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, national.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Constructed by the Montreal harbour board?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Did it receive a subsidy under the act?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Then it has nothing to do with the act?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I mentioned it incidentally. As I understood it, the object of the government in practically suspending the operation of the act was to concentrate activities on the Montreal institution. As regards the Nova Scotia plants, I understand they are all in operation. The Lockport cold storage plant receives a subsidy of $17,055, the Halifax Cold Storage Company, at Port Hawkesbury, $9,115, and the Leonard Fisheries, Limited, $60,000. I might add that the largest grant earned under the old subsidy act was $105,000 by a cold storage plant at Prince Rupert. The Canadian Fish and Cold Storage Plant, which the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) referred to in the course of his speech on the Address the other evening. I had an opportunity of visiting this plant last summer, and it has certainly contributed largely to the development of the fisheries, especially in regard to halibut, on the Pacific coast. The smallest grant was given to the plant at Peterboro.

Mr. HANSON: In view of the statement the minister makes that he has been unable to spend the money voted for subsidies each year, may I ask him if there is any pronounced demand on the part of co-operative societies for this measure, and, if so, from what part of the country does it come? Or does it emanate from the officials of his department so they may be enabled to spend the money which at present they have no outlet for?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Properly these questions should be put when the bill is before Committee of the Whole, but with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to answer my hon. friend. We have had requests from several quarters, the principal one being from the minister of agriculture for Ontario. We have discussed the matter with him several times. He is very much interested in co-operative effort, particularly as it relates to the dairy industry. The fruit-growing industry of the Niagara peninsula also made a request through Colonel Roberts, who is himself operating a plant at Grimsby and is very familiar with the local fruit industry. He recognizes that the fruit industry can only be successfully carried on in future by the establishment of pre-cooling plants, so that the fruit directly it is gathered may be put into cold storage to reduce its temperature, retard the ripening process and arrest bacterial action. We have also had a request from the Pacific coast. Hon. members from British Columbia are of course familiar with the fruit industry there. We are informed that what is wanted probably more than anything else is cold storage accommodation so that the marketing season may be extended and thus give fruit producers a chance to dispose of their products over a longer marketing period.

Mr. SPEAKER: I need not remind hon. members that they can speak only once on the second reading. Of course, when the bill is in committee stage no restriction applies.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I asked a question, Mr. Speaker, preliminary to making some remarks on the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member put a question a moment ago.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I do not go so far as to say that I am opposed to the bill, but my experience of cold storage operations aided by government subsidy is not such as to urge me to become enthusiastic over the proposals contained in this measure. The minister (Mr. Motherwell) says he has $500,000 a year to spend for this purpose, and he wants an opportunity of spending it. But surely that is hardly sufficient justification for the bill. We can easily relieve him from his embarrassment by not voting the money.

Mr. MARTELL: Is my hon. friend prepared to state that the fruit industry of the Annapolis valley, comprising the counties of King's, Hants and Annapolis, is not in need of government subsidies for the establishment of pre-cooling plants for the better handling of fruit? Do I understand him to be opposed to such assistance?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I do not know whether the fruit industry in the Annapolis valley is in need of such assistance or not. My hon. friend, I have no doubt, will tell us before the bill passes whether or not there is necessity for such state aid in Nova Scotia. If there is such necessity, I have not the slightest doubt that private interests in the Annapolis valley could very well supply the accommodation themselves. However, Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to say that I doubt very much the wisdom of continuing the Cold Storage Subsidy Act, and when this bill comes before the Committee on Agriculture I hope it will be given full and frank consideration. In so far as the act has been applied in Nova Scotia the results have not been satisfactory. The present Cold Storage Act owed its genesis I think to the efforts of persons interested in the fish industry in the Maritime provinces. I am not quite positive about that, but that is my impression. As the minister has stated, some plants have been subsidized there, but gradually they have drifted into private hands, and to all intents and purposes they are now private institutions. I believe that will happen in almost all cases where such plants are subsidized by the government. I observe that the minister in moving his resolution stated that he was very doubtful whether the act should be continued, simply by reason of the fact that such few requests for aid under its provisions had been received by his department.

I do not see how you can very well distinguish between a corporation, a co-operative society, and a private individual. The end which any one of the three might have in mind would be served and the same results accomplished in any locality by any of these agencies. If the principle is sound I think it should be applied to everyone. In Nova Scotia, so far as fish products are concerned, it is my opinion that considerable private capital would be invested in cold storage plants if government control were abandoned. It is very difficult to-day to attract private capital to any business which is subject to severe government control and regulation of rates. As the minister himself stated on Friday last, there has been so much criticism in recent years of the management and direction of cold storage plants that private investment in them has been discouraged. Give them the opportunity to do business with the same freedom as obtains in other industries and I think there will be forthcoming all the capital that is necessary. I quite concede that if institutions of this kind are to be subsidized there must be state control and regulation. It is also true, perhaps, that even though not aided by the state they should be regulated to some extent.

I am not going to the extent of opposing this measure, but I doubt its utility, for our experiment with state-aided cold storage plants has not been successful in any respect. Indeed, I think this might be a very good opportunity to abandon the act altogether and see what will happen in the development of these plants without any aid from the state. However, I have no doubt that the bill will be thoroughly considered by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker, cold storage, in so far as it relates to improved facilities for fruit growers in Nova Scotia, is of vital importance. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), whose experience, it would seem, has been a very bitter one. He is undoubtedly in favour of every possible government expenditure that will go toward the improvement of his constituency. But the people of western Nova Scotia—and I am referring to my own constituency—are in need to-day of some sort of cold storage or pre-cooling plants in which they can place their fruit when the market does not enable them to sell at a price that will yield a reasonable return for their labour. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, in the course of his remarks in reply to the hon. member for Halifax referred to the North Atlantic fisheries, and also to the Port Hawkesbury cold storage plant and one or two others. It is true that these plants may not have been a great commercial success, but if the hon. member for Halifax will look into the question without philosophizing upon economy, he will find that cold storage has been of inestimable value to the fishermen of Nova Scotia. The other day I referred to the fact, as also did my colleague from the county of King's (Mr. Robinson) that there were thousands upon thousands of barrels of apples down in the Annapolis valley, so-called, for which the people there could find no market. If we had these cold storage or pre-cooling plants these apples could be kept until such time as they could be placed on the market at a price to yield a reasonable return. The hon. member for Halifax spoke merely from the point of view of Halifax. We of the western counties are speaking—

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): If I may interrupt my hon. friend, I would deny to him the right to say that I was speaking primarily for Halifax. I appeal to the House and ask hon. members if any portion of my remarks justify my hon friend's making such an unwarranted statement. If he wishes to discuss the question, let him do so intelligently.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend is discussing the matter with a view to getting away from any improvement in cold storage plants that will go to aid the industry of agriculture in Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): My hon. friend is wrong in saying that.

Mr. MARTELL: The hon. member can make his own interpretation of it; that is the interpretation I place upon it, and I intend to stand by my own. The bill that the minister has introduced has a tendency to encourage the fruit grower; the only objection I have to it is that it does not cover private corporations engaging in the cold storage business. In many cases the carrying out of the co-operative idea has not been successful, and people are loath to engage in a co-operative business. In the western counties of Nova Scotia there are people who are ready to erect a cold storage plant. The hon. member for Halifax, in his wisdom supernal, said he did not know of any demand having been made for cold storage plants in Nova Scotia, but if he examines the files in the Department of Agriculture he will find that within the last week or so I presented to the hon. minister a communication from persons in the county of Hants asking that the government give them a subsidy for the purpose of the erection of a cold storage or pre-cooling plant in the town of Windsor. My hon. friend may live in Halifax, but the city and county of Halifax is not the province of Nova Scotia. I repeat that the minister in bringing this measure before the House is taking a step in the best interests of agriculture in my province. I do ask, however, that the granting of subsidies be not confined to co-operative or municipal bodies but be extended also to companies duly incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act of Nova Scotia or the Canadian Companies Act, having in view the erection of cold storage plants. I have stated that the people of western Nova Scotia are handicapped; they have no market for their fruit, their vegetables, their meats, and so on, and the government should do all they can to enable these people to conserve what they produce and get a legitimate return for their labour. But to come here and philosophize and to oppose the measure because it does not happen to favour one constituency is not in the best interests of agriculture in my province. I say again to the hon. member for Halifax that the city and county of Halifax do not constitute the whole of Nova Scotia; the portions of the province which bear the burden and heat of the day are the country districts, particularly the agricultural districts. On these the province must eventually depend; therefore, everything within reason should be done in their interests.

Mr. JOHN MORRISON (Weyburn) Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this bill opens up a question in connection with which a big principle is at stake. It is quite evident that there is great difference of opinion as to the best methods of helping the cold storage business. I am afraid I shall incur the displeasure of the member for Hants (Mr. Martell), as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has done by opposing this measure. I realize the great necessity for giving all possible encouragement to the cold storage business, but, like the hon. member for Halifax, I am of the opinion that the bill in its present form is not in the best interests of all concerned. I realize that the men in Nova Scotia who are growing apples, the potato growers and the fishermen, the farmers in Ontario and Quebec and in the western provinces—they all need cold storage facilities. But hon. members know that we are in much trouble in Canada to-day as a result of this pernicious system of subsidies. It opens up a big question; we are going to have demands from many quarters for bounties by the government, just as we have had them in the past. I think public opinion is changing; the people are tired of giving subsidies. The minister told us that $2,408,384 had been spent in twelve years in thirty-four plants, and that to these the government had granted by way of subsidies, $722,506. I think a much better way would be to give long-term loans at very low rates of interest, and these could be returned to the public treasury without any hardship on the borrower. I believe they would conduct their business better if they knew they had to return the money, for it pauperizes many people to give them grants. It is a pernicious system, either for the individual or a corporation. We can all recall instances in our own locality of companies getting grants from towns or provincial governments on the understanding that they were to do so and so, and as soon as they got their hands on the money they would turn the tables in some way, go broke or by some manoeuvre get out of their contract, and the parties making the grant would have no redress, and the public would not get the service intended. I am not objecting to the bill in this form for the purpose of putting obstacles in the way of the minister. I merely want to do what I think is best, and we can see from the discussion already that there is going to be a demand from different places if the bill goes through in its present form. The minister will simply be bombarded with requests for big grants for particular districts. But if people know that they are not going to get a free grant, but a loan—

Mr. MARTELL: You want the Hudson Bay railway, do you not?

Mr. MORRISON: I am not asking for any free grant for that road, for the very reason I have given. Railway subsidies have been the curse of Canada, and have been the cause of the biggest problem confronting parliament to-day. It is that very principle I am speaking against. If you give a subsidy to one, others have a right to expect it. The whole practice should be stopped. I am not going to be a party to something that will help farming, and then have Montreal and Toronto come and ask for ten or fifty million dollars and say: Well, you got $100,000 for your constituency; why cannot we have something for ours? The principle is wrong, and there is a good remedy. It is the lack of credit for cold storage, which is so great a necessity in this country, that is the difficulty, and that lack of credit only proves to my mind that we have a poor financial system in Canada, or money would be available for this business on long term loans. I am in favour of giving approved loans on good security for cold storage wherever they are necessary, but I feel in duty bound to oppose the bill in its present form.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): When this discussion was up the other night I understood from the minister that it was going to the Committee on Agriculture for consideration; otherwise, I should have fought it harder then. This is a very important project we are launching into, and it will require a great deal of consideration by the Committee on Agriculture. I understood from the minister that we would be given the opportunity in that committee to make changes, and the bill requires several changes. In reply to my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Martell), I would say that having a cold storage down in the beautiful land of Evangeline—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not want the hon. member to be under a misapprehension. This is the second reading of the bill, and though he is entitled to speak on the second reading, of course, this stage is preliminary to referring the bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SPENCE: I was scared of letting it advance too far, but if it is going to the Committee on Agriculture I shall have an opportunity to make suggestions there. I was going to say to my hon. friend from Hants that having a cold storage down in the land where he lives, and which he admires so much, will never create a market for his stuff. More than that, having a cold storage sometimes leads holders of perishable goods to hold them too long; they do not put them on the market at the proper time. That has been my experience in the business. I have known many cold storages, and I do not of one in Ontario that has made any money. They are exceedingly hard to carry and cost a lot of money. If you subsidize cold storages, you will have to open wide the door and subsidize municipalities as well as co-operative companies. The other night municipalities were eliminated from this resolution, and I took exception to that. If this bill is going to be of benefit to the fruit growing industry or to any part of the Dominion, I am willing to support it, but it is obvious there is not much demand for it when for the past four years we have not had a single municipality demand a cold storage subsidy. There are two or three cold storages in Toronto, and not one of them is making money. If this government undertakes to go into the cold storage business or to subsidize cold storages, it will be a losing investment, and we should be very careful especially in these times, when we are talking so much about economy, that we do not go too far. I am willing to discuss this further in the Committee on Agriculture, when I shall try to point out to the minister where he is wrong.

[Mr. Spence.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

LIVE STOCK ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting Live Stock.

He said: This is a consolidation of the original act of 1917 and of amendments thereto. It has in addition certain new features, not of a very radical nature, but yet fairly important.

The bill provides for the better control of stock yards. While the act is named the Live Stock Act, the title does not seem to me to fairly represent its purpose. The purpose briefly is for the proper control and establishment of stock yards, and stock exchanges associated therewith, and also to give to the by-laws and regulations of such stock exchanges, the status of law.

The bill also provides for the organization of exporters' associations, very much like what we have in the West in the shape of small shipping associations. Some of the provinces have a statute providing for the organization of shipping associations in order that the farmers may unite and ship their live stock collectively. The bill also provides for the inspection of animals prior to slaughter, and for the establishment of an egg-breaking plant where low grade eggs may be taken care of by breaking and freezing, or breaking and drying.

The administration of the act will be about as before. I think I explained the provisions pretty fully on the resolution.

Mr. MILLAR: In the Farm and Ranch Review of December 20th appears an article which may have a bearing on this bill, for I see it refers to stock yards. It says:

> This relates to the gangs hanging around all places where cattle are received from the farms—kind of speculators, who buy old cows and broken down dairy stuff direct from the farmers for $8 or $10. They then ask for a test. Where infection is disclosed, the animals are condemned and the speculator gets $40 for his investment.
> This questionable traffic has grown to considerable proportions around Winnipeg. Farmers do not, of course, engage in this sort of thing. They are glad to get the small amount the old stuff sells for to these speculators. Their cattle are consigned to commission men who, of course, are not expected to call for an inspection until the stuff is ready to leave the yards. By that time the speculators have made their purchases. Not infrequently drovers go over the prairies buying nothing but the old cattle that are likely to react to the test for infection and for which they expect to receive, in that event, $40 from the government.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the attention of the House to rule 21 which provides that no member may speak twice on the motion for the second reading of a bill except the mover, who can reply. Remarks can be exchanged on the bill in committee when the measure reaches the committee stage. If no other hon. member now wishes to speak the minister will reply and close the debate.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If any abuse, such as complained of by the hon. member (Mr. Millar) exists, or if there is any violation of the regulations of the stock exchange organized at each stock yard, it must be remembered that the purpose of this bill is partially to give effect to the by-laws and to the wishes of those stock exchanges. With respect to the buying up of old "canners" and "cutters" of which there are all too many around some of our stock yards, the purchasers taking the chance of their re-acting, I do not understand how any person would do that deliberately because they are sure to be caught in the abattoir. The man who owns these animals will find, that when they reach the abattoir they have to run the gauntlet of three or four government inspectors at various stages of the slaughtering, from the beginning to the end, and they are sure to be caught and condemned —they will not be used for food at all. If the animals are not too badly infected the parts which show tuberculosis will be cut away and the sound meat retained for food. If the animals are of the kind referred to they are sure to be condemned, therefore whoever is handling them is going, in the last analysis, to lose money. Anyway the purpose of the bill is to control our stock yards, to give our stock exchanges more authority over their members so that if they make a ruling it shall be carried into effect; also to give the regulations and by-laws of the stock exchanges the effect of law by being O.K'd. by the department.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

SALE AND INSPECTION OF FRUIT

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, to regulate the Sale and Inspection of Fruit and Fruit Containers.

He said: The original act dealing with this subject was passed, I think, in 1905, and there have been some six or seven amendments to it. The measure before the House is a consolidation of all these statutes. A little more than a year ago a conference was held in Ottawa, when every phase of the fruit industry was taken up and a statement prepared embodying many changes and recommendations to the government. The matter was taken up too late to pass legislation governing last season's crop, consequently it is introduced at this session.

Some of the changes have to do with the size of the container. When the resolution on which this bill is founded was introduced I explained that there is nothing rigid in the proposed changes, they are adjustable. I may point out that we have had the advice not only of the fruit growers but of all the organizations interested in fruit, from the producer right to the consumer. They have harmonized their differences and given expression to their wishes, and that expression is embodied in the present bill. Nevertheless I have no doubt we shall find quite a number of hon. members familiar with fruit growing who will be able to advance suggestions calculated to improve the bill. If there are any such who are not members of the Committee on Agriculture I can assure them, on behalf of the chairman of the committee they will be given an opportunity to be heard on any particular phase of the bill respecting containers or anything else that they may be specially concerned in.

There are certain changes in the matter of grading that I went into before, certain changes intended to make our berry boxes conform to the American box; certain changes with regard to the half barrel of apples which hitherto has not been recognized by law; also regulations governing the export of fruit and, in the matter of imports, designed to see that such imports conform to the grading of Canadian standards.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

TESTING AND INSPECTION OF SEEDS

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, respecting the Testing, Inspection and Sale of Seeds.

He said: The original Seed Control Act was passed in 1905. It was preceded by one or two attempts to put a similar act through the House which resulted in discussion. My hon. friend opposite (Mr. Tolmie) has had some experience in the matter of legislation of this character. As the bill referred to was the first measure of the kind introduced into the Canadian parliament it naturally created a great deal of discussion, some of it of a contentious nature. However, the bill finally passed the House in 1905, and at that time was considered one of the most advanced acts of the kind, I think, on this continent. It stood the test of time until 1911, when it was again amended and brought up to date. Since then it has continued in force up to the present day without any additional amendment. During the interval a number of similar acts have been passed in the various states of the American republic, and also on the continent of Europe, where they have not only overtaken but, in many important respects, actually surpassed us. It is now time that we should make further progress and not only consolidate but virtually build a new act that will do credit to us and compare favourably with any other legislation of the same nature to be found elsewhere.

In the old act the grading of clover and grass seeds was made compulsory. In the present bill not only is the grading of these seeds made compulsory, but likewise the grading of cereals for seed purposes. The grades are described by law just as our contract grades of wheat are described by law. The cereals, however, are not described by law, but are set by an advisory board in the same manner as the commercial grades of wheat are set in the West by the Western Standards Board. There are a number of other changes in the law, one of which I might mention. I mentioned it on the resolution, and it is a very good example of what we refer to as direct legislation. The conference to which I have referred, during their deliberations recommended to the government that we should insert a section making provision to protect the public from being exploited by some new or fancy variety of cereal, that might have no economic value at all, probably some old, worn-out variety that was rechristened, being put on the market, and an unsuspecting public exploited by such methods. I can recall many occasions in my farming experience when some glib-tongued gentleman would come around and expatiate on the advantages of, say, Alaskan wheat that was to enable one to grow 100 bushels of good milling wheat to the acre. That has been done, not once, but many times. In this bill, there is a clause stipulating that before any new variety of cereal or seed shall be put on the market, it shall be tried out either in some experimental plots privately, or under the auspices of some experimental farm and its merits tested out before the owner thereof will be permitted to sell it. While there are advantages in that in the protection of the public, it has disadvantages also. It might have a deterrent and hampering effect on the real plant promoter or breeder. If a gentleman, let us say, like Mr. Seager Wheeler, who is recognized throughout this continent as a plant breeder, thought that his discoveries had to go through two years' experimentation in some other hands than his own, that might have a retarding effect on his investigational work. There are the two sides. I am not married to either of them; but I will invite discussion by the agricultural committee of them, because there is a real grievance there. I do not, however, desire that the remedy shall be worse than the disease, and that is the danger of this amendment.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): Mr. Speaker, it has been called to my attention by the Horticultural Association that it is very desirable that provision should be made for the registration of plants. We all know the great value of registering live stock to enable people, who are desirous of improving their herds and their methods of farming, to purchase such a line of breeders as will be of assistance to them in that regard. In the same way, plant breeding has been advancing of late years to a great extent, and many of our florists and horticulturists have made great reputations by the production of specimens of particular excellence. They desire now to be able to register such plants so as to be sure that those purchasing the plants will be able to obtain the proper strain and also to ensure that they themselves will derive the benefit which is naturally coming to them as a result of their efforts along that line. They strongly protest against anything in this bill which will prevent that. They point out quite clearly how important this registration is, and I sincerely hope that the minister, before the bill reaches its final reading, will give this matter careful attention, with a view, perhaps, of adopting their suggestion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. MANION:

What Civil Service Commissioners signed their names to the recommendation which was followed by Order in Council of June 29, 1922, removing large numbers of employees from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission?

Hon. Mr. COPP: The recommendation which was followed by Order in Council of June 29, 1922, was signed by Mr. Clarence Jameson and Mr. LaRochelle, of the Civil Service Commission.

SEED PURCHASING COMMISSION

Mr. MILLAR:

1. What has been the cost by years of administering the Seed Purchasing Commission during the last five years?

2. What are the names of the members of that commission, and what remuneration has each received for each of the last five years?

3. What services to the state are performed by the commission?

4. What services are rendered by the seed branches of Winnipeg and Calgary?

5. How much of each of the various kinds of grain have been distributed in each of the last five years?

6. What kinds of grain, and how much of each is it proposed the commission shall distribute this calendar year?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. 1918, $28,614.86; 1919, $28,905.52; 1920, $21,553.61; 1921, $9,890.39; 1922, $9,188.92.

	1918	1919	1920	1921	1922
A. E. Wilson.. ..	$3,170	$2,820	$3,040	$2,330	$2,490
J. J. Mulvihill ..	2,344	2,536	2,720	2,800	2,800

(Mr. Wilson is paid at the rate of $10 per day when employed).

3. The commission have purchased, assembled, stored, cleaned and distributed for cash, seed grain that has been inspected and graded according to the established grades for seed, in quantities each year to meet the estimated requirements of provincial and municipal governments, farmers' organizations and individuals in any part of Canada.

4. The district inspection and laboratory staffs, having headquarters at Winnipeg and Calgary, each year determine so far as possible the areas in their respective districts within which the supply of seed for any kind of crop may be deficient or of inferior quality, due to drought, rust, hail, frost, insect pests or other causes; determine or estimate the amount of the shortage for each kind of grain and ascertain the areas from which a supply of good seed grain to meet the requirements may be economically obtained; inspect, test and grade seed grain and other seeds for commerce, including all seeds purchased and sold by the Seed Purchasing Commission; enforce the Seed Control, Feeding Stuffs and Fertilizers' Acts.

	Bushels	Bushels	Bushels	Bushels	Bushels
Wheat	500,620	2,181,445	1,040,270	41,990	37,624
Oats.. ..	2,386,250	1,734,870	1,287,631	113,000	654,500
Barley.. ..	87,645	31,442	17,197	892	4,031
Rye..	.....	11,840	2,769	.....	.....
Corn	10,380	2,519	.....	.....	.....
Peas	3,656	41,376	.....	.....	.....
Beans	1,000	.....	.....	.....	.....

6. The reports received from the inspectional districts would seem to indicate that there does not exist in any part of Canada a seed shortage of a nature sufficiently serious to render activities this year on the part of the Seed Purchasing Commission a matter of necessity. It is known that there is a substantial number of farmers located in east-central Alberta who may have difficulty in securing their requirements of seed grain because of their inability to obtain credit. There is, nevertheless, in adjoining districts plentiful supplies of seed grain, of all kinds, that are being held for sale for seeding purposes by individual farmers, farmers' organizations and seed and grain merchants, a great deal of which seed grain has already been tested and graded for commerce and is available at a cost estimated to be less than the Seed Purchasing Commission would have to charge for the same grain because of having the additional expense of freighting and elevator charges.

EIGHT HOUR DAY

Mr. NEILL:

1. What steps, if any, have been taken by the government towards calling a conference of all the provinces on the eight hour law recommended by Article 427 of the Treaty of Versailles?

2. If any invitation was issued by the federal authorities what was the response from the different provinces?

3. What further action is contemplated by the government towards getting the provinces together on this matter?

Hon. Mr. MURDOCK:

1. The labour principles set out in Article 427 of the Treaty of Versailles, including that which urges the adoption of the eight-hour day or 48-hour week as "the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained," were made a subject of consideration between the federal and provincial governments at the National Industrial Conference which was held in Ottawa in September, 1919. All of the nine provincial governments were also represented at the first session of the International Labour Conference in Washington in October-November, 1919, at which a draft convention was adopted on the subject of the eight-hour day and 48-hour week and submitted to the various countries, including Canada, which comprise the membership of the League of Nations. The views of the provincial representatives on the eight-hour day were also obtained in consultation with the federal delegates in attendance at the Washington conference. The federal government, in connection with the Dominion-provincial conference which was held in Ottawa in September last for consideration of the unemployment situation, proposed that attention should also be given to other industrial and social questions which had been the subject of attention at the International Labour Conference. The obligations assumed by Canada in connection with these matters under the Treaty of Versailles were considered at the conference, and a resolution was adopted expressing the view that the authorities deemed to be respectively competent to deal with the matters in question should give careful and sympathetic attention to the proposals emanating from the international labour body with a view to enacting necessary legislation where this may be found practicable. The resolution also provided that the federal government, on request from a majority of the provincial governments, would summon a special conference for the consideration of International Labour Conference matters when this may be deemed necessary. In conformity with this last-mentioned resolution a letter was addressed by the Prime Minister of Canada to the several provincial premiers on December 22, last, proposing that a federal-provincial conference should assemble in Ottawa in the near future to deal with matters arising out of the relations between the Dominion of Canada and the international labour body and inquiring if the provincial governments desired that a conference for this purpose should be held.

2. The replies of five provinces were favourable to the proposed conference, those of two other provinces were not unfavourable but intimated that these provinces had limited interest in the subject matter. In one case the reply was indefinite, and in another case the reply of the provincial government has not yet come to hand.

3. The suggestion was made in the letter of the federal Prime Minister that the conference should be held in the end of February or early in March. The replies indicated that a meeting in Ottawa at this time would be inconvenient for several of the provincial governments on account of their respective legislatures being in session. After consideration of the replies received, it was decided by the Dominion government that it would be in accord with the desire of most of the provinces that the conference should be held, but that the question of the date should be taken up with the provinces in the spring looking to a meeting in the early part of next summer.

TORONTO SUBURBAN RAILWAY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What legal agreements and options have been made by the Government of Canada from time to time to date for the sale in whole or part of the Toronto Suburban Railway between Guelph and Toronto to the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, and why were these agreements for the whole road not carried out and acted on in view of this road being an inactive asset of the Canadian National?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to enable the city of Toronto to acquire the part in the city limits in accordance with an agreement made between the city and the Toronto Suburban Company validated by the Ontario legislature many years ago by which the city at the expiration of the company's franchise which expired over a year ago, could acquire this road within the city limits by arbitration?

3. Was any agreement prepared for sale of the part within the city limits and on what terms, and is the announcement correct of Mr. Gerald Ruel, Vice-President of the National Railways in a letter to the Board of Control of Toronto in January last that such an agreement existed for sale of part? If so, with whom was it made?

4. Under what terms and conditions of purchase of this road by the Government a few years ago; and its absorption by the National Railways System, can the government sell part and not all of this railway without the consent of the bond holders?

5. Why was the agreement and options legally given for the sale of the whole road to the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario not carried out, and has the policy of the old Board of Directors of the National Railways to dispose of this whole road which never paid, been abandoned by the present directors, in view of a favourable vote of the ratepayers of Toronto to sanction such purchase agreement for the whole road?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. No legal agreement or option was given.

2. The question is not one for the government, but for the management of the Toronto Suburban Railway.

3. No agreement has been prepared for the sale of the lines within the city. The agreement which Mr. Ruel referred to was an operating agreement.

4. The government has not purchased this road. The stock merely was acquired by the Canadian Northern Realties Limited. The question of sale is one for the management of the railways.

5. See answer to No. 1.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

On the motion of Mr. J. S. Woodsworth (Centre Winnipeg.)

That, in the opinion of this House, it is in the interest of world peace that Canada should withdraw all claims on Germany for reparations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am ready to go on with this motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is an important question in which the whole House will be interested. There can, of course, be no objection to my hon. friend going on with it this evening if he so desires, but I would suggest that we adjourn the debate after he has concluded so that we may have a fuller House to discuss the subject on another occasion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like, of course, to have as full a house as possible when the motion is brought up, because it deals with an important question. I do not want to let it go by default, and perhaps it would be better to let it stand until there is a larger house.

Motion stands.

On motion of Mr. Graham, the House adjourned at 9.15 p.m.

Thursday, February 15, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Annual Report of the Editorial Committee for the year 1922—Hon. Mr. Copp.

MESDAMES KENNEDY AND LAFORTUNE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received two letters, one from Mrs. W. C. Kennedy and the other from Madame D. A. Lafortune, thanking the House for its expression of sympathy in their great sorrow. In behalf of the House I acknowledge these communications.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17 respecting the Royal Academy of Arts.

He said: The object of the bill is to grant a public charter to this academy and to bring it under one of the federal departments. It has been in existence for some time but so far has had no official channel of communication with the department. The purpose is to bring it under the purview of one of the ministries. The Department of Public Works is mentioned in the bill, but that is a matter of detail that can be considered and decided upon when the bill is in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SALES TAXES

SIR HENRY DRAYTON:

1. What amount has been collected under the sales tax during the present fiscal year in each city with a population of one hundred thousand or over, down to the 31st of December, 1922?

2. (a) What amount of sales taxes were due and unpaid upon such date and (b) what is the number of taxpayers in arrears ond said date in each of said cities?

3. Have legal proceedings been taken against such taxpayers? If so, in what cities and what is the number of such proceedings in each city?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1. Sales tax collections are recorded by customs and excise ports and not by cities. The collections at city ports, where population is in excess of one hundred thousand each, for the present fiscal year to 31 December, 1922, were as follows:

Montreal, $16,265,019.40; Ottawa, $1,046,811.26; Toronto, $15,996,953.16; Hamilton ,$3,318,522.63; Winnipeg, $3,511,598.66; Vancouver, $2,758,414.11.

2. (a) Information not available. (b) The number of taxpayers in arrears on 31 December, 1922 in each of the said cities: Montreal, 1,058; Ottawa, 38; Toronto, 276; Hamilton, 71; Winnipeg, 152, Vancouver, 221.

3. Yes: Montreal, 169; Ottawa, 12; Toronto, 83;Hamilton 9; Winnipeg, 13; Vancouver, 24.

INCOME TAX

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. What amount of income taxes has been collected during the present fiscal year down to the 31st day of December, 1922?

2. What amount of income taxes was collected during the last passed fiscal year down to the 31st day of December, 1921?

3. What amount of income taxes has been collected during the present fiscal year down to December 31, 1922, by each of the different offices?

4. What amount of income taxes has been collected during the fiscal year last past down to December 31, 1921, by each of the different offices?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

1. $55,517,222.02.

2. $72,517,814.77.

3. Halifax, $1,517,505.96; St. John, $922,425.89; Quebec, $1,953,853.75; Montreal, $18,195,749.82; Ottawa, $2,655,577.23; Kingston, $523,374.59; Toronto, $11,742,770.71; Hamilton, $3,693,159.12; London, $3,686,784.92; Belleville, $250,784.65; Fort William, $262,996.14; Winnipeg, $4,019,399.64; Regina, $1,217,009.04; Prince Albert, $104,143.93; Calgary, $1,477,994.05; Vancouver, $3,255,525.40; Dawson, $38,167.18.—Total $55,517,222.02.

4. Halifax, $1,664,504.78; St. John, $1,338,395.70; Quebec, $3,227,560.37; Montreal, $19,149,250.82; Ottawa, $4,035,053.52; Kingston, $1,158,667.29; Toronto, $15,517,891.37; Hamilton, $5,648,794.90; London, $4,954,217.39; Belleville, $377,371.17; Fort William, $597,594.98; Winnipeg, $5,754,174.24; Regina, $1,890,685.33; Prince Albert, $208,855.61; Calgary, $2,253,263.35; Vancouver, $4,705,494.50; Dawson, $36,039.45.—Total, $72,517,814.77.

DIRECT TAXATON RESULTS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. What percentage of the receipts of the present fiscal year, down to December 31, 1922, has been raised by direct taxation?

2. What percentage of the receipts of the last passed fiscal year, down to December 31, 1921, was raised by direct taxation?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

1. 24 per cent.
2. 32 per cent.

STAMPS ON CHEQUES

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. Have any rulings been made for the direction of the public or the banks as to affixing stamps on cheques under the legislation of last session? If so, what ruling or rulings?
2. What are the penalties for failure to affix stamps, or sufficient stamps on the cheques?
3. Have any proceedings been taken in respect of such breaches?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1. No, as far as the Department of Customs and Excise is concerned.
2. As provided by Special War Revenue Act, 1915, part 3, and amendments thereto.
3. Yes.

NEW BRUNSWICK REPRESENTATION ON RAILWAY BOARD

Mr. MacLAREN:

Is it the intention of the government to add to the new Canadian National Railway Board a representative from New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

After consultation with the president of the Canadian National Railways, it was decided to begin operations with a comparatively small board representative of districts rather than of provinces. Should experience indicate the necessity for further additions, within the limits of the act, the government will not hesitate to make these additions.

D.S.C.R. HOSPITALS

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

1. What was the cost per patient in different D.S.C.R. hospitals in Canada for year 1922?
2. What was the per capita maintenance for same institutions for 1921?
3. What was the strength of the staffs of these hospitals at the beginning of the year 1922, and also at the close of the year 1922?

Hon. Mr. BELAND:

1. During the period from April 1, 1922 to December 31, 1922, the average cost per patient per day was $3.31.

2. From April 1, 1921 to March 31, 1922, the average cost per patient per day in the different D.S.C.R. hospitals was $3.29.

3. On January 1, 1922, staff employed in the D.S.C.R. hospitals numbered 1,751, and on January 1, 1923, 1,502.

RECEIPT STAMPS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. What rulings have been made with reference to the affixing of stamps on receipts as required by legislation of last session? What receipts are exempt from the tax?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

2. Does the use of forms or printed letters enable the tax to be avoided?
3. Does the usual course of mailing receipts obviate the necessity of stamping them?
4. Has a complete list been compiled showing the different manners in which the affixing of stamps to receipts may be avoided?
5. Under what conditions must the stamp be affixed?
6. What is the penalty for the omission to affix the stamp?
7. Have any proceedings been taken to enforce such penalties?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1. Counter sales slips and cash register tickets are not taxable, provided no words implying or stating acknowledgement of the receipt or the payment of money appear thereon.

Pay-rolls,—signature of employee thereon being receipt for wages,—taxable, in respect of each such signature.

Receipts for payment of legacies are taxable. A receipt for money in a deed or mortgage is taxable.

Receipts for payment of taxes, except those given to, or by, the Dominion Government or Provincial Government, are taxable.

Individual freight bills and periodical statements of same, acknowledging receipt of payment, are taxable.

Customs house brokers' receipts are taxable.

Letters forwarded by mail, also postcards, acknowledging the payment of money, are regarded as letters and cards and not subject to this tax.

All insurance policies, whether fire, life, marine or casualty, wherein the payment of money is acknowledged are taxable.

All insurance receipts, acknowledging the payment of money, are taxable.

Receipts drawn out of Canada, but not valid until countersigned, in Canada, are taxable.

Voucher cheques and cheques with receipts endorsed thereon, when drawn upon or addressed to a bank, are not taxable as receipts.

Remitters counterfoil, being part of a taxable express money order, is not taxable as a receipt.

Employers may, if they so desire, affix a stamp or stamps to the Pay Roll for the amount of the total tax payable in respect of the receipts therein given, and they may cancel same by the method prescribed in the Act.

No stamp duty is required on a mailed post card acknowledging a remittance as such post card bears on the reverse side thereof, evidence that such card has already been taxed under Section 13 (5) of the Special War Revenue Act, there being required thereon the tax of 1 cent in addition to the postage payable.

A mailed form letter, which by the method of folding has the address placed thereon without the use of an envelope, requires no stamp duty for the same reason as in the case of a post card.

A form letter, mailed in an envelope, acknowledging payment of $10 or over, requires a two-cent stamp affixed thereto because it has thereon no evidence that any other tax has been paid under the Special War Revenue Act.

2. & 3. Answered by No. 1.

5. Conditions as provided by the Act.

6. Penalties as provided by the Act.

7. Yes.

MINISTERS' AND OFFICIALS' TRAVELS

Mr. STANSELL:

1. What Ministers of the Crown have been absent from Canada since the close of last session?

2. What were the several tours taken by each minister so absent, and what was the object of each trip?

3. What were the names of those who, at public expense, accompanied each minister, and what was the purpose?

4. What officials of the various departments have been out of Canada since the last session and for what purpose in each case?

5. What were the several tours taken by each official so absent, and what was the object of each trip?

6. What has been the cost to Canada of such trips by ministers and officials, and those who accompanied them?

7. What has been the cost to the Dominion of the various trips made by ministers and persons who accompanied them since the last session of parliament: (a) within Canada; (b) out of Canada?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: I would ask the hon. gentleman to kindly renew his question in the form of a motion, when it can be better considered.

MATT C. BECKETT

Mr. DUNCAN:

1. Was Matt C. Beckett, of Owen Sound, Ont., appointed Customs and Excise Preventive Officer for Grey county?

2. If so, when was such appointment made?

3. Was the said Beckett subsequently dismissed?

4. If so, for what cause?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1 and 2. Mr. Matt C. Beckett, of Owen Sound, Ont., was authorized to act as a Customs-Excise Enforcement officer, without salary, and with power to make seizures for infractions of the excise laws, by letter dated 16th March, 1922, such authority to terminate at any time at the discretion of the hon. the minister.

3 and 4. Authority for Mr. Beckett's employment was withdrawn by letter dated April 24, 1922.

GRAND TRUNK ELECTRIFICATION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to a telegram sent to the Hamilton Board of Trade by Sir Henry Thornton, President of the National Railways, dated December, 1922, stating that the Grand Trunk would be immediately electrified between Toronto, Hamilton and Niagara Falls and the border?

2. Have plans been prepared, and what will the cost of this work be, and what amount of money will be required to be furnished by parliament for this project, and why were the government and parliament not consulted before such a declaration of policy involving an expenditure of millions?

3. Is it the intention of the government to electrify the National System in other parts of Canada as well?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The President of the Canadian National Railway system has given no assurance to the effect that the Grand Trunk would be immediately electrified within the territory contemplated by the question. An assurance was given, however, that the Canadian National Railways would at once undertake an investigation of the whole position, to see to what extent it was necessary to improve transportation facilities to meet the requirements of the public; and that as soon as such investigation was completed the public might anticipate immediate relief.

2. The investigation referred to is under way, but has not yet been completed.

3. The Canadian National management will consider the electrification, from time to time, of such parts of the system as can be electrified economically and in the interests of the public.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY LAND

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. What is the total number of acres of land sold as authorized by Statute of 1908 for the purpose of Hudson Bay railway construction?

2. What is the total amount for which this land has been sold?

3. How many acres of land are still held in western Canada on account of the above legislation?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. There was no specific authority under the Dominion Lands Act, 1908, for the sale of land for the purpose of Hudson Bay railway construction, but pre-emptions and purchased homesteads were sold under the provisions of the said act as follows:—

2. Total acreage of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads sold under the statute of 1908,—8,050,720 acres approximate. Total amount for which pre-emptions and purchased homesteads have been sold $24,152,160, approximate.

3. Total acreage of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads held as entries not having been paid for in full 2,500,000 acres, approximate.

FORT CHURCHILL TOWNSITE

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. Has any land or lands in Fort Churchill townsite been sold to any private party or interests?

2. If so, what are the names of the parties, and the extent of the holdings of every person or interest in the townsite?

Hon. Mr. STEWART: Lands in the townsite of Fort Churchill disposed of by sale:

East Peninsula: Block 30, lots 9 and 10, and block 31, lots 11 and 12 sold to Wm. Beech, approximate area 1.2 acres. All of blocks 440, 441, 442, 456, 457, 458, 511, 512, 513, 530, 531, 532, 585, 586, 587, sold to Carl Emerson Beech, approximate area, 44.5 acres.

Lands finally disposed of otherwise than by sale:

East Peninsula: All of blocks 432 to 439 inclusive; 459 to 466 inclusive; 503 to 510 inclusive; 533 to 540 inclusive; 577 to 584 inclusive, homestead of Wm. Beech, approximate area, 118.4 acres. All of blocks 443, 444, 452, to 455 inclusive; 514 to 517, inclusive; 527 to 529 inclusive; 588 to 590 inclusive, special grant to Carl Emerson Beech, approximate area, 44.5 acres. A parcel of land containing 12.63 acres, more or less, on the east shore of the West Peninsula patented on the 7th June 1913, to the Hudson's Bay Company (under deed of surrender), approximate area, 12.63 acres.

Lands in the townsite of Fort Churchill held under lease:

East Peninsula: Block 10A., lot 14; block10, lots 5, 6, 7, 8, leased to the Hudson's Bay Company, approximate area, 0.6 acres.

West Peninsula: Block E, lots 7, 8 and 9; block F, lots 1, 2, 3 and 4, leased to the Hudson's Bay Company, approximate area, 1.0 acres.

TRADE REPRESENTATIVES

Miss MACPHAIL:

1. How many Consuls and Commercial Agents has the United States resident in Canada?

2. How many Consuls and Commercial Agents has Canada in the United States?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to appoint enough Commercial Agents in the United States to adequately take care of Canadian trade interests and foster Canadian trade?

4. If not, why?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. There are ninety-one consular representatives of the United States in Canada. So far as the government is informed there are no officials of the United States resident in Canada designated as commercial agents.

2. Canada has no foreign consular representation distinct from Great Britain. The Department of Trade and Commerce has no commercial agents in the United States. It has, however, one trade commissioner's office in New York City.

3 and 4. The question of appointing trade commissioners in the United States has been considered at various times. Up to the present, owing to the proximity of the two countries and the cost of maintaining trade commissioners, appointments have been confined to foreign countries whence commercial information is not so accessible to Canadian exporters.

Miss MACPHAIL:

1. In view of the fact that a large volume of trade is done between Canada and the United Kingdom, what steps has the government taken to appoint representatives in Great Britain to foster and encourage Anglo-Canadian commerce?

2. What officials with technical knowledge of Canadian trade are attached to the High Commissioner's office in London?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The Department of Trade and Commerce have established officers and trade commissioners in the United Kingdom as follows: London, Manchester, Liverpool, Bristol, Glasgow. The trade commissioners and their assistants foster and encourage Anglo-Canadian commerce.

2. On the staff of the High Commissioner there are two officers with long association with Canadian trade who are able to deal effectively with any commercial inquiries received. There is also attached to the office a special customs investigation officer. The Dominion trade commissioner in London and trade commissioners throughout the United Kingdom are also in immediate association and close touch with the High Commissioner's office.

SIR HENRY THORNTON

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Did the government of Canada in October, 1922, enter into a contract with Sir Henry Thornton by which the government agreed that Sir Henry Thornton would be appointed President and General Manager of the Canadian National Railway Company, and by which contract the salary of Sir Henry Thornton was fixed, and other terms and conditions imposed?

2. If so, did the government have any authority from parliament for making such contract, and in what section of what statute is that authority?

3. What authority in law exists or existed for the government of Canada to enter into any such contract for a fixed term?

4. If the government had no authority from parliament for the contract made with Sir Henry Thornton, why did the government make such contract?

5. If the government was of opinion that a contract of the nature made with Sir Henry Thornton was necessary, and if there was not authority in law to make it, why was parliament not asked at last session to grant such authority by statute in the usual way?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. None.
4. It was deemed in the public interest to definitely secure the services of Sir Henry Thornton, and, as the Board of Directors had not been previously appointed, the government decided to make an arrangement with him and rely on the board ratifying it, as has been done.
5. The circumstances under which it became advisable to execute this contract were not contemplated during last session of parliament.

LOUIS LEBLANC

Mr. HANSON:

1. Was the position of light-house keeper at Carleton Point, Quebec, held by Louis LeBlanc prior to November 15th, 1922?
2. Was the said Louis LeBlanc dismissed from the service?
3. If so, why?
4. Were any charges laid against the said Louis LeBlanc?
5. If so, was an official inquiry held, was the said Louis LeBlanc brought before an official tribunal and what were the findings of the official tribunal, if any?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Political partisanship.
4. Yes.
5. No.

CONSUMPTION OF INTOXICANTS

Mr. EVANS:

1. What was the per capita consumption and per capita expenditure of all intoxicating beverages generally in Canada during the years 1914, 1920, 1921 and 1922, on the basis of the excise returns?
2. What were the figures by provinces?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

1. Per capita consumption of domestic beer and spirits based on excise returns during the fiscal years mentioned.

Fiscal year	Beer Gals.	Spirits Proof Gals.
1914	6.942	0.590
1920	4.096	0.424
1921	3.945	0.313
1922	4.389	0.204

Per capita expenditure not available from excise returns as these returns show quantities of beer and spirits, and not values.

2. Information not available for the same reason. Beer and spirits upon which excise duties are paid in one province are not all consumed in such province.

SALES TAX COLLECTION

Mr. JOHNSON (Moose Jaw):

1. What were the sales tax collections, by months, during the calendar year 1922?
2. What were the collections on domestic sales, and imports, respectively?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

Period 1922	Domestic	Importations	Total
January	$4,280,908 70	$1,330,333 10	$5,611,241 80

October	6,692,070 84	2,533,984 44	9,226,055 28
November	6,213,902 40	2,663,118 62	8,877,021 02
December	6,113,319 02	2,471,639 60	8,584,958 62
	$56,202,479 58	$25,119,450 96	$81,321,930 54

IRREDUCIBLE MINIMUM OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. MARTELL:

1. Was a conference ever held between representatives of the various provincial governments of the provinces of Canada and the federal government of Canada, between the years 1912 and 1922, with a view to securing for the four original provinces of confederation an irreducible minimum of representatives in the Canadian House of Commons?
2. If so, what was the result of said conference?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. There is no record in any of the government departments of any such conference having been held.
2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

OFFICIALS ATTENDING FAIRS

Mr. LEADER:

1. How many officials of the Department of Agriculture attended fairs during the nine months ending December 31, 1922, and what duties did they fulfil?
2. What was the total expense incurred by such officials?

CIVIL SERVANTS—POLITICAL PARTISANSHIP

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (Oxford South): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a despatch which appeared in the press on the 13th instant, and which I think is of public interest as relating to public affairs. This is the despatch:

Toronto, Feb. 13.—Charges of political partisanship against certain employees of the Dominion government in Ontario are to be proved.

I believe that must be a misprint for "probed."

Mr. COPP: There should be no trouble to prove it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The report continues:

Thomas R. Mayberry, of Ingersoll, Ont., has been appointed as commissioner to conduct the investigation. His appointment has been officially gazetted.

I would ask if the substance of this despatch is correct, as the commissioner happens to be a resident of my constituency. Might I also ask, who are the officials against whom the charges have been preferred; and if one, Duncan Marshall, an official of the government who delivered an address at a political gathering in my riding in June last, is among those so charged?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the practice the government has adopted with respect to any charges of political partisanship against members of the civil service has been to proceed very guardedly, taking care to see that the charge is proved in a manner to which no exception can be taken, before permitting dismissal of the person offending. In that connection the government has followed the precedent adopted by previous governments of appointing commissioners to investigate such charges where there appear to be substantial reasons for believing that they are well founded. I believe Colonel Mayberry has been appointed a commissioner to investigate some charges of political partisanship. Who are the parties concerned I am unable to say at the moment, but I can probably get that information for my hon. friend. He mentions one name that I do not recall as being among the number affected.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the Prime Minister will explain why there is such a multitude of exceptions to the rule which he says has been adopted, and why so many have been dismissed without any charges being preferred against them to their knowledge, and without any pretence of investigation.

Mr. BUREAU: There are precedents by the thousand.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In some cases charges have been preferred against certain officials by hon. members of this House. Where an hon. member has been prepared to state to the House that of his own knowledge an offence contravening the provisions of the Civil Service Act respecting political partisanship has been committed, the government has acted under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, which provide that a civil servant guilty of political partisanship shall not be retained in the service. I think that list will cover any of the dismissals to which my right hon. friend has referred.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume that that list would cover practically every case, because the statement from any member that a man has been guilty of political partisanship is not very hard to secure from a partisan supporter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say a statement from any member. I said a statement from an hon. member of this House that of his own knowledge a civil servant had been guilty of a certain offence which was in the opinion of the government sufficient to warrant his dismissal under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That of course will apply in future to members of the House on all sides?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Undoubtedly. It always has.

Mr. BUREAU: I make an exception in regard to the Customs department. I will not take any notorious recommendations.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Resign!

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BUREAU: Say out loud what you want to do. Don't do it behind closed doors.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The Chairman of the meeting, who is a member of the Liberal executive of the province of Ontario stated that the party referred to by me was asked by Premier King to appear and address this Liberal picnic on his behalf.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no recollection of having asked anyone to appear at a picnic, and I do not think I did. But I would say to my hon. friend that in regard to any matter deserving discussion here it is well not to base his information entirely on a press report.

STEEL STRIKE AT SYDNEY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): In the press of yesterday there appeared a despatch with regard to a steel strike at Sydney. I have information from the men that they applied for a board some weeks ago and were refused; that their members are being discriminated against because of their protest against a wage rate of 28 cents per hour, and that yesterday their active members were dismissed, the result being a spontaneous walk-out of workmen. Three thousand men are affected by this strike. Is it proposed that this board shall be granted? What further information can the government give us with regard to this industrial dispute?

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Some four weeks ago the first information the Labour department had of a possible strike in the steel works at Sydney was in a newspaper item stating that a board was to be asked for to investigate the question of the adoption of the eight-hour day, the check-off system, and an increase of 15 per cent in wages. The article stated that as the steel industry was not a public utility under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, a board would probably be denied by the Labour department. On the 31st day of January application for a board was made; it came to the Labour department on the third day of February. The workmen were advised at once that their application had been received and that we would ascertain from the officers of the British Empire Steel Corporation if they would be parties to the formation of a board. Yesterday the answer of the companies was received. It indicated the company would be unwilling to submit the question of the eight-hour day in the steel industry, to a board for investigation, as that matter had been dealt with in 1920 by a board, which unanimously indicated the belief that it would be impracticable to adopt an eight-hour day in the steel industry. The companies also stated that they would be unwilling to submit the question of the check-off system—which, in substance, means that the company would be required to collect the union dues of all workmen engaged in the steel plant—to a board, and that it would be inadvisable to submit to a board the question of an increase in wages, in view of the low price of steel products and the inability of the company, as it was stated, to make a profit instead of losses, wage increases were not possible. That information has been to-day conveyed to those who are now strikers at Sydney.

The information given the Labour department in regard to the actual strike is this: The day before yesterday an employee there, who thought he should be, for the time being, on account of the illness of a foreman, placed in the position of that foreman—threw some belts onto an idler, or in some other way interfered with the proper operation of the plant, and was promptly discharged therefor. The workers' union took the matter up and insisted on his immediate reinstatement, and when that was not granted they brought on a strike. The information received to-day is that the strike situation is serious indeed and that every effort is being made so to handicap the steel industry at Sydney as to cause—if they are successful in their undertakings—irreparable damage to the steel plant. I may say that is all the result of a campaign undertaken during the past few weeks in Sydney. For instance, I hold in my hand a newspaper containing a full-page advertisement; it is dated February third, but there were others in advance of this one. The advertisement reads:

> Wanted!
> 1,000 Steel Workers
> Who Have Courage
> Not Fear
> Who are Men, not Scabs
> Who will demand
> An Eight Hour Day,
> 15 per cent increase of Wages
> Recognition of the Union
> And Put it Through and Win a Victory
> Are you with us, or Against Us?

The strike appears to be a part of the campaign of the Workers' Party of Canada, which to all intents and purposes is the same as the Communist Party, or the party in control of affairs, it is said, in Russia at the present time. That is the cause of the trouble as it has developed, and I may say that we have to-day advised the strikers at Sydney that they should not interfere with the protection and maintainance of the plant to the extent of causing great damage to the property of the Steel Company. That is the situation, briefly, existing for the past few days.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I hope the hon. member does not rise to reply.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish just to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has already put a question, but if his further question will be brief, he may ask it, by leave of the House.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The question is whether the government are making any provision to protect the men from being worked twelve hours a day, and twenty-four hours every alternate Sunday?

Mr. MURDOCK: The wage rates are by the hour, I understand, the day has been one of twelve hours, generally speaking, some days thirteen hours.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With twenty-four hours every other Sunday.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not sure as to that.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—
EMPLOYEES' PENSIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (Calgary West): May I be permitted to ask the government if it has under consideration any pension scheme to be applied to the employees of the Canadian National Railway, and if not at the present time, do they contemplate taking the matter under advisement shortly?

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways): That is a pretty large question to answer without any notice having been given. The Grand Trunk has a superannuation scheme. The Intercolonial has what is called a provident fund, which is a similar scheme. Just what the Canadian Northern had I am not able to say—perhaps nothing. But the question of having some kind of fund established is under consideration. I cannot give any particulars with regard to it.

PENSIONS COMMITTEE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): May I ask the government if it is their intention to reconstitute the pensions committee of last year? This committee did excellent work and made a number of recommendations which became law; but I am prepared to prove that the government officials, the Pension Board, whose duty it was to carry out these recommendations, have in some cases deliberately ignored them, and in others deliberately evaded them. I know nobody to whom I can bring the matter except this pensions committee which did such good work last year.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): It is not the intention of the government to appoint a special committee on pensions and re-establishment similar to the one that was appointed at the last session. The main reason is that a royal commission was appointed during the recess to investigate problems affecting the returned soldiers. This commission is now at work and its report should be submitted before the end of the session, when proper steps will be taken to carry out its recommendations.

EMPIRE SETTLEMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): I should like to direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Immigration to an article which appeared in yesterday morning's press, from the London Times, in which the Times was somewhat critical of Canada for not having taken more advantage of the Empire Settlement Act, and pointed out that Australia and New Zealand were getting great advantage out of it. Will the minister be ready, shortly, to tell the House what move has been made by Canada to take advantage of the money which has been granted by the British government for this purpose?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Immigration): It is the intention of the government at this session to ask for some money for the purpose of taking advantage of some of the schemes promoted by the Empire Settlement Board.

THE MARKETING OF GRAIN
MOTION BY MR. MILLAR FOR A COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle) moved:

Whereas the conditions under which Canada, and particularlly Western Canada, markets its grain are matters on which the prosperity of all Canada in large measure depends; and

Whereas there is a widespread and insistent demand in all the principal grain producing provinces of Canada for an improved system of marketing said grain; and

Whereas there is at present a great diversity of opinion concerning the weakness and abuse of our present system and also as to what system if adopted would prove most satisfactory for the future.

Therefore be it Resolved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that this government should create a commission for the purpose of making inquiry into the grain trade, whose findings might serve as a basis for improvement of present legislation relative thereto or for the creation in the immediate future of some permanent solution of the grain marketing problem.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I realize in rising to make this motion that I am dealing with a matter of very great importance. First, let me say a few words in regard to the demand for a grain inquiry. There has been a persistent demand for it for some years, and committees have been appointed from time to time to try and find some better methods for marketing our grain, though it is true that a great many are under the impression that the present method, so far as its physical features are concerned, is as good as it is possible to get. During the last few months the farmers have met in convention in the cities of Brandon and Saskatoon and passed resolutions in favour of a grain inquiry.

I should like to deal with a few matters in respect to which there is a general impression that there is a grievance, particularly on the part of the producer, but first a few words in regard to the methods by which we have advanced during the last twenty years. Many sitting in this House, and on this side particularly will remember the time when the conditions under which we marketed our grain were intolerable. I need not dwell on that; I merely wish to remind the House that it was a fact. Several times during the last two decades inquiries have been made, and I can think of no instance in which a thorough inquiry was made where it was not followed by legislation that has been of very great benefit to the producers and to the country as a whole. Commissions have been appointed in the province of Saskatchewan, and after one of these had completed its work and handed in its report, legislation was adopted providing for the creation of the Co-operative Elevator Company. I should like to contrast that procedure with the experience of the Manitoba government, which tried to apply legislative measures without first holding an inquiry. The question before them both was that of the government's owning and operating country elevators. In Saskatchewan, where they took the wise course of making an inquiry and careful investigation first, they have succeeded admirably, but in Manitoba, where they proceeded to apply legislative remedies without first holding an inquiry, they failed dismally. That is so well known that I need not dwell upon it. In the year 1906 a commission was appointed and made a thorough investigation into the grain trade, and as a result of its inquiry proposed twenty-six changes. Twenty-four of these were accepted and approved and became part of the present Grain Act.

Some have asked, what results have followed these inquiries by commissions, and seem to be under the impression that an inquiry usually starts with nothing and ends with nothing. I have not time to dwell on all the improvements that have followed this particular investigation, but let me mention only two which I think are well worthy of the consideration of the House. In the year 1907 and prior to that time, in the grain that was passing from Fort William to the transfer elevators, there was an annual loss of 50,000 bushels. That had been going on for years. The lake carriers, when asked why they did not watch the scales to see they were not beaten out of their weights simply remarked, "The more you watch the elevator people the more they take from you, and we simply take our loss and add it to the cost of carrying.' The point I wish to make is this: After the remedial legislation recommended by the commission was applied, you will find if you look up the figures that after 1908 instead of there being a loss, the weights on the transfer elevators and at Fort William agreed very, very closely; in fact, there was practically no loss; and that has continued, I believe, up to the present time. I would ask if that is not a very definite and substantial benefit?—and it resulted from simply one suggestion from the grain commission.

Let me mention another. At that time it appeared as though there were abuses on the part of terminal elevators. It was very difficult to find out exactly what was taking place, but recommendations were made to remedy the abuses if they existed, and in the following year, 1909, or possibly 1910, several of the managers of the terminal elevators were prosecuted by the warehouse commission and fined $500 each on some five or six charges. That was another practical and helpful work of legislation resulting from a recommendation by one commission only. I pass on.

Some have raised this objection, that we expect that steps will be taken to create a wheat board. I am in sympathy with that idea; in fact, I propose to urge the creation of a wheat board. But the faults of which I am going to speak nearly all existed under the wheat board of 1919, and I cannot see that they would not continue to exist under a new wheat board. What are they? The spread in the country elevator between the track price and the street price is very great. Now I would like it to be understood that the amount of grain handled in the country elevators is so small that they cannot make both ends meet—that is, the country elevators by themselves, receiving only the handling charges, are not paying propositions. And it is alleged—I will not say the allegations are all true—and our people generally believe, that a large part of this loss is made up by taking a too heavy toll from the man who is compelled to sell his grain on the street. That man has not a carload, therefore he is at the mercy of the elevator. That is one allegation that is made and one which, I think, should be investigated by this inquiry board.

Another matter is this. An organization of grain buyers in the West are making very serious charges against the grain trade. I do not assume the responsibility for their statements, I do not know that the charges are all true; but they are very serious in character. They claim that those who employ them, the firms in Winnipeg, are using very strong pressure, amounting to intimidation and even threats, in order to induce them to take a greater toll from the farmers than they have any right to do. They are bonded to become good—that is what it practically amounts to—for any shortage. Their contention is that though they have purchased grain for a firm for many years they are not permitted by the firms for whom they purchase to know the outturns of the cars as they go to Fort William. The grain firms follow this practice: If a buyer writes to Fort William and asks for the outturns of its cars they are at once notified by the chief weighmaster and the grain firms thwart the buyers. This is their contention. The grain firms rather reproach the buyers when they ask for these outturns. They tell them, "We would supply them to you if you ask for them"; but the buyers allege that they have not been able to get these statements in a satisfactory manner from the firms who employ them. They are kept in the dark as to whether they are going to be short or not, and at the same time they are bonded to become responsible for any shortage. This keeps them in the position where they are constantly striving to get all the grain they can lest there should be a shortage for which they would be held responsible.

The buyers also allege that the bonding firms are in collusion with the grain firms to intimidate them and keep them in subjection; giving them anything but a square deal. Now it may be that they have tried to have these matters investigated by the Board of Grain Commissioners, and it may be that there is not much foundation for their charges, but it seems to me it is only fair that some regard should be paid to the wishes of a body of men—I do not suppose all are members of this organization—whose membership runs into many hundreds. They are the men to whom we must sell our grain, it must pass through their hands before it goes on to Fort William, and it seems to me that in view of the fact that they have been making these charges openly—in a little pamphlet they have issued, on the platform, and in every conceivable way they can get the charges before the public—it seems to me only reasonable that opportunity should be given to prove whether these charges are true or false.

Since this resolution was placed on the order paper, a select committee of this House has been appointed, and it may be the opinion of some that this committee could successfully inquire into all these matters. I would submit, however, that the charges I have just mentioned could not possibly be inquired into by this committee, for the reason that the organization referred to would probably make charges against a dozen, possibly two dozen, grain firms in the city of Winnipeg. It would be unfair to allow such charges to be preferred without giving the grain firms the oportunity of defending themselves. That would mean summoning witnesses by the score, it would mean occupying a great length of time, and it would be a very expensive process, because many of these witnesses live out in the country and probably would not be in a position to leave their work and spend a week or ten days in the city of Ottawa. Moreover the programme allotted to the select committee in question is so large and comprehensive that no committee, in the given time, could possibly cover one-quarter of the work laid out for it. That is quite evident and I need not labour the point. We all know how long it took the Committee on Agriculture to deal with the wheat board question last session—it occupied somewhere about three months' time. Now the work laid out for this select committee will probably cover four or five times as much ground. In that event, how is it possible for the committee to do justice to more than a very small part of the programme referred to it?

It has also been urged that the present Board of Grain Commissioners have the power, and it is their duty, to investigate these charges—that if anything wrong has occurred it is within the jurisdiction of the grain commission to investigate it. Let me point out the position in which the grain commissioners would find themselves if that course were pursued. Suppose a charge of injustice or irregularity in connection with a terminal elevator, or a country elevator for that matter, were made. These institutions are run under regulations laid down by the Board of Grain Commissioners, and the commissioners would be in the position of sitting in judgment of their own acts. Therefore, I submit, the Board of Grain Commissioners are not the proper authorities to investigate these charges. Furthermore I am going to ask, among other things, that some changes be made in the Grain Act. Now I cannot conceive that the board would seriously regard it as a part of their duty to submit such changes in the Grain Act, although they might. I think they have known in the past that charges of injustice in connection with the inspection of grain have been made, and yet no recommendation, so far as I know, has come from that board. I had occasion to write to the grain commission some little time ago when the grain firms were following this course in connection with cheques issued for purchases of grain: They sent cheques to the farmers for the cars they had purchased and put the necessary stamps on the cheques all right, but they charged the farmers for the stamps. I wrote to the grain commission and pointed out that fact, but they took the stand that the matter was not within their jurisdiction. Now, if they regard little matters of that nature as not being within their jurisdiction, and if complaints have been made and have failed of investigation by the commission and no remedies are forthcoming, what is the use of going on year after year and waiting for a remedy which fails to appear? We cannot get a remedy for the difficulties which exist and yet plenty of time has been allowed to provide a remedy. Under the circumstances the time has come to adopt a better means of securing redress.

I have touched on the matter of the inspection of grain. Let me deal a little more in detail with that point. At the present time it is believed—it is not my opinion only but it is the general belief—by the producers of grain that they are not securing a just return for wheat of a certain nature. The wheat that I refer to is of this character: grain that has been damaged slightly, or at least slightly discoloured by rain. Nothing but the milling test will determine whether the grain has been damaged. Much of that grain is being graded as No. 3 Northern. Milling tests have been made again and again. A firm in Minneapolis made one test some years ago; our provincial governments have made tests; tests have been made in the city of Winnipeg; and in all cases it has been found that many of those samples of grain from No. 3 Northern, of the kind of which I speak, have proved to be equal in milling value to our very best No. 1. Northern. That has been proved beyond a doubt. The difficulty is how to classify this grain so that it shall be sold for its proper value. Some years ago a suggestion was made from the grain trade, and for a time was backed up by a few farmers, in favour of creating a sample market, in order that this grain might be sold on sample. In a very short time, the farmers, looking into the matter, began to see that it was not in their interest. It simply meant that the best of each grade, the choice cars, would be picked out, and the poor cars would be allowed to go forward, and would be the basis of the price fixed on the Liverpool market. It would be a skimming off of the cream, and allowing the skimmed milk to go forward. The farmers at once commenced opposition to the creation of a sample market. That opposition has continued up to the present time, notwithstanding the fact that the sample market was created some years ago. Let me point out to hon. members that although that sample market has been in existence for some years, very few bushels, if any, have ever passed over the sample market, but with the sample market went the mixing privileges —an excuse and a reason for the existence of the mixing elevator. I think I am not unfair or unjust when I say that those who asked for the sample market did not want the sample market, but wanted the mixing privileges. I am not prepared to say definitely how that grain can be classified. I will add a little more to the class I have just spoken of: It is not only grain that has been slightly bleached by being wet, but also grain that has been slightly frosted. There is in some years a considerable quantity of grain of that nature, and the farmers who raised it are selling it sometimes for fifteen and sixteen cents a bushel less than No. 1 Northern, whereas, it has been proved beyond a doubt that it is of as much value and as good milling wheat as No. 1 Northern. That, I claim, is a very great injustice, and I believe a change should be made in the Inspection Act, but I am not prepared to say just what it should be. If I could tell you exactly how that could be remedied, I do not know that there would be very much reason why a grain commission should investigate it. That is a matter which could and should be dealt with by a select committee, although I have pointed out some matters that could not be dealt with by them.

There is another evil to which I will refer. I suppose some of you would find it hard to believe, but there has been a practice in the past of substituting cars. Cars that 4 p.m. are near the top of the grade are of excellent quality, and those mixing elevators would want them very much, though by some mysterious method the cars have been selected from the general flow of grain and have been sent to the mixing elevators, and cars of poorer quality have been put in their places. This, at one time, was carried on on a very large scale. There is a very great injustice. As I have pointed out—and I think I shall repeat because I want hon. members to appreciate the point—the price that the farmer receives for his grain is based on the kind of grain and on the value of the grain as it arrives in the Old Country market, and when the grain is deteriorated, damaged in any way, and the value taken out of it, then the price is less, and the farmer must suffer the loss. Sometimes, when a commission of inquiry engages in this work it will find evils of which nothing was known previously. I remember one remarkable case of this sort—it is quite possible that something of that nature might be discovered, if a board of inquiry were appointed at the present time. Investigation took place in Minneapolis some year or more ago, in which it was found that scalping played a very large part. That is, a grain firm would buy from a farmer and they would transfer to another grain firm. Sometimes, it would be a legitimate transaction and sometimes it would not. In some cases, carloads of grain were sold five or six or seven or eight times, and the spread between the first and second selling price was sometimes thirty and forty cents a bushel. Now as a great many grain firms that are doing business in Minneapolis are also doing business in Fort William, the relations between the two exchanges are very close, and the practice followed in the two exchanges is very much alike. I have no knowledge that the evil practice of scalping is carried on on a large scale, or to any great extent, in Fort William, or rather in Winnipeg, but the fact is that it is a growing evil, and as the commission denounced it roundly in Minneapolis, it would seem to me to be a question that the board of inquiry might investigate carefully.

Let me touch very briefly on a matter I think of considerable importance. Under the wheat board, I think it is common knowledge among farmers that the spread between No. 1 Northern and No. 3 Northern is seven cents—it stood at seven cents during the whole season. Wheat, you will notice, was nearly $3 a bushel. Now, mark you, after the wheat board ceased operations and the price of wheat dropped to about $1.50 a bushel, the spread, instead of being one half of seven cents, was doubled; instead of being 3½ cents, the spread increased to fourteen cents and in some cases to fifteen cents. It does not matter very much to a man who is growing No. 3 Northern wheat if the price of No. 1 Hard or No. 1 Northern is good, so long as he has not that kind of wheat, but what is a serious matter to him is the fact, if he has No. 3 Northern wheat, that the spread between No. 1 Northern and No. 3 Northern is sixteen cents, and it brings him a very small price, indeed. Can anyone well explain that? Is it not worthy of some investigation by a board of inquiry, that the spread between No. 1 Northern and No. 3 Northern was seven cents and since the wheat board went out of business, the spread doubled, notwithstanding that the price of wheat went down? I think it well worthy of consideration.

Let me say a word in regard to mixing elevators. A few years ago there were very few mixing elevators, Now there are a great many; and I suppose the reason is quite evident—they are profitable. Grain is taken into the mixing elevators, and according to the regulations of the Board of Grain Commissioners, as it is inspected out, it should grade up to the average. But what takes place in the meantime? Nos. 3, 4, 5—we do not know what grades, sometimes it is one and sometimes another—are mixed together and as the grain goes out of the elevators the lower grades disappear entirely. What has happened is this. They have cleaned the good grain out of the lower grades; their weights increase; a great deal of the poorer grain in the lower grades has gone out as screenings and a considerable quantity of the better grain has been mixed in, so that wheat that has gone in as No. 6, or No. 5 or No. 4 may go out as No. 2 or No. 3. A strong argument is advanced by the trade that this is really a benefit to the farmer, that it does him no harm but rather improves some of his grain, and that not so much storage is required. I grant you the last point, but I deny the others. I think that this practice entails a great loss to the producer of grain. In the first place, if the good cars are taken out of the general flow, what happens to the rest? The question arises, is the grain which goes out of the mixing elevators up to the average required by the regulations? I would not say that it is not, at the present time, because I believe that the change in the personnel of the Board of Grain Commissioners has very greatly improved the board. But I would point out that within the last few months, at least within the last year, one cargo went to the United States graded out of one of these elevators as "3 Northern straight." When it got to Buffalo it was held up, the purchaser refused to accept it, the inspectors drew samples which were sent back to Winnipeg, and it was declared by them that the grain instead of being "3 Northern straight" was "3 and 4 tough." I know that that is only a matter of administration, and it is quite possible that it calls for no change in the regulations, but I think a board of inquiry would not do any harm if it investigated that matter along with others. How was it that a similar cargo was sent to the Old Country and there found in the same condition and rejected? I would mention another point in connection with these mixing elevators. In the evidence taken by the Committee on Agriculture last year, it was pointed out that there was considerable difficulty in getting rid of the grain. I do not know just where this happened, but the fact is that when James Stewart was head of the wheat board he refused to take grain out of these mixing elevators except at a discount of as high as four cents per bushel. What does it indicate, when a man who was competent and knew the grain trade thoroughly, refused to take grain out of the mixing elevators except at such a discount? It is pointed out, of course, that he did not exercise his powers in this matter. But what do we infer from that? Knowing whom they had to deal with and that he would take his discount if the grain was not up to the mark, they sent it out at the right grade. But in the past it has not always been that way. Now, even supposing that the grain goes out of the mixing elevators up to the average, the value for mixing purposes that is in the grain as it passes from the producers' wagons is taken out. I believe that the Old Country importer and miller, knowing that they buy our grain not for its intrinsic value as milling grain, but for its strength for mixing purposes, would use that grain for those purposes themselves, and if they got it unadulterated I think they would pay a higher price for it than they give at present. If that be true—and I think the point is well worth looking into—then the farmer is being robbed of something to which he has a right, because he is entitled to the full value of his grain as it passes from his wagon. Anything that damages grain or takes from its value in transit takes from it something to which the farmer is entitled. It has been told me, and the statement has been made on such good authority that I have no hesitation in repeating it, that a considerable quantity of grain is transferred between the mixing and the public elevators. For what purpose is this done? It is alleged that these mixing elevators have difficulty in getting rid of their grain, and the millers admitted in evidence last session before the agricultural committee that they would never take grain from the mixing elevators if they could possibly help it. That was their evidence, one and all. Now, when they have that difficulty in getting rid of their grain what do they do? It is stated that they send it to the public elevators. It then passes into the general bin. If it is not up to mark, or if the value has been in any way impaired, it passes to the general bin and goes to lessen the value of the grain that is shipped to the Old Country, and on which the price is based.

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend intend to imply that the public elevators are doing the mixing at the head of the lakes?

Mr. MILLAR: No, not necessarily so. The grain that has been mixed and skimmed down as low as the inspection system would permit, to such an extent that the millers do not want it, the exporters do not want it, and James Stewart will not take it except at a discount, is sent over to the public elevators where it loses its identity and becomes straight grade grain.

Mr. STEVENS: But my hon. friend says that it was put into the general bins and thereby impaired the standard of the grain already there. Is not that mixing, and is it not contrary to law?

Mr. MILLAR: What I am pointing out is that whatever value that grain would have for blending purposes, if it were not mixed, is thereby lost. That is to say, if that grain were sent over to the Old Country unmixed it would have a value for mixing purposes which it loses when mixed in the mixing elevators.

Now, some time ago a statement appeared in a great many of our newspapers that must have cost a considerable amount of money. It was published by the secretary of the Grain Exchange, Dr. Magill, and appeared in many of the agricultural papers and the daily papers all over the country. We know that this advertising is quite expensive, and that statement must have cost a good deal. In it, it is claimed by Dr. Magill that all that the trade at Winnipeg takes out of a bushel of wheat is 4.3 cents. Now, anyone who knows anything about grain, anyone who knows the number of people that are employed on the exchange, the profits they are evidently making, the staffs they keep, the enormous army that feed off the handling of the grain, will know quite well that these people could not live very long if that were all they got from the grain. If 4.3 cents per bushel were all they got I think some of them would starve inside of six months. It is quite evident that there are underground ways of reaping a greater profit from the grain than that. It is obvious that this is not all the profit they receive. And that is one reason why, it seems to me, a commission should be appointed, not to look into any one of these charges, but to go into the whole subject from every point of view. All the circumstances taken together constitute a sufficient ground for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the matter.

There is another point I should like to mention. I know representatives of the trade on the Liverpool and London markets are very anxious to know just what steps are taken by the Canadian government to see that no deterioration of our grain takes place between Fort William and the seaboard. They ask again and again: Inspection takes place at Fort William; what inspection takes place after that? The grain is handled through elevators, some of which are private elevators. Are the steps that are taken to safeguard the various grades of grain sufficient and adequate? I know quite well that such steps in regard to grain that passes through American channels are not sufficient. I found on the other side of the water a great many complaints about grain that had come from American ports, and the trade could not understand why it was that such grain was not as good as that coming from Fort William. Although the evidence was not given on oath, it was discovered either at New York or Boston that after the grain passing through the American channels in bond has left the seaboard, it is considered to be out of bond and the grades are then mixed. Here I believe is a very strong reason why there should be an investigation into the trade, because 65 per cent of our grain is now passing through American channels. Our railways are crying out for more freight, and our elevators at Montreal, although they had all they could do last year, I am sure would not admit that they could not do more business. We want our trade kept in Canadian channels, and I believe that an inquiry might do much to this end, because the variation of a single cent in carriage would mean a great deal; it would keep millions of bushels in Canadian channels that are now passing out through American channels.

Mr. ARTHURS: Before the hon. member leaves that subject, has he figures as to how much American grain passed through Canadian channels in the same period?

Mr. MILLAR: I could not give exact figures to the hon. member. I know the amount is considerable. I suppose some people might take the attitude that while as much American grain passes through Canadian channels as Canadian grain passes through American channels, why, we are enjoying a square deal and have nothing to complain of. I do not take that view. It seems to me that the Americans take all they can get, and they would not stop if they got more than their share. And we too should get all we can. I do not think the Americans would blame us.

I am not just certain whether another matter should be brought under this inquiry, but I think it would do no harm if the possibilities of creating co-operative systems for handling our farm products were investigated and reported on. This system has been adopted in the United States with considerable success, especially by the fruit growers, and a little more information on the subject to our farmers that would eventually help them to solve their marketing problem by the creation of such a system would be of great value. It is well known that the wheat board which we are asking for and expecting this year is only regarded as a temporary expedient. We are looking for something that is permanent. We have not yet found it. It might be possible that a grain inquiry would serve as a kind of cleansing of our present system and wipe out some of those evils or clear up misapprehension. If so, our people might be satisfied to continue the same system, but I doubt it very much. Otherwise we want some other system of handling our grain, and it is the general belief that the co-operative system will be found the best. Any assistance that could be given by this board of inquiry would be very much appreciated by the farmers.

In closing, I am going to make one suggestion. Commissioners have gone to the Old Country and investigated the condition in which grain arrives there. There has been a strong feeling on the part of some that grain arrives very much deteriorated; in fact, extreme statements have sometimes been made to the effect that the grain reaches there as chicken feed. That has never been anywhere nearly true. But unfortunately those commissioners that have been sent to the Old Country have not numbered among them a single grain inspector, and I believe the government will be well advised to send a well qualified grain inspector overseas to look into this matter and to report back to the grain commission and to the inspection department the actual condition in which grain is arriving there, and also to make suggestions for overcoming any trouble that his investigations may disclose. A great deal could be accomplished by getting in touch with the trade there and encouraging them to further develop business with the Canadian people. If a competent inspector were kept there for six months or possibly a year I believe it would be money well spent.

Mr. SALES: Why not permanently?

Mr. MILLAR: The member for Saltcoats asks, why not permanently? Well, that is a matter for future consideration. After a period of one year, if it were found advisable to keep such an official there, I certainly would have no objection to his being retained.

You will note, Sir, that I have not dwelt to any great extent on the serious conditions prevailing among the producers of grain, but this is simply because I think those conditions have been mentioned often enough by others. I think the House appreciates the fact that it would be a very great inspiration and help if something were done to give those producers encouragement, before they sell their next crop, that something of a practical nature is being done to relieve the difficulties under which they labour. Because, we must continue to sell our grain in competition with the other countries of the world, and accept prices regulated by supply and demand, while, as has been many times said, we are compelled to buy in very, very high markets. On these grounds I ask hon. members to support this resolution.

Mr. MANION: I should like to ask the hon. member a couple of questions. He has mentioned a sample market. Does he favour the operation of a sample market? The other question is in regard to deterioration. He referred to the deterioration of grain going from the head of the lakes or Winnipeg to the London or Liverpool market and the interest that the farmer had in that grain. Is it not true of a very large proportion of the wheat sold by the farmer at the track, that once he delivers it to the country elevator his interest in that wheat ceases entirely? I am asking for information in both these cases.

Mr. MILLAR: I will answer the last question first, lest I forget it. That ground has often been taken, that as soon as a farmer sells his load of grain at the country elevator, and receives his price therefor, he has absolutely no further interest in that grain. I think that is what my hon. friend means. But that is not so in any case, not even as to a part of his crop. The price he receives for that load has been based on the actual value of grain arriving in the Old Country. That is, those who are importing the grain know what they have been receiving for that grade. It does not matter what the grade is, but we will say it is No. 3; they know what they have been receiving for No. 3 in the past, and if anything is done in transit to lower the value of that grain, the price will be less. It is plain that if the price is less the price to the farmer will be less; there is no getting away from that. So that the farmer is interested in what happens to that grain from the time it leaves his wagon until it is sold to the Old Country buyer.

The question has been raised with regard to a sample market. When a very considerable part of our grain is milled in Canada, I shall be in favour of a sample market, but so long as nearly all our grain is sold by grade, I cannot see my way clear to favour a sample market. What takes place is simply this—and I do not know that I need cover the ground; in fact, I believe I have already done so—it is a picking out of the best cars, the cars that are of great value, and getting them for the same price as for the ordinary cars; little or no premium is paid. What is left is less valuable, but it is on what is left that the price is based; therefore the price is less.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this resolution; I believe that an investigation into the grain trade is long overdue. The world's price for wheat is set at Liverpool, because Liverpool, being the great centre for wheat, collects the surplus practically of the whole world. It is this surplus, or the lack of any surplus at all, that sets the price for wheat all over the world. We, the growers in western Canada, are content if we get that price, minus the cost of getting our surplus on that market.

The farmer can market his grain in one of several different ways. He can sell outright to a country elevator at a price based on the Winnipeg price—to a dealer whose interest it is to create as much difference as possible between the initial price and the price paid at Winnipeg. Now, the farmer may possibly load a car over the loading platform and ship to Fort William and Port Arthur, in which case he will save the spread that may exist between the elevator prices and the cash prices in Winnipeg, as well as avoid the effects of all the devious methods of elevator operators regarding grades, shrinkage, dockage, and so on. He may send his car down to be stored at the terminal elevator, and to be sold later when the price suits him, in which case he is given a certificate guaranteeing the weight and grade. But that car of wheat may be spotted on the way by some miller and diverted to his mill for his own use, or it may be diverted to a private elevator for mixing purposes; and all the farmer has to show for it is a certificate. If his car is diverted, it means that the wheat was a particularly fine type of that grade, and it also means, that, although the price is made in Liverpool, according to the value the British miller sets on Canadian wheat in competition with the wheat of other countries, the British miller does not get a chance at the wheat as it leaves the farmer's wagon. I think it should be made illegal for anyone to go into the business of buying and selling with no intention of ever taking possession or delivering in case of sale. Many of these men at one time or another overstep their capabilities and have to unload in a hurry. When they do this, advantage is taken of it by the exporter; the price is beaten down, and that sets a price for the next twenty-four hours over the whole of the three prairie provinces. It is possible, too, for a combination of these men, by withholding or dumping, to influence the price the way they want it. It is unfair, I say, to the grower that the remuneration for his year's work should be subject to such haphazard methods of price fixing and resulting violent fluctuations—seeing that he has no other channel open to him through which he can market his wheat.

While I believe in as little government control of industry in any form as possible, one must realize that wheat is different from all other commodities in that, because of its great bulk it must be moved from the grower to the consumer in a collective way. The grower has no control over any part of the business after the wheat leaves the wagons at the initial loading point, and yet his price is subject to the speculation of a set of men who are interested only in making all the difference they can between the price at the initial point and the Liverpool market. Since the farmer's price is established outside of his province, outside of his country, in competition with the wheat of other countries, it is surely the duty of the government to see that the grower is protected to the point where his product cannot be further tampered with, either in the physical handling or in the matter of price fixing. Since this product of the farmer is one which must be handled collectively and which has to pass through the hands of so many public utilities before it reaches the place where the price is set, I say again it is the duty of this government so to regulate these public utilities as to guarantee that full justice shall be done to those who are particularly interested in such products.

Many features of the trade which this commission should investigate are outside the province of the present grain commission. I think it is necessary that some consideration should be given by the commission of inquiry to the routes by which the grain of this country can reach its ultimate destination in the most economical way. I shall hope to see the appointment of men in this capacity who, by their integrity and ability, will command the respect of all concerned.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): I rise to associate myself with the sentiments expressed by the two former speakers concerning this resolution. It is a cause of gratification to me that the government has so far conceded the point as to have this problem investigated by the select Committee on Agriculture, for a problem it is, and it has been a problem in the West ever since the West has been growing grain. I do not, however, think that the committee will have either the time or the opportunity to take all the evidence that is necessary in this matter. By way of illustration let me say that when a committee of this House sits and takes evidence it is only natural, and it is what we have been accustomed to find in the past, that the financial interests in the country, particularly those engaged in the grain trade, always send their delegations to give evidence before the committee, and invariably they are composed of capable men who give expert evidence. But I maintain that the producer, the man whose cause has been pleaded here to-day, and whose cause I am now endeavouring to plead, has not the same opportunity of giving evidence before a committee of this House that he would have before a royal commission, and that is one reason why I rise to make a small contribution to this debate.

I should like to see a royal commission appointed that would travel all over the country and give the producer, the man who has a grievance, and who has always had one —the man who is not receiving justice, and particularly so this last year—an opportunity to appear before it and give evidence. In my humble opinion that is necessary before justice can be done; but as I said before, I am pleased that the government have conceded the point of appointing a committee at all events. I hope that if the committee has not finished its work by the end of the session, and that if its work warrants continued investigation, as I think it will, the government will appoint a royal commission that will travel over the country and give all parties concerned an opportunity to give their evidence, and then bring in their report which the government might act upon through order in council so that it would not be necessary to wait until another session was called, but give relief before the next crop was marketed.

The two speakers who have preceded me have entered into quite a technical point. For myself I wish to give only concrete evidence. I believe the commission could and would find out the conditions if they would only travel over the country and give the producer an opportunity to present his evidence. I might state that I think I have a right to speak for the producer, because I have endeavoured to take a man's part in the harvesting of thirty-one crops in that western country, and surely if an individual has done that much work, he should know something whereof he speaks and of the conditions surrounding the producing of grain.

As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) said, the spread between the price the producer receives and the price that is received on the market at Liverpool is altogether too great, and in the first place it is the producer of the grain who pays all the charges between, to say nothing of the inequalities of which the hon. gentleman speaks.

We have heard the complaint of the miller, and in my humble opinion the eastern miller, in the province of Ontario, we will say, is warranted in complaining on the ground that the grain which he buys to grist in his mill has lost much of its value because of its being purchased at the mixing elevators. The grain he gets is not as a rule of the same quality as the grain forwarded to the initial elevators by the producer, and that difference in price is always deducted from the producer. I have no doubt it may seem that this point has always been stressed in the House, but it has not been stressed very much until the last three or four years, and that is one of the reasons why men are down here now endeavouring to bring the matter before the House. I think I can assure the House that when the conditions are recognized and remedies applied, you will not have the same complaint from the people of the West. It is simply because remedies have not heretofore been applied that we are obliged to come here and ask for redress for our grievances.

I stated a few moments ago that I proposed to present some real concrete evidence, something of which I am absolutely certain. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that in the year 1920 I made a statement on the floor here to the effect that I had visited the state of North Dakota and had found a great disparity in the price paid there to the man who sold his grain to the initial elevator and the price paid to his neighbour just north of an imaginary boundary line. I found a difference of $1.01 a bushel between the price paid to the Dakota farmer and the price paid to the farmer in the West. In this country we had a wheat board in existence at that time and over there there was none. The explanation given by the interests—naturally it does not come from the producer, yet it is the producer on our side who suffers and has suffered for years— was that the United States required what hard wheat could be taken across the boundary for the purpose of mixing at the Minneapolis mills to provide a grade of flour acceptable to the consumer in the British Isles. That is true, and all very well, but we find to-day that the United States is scarcely an exporting country; in fact, we believe that in the very near future she will forego the large revenue she has derived in the past from the export of flour; yet this same condition exists to-day. Again this year, for my own satisfaction and for the purpose of being in a position to furnish evidence to the House or before a committee, I made another visit to the state of North Dakota, and on the day of my arrival, which was 9th October, I found a spread of 11 cents a bushel between the price paid the North Dakota producer and the price paid north of the boundary line, and that was for a poorer grade of wheat than ours. They were receiving 93 cents a bushel, while I was receiving only 82 cents. I make this positive statement. In my judgment, and from what knowledge I have gained in seeing samples of grain, my grain that I sold this year—and you will pardon the personal pronoun, but I can speak more positively of my own case—was fully two grades better than the grain over in the elevators that I visited in the town of Sherwood in North Dakota; yet my neighbour was getting 93 cents a bushel while I received only 82 cents. When I reached home I found in my mail a map sent by the Railway Association of Canada, which shows the 49th parallel and the lines of railway paralleling the international boundary line. It also shows the comparative freight rates from points opposite each other along the international boundary, and I find that in each case there is a difference of 4½ cents per one hundred pounds in favour of Canada. We might call that equal to 2 6/10 cents a bushel. Add that to the 11 cents premium that my neighbour to the south was receiving, and for a poorer grade of wheat. I went home quite prepared to ask this further question,—why is it, when Liverpool is the pivotal point where the price is fixed for all export wheat, that my neighbour to the south of the boundary can receive 11 cents more than I, and all these other favourable conditions? It does seem to me, and I urge it upon the House, that this is one of the questions which the commission should investigate and determine.

I also submit that a committee of this House could not secure the necessary evidence. It would be different with a royal commission moving through the country and hearing evidence at various points. I am sure in that case the producers of grain would only be too anxious, oniy too glad, to have the opportunity of appearing before them and giving concrete evidence upon the points referred to. The evils in connection with this matter have been apparent for many years, and it is a cause of gratification to us to-day, Sir, to know that our government have recognized the fact and are adopting means whereby we hope to obtain redress. It has been a subject of complaint in the past that governments have been loath to take action in the matter; I am happy to think that a change for the better has taken place in that respect.

It occurred to me, when the hon. member for Qu'Appelle suggested that an officer should be located in the Old Country to look after our grains, preferably at Liverpool, that our government might have obtained samples from the Liverpool market and laid them before the members of this House, or at least before the Committee on Agriculture which is to look into this matter. I might state that as a producer I am prepared to collect samples of grain as grown in the prairie provinces in the year 1922, and I am prepared to establish the grades upon which the producer was paid; it would be a very nice comparison for individual members of this House to see the quality of grain that was produced and sold last year as against the quality of grades that are fixed as standards upon the Liverpool market.

May I give another concrete instance illustrating the conditions that prevailed in 1922. I read in the statutes that:

> No. 1 Northern grain shall be sound and well cleaned, weighing not less than 60 pounds to the bushel, and shall be composed of at least 60 per cent hard wheat.
> No. 2 Northern shall be sound and reasonably clean, of good milling quality, 58 pounds to the bushel, 45 per cent hard wheat.

The illustration that I wish to give the House, and I hope it will come before the committee, was furnished by an individual whose entire grain crop was grown upon prairie land that was newly broken. This individual purchased really good Marquis seed wheat from a responsible seed firm, and it was sown upon this land. I myself saw this crop many times, and helped to thresh and market the grain. When that grain was being marketed by the load on the street all the buyers were very anxious to purchase it, in all cases at the maximum price of No. 1 Northern. The producer placed 1,206 bushels of this wheat in the elevator to ship out, and when it was shipped out he received the grade of No. 2 Northern. Complaint was made and a re-inspection asked for, but the reply the producer received was, "We are not paying No. 1 Northern prices for wheat this year." Now I am prepared to take my oath, Sir, that that grain weighed 62 pounds to the bushel, that it contained more than 80 per cent hard wheat, and that it was as beautiful a hard, red wheat as anyone would wish to see. Yet that was the treatment accorded to that fine grain. I have wondered many times how many cars of a poorer grade of wheat those 1,206 bushels were intended to be mixed with to conform to the standard of grade required on the Liverpool market. That illustrates the problem which confronts the producers to-day, and it is an injustice to refuse them the opportunity of appearing before a commission.

Referring again to the question of the spread in prices in the state of North Dakota I wish to state that since the date to which I referred previously the spread there has gone up to as much as 21 cents per bushel, and the question arises why it is that a grower in the United States who produces wheat under the same conditions and suffers the same disability that I do, should receive 21 cents per bushel more for an inferior grade when the price for export wheat is set at the pivotal point of Liverpool. That is a very important question and one which enters largely into the question of immigration, as I would remind my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Stewart). How largely it affects the question of immigration I can best demonstrate by citing a newspaper quotation which I would like to have placed upon Hansard. It reads thus:

> On Wednesday, December 13th, the Whitehead family, comprising Mrs. Whitehead, Sr., Mrs. Wm. Whitehead, Jr., and Edmund took their departure from this district proceeding to Sherwood en route for Michigan. This is the fourteenth family to leave this locality with no one up to the present coming to take their places. Out of the number gone only one was a bachelor.

That is the condition which prevails in the West; it is the condition which prevails all along the international boundary. And again I state, and reiterate, that this matter is one which we must take into consideration, because there must be an equitable price paid to those who are producing grain and who are working fourteen and fifteen hours a day in so doing. I say that the question of immigration does enter into this matter and that the exodus from western Canada must be stopped. Because there should be the fullest opportunity of demonstrating what the West is worth. The potential wealth of the country is not challenged, the people of the West have a heritage that is well worth while; but parasites must be stopped from stepping in and taking an unjust toll from the people who are labouring there.

I am very pleased indeed that the government have at last made a move towards investigating the conditions about which we have for so long complained.

Mr. ARTHUR L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, when coming down to Ottawa last year, a large percentage of the electors of Provencher, which I have the honour to represent here, told me that they thought that a royal commission to inquire into the grain trade should have been established long ago. I thought so myself and was under the impression that during the last session, we had voted the sum of $40,000 for such an inquiry. If I am wrong in that respect I am open for correction. When parliament prorogued I returned to my electors and told them that $40 000 had been voted for such an inquiry. Afterwards the statement appeared in the press that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was of the opinion that there were not sufficient complaints to warrant an inquiry. I do not know what grounds there were for making such a statement. At any rate, I came back to Ottawa this year with full instructions from the people of my riding to press for a royal commission to inquire into the marketing and grading of grain. I want to take up the question of grading and emphasize that point to a greater extent, perhaps, than other speakers who have preceded me. In Manitoba—the oldest province of the West and one that has been growing grain for a longer period than the other two western provinces—we have a weed element to contend with, a menace which is more formidable than Saskatchewan or Alberta have to contend with. Consequently we are doing all we can to destroy the noxious weeds. And just here let me say that the farmers in Manitoba are the best farmers in the West because they have had a very much longer experience. And we are doing everything in our power to eliminate weeds, but we have a very hard proposition on our hands and we cannot eliminate them to the extent I would like. So, therefore, the grading affects us to a larger extent than it affects the people in Saskatchewan and Alberta. This fall, I think, we grew one of the best crops in the southern part of Manitoba, which I have the honour to represent, that was ever grown in that province, and at the same time we have received lower grades this year than in any year I know of. Even in 1916, when we had an epidemic of rust, we really received better grades than we did this year, and, of course, our grievance is much more prominent than the grievance in any other part in western Canada, for the simple reason that we are very close to the boundary. I live only 22 miles from the boundary, and I have taken wheat to Pembina, on the American side, and my wheat would grade No. 1, at Pembina, but on the grading market in Canada, it would grade No. 3 and No. 4, so that being so close to the line does not conduce to the farmer receiving justice in regard to the grading proposition.

I received before I came to Ottawa, resolutions from practically every municipal council in the county of Provencher, and I know that copies of these resolutions have been forwarded to the Prime Minister; at least, the councils intimated to me they were sending them. The municipal councils represent all the people in the country, and I think that these resolutions are not passed lightly. Before they pass those resolutions, they study the question, and they hear plans discussed, and so forth, and I do not think they would pass these resolutions, unless they knew what they were doing.

I think the appointment by the government of a parliamentary committee was a good move, but if the parliamentary committee were going to give the grain trade a thorough investigation, we would be here until this time next year, because we cannot hold a thorough investigation in Ottawa. You must go through the country and find out from the people who know. If you brought these people to Ottawa, it would involve a great deal of expense, and there is no doubt, if that were done, the Prime Minister and his colleagues would not be able to attend the Imperial Conference next June.

The kind of commission that we in this corner of the House desire—and I think the government should give us all the support possible—is not a political commission, but a commission of men who know the grain trade and have the interest of the country at heart. In my opinion, a political commission is no good and has no right to be appointed at any time. We want a commission that will bring our recommendations to the government, so that if the Grain Act needs to be amended, the recommendation of this commission, which would be a royal commission, will be put into the Grain Act, and will relieve the Canadian farmers. I might offer a suggestion. We have a commission inquiring into the lake freight rates to-day. If the government consider that commission is competent to inquire into the marketing and grading of grain, I would throw out the suggestion that, when they are through with their present work, they keep on investigating and do not stop until the people of 5 p.m. the West are getting justice in the grading, marketing and mixing of grain.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I have been waiting in the hope that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would make a statement to the House and save further debate. Hon. gentlemen know that we had this all threshed out last year, and at the request of the government, we put through a vote of $40,000, if I remember rightly. Again, if I remember, we had the whole matter discussed one evening, when many of my hon. friends to my left were present, and when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) told us, as I recollect it—hon. members will correct me if I am wrong—that in view of the fact that the Progressives, as well as the official opposition, demanded this investigation, it would be held. Well, of course, the government have been very busy. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has been out of the country a great deal, but he is here now —they are all home—and I was in hopes that we could be told that the investigation would go on.

Something has been said by an hon. gentleman to my left to the effect that they are glad that something is now going to be done. Well, we tried to do something and we were stopped. It was said we wanted to get a special organization—a political organization. We asked Mr. Wood—Mr. Henry Wise Wood —of Alberta, to act as chairman of that investigating commission, and he would not act. We thought that if we put him in charge of it he would at least see it was not political. He would be there and would be in charge. Failing to obtain Mr. Wood, we then asked Mr. Stewart to take charge. Mr. Stewart has been described more recently as a representative of the farmers on the railway board, but he declined. We did not want any political commission. However, that is all old history. We thought the grievances of the West ought to be properly inquired into, and that any possible remedy that the West was entitled to ought to be given to it. We still think so, and I hope my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, will now tell us that the vote of last year is going to be put into effect, that the government still are where they were last year, and that the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be given immediate effect.

Mr. L. H. JELLIFF (Lethbridge): It was not my intention to take part in this debate, but it seems to me one important feature has been omitted in the remarks that have been made, and that is the effect that this investigation might have on immigration matters. We have heard a great deal said during this session on the vast number of our people that were going to other countries, especially to the United States, and what should be done to keep these people here. It seems to me that if this question which is before us this afternoon is properly settled, it will afford some solution to that problem and assist us in keeping our people on the land. I come from the Lethbridge constituency, where we are engaged in a great irrigation project. Somewhere in the neighbourhood of $8,000,000 is to be expended in that country in placing those farmers in a position where farming in the future will be a permanent success and not be subject to all the ups and downs that have been experienced there during the last twenty years.

I want to acknowledge here some real and valuable assistance we have had in our labours from the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). We have sent men into the United States in an endeavour to get settlers to come in and take up surplus lands in the irrigation districts, and in this connection I would read a few lines from a letter which I have received from a friend who was in the United States engaged in that work. What I shall read has an important bearing on this discussion. It is dated from Oakland, and reads:

> As you know I am down here to try to interest people in the Lethbridge Northern and I have had some success as far as interest is concerned but the people that would come have no money and those that have money see no real benefit in changing. I just want to call your attention to some of the things I can't explain to their satisfaction. Why fat steers at Calgary are selling for 3 to 4 cents per pound when they are worth 10 to 11 in Chicago? There is a man out north of here feeding Canadian stockers he bought at Minneapolis and says they are the best feeders he ever fed but he says where does the Canadian farmer get off that raises them? This country would take every steer for sale in Canada at a good price if it was not for the tariff. The farmers are getting $1.10 for wheat that would not make chicken feed, why do we have to take 80 cents for No. 1 Hard when the farmer here gets $1.10 for worse than chicken feed? Ask the Minister of Agriculture. They also ask the rate of interest and when I tell them 8 per cent they say "no Canada for me."

I thoroughly appreciate and endorse the action of our government in proposing this committee for this session to make a special investigation into these matters affecting agriculture. But, as has been pointed out by the mover of this resolution (Mr. Millar), it is hardly likely that that committee, within the short period available in this one session, could in any wise be able to cover the ground of the complaints raised this afternoon. I think what is needed is a royal commission to investigate this whole subject in as thorough a manner as possible. The subject is one that has been discussed up and down this chamber for the last four or five years. Not only last session was it under discussion; from the reading I have done of previous Hansards which have been sent me, I find that this same discussion has been going on for the past few years. Now, let us get down to the bottom of the whole thing and have it settled. It is the most vital question we have to deal with to-day, and bound up in it is the question of immigration, in fact, the question of the whole future of this country. It is a matter of patriotism that a royal commission be appointed to look thoroughly into the subject.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) is to be congratulated on bringing this important national subject to the attention of the House. I do not know any hon. gentleman more capable of dealing fully and fairly with the question than the member whose name is associated with the resolution. Grain inquiries are not new events in Canada. We have had a number of them, some national, some provincial, practically all of them, I think, considerably effective, and certainly all of them of an educational character. The first one I can recall was conducted in the year 1899. It was preceded by the action of a private member, the late Senator Douglas, who introduced into this House a private bill dealing with the grain trade. Previous to that we had had no legislation governing the warehousing, transportation and sale of grain, except what was called the Manitoba Inspection Act. The government of that day assured the late Senator Douglas that if he would withdraw his bill they would take the matter up at a subsequent session and during the recess have an investigation into the trade, bringing down later a bill based on the recommendations of that investigation. I remember quite well the personnel of that commission, which created a great deal of interest throughout the West. People had been harassed and were not only filled with suspicion but were absolutely certain that things were not all well and this being the first commission of its kind it can well be understood with what interest it was received. The late Judge Senkler of St. Catharines, was appointed chairman of that commission and his colleagues were three gentlemen from Manitoba, all still alive, Mr. C. C. Castle, now in British Columbia, Mr. Lothian and Mr. Sirrett. I forget who was the secretary. They conducted the usual inquiry, travelling about the country, and created a great deal of interest, especially among the farmers. I travelled myself some fifty miles on the prairies to give evidence, and I felt when I went home that I had not spent the time in vain. When the recommendations came down, and subsequently the legislation based thereon, I was convinced that it was perhaps one of the most successful investigations that had ever been held in connection with this important industry. Notwithstanding the very thoroughness of that inquiry, however, time seemed to reveal certain weaknesses in the act. No matter how you legislate, it is said that some people can always drive through the law. And in the year 1906 another agitation sprang up for a further inquiry. I had the honour of recommending to the government of that day that the present member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) be not only a member, but chairman, of that commission; and I have no doubt that the opportunities he had at that time of investigating the trade, not only of Canada but of the British Empire, as well as the practical knowledge we had of the producing end, have enabled him to gain that familiarity with the subject which it is evident he has to-day. In 1906, there were a number of other commissions, all more or less important. One of them was provincial, appointed by the province of Saskatchewan, and resulted in the present co-operative elevator system in that province. Later on we had the commission of 1921 which has been referred to by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). It is true that the operations of that commission were estopped by injunction proceedings, and it has occurred to me, since attention has been drawn to the fact, that before any more royal commissions are appointed it might be well for the status of the federal government to be established in order to ascertain how far we can go in these matters. There is no doubt that there is a federal jurisdiction; but apparently the royal commission could not go the limit of the present Grain Act in this inquiry. It would be well, therefore, for any investigation to try to avoid such an impasse as occurred in this case, because it brings discredit on investigations generally and on the Grain Act in particular. I have no doubt that before such an investigation proceeds the necessary steps will be taken to see just where our jurisdiction ends and that of the provincial authorities begins. I would gather, however, from the remarks of two hon. members that we were to avoid duplicating the personnel of that commission—I do not know exactly why, I must admit—and that the personnel of the present lake rates commission is of the right type. If that is so, we naturally feel gratified at having pleased the House, more particularly that portion of it which is intimately associated with grain growing, with the personnel of this commission.

During the last few years not only has the agitation for a further inquiry into the grain trade been continued on the part of the producers themselves after these injunction proceedings were successful, but the Organized Buyers' Association, with headquarters at Moose Jaw, have been doing a great deal of educational work throughout Saskatchewan directed to the necessity of further inquiry, especially from their standpoint as buyers. I have noticed in the press the very radical and extraordinary statements made by them which, if true, should receive very careful attention. I have no doubt that the inquiry by the special committee mentioned in the Speech from the Throne will give representatives of this association an opportunity of being heard. At all events, I hope that will be dealt with when the committee is organized.

Might I state, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion the spirit of this resolution is being complied with by the sessional programme? It is true that the commission to inquire into lake rates touches very slightly the particular matter mentioned in the resolution, but the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which I am about to read is so comprehensive that I think it can be taken to embrace all phases of the grain trade. The only question is whether it is possible to get at the bottom of these matters from one central point like Ottawa, or whether it is necessary to have a commission take evidence throughout the country. This is the paragraph:

> The adverse conditions with which agriculture generally is confronted in many parts of Canada, despite the abundant crops of the past year, render it desirable that a special committee, with powers to make recommendations, be appointed to look into various agricultural matters such as the mixing of grain in private terminal elevators, the marketing of farm porducts,—

[Mr. Motherwell.]

To look into "the marketing of farm products." That is a very broad and comprehensive term. So I think the scope of the committee is quite sufficient to cover every phase and form of grievance. The paragraph concludes:

> —the development of the live stock industry, and the possibilities of further diversification in our Canadian agriculture.

I wish to point out at this stage that the desire of the government in this direction is already shown by the commission which has already been appointed to inquire into lake rates, and by the appointment of a special committee, the personnel of which is almost complete. I have in my pocket the names of all but three of the committee, and its full personnel will be announced, I hope, in the course of another day. The committee will be set to work immediately.

I take the ground that this special committee is necessary even though the grievances were imaginary—which they all are not, of course—simply for the educational value of these investigations. Every few years there is a new body of producers growing up who know nothing about the history of the grain trade or the former investigations of that trade, and who find our grading, inspection and sample systems very mysterious processes indeed. I remember very well in 1901, when I was first associated with the Farmers' movement of that day, going to Winnipeg as the Farmers' representative to inquire into the intricacies and mysteries of the grain exchange. I went with great trepidation, feeling I was entering a den of thieves but to my surprise I found the men engaged in the grain trade were very much like other business men. I got to know David Horne, W. W. Thompson, the warehouse commissioner, and Mr. Searle, our present chief inspector. You cannot find more upright men in any business in Canada. Later on I became acquainted with some of the grain merchants whom you would find on the grain exchange acting like so many madmen. I have no doubt hon. members have all played the parlour game imitating the grain pit, and even this mild game causes quite a lot of excitement; but when millions of bushels of grain are being dealt with the excitement in the pit of the grain exchange is easily accounted for. One can expatiate on the mysteries of the grain trade to people in a country district whose minds are harassed by a hundred other things and suggestively remark what these grain dealers are doing and that their intervention between the producer and consumer might well be dispensed with. Naturally a very bad impression can be left on the minds of your hearers. I had an opportunity of being in the grain exchange in the city of Budapest, Hungary, and unless I had had a preparatory course in Winnipeg I would have thought that the wildly gesticulating men before me should not be at large. For the sake of its educative value alone the committee referred to in the Speech from the Throne should make its inquiry as exhaustive and complete as possible.

The question of grading and sampling is a very difficult one to handle, but if we can get men of the type of Mr. Searle at the head of affairs we have made a good start in removing the suspicion that the whole business is wrong. Many men entertain the idea that the grading system could be dispensed with altogether. In my youth in Ontario when we had any wheat for sale we took it to the local mill and sold it on sample. The owner and the miller were there, they both dug their hands into the bag, and arrived at a conclusion of the value of the contents. The value was decided by weight only, but it was a matter of negotiation between them, and was in effect a sample market. That practice is all right where the wheat is for domestic use, but for export purposes the quality of your wheat must be designated by grades, and consequently a system of grading has been worked out. The contract grades are Nos. 1, 2 and 3 Northern which are specified by statute. What we call the commercial grades under No. 3 Northern are set from year to year by the Grain Standards Board, and of course these grades fluctuate. No wonder it is all very mysterious to the man who has not been behind the scenes, but at the same time I do not know any better system of grading.

In the United States they have practically the same system, supplemented by what is called the sample market. In a country like the United States, where a large volume of wheat is milled at home, the sample market —in Minneapolis, for instance—is a tremendous factor. But in Canada our alternative markets are not sufficiently numerous to make the sample market a dominating factor; it is the export trade that counts, consequently our chief method of grading must be by statute or by standards board rather than by sample. You will recall that before the war a great agitation arose in the West for a sample market. The multiplicity of grades, running to fifty or sixty in number, the mystery that seemed to surround the establishing of them, the taking of the samples on which they were based, and so on, led to an agitation for a sample market such as they had at Minneapolis. That demand naturally reflected itself in this House in the demand of the western representatives—in 1911 or 1912, I think it was—for provision for a sample market. I do not think it was realized at that time just what a sample market meant.

A sample market cannot be of any appreciable value to anybody, much less the producer, unless those engaged in the trade have the opportunity of mixing the grades and the various wheats. The very essence of it is the buying of wheat which has an excess of virtue over the standard grade and mixing it with lower grade wheat. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, in our determination to progress we sometimes take a mistaken step; at times we learn only by finding out that we are wrong. So that action was taken, at the request of the western members of the House, to provide for sample markets—and that always implied mixing, and now we have come back to the old difficulties of twenty-five years ago in connection with these mixing elevators.

Prior to the passing of the old Manitoba Grain Act, which is now the Canada Grain Act, mixing prevailed at Fort William to such an enormous extent that that was one of the causes which led the late Senator Douglas to bring down the bill to which I have referred. It was felt that the mixing process was deteriorating our export wheat to such an extent that the only solution of the difficulty was to stop the business entirely. There was no way of controlling it; therefore they stopped it.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle has stated that mixing should be all right theoretically, because the owners of the mixing houses are required by law to turn out every carload up to the average grade of the public terminal elevator. That sounds pretty reasonable; in fact, it is almost more exacting, you would think, than the result would be in the case of the terminal elevators, because they have to turn out nothing less than the minimum.

Now, I find that quite competent men in the trade, men who are probably better versed in it than any of us here, differ as to the mixing. Of course, a man who is engaged in mixing is invariably in favour of it, otherwise he would not be doing it. The man who grows the grain, especially if he is feeling hard hit at other points, is likely to suspect that there is some immense advantage accruing to the man who does the mixing, with corresponding detriment to the grower himself. Is it possible to take out, say one-third of the best of the wheat, one-third of the contents of a car showing quality over and above the straight grade —is it possible, I say, to take this out and have a residue as good as if there were no mixing? Let us get it down to a simple illustration that we can all understand: if you had a dozen apples on that table and you took out the six best apples, could you possibly have as good apples remaining as you have taken out? It cannot be done. We may talk wisely about mixing elevators; we may say it is the only system by which export can be kept uniform and that no harm is done to the producer; we may say that on the other hand we are establishing an industry that is so profitable that it will bid up for these off-grade cars and that a part of the benefit will then be transferred to the producer. Well, I will guarantee that there is no hon. gentleman present who, even with the aid of the most powerful X-ray, has ever been able to see any benefit come to the producer as the result of mixing.

I know there are some men who know more about the grain trade than I do who take an exactly opposite position and say that mixing is all right. I know, too, that some of these gentlemen have the complete confidence of the Progressive group—and, indeed, of everybody who knows them. Well, if doctors disagree, who is to decide? It shows the necessity of reviewing this whole question thoroughly before coming to any hasty conclusion. There is nothing to be said against anyone for having carried out the wishes of the West in the matter of the establishment of a sample market. We tried it, and it is only by trying things that you get anywhere.

Mr. SALES: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister, but what he says there is not quite correct. At the meeting in June, 1917, when the grain commission decided to put the sample regulations into force, the Canadian Council of Agriculture, representing the organized farmers of the three prairie provinces, objected to that being done.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not mention it with the idea of blaming anybody. I will put it this way: the western representatives of that day—I cannot recall who they were—thought they were voicing the public sentiment of the West when they agitated in this House for a sample market. It is a reflection on no one; we often have to retrace our steps. There is no other way of trying some things. Take the Hudson Bay railway; there is no way of proving whether or not it is feasible except by trying it.

Mr. STEVENS: May I point out to the hon. minister that when the act was amended providing for sample markets, it was not made obligatory; it was simply laid there for the use of those who desired to have it. It is there to-day and may be used if there is a desire to use it. It was not forced upon an unwilling public.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not the act before me, and I speak subject to correction, but my hon. friend knows that certain changes were made in the act that were construed to mean that the right of mixing went with the sample market. Anyhow, everybody believes in its being practised—

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will permit me, there is an impression going forth from his words, now, I think, in this House, that when the act was amended this parliament placed the seal of approval upon the principle of mixing. I submit to him in all fairness—and I think he will make himself clear on that point—that that is not the case. All they did was to provide, because of a widespread agitation in favour of it, for a sample market.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not aware whether it was the government prior or subsequent to 1911 that was responsible for it, but that is immaterial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was years after. The sample market was not created till about 1914 or 1915.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Anyhow, the point is that the sample market means nothing unless it implies mixing; there is no question about that. It is a dead letter otherwise, and I think a great many people did not understand that. I am not trying to reflect on anybody; I am simply trying to give the facts. If there is any construction to be placed on my remarks, they are of an extenuating nature with regard to anybody who was responsible. I happen to have taken the other side, and I have taken it all my life. You cannot eat your cake and have it; you cannot take the good out of your wheat and have as much good remain in the residue. It has often surprised me, Mr. Speaker, that this custom of mixing has not been complained of more in the United Kingdom. I can recall the time when my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle went overseas and found, as others have found, that our wheat arrived there in a very satisfactory condition, but the whole, or I will say, three-quarters of the milling trade of eastern Canada will not order out of those mixing elevators if they can get wheat out of the ordinary terminals. Do you think they do not know when they get value? Is it possible for a miller who has been in the business for years not to know what kind of raw product makes the best flour? I am told by the secretary of the Dominion Millers' Association himself, who is to-day in Ottawa, that the milling industries of the East avoid buying out of these mixing elevators every time they can. That may not apply this year, because there is nothing bad to mix with the good wheat, for 70 per cent or more of the wheat of the West this year is No. 1 Northern, and it is nearly all in the contract grades. Consequently, mixing has gone out of business this year, because there is nothing to mix; but almost every other year you have enough low grade stuff to mix with the virtue in the high grade stuff. I have often wondered how men who should and do know infinitely more about the grain trade than I can ever possibly hope to do without going into it, can argue on behalf of mixing from the standpoint of the producer.

Mr. STEVENS: Then is it the intention of the government this year to amend the act so as to prohibit mixing and to eliminate entirely the so-called mixing elevators?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That will depend, I presume, on the report of the special committee, to which every facility will be afforded to get to the bottom of this question. Those gentlemen who believe in mixing will have the opportunity to give a reason for the faith that is in them, and those holding the contrary opinion will also have an opportunity to be heard, so that we can get to the bottom of this question. Then I presume that parliament will act as it usually does, on the recommendations of the special committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the government's mind is made up so firmly as the hon. gentleman represents, why make further inquiry?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am only giving my own personal view. The question was raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, and quite properly so, and I am simply saying that gentlemen in the trade whom I know, as well as others not in the trade, hold exactly the opposite view. Consequently, we must move with the greatest caution. We should consider the matter thoroughly and get to the bottom of it. In the multitude of counsellors surely there is wisdom; I do not think that any one man has all the wisdom on this very involved and intricate question.

Just a few words on the question of grades. This year there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction in the West regarding the grading system. I can remember that in the year 1901 there was similar dissatisfaction. Every time that we have a good crop, as in 1901 or 1922, the average man knows that it is good, but sometimes before he can get his grain threshed, climatic conditions intervene, and while the grain is still in the stook it is so badly bleached that it grades as No. 3 Northern. We cannot see the point of it. Wheat that at the beginning of the season graded No. 1 Northern and sometimes No. 1 Hard, after one or two snowstorms, or perhaps even a rainstorm and exposure for five or six weeks in the stook, would be graded as No. 3 Northern. The miller will tell you the reason.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: How do you account for wheat grading tough when there never was any rain except in June? Along the Red River valley we had most of our threshing done before the rains, but after one rainstorm in the West our grain was graded as tough.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had a note on the tough question, and it is a tough question, but first with respect to the bleaching. I may say that the questions of bleached grain and tough grain are the two outstanding questions around which so much dissatisfaction revolves. The exterior of the grain is so wrinkled and bleached with the weather —sometimes I have seen grain actually frozen in the stook after it had been dry enough to thresh—that it looks as if it had been frozen before it was cut. No miller can extract as high a percentage of flour out of that grain as he could if it was not wrinkled. It has lost part of its commercial value, because there is no machinery for getting the maximum amount of flour out of it. But that is a miller's question. I can understand why the wheat would be graded down, although I did not at one time in my life. The wheat being mine I naturally saw it with a friendly eye, and I could not see how wheat that was perfectly good at the outset when it was cut was going to deteriorate in six weeks. I wanted the grade the wheat was at the outset.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not think the minister got my question right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am coming to that, but I am leaving the tough question till the last. I have had the opportunity, might I say, for over thirty years of being closely identified with the grading of grain, through being a member of the Western Grain Standards Board, and every year except last I was able to attend its annual meeting in Winnipeg. I think there is more real abuse in the disposition of that tough grain than in anything else I know. What are the facts?

I have just forgotten the percentage of moisture that is permitted in wheat—

Mr. SALES: Fourteen per cent.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think we follow largely the practice of the United States, and I think they operate on the basis of 13 or 14 per cent. If there is excess moisture over that, it is graded as no-grade or as tough; it is moist, or it is tough. There are two degrees of toughness: one is slightly tough, and the other is so tough that it has to go to the dryer. There are thousands, and in some years, tens of thousands, of bushels of wheat with so little excess moisture that even though it goes no-grade, it can still be mixed with perfectly dry grain, which absorbs the moisture, and it all goes as straight grade. Every hon. member knows that. Well now, if my hon. friends were in the business, I have no doubt they would say that that was a fine way of dealing with this no-grade stuff. Here you have a dry wheat with a slight amount of moisture below the maximum, and here you have one with an excess of moisture. What is to prevent you mixing the two and producing a straight grade. At the last Standards Board meeting I was at, this question was very thoroughly discussed, and particularly in its relation to sprouted grain. What amount of sprouted grain is going to condemn a No. 1 and a No. 2 Northern and drive it into a No. 3? It is a very fine question as to how are you going to define many of these points by law; it has to be left to the fairness or honour of the chief inspector and his subordinates. We should not leave any more to them than we possibly can, but there are some points that are extremely difficult of definition in law. For example, would you say that if there was one kernel of sprouted wheat in a bushel you should throw it into No. 3 Northern? Well, that is a matter of judgment. If the wheat was uniformly good and very superior in other respects the inspector might permit that to go into No. 2 Northern. If he does not, the grain must go into No. 3, although it is otherwise good grain. It is the same with tough wheat.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend said a moment ago that he had been for a great many years a member of the standards bureau.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A member of the Western Grain Standards Board.

Mr. STEVENS: I think it would be very instructive and interesting to the House if the minister would explain how this board fixes the standard from year to year. It would largely explain many of the technical points he has been discussing.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should be very pleased to but I want to try and get through by six o'clock. I would leave that subject until the last if my hon. friend will permit me.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a very important question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Tougher than the tough. We can continue the discussion after dinner. In the meantime let me just finish my story. I have a few notes here jotted down as hon. gentlemen opposite were speaking.

Getting back to the tough grain, that is the grain that has just sufficient excess moisture in it to make it go straight grade. How should we legislate with respect to that? Should we prohibit that going into the straight grade? If you did that you would inevitably reduce its value to the man who buys it. It is a big problem and I just leave the matter there. It shows that the question is one which cannot be dealt with offhand. It is very complex and very involved, and it would take the united wisdom of the whole of this committee to bring about an improvement. However I think improvement can be made in the law.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle said that even apart from the benefits that may be expected to spring from an investigation, the question of improving the morale of our people on the farm is well worth considering. I think I am safe in saying, without laying myself open to the accusation of anything like pessimism, that the morale of the people on the land throughout the whole civilized world, and not merely this country, is low. Anything that can be done to remove either real or imaginary grievances should be done. An imaginary grievance is often nearly as bad as a real one to the man who cherishes it, and we should not be intolerant of people when we find out their grievances are imaginary. I was closely associated with the grain trade for years, and I can appreciate the difficulties that arise when you are dealing with a question so involved. I never saw anybody yet who, on his first glimpse of it, was not ready to be permeated with suspicion because he did not understand it. The more one understands the intricacies of the grain trade, the more a lot of these mysterious things of which complaint is made disappear because they are capable then of being understood.

I am well acquainted with Mr. Searle, Mr. Horne and Mr. W. W. Thompson, the latter an octogenarian whose honour is above reproach. These are some of the men engaged in the grain trade. I hold no brief for them, but I think some of those who make charges are in the same position to-day that I was twenty-five years ago when I thought that no good thing could come out of the grain exchange.

Now let me endeavour to comply briefly with the request of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). Just as soon as the crop is sufficiently dry to thresh action is taken. I may say that the low grade grain, as a rule, is slower in drying than good grain, with the result that it is usually the middle of October—from that to the 20th—when the inspection department, through its various agencies secures samples of the grain from every important area throughout the Canadian west. Those samples are obtained from the threshing machines through the various channels through which we have been getting them for years. As soon as they are secured the various members of the Grain Standards Board, composed of millers, dealers, and farmers, some of whom have been serving for twenty-five years, are notified by the secretary, Mr. C. N. Bell, that the annual meeting will be held in the city of Winnipeg at a given date to fix the standards for that year. When the board meets the bags are all arranged. There are fifty or sixty bags in approximate grades. Then the members of the board proceed each with a bucket or tin to go round to the different bags, each bag having a number to indicate that it was the one from which the sample was taken. They start we will say, at No. 4, that is the first commercial grade under No. 3, and the members of the board go about and build up from the samples from various districts as near as possible to the No. 4 of the previous year, and yet having entirely different characteristics. The year before it might have been a No. 4 because, we will say, of rust—thin, meager, lean stuff, but still of quite a good color. Or it might have been graded as No. 4 because of frost. That makes it a very difficult thing sometimes to get a standard sample of the same commercial value as the standard sample for the year previous. It is quite an involved business collecting standards, but that is the way it is done. We bring the wheat into the north light and spread it on the table. Three or four samples of the same grade are selected. Then they are set out in the light and compared in order to determine which comes nearest to the No. 4 sample of the year before. Next the samples are tested in the scales for weight, and finally we have a vote on the matter and that decides the grade for No. 4 for the current year. We do the same in the case of No. 5 and No. 6. Before we do No. 5 we take all the sacks from which samples were taken—a tin pailful having been taken from a number in succession—and empty them on the floor in a big pile and mix them up together. After giving them a thorough mixing we take a sample from it and compare it with what we chose before, and if they are similar—that is to say if the sample taken when the bags are emptied is similar to that taken from the respective tin pails—a vote is taken and the grade decided upon.

That briefly is the procedure. I have seen articles in the press making great sport of it. A person with a sense of humour and an active pen can ridicule anything especially something that he knows nothing about. However we have not been able to devise a better means. The only difficulty has been that as the result of rust or frost in order to get the samples graded properly you had to add a certain amount of low grade wheat. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle and the rest of the hon. members for the West will understand why and how that is done. But in order to meet that situation one year we had two series of low grades, one low grade series, Nos. 4, 5 and 6, as a result of frost and a corresponding series of low grades as a result of rust. And there you are. There are the two of them; you pay your money and take your choice. In the actual working out it was found that when they went on the markets of the world the prices of the two were practically indentical and the result was we never tried that dual system again.

I think I have covered all the ground, and I want to express my appreciation of the moderate manner in which the whole question has been discussed, and also to assure the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, that the spirit of his resolution has either been or is being complied with. When the matter comes up for inquiry before the special committee, if it is found that their facilities for research are so limited that they cannot get at the bottom of it, it will be their privilege to make a recommendation, and go as far as they can. The sample markets are still get-at-able. A great many phases of the matter are capable of thorough investigation, but if it is found it cannot be dealt with, either on account of insufficient time, or from being operated from one centre or from another, then it will be within the province of that committee to make a recommendation accordingly, and any recommendation made, either in the direction of a fuller and more favourable investigation, or otherwise, I am sure, will receive full consideration by the government of the day. Whatever becomes of this resolution, I may say that I do not feel strongly about it, as I think that the spirit of the resolution has been complied with. I do not think harm will be done if it passes. I leave the matter with my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton, N.B.): It is not my purpose to prolong the debate, but I would associate myself with the mover and seconder of the motion. No hon. member who has sat in this House for the last three or four years, and certainly no member who was here last year, will doubt that there have been some abuses of the Grain Act and in the handling of that very important commodity which contributes so largely to the wealth of Canada. I think the government would be well advised to inquire thoroughly into the matter. As regards the method that should be pursued, not being so well acquainted with the grain business as are my hon. friends from the West I do not, of course, feel like making any very definite suggestions. I should think, however, that if it is found that the scope of the committee which it is proposed to appoint is not adequate—and I doubt very much whether a parliamentary committee could deal fully with the subject—the government should appoint a commission to go thoroughly into all the circumstances in order that the investigation might be as complete as possible. However, as I have said, I do not intend to offer any suggestions in that direction.

I intervene in the debate especially to urge upon the government the advisability of extending the scope of the investigation to the marketing of all farm products, particularly those raised for export, instead of confining it to wheat or grain alone. We have a serious situation in eastern Canada. While we do not grow wheat for export, we grow a crop that is as important to us as wheat is to the West. And at the present time the outlook for the potato growers of eastern Canada is serious indeed as a result of some things that possibly are beyond our control, although there are some contributing factors that can be remedied by action on the part of the government. During the past summer the government established a frost-proof warehouse at the port of St. John to facilitate the export trade to Cuba. I might say that it became necessary for me to do a great deal of work this summer towards getting the project carried through. I am not blaming the government, but they had information that this frost-proof warehouse was not necessary at St. John, and that information came from persons who were interested in cornering the potato export trade of New Brunswick. When I came to Ottawa and explained the situation the government, I think, were fully seized with the importance of providing these facilities at St. John.

But we are faced with what is possibly a more serious difficulty. While the United States market was open to us our shipping problem was a fairly simple one; we just shipped by the carload. But since that market has been closed to us by the American emergency tariff, Cuba has been practically the only outlet for any quantity of our potatoes. I urged upon the government last spring, apart from the providing of these facilities at St. John, the importance of giving us a regular service of the Government Merchant Marine between St. John and Cuba. I would make that representation even stronger now, because my worst fears have been realized with regard to transportation from St. John to that island. In order to ship potatoes from St. John to Cuba our shippers must charter a vessel and load it with potatoes. If they cannot fill all the space with potatoes they must pay for it anyway. This puts the export business in potatoes into the hands of a few of the largest shippers of New Brunswick. The smaller shippers are practically shut out because they cannot charter and load a vessel at each trip.

There is another condition to be contended with in Cuba; and while we have no control over the actual trade in Cuba I believe that regular sailings from St. John would enable us to overcome the difficulty from this end. To-day there is a combine in Cuba that handles possibly two-thirds of the trade in potatoes on that island. I know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb), were he in his place, could verify the statement I am about to make, that there are a number of independent wholesale potato dealers in Cuba outside the combine who have been unable to get supplies from our exporters in New Brunswick because the Cuban combine, to whom our exporters have been shipping, absolutely refuses to take delivery of any potatoes from a vessel if there are any potatoes on it for one of the independent dealers.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I would call his attention to the fact that he is not speaking to the resolution. The question before the House has reference to the conditions of grain marketing, and the hon. member is speaking on some other subject. I would ask him to bring his remarks into conformity with the resolution.

Mr. CALDWELL: I certainly bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I was merely urging the government not to limit the scope of the inquiry to grain alone, and was endeavouring to show the necessity for making it comprehensive enough to embrace the subject to which I was referring. I should like to have an assurance from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), that when the proposed committee begins its deliberations, or when the commission, if the government decide to appoint one, is constituted, I may have leave to submit this matter for consideration. I thought this an opportune time to bring to the attention of the government the fact that there are other important exports in Canada besides grain, in the handling of which there are great abuses.

Hon. C. A. STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Needless to say, the department over which I, for the time being, have control, is very vitally interested in this question. Indeed, so vitally interested are we that it is the one field that is left open, under the provisions of the Immigration Act as it stands to-day, for which we may secure settlers. Owing to the occupational test and the fact that there has not been employment for intending immigrants to Canada, and the fact that those immigrants whom we are trying to induce to come to this country must be of the agricultural class, or domestic servants, any matter that affects agriculture is of vital importance to the Department of Immigration.

It is needless to say that in these days of readjustment agriculture is suffering more severely than any other industry in this country. It is desirable that this unfortunate condition of affairs should be changed, and with a view to ascertaining if some remedies at least might be applied through the agency of government, you find in the Speech from the Throne that a special committee is to be appointed as wide in scope as that requested by my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Caldwell). When proposing this inquiry it was not the intention of the government that it should be confined to the one subject of grain marketing, but rather that it should cover the wider field of all agricultural activities. My hon. friend who has brought forward this resolution (Mr. Millar) has introduced a question that is not at all new, and in my remarks to-night I shall confine myself to his resolution.

His contention is that a special committee of this House would have neither the facilities nor the power to make the inquiry necessary to enable them to recommend a solution of the problem. Two features appealed to the government in discussing this matter. There is no desire on our part to circumscribe the inquiry in the slightest degree either with respect to the marketing of grain or to any other matter that hon. members may be desirous of having investigated as being of importance to agriculture. But we have had commissions in the past dealing with this very question, and it will be remembered that the one last appointed came to a somewhat untimely end not very long ago.

There are a few difficulties of grain marketing which it is doubtful if we can remove. Ten or twelve years ago I was directly interested in marketing grain, and I found that there is one type of farmer whom it is very difficult to protect, namely, the man who takes his grain and sells it on the street or to the local elevator. I have not yet heard of any scheme that will protect him, nor do I know whether one can be devised. We who raise and market grain in western Canada know how serious a problem that is to deal with. This year during the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) I had the pleasure of looking after his department and I did not let any opportunity pass to facilitate the movement of grain. The sending of the commission to Vancouver to investigate when a blockade seemed imminent was for the purpose of keeping that outlet open if at all possible. We took some chances in that connection, and one hon. member told you the other evening that the transfer of bills of lading to allow the loading of grain freely at the port of Vancouver assisted very materially in overcoming the threatened blockade. The cleaning of grain and its storage in the Calgary elevator also helped. We are anxious to maintain the flow freely to the Pacific coast, but that does not help the very large number of farmers who sell by the wagon load throughout the whole season. Indeed, when a blockade occurs, as any farmer knows, they are the men who suffer most severely, and usually they are most remote from the points at which they market their grain. Therefore any drop in price affects those who usually can least stand the loss. But frankly, I doubt if any of us would be able to secure evidence that would assist that class of farmers.

Then the inquiry resolves itself into an investigation of the inspection and the mixing of grain. The man who ships his carload of grain, and is not satisfied with the return he gets can have the transaction reviewed. You may strengthen your inspectional system, and with that I do not intend to deal.

There is a great difference of opinion on the question of the sample markets, but what I had in mind when discussing this matter in government circles was that within the confines of the membership of this House, within the confines even of the Progressive membership, there are men who know every phase of the marketing conditions surrounding wheat. I do not believe that a commission will be able to secure any new evidence bearing upon those conditions. But a committee can summon before it the grain commissioners and the grain operators, and it can get the outturn of the mixing houses as well as of the larger elevators at Fort William. It rather goes to confirm what I have always had in the back of my head in connection with grain marketing or the fixing of our samples. With all due respect to my good friend, when I was handling grain actively in western Canada I always had a suspicion that the grades upon which we sold our grain were fixed too high, with consequent detriment to the farmer who had grain to sell. I may be wrong about that. However, while I had charge of the Department of Trade and Commerce I wired my colleague (Mr. Robb) to get samples off the Liverpool market, in order, as suggested by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) that we might have them before us for comparison when discussing the matter. Those samples will be here for the inspection of members of this committee, and we will secure all evidence available from the sources where the difficulty originates, namely, in the inspection and mixing. With that evidence before us we will endeavour to improve these facilities, if they are capable of improvement, and we will do it this session even if it requires an amendment to the Grain Act. If that evidence is not sufficient—and undoubtedly hon. members of this House will be prepared to give evidence and to suggest what evidence might be brought here of an expert character—then the government stand ready and willing to go to any length to settle, if at all possible, this very vexed question.

In my opinion we were wise, on the evidence we had in hand, to appoint a commission to investigate the lake shipping combine that we think exists to the detriment of the western farmer, and we are willing to carry on an investigation that will help to solve his difficulties in connection with the growing and marketing of his grain. The question is whether it would be better to start a commission at once upon the inquiry. I have attended many sittings of these commissions, and some of the material dealt with is not of very much value; they frequently wander very far from the point when it comes to evidence that is gathered indiscriminately. But this committee can decide what evidence is vital and what concerns should be brought here. The grain board itself should be here to show the net result of a year's operations, and with this and other information we can judge whether or not we have, through this process, been milked to a very large extent in connection with grain marketing.

Let me say this further thing: In the years when I was actively interested in this matter, we were furnished with Canadian samples and secured standard samples for grading in Minneapolis, and invariably, not upon expert test but with the naked eye, a difference of one grade could be observed between our standard and that of the American sample. I have not examined samples in recent years, but I assume that the same condition would exist to-day. My contention is that those who fixed the standards for the Canadian grain trade fixed them too high, with resulting detriment to the producer. When we get the samples from Liverpool we shall be able to compare them with the samples upon which our grain is graded in western Canada, and in that way I think we can arrive quickly and definitely at a conclusion as to what will be necessary to assist in the settling of this rather vexed question.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): Mr. Speaker I do not wish to make any lengthy remarks on this subject, for I do not know very much about the mixing of grain, although I am the son of a farmer. But I would like to ask the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) if he would add to his resolution, after the word "grain" in the first paragraph, the words "and potatoes." I do not believe he will refuse to grant that request. The reason why I ask him to do that is this. Our American friends are coming over to New Brunswick for potato seed. It seems that we are growing the best potatoes in Canada, and our difficulty—just as it is with the grain growers—is the necessity for an improved system of marketing our potato seed. I would ask my hon. friend, therefore, to include these words in his motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind hon. members that when the mover of the resolution speaks, he closes the debate. If, therefore, any hon. member wishes to address the House on the subject, he should do so now.

Mr. MICHAUD: If I may be allowed, in case my hon. friend does not like to make the amendment I suggest, I would propose it myself.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to spend very much time in closing the debate. There seems to be a unanimity of opinion in regard to the necessity for an investigation.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) has just said that a commission of this nature could not bring out very much new evidence. It is some years since an investigation of this kind was held, and all the time our system has been changing. The mixing elevator system, methods of mixing grain, the transfer of cars and many other evils have grown up since the last investigation took place, and I feel quite sure that even those in this House who are best posted on the subject cannot say that they know all about these matters, or that they know what allegations are true and what are not. Several charges have been made; and none of us are certain as to their accuracy. We shall make a great mistake if we base legislations on rumors or hearsay; we should have the actual facts before us.

The hon. minister stated also that he believed our present grades were too high. I must disagree with him in that respect; I do not think we suffer from that. If one raises a superior grade of grain, it is hardly just that he should not receive the better price. If his very best grain is thrown into something which is poor, naturally he must take the average of the good and the bad. The man who raises No. 2 Northern is not injured in the least if his neighbour raises grain that is one grade better and receives a little better price.

The last speaker asked that the words "and potatoes" be added to the resolution. Personally I have not a very strong objection to the addition of these words. But it may be suggested that those who are appointed to investigate the grain trade would naturally be men who are posted in that trade, and I was wondering whether they would have the necessary insight into and knowledge of the problems which my hon. friend has in mind. I was wondering whether that matter could not be brought before the special committee. If that, however, is not satisfactory to my hon. friend, and if it is thought by the House that it would be best to have the two subjects investigated by the same commission, I would offer no objection to the addition of the words suggested.

I have nothing more to say, except in regard to the personnel of the commission. I am convinced that it is very necessary to have men on this commission who are well posted on the grain trade. I am not sure that it is always wise to depend on a lawyer to act as solicitor for a commission after its appointment. I remember one experience where one of the best lawyers in Winnipeg was engaged, a man well known throughout Canada, than whom for ability in his chosen profession I believe there is none better, yet I have seen him badly tied up when dealing face to face with the expert members of the grain exchange. He admitted to me that his knowledge did not go deep enough. He could get at the information on the surface, but when it came down to the difficult matters, the men who were dealing on the exchange day after day and knew all the ramifications of the business could twist and turn and get away from him. He admitted that to me more than once. I just mention that lest it might be thought that any men in whom the public had confidence, whether they had an intimate knowledge of the grain trade or not, might be trusted to do this work provided they had a competent lawyer to act as solicitor. I do not think that would be wise.

I am willing to insert the words "and potato" before the word "trade" and also before the word "marketing" in the last paragraph.

Motion as amended agreed to.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

MOTION BY MR. WOODSWORTH FOR WITHDRAWAL OF CANADA'S CLAIMS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is in the interest of world peace that Canada should withdraw all claims on Germany for reparations.

He said: One perhaps almost hesitates to introduce a motion of such far-reaching importance as this, on a question on which there has been comparatively little discussion in our Canadian press. However, anyone who has been following the situation at all as it has been discussed in the Old Country papers must recognize that we in Canada have a certain responsibility with regard to the Old World situation. I feel that since we were asked to participate in the great world war we ought to have some voice at this time in deciding what our policy toward European affairs shall be, and especially as to our attitude toward the Peace Treaty of Versailles which concluded the war, and which in the judgment of a great many is very largely responsible for the chaotic conditions that prevail in Europe to-day.

I cannot discuss this resolution without discussing to a certain extent at least the Peace Treaty of Versailles, and also the war itself. One difficulty is that our Canadian people have had comparatively little discussion of the various aspects of affairs in Europe during and since the war. We have been perhaps inclined to say: Great Britain is at war, or Great Britain has adopted such and such a policy, and we must follow the lead of Great Britain. I think perhaps the time has come when we ought rather to say: Since we have a certain responsibility in this matter, we must think out these questions for ourselves, and determine each on its own merits. I remember very well being in England during the time of the Boer war and hearing its merits discussed very freely in halls of various kinds, as well as reading the discussions in the newspapers. As you all know, at that time Lloyd George was among those who were bitterly opposed to the Boer war, and I think later events have shown that he was in the right. On my return to Canada, after the war was over, it was almost a shock to find that the people of this country had absolutely refused to consider any other than the one point of view. They said "England is at war, we must rush to her defence"; and apparently they were greatly perturbed if anyone suggested that there could be any other policy than that which happened to have been adopted by the party which was then in power.

Now with reference to the reasons alleged why we went to war. We were told that we went to war because Germany invaded Belgium, and it was only later that we discovered that Canada had been committed to war two or three days before Germany invaded Belgium. I think the Americans, probably, have been greatly excited during the last few months since they have learned more definitely the cargo that the Lusitania bore; not that anyone is exonerating Germany for the attack, but they are understanding a little bit more fully some of the circumstances that surround the various events of the war.

Further we ought to remember very clearly that whilst certain policies may be arrived at in Great Britain, these may in fact represent the conclusions of only a small section of the British people—possibly the conclusions only of her diplomats or her great financiers. Some of us take the ground here that the interests of the common people of this country are not identical with the interests of the moneyed kings of this country; and a great many of the people of England, as shown by the last election, are also taking the ground that we ought not to follow the great financial leaders of Great Britain. If we criticize British policy, we are criticizing the policy not of the great masses of the people of Great Britain but the policy of a certain definite section of the people of that country.

Further I think, perhaps, it were well that when we refer to Germany we should, as far as possible, dispel from our minds the idea of the Germany which was conjured up during the war. Germany is no more a single entity than is Great Britain. Rather is it composed of a very large number of sections of people, very widely diverse in character. The Germany of the junkers and the war lords is one Germany and, I think, a Germany that very few of us here have any use for. But that is not the Germany of a large majority of the people. I remember that even during the heat of the war there was one man, at least, who stood up in the Reichstag and there suggested that war credits should not be voted, Karl Liebnecht, who was at that time hailed as being the bravest man in Europe. He represented another type of Germany, a type that was at that time protesting against the carrying on of the war.

However, I should not like to think so much of the Germany of the past, but rather to call attention to the fact that we have to deal since the war with a new Germany. Some among us have said that the Kaiser was responsible for the war, but we must remember that the Kaiser has been deposed, that the German people themselves have repudiated him and some of the war lords that were associated with him, and the policies which they represent. We are dealing with another Germany than the Germany that went to war. More than that—and this is the most important point it seems to me that at this stage we should keep in view—the indemnities which were saddled upon Germany by the Peace Treaty of Versailles are to be extended throughout the life time of another generation. Little German girls and boys playing around —if they play in Germany these days—are to be asked to pay reparations which simply means to give of their time and effort to pay for what men, for whom they had no responsibility whatever, were guilty of. And as we look forward to these payments extending away along through the years to come, it seems to me we may well pause and ask whether it is right, whether it is in the interests of world peace, that we should attempt to carry out a programme of this character.

I should like to place this resolution frankly on the basis of the interests of world peace. We must rise above the old war-time viewpoint of one nation or empire set against another nation or empire, and think of the actual situation as it presents itself to-day and the extent to which we can establish a greater measure of good will and peace in the world of to-day. I take it that the Treaty of Versailles which closed the war was based on the theory of Germany's sole responsibility for the war, and I must ask your indulgence if I go into the matter a little on this point. Lloyd George said on March 3, 1921:

> For the Allies, German responsibility for the war is fundamental. It is the basis upon which the structure of the treaty at Versailles has been erected, and if that acknowledgement is repudiated or abandoned, the treaty is destroyed. We wish, therefore, once and for all, to make it quite clear that German responsibility for the war must be treated by the Allies as a chose jugée.

But murder will out. You cannot always fool the people in these great concerns, and the publications which have been given to the world in recent years will, I think, indicate clearly to any unprejudiced man who studies the documents that are brought to our notice that Germany should not bear the blame forced upon her in the Peace Treaty because she is not solely responsible for the war. I am not standing here as in any sense whatever exonerating Germany for the dastardly part she played in the war—I want that to be clearly understood—but at the same time I say that we must not hold Germany solely responsible for it. Mr. A. J. Nock in a little book The Myth of a Guilty Nation which may be found in the Parliamentary Library has summarized the statements which have been given to the world recently. I may say that these statements are well documented if any of you are interested in reading them or in trying to follow them out in detail. Let me give these statements in brief:

> 1. The British and French General Staffs had been in active collaboration for war with Germany ever since January, 1906.
> 2. The British and French Admiralty had been in similar collaboration.
>
> 3. The late Lord Fisher (First Sea Lord of the British Admiralty), twice in the course of these preparations, proposed an attack upon the German fleet and a landing upon the coast of Pomerania, without a declaration of war.
>
> 4. Russia had been preparing for war ever since 1909, and the Russian and French General Staffs had come to a formal understanding that Russian mobilization should be held equivalent to a declaration of war.
>
> 5. Russian mobilization was begun in the spring of 1914, under the guise of "tests," and these tests were carried on continuously to the outbreak of the war.
>
> 6. In April, 1914, four months before the war, the Russian and French naval authorities initiated joint plans for maritime operations against Germany.
>
> 7. Up to the outbreak of the war, Germany was selling grain in considerable quantities to both France and Russia.
>
> 8. It cannot be shown that the German government ever in a single instance, throughout all its dealings with foreign governments, demanded or intimated for Germany anything more than a position of economic equality with other nations.

Mr. Lloyd George said on December 23, 1920:

> The more one reads memoirs and books written in the various countries of what happened before the first of August, 1914, the more one realizes that no one at the head of affairs quite meant war at that stage. It was something into which they glided, or rather, staggered or stumbled, perhaps through folly, and a discussion, I have no doubt, would have averted it.

Here we have a man occupying a most responsible position in the British Empire, a man who is credited with having done more than any other man in the prosecution of the war, coming out after the war is all over and saying that they simply stumbled into it, and that a discussion might have prevented it. Ex-Premier Nitti, in his book, Peaceless Europe, says—and he was another, let us remember, who was in the midst of things, and who had inside knowledge of what was transpiring at the time of the Peace Treaty, and who has intimate knowledge of the events of the war:

> When our countries were engaged in the struggle, and we were at grips with a dangerous enemy, it was our duty to keep up the morale of our people and to paint our adversaries in the darkest colours, laying on their shoulders all the blame and responsibility of the war, but after the world conflict, now that Imperial Germany has fallen, it would be absurd to maintain that the responsibility of the war is solely and wholly attributable to Germany and that earlier in 1914 in Europe there had not developed a state of things fatally destined to culminate in a war.

Let me again remind you that it was in the Peace Treaty of Versailles, that we had the arrangement with regard to reparations which we deal with in our resolution. It was the very basis of that Treaty of Versailles that Germany was solely and wholly responsible for the war, a position that is abandoned by at least two of the premiers responsible for the drafting of that treaty. Now it is quite obvious that we in Canada are in a position—

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. member tell me who those premiers were?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Lloyd George was one and Nitti the other.

Mr. VIEN: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that Lloyd George stated that Germany was not responsible for the war?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall read again, if I must, the passage which I have already quoted to the House.

> The more one reads memoirs and books written in the various countries of what happened before the 1st of August, 1914, the more one realizes that no one at the head of affairs quite meant war at that stage. It was something into which they glided, or rather staggered and stumbled, perhaps through folly, and a discussion, I have no doubt, would have averted it.

That is very different from his earlier statements of a great conspiracy of which Germany has been guilty. It is very different from the thought that Germany is, as Premier Nitti had said, wholly and solely responsible for the war.

In Canada, during the war, we had no opportunity, as neither had other nations, to discuss the real causes of the war; in fact, it became a crime to discuss the causes of the war. Quoting the law, I find the provision:

> It shall be an offence to print, publish or publicly express an adverse or unfavourable statement, report or opinion concerning the causes of the present war, or the motives or purpose for which Canada or the United Kingdom of Great Britain or Ireland, or any of the Allied nations entered upon, or are prosecuting the same, which may tend to arouse hostile feeling, create unrest, or unsettle, or inflame public opinion.

Now that the war is over we have an opportunity almost for the first time to discuss publicly the real causes of the war, and perhaps we do so even yet in a spirit of prejudice which it is extremely difficult for any of us to overcome, it is only the seriousness of the situation in Europe which forces us to enter upon a question of this kind.

As to responsibilty for war, might I call to your attention a very excellent pamphlet, which some of you probably have, published by Mr. John S. Ewart, K.C., entitled Canada and British Wars. Few of us have had the opportunity of studying closely the many documents which have been put forward in recent years. We all recognize that Mr. Ewart is a very profound student of constitutional history and of European affairs. Mr. Ewart distinguishes between what is called the predisposing causes and the precipitating causes. Let me quote a paragraph or two with regard to the predisposing causes, the general situation which existed in Europe when the war broke out—

> As already indicated, distinction ought to be made between the predisposing causes—I prefer to call these the roots—of the war, and the precipitating causes. The whole subject is much too large for treatment here. I must content myself with stating—very shortly, and therefore, inadequately,—the conclusions, at which, after prolonged study of the immense mass of material now available, I have arrived.
>
> 1. The chief of the predisposing causes in western Europe was the desire of France to repossess herself of Alsace Lorraine, which had been taken from her in a war which she had precipitated.
>
> 2. The chief of the predisposing causes in eastern Europe was the inclusion of Bosnia and Herzegovina in the Austro-Hungarian Empire. For the inception of that situation (Berlin Conference 1878), the United Kingdom and Austria-Hungary were principally responsible. For its development Austria-Hungary was alone responsible.
>
> 3. The predisposing causes, as between the United Kingdom and Germany were (1) German competition in manufactures, trade, mercantile marine, and war navy; (2) the substitution of Germany for France (the British traditional enemy in western Europe) as the potential aggressor upon Belgium and Holland, and the consequent establishment of a menace upon the North Sea coasts; and (3) the substitution of Germany for Russia (the British traditional enemy in eastern Europe) as the potential aggressor upon Constantinople and India.
>
> 4. A general predisposing cause was the erection of Europe into two vast military camps, for which all the Great Powers were, in varying degrees, responsible.

In giving the situation which prevailed immediately on the eve of the war, let me turn to Lord Loreburn, who was in a splendid position to know the situation. He says—

> Serbia gave to the Austro-Hungarian Empire, cause of just offence, as our ambassador frankly admits in his published dispatches. We (England) had no concern in that quarrel, as Sir Edward Grey says in terms. But Russia, the protectress of Serbia, came forward to prevent her being utterly humiliated by Austria. We were not concerned in that quarrel either, as Sir Edward also says. And then Russia called upon France under their treaty to help in the fight. France was not concerned in that quarrel any more than ourselves, as Sir Edward informs us. But France was bound by a Russian treaty, of which we did not know the terms, and then France called on us for help. We were tied by the relations which our Foreign Office had created, without apparently realizing that they had created them.

Reference is here made to those secret treaties, which were not known to the world generally until they were published 9 p.m. by the Bolshevik who had obtained access to the archives in Petrograd. I have never yet seen these secret treaties published in any Canadian newspaper. They were first published, I think, in England in the Manchester Guardian, a reliable old paper which we all know. They were not sent broadcast to this country, and there are those who do not yet know of the serious nature of these treaties, which had a great deal to do with tying us to France and Russia and thus preventing us from acting at the moment when possibly war might have been avoided. But we have to deal with other treaties which were made in the course of the war. I want to quote from a man whom I regard as a high authority, Mr. E. D. Morel, who, by the way, it is of interest to remark, defeated Mr. Winston Churchill. And this was one of the questions which were to the fore in the recent elections in Great Britain. Mr. Morel, in Foreign Affairs, says:

In this period it has been demonstrated by the acts of the Allied governments that our people were grossly deceived in respect to the motives proclaimed by those governments in waging the war and in rejecting overtures of peace.

For all those to whom authentic information was accessible, the demonstration had been complete long before the end of the war. From the date of the secret treaties between the Allies, the war became a war for loot.

Mr. Lloyd George, speaking at the Queen's Hall, August 4, 1917, said:

What are we fighting for? To defeat the most dangerous conspiracy ever plotted against the liberty of nations; carefully, skilfully, insidiously, clandestinely plotted in every detail with ruthless, cynical determination.

To continue:

And that was very early in the day, although their existence only became known (in part) at the end of 1917, through the Manchester Guardian. It is doubtful whether the general public ever knew of them at all, i.e., in any comprehensive sense. Secret negotiations began between the Allied governments for the division of enemy territory and resources almost immediately after the war broke out. By the spring of 1915 the British government had consented to the Tsardom realising its secular ambition, i.e., the acquisition of Constantinople and the Straits, receiving in exchange a large slice of Persian territory—Persia not even being an enemy; Italy had been induced to enter the war by a treaty ensuring the break-up of Austria-Hungary, with large territorial concessions to Italy in Europe and in Asia. All through 1915 and the summer of 1916 the bargaining with Rumania continued, and was finally concluded in August of that year, which also saw the conclusion of the secret bargain with Japan at China's expense. By the spring of 1917, Russia and France had made their arrangements for the division of Germany, which would have brought Russian Cossacks to within sight of the Oder. When Mr. Lloyd George was declaiming in the Queen's Hall, in August, 1917, about defeating a German "conspiracy" against the liberty of nations, a series of secret pacts, constituting a more flagrant invasion of the liberty of nations than Napoleon ever dreamed of, were lying in the safes of the Foreign Offices of London, Paris, Petrograd, Rome, Bukarest, and Belgrade. And the young men of Britain were being called from the factory, the office, and the plough to fight and die for the noblest of ideals! Has such a betrayal of a people's faith ever been recorded?"

Let me again say that in his treatment of the case Mr. Morel sees that all these statements are fully documented. You can read them in pamphlets published broadcast throughout Great Britain. One other word from Mr. Morel:

In other words, it is not a case of Germany and her partner having spent far vaster sums than their potential foes before the war. Incidentally it may be remarked that although before the war the British people were supposedly the least "militarised" people in Europe, these secret commitments had made of them the most heavily taxed people in the world for war purposes. When the war came the average burden of taxation for war purposes borne by the British citizen was much heavier than the burden of the French, German, Austrian, Russian and Italian citizen. Thus the real combination which Germany and Austria had to face was a Franco-Russian-British combination. Yet, in the decade preceding the war, their expenditure in preparedness for war fell far short even of the Franco-Russian expenditure. And, almost to the last, the German government in its blindness was convinced that Britain would remain neutral.....But the most astounding fact which French publications reveal is that, when the war broke out, the French army alone was numerically as strong as the German!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If any hon. gentlemen doubt this statement they must consult the records. Mr. Francis Neilson in a book How Diplomats Make War, which can be found in the Parliamentary Library, has this to say on another point in connection with the pre-war preparations:

The story of the naval conspiracy is told with extraordinary and brutal frankness by Lord Fisher in his book entitled "Memories". Lord French, Colonel Repington and Lord Haldane all confirm the story of the secret military and naval conversations between the British and French Staffs, begun in January, 1906, without the knowledge of—consent of even—the British cabinet, let alone that of the House of Commons. The reports of German diplomats recently translated and published in England exhibit the course of Allied war preparations and of the progressive isolation of Germany. The reports of the Russian Foreign Minister, Sazonof, written in 1912, show the extent to which the Entente powers were even then pledged to one another and the evidence given by Marshal Joffre before the Metallurgic Committee in Paris in 1919, is conclusive with respect to the military understandings which existed among the British, French and Belgian Staffs.

Some hon. members would seem to be incredulous with regard to some of these statements. I do not wonder. Let me give an official statement concerning the question whether Great Britain was unprepared.

There is no doubt that the machinery for setting our forces in action had reached an order of completeness in detail that has no parallel in our history.

That is taken from the official documents issued by direction of the historical section of the Committee on Imperial Defence, and can be found in Naval Operations by Sir Julian Corbett. And again, Viscount Haldane says in his book Before the War:

To say, therefore, that we were quite unprepared is inaccurate.

Mr. Morel, whom I have already quoted, very well sums up the situation at the same time that he gives the source of the information, which I do not think has been very widely disseminated in Canada:

The story of British unpreparedness has vanished with the published admissions of Lord Fisher, Lord Haldane, Lord French, Sir Julian Corbett, Colonel Repington, Captain Peter Wright, and a host of others —not to mention Blunt's "Diaries". The legend of French and Russian unpreparedness was exclusively for British consumption; it was never advanced in France or Russia—indeed the feeling in French and Russian official circles in the years immediately preceding the war was one of considerable confidence at the prospect of war. In any case, the legend has vanished with the publication of the Imperial Russian archives, the Belgian diplomatic dispatches, the book of the French General Buat, and that of M. Paleologue, the French Ambassador at the Russian Imperial Court, not to mention the extensive data now available concerning the Russian mobilisation and the character and composition of the Russian invasion of Prussia at the outbreak of the war. These publications and others which might be mentioned, above all the correspondence dealing with the conclusion of the Franco-Russian Alliance, have also finally exploded the myth of the "wanton attack" upon France.

I think that in view of the evidence adduced, of which I have given but a very brief summary, we must conclude that Germany was not solely responsible for the war.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. member has given us the opinions of very eminent men with respect to the cause of the war. Will he not honour the House with his own opinion as to whether or not Britain caused the war?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have given the opinions of eminent men, based, as I have said, on documentary evidence which may be obtained if any one takes the trouble to consult the books quoted. It is obviously impossible for me to bring into this Chamber and quote all the documents to which I have made reference. My own opinion would have been of very little avail in the matter. I think the House will agree with me in that. But I do say that the opinion of some of the authorities I have quoted cannot be disregarded

Mr. LADNER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman misunderstood my question. I asked him if after the explanations given he would not favour us with his own opinion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have suggested, Mr. Speaker, that my own opinion on this particular case is of very little value to the House. I am not dealing with my own opinion, nor do I think the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) is very much concerned about my opinion in the matter. We are dealing with facts which are of a great deal more importance than mere opinions of individuals.

Now I come to the reparations as arranged for under the Peace Treaty. I presume that we have all read Mr. John M. Keynes' books on The Economic Consequences of the Peace and A Review of the Peace Treaty, in which he has made out a thorough case for revision. Perhaps it is hardly necessary for me to say that Mr. Keynes was the expert of the British Treasury at the Peace Conference at Versailles, and that his opinion has had the most profound influence upon British policy. Mr. Keynes states very clearly that Germany laid down her arms under certain expressed conditions, and he charges that these conditions were not lived up to by the Allies.

An hon. MEMBER: Well, well.

Mr. McMASTER: Everybody admits that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope hon. members will hardly question that statement. Let me summarize, or rather let me quote a paragraph or so from Mr. Keynes' book, because it is obvious that I cannot summarize the whole volume. He speaks of the conditions under which Germany laid down her arms. These were, among others, Wilson's Fourteen Points and some of the speeches that the then President of the United States had made, because it was following the assurances which he gave that Germany first began to treat with the Allies at this time.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit that this motion is out of order, and I refer you to rules 626 and 629 on page 168.

Mr. CANNON: What book is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. Rule 626 reads:

> This House will not proceed upon any petition, motion or bill for granting any money, or for releasing or compounding any sum of money owing to the Crown but in a Committee of the Whole House.

Then rule 629:

> The recommendation of the Crown is needed for such measures as bills relating to the extension of time for the repayment of the deposit which has become liable to forfeiture in the case of a private bill; the release on compounding of sums due to the Crown; the repeal of an exemption from an existing duty, as the burthen of the duty is thereby augmented; a proposal to repeal an existing drawback on export of sugar, as it effects an increase of charge upon the importers who desired to export sugar.

Therefore I submit that in the first place this motion cannot be considered except in the Committee of the Whole House; and, secondly, that it cannot be considered at all without the consent of the Crown.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I will consider the authority cited by the hon. member who raises the objection, and in the meantime the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) may continue his remarks.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let me quote then, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Keynes' statement as to the conditions under which Germany laid down her arms. They were, among others:

The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

(4) Adeqnate guarantees, given and taken, that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

(5) A free, open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, regard being had to the interest of the population concerned.

(6), (7), (8) and (11). The evacuation and "restoration" of all invaded territory, especially of Belgium. To this must be added the rider of the Allies, claiming compensation for all damage done to civilians and their property by land, by sea and from the air (quoted in full above). (8). The righting of "the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine." (13) An independent Poland, including "the territories inhabited by an indubitably Polish population" and "assured a free and secure access to the sea." (14). The League of Nations.

Before Congress on February 11, President Wilson said:

"There shall be no annexations, no contributions, no punitive damages. . .Self-determination is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril . . .Every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims amongst rival states."

In New York on September 27 he laid down the following principles:

(1) The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just.

(2) No special or separate interest of any single nation or group of nations can be made the basis of any part of the settlement which is not consistent with the common interest of all.

(3) There can be no leagues or alliances or special covenants and understandings within the general and common family of the League of Nations.

(4) There can be no special selfish economic combinations within the league and no employment of any form of economic boycott or exclusion, except as the power of economic penalty by exclusion from the markets of the world may be vested in the League of Nations itself as a means of discipline and control.

(5) All international agreements and treaties of every kind must be made known in their entirety to the rest of the world.

Mr. Keynes, after showing how these different principles have been violated by the treaty, concludes:

This was the atmosphere in which the Prime Minister left for Paris, and these the entanglements he had made for himself.

This was just after the Khaki election, I may say:

He had pledged himself and his government to make demands of a helpless enemy inconsistent with solemn engagements on our part, on the faith of which this enemy had laid down his arms. There are few episodes in history which posterity will have less reason to condone,——a war ostensibly waged in defence of the sanctity of international engagements ending in a definite breach of one of the most sacred possible of such engagements on the part of the victorious champions of these ideals.

And again on this subject let me quote ex-Premier Nitti in his Peaceless Europe:

The peace treaties are the most barefaced denial of all the principles which the Entente powers declared and proclaimed during the war; not only so, but they are a fundamental negation of President Wilson's famous Fourteen Points, which were supposed to constitute a solemn pledge and covenant, not only with the enemy, but with the democracies of the whole world. . .

But it will remain forever a terrible precedent in modern history that, against all pledges, all precedents and all traditions, the representatives of Germany were never even heard; nothing was left to them but to sign a treaty at a moment when famine and exhaustion and threat of revolution made it impossible not to sign it.

Germany has already consigned all her transferable wealth; the gold in her banks, her colonies, her commercial fleet, a large and even the best part of her railway material, her submarine cables, her foreign credits, the property of her private citizens in the victorious countries, etc., everything that could be handed over, even in opposition to the rights of nations such as are known in modern civilized states, Germany has given. She has also hypothecated all her national goods...

France had but one idea, and later on did not hesitate to admit it; to dismember Germany, to destroy her unity. By creating intolerable conditions of life, taking away territory on the frontier, putting large districts under military occupation, delaying or not making any diplomatic appointments and carrying on communications solely through military commissions, a state of things was brought about which must inevitably tend to weaken the constitutional unity of the German Empire. Taking away from Germany eighty-four kilometres of territory, nearly eight million inhabitants, and all the most important mineral resources, preventing the unity of the German people, and the six million and five hundred thousand of German Austrians to which Austria was then reduced, putting the whole German country under an interminable series of controls —all this did more harm to German unity than would have been done by taking the responsibility of a forcible and immediate division to which the Germans could not have consented and which the Allies could not have claimed to impose.

What is the present situation? I have quoted ex-Premier Lloyd George; let me quote one of his latest utterances, published on January 20, last:

France has once more jumped on the prostrate form of Germany and the sabots have come down with a thud that would sicken the heart of multitudes on both sides of the Atlantic whose friendship for France stood the losses and grievances of four years' war. But what good would it bring devastated France or her over-taxed Allies? The additional coal that would be wrung out of Germany would barely cover the direct cost of collection. Although Germany bears the extra cost, the expenses of these punitive measures must all in the end diminish the means of reparations and therefore fall on the victor.

Mr. CANNON: Is the hon. member quoting from articles written by Lloyd George and published in the Hearst papers?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quoting from articles written by Lloyd George and published in our Canadian daily papers.

Mr. CANNON: Which paper?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think in the Montreal Star, and I believe I got my copy from the Ottawa Citizen. Once more permit me to quote from an article by ex-Premier Nitti, published in the European press:

In 1914 and the years immediately following, when the free and democratic peoples saw France apparently attacked by Germany, they took active sides against German imperialism. England, Italy and the United States of America stepped one after another into line and gave their blood and their economic resources to the defence of France and the rights of democracy. But later the Entente developed into nothing else than a system of violence (Gewalt-system). No German representative of the theory of might (Gewaltthrorie) has ever so glorified might as has the Entente since the end of the war. When one considers that the occupation of the Rhineland, partly by negroes, costs about four million gold marks a year and brings with it, in addition, every possible kind of evil, including the legal prostitution of German women to black men and men of other colors; that Upper Silesia, in open contradiction of the Treaty of Versailles and the mandate of the plebiscite, was dismembered; that it is to-day still considered possible by demands for senseless damages to bring Germany under an alien finance control like that endured by Turkey; that the most highly cultivated peoples of the world have been forced under the rule of the least,—when one considers these things one can stand only in horror before this vast catastrophe that is not merely of an economic but rather one of a moral character.

In view of this situation it seems to me we ought to consider our whole policy in regard to reparations. And again, instead of voicing my own opinion, let me voice the opinion of one who knows well the conditions which obtained during the war, one of our most eminent Canadian statesmen, the Hon. N. W. Rowell.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who?

Mr. DUFF: You could not call him an eminent statesman.

Mr. CANNON: He is a dead one.

Mr. POWER: De mortuis nil nisi bonum.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Speaking in Guelph before the Canadian and Rotary Clubs on January 26, Mr. Rowell said—I quote one paragraph:

Canada's substantial claim to a share in the reparations is based on the inclusion of pension and separation allowances in the Treaty of Versailles. Canada should relinquish all claims under those heads, as they are not covered by the agreement under which Germany laid down her arms, and should not be included in the treaty. Further, as it is now admitted that Germany cannot pay even sufficient to cover the cost of restoring the devastated areas, any payments which might be made to Canada in respect of pensions and separation allowances would necessarily come out of the amount which should properly go to France and Belgium. If, after these deductions, there remains any further sum payable to Canada, we should be prepared to follow the lead of Great Britain and forego this amount in the interests of a general settlement of the whole question of reparations and inter-Allied debts. Fortunately for us, the government of Canada, both during and since the war, has based our finances on the assumption that we would have to pay our own costs of the war, and the failure to receive any sum from Germany on account of reparations, will not involve any change in our financial program.

Now, on this question of our share in the reparations, let me point out that according to the original agreement, as Mr. Rowell has shown, the inclusion of pensions and separation allowances was not involved in the conditions under which Germany laid down her arms. There are one or two misapprehensions that should at this stage be removed. There are some who imagine that private claims for damages will be paid in Canada. I am told by those associated with the Reparations Commission that there is no intention whatever, nor was there ever any, that private claims should be paid. It is true that an advertisement was sent out asking that people in Canada who had suffered damages should send in their claims, but this was done in order that Canada might be able to estimate the amount of damages she should claim. It was not the intention that the money so procured from Germany would be turned over to private individuals. That policy was very clearly stated in the British House of Commons by Mr. Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer. In reply to a question on May 4, 1920, Mr. Chamberlain said:

His Majesty's government has given careful consideration to the position of individuals in respect of whose losses reparation will be claimed by His Majesty's government. It must be understood that the claims to be made are claims by the British government in respect of a wrong done to the state, and not claims by individuals in respect of private wrongs, and that the government do not act as the agents of any individual to put forward his personal claim. Any payments that may be received from Germany are therefore the property of the nation, and no individual will have any claim in law for any sum which the British government may receive from Germany in respect of reparation.

On one other point, too, I think there should be a statement made, and that is with regard to the closely related question of the property or estates of German nationals in this country which have been seized by the Canadian government and are now being held. I believe there is a trust of something like $40,000,000 which is being administered. On this point may I quote a few sentences from the annual report of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. The president of the bank says:

In all references to it authorities on international law make it clear that our right to retain enemy property which falls within our control exists only so long as the enemy country fails to honour similar obligations or to restore our property.

Further:

It is with reference to these exceptions that difficulties are being encountered, out of which there may arise the very unfortunate conclusion that in the treaty departure has been made from principles which have been respected for centuries.

And still further:

We must not in this matter be influenced by anything but the facts, and by that honour among nations which has been displayed for centuries. It is true that the property and business interests of the Allies were sometimes very wrongfully dealt with in Germany, at least in the early years of the war, but it is also true that Germans ready and willing to settle debts directly with British creditors have been unable to do so because of the terms of the treaty. Every merchant seeking to do business in foreign countries, and every banker considerate of the credit of his country, should remember that international trade and finance are built on good faith ,and that we must avoid the possibility of these unfortunate exceptions in the treaty causing injustice and thus involving Canada in discredit.

Another point made by Mr. Rowell to which I would call attention is that if we were ever able to collect from Germany for our pensions or separation allowances, such sums would really come out of the amounts that ought to go to the building up of the devastated districts of France and Belgium. I have not been saying anything to-night with a view to arousing any feeling against France. I think, on the contrary, we may well say that if we relinquish the amounts which we claim, they might possibly go to the help of Germany in paying the amounts which ought to be paid to France and hence those districts which have suffered the most severely would be built up.

Let me very briefly summarize a few points which I should like to leave with this House.

First of all, that our claims under the Treaty of Versailles are contrary to international law as international law was understood before the war. I was reading only the other day the international conventions with regard to the laws and customs of war by land as signed at The Hague in 1899. It would seem as if we in our peace treaty at Versailles had contradicted almost all these conventions which had been drawn up, and which at that time were supposed to prevail amongst civilized nations when they were unfortunately drawn into war.

Next I would appeal on economic grounds. Canada's prosperity as that of other nations is dependent upon the prosperity of Europe. We cannot have prosperous conditions in Europe until the peace treaties are definitely modified. On that point let me quote from one who, I think, will be considered an authority, Professor R. A. Seligman, Professor of Economics at Columbia University. In the New York Times of November 5, 1922, Mr. Seligman says:

What is the situation in the continental countries of Europe? They have no gold to remit. They cannot send us their land, railroads or factories. They have no more securities of foreign countries to turn over, as England did during the war. There is no likelihood of any substantial increase in the invisible items which they could transfer to us. On the contrary, in the present perilous economic situation there is slight probability of their receiving additional sums on foreign investments or profits on a larger merchant marine, or gains through developing banks or insurance companies; and the sums yielded by a possible increase in American travellers abroad or in the sums remitted by immigrants to this country would be only a drop in the bucket.

Again:

The truth is our debtors are bankrupt. They cannot pay now, and will not be able to pay in any assignable time. I have found no prominent business man or banker here or abroad who believes that there is any possibility of paying the debts. You cannot extract water from a stone.

But even if the Allies could pay, the final question arises: Should we demand that they pay now and forthwith? If they have the ability to pay, have we the capacity to receive?

Still again:

No explanation can obscure the fact that, despite the three-cornered trade, a nation's commerce must be envisaged as a totality. If the rest of the world pays a debt by exporting more goods, whether to us or to another country, it makes it harder for us to export the usual quantity of goods in return. The reason why, under normal conditions, exports are mutually profitable, is that the exporting country is thereby enabled to secure imports, that is, to buy commodities. It is a matter of give and take. But when, in order to pay an immense debt, the rest of the world has to increase its exports to us, there is nothing to call for imports in return; and with this cessation of our exports to foreign countries our factories will close, our industries will languish and a period of business depression will set in.

That is, we must realize that the world to-day is a unity, and that just as in the human physical system you cannot have one diseased part without its affecting the whole body, so in the world to-day we cannot injure one member without all the members suffering with it.

I do not know whether it is at all possible that I appeal on the higher moral grounds, that we take this stand in the effort to bring about better conditions in Europe. We may demand our pound of flesh, but all through the history of the world there has been another strain of teaching running that mercy is greater even than justice. We are nominally a Christian country. I wonder if we can ever learn to begin to put in practice those words which I heard no later than this afternoon from the lips of the Speaker: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive." I suppose it is bad form to say that. I do not often come into prayers, but I do not see why we should not begin to try to practise some of these phrases that are so often upon our lips. It is quite true that the amount involved, so far as Canada is concerned, is not large. It may be true, as a good many have pointed out, that we will receive nothing anyway, but at least such an action of this kind on the part of Canada would be a certain gesture which might have some influence in other parts of the world. We read of an historic occasion on which a shot rang round the world. It is quite possible that action on the part of even a comparatively small nation such as Canada might have far reaching effects, and that our action may be followed by a somewhat similar action in other parts of Europe. Only the other day we were formally accepting the gift of a piece of land from France on which a monument might be erected to our men who fell at the front. I think none of us would withhold tribute to men who, from heroic motives, offered their all for what they believed to be the very highest and best, and yet one cannot but remember that the whole of Europe is strewn with monuments. I well recall some years ago spending a day on the battlefield of Waterloo and there seeing the great monument erected to the victors, Great Britain and Prussia, and in another part of the field a small monument, a most pathetic one I thought, an eagle with a broken pinion erected to the vanquished, France. Now the scene is changed. France is our ally for the time. Prussia has been our most deadly enemy. Before the monument is erected in France it may well be that relations between England and France may be most severely strained. I wonder whether, after all, we can best honour the memory of those who fell on the fields of France and Belgium by erecting monuments over there, or rather may we not do more by seeking to arrange our economic and social conditions in such a way that future wars will not be brought about.

You remember how Lawrence Housman seeks to give expression to the feelng of the men who fought at the front:

> We fought at Armageddon for the brotherhood of man;
> And safe within their fences the tricksters plied their trade.
> 'Twas the old fight we fought; and it ends as it began:
> The gamblers hold their hands till the last trump was played...
> And the freedom that we fought for is an unremembered tune.

Mr. Speaker, it seems, as we read history, as if the human race has climbed, by very small degrees, up the blood stained trail that has led to even the measure of civilization that we possess at the present time. Some recent developments have given to mankind a wonderful power, have given us control of machinery which might be used in the interests of mankind or, if used by one group in opposition to the other, may spell the very doom of our race. It seems to me that on an occasion of this kind we should try, at least, to rise above the passions and prejudices of the war, the passions and prejudices that have kept the peoples of Europe apart throughout these years, and that we at this distance, somewhat removed from the horrors and chaos of Europe to-day should, in a little more dispassionate way, resolve that as for us we could, we would, do our utmost to start things on a somewhat different path in the future. I would plead that the least we can do is to make what I have called a peace gesture and withdraw our claims to reparation from Germany.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) has raised an objection, calling in question the right of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) to bring this resolution to the consideration of the House. Let me direct attention to rule 78 which reads as follows:

> All aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by the Parliament of Canada, are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the Housce to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

I also find in Beauchesne's Rules and Forms the following:

> 626. "This House will not proceed upon any petition, motion or bill for granting any money, or for releasing or compounding any sum of money owing to the Crown but in a committee of the whole House."

Now the resolution does not mention the Crown, but everyone will understand that moneys owing to Canada are moneys owing to the Crown.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling, may I speak to the point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: Certainly.

Mr. MANION: I do so, Sir, because it will be too late to speak after you have given your ruling. I have sat here listening for about an hour and a half to the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) discussing this question, and he has put before us all the arguments favourable to his contention. I do not know, of course, what your ruling is going to be, Mr. Speaker, but speaking personally I should regret very much if, after the hon. member's argument of an hour and a half in favour of this resolution, the motion were ruled out of order, because I do not believe it would be in the best interests of Canada or of this House that the hon. member's statement should go unanswered.

Mr. MURDOCK: I would respectfully make the same suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no objection to postponing my decision.

Mr. CANNON: In order that members who wish to address the Chair may know exactly when and how they may speak could we have an intimation as to when the decision will be given?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the Minister of Labour has the floor.

Mr. CANNON: I am putting the question before the Minister of Labour speaks. I wish to find out from the Chair when the decision will be given in order that any member who wishes to speak may have that information.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in the hands of the House. The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg having spoken and expressed his own views other hon. gentlemen are entitled to reply. I shall reserve my decision for the present.

Mr. SHAW: Speaking to the point of order may I suggest that the rules of the House in this connection be suspended which will prevent the necessity of you, Mr. Speaker, giving your decision in the matter. I understand such action can be taken with the unanimous consent of the House.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): I can imagine no other condition or time under which it could be as conclusively proven that "time is a great healer." Hon. members in this House, imagine, if you can, four years ago to-night, sitting deliberately and listening to a statement from an hon. gentleman such as we have heard for the past hour and a half. I want to say only a few words in regard to this particular matter, and not of necessity dealing at all with the particular question of reparations, or the question of the sums owing to Canada by Germany. I care not personally whether the reparations ever come or not, but I do believe that there are some things that surely the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has either overlooked or else never experienced. He spoke of the great trouble, tribulation and hardship that would come to future generations of German children should there be insistence on the payment of these reparations. I imagine that I learned in my younger days and since from the same Book of Holy Writ as my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg, and in that I found conveyed the suggestion of an eye for an eye and that justice is eternal. Four years ago that would have been conclusively proven to my hon. friend and other members of this House, I imagine, had anyone even thought of such a thing as raising the question that we have heard raised to-night.

I wonder if my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg knows anything of the wounds in the hearts of tens of thousands of Canadian mothers that are being opened up afresh to-night, and that would, if his view carried, figuratively speaking, bleed with the injustice of the proposals that have been discussed before us. I think it can be very readily conceded that sentiment very largely rules the world, and, looking at it from every viewpoint of sentiment, I cannot but express the view that my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg has acted in entire disregard of the feelings of tens of thousands of Canadian mothers, yea, and of Canadian fathers, in making any such proposal or indulging in any such discussion as we have just listened to. My hon. friend surely overlooked the fact that mankind in all the ages, from the garden of Eden, has, we are told, been paying the penalty for sin, for injustice, for violation of the law, and does he appeal to us as human beings, thousands of Canadian citizens, with hearts still bleeding, and expect us to forget all of our conception of human justice and right, and do the work of forgiving, whitewashing, waving these things to one side, as is suggested in his resolution? The hon. member undertook, as I understood, to show that maybe Germany was not responsible for the war to the extent that was alleged, but I would submit to my hon. friend that were it possible for this resolution to pass, tens of thousands of Canadian mothers and fathers would hear the tramp of a nation run mad with the lust and desire for conquest, marching through Belgium, and that would be the only thing that they could see was the cause of the war.

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am personally concerned, I think the proposal of my hon. friend to-night is in entire disregard of the sufferings, the sacrifices and the feelings, present and future, of tens of thousands of Canadian citizens, and might I, in all seriousness, suggest that if my hon. friend is so sincerely desirous of bringing about peace and of obtaining harmony and co-operation, he will find wide scope in the industrial field here in Canada, where there is ample opportunity for the exercise of his undoubted ability and great earnestness in this direction. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the motion should never have been discussed, because in my judgment thousands of our Canadian citizens will never be able to understand why we should, at this time, have listened to any such proposals as have come to us to-night.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I do not take objection to a discussion on the question of German reparations or the attitude that Canada should take towards it. I do object however, to the discussion of that very important problem under a resolution introduced in this form, and supported in a spirit and with language which, I think was inspired far more by a desire to discredit the great statesmen of the allied countries, rather than any desire to promote peace in Europe or throughout the the world. My hon. friend has quoted very liberally from what he is pleased to term great authority. I have read, and undoubtedly every member of the House has read many of the articles and books to which he has referred. I know of no work of literature from which one could not extract a clause here and there and distort its meaning, segregate it from its surrounding arguments, and make it serve some purpose to support some theory in many cases far removed from the subject under discussion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order. May I ask the hon. gentleman to cite at least one or two of the books from which I have taken extracts and distorted them or wrested from the context.

Mr. STEVENS: I have merely begun to state my argument. I have before me fairly copious notes of my hon. friend's remarks and it is my intention to give some consideration to his quotations. My hon. friend takes a purely business problem, an economic problem, a problem of a financial character between two nations, and one which could very properly, and undoubtedly would, come up under the budget proposals of the government, and uses it as the occasion of libelling the allied countries and, as I said a moment ago—and I repeat it—of deliberately casting aspersions upon some of the greatest statesmen in those countries, and above all—which I resent very much—upon the good faith of Great Britain and the British Empire. In the first place, my hon. friend referred, with a sneer in his voice, to the old practice, which unquestionably has been followed very widely, of trusting to Great Britain in the determination of foreign policy. I at once, Sir, agree that that might be a fitting subject for debate when some question was under consideration, as for example the subject of imperial conferences or any other allied question. But surely we can debate a question of that kind dispassionately and assert, if you will, a new and broader status for this country in imperial affairs without implying that Great Britain has invariably been wrong. My hon. friend went back to the South African war and raked around, showing to his own satisfaction that Great Britain had been wholly in error, without bringing forward any substantial proofs. My answer to him in connection with that South African argument is this, that General Smuts, who fought so valiantly against the British in South Africa,—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. STEVENS: —is to-day the premier of South Africa and one of the most loyal sons of the Empire.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. member to rise to a point of order?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I deny that I ever made the statement—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member rises to a point of order he can speak only with the permission of the member who has the floor.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member made a statement which I absolutely contradict.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend next referred to the Lusitania incident, and without giving to the House any clear reasons for his insinuation, and carefully refusing on repeated occasions to give his own opinion when requested to do so, he insinuated that some recent revelations more or less excused—I will not say justified—the Germans for the enormity of that frightful act they committed in the sinking of that ship. It is true that with his subtlety of language, of which he is a master, he avoided coming out freely and saying that he approved of the German action. Nor did he come forward and say that the Germans were justified. But he did insinuate, in that manner, of which I say he is a master and which he has used time and again in this country amongst the Canadian people to stir up strife and discord, that there was a question whether the Germans were not more or less justified in that act.

Oh, he says, the German people for whom I am pleading to-night have repudiated the war lords. That is true. But I ask him, did his red revolutionary friends in Germany support the prosecution of those war lords for the war crimes they perpetrated, of which there was ample evidence before the people of Europe? Have they done so? What did Great Britain do? Great Britain was the mover in this matter and she induced the Allies to deal on a level, fair and equitable basis with the war lords and the war criminals of Germany who were guilty of the most heinous crimes ever recorded on the pages of history. They were known to be guilty on the strength of evidence that was in the hands of the Germans to that effect, and Britain was fair enough to allow the German courts to try them. What has been the result? Will the hon. member or any one else in this House, in this country, or in Europe, assert that any measure of justice, but rather the most subtle and invidious type of evasion, was ever offered by the German people, the new Germany he speaks of, the revolutionary Germany he lauds to the skies? Have they in any measure sought to bring those war lords to justice? Not once! On the contrary, they have lent every energy, intellectual and physical, to blocking the way of attaining that end.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it possible for me to deny—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have never lauded Germany to the skies.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member can interrupt only by permission of the member who has the floor, unless he rises to a point of order.

Mr. STEVENS: I will answer my hon. friend by quoting his next statement. He pleaded on behalf of the little boys and girls of Germany. Well, what red-blooded man living to-day would not respond to a plea of that kind, whether the children were of Germany or anywhere else? But methinks there was a time when strong red-blooded men turned a deaf ear to the plea for children, boys and girls and babes. What about the advance of the German troops through Belgium and northern France? Outside of warfare waged by absolutely barbarous people, there has never been an instance in history in which there was such an utter disregard for the helplessness of childhood and the weakness of old age as characterised the advance of the German soldiery through Europe at that time. And yet my hon. friend comes to this House and says. "Let us think of the boys and girls of Germany". Why, certainly, I am prepared to meet him on that ground and discuss the resolution from that standpoint. But I think we ought also to think of the boys and girls of Great Britain, of France, of Canada, and other countries. Next, my hon. friend brought forward one of the stock arguments—well, it is not really an argument, rather let me say, one of his stock sneers at modern society, one of those soap-box references that we hear so often on the street corners, where men who have been toiling, or who perhaps are out of luck, or are misfits in society, are teased and agitated and aggravated into resentment. He trotted out the gibes about the great financial lords, and captains of industry. He based no argument on it, but he just introduced it in his speech —it will read well among certain groups of his followers and friends. They will say: Our great leader in the House of Commons has brought before the attention of his fellow members the iniquities of the financial lords of Europe.

Let me remind my hon. friend that his insinuation is baseless, for this reason. It was argued throughout the world that no great war could come. Why? Because the great moneyed interests of the world would not permit it. But I submit that in spite of the most bitter objections and in spite of all the efforts put forth by the great so-called "controlling influences" of industry and finance, this war broke out. I am not going to rehash the discussion of why the war broke out, but I answer his argument with that statement, which no one can, I think, gainsay.

Then he quoted as the greatest authority of all, and the most outstanding—whom? Mr. Morel. What is Mr. Morel's claim to notoriety? Simply that he defeated Winston Churchill. That is the sole reason why we should accept what Mr. Morel says. As my hon. friend put it very modestly: "My opinion is no good; I give you Mr. Morel's." Now, in the long quotation my hon. friend read Mr. Morel referred to the conferences between the British, French and Belgian military staffs. Will my hon. friend deny that he called those conferences a conspiracy? Hansard will show that he did. What does he term a conspiracy? That which was published in the White papers of every one of the allied nations; everything to which he referred to-night and suggested to this House as a secret revealed because the spotless Bolsheviks of Russia had secured the archives in Petrograd. That was my hon. friend's argument. "This conspiracy was revealed." Those were his words. Revealed!

My hon. friend ought to know that this so-called conspiracy was revealed in 1914 at the commencement of the war and again in 1915 showing the conferences that had been held between these staffs on questions of preparation.

Then as an offset to our charge that Germany had been preparing for this war for years what did he bring forward? Britain's preparedness! And he quotes the speech of one of Britain's statesmen in that regard. Everybody knew—and well for my hon. friend, for every hon. gentleman in this House, for the whole North American continent, and for other parts of the world was it—that the British navy was prepared. Winston Churchill – whom he so slightingly refers to, and whom Mr. Morel, one of his British communistic leaders, defeated in the last general election in Great Britain—Winston Churchill abov all other men was responsible for the preparedness of the British navy. Was there any secret about it? I recall perfectly well in March 1914 one of the most lengthy and exhaustive debates ever held on a British budget had to do with the navy vote in that year, and again in 1913. And yet my hon. friend says there was a secret conspiracy among these nations, and that Britain's preparedness was in the nature of a crime equal to the military aggressiveness of Germany. These are the arguments, Mr. Speaker, that make one resent the presentation of a purely business proposition.

Then my hon. friend, in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), who asked him very politely and in perfect parliamentary order, would he be kind enough to give the House his own views, shielded himself behind the rather clever practice of reading the views of others. From one end of his speech to the other my hon. friend never told us where he stood on this question. But I know this much. If he goes to the city of Vancouver where he spent a few years, if he goes to the city of Winnipeg where he also spent an active period—in these cities, if he can do it with an audience just suited to him, he will tell them in most violent language where he stands on this question. I know my hon. friend's position. In this House he has conducted himself with commendable reserve. I have watched him during last session and this, and I must say I admire him. Bnt, Mr. Speaker, the language in which my hon. friend would express himself on these problems under other circumstances would be of an altogether different character. And so he was afraid to tell this House frankly where he stood on this question. I challenge him, and I challenge everyone who belongs to that peculiar group of economic freaks, who owe allegiance to the Third Internationale in preference to the British Crown, to come out frankly and, through him, debate this question in the proper form—on the floor of the parliament of this country. If they have an opinion, this is the place to express it. I do not question a member's right to read other people's opinions on a subject while refusing to declare his own view. That is his privilege. But I do question a man's moral courage who will do it and then, under other circumstances peculiarly suited to himself, give vent to expressions of policies inimical to the welfare of this realm.

My hon. friend also addressed himself to quotations from Mr. Keynes' famous books on The Economic Consequences of the Peace and A Review of the Peace Treaty. I pay a tribute, Mr. Speaker, to Mr. Keynes, whom I look upon as one of the most thoroughly versed political economists in Europe and, perhaps, in the world to-day, a man of exceptional ability and one who has given expression to his own views in a very frank and courageous manner. My hon. friend selects a passage here and there and dovetails them into his speech this evening. Mr. Keynes once applied his arguments either in his book on The Economic Consequences of the Peace or in his famous articles in the Manchester Guardian Supplement during the past year in the manner that my hon. friend has applied them to-night. Mr. Keynes does argue—and I want to say here very frankly that in a large measure I agree with him—that the French particularly are interpreting the Versailles Treaty in a somewhat harsh and exacting manner. That is Mr. Keynes' argument in a nutshell. He labours very industriously and very effectively to prove his position.

But my hon. friend paid most of his respects to Great Britain in his insinuations. Well, Great Britain is the one country that has stood out firmly against an extreme interpretation of the Versailles Treaty by the French. Why was not my hon. friend generous enough to say that the country which has offered him protection during the whole of his life has been honourable in this regard? Why has he not been generous enough to say that Great Britain has been more than generous with the Germans in regard to reparations?

Then my hon. friend quoted ex-Premier Nitti of Italy. It might be well for this House to pause for a moment and ask what became of Mr. Nitti. Has he the support of the Italian people to-day? He certainly has not. He has been completely rejected by his people.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about Mr. Lloyd George?

Mr. STEVENS: I was coming to Mr. Lloyd George, if my hon. friend will wait a moment. Mr. Nitti has been rejected by his people. My hon. friend quotes Mr. Nitti to bolster up his argument, and he states in a general way that the people, not the few, should rule. But have not the people of Italy recently put Mr. Nitti out of business? I will give you, Mr. Speaker, what I am quite convinced, from several addresses I have heard him make, the hon. member means by "the people." In his estimation, the people are composed of that group in each country which corresponds to the 500,000 Bolsheviks in Russia out of the 180,000,000 inhabitants of that country. In his estimation, an organized group with his peculiar economic and philosophic ideas, no matter how small it may be numerically, constitute the people of a country. We happen to believe in majority rule. While there are injustices under our present system, and lots of them, we believe that through it we get the best expression of opinion on the part of the people that up to the present it has been possible to get anywhere. No man who has followed with any degree of interest the history of his friends in Russia will be able to argue, no matter how finely spun those arguments may be, no matter how subtle and insinuating the language in which they are expressed may be, that there is anything approaching real liberty under the rule of the Third Internationale, in Russia.

Now, my hon. friend quotes Mr. Nitti. Then he says that Mr. Lloyd George used the phrase—and we all know that Mr. Lloyd George is perhaps the most apt phraser that we have on two legs to-day—that Germany was prostrate. My hon. friend seizes upon this little phrase and produces it before the House as an argument in support of his extreme resolution, yet he condemns the part played by Britain under the leadership of Lloyd George all through the period of war. I would also remind him that the very gentleman whom he produces here as an authority has been rejected by Great Britain, and particularly, Mr. Speaker, by Mr. Morel and a few other of his friends.

My hon. friend introduced another suggestion which was unworthy of him—and that is going some. He introduced that old shibboleth about the French-coloured troops on the Rhine. He is not in a position to give accurate information on that, nor am I. But this we do know, that a great deal of the agitation regarding the supposed occupation of the Rhine by coloured troops of France is mythical and false—is propaganda by the Germans themselves. There are more official reports excusing or justifying the French government than there are condemning them. I am not going to say for one moment that French troops occupying a territory like that have been blameless; it would be utterly impossible to pick out a group of men thus situated who would be free from any action that could be questioned. But to suggest, as my hon. friend has, that France has perpetrated a crime upon civilization in her occupation of the Rhineland, is, Sir, to present an argument that has no foundation in fact.

Then my hon. friend proceeded to quote a speech of Hon. Mr. Rowell. Quoting Mr. Rowell, he said: that Canada should follow Great Britain in the matter of a policy on reparations. In his opening remarks he jeered at and condemned Canada for following Great Britain in connection with the action taken at the outbreak of war; now he comes along and supports the statement of Mr. Rowell that we should follow Great Britain in the matter of reparations. The question whether a thing suits my hon. friend depends on whether the action taken suits his own particular mental distortion. If it fits into that peculiar state of mind into which he has forced himself in recent years, then it is all right; if it clashes with that state of mind, then it is all wrong and there is no justice, equity, reason, logic or anything else in it. "What is right is what suits my peculiar state of mind"—that was my hon. friend's process of reasoning in his speech to-day, as it is in all his presentations throughout the country—and they are many—with regard to economic problems.

Then my hon. friend makes a general sweeping charge of violation of the treaty by France. I admit very frankly, Sir, that there is ample room for differences of opinion in interpreting the Treaty of Versailles. The greatest minds of Europe and America have been struggling with that treaty for the last three years. But should we not pause before making rash and hasty assertions condemning a whole nation for its action? Should we not pause and consider the peculiar and intricate conditions under which this treaty was entered into? Here we have a world literally prostrate as the result of the war—all participants in a state of chaos. State after state completely disrupted; new governments and new constitutions created overnight. Under conditions of that kind, a score or more of nations meet together to draft a treaty of peace; is it any wonder that this piece of machinery produced under circumstances of that kind should in after years, in times of comparative peace and coolness, be found to be more or less faulty? So it is with the Treaty of Versailles. There are very few, if any, who do not frankly admit that the Treaty of Versailles must in some respects be changed and modified. But that does not warrant my hon. friend's coming before this House with a libellous charge against the statesmen who made the treaty. I believe that with few exceptions, if any, the statesmen who engaged in the titanic task of trying to weave peace and order out of chaos did their duty faithfully and earnestly and with a common desire for peace. That they have not brought peace is something for which they cannot be blamed. It certainly will not contribute to peace to have such unfounded statements flung to the four winds as my hon. friend has made here to-night, and, unfortunately, is making on all possible occasions.

My hon. friend said also that this treaty and its enforcement violated international law. He did not tell us in what way it did so, but he said it violated international law as it was understood prior to 1914. I am not going to question the accuracy of his statement, but I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, what respect there was for international law on the part of Germany and her allies? Was there any respect for it? Did not Germany openly declare and avow officially through her Chancellor, Bethmann-Hollweg, that Germany would ignore international law; that it was in the interests of military tactics that Germany invaded Belgium?

Now I do not say that that justifies us in violating international law, but I would draw the attention of the House to the vast difference between the violation by Germany, and the supposed or alleged violation by France and her allies. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), suggests, how could a treaty violate international law? As a matter of fact, the whole question narrows down to this: Is the interpretation of the treaty by the Allies a fair and reasonable interpretation? Then the second question is this, and it is really the most important problem that this parliament and similar parliaments have to deal with: Assuming that we interpret the treaty correctly, and fix a given amount for Germany to pay, is that amount a reasonable amount under the conditions now existing, that is, can Germany possibly pay?

I would say this to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. After a great deal of thought upon this subject so far as my individual capacity would permit, I am prepared to advocate and support this in the House of Commons: That we should seek to determine as far as we can, and in a generous spirit, the extent to which the reparation amounts due under the Versailles Treaty ought to be reduced to meet Germany's capacity to pay. That is a fair question, and one which may properly engage the attention of every fair-minded and intelligent and unprejudiced person.

My hon. friend then says he appeals on economic grounds. His economic grounds were not stated. He did not disclose either his own opinion, or the economic grounds upon which he wished to support his motion. The only hint of an approach to economic grounds that he gave was a general, sweeping statement that Germany could not pay, that Germany was bankrupt. I would remind him and this House that up to perhaps six months ago Germany was the most prosperous country since the war of any in the world. It is true that about six months ago, or perhaps a little longer, this prosperity broke. The inflation of her currency and the devaluation of her monetary system has resulted in more or less of chaos in Germany to-day, but it is strange that only a day or two ago the German Reichstag asked the chief bank of Germany to release—what? A very huge sum of gold marks that they still held in their vaults, for the purpose of stabilizing the currency of Germany, and the bank refused to release that money. My hon. friend in his statement a moment ago said that Germany had no money, or words to that effect—that Germany was bankrupt, that she had no amounts of money, that all her gold and all her resources were gone. I would remind this House that in no single instance has the industrial machinery of Germany been tampered with except by my hon. friend's German friends, through sabotage and strikes, and in no other way. Germany's whole industrial machinery is intact, whereas France, as we know, was prostrated and devastated over very large areas, a great portion of which will never be restored, indeed cannot be restored. Mines have been wholly destroyed so that they can never be worked again. It is so with other parts of Europe other than German territory; but German machinery remained intact and is intact to-day. Does not the wealth of a nation very largely consist of the things out of which they produce, such as the land and the machinery, whether it be industrial or agricultural? Germany was never touched in one of these things.

Her farms, her mines, her machinery, are all intact. Her people were undisturbed except those who were fighting in the war. Compare that, Mr. Speaker, with Belgium and France and certain portions of Italy, with Serbia, with Roumania particularly, with Bulgaria and Poland. Compare the conditions in these countries with conditions in Germany, and you have a complete reversal.

Now let us turn for a moment to the situation as far as Canada is concerned. We are faced in Canada with a huge debt, and for the size of our population and our development that debt is an appalling burden. Some day in the near future I intend to discuss it at some length, but suffice it for tonight for me simply to remind the House that that debt rests with extreme weight and with grave possibilities upon the shoulders of the people. I am not prepared to say that we should forego the claims that we have against Germany; not at all, Mr. Speaker, but I again repeat that in so far as it can be shown, supported by intelligent and accurate information, that the reparation claims from Germany are beyond her economic possibility of payment, to that extent I am prepared to consider the reduction of our claims against her. But to come forward with a resolution such as my hon. friend has moved—I was going to say 'falsely' clothed, but perhaps that would not be parliamentary—inaccurately clothed in the argument that it is in the interests of world peace to present this resolution under present conditions, and to support his motion by such a speech as he has delivered, which was far more significant in what it left out and in what he insinuated, than in what he actually did say—such an appeal, I say, should not win any support from this House.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the mover of this resolution (Mr. Woodsworth), and also the last speaker (Mr. Stevens). They have both presented extreme views. I hope that those who will take part in this debate from now on will endeavour to keep to the middle road.

This discussion is one of the greatest importance, I believe, to this country. I do not think that anyone will disagree with me—I know that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) will not—when I say that the whole future of western Canada is wrapped up not only in economic peace but every possible kind of peace in Europe. If, therefore, by the cancellation of Germany's debt to us we can help to bring about that peace, or progress just one step towards it, we shall have done a great deal.

The Treaty of Versailles which has been referred to so frequently to-night has not, I think, been glanced over at all. Let us look at it for a moment. In that treaty Germany specifically accepted responsibility for all the damage which she and the countries associated with her had done to Great Britain and her allies. On the other side, Great Britain and her allies specifically acknowledged in the treaty that the resources of Germany were not adequate to make complete reparation for all such loss and damage. The treaty did not attempt to fix the amount of damage for which Germany was to make payment, but it did provide for an initial payment on May 1, 1921 of twenty billion gold marks. This payment was to be in gold, in commodities, in ships, or, otherwise as the Reparations Commission might decide. In addition to that the remainder of the reparations to be made by Germany were to be decided upon by the Reparations Commission and were to be announced to Germany on or before May 1, 1921. On January 23, of that year the Reparations Commission reported that prior to December 31, 1920, Germany had delivered in payment of the 20 billions of gold marks referred to a large number of ships, a great quantity of commodities—I have the list with me but I do not think I need weary the House by giving the details—and in addition all her submarine cables. The estimated value of these commodities varies very much but one thing can be said, and that is that the value fell very far below the 20 billion marks. On May 10, 1921, Germany under pressure, accepted an estimate by the Reparations Commission of the additional reparations payable which we fixed at 132 billions of gold marks, roughly about 33 billion dollars. These were to be covered by bonds in three series—A. amounting to 12 billions; B, amounting to 38 billions. Both of these, bearing 5 per cent interest, were delivered to the Allied governments. Series C, of 82 billions was non-interest bearing and was to have been delivered, by November 1, 1921. In addition, the Reparations Commission decided that annual payments were to be as follows: 2 billions of gold marks and a variable amount up to 26 per cent of the total value of German exports. These payments were only sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds of Series A and B, and 1 per cent for amortization purposes, but they made no provision whatever for meeting the bonds of series C.

Now Germany made the first payment of 1 billion on time, but she at once commenced to assert her inability to make any further payments. Then commenced those conferences. Conference followed conference, failure followed failure, leading up to the situation that we are now faced with. No one with a heart, no one with the realization of France's suffering, of the destruction which she has experienced, of her loss in every sense, can resent her stepping across into the Ruhr. No one who looks at the matter purely from the sentimental aspect, or from the aspect of cold justice, will blame her for her action. We all have deep sympathy for France, but in so acting did she take a wise step? None of the premiers of the other countries think it was a wise step. Only in this morning's paper I notice that an amendment to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne is to be moved in the British House of Commons. I am not quite certain who is to move it, but the amendment, which is being prepared by Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Asquith, advocates the appointment of a commission in which the United States would be invited to participate for the purpose of investigating Germany's capacity for reparation payments and the best methods of securing a quick settlement.

The last speaker referred to the inflated condition of the currency in Germany but did not dwell on the effect that that had on the possibility of Germany meeting her debts. May I quote in this regard the Prime Minister of England. The charge has been levelled, mostly I believe by France against Germany, that she deliberately inflated her currency for the purpose of avoiding the payment of her debt, but the British Premier speaking about this says:

> Honestly I cannot myself take that view and for this reason: It is perfectly true that by that method of passive resistance Germany can avoid her ever paying any indemnity, but it only means what is very like suicide for Germany. I can hardly believe that any sane government would deliberately adopt that course.

Yet that course was adopted and continued until it led to some extraordinary conditions. The position of Austria in this regard is a slight degree worse, but not very much worse, at the present moment. I read some little time ago of a mortgage that had been taken out in the year 1917 in Austria for the sum of 250 thousand crowns. The par value in dollars at that time was $50,000. That mortgage of $50,000 in 1917 was paid in August of 1922 in full for $3.12½. A pension before the war of 30 thousand crowns was equal to about $6,000. To-day that same pension would buy you a breakfast. In the middle of August $1 would buy about one thousand marks in Germany. In January of this year $1 would buy more than eight thousand marks. Now

France has marched into the Ruhr. The immediate result of that action was to reduce the value of the mark to the vanishing point. Between January 14 and 18, the mark declined by 50 per cent. To-day you can buy 1 million marks for $50. The result of that invasion was the immediate rise in the cost of living and it at once doubled the difficulty of the payment of German reparations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the position that Germany is in with regard to its ability to meet the reparations. The total of the European debts to the United States of America is about $11,525,000,000. Of this England owes $4,747,000,000; France $3,770,000,000; and Italy owes $1,891,000,000. The remainder is owed by 17 other European nations. Now even should series C amounting to 82 billions of gold marks be cancelled, the remaining 50 billions of gold marks, or 12½ billion dollars is more than the total owed by 20 European nations to the United States. Now if these nations, which have already received more than a billion in gold and several billions in value in commodities are unable or have not—with one exception, the proud exception of Great Britain,—been able to pay even interest it appears to be reasonable to believe that Germany may be unable to pay any large part of the reparations amounting as they do to so much greater sums.

Force has failed. I personally do not think there is any possible prospect of success in the French invasion of the Ruhr district. We have seen in the last few days the collapse of industries in Germany, and we have seen strikes and other disturbances started, the outcome of which I am sure every member of this House dreads.

On one point I must agree with the last speaker. We must give every credit to Great Britain for the magnanimous position she took at the Paris conference, and I desire to remind the House of it. The offer was that Britain woud cancel France's debt to her. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to note that Britain proposed that she should cancel her debt to France, provided France would consent to a reduction of the German indemnity, and would drop altogether the proposition of bringing economic and military pressure to bear on Germany. I read that statement in the Montreal Gazette of 13th December, 1922.

Now, might we not follow England's example? I do not think the exact amount of reparation due to Canada has even been announced. It must be a comparatively small amount, and it will make little difference to us. No computation has been made of what is due to us by Germany up to this time. If we pass this resolution perhaps we may in some small degree help to eliminate the old hatreds that we see rising up, even around us in this House, and we may be able to assist European reconstruction. When we have a crippled horse, Mr. Speaker, we do not cripple it further. We put it in a stable, and take it out, and feed it, if we think it can recover. If we think it can be made to do any work in the future we feed it, nurse it and look after it. If we do not think so, then we shoot it and put it out of misery. If we could find out just exactly what Germany's capacity is, and decide once and for all whether she can pay or not pay, then we could either put her out of misery, as France appears to be prepared to do, or sacrifice our reparations.

Mr. ARTHURS: Before the hon. member finishes, will he tell us whether he is in favor of the resolution of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg that Canada should withdraw all claims against Germany?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would appeal to this House to support the resolution that Canada should withdraw all claims to reparations in the interest of European peace, in our own interest, if you want to come nearer home, and in the interest of agriculture, if you wish to come still closer home.

Let me suggest to hon. members that we are told to-day, when we protest against the price we are receiving for our grain, that the low price is due to the appalling conditions in central Europe. May I say also that I hope this House will, in the interest of humanity, in the essential interest of the economic reconstruction in Europe and of human welfare and peace, support this resolution.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): I may say at the beginning of my remarks that I certainly cannot support the motion of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). It is true, Sir, that if things go as they seem to be going in Europe, it is very probable that this country will receive nothing in the shape of reparations. And yet, if my memory serves me correctly, the revised amount of reparations which under the Peace Treaty was to be paid by Germany was thirty billion dollars. Originally almost double that amount was proposed. Suppose the last revised figures amount to thirty billions, then by Keynes' latest works which I have consulted to verify the facts, if that thirty billions were paid, Canada would receive one per cent, roughly, which means that Canada would get about three hundred million dollars, and yet my hon. friend from Winnipeg, looking at it from a cold blooded business standpoint, suggests in a three line resolution that we pass a motion in this House to forego that three hundred million dollars. It is doubtful if Canada will ever receive very much reparations, but there is another standpoint from which to view this question, and that is this: The passing of such a resolution in this House would help to complicate the already very much complicated conditions in Europe for by such a resolution you say once and for all that you do not believe that Germany has any right to pay you anything. By such action you condemn France, who has recently gone into the Ruhr, and I may say here, though it has no special bearing on this subject, that I have very great sympathy with France in her action in going into the Ruhr. When you remember the conditions which France went through, the suffering which France endured when the Germans invaded that country in 1870, when you remember that at that time the German troops first went to Versailles, and imposed upon France the most humiliating terms of peace, and on top of that, a very heavy reparation, you can well understand and appreciate the feelings of the French people to-day. The reparation demanded then was considered very heavy. Considering the value of money at that time and the value of money at the present time, the reparation payment which Germany imposed on France on account of a war which only lasted about six months, was, I believe, nearly equivalent to the thirty billion dollars imposed upon Germany on account of the recent war, and when Germany imposed that payment on France, she stayed in France with her army until the money was paid. Therefore, I feel very sympathetic towards France in the action which she has taken at the present time.

However, laying that aside for a moment, I do not believe it is the duty of this country to be the first to complicate the already very difficult conditions which exist in Europe. That is my first reason for very strongly opposing this resolution. My hon. friend from Winnipeg mentioned the boys and girls of Germany,—and I do not say this with any desire to arouse passion—when he mentioned the boys and girls of Germany, one was forced to think of the boys and girls in this country whose fathers had died in order to bring about peace in the world. While I do not accuse him of doing this with this object in view the intention apparently was to let the little boys and girls in Canada suffer so that the little boys and girls in Germany might be relieved of the pressure of debt which they would have to pay in the future. According to all the despatches that we read at the present time, while the conditions in Germany are very bad just at the moment because of the Ruhr invasion, yet up to recently they had been very good probably better than the conditions in any country in Europe at least, and perhaps even better than conditions in Canada. According to persons whom I have met, who have visited Germany within the last year or year and a half, there was practically no unemployment in Germany, and yet we have a large unemployment problem in this country. And certainly, so far as Great Britain and France are concerned, and particularly Great Britain, the unemployment situation is critical. Indeed, so severe is it in Great Britain that the British parliament, according to a despatch in the press to-night, was this very day debating the question whether they might solve the unemployment problem by getting the unemployed to emigrate. Now, when a condition is so critical in a country that the unemployed are asked to emigrate as the only solution of the difficulty, it is obvious that conditions generally must be very bad indeed. I have certainly never read any suggestion coming from Germany or any of its people that there are in that country such conditions of unemployment as would necessitate anyone emigrating from Germany.

I do not intend to waste the time of the House going into all arguments put forth, because many of them have been dealt with very ably by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). But with reference to Mr. Keynes, I have never read any statement of his suggesting that there should be an entire abandonment of all reparation claims. He did suggest that the reparation claims originally imposed against Germany by the Allies at the Versailles conference were too severe and he said that they should be cut down. But so far as I can learn Mr. Keynes suggested something like thirty billion dollars as possibly an amount which Germany could pay. He may have proposed a lower sum, but there has not been anywhere in his writings any suggestion that the reparation claims should be wholly wiped out. It is true that some of the men quoted by the hon. member who intoduced the resolution have probably taken that attitude.

In considering the stand which some men even in the British Isles have taken in contradistinction to the position held by the people of France, we must bear in mind that the conditions are altogether different in the two countries. In England we find a country that was dependent to a great extent on its trade in the days before the war, and much of that trade was with Germany. So that, looking at the matter absolutely from the materialistic standpoint, the British people would probably be glad, as most of us no doubt would be glad in the interests of the world at large, but the English people particularly would be glad, to see Germany rehabilitated in order that there might be a resumption of British trade with Germany and British industries be once again put on their feet. France, on the other hand, was not so great a trading nation as Great Britain. She is looking at the danger that threatens her northern and eastern border from a country which invaded her and Belgium in cold blood. France is looking to the future, and I certainly do not blame her for so doing.

I shall vote against this resolution and I shall certainly be disappointed if it receives any great support in this House. If you support it you are practically exonerating Germany from all blame for bringing on the war. And while I cannot work myself up into a passion of hatred against Germany, I for one shall not vote to exonerate her from responsibility for the war through which we passed. But not only would a vote for this resolution be exonerating Germany, it would appear to me to be a condemnation of the actions of this country, of France, of England, and of the United States, which quietly for a period of three years discussed the question before going into the war. It would be a condemnation of all our Allies; it would be a condemnation of our boys who went overseas and of those who died there. I do not think, therefore, that we should vote for any such resolution as this, and it would be a great disappointment to the people of this country if this House at the present time, in the present condition of our finances, in the present situation in Europe, should pass a resolution of this character. For these reasons I shall emphatically oppose the resolution.

On motion of Mr. Warner, the debate was adjourned.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

CIVIL SERVICE—APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS

Mr MANION:

For a copy of all orders in council passed since January 1st, 1921, removing appointments or affecting the removal of appointments or promotions from the Civil Service Commission.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Friday, February 16, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Annual Report of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Sir Lomer Gouin.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 18, respecting The Dominion Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Ryckman.

Bill No. 19, respecting certain patents of Albert Manvers.—Mr. Jacobs.

MAIN ESTIMATES FOR 1923-4

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1924, was presented by Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

PATENTS OF INVENTION

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 20 to amend and consolidate the acts relating to patents of invention.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to call the attention of the House, in connection with this bill, to Rule 50 dealing with bills relating to trade, which reads as follows:

> No bill relating to trade, or the alteration of the laws concerning trade, is to be brought into this House, until the proposition shall have been first considered in a committee of the whole House, and agreed unto by the House.

I find that bills concerning patents and copyright were once considered as relating to trade, but at page 499 of the fourth edition of Bourinot it is stated, after enumerating which bills come within the rule, that—

> Bills respecting patents and copyright have been presented without committee.

That is, without the usual resolution preceding their introduction. On the same page there is also the following footnote bearing on this point:

> In 1872 a bill to amend and consolidate the patent laws was based on a resolution. But this was an irregularity as the bill merely imposed fees.

I am informed by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) that the present consolidation is of the same nature; it will impose fees and nothing else. On this assumption I consider that the bill does not come within Rule 50, and therefore he may proceed with its introduction.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, we have a letter from the Law Clerks along the lines laid down in your ruling.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE MARKS AND DESIGNS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce), moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. ROBB: This is for the purpose of making our law uniform with international law governing patent rights and industrial trade marks and designs.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CONVENTION OF COMMERCE WITH FRANCE

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance, moved that the House on Tuesday next go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that a certain convention of commerce dated the fifteenth day of December, in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, entered into at Paris by plenipotentiaries appointed by His Majesty and by the President of the French Republic be approved and to give effect to the provisions of the said convention.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CONVENTION OF COMMERCE WITH ITALY

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance), moved that the House on Tuesday next go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that a certain convention of commerce dated the fourth day of January, in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three, entered into at London by the plenipotentiaries appointed by His Majesty and by His Majesty the King of Italy be approved, and to give effect to the provisions of the said convention.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

STAMPS ON CHEQUES

PRACTICE CONCERNING QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I should like to ask the government whether any new practice has been adopted in connection with questions on the order paper. There was a question put on the order paper as to stamps on cheques. I notice that it has been dropped. It was not answered by the government. It was answered in so far as the Department of Customs and Excise is concerned, but that is not the department which has to do with it. I should think that the department concerned was the Finance department.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The initiation of legislation in these matters falls within the scope and duties of the Minister of Finance; the administration of the law falls under the authority of the Minister of Customs, and I suppose that was the reason my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) answered it. If there is anything, however, which is not answered that comes within the scope of my department, I shall have the matter looked into, and assure my hon. friend that he shall have the information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that the ruling has been given without a doubt. I assume that the question may stand until fully answered.

ALLEGED CAMPAIGN AGAINST IMMIGRATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): The press announces that a certain number of delegates to a trade union conference have decided to start a campaign to fight the movement to attract settlers to this country. I notice that a protest has been lodged with the Minister of Immigration and Colonization. It is pointed out by the resolution that this protest is to apply not only to city dwellers, but also to farmers and proposed farmers. I should like to know if the government has anything to say in the matter, and what their attitude is in regard to it.

Hon. C. A. STEWART (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I have no knowledge beyond what is contained in the press report mentioned by my hon. friend.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 16, to provide for further advances to the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon. Mr. Gordon in the chair.

On section 2—the Crown may advance $5,000,000 to corporation.

Mr. LADNER: With reference to the word "necessary" in the last line but one of this section, I presume that refers to such terminal facilities as are deemed necessary by the corporation. The corporation lays out its plans, and then the next section provides for the approval of the proposed expenditure. Is not that the meaning?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is the language usually used in all these bills.

Mr. LADNER: It may be the usual language, but somebody may get a freakish or obdurate turn of mind—and this is a very important matter from the point of view of Vancouver. There is no reason why the law should not be explicitly clear. I suggest that the words "by the corporation" be inserted after the word "necessary".

Mr. LAPOINTE: Nothing can be done, of course, without the approval of the Governor in Council. I am a reformer, but in matters of language, especially the English language, I would hesitate to make any change in what has been the custom.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think it would be very inadvisable to change the language of this clause. The House cannot pass over to any harbour commission rights which are vested in this parliament.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

MOTION BY MR. WOODSWORTH FOR WITHDRAWAL OF CANADA'S CLAIMS

The House resumed from February 15 consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Woodsworth that it is in the interest of world peace that Canada should withdraw all claims on Germany for reparations.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, in resuming the debate on the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), I may say that the hon. member was no doubt actuated by the best motives in proposing the motion that he did, although the effect has been different, perhaps, from what he expected. I have no intention of taking up any considerable time of the House in discussing this very important resolution. I rather regret a good deal of the language that was used by the mover in presenting his case—language that was unnecessary, arousing many strong feelings, harrowing our feelings, I might almost say, by recalling many of the things which happened in the past. The sufferings endured and sacrifices made by the people of Canada and many other countries in defence of their liberties are too recent to enable them with calmness to hear them lightly passed over at this time. When we think of the sacrifices that were made, when we remember some of the early scenes in 1914 and 1915 when Germany began her march across the plains of Belgium; when we remember the stories of atrocities and other accounts that appeared in the papers of that time, many of which we know to-day were true, we must realize that this is not the time to begin to say we must forget everything and be just as we were before. I do not think anything can be gained by keeping alive the smouldering fires of hatred; it would be as well for the world if we could forget some of these things, though it may be hard to do at this time, and look toward the future and toward a brighter and better and happier condition everywhere throughout the world.

I do not think any good purpose would be served by my speaking at length on this subject. I may say, however, that in many respects I am not exactly in sympathy with the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). I have known that hon. gentleman for a great many years, but I believe that in this case his point of view is altogether wrong; the end he seeks will never be accomplished by the method he has taken. At the same time I believe him to be in earnest and, although mistaken, working in the best interests of the common people. I want to say that in justice to the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg. I know that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is very patriotic, and no doubt he meant all he said, but as he warmed up his patriotic sentiment got uppermost and he lashed the member for Centre Winnipeg in a very vicious manner. I am ever willing to forget and forgive, and I do not think any good purpose is served by that kind of debate in this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having made that statement, I can only say that I feel I must vote against the resolution; and I am sure I speak for a great many hon. members on this side when I say that we wish to dissociate ourselves from some of the sentiments that were expressed by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on this resolution until I listened to the tremendous outburst of hysteria which took place on both sides of the House last evening, but having listened to that outburst with a good deal of sadness at heart—because I do not think it was creditable to the Parliament of Canada—I feel that I have to say a few words. I shall not enter into any prolonged debate upon the economic aspect of the question; that would be wasted effort. But I do wish to express a few opinions on the resolution itself and some of the arguments that were advanced. Hysterics in my opinion are the expression of argumentative penury. It gets us nowhere. It is an incentive to a spirit which leads away from truth rather than towards it. The Minister of Labour made a passionate plea which, to my mind harked back to the days of savagery.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: What savagery?

Mr. IRVINE: I shall proceed to indicate what it was—"An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth", was the spirit of the hon. minister. This appeal was placed—and here is the tragic part of it—in the name of the faller heroes of Canada. I think I shall have to mention here something which otherwise I should certainly hesitate to do. Among the names mentioned by the Prime Minister of Canada the other day that appeared among the missing I happened to have a brother and so if it is necessary, and I regret that such seems to be the case, that a man must speak from behind the blood of his relations before he can escape the imputed motives of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and the Minister of Labour—of course, I must do it. If then it is a matter of whether I want to sell my brother's blood for a few German marks—which we will never get,—or whether I am to sell my brother's blood for the world peace for which he died, then there is no argument, or there is only one thing, and that is leave the marks out of consideration. Mr. Speaker; to place falsely, in the name of patriotism, the blood of Canada in the scales and place on the other side the German mark is to my mind beneath the Canadian parliament, it is unworthy of the sacrifice our men made, and I certainly wish to dissociate myself from the sentiments that were expressed by the Minister of Labour and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre in this regard. The latter gentleman indulged in a good deal of animosity which was entirely uncalled for. I believe, Sir, that there are certain rules in this House which prohibit a member from using certain words, but there does not seem to be any rule which prohibits a man from making certain inferences which, if expressed in words of a certain character, would be quite out of order. It seems to me that a great deal of animosity bubbled out from beneath the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, and he seems to think that the resolution as proposed by the leader of the Labour party (Mr. Woodsworth) could only come from a gentleman who was the victim of an economic freak. Did the hon. member for Vancouver Centre give us an exhibition of economics that would warrant us in the view that he has got enough of economics to constitute even a freak? I do not think he did. There was no evidence of any economic wisdom in his pronouncement. I think I can, perhaps, answer the verbosity of that hon. gentleman by a quotation from Emerson and thus save myself a good deal of mental effort. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre put out the historic argument of the Conservative which Emerson states so forcibly in the following words:

> The conservative alone remains the only evidence of his own faith, and we are compelled to discount even him. While his mind remains fixed it is compelled to defend different things.
> Conservativism took its original stand in favour of a primeval taboo, but since then it has defended the utterances of the Delphic Oracle, the Athanasian Creed, the inquisition, the geocentric theory, monarchy by the grace of God, witchcraft, slavery, war, capitalism, private property, imperialism.

That is the noble history of Conservativism, and I think the House will agree with me that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre upheld the traditions of his noble party last night in his tirade of implications against the leader of the Labour party, and in his decided opposition to the "new world" policy which substitutes reason and goodwill for blood.

Now, the resolution is really, after all, a most harmless resolution stating it negatively, and positively stated it might lead to a very great deal that would be desirable not only on the part of Canada but on the part of the world. I am not certain that I agree with the leader of the Labour party's method of introducing it. Personally for the moment I do not care who started the war, we are dealing now with the results of it; and I imagine if we dug down to find out who started it we would have just about as much trouble as we have in deciding who won it, and that seems to be causing the world a great deal of speculation. We have in the causes of war, of this and other wars, a circle a century or two in circumference, and within that circle we have a veritable polyglot of influences which it is impossible to trace to their sources and all of which have a bearing upon the causes of war. I am not going to deal with that; I repeat that I care not for the moment who caused it; I am dealing with the actual situation with which we are confronted at the present time. And what is the question before us? The question before us is that Canada's sons, as was pointed out by the Minister of Labour and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, died that the world might have peace, died in a war that was going to end all wars. The question is, then, shall we help the cause for which they died the better by the forswearing of our claims upon any indemnity from Germany, or shall we help that aim forward by insisting that she pay to the last farthing whether by force of arms or by force of economic pressure? That is the question we are considering, and while I have a good deal of sympathy with the expressions of the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke), just now, yet I think, perhaps he is missing an opportunity here, for we must not allow any sentiment which we may have against any member of the House to interfere with our intelligent and reasonable analysis of the resolution itself. Which course will lead toward world peace is the crux of the question. Taking the thing on its highest possible ground we do not wish to haggle over marks when the world peace is in the balance. The resolution may be considered from two angles. First, it is economic. I refer you to the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), with regard to the economic side of the question. The other phase of the resolution has to do with obtaining the aim for which we fought in the last war. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if Canada could see her way clear, regardless of carrying out the doctrine of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, burying as deep as hell the animosity that seemed to spurt from the Minister of Labour, and could see her way clear to be magnanimous in the interest of world peace, we should be doing a more glorious thing for those who died and a greater thing for Canada and for the world. That is my position on this resolution.

I would refer, in closing, to an incident of last session, which is pertinent to the present discussion. We had an honoured professor from Oxford who came to this parliament last year and was introduced by the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons. They sponsored this professor, and what was his plea to us? Those of us who took the trouble to be present will remember that he outlined the whole economic situation in Europe. He showed us the hopelessness of trying to extract the indemnity from Germany, and he finished in words that were both dramatic and prophetic, suggesting what a great thing it would be if Canada could take the very course which this resolution asks that we should take. I think we can lay aside all animosity, and all unfair criticism and face this resolution on its own grounds. We know that the whole world is affected by the economic situation in Europe. We know, if we know anything, that the war cannot be paid for to the extent that is hoped by those who are entitled to receive indemnities, and most of us know that if we draw a tooth from Germany to-day, or pluck an eye from the Kaiser, to satisfy the hon. the Minister of Labour, that some day they will probably draw a tooth or pluck an eye from some other nation. We know also that, if we have that magnanimity of spirit which is worthy of our Canadian dead, we will say to the world and to Germany specifically: We will not have your marks, they are worthless anyway, keep them; we will not ask you to pay anything, but we will foreswear our share of the indemnity in the interests of that world peace for which our Canadian soldiers died.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): We must all admire, Mr. Speaker, the Christian sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman from Calgary East (Mr. Irvine), but I am at a loss to understand why such a resolution as this should be presented to a Canadian parliament at this time. Are we pressing for reparations? Are we in any way oppressing these poor Germans, whose ardent friend from Winnipeg is trying to protect them before they are attacked? Why bring in such a resolution as this? Is it his desire that this parliament should give a lead to Europe and to the Imperial parliament as to how it should deal with reparations? If that is his purpose I do not think that the Imperial parliament would be inclined to follow in his footsteps. So far as reparations are concerned, Mr. Speaker, I think that the Dominion of Canada might very well follow the lead given to us by the Mother Country and its government, and wait for developments before we begin to express our friendship for the poor downtrodden German. I am not concerned about the reparations, but I must confess that it vexes me considerably to have a man stand up in the House of Commons and tell us that Great Britain and France were as much responsible for the war as Germany. That is substantially the statement made by the hon. gentleman for Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). He read a number of quotations last night, among which I find the following:

> The British and French General Staffs had been in active collaborations for war with Germany ever since January 1906.

Does he mean to tell the House and the country that France and Great Britain had contemplated war against Germany in 1906? If that is what he is trying to make us believe, I think he has a task on his hands in which he will fail. There can be no doubt in the minds of men who followed the circumstances attending the beginning of the war that Germany was solely responsible for the war. He referred last night to what Austria and Hungary had done. Austria and Hungary did what the German Kaiser and the German government compelled them to do, and they had to do that right up to the time of the armistice. He knows, if he knows anything at all about the war, which I doubt, that Austria and Hungary would have ceased fighting long before if the Germans had permitted them to do so. But to come into this House and attempt to excuse Germany I cannot regard as anything but a little piece of German propaganda, designed perhaps to create opinion in Canada, and as far as it goes outside of Canada, that these poor people are being oppressed. If that is his object, I want to utter my protest against the House of Commons being used for such a purpose. The hon member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) answered his argument about the poor little children. I need not go into that further than to point out that whenever a man commits a crime his little children and his family are the sufferers, and when the leaders of the government committed that unparalleled crime they brought suffering upon the poor people of Germany.

I would like to draw another thing to the attention of my hon. friend when he is talking about reparations. There is only one argument that a German can understand, and that is the argument of force, and the best guarantee that Germany will not again invade France is that France has gone in and taken hold of the Ruhr district, and I hope that France will keep it until every last cent of reparations is paid. I never had stronger sympathies in my life than I have for the people of France to-day for what they suffered in the war and what they are suffering yet. The question is whether France will be ruined or whether Germany will be ruined. If that is the issue, then my preference is that it shall be Germany. As far as my stand is concerned, I am with the French, and notwithstanding all the economists who may speak on this question, if I were a Frenchman I would glory in the action of the government of that country. I would tell these economists—who do not know half as much as they think they do—because these are the fellows that told us the war could not last three months, that the economic conditions were such that it was impossible to continue it, but it lasted over four years—I would tell these economists that I have great hope that France will win out in the contest that is now going on in the Ruhr. May I also point out to hon. gentlemen that every fifty years of the Christian era France has been invaded by this power, and why should we take our stand now by the side of the invading power and against our ally by adopting a resolution of this kind?

My hon. friend from Calgary East says he is as much troubled now in deciding who started the war as he is in deciding who won the war. Well, I think, Sir, that his mind must be entirely devoted to metaphysics and must be clear of all the practical questions of the day if he finds so much difficulty in deciding that question. I want to associate myself with those who would make Germany pay the cost of the destruction of France and Belgium. I protest against a motion of this kind being brought into the House because it can serve no good purpose and is designed, in my judgment, clearly to try and find a reason in the minds of some people in this country for exonerating Germany for its dreadful conduct in starting the war. What was the cry? "World power or ruin!" That was the issue that the German people under their leaders made. If they had succeeded in getting world power, what would this country be to-day? A colony of the German Empire, and my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) would not be permitted to stand in the parliament of this country and say against Germany things that he is able to say on the floor of this House against the British Empire. Liberty, as we have it, would not exist in Canada if this were a German colony. Germany made her choice—world power or ruin. She is pretty well ruined. Still, I think, whether these reparations can be paid now or later on, they should be paid, and the payment of them is the only means by which the people of that country will be educated as to their iniquities and the unwisdom of war.

A provocative motion of this kind should have no place in parliament. I think I understand the peculiar and distorted mentality of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg, and I sympathize with him that his mind, which might have been bright and practical, and of value to the people of this country, has run off until he has become, I think he would not object to my saying, a Bolshevist. If his opinions are not of a Bolshevist turn, I do not undertsand what Bolshevism is. I do not think he would object to that characterization, and I am extremely glad that throughout this Dominion of Canada there are so very few of his type.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are four conferences, the proceedings of which should, I think, be considered in connection with the resolution of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). The first was the conference of Versailles, at which the Treaty of Versailles was drafted and signed by the different countries involved in the war. The second was the conference at Spa, held in 1920, at which the reparations which, under the Treaty of Versailles, Germany had admitted she should pay to the allied and associated powers were allocated as between the different powers. The third conference was a conference of inter-allied representatives, held at London in 1921, at which conference the proportion of the reparations to be assigned to the British Empire and others of the allied and associated powers, was definitely fixed. The fourth was a conference held in London in 1921, between the British government and the prime ministers of the different dominions, at which conference the proportion of the reparations which Canada and the other dominions and Great Britain were to receive, was determined. For purposes of record, may I mention one or two relevant particulars with respect to these conferences?

Under article 231 of the treaty of Versailles, Germany admitted responsibility for all loss and damage to which the allies and associated governments and their nationals had been subjected as a consequence of the war. Germany's signature stands to-day to a treaty in which she admits that she was responsible for the war and for all the damage that grew out of it. That should answer for all time the question of the responsibility of the war.

Mr. GOOD: Could it possibly be said that that signature was secured under duress?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is unnecessary to answer my hon. friend's question. Article 232 states that the Allies recognize that Germany is unable to pay the full amount of these damages; it is further provided that the allied and associated governments require, and Germany undertakes, to make compensation for all damages done to the civilian population and their property.

Under article 253, the amount of these damages was directed to be determined by the Reparation Commission. The category of damages which Germany undertook to pay was set out in the annex following article 244.

At the conference of the inter-allied representatives, held at Spa in July, 1920, the amount payable by Germany was allocated between the different allied powers, 22 per cent being the amount receivable by the British Empire.

At the conference of the inter-allied representatives held at London in 1921, the amount of damages payable by Germany was fixed at one hundred and thirty two billion gold marks. The provision of the treaty that the amount be fixed by the Reparation Commission was at that time superseded.

At the conference of the British government with the prime ministers of the dominions in 1921, at which conference I think my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) was present, Canada's share of the amount to which the British Empire was entitled, was fixed at 4.35 per 4 p.m. cent of the 22 per cent to which the British Empire was entitled. Seeing that the British Empire at the time that the question was being decided as to what amounts Great Britain and the several dominions were to receive, acted as one; that all the different parts were taken into consultation, would it not appear in every way right and proper, and indeed the only thing that is fitting, that, before any alteration is made by any one part of the British Empire on this question of reparations, they should all have opportunity of conferring together with reference to that question? I will not take second place to any hon. member in this House as to a desire to see Canada manage her own affairs, maintain in every way and at all times her identity and individuality; but there are occasions when not only is it right and necessary, but when any other course would appear to be wrong and improper, that all parts of the British Empire should act together as one. In regard to a settlement such as this, dealing with a matter of war, in which different parts of the Empire fought together, in which their sons died together, where the matter was originally determined in common conference, the only proper way in which to deal with the question at issue namely that of reparations would appear to be by all parts acting together as they did at the time the agreement was made as to the proportion which each should receive.

Indeed, only a few days ago the Prime Minister of Great Britain, speaking in France, made reference to the possibility that at some time the British Empire might consider what could be done in this very matter of reparations. But Mr. Bonar Law was careful at the time of making his statement to say that whatever Great Britain might do in the matter, would be done only after consultation with the different British dominions. I think it will be the wish of the British dominions throughout the Emipre to adopt precisely the same attitude towards the Mother Country in this matter as the Mother Country is prepared to adopt towards us.

My hon. friend who has moved the resolution says that his purpose is the furtherance of world peace. I believe he is quite sincere in so stating his position, but I would say to him that I fear the effect of his resolution, if adopted by this House, would be entirely the opposite of what he would wish it to be in that regard. We cannot as respects any resolution passed by this House dissociate the effect of its interpretation outside of and within the House; we cannot dissociate its effect beyond the boundaries of and within our own country. My hon. friend says that this would be a gesture. I am very much afraid it would be a gesture which would be construed as anything but favourable to France, and rather strongly in favour of Germany at this particular time. As my hon. friend knows, the relations between France and Germany at the moment are severely strained. The most serious situation that we have in the world at the present time exists because of those strained relations. Is it conceivable that this parliament at this moment could pass a resolution which has a bearing upon that situation without it being construed abroad as an expression of our attitude in that very serious situation?

I would say to my hon. friend that I hope when he reflects upon the views which have been expressed here, when he reflects upon the possible bearing of his resolution in its relation to the situation overseas at this particular time, he will see well to withdraw it altogether. But if he does not see fit to take that course, I hope this House will see well to defeat his resolution, because I fear were it passed its purpose would not be understood in any such sense as that in which he says he has put it forward.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have no particular desire to address the House and to in any way pretend to add to the importance of this resolution. At the same time I do not want to be even seeming to attempt to evade any part of my duty or responsibility here.

The resolution may be viewed from the standpoint of its own merits and debated. To its being so presented, I have not any particular objection. But even so presented, disrobed of all the other trappings with which it was introduced, I would oppose it.

But the resolution has been presented in a speech which sought to press its acceptance on grounds that reflected on the bona fides of our country and of our Allies in the war from which we have emerged. It would take an assertion of fact pretty hard to overcome, to secure my support after it had been paraded before us to accompaniments of that kind. I cannot, I am sorry to say, agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the way he meets the suggestions of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). I do not base my belief in the good faith of Britain and of France, in the complete and absolute accountability of Germany for the war, on any admission exacted from Germany under the pressure of the Conference of Peace. I would not regard even a voluntary admission by Germany as of much value or as necessary at all. I base my belief on facts that the world knows, facts that have been flared before the face of this generation so clearly that none except those of kinked and super-heated minds can doubt their manifest and eternal import. There is some weight attaching to the statement of a man who, like Prince Lieknowsky, who sitting as a German ambassador at the very centre of events, watching the course of Germany, of Great Britain and of France throughout the crisis, had the courage to state that, knowing what he knew, his own country was solely the cause of the conflict, the aggressor from beginning to end. But this matter does not admit of discussion. Do not let us in any way ennoble the suggestion of the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg by discussing the matter of the accountability for the Great War that scourged this country.

Now, taking the resolution itself, aside entirely from what has been urged in its support —apparently with some measure of acceptance to the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine)—it proposes that Canada should now assert to the world that she abandons all claim to any share of reparations. The argument in its favour, aside from what I have already described, is that it is going to aid world peace, that it will be an exhibition of mercy, an acceptance of some scriptural injunction, and in that way be an evidence of the high moral standing of this country. Well, Mr. Speaker, if that is true, it applies to France, it applies to Britain, and it applies to Belgium just as clearly as it would to this country. If the right way to bring about world peace is to take the man who, with uplifted arm, enters your house to slaughter your family, and say to him: Now, we forgive you, go and sin no more;—if we have come to that day in this world, all right, let that be general. We do not find that course possible in this Dominion nor anywhere else in the world. Penalties are still the law of this universe, and no man entitled to enjoy liberty and be at large would suggest that any other principle is possible in the conduct of the affairs of men.

Why, if it is right at this time to say to Germany: You were wrong, but we forgive you, we do not ask that you pay for any of the damage that you committed;—well, my idea is that we place the biggest premium possible on the repetition of German aggression. Germany escaped unhurt from the consequences of her crime of 1870; she escaped unpunished from the consequences of her crimes of 1862 and 1866. And because she so escaped—the aggressor in all those instances—though she exacted a penalty from France, when the time came again that she thought she could strike, she was again the aggressor. In 1914 France, which just forty years before had been called upon to pay an indemnity of a billion dollars, stood at bay until German arms were raised, and until France knew that unless she rose in her own defence she would suffer a repetition of the woes of 1870. If Germany had been made to pay for her crime in 1870, there would not have been a war in 1914.

Now, I ask hon. gentlemen just to reflect. How would you like to stand to-day in the face of the people of France and say to those people: There are your cities desecrated; there are your young children murdered; there are your women folk outraged; there are your sons slaughtered—for no cause attributable to you at all; there is your country to-day, a desolation—now be good enough just to restore all those ruins yourselves and let the destroyer pass by unrepentant and unpunished. What kind of suggestion would that be to make to France? Well, by just the same argument it is an outrageous suggestion to make to this country. I know we have not suffered as France has; our measure of reparation is that much less than France's, but our right is just the same as theirs. To ask this parliament, then, to abandon that right, to throw it away, is indirectly to suggest the same thing to Belgium, to Poland and to France.

I do not want to be understood as saying that this country is probably going to collect the measure of reparation that now, under the covenants, is our due. I do not think myself that that is probable. But, parenthetically, I am not quite able to understand the contention that it would be a great and noble thing to give up our right to all reparations, when followed by the assertion that the reparations are no good anyway because German marks are useless. I cannot follow that argument.

I am going to give my idea of the principle on which reparations should be founded. There is no doubt that German damage in this war is beyond all power of Germany to pay. If I go out and commit damage, of course I ought to pay for it all, but if I go on a rampage and destroy the city of Ottawa there would be very little use in assessing me for the value of the city. I should, however, be made to pay all that by the power of my hands and my mind I can bring to production in the course of my life. In my judgment the same principle should apply to the aggressor in the late war. Germany should be made to contribute all that the German people can stand; all that they can by production turn over to those who suffered by their wrong. Now, there is a point—and I admit it is very difficult to find—beyond which if you add to the burden you destroy the capacity to produce; you turn the country down the hill rather than over the hill and disable it from performing its contract. The best minds of the world should address themselves to the task of finding as nearly as they can where that point is, and, that done, let all the Allies see to it, by whatever means are essential, that up to such point Germany pays without abatement.

I find myself wholly in accord with the Prime Minister in his statement that before we set about to determine just what we should insist on, we should meet with the other countries of the Empire and seek, in concert with them, to come to a decision applicable to all. In fact, I would go further than by the terms of his speech the Prime Minister indicated he would go to-day. I am one of those who believe that in all matters affecting the common concerns of the Empire, of which this is only one, it is fundamental and contributes to world peace if we sit down with the other nations of the Empire and seek in conference with them to find a common course. But applying the principle only to this, it is evident that before any step is taken now in derogation of what we did in association with the other nations of the Empire, we should sit with them and see what the wisest step, having regard to the interests of all, may be.

That we should do, but when we get there I hope the attitude of this government—and I believe it is the will of this parliament that such should be the attitude—will be that they will endeavour to find, in the light of the best evidence that the economists of the world can produce, the utmost limit that it is possible for Germany to pay in satisfaction for the damage she caused this world, and thus commence the colossal task of restoring those countries, the restoration of which is not only an act of justice for which the world is longing but as well an event of vital importance to this Dominion. You are not going to restore Europe by taking Germany's burden and putting it on the back of France. You are not going to restore Europe by virtually saying to every citizen of Germany: Any time you want to repeat the outrage of 1914 you can count upon us, after the war is over and we are weary of it all, to say to you that the penalty is entirely revoked. No, you will not restore Europe in that way. There must be left in the minds of all the people of the world a sense of justice done before the first essential, the corner stone of restoration, is put in place. If something is done that forever will rankle in the mind of France as an injustice to her; rankle in the mind of the British taxpayer, whose trials are only in short measure understood; rankle in the minds of these people as a gross iniquity born of soft-minded flabbiness on the part of the nations of the world, then you have only postponed the day of a reconstructed and a rehabilitated Europe.

Yes, Germany signed the peace treaty. Germany, of course, signed it under duress; I fully admit that. Germany's signature to my mind means this and this only: she decided it was better to sign it and undertake its obligations than to accept the only alternative. That is why Germany signed.

I place no importance whatsoever upon her signature as an admission. I judge of Germany's obligation not by what she signed, but by what she did, and so far as it lies in my power, I shall support the view that there should be no remission beyond the point of Germany's capacity to pay.

There remains an argument that perhaps I might refer to—there are some who hold it, and, I think, hold it conscientiously—that the exactions made of Germany under the treaty went beyond what could reasonably to read into the Fourteen Points promulgated by the President of the United States; that the President of the United States having stipulated that only civilian damage should be held as that for which Germany should account, and Germany having ceased fighting on those stipulations, it was not fair to include in civilian damage the capitalized value of separation pay, and, I think, of pensions as well. This matter was argued at the Versailles Conference. I understand the United States representatives for a time took a stand against the inclusion of those items, but after argument and the fullest debate they conceded the point, and as a consequence those were included. Such was the judgment of the majority—I think it was the unanimous judgment—of those who attended that conference. Such judgment has not been reversed, and I have never been able to persuade myself that it should be reversed. If it could be shown that to include these classes of damages was in any way in derogation of the stipulations on the faith of which Germany laid down her arms, then, whatever the prior crime of Germany, I would be prepared to abide by the real meaning of those stipulations. This as yet has not been shown; until it is shown I think the only principle that should govern is the principle that I have just sought to elucidate to the House. At all events, that is the course I would pursue.

I propose to vote against the resolution, but I do not for a moment suggest that the government of this country should not take its place among the nations of the Empire, or if necessary among all the Allied nations, and seek to have a composition of the whole subject of war reparations, so long as in that composition the principle I have sought to emphasize is not forgotten.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): I do not intend to delay the House very long this afternoon in the observations which I propose to make on this very important resolution. It seems to me that the quiet, weighty and reasonable remarks of the Prime Minister will find a responsive chord in the hearts of nearly all of us present, and I trust that those responsible for bringing the resolution before the House will feel it incumbent upon them to comply with his courteous request.

But things have been said in this debate which I do not think should go without some observations being made thereon. I have been pained at some attacks made upon the member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). I do not believe he deserved those attacks. I believe he brought this resolution before the House with the best of good will, with absolute sincerity and conviction of the righteousness of what he brought forward. It has been the glory of British people, Mr. Speaker, that at all times in the nation's history here and overseas there have been men who have been prepared to stand up for what they thought was right, even if it went against the current of popular opinion at the time. Fox withstood Pitt and argued against the continuance of war with France a hundred or more years ago. At the time of the Crimean war, John Bright fulminated against Great Britain's stand at that time, and history has said that he was right. A few years after, it was the turn of Richard Cobden to protest against the Opium War in China. We should always courteously listen to those with whom we disagree, even if they say things we might not consider wise, or if wise which we consider unpalatable.

Now, that Germany was the immediate aggressor, I think we are nearly all in accord. But if Germany was the immediate aggressor in the Great War—and dearly has she paid for her aggression—does anyone in this House composed of intelligent men, believe that Germany was solely responsible for the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Speaker, the war came because the European peoples had for years followed a false system. They tried to find security in military preparedness. I grant you that it was enormously difficult when one nation had set the pace for others not to keep step with it. Once Germany believed that Russia was arming against her, it was difficult for Germany not to prepare. Once England believed that Germany was arming against her, it seemed only the part of wisdom to prepare for war and to seek alliances; and we found before the Great War broke upon this world that Europe was divided into two great armed camps—the Central Empires on the one side, who relied at that time upon the adhesion of Italy, which failed them when the time came, and the Entente Powers, Russia, France and Great Britain, on the other. What appeals to me, Mr. Speaker, is that the lesson for humanity which we derive from seeing this war in its operation, seeing what led to it, and seeing its consequences, is the utter futility for mankind to try to protect itself against violence by military preparation. Surely that is a lesson of the war which has been driven home to all of us. What I would ask this House to consider is, not men who have been our enemies, not men who have been our friends, but suffering humanity, the victims rather than the authors of what has happened to them. That seems to me the frame of mind in which we should approach this question.

I have little more to say. I believe that the great cause of the war was the conflicting imperialisms of Europe, nations striving to extend the ambit of their power, particularly in parts of the world which were only semi-civilized or not civilized at all. The conflicts of imperialisms in Africa and other parts of the world were, I think, the cause of the war which has its roots far in the past.

I do not know what the mover (Mr. Woodsworth) proposes to do. I hope that he will withdraw this resolution, not because the resolution is wrong in essence, but because it is liable to be misunderstood. Why should we be willing to give up any part of our reparations? Not because we think that France should give up reparation, for I think we are all convinced that Germany which devasted northern France owes by every rule of ethics, law and justice, the obligation of restoring those devasted portions of France, and it is but fair to say that the German trade unions have offered to restore northern France, and that that offer has not been accepted.

I have little more to say on this occasion. What I do wish to protest against in all good spirit is the attacks that have been made against a man who has tried to say what he thought right and what he thought in the interests of peace. We may agree with him or we may not agree with him, but let us be charitable one to another. I think that in the last ten years what has happened in this world has shown the truth of what John Bright said fifty years ago in connection with the Irish question, that force is no remedy, and this old world will not have peace and concord until force as an ultimate solution is abandoned and men will rely upon good will and justice to settle their disputes.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) in requesting the mover of the resolution (Mr. Woodsworth) to withdraw his motion. Personally I find myself in very large agreement with his point of view, but I would find it very difficult under the circumstances to vote for his resolution, for various reasons which have already been outlined, particularly by the Prime Minister. I think that a vote taken under the circumstances would not be a vote on the merits of the question which the mover has in mind, and therefore I think it would be unfortunate to call for a vote.

I wish also to protest, as did the hon. member for Brome, against the spirit of hostility displayed, and against the sneers and jeers that have been uttered in this House, in this debate. I know that this is a question which it is almost impossible to discuss without heat, animosity and prejudice, and sometimes it is wise, although not always perhaps, not to risk arousing prejudices when you are pretty sure that what may be said will only result in inflaming feeling

I do not think I have anything further to say. I do believe that we ought to remember the old truth that they who take the sword shall perish by the sword. That is something that we ought to take to heart nationally, but I am not going to discuss that question. I would once more request that the mover of the resolution do not press for a vote upon it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the mover closes the debate, the Chair must give its ruling, which I thought was awaited with considerable anxiety. The point was raised last night by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) that this resolution, under rule 78, was out of order and could not be proceeded with. The resolution is couched in vague language. It reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it is in the interest of world peace that Canada should withdraw all claims on Germany for reparations.

As I stated last night, Canada here means the Crown and the Crown has claims against Germany. The rights of Canada are clearly stated in the Treaty of Versailles. Canada was represented at the making of that treaty, Canada's representatives signed the treaty, and the reparations which Germany was condemned to make are set forth in Articles 231 to 244. Annex I enumerates claims that could arise out of those reparations. For instance:

> Annex I
>
> Compensation may be claimed from Germany under Article 232 above in respect of the total damage under the following categories:
>
> (1) Damage to injured persons and to surviving dependents by personal injury to or death of civilians caused by acts of war, including bombardments or other attacks on land, on sea, or from the air, and all the direct consequences thereof, and of all operations of war by the two groups of belligerents wherever arising.

(2) Damage caused by Germany or her allies to civilian victims of acts of cruelty, violence or maltreatement (including injuries to life or health) as a consequence of imprisonment, deportation, internment or evacuation, of exposure at sea, or of being forced to labour, wherever arising, and to the surviving dependents of such victims.

(3) Damage caused by Germany or her allies in their own territory or in occupied or invaded territory to civilian victims of all acts injurious to health or capacity to work, or to honour, as well as to the surviving dependents of such victims.

(4) Damage caused by any kind of maltreatment of prisoners of war.

(5) As damage caused to the peoples of the allied and associated powers, all pensions and compensation in the nature of pensions to naval and military victims of war (including members of the air force), whether mutilated, wounded, sick or invalided, and to the dependents of such victims, the amount due to the allied and associated governments being calculated for each of them as being the capitalized cost of such pensions, and compensation at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty, on the basis of the scales in force in France at such date.

(6) The cost of assistance by the governments of the allied and associated powers to prisoners of war and to their families and dependents.

(7) Allowances by the governments of the allied and associated powers to the families and dependents of mobilized persons or persons serving with the forces, the amount due to them for each calendar year in which hostilities occurred, being calculated for each government on the basis of the average scale for such payments in force in France during that year.

(8) Damage caused to civilians by being forced by Germany or her allies to labour without just remuneration.

(9) Damage in respect of all property wherever situated belong to any of the allied or associated states or their nationals, with the exception of naval and military works or materials, which has been carried off, seized, injured or destroyed by the acts of Germany or her allies on land, and sea, or from the air, or damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war.

(10) Damage in the form of levies, fines and other similar exactions imposed by Germany or her allies upon the civilian population.

As the House will readily see, Canada has various claims against Germany, and when Canada is invited to relinquish such claims it is a matter which affects the public exchequer. Therefore it comes under the rule which was quoted last evening by the hon. member for New Westminster. Under that rule in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms I find the following:

626. This House will not proceed upon any petition, motion or bill for granting any money, or for releasing or compounding any sum of money owing to the Crown but in a committee of the whole House.

Then I find further:

629. The recommendation of the Crown is needed for such measures as bills relating to the extension of time for the repayment of the deposit which has become liable to forfeiture in the case of a private bill; the release or compounding of sums due to the Crown; the repeal of an exemption from an existing duty, as the burthen of the duty is thereby augmented; a proposal to repeal an existing drawback on export of sugar, as it effects an increase of charge upon the importers who desired to export sugar.

I also find in May 12th edition, at page 461, the following:

In pursuance of standing orders Nos. 66 and 67 a petition praying directly or indirectly for an advance of public money; for compounding or relinquishing any debts due to, or other claims of, the Crown; or for remission of duties or other charges payable by any person; or for a charge upon the revenues of India, will only be received if recommended by the Crown.

And so on. So that the principle of rule 78 is clearly laid down, in May. In Bourinot I also find the following:

Referring to this right of members to move such abstract resolutions all authorities agree that it is one "which the House exercises, and should always exercise, with great reserve and only under peculiar and exceptional circumstances." Such resolutions are considered virtually "an evasion of the rules of the House, and are on that account objectionable, and should be discouraged as much as possible."

It might be said that the resolution is only the expression of a pious wish. I grant that in an ordinary matter the Speaker might ignore the rule and acquiesce in a debate such as has taken place since last evening. But here we are face to face with a very serious matter. In my humble judgment, if the House of Commons of Canada, under the present circumstances, adopted this resolution it would have far reaching consequences. Internationally speaking, it would be a notice given to the allied powers that Canada relinquishes her share of the reparations. Therefore, I think I am only doing my duty in adhering to the rule and in following the precedents which have been adopted in Great Britain and in Canada, precedents which have received the support of the best parliamentarians in our country such as Sir John A. Macdonald, Mr. Holton and Mr. Blake. As Bourinot says:

Sir John A. Macdonald, Mr. Holton, and Mr. Blake pointed out the necessity of considering with the fullest deliberation all propositions which may involve an appropriation of the public moneys.

An appropriation of the public moneys or relinquishing debts or claims owing to the Crown is the same thing in my humble judgment and consequently, following on these authorities, I declare that the point was well taken and my ruling is that the resolution is out of order.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

TAX EXEMPT BONDS

Mr. NEILL:

What is the aggregate value (calculated at par) of all bonds issued by the Government of Canada, exempt from income tax?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: Bonds and domestic issues, exempt from Dominion income tax, $1,103,972,550; of New York issues, $50,874,000.

In addition, $160,000,000 of bonds issued and payable in New York are exempt from Dominion taxes except when beneficially owned by persons residing or ordinarily resident in Canada.

MINISTERS' AND OFFICIALS' TRAVELS

On the question of Mr. Stansell being called:

Mr. STANSELL:

1. What Ministers of the Crown have been absent from Canada since the close of last session?
2. What were the several tours taken by each Minister so absent, and what was the object of each trip?
3. What were the names of those who, at the public expense, accompanied each Minister, and what was the purpose?
4. What officials of the various departments have been out of Canada since the last session and for what purpose in each case?
5. What were the several tours taken by each official so absent, and what was the object of each trip?
6. What has been the cost to Canada of such trips by Ministers and officials, and those who accompanied them?
7. What has been the cost to the Dominion of the various trips made by Ministers and persons who accompanied them since the last session of Parliament: (a) within Canada; (b) out of Canada?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the question was dropped yesterday.

Mr. FIELDING: I said the hon. gentleman should convert it into a motion, when it would be more conveniently dealt with. I did not say "dropped."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not think the hon. minister said "dropped."

Mr. FIELDING: But that was my answer. We were not prepared to answer in that way, but if he would convert it into a motion we would deal with it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could it not stand as an order for return?

Mr. FIELDING: No, not in its present form.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will leave it as it is.

Mr. FIELDING: I have given the answer of the government, and I would prefer if the hon. member would bring it forward as a motion, because we desire to give him information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask what is the matter with the question?

Mr. FIELDING: The question occupied some space and would call for poscsibly a good deal of information. At all events in the judgment of the government it should not be dealt with in that form. We are perfectly content to bring the information down if he will move for it. There is nothing remarkable in that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only course the government has to pursue in that case is to have it stand as an order for return.

Mr. FIELDING: But suppose I do not want it to stand in that form.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What other alternative has the government?

Mr. FIELDING: I propose to move an amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To the question?

Mr. FIELDING: No, I cannot do that, but I can move an amendment to the motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then, there is no motion.

Mr. FIELDING: If there is no motion, only a question, I could not answer it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman says he will not answer it—

Mr. FIELDING: I have given the answer. If it is converted into a motion it will then be considered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then it stands, as an order.

Mr. FIELDING: No, it does not stand as an order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why does it not? Has the hon. gentleman a right to strike a question off the order paper?

Mr. FIELDING: No, but I have a right to answer the question. The judgment of the government in that respect must be accepted. The hon. gentleman can proceed to move, but he cannot compel me to answer the question in any other form than that which seems to us to be proper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. Minister of Finance assert that he can stand up in the House and say "We will not answer the question", and then ask the clerk to record that as an answer?

Mr. FIELDING: I did not say I would not answer. I said I had answered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says "I will not answer", and then says, "I have answered".

Mr. FIELDING: No, I did not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: His words are down and his words are "We will not answer it in that form".

Mr. FIELDING: Exactly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And then he says, "I have answered".

Mr. FIELDING: That is the answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the government is entitled to do that, I think, Mr. Speaker, your well known capacity to hunt for precedents will be taxed in vain. If he says, "We will not answer it in this form", and instructs that the records of the House show that that is an answer, then the whole practice of questioning falls to the ground, and the government has it in its power to deny everything, giving no reasons whatsoever.

Mr. FIELDING: Most certainly—

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is a matter of length, if the minister has said the answer is going to be too long and entail too much work, then the government can say, "Stands as order for return", and the House has no alternative. That is the only reason the minister has given for his very strange attitude. If that is the objection to the question, all right, the government has its alternative, it can stand as an order for return, but the government has no right to say "We will not answer it in its present form, we do not like it, and we say that is our reason—"

Mr. FIELDING: I am surprised at the hon. gentleman. It is in his power and in the power of any member of the House to frame a question as he pleases, and it is the right of the government to say whether they will answer it in that form or not. We take the liberty to say that if this is put in the form of a motion we would bring down the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the same thing as having it stand as an order for return.

Mr. FIELDING: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the difference?

Mr. FIELDING: As a question I can not amend it, but as a motion before the House I can ask the House to amend it. That is the difference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not of the nature of a motion. It is in the nature of an inquiry.

Mr. FIELDING: Well, I have answered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman is satisfied, I do not think he will be proud of the record when it appears in print.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Mr. FIELDING: Very well.

Mr. SPEAKER: If hon. members will look at Rule No. 37, paragraph 3, they will find the following:

If in the opinion of Mr. Speaker a question on the order paper put to a Minister of the Crown is of such a nature as to require a lengthy reply, he may, upon the request of the government, direct the same to stand as a notice of motion, and to be transferred to its proper place as such upon the order paper, the Clerk of the House being authorized to amend the same as to matters of form.

Para. 4. If the question is of such a nature that in the opinion of the Minister who is to furnish the reply such reply should be in the form of a return, and the Minister states that he has no objection to laying such return upon the Table of the House, his statement shall, unless otherwise ordered by the House, be deemed an order of the House to that effect, and the same shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings as such.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite prepared to abide by either one.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then my ruling is that it comes under paragraph 3. It will stand as a notice of motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For return?

Mr. SPEAKER: As a notice of motion. The other one is in the form of a return. One is the notice of motion, and the other one is the form of return.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then it stands as a notice of motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is satisfactory.

Mr. SPEAKER: It stands as a notice of motion.

MILITIA AND DEFENCE DISBURSEMENTS

Mr. BOYS:

1. What expenses, payments or disbursements of any kind have been made since April 1, 1922, out of other moneys than those included in the amounts voted by Parliament for the Department of Militia and Defence in respect of items or charges paid in the fiscal year 1920-21 out of moneys voted for the Department of Militia and Defence?

2. Under what authority were such moneys so paid from other votes, and why was the change made?

3. Were objections offered by the Department of the Auditor General to payments being so made or to other attempts to make similar payments? If so, in what cases?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think this question was called yesterday and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Graham) asked that it be allowed to stand so that he could really understand what the hon. gentleman wished by his first question. He asked the hon. member to put it in different langauge, so that he would be able to give him the information. The question does not quite convey what is desired.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have looked over the question since the Minister of National Defence made the statement the other day. The question seems clear to me. If I were to put it in other words than those which appear on the order paper, it is this: what the hon. member desires is a statement of payments made charged to other departments than the Department of National Defence, in the present fiscal year, in respect of expenditures that in former years were charged to Militia and Defence. I could illustrate that by an example. Presuming that in the fiscal year 1921, the rent of a building used as an armoury was paid and charged to Militia and Defence, and in 1921 paid and charged to Public Works, that would be such an item as would be covered, and asked for by a return to the House.

Question stands.

WINNIPEG SAMPLE MARKET

Mr. Millar:

1. How much grain has been sold on the Winnipeg Sample Market in each of the last four years?
2. What amounts have been received by the Government from the proceeds of terminal elevator overages for the last year, for which returns are available?
3. Did the Government propose towards the close of the 1922 shipping sesaon to waive the regulations forbidding foreign boats carrying Canadian grain between Canadian ports?
4. If so, did any Canadian carrier or carriers make objections, and what are the names of such objectors?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: This question must stand until we can get the return from Fort William.

Mr. SPEAKER: As an Order for Return?

Mr. ROBB : No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question stands.

THE CIVIL SERVICE

MOTION BY MR. POWER FOR REPEAL OF THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable to repeal chapter 12, 8-9 George V., an Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with this resolution which stands in my name on the order paper, I should like, through you, to ask the House to allow me to amend the resolution by adding after the words "Civil Service of Canada" the following words:

and to restore, in so far as circumstances will permit, the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908.

Mr. SPEAKER: This can be done only by unanimous consent. I take it that the House agrees to the amendment to the motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the hon. member should proceed with his motion to-day under an amendment just introduced. I think I understand the effect of the amendment, but there certainly might be hon. members a shorter time in this House who would not.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the unanimous consent of the House is required, I take it that the hon. gentleman will not proceed on his amendment. He may, however, proceed on the motion unamended.

Mr. POWER: I am surprised that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has not seen fit to allow me to proceed with my amendment. If, however, I understand parliamentary practice, it will not be very difficult for me to induce some of my friends to move to the resolution an amendment somewhat similar to that which I have suggested. I had intended moving this amendment in order to reassure a number of hon. members who were under the impression that the resolution as placed on the order paper was somewhat too radical and would have the effect of bringing about chaos in the Civil Service of Canada. The effect of the amendment will be that one piece of legislation will be repealed, and that immediately another act, which is, to my mind, far more advantageous, will replace it. There are certain portions of the act of 1908 which, of course, would not apply to the circumstances of the case at the present time. For instance, if my memory serves me well, a schedule of salaries is attached to the act of 1908. These salaries are in many cases much lower than those which at present obtain in the Civil Service, and they would naturally have to be increased. It is not my intention in any way to urge upon members of the House the advisability or expediency of diminishing the salaries of the public servants of Canada. I feel that the cost of living has increased so much in recent years, and that the salaries paid are in many cases so low, that it would be impossible or, at any rate, most ungenerous, for us to ask that these be diminished.

This proposed resolution of mine has received a certain amount of criticism, some of it very harsh, some of it, perhaps, a little ungenerous, in the press and even in this House of Commons. We have heard from some hon. gentlemen who sit directly opposite, an ultimatum delivered to the government warning the Prime Minister and his colleagues not to allow impious backbenchers of the Liberal party to lay their sacrilegious hands on the sacred Civil Service Commission. In order that the responsibility for this resolution may lie where it properly belongs, allow me to tell my hon. friends that the resolution was drafted and 5 p.m. placed on the order paper without my having entered into any consultation whatever with the leaders of the party to which I have the honour to give my allegiance. Permit me to say, too, that I await with some little anxiety the announcement of the point of view which the government intends to take on this subject. I am here, however, to represent, in so far as I can, the opinions of the constituents who elected me, provided always that their opinions and views are consistent with and conducive to the best interests of Canada. So far as I am able to judge from the frequent and sometimes rather forcible representations which have been made to me, I am inclined to believe that the great majority of my constituents have not for the Civil Service Act or for the Civil Service Commission the respect and admiration which a large number of my hon. friends seem to have. They do not seem to wish to perpetuate in our statutes as a monument of wise legislation, as a law not to be altered nor assailed, the act of 1918. And it is to represent their views as well as I can that I propose this resolution to-day.

My objections to the Civil Service Act are based mainly on two grounds, which I might call constitutional and practical. From a constitutional standpoint I am and have been a firm believer in the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. I believe that the duty of our ministers is to carry out the wishes of the people, and to be responsible to the people for their every act and deed. There has been a tendency in recent years in this Dominion, as in other countries, to urge that national affairs will be best administered by those who are not responsible to the people, that it is well that those who pay taxes should not have direct control and management of the national purse to which they contribute. This tendency has increased considerably in recent years, and as a consequence we have had a perfect avalanche of boards, bureaux, and commissions, all administering in some degree the affairs of the people, and many of them in no way whatsoever answerable to the nation.

It seems to be generally accepted that whatever may have been his previous record, the moment a person is appointed to a position of public trust where he no longer has to answer for his stewardship, he immediately becomes clothed in a kind of mantle of grace and gifted with all wisdom, and that his decisions, however injurious they may be to the public, must be accepted as infallible. With this theory I must respectfully beg to differ.

A number of hon. members in this House and a number of people throughout the country have been preaching democracy, the government of the people by the people, on the one hand, while on the other they have been urging the country to take the administration of the people's money out of the control of the people. This tendency increased perhaps more during the war than at any other time, due, I think, to the theory that a democracy was unable to carry out great undertakings without first sacrificing the very principles upon which it was built and had its being. We heard throughout the days of the war, and we have heard since, that it is impossible for any great democracy to be victorious in war. Sir, we have only to go over the history of the last few years to find that the two most democratic nations on earth, England and France, after four years of struggle emerged victorious over the two most bureaucratic nations of Europe, Germany and Austria. However, in spite of this vindication of the views of those of us who hold that any encroachment upon or curtailment of the rights of the people is dangerous, we have had in Canada the strange spectacle of public-spirited men, men of standing in the community, urging upon us the advisability of allowing our national affairs to be administered by boards, bureaux and commissions.

These attacks on what to my mind is the proper theory of democratic government, namely, representation so far as possible of the people by those responsible to the people, reached their culmination in 1918, when our parliament created the most irresponsible body which has ever been known in the history of Canada. This commission—of course, I refer to the Civil Service Commission—which has power almost of life and death, at any rate power of affluence or starvation, over thousands of our fellow-citizens, and power to expend millions of public money, is not directly or indirectly answerable to parliament. It makes appointments to positions of public trust, fixes salaries, awards bonuses, and distributes favours of all kinds, without being obliged to accept any suggestions of the representatives of the people and without even taking into consideration the recommendations of those best fitted to make them.

Mr. SHAW: May I be permitted to ask the hon. gentleman a question? When speaking about the creation of the Civil Service Commission, is he referring to the commission under the act of 1908 or under that of 1918?

Mr. POWER: I am afraid I did not make myself quite clear. The Civil Service Commission was created in 1908—my hon. friend is quite right; but the exceptional powers which it received in 1918 are those to which I object. I was saying that this commission is under no obligation to accept even the slightest recommendation from those who are in the best position to know the wishes of the people and to state what in any locality under any given circumstances should be done. The commission goes even further, as do its friends, and contend that no recommendation of the people's representatives can be acceptable to it—a contention in which they take great pride. As I understand it, we have been called here to advise His Majesty the King on the carrying out of the affairs of state and to vote supplies for the administration of the country. When we by our own act neglect to carry out the duties which are imposed on us by our mandate as members of parliament, I do not think we are faithful to the trust which has been placed in us by the constituents whom we represent. We allow an independent body to usurp the functions which should, properly speaking, belong to those who advise in the administration of the country and those who should vote supplies for the carrying on of the government of the country.

It is true there are a number of us who say we do not wish to be bothered by patronage; that we only make enemies by distributing patronage; that if we give a position to one we offend ten others who are seeking the same position. I submit, Sir, with all respect that we are not doing our duty unless we fearlessly tackle all the problems which confront us. To shirk our responsibility by saying that we do not wish to have the burden of patronage is, to my mind, unworthy of our position.

It will be said, I think, during the course of this debate that the present act, the Act of 1919, was endorsed by the electorate of Canada on two occasions. Sir, I think you and any of those who took part in the election of 1917 will readily admit that other issues were involved; that public opinion was more agitated by other questions than it was by those which had reference to the Civil Service of Canada. It will be said, perhaps, that the 1921 election was an endorsation of the Civil Service Act of 1919. Permit me to recall to your memory, Sir, the fact that during the whole course of that election the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues appealed to the people from every platform throughout the length and the breadth of the land to free them from autocratic and bureaucratic control. To my mind it was due in large measure to those appeals, and to the fact that there was in Canada a reaction against the arbitrary methods of ruling which had been employed during the war and shortly after, that the Liberal party is in power today.

The present system of making appointments under the Civil Service Commission is, as I have said, impracticable. I should like to quote a few words spoken by a man who is, without doubt, one of those most experienced in the public life of Canada. In a speech which he made when this 1918 act was first proposed in the House of Commons—a speech which might have been made after instead of before the advent of the present commission—the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding, speaking on the Civil Service Amendment Act, on April 12, 1918, said:

> I think we are getting away from the purpose for which the Civil Service Commission was created. It was never intended to be a patronage distributing body, but a body with distinct purposes, a body to hold examinations and to take means of guaranteeing the qualifications of applicants for the public service.

He goes on further:

> Where is the Civil Service Commission going to get information regarding all the virtues of this man who is to fill the office of postmaster away out at Blankville, in Cape Breton County? I do not know what the experience of others has been, but I have had some of the worries of my life in getting a capable man to accept the position of postmaster, and how these excellent gentlemen in the city of Ottawa are going to get a postmaster for Blankville better than any one of us, I fail to comprehend.

The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) at that time failed to comprehend how the Civil Service Commission was going to make these appointments and make them properly. I think he will admit that in the light of experience it has been found that the Civil Service Commission is not able to make these appointments properly and judiciously, and that every word he uttered on that occasion has proved to be true.

I have here also, in order that my hon. friends of the opposition may not be disappointed in my not quoting from some of their leaders, the words of a gentleman with whom I have had occasion to differ at times, but for whose capacity, energy and fighting ability I have the highest regard; I speak of the Hon. Mr. Edwards. He said:

> I also, Mr. Chairman, want to repudiate the suggestion that I am one wrapped up in the theory that "to the victors belong the spoils." . . . . But I say that I do not see how it will be possible for the Civil Service Commission, sitting in Ottawa, to ascertain the proper persons to appoint to these positions without applying to those who might be reasonably expected to know who were qualified for them. I repudiate the reflection which I maintain is to a certain extent thrown upon members of parliament generally by the wording of this resolution and by some of those who are supporting it. In effect, you are saying that no man who has been chosen as a representative of the people to sit in this House can be trusted to make an honest recommendation or to select an efficient man to fill a vacancy in the Civil Service. ....That is putting members of parliament on a very low plane.

The history of the commission since that time has, I think, fully borne out the predictions made by the gentleman whose remarks I have just quoted. It has been found to be practically impossible for the Civil Service Commission to make the impartial and judicious choice which was had in mind when the commission was appointed. They do not, either from choice or through fear of adverse criticism, wish to take into consideration the suggestions and recommendations of those who by their local knowledge are best fitted to understand the situation in any given locality. They are thus forced to call in and to take counsel from persons who in many cases have neither the confidence nor the respect of the inhabitants of the locality, and in a number of other cases have themselves been appointed to the positions which they hold from partisan motives and in order to increase the prestige of some political party. The result of this system is that instead of what was formerly called patronage we have a species of nepotism,—a kind of series of family compacts spread over the length and breadth of the land. Instead of the appointments being made by someone who is responsible to the constituency in which the vacancy occurs, the appointments are made by officers or by outsiders many of whom do not understand the conditions of the locality and are not fit in some cases to make any recommendations.

It is not my intention to ask that competitive examinations be done away with altogether. In fact, my understanding of the act of 1908 is that in a large number of cases competive examinations must be held, but I do contend that there are certain positions for which competitive examinations, written or oral, are unnecessary and in many cases useless. When it devolves upon the commission to choose a man for a position requiring certain technical or professional knowledge, I contend that the Civil Service Commissioners are not qualified to judge whether or not the applicant has the necessary qualifications, and when it comes to the appointment of manual labourers I contend that the Civil Service Commission cannot, by written or oral examination held in Ottawa, judge which man should be selected and which rejected in, say, Prince Rupert, British Columbia.

There has been some question of economy brought into this discussion. It is not the intention of those who support the resolution to ask that any more positions in the civil service of Canada be created. Their intention is simply to ask that appointments be made on a more impartial and more judicious system than has obtained during the last five years. I contend, Sir, that the efficiency of this service was just as high, that the public servants did their duty just as well, and probably better, five years ago than they do to-day. Almost since confederation we have had what might be called political appointments, and I think that, generally speaking, the public service of Canada was as efficient under that system of political appointments as it is to-day under the present arbitrary system. I cannot understand how it could be otherwise. The business administrative head of a department, the deputy minister, can surely not obtain from his subordinates, those who work in his department, the same loyal support and the same steady work under a system which gives him no right to punish, as he would get when he was absolutely and personally responsible for carrying on the affairs of his department. I contend that owing to this system under which appointments are made by someone who has no interest whatsoever in the efficient carrying on of the work of the department. discipline has slackened, the morale has been lowered, and the esprit de corps, of the department lessened. Would any hon. member —and I appeal particularly to my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), who was laughing a short time ago—accept, in his own business, appointments made by someone outside of the executive head of his business? Would he accept from a third party, say, the manager of his business, particularly when he had no confidence whatsoever in that third party? I think my hon. friend will agree with me that if we are endeavouring to have business government in this country we must carry on government on business principles, and if we are seeking to obtain the most efficient service possible, let those who are in charge of this service have perfect liberty to choose those in whom they have the greatest confidence and who, in their opinion, may be best able to do the work.

Before taking my seat I should like to refer to the fact that in 1921 a debate took place on a resolution somewhat similar to this. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance smiles again. I will tell him that on looking up the Hansard, I find that I did not vote on that occasion. However, I do not intend to hide behind that kind of an alibi. Had I voted I would undoubtedly have voted against the resolution contained in what was then called the Spinney bill. I will be quite frank with the House: I should have voted that way because I mistrusted the Tories. We were on the eve of a general election, and knowing my Tory friends I was under the impression that they would make of this bill an instrument of political corruption. I was not aware at that time that every nook and cranny of the civil service had been filled chock-full, so that not another man could be got into the service anyway. Had they wished to appoint any more they would have had to create new departments and build an annex to nearly all the public buildings.

I want to protest against the feeling which seems to be prevalent throughout the country that politics should be eliminated from politics. We have heard from platforms innumerable that there is too much politics in Canada. Now, as I understand politics, it is the science of government, and politicians are those who devote more or less of their time to looking after the affairs of the public. There has been throughout the country, and more or less on the part of certain. hon. gentlemen,—I speak with particular reference to some of my hon. friends directly opposite—a certain amount of desire expressed to do away with politics and politicians, the implication being, I presume, that my hon. friends themselves are not politicians but statesmen. Now, I have no ambitions to reach the unattainable, and in this parliament and in this country I would like to reach what I think I can attain. I think that by considerable study, by hard work, and by paying some attention to the wants of my constituents I may some day be adjudged a good politician. My constituents themselves will no doubt judge whether I am or not, and the results of elections will show whether my ambitions have been attained. But to endeavour to reach a higher category, that of statesman, is I think somewhat more difficult because I know of few statesmen who ever attained to that high grade in the public service until they had passed beyond, and then purely mundane appreciation is not of very much use to them. So, I would ask my hon. friends to be a little more charitable to those of us who are mere politicians; to give us the benefit of the doubt and to imagine that we sometimes try to do our best in the country's interests; to recognize that the interests of this country are to some extent connected with the interests of the parties which we sometimes uphold; and to feel that there is no great virtue in being the only person to hold an opinion, but that rather one can obtain greater credit by being able to carry out urgent reforms or to work in the best interests of the country, and submerge at times one's own personality and one's more extreme opinions. I ask my hon. friends in all sincerity, and I ask other hon. members also, to give to those of us who are what might be called "party men" the credit for thinking that we are doing our very best in the interests of the country, and that we think the country's interests will not suffer by carrying on a system of party politics.

Now, Sir, in conclusion may I ask hon. members to view this question free from prejudice, to discuss it calmly and quietly and not be carried away by the shibboleths of the moment, such as we have heard, that there should be no party politics, and to discuss with us the question as to whether we would have a more efficient service under which the country's business would be more properly carried on, and whether we are remaining more true to the real spirit of our constitution by keeping the law as it stands at present than by repealing it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) could not see his way to permit the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) to present his resolution to the House in the form which most appealed to his mature consideration and best judgment. I think that privilege ought to have been accorded my hon. friend, because it must be apparent from his remarks to which we have just listened that the intention as expressed in the resolution as it stands is different from the intention as it would have been expressed had he been allowed to offer the resolution in the amended form suggested. As the resolution stands it is a motion for the abolition of the Civil Service Act. I need hardly say that in that form his motion would not be acceptable to the government. I think it would be a great mistake to repeal the Civil Service Act. The Civil Service Commission, of course, is the main feature of the act and, I imagine, the one to which attention is being particularly directed. On the other hand I should like to associate myself with my hon. friend in much that he said about the importance of maintaining ministerial responsibility, and having government by a responsible ministry and not by irresponsible authority.

I would like the hon. members to consider this whole question in the calm and deliberate manner in which my hon. friend has suggested they should, and in particularly the fundamental question of government by commission or responsible government. We all know that during the period of the war the business government was very greatly increased. Cabinet ministers could not begin to give attention to many matters in connection with their departments, in connection with the work of public administration, which they would, and should, be able to give in normal times, and through the period of the war there were a very large number of new commissions created and the powers of some existing commissions considerably extended. Speaking of the experience that I have been privileged to have in the administration of public affairs during the time that I have had the honour to hold my responsible office, not a very long experience it is true, I should like to say that it has become wholly apparent to me that in many particulars the government is being held responsible by the country for certain aspects of administration over which it has no control whatever, and that as a consequence the ministry is being put in an entirely false position.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would ask my hon. friend to tell us in what regard he finds himself in that position?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer my hon. friend immediately. No need has been stressed so strongly in this House as that of economy. I say, without any fear of contradiction whatever, that had the government in the framing of its estimates been free to act in accordance with its own judgment in the matter of appointments it would have been able, in the case of a number of departments, to have administered the affairs of the country with fewer servants than there are in the public service at the present time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it not the truth that the salaries are fixed by order in council and not by the commission, and that it is also the truth that the government can abolish any position they desire?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question of classification, is one quite apart from the competency and the suitability of the individual who may be filling a particular position—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not my question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—and the government finds itself—I speak now from the knowledge of the difficulties with which the ministers of the different departments have to contend—the government finds itself continually in the position of being obliged to endeavour to carry on the work of the country with clerks who are sent to the government by the Civil Service Commission but who do not possess the qualifications which if the minister himself were free to make the appointment, he would see were possessed by whoever was appointed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it not a fact that under the law as it now stands the ministers can get rid of those men they do not think are competent? They are only sent there for trial.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might point out to my hon. friend, just in connection with what he has said, that after getting rid of a clerk fresh application has to be made by the deputy minister to the Civil Service Commission. As a consequence the correspondence that is necessary to be carried on between the department and the Civil Service Commission is very considerable; in other words, there has been added to the Civil Service of Canada a not unappreciable number of employees, necessitated solely by the increased amount of correspondence that has to be carried on between the different departments and the Civil Service Commission before any appointment can be made, or before any change can be made or any particular work undertaken.

During the recess between the last session and the present, the government has made a sincere effort to effect economies in the public service. It has endeavoured to work with the existing machinery of government in the most effective way, and to make that machinery just as effective as possible. In that regard, two conferences of particular importance were held; one conference was with the Civil Service Commission itself. The other conference was with the deputy ministers of the departments, who are the permanent heads. The members of the Civil Service Commission and the deputy ministers came into conference with the government to discuss the act, and its workings, in the light of experience. At these conferences the view was expressed by both groups that the act in its present form is not as workable as it should be, that it was capable of amendment and improvement. The deputy ministers themselves have, in joint conference, gone very carefully into the whole matter, and they are unanimously of the view that the act as it stands at the present time is in some of its aspects embarrassing public service, that it is increasing the cost of the service, and that if it were amended all the good that is in the act might be obtained and very much of the evil eliminated.

In view of that circumstance, I should like to suggest that it is in the public interest that some consideration be given to the necessity of amendment of the Civil Service Act as it stands. I would not for one moment support any proposal for the repeal of the Civil Service Act, but I do think it is in the public interest that that act should be made to serve the ends of economy and efficiency to the fullest degree, and as it stands I do not believe it begins to serve these ends as it should. What I would suggest is this: Instead of proposing an amendment to the resolution at the present time, as has been suggested by my hon. friend that some one of his colleagues might propose, it would be infinitely preferable that a committee of this House composed of members of all groups represented here should be appointed for the purpose of considering the Civil Service Act, hearing the members of the Civil Service Commission themselves, hearing the views of the deputy ministers, and after having carefully considered the existing measure, make to the government what recommendations may be deemed advisable in the matter of its necessary improvement. I would suggest that course should be adopted and followed by hon. gentlemen, instead of support being given to any motion to abolish the Civil Service Commission, or to any motion at this stage to amend the act in any particular. If a committee of this House thinks well to suggest an amendment as a result of the opportunities of inquiry it may have, the necessary amendment may be expected to meet with the general approval of the House.

I have a further reason for suggesting that a committee of this House should have an opportunity of going carefully into this whole matter of the Civil Service Commission. I believe the government has been put in a very false light before the country as to its relations with the Civil Service Commission. Looking at the reports that have from time to time appeared in the press one would gather the impression that in some way the administration had tried to influence the commission in the matter of appointments. I should like every hon. member of this House to have an opportunity before a committee of this House of asking the members of the Civil Service Commission just what the relations between the government and the Civil Service Commission have been. If there ever was a government that sought to work loyally with another body, this government has sought to do that with the Civil Service Commission. I think the commission will be the first to make apparent to hon. members of the House wherein much that has appeared with respect to an alleged endeavour by the government to get back to what is called party patronage is entirely erroneous and misleading.

May I assert, speaking of patronage, that patronage cannot be abolished by statute. It is impossible to make appointments to the public service unless they are made by some body. The Civil Service Commission as constituted to-day is a body of three or four men. Hundreds of appointments—yes, thousands of appointments—have to be made to the public service. Those who favour appointment by commission must remember that these gentlemen have the determining as to who is to fill particular positions. They have patronage, as long as they have to make appointments. But while they have the patronage they are responsible to no one. The government is without patronage, as matters stand at the present time, but is held responsible for appointments with which it has nothing whatever to do. That is not in the interests of the public service. I believe that the act as it stands is working out in ways that were wholly unforeseen. I will support any measure that will help to free the Civil Service from anything in the nature of favouritism on the part of those who are at the head of departments, and in favour of anything that will give increased security to those who are in the service, to see that justice and fair play are carried out in the matter of appointments, promotions and the like, and I would favour strongly the maintenance of a body which would see that such appointments as are made are made on the basis of efficiency and on the basis of merit, but it does not follow that because some particular body with no ministerial responsibility sees fit to make an appointment in one way rather than another, that such is going to be the method that will produce efficiency or economy in the long run.

As an illustration, I draw the attention of the House to the facts concerning an order in council of which a good deal of mention has been made, under which a large number of positions were withdrawn from the operation of the Civil Service Act. I venture to say there are many hon. members who think that in some way the withdrawal of hundreds, possibly thousands, of positions from under the operation of the Civil Service Act was the result of some action on the part of the government. I have in my hand the order in council to which reference was made. It is not an order originating with the government, it is an order based on a recommendation of the Civil Service Commission itself, with which recommendation the government had nothing whatever to do. It came to the government from the Civil Service Commission and this is the language in which it is worded:

Section 38B of the Civil Service Act, 1918, as amended, prescribes:

In any case where the commission decides that it is not practicable nor in the public interest to apply this act to any position or positions, the commission may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, exclude such position or positions in whole or in part from the operation of the act, and make such regulations as are deemed advisable prescribing how such position or positions are to be dealt with.

The Civil Service Commissioners are of opinion that the following classes of positions should be exempt from the operation of the Civil Service Act under the above section, namely:

1. All positions where the salary does not exceed $200 per annum. (The Order in Council P.C. 1694 of the 19th August, 1919, is hereby cancelled.)

2. All positions for which the compensation provided is fees of office and positions of an honorary character to which no compensation is attached.

3. Positions of orderly in the office of the Governor-General's Secretary.

4. Positions of Indian interpreter, Department of Indian Affairs.

5. Positions of physician performing the duties of port physicians, under the Department of Health at the following points: Province of Nova Scotia, province of New Brunswick, province of Prince Edward Island, province of Quebec, province of British Columbia.

A large number of centres are enumerated.

6. Positions in the following classes of skilled and unskilled labour and domestic service.

Then follow two or three pages of different positions, all of which are enumerated and which run up into hundreds. What is said in regard to these positions? This is said not by the government, but by the Civil Service Commission, as a result of its experience of the act as in operation:

The Civil Service Commission is of opinion that it is not practicable to prescribe a system of competitive examinations or tests as required by the Civil Service Act.

In other words, the act as passed, placed upon the Civil Service Commission the duty of making all those appointments. The commission struggled with it; they sought to fix examinations and competitive tests for those classes, and after having struggled with it for months, they come of their own accord and ask the government to exempt those positions inasmuch as they find it is not practicable to prescribe a system of competitive examinations for such appointments. If the Civil Service Commission itself makes an appeal to the government to free from the operation of that act thousands of appointments in the public service of Canada, there is, I submit, strong justification for what my hon. friend has just suggested, that the act requires some revision, and I think it is very much in the interest of the country as well as of the Civil Service Commission and the government that a committee of this parliament have an opportunity of discussing with the commission and with the deputy ministers, as the government has done, the various phases of the act, in order to see whether in some particulars amendments cannot be made which will help to make the act more efficient, more economical in administration, and of greater service.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was making mention of a few reasons which seemed to me to justify the consideration by a joint committee of this House of the present Civil Service Act, with a view of seeing if it were not possible to have the act amended in a manner which would make it a more efficient and economical instrument of government. I was making particular reference at the time to a recommendation from the Civil Service Commission, in virtue of which a number of classes of employees were removed from the operation of the Civil Service Act, and I pointed out that a good deal of misconception had arisen in the public mind as to the attitude of the government towards the Civil Service Commission, largely as a result of references to that particular recommendation.

I hope I made it very clear that I would strongly oppose any move to abolish the Civil Service Commission. I think some commission or other body should have the power to see that the members of the Civil Service are duly qualified for their positions before being appointed to them, and that those who are already in the service should receive promotion and salaries in accordance with merit. This is wholly in the public interest, and I would do anything in my power to prevent any amendment to the act which would destroy those all-important considerations. On the other hand, I believe that the Civil Service Act as it was placed on the statutes in 1918 went lengths which have rendered it in many particulars far from workable and have caused it to operate in a manner quite the opposite to that which the framers of the measure either intended or expected.

In reply to the question put to me by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) as to wherein the Civil Service Act has increased the expenditures of government, I cannot give a better example than by again referring to the particular order in council passed on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, which I have already mentioned, removing from the operation of the act large numbers of classes of employees to be appointed to the civil service. The last recommendation from the commission came to the Cabinet on the 14th December last. In other words, with the exception of the last few weeks, during the whole of the past year, the Civil Service Commission had been making appointments of different classes in accordance with the methods which it adopts but which it has found to be impracticable. These methods imply competitive examinations, advertising the positions, correspondence between the departments and the commission as to the necessity of particular positions, followed by further correspondence between the commission and the departments advising them of the persons whom it is about to recommend for appointment.

Hon. members will see that all this means a large amount of work for the staff of the commission. I need not re-enumerate the many classes of which these particular recommendations make mention, but I should like the House to bear in mind what I have just said, as respects all of them: that if the commission had been doing its duty in accordance with the terms of the act it would have been advertising the positions, setting examinations for those who were seeking to be appointed to them, and conducting all the correspondence necessary in connection with such examinations. Up to the end of the year, after having pursued their own methods for that length of time, the commission comes to the government—it was not a case of the government going to the commission—and says: In our opinion these many classes of employees should never have come under the Civil Service Act, and we ask the government to withdraw them from its operation altogether.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if those classes of employees had never been put under the act, and if the commission had not had to advertise those positions, examine the various applicants and correspond with the departments in reference to them, we would have saved many thousands of dollars which have been simply wasted as a result of the measure being in the form in which it was originally drafted. If that is true—and it is beyond gainsaying—in regard to these classes, why may it not be equally true in regard to certain other classes which are still under the act?

As a matter of fact, more than one recommendation was made by the Civil Service Commission to the government to withdraw certain classes from the operation of the act. I have here a further order which came before council, in which the Civil Service Commission recommends:

> That the Order in Council above mentioned (P.C. 1053) be amended by adding to this list, the classes of fireman, fireman's helper and fireman labourer, the commission being of opinion that it is not practicable to prescribe a system of examinations or tests as required by the Civil Service Act, 1918, for making appointments to positions of this nature.

If the experience of the commission itself during the past year has shown that the act as drafted goes too far, I think it is reasonable to assert that in other particulars as well the act may go further than was intended, and that it would be very much in the public interest, as well as in the interests of the commission itself, that its workings should be made the subject of examination by a committee of this parliament.

I have another reason, Mr. Speaker, for suggesting that parliament should have an opportunity of inquiring fully into the methods by which the commission is carrying on its work and the relations between government departments and the commission as well as between the government and the commission. There are grounds for believing that there has been commenced in this country an insidious campaign the purpose of which is not to improve the working of the Civil Service Commission but rather to undermine the confidence of the Civil Service and of the public in the government in its relation to the Civil Service Commission. I think that the sooner the gentlemen who are associated with this movement have an opportunity to state before a committee of this parliament the grounds on which they base a view of that kind, the better it will be for all concerned. That hon. members may have reason to feel that what I am saying is not without justification, I would remind them of an article which appeared in a Toronto paper, and which has been largely quoted throughout this country, with reference to an address that the chairman of the Civil Service Commission was supposed to have delivered before the Rotary Club in Toronto in December last. A Toronto paper, reporting this alleged address, came out with the heading:

> "Strong Element Favours Patronage. Doctor W. J. Roche Expresses Fear regarding Future of Civil Service."

The article says:

Dr. W. J. Roche, chairman of the Civil Service Commission of Canada, speaking before the Rotary Club at yesterday's luncheon, expressed fears for the future of the Civil Service system in Canada and stressed strongly the necessity for the formation in Canada of a league in support of the merit system for federal, provincial and municipal governments.

A little later in the report the following appears in quotations as coming from Doctor Roche, chairman of the commission:

"The fate of this law". . .

That is, the Civil Service law.

. . . "however, is beset with dangers due to the insidious, unseen and silent manipulations of the adherents of patronage in political life," he said. "Slowly, but surely, the politicians will gain back to their own control more and more of the service by the process of exemptions. On June 29 last an order in council was passed exempting from the operation of the merit law a great many positions, which affects in all 10,000 persons out of a total of 50,000 employees, thus placing back into patronage one-fifth of the whole public service.

The effort at present is aimed at the return to patronage of the system of promotions which at present has been so splendidly developed by the Civil Service Commission. Technical positions are also under immediate attack, and there can be no doubt that the whole merit law is in danger unless the strong arm of public opinion is organized to oppose its attack.

Now, there is a very serious charge, and if time would permit and, it were desirable to do so, I could show to hon. members of this House not dozens but hundreds of editorials and articles based upon that particular report which have appeared in the press throughout the country. I have here editorials from and communications addressed to the Ottawa newspapers headed, "Return to the Spoils System," and the like, all of which enlarge upon the seriousness of the situation which has developed in consequence of what is supposed to have been the statement of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission.

Let me now read to the House a letter which I received from Hon. Dr. Roche, the chairman of the commission which was sent without any previous communication on my part to him, without mention on my part directly or indirectly to anyone of the particular address which he was supposed to have delivered and from which I have read alleged direct quotations. The letter is as follows:

Civil Service Commission of Canada

Ottawa, December 22, 1922.

Office of W. J. Roche, chairman,

Dear Mr. King,—

Some days ago I received an invitation from the Rotary Club of Toronto to give an address before that club on the question of the Civil Service of Canada, which invitation I accepted and delivered the address last Friday.

It appears that Principal Grant, of Upper Canada College, who takes a great interest in Civil Service matters, before my visit to Toronto supplied certain material to the press of Toronto, the contents of which I was absolutely unacquainted with, with the request that the respective journals would give publicity to the same either by way of editorials or otherwise, and suggesting that an appropriate time would be when my address was being reported in their columns. Apparently neither the Globe nor the Star had a reporter at the function, but taking it for granted that I would deal with the matters contained in the memorandum supplied by Principal Grant they framed up a speech that I was supposed to have delivered on that occasion. In this instance, however, they made a very bad guess for I did not touch upon a single subject that both the Globe and Star credited me with, with the exception that in the last few minutes of my address I stated that if we had in Canada a Civil Service Reform League similar to the league in the United States it would be of great advantage in the public life of Canada. I made no mention of exemptions, orders in council, promotions, technical positions, the amount of money expended in public utilities, etc.; in fact I was most careful in my remarks not to reflect upon any party or any government past or present, dealing merely with general principles and the necessity of educating the people to take a greater interest in matters pertaining to the Civil Service of our country.

I am enclosing you copy of Principal Grant's letter which I received this morning which will bear out my statements, and in view of the Ottawa despatch sent out by the Globe reporter, which appeared in yesterday's Globe, in which it is reported that a member of the government "speaking for many of his colleagues" has expressed his indignation at the remarks I was supposed to have made, I think it only right in justice to myself that my explanations of the press bungle that occurred in this connection should be made known to yourself and colleagues, who I trust will credit me with a sufficient sense of propriety not to indulge in criticism of the character attributed to me in the Globe article.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) W. J. ROCHE.

I direct the attention of the House to this particular sentence in the letter of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission to me:

It appears that Principal Grant, of Upper Canada College, who takes a great interest in civil service matters, before my visit to Toronto supplied certain material to the press of Toronto, the contents of which I was absolutely unacquainted with, with the request that the respective journals would give publicity to the same either by way of editorials or otherwise.

Such is the work of this new organization that has been formed, known as the Civil Service Reform League of Canada. The gentlemen connected with the league have assumedly very much at heart the interests of the Civil Service and the work of the Civil Service Commission. Doctor Grant is apparently a leader in the movement. I think hon. members will agree in view of what the chairman of the commission has said, that there is ample ground for believing that this so-called reform league is not in the nature of a league the purpose of which is to help and improve conditions in the Civil Service, so much as an organization formed for political reasons, the hope being to undermine public confidence in the government by creating distrust with respect to its relation with the Civil Service Commission.

Lest the statement of the chairman of the commission itself is not sufficient, may I read the letter which Dr. Grant wrote to Mr. Roche, and I need hardly say that the chairman of the Civil Service Commission has given me his authority to quote these communications in any way which I deem to be in the public interest. Dr. Grant's letter reads as follows:

Upper Canada College,
Toronto, December 21st, 1922.

The Hon. W. J. ROCHE,
Civil Service Commission of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Dr. Roche,—

I see in this morning's Globe (21-12-22) that a "prominent member of the government" takes you to task for your recent speech before the Rotary Club of Toronto. Should this criticism be really worth notice, what would you wish me to do, as the man responsible for the invitation to you to speak?

The items complained of were not in your speech at all, but in a memorandum circulated by me on my own responsibility, and sent to the press on the day before your address, in the hope of stirring up interest in it, and in the possible formation of a National Civil Service Reform League, which I have much at heart. The Globe reporter, who had your speech as an "assignment", evidently acted in a way familiar to all journalists, and wrote his report from my memorandum; the report consequently bears no relation to your speech as actually delivered.

Your speech contained no reference whatever to the "10,000 civil servants exempted from the operation of the act". It was a model of good taste and reticence. No human being could have told from it that you had ever belonged to a political party or whether your relations with the present government as chairman of the Civil Service Commission were better or worse than they had been with previous governments. Personally, I had a natural longing for a little more "spice".

If you wish to show this letter to the Prime Minister, or to anyone else, you are at fullest liberty to do so; or if you wish me to write along these lines to the press you have only to let me know.

I am,
Yours sincerely,
(Sgd) W. L. GRANT.

May I say to Principal Grant's credit that he did write to the press along those lines, but for one man that read his communication in the press there are thousands in this country who have never seen it. As for the statement that was attributed to Dr. Roche which would lead the public to believe that some ten thousand civil servants were taken out from under the operation of the act because of a desire on the part of this government to return to patronage, there is possibly not one man of a hundred who has read that who will ever learn the truth of the situation.

I should like again to draw the attention of the House to the grounds on which this particular movement is supposed to rest. Dr. Grant says that he did what he did in the hope of stirring up interest in the possible formation of a National Civil Service Reform League which he has very much at heart; of adding "spice." All of what have been shown to be false representations were, he says, of his own creation. This civil service reform movement is supposed to be a reform movement, a moral reform. This is a strange kind of morality, to stir up antagonisms by false representations concerning the government, then claim that such a movement is helping along the cause of morality in this country. I say, Mr. Speaker, that when a principal of a college of young men will lend himself to that kind of false representation with respect to any branch of the public service in this country, the time has come when a committee of this House of Commons should give to gentlemen of this character an opportunity to appear and make good their assertions. I would ask my hon. friend who has brought the resolution before the House, in order to give hon. members a chance to debate this subject, to accept the suggestion I have made and let us have a committee of this parliament, with representatives on it from hon. gentlemen opposite of both camps, and representatives from this side of the House as well, with power to bring before that committee any person and every person, so that amongst other things we may get at the truth as to the relations between this government and the Civil Service Commission and the need for civil service reform.

Let me say just this word in conclusion. For eight years I was myself a member of the Civil Service of Ottawa, and I had the privilege of learning something of the needs and of knowing something of the aspirations of the members of the Civil Service. As long as I have the privilege of being in parliament I shall at all times endeavour to do what I can to cause the Civil Service of this country to feel a sense of security and justice and right in the discharge of their duties, which as a most important part of the administration of this country they are entitled to have. As I stated a moment ago, I shall not at any time lend myself to any movement that in any way may threaten the standing of the Civil Service nor any movement which may tend to put into positions men who are not qualified for the positions to which they are appointed, nor any movement which will lend itself to favouritism on the part of those who are in a position of authority, nor any movement which will deprive those already in the service of promotion on the ground of merit and right. But I do say, Mr. Speaker, if we are to have merit recognized and the measure of justice which we should have for the service, if we are to have that economy and efficiency in the public service which we should have, we shall have to get back to where the government has a larger measure of responsibility for how the public service is carried on, where it will have some substantial authority and will not be manacled and shackled by regulations and rules of a body that is responsible to no one but itself, and that in many cases makes appointments not by itself, but, as can be shown if the commission is brought before a committee of this House, by its own appointees who conduct examinations and make recommendations. I think this subject is deserving of the fullest inquiry this House can give it, and I must thank the hon. member, though I shall strongly oppose his resolution in the form in which it stands, for introducing the subject for discussion in the House. I hope every member of the House will express his views very plainly in order that the country may know the truth of the situation.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The House has been plunged with remarkable suddenness into what appears to be nothing more or less than a crisis in connection with the entire public service of this country. The motion, of course, of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), if it had been suspected to be really a motion inspired by the government, would of itself have put the House in a state of warning and premonition.

Mr. POWER: I stated at the beginning of my remarks that the members of the government had not been consulted with reference to this motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I remember that. What I said was, if there had been any reason to believe that this was a motion that had in any degree whatever the inspiration, or if my hon. friend prefers it, the sympathy of the government, we would have had some premonition of what was to come. Apparently, judging not so much from the motion as proposed but from the speech of the Prime Minister, the government has made up its mind to destroy the merit system. The government has made up its mind to get rid for all effective purposes of the body of men, and the organization under that body of men, which is now entitled to the making of appointments and promotions, and to return that power to itself. If the meaning of the Prime Minister's words is different from that, then I am sorry I could extract nothing but that conclusion from his speech.

Mr. BUREAU: You only extract what you want.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He stated that a body not directly responsible to this House has the matter of promotions and appointments in its hands. He objected to that. He said such a power must be in the hands of the government which is responsible to parliament and responsible to this country for the administration of affairs. Can any hon. gentleman tell me what the difference is between that and the old patronage system under which this country laboured for forty years? That is the purport of his address. It does not matter what the resolution is: The resolution is only the road they purpose to follow, it is only the pathway the government has in its eye in order to reach the goal of patronage and satisfy the hunger of its followers. The resolution proposes to repeal the act. The Prime Minister says "I would oppose it". If I had in mind, if I had averred to this House, the opinions the Prime Minister has averred, I would support the resolution of the hon. member for Quebec South. That is precisely the way to take from an independent commission control of the appointments to the service of Canada and of promotions, and bring them under the control of the government. That is precisely the way embodied without any amendment in the resolution of the hon. member.

Now the government proposes if I understood rightly—and I hope I will be corrected if I am wrong, because I did not get the very first part of the Prime Minister's address—the government proposes an amendment to this resolution which will provide for a committee of this House to consider amendments to the Civil Service Act. That I understand to be the official position, that I understand to be the method of treating the resolution, and it proposes to force that policy before this House. But I ask hon. members to remember, the accompaniments with which that amendment was pressed. I ask them to keep in mind the declarations of the Prime Minister. It is with a view to securing the results that he has in mind, as stated in his speech, that this amendment is now proposed.

The Prime Minister in the latter part of his address sought to convey the impression that what he was after was to delve into certain charges which, he said, had been levelled against the administration, a certain movement that he described as surging over this country to undermine confidence in the administration and its relation to the civil service, and particularly to bring to book a gentleman whom I fear he considers "an undesirable citizen,"—the Principal of Upper Canada College—to bring him to book and make him pay dire punishment for some alleged offence. Well, that is a wholly different thing. If there are charges made inside this House or outside this House which the Prime Minister wants to inquire into nobody here is going to stand in his way. Let him have an inquiry made into Dr. Grant's charges, into the Globe charges, into the Star charges, into the charges of all these other offenders who he says are trying to undermine confidence in the administration in connection with the Civil Service Act. That is one thing. But to start on the pathway to the return of patronage is something wholly different. To appoint a committee whose commission from the government will be to so amend the act as to bring about the results which the Prime Minister describes is another thing altogether.

Now let me make a confession of ignorance while I am on my feet. If there is a movement on foot to organize dissatisfaction and accumulated grievances arising out of the civil service law and its operation—to organize those in an attack on the administration and consequently for the benefit of the opponents of the administration I am bound to confess such is a phenomenon that I never knew of at all. I do not think I ever met Dr. Grant—to the best of my knowledge I never have. I never knew Dr. Roche had delivered the address in question; I never knew Dr. Grant had written the article referred to. I never read anything of the kind in the Globe or in the Star. I never knew of any Civil Service Reform League in Canada—never heard such a league suggested. If all these are movements of the opponents of the administration they have managed to display their support of the party which I lead without any knowledge of mine.

Now let us come back to the concrete matter which from the speech of the Prime Minister, is before this House. It is necessary to go some years into the past in order fully to understand just the course that has been traversed, just the mountains that have been scaled in the long pathway of civil service reform. I do not know that I can give it to the House with particularity. I am certain I cannot give it with accuracy—but so far as I give it at all I will endeavour to be accurate. Patronage was unrestrained, until an act was passed, under the Laurier administration, applicable to the Civil Service at Ottawa—applicable to what was known as the inside service, which, I think, in practical residuum meant only a part of the Civil Service in this city. A commission was then appointed which had very limited power even as regards that limited section. I think in essence the law was this—that the government made the appointment, the government looked around and chose its man, they got such recommendation as they desired, but before the appointment could be confirmed—that is before the man could be really permanently in his office—he had to have the imprimatur of that commission. Perhaps I have done the law over-justice, perhaps I have done it under-justice—but such is my recollection of its main provision. An agitation became—I will not call it an agitation—a feeling became pretty general throughout this country that there should be an extension of that principle. An extension of it not only to the inside service—an extension of its applicability and operation there, but,—as well, that the outside service should be covered by the reform, and that political patronage as such should disappear from the service of this country.

The road was not an easy one to travel. It was surrounded with difficulties of an almost insuperable character—difficulties that for years proved insuperable at the hands of purely party governments. No matter how desirable a party government might have been of ridding itself of the incubus of patronage, it found itself powerless to extricate itself from the bondage because of the strength of the influences which surrounded it. But on the formation of Union government—and I am not saying this at all to boast of Union government—a juncture of circumstances took place which, under the stimulus of the war feeling, enabled the government to reach its goal. I doubt, whether if there had not been a war such a course would have been possible, but political patronage took on a darker hue before the public of this country, in the light of the war itself, and as a consequence the government of the day, formed in 1917, took the courageous, the final step. In this regard I want to say that one of its chief proponents, one of its most determined advocates, was the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), lately the leader of the Progressive party in this House. Another of its foremost defenders through every crisis—because you cannot get these reforms without crises—one of its foremost defenders was the hon. member for Halifax, the senior member from that city (Mr. Maclean). He is absent from this House to-night. I wonder what would have been his feelings had he listened to the astonishing speech from the Prime Minister this afternoon. Not only did these men stand valiantly in battle for us but others of hon. gentlemen opposite did as well and I think I may include—although I speak subject to correction, the Finance Minister of this government. Ah, yes, and more—hon. gentlemen opposite as a party when in opposition were in favour of that reform. Hon. gentlemen opposite looked with jealousy and suspicion on every move which ventured to infringe by the thousandth of an inch the integrity of our Civil Service Act. It is easy to so act in opposition; such a course is no evidence of character or principle. I do not pretend to any particular exhibition of moral strength because I opposed when in opposition this plan for the renewal of patronage. But standing in power it is a difficult thing. It is different when you have the responsibility of office and have around you all the influences and pressure that office entails. Then it is a difficult thing to stand by this reform; and this government—weak in every fibre, weak in heart, pitifully weak—has surrendered to these forces and has consented to throw overboard all the achievements that these years have brought about.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the right hon. gentleman oblige me by mentioning one sentence of mine which intimated, directly or indirectly, any desire in any way to change the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say the Prime Minister proposed to change the commission, but the sentence the Prime Minister uttered, not once but twice at least, means the results exactly which I have described. It is not nominally whether there is a commission or not, that is not the essence of the problem. The real question is, what is to be the power of that commission? The Prime Minister said that an irresponsible commission must not have power of appointment and promotion; that a commission not responsible to parliament—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg pardon, I made no such statement. I do not wish to be understood for one moment as saying that the commission shall not have the power of making appointments and promotions. There are ways of arrogating to it control in the matter of promotions or appointments, regardless altogether of the needs of the situation, which can be most embarrassing to the country and the government. I think it is proper those should be looked into, but I have never suggested that the commission as a body with power to see that certain qualifications are met in the matter of appointments, and that merit is duly considered in the matter of promotion, should in any way be interefered with.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will have to plead my own density but I do not know where the Prime Minister is. What is the difference between saying they shall not have power to appoint and promote, and saying that the commission has now a control which it should not have and can arrogate to itself authority which it should not arrogate and that such power might well be taken away? Really I do not know what he means. If you leave the appointing authority in the commission, you leave it, over such an area of appointments and promotions as the government and the commission think wise. If you leave it there, you leave it, and if you take it, you take it, and I venture to say if you take it, you take it one place and no other, you take it right into the hands of the ministers and restore the conditions from which, after a struggle, we emerged some years ago. Very well. Such became the law in 1917. The difficulties this government battles with now, are the same as every government has battled with. And less and less are the difficulties as years go by. The British government, which has the merit system, has not anything like the struggles it had years ago. These difficulties we encountered too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say the British government has the civil service system we have here?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not precisely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should think not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the patronage system is gone in England, and the patronage system cannot be gone if the government responsible to parliament is to take to itself appointments and promotions. In 1921, the government of which I was the head introduced a bill into the House of Commons—I have the statute before me—sponsored by an hon. gentleman at that time member for Yarmouth, N.S., then minister without portfolio, Mr. Spinney, and the bill was commonly known as the Spinney bill. Its effect was, as far as I can remember, just about the same as this motion would be if it were amended as proposed. We proposed then to submit the bill to a committee of parliament, and we urged that the authority of the commission should be left intact, so far as the committee felt it right that the commission should operate at all. We believed that, in the opinion of the commission itself, there were certain classes of appointments which would be better not under the purview and control of the commission, which were not of sufficient consequence, attached to which the salaries were not large enough, in respect to which the duties were not important enough to warrant the care that the commission necessarily takes under the law in the matter of appointments, to warrant the machinery that the commission erected to take care of them. As a consequence a committee sat and heard evidence for some time, and on its recommendation an amendment was put through, which I have before me, chapter 22 of the statutes of that year, under which it was provided that the commission may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, exclude such position or positions, in whole or in part, from the operation of the act, as in the opinion of the commission could not practically in the public interest be filled under the Civil Service Act. There was another amendment put through of very little consequence, but this important amendment was recommended by the committee and became law, and thereafter where, after the experience the commission would have, the commission itself felt there was any class of appointment, or single appointment, of a character that could be filled by the government, and not by the commission, without any fundamental return to patronage, where in a word they deemed on account of the rather cumbersome machinery they had to apply, there was not sufficient cause for its application, they may recommend to the Governor in Council exemption and if the Governor in Council approves, that particular position or class of positions becomes exempt.

To show that the government of the day did not contemplate any invasion of the Civil Service Act, let me say we were in power for eight or nine months after that law was passed, and I am not sure that any recommendations were ever made to the government, or any order in council passed exempting positions from the operation of that law. I am not saying there were none made. It is possible there were, but if so they were very few; they were indeed negligible. But after hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, in the month of June of this year a recommendation came from the Civil Service Commission, quite within its power—and for the moment I do not criticize it; it is not necessary to criticize it here—a very sweeping recommendation which, though in the main it did apply to minor offices, did cover a tremendous area of appointments a very wide field. I do not say it covered ten thousand. The Prime Minister does not say how many it covered. I doubt if there is a member of the government who can say, but if it covered ten thousand I do not know what was wrong with the statement of the principal of Upper Canada College. He estimated the numbers at that figure. Evidently such is his opinion; I do not know. At all events the recommendation was sweeping The recommendation, I need scarcely tell the House, was eagerly accepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my hon. friend's pardon, it was not eagerly accepted. My purpose in rising was to answer my hon. friend in the matter of Principal Grant's statement. There was no exception taken on the part of the government to the figures that Principal Grant gave. The exception I took to his statement was that Principal Grant said that these exemptions were brought from under the act at the instance of the government, whereas it was at the instance of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know the recommendation was from them, and I have no reason to say—I have never suggested to anyone myself—that it was at the instance of the government, and I have no objection to the government appointing a commission to find out at whose instance it was. I add that I will attend such a commission with considerable interest and curiosity as well. A large area was made exempt, a very large number of classes of positions. From that day forward the government became entitled to make those appointments. The Prime Minister says the government was not eager to accept this duty at all. Well, if not, the government has suddenly changed its opinion since June, 1922, if the Prime Minister's words to-night represent the concerted opinion of his administration. How could anyone listen to his speech this afternoon and come to any other conclusion than that the government very eagerly accepted the recommendation of the commission for the exemption of large classes from that act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The recommendation was made in June and it was accepted in December. I do not call that eager.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Accepted in December?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. gentleman sure of that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the order in council here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I sent for the order in council last midsummer, and I do not remember exactly what the date was. I thought it was June. However, I suggest it was accepted pretty early. I have before me now the order in council itself. The hon. gentleman says December. The order in council is marked "June."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Which one is that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The one the hon. gentleman sent over.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one in December.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is "29 June." I will read it. I recollect now the Prime Minister said it was June the other day in answer to the question of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Duncan). I will read the order and the House can decide.

The committee of the Privy Council—

This is dated June 29, 1922.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The one of December was lying on my table. I have sent it to Hansard. That was the last order that came over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The December order is an addition and exempts only a very few. This one is the big sweeping order in council and it was passed in June. The government was far more eager than the Prime Minister knew:

The committee of the Privy Council have had under consideration the following report from the Civil Service Commission, dated 14th June, 1922—

I do not know when they received it. Perhaps, it would not be cruel to suggest that it was the evening of the 28th of June.

—submitted by the Secretary of State;

Section 38B of the Civil Service Act, 1908, as amended, prescribes:

And then it quotes what I read to the House from the Statute a moment ago. It goes on to say:

The Civil Service Commissioners are of the opinion that the following classes of positions should be exempt from the operation of the Civil Service Act, under the above section, namely:

1. All positions where the salary does not exceed $200 per annum.

2. All positions for which the compensation provided is fees of office and positions of an honorary character to which no compensation is attached.

This is the one which the Prime Minister himself read:

3. Positions of Orderly in office of the Governor General's Secretary.

4. Positions of Indian interpreter, Department of Indian Affairs.

5. Positions of physician performing the duties of port physicians under the Department of Health at the following points:

And then a list of classes is given, covering the whole of a page:

Positions in the following classes of skilled and unskilled labour and domestic service.

[Mr. Meighen.]

I will not weary the House with reading them all; but the House will see, as I raise the paper, that the classes of positions cover the first entire page. Then following is another page with classes of positions exempted from the Civil Service Act, and then there is about one-third of a page more. So I was emphatically correct when I said that the vast number of exemptions were made in June of last year, and if not made eagerly, were made at least with remarkable promptness upon receipt of the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission.

I call attention in this connection as well to the fact that the recommendation upon which the government acted lacks the signature of the chairman of the commission, and hon. members of both sides of this House, who have known the chairman of that commission for many years, who have had to do with him, men of all parties and of all persuasions, know that the chairman of the Civil Service Commission is a man of high status and authority in this country, a man who has performed his duty with absolute fidelity and undoubted capacity. Hon. gentlemen in this connection may recall that when the government of 1921, of which I was the head, suggested a committee, the object being to secure authority in the commission, where it thought wise, to rid itself of appointments, even then apprehension was felt, and either the chairman of that commission gave a statement to the press or his opinion was announced in the press in opposition to the course which the government contemplated pursuing. Thus it was indicated that Dr. Roche at that time, just as to-day, guards jealously the integrity of the act, and in guarding jealously that integrity, he is no respecter of political parties.

9 p.m.

Under the law of 1921, all those positions have been exempted, as recommended, and the Prime Minister's argument is this: "Why, if it was wrong to put those in, it may have been wrong to put others in." Well if it was wrong to put others in, there is a way to get them out. If the government is to be allowed to take out all it wishes, then there is no more Civil Service Act. If the commission believes it to be in the public interest to do this, it can recommend so under that act. No, this, however, is not the purpose of the government. The purpose of the government is to restore to those who are pressing them at this hour the control which that law took from them in the interest of the Civil Service and of this country. Consequently, because I believe the amendments of 1921 are ample, under which to correct any working out of the law that may be thought desirable, ample for all purposes; moreover, because of the speech delivered by the Prime Minister in which this resolution is launched before this House, and because of the clear purpose the government has in view in having this committee appointed, I oppose altogether its appointment.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), in introducing this resolution, undertook to give the members in this part of the House just a little lecture about the position that they took in the political life of this country. I do not know whether we are politicians or statesmen. I do not think we make any pretences along those lines; I think, perhaps, we are anxious to do the best we can in the interest of the public life of this country, irrespective of what name we may be tagged by.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speeches that have been delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). I am sorry to have to confess that I am not as familiar with this subject, with the whole history of the Civil Service Commission as hon. members who have been speaking this evening. I know something, however, about the old system, what we used to call the "spoils" system, and I hope no one in this House will ever, for a moment, think of returning to that bad old system. I noticed that the leader of the Opposition stated, what I already knew, that the Civil Service Commission came into existence through the efforts of the Union government. It may be rather a sad commentary upon the state of public life in Canada that we know it would have been almost an impossibility for any political party to carry through that measure, unless it had been some sort of coalition like the one we had during the time of Union government.

I am not going to take up very much time to-night in discussing the "spoils" system or the system of patronage, because I think we are all ready to condemn that system. What was it? It was simply a lever that politicians who were in office could use to keep themselves in power. I can remember a time some years ago when public servants spent a good deal of their time working for the party in power, simply in order that they might retain their positions, and we all know that when a change of government occurred, there was generally a clean sweep made of those same public servants. The Prime Minister, in speaking to-night, stated that public servants should be judged by their efficiency. I cannot understand how it would be possible to have efficient public servants, were they to know that their remaining in the public service was dependent upon the fact of the party which put them there remaining in power. If you are going to have a really good Civil Service, public servants must feel that they have some security of position. I have here a short extract taken from an editorial, in regard to the old country Civil Service. It reads:

> "We serve the State", is the motto of the British Society of civil servants, and it might well be adopted, with all it means and implies, by those engaged in the Civil Service of this country. But to serve the State best, those so employed must be contented and efficient.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that we can never have an efficient public service until our civil servants enjoy security of tenure in their positions. We know something about the degrading effects upon public life that the old patronage system had, and I can assure you, Sir, that, speaking for myself and those in this section of the House, we view with a good deal of alarm any attempt to infringe upon the powers conferred upon the Civil Service Commission by the present act.

I understand that a short time ago a committee of the House did examine into the operation of the act, took evidence and made recommendations. I do not know what has happened since then to cause some hon. members to be of opinion that a further exhaustive examination into the workings of the act should be made at this particular time. The Prime Minister has pointed out some defects in the present act. The government has been in office for some time, and if they have discovered certain weaknesses and defects in the Civil Service Act, it is quite within their province to come before this House and tell us what is wrong with this legislation. We will then examine what they put forward and give our opinion whether we think they are right or not.

I was surprised to hear the Prime Minister state that we ought to have a committee of this House to deal with the Civil Service Act because a certain newspaper in Toronto commented upon a speech which the chairman of the Civil Service Commission had delivered. I do not think for a moment that this House is going to authorize the formation of a committee to investigate the Civil Service Commission or any other department of the public service just because some journal makes certain statements that are not just exactly correct. Indeed, I do not consider it at all necessary that a committee should be apppointed on such grounds.

After all, the main question is: Have we got an efficient Civil Service? If not, what fault have we to find with it? The Prime Minister has stated that the government must not be manacled and shackled. Well, what does it mean? Does it mean throwing the whole service open again, with the government empowered to make and unmake civil servants just as they please? I do not see any other alternative. We must either have a civil service commission with sufficient power to function properly, or we might as well not have any civil service at all.

It is apparent from the evidence we have had to-night that there already exists a way of making some reforms in the methods of the Civil Service Commission. We have seen the long list of positions which have been withdrawn from the operation of the act upon the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission itself. If in the opinion of the commission that list is too small, it seems to me that there is a way to enlarge it.

When the Prime Minister first spoke I thought there might be something in the suggestion to appoint a committee for the purpose of examining into all the conditions surrounding the civil service. But I did not know at that time that there had been a committee examining into the same matters in 1921. It seems to me that the proper course for the government to take now is to recommend to this House what changes they think should be made in the act, and we will then give those recommendations due consideration, examine into their merits or demerits, and give our decision.

But I do not believe that at the present time it is in the public interest to appoint a committee to inquire fully into the operation of the Civil Service Act. I cannot help being suspicious when I realize the character of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). It was only upon the suggestion of the Prime Minister that it was amended. This shows that there may have been some thought of blotting out the Civil Service Commission altogether. Therefore I am just a little afraid that this may be the thin end of the wedge, the taking the latch off the door to reintroduce the old spoils system, although I do not believe for one moment that the Prime Minister really intends such a radical change. However, I am afraid it would lead in that direction, and I am therefore opposed to the appointment of a committee as proposed.

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend allow me to correct a misapprehension he is labouring under? I did not like to interrupt him while he was speaking. He mentioned that he understood there had been no Civil Service Commission until the Union government was formed. As a matter of fact a Civil Service Commission was appointed in 1906 by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That commission was confined entirely to the service in Ottawa. The Union government extended its operations to the outside service.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Speaker, I understood that perfectly well. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) made it very plain that the first Civil Service Commission was appointed by the Laurier government. But its powers were very limited, and it never had any wide powers until the Union government was in office. I think I am correct in that.

Mr. BUREAU: It never had the arbitrary powers.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I think it is a rule of this House, Mr. Speaker, that when it pleases you to name as the seconder of a resolution one of the hon. members that may be sitting next to the mover of the resolution, it is not to be taken as an expression of his concurrence of opinion therein. I say that at the outset because I want to dissociate and free myself from some of the opinions that the hon. mover of the resolution has given expression to. The resolution as it now stands is that the Civil Service Commission be abolished. To that I cannot subscribe. I would willingly subscribe, however, to the motion as amended, namely, for a return to the act of 1908 as far as present circumstances may warrant.

Having made that clear, there is another point I want to establish, and it is this. There is no thought in my mind at present, and there will be no thought in my mind during the course of my remarks, that can be construed in any other way than as simply, sincerely and honestly wishing for the promotion of and the maintenance of efficiency in the Civil Service. I say that because it has pleased a number of hon. members sitting opposite to lightly use the term "distorted mind," and I, Sir, will not allow that anyone with a distorted mind should read into my own thoughts ideas that I do not entertain. Therefore, I wish to say clearly that I stand on this particular occasion as I have always stood in the past on the question of civil service reform, namely, that any reform should be on the basis of merit and efficiency alone.

Now, let us for a moment review this legislation and see how the Civil Service Commission was established. The present act is the outcome of legislation that was passed in 1882 and came into force on the 1st of July, 1883. The body then appointed was called the Board of Civil Service Examiners, and, if I recollect correctly, the operative section of that act was Section 3, which appointed a board of three examiners whose duties were to establish tests for the admission of candidates into the Civil Service. Under that old system, as hon. gentlemen will remember, a large number of appointments were made, and I must say to the credit of those now in the Civil Service who were appointees under that regime that to a large extent they constitute the backbone of the Civil Service to-day. That legislation was carried down until 1908. Now, it has pleased the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), to say that we wish to destroy the merit system. That thought is far from my mind. It has also pleased him to say that the government made the appointments under the act of 1908. May I point out that the working section of the act of that year, section 10, said:

> The duties of the commission shall be—
> (a) To test and pass upon the qualifications of candidates for admission into the service and for promotion in the service.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition has stated that these appointments were made by the government and that the Civil Service Commission ratified them. Well, section 13 says:

> Appointment to positions in the inside service. . . . shall be by competitive examination, which shall be of such a nature as will determine the qualifications of candidates for the particular positions to which they are to be appointed, and shall be held by the commission from time to time in accordance with the regulations made by it and approved by the Governor in Council.

So that under that system appointments were not made purely and simply upon the recommendation of the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman not admit that under those two sections the basis for the commission's ratification was provided, but that was all? The appointment was with the government, so far as those two sections were concerned at least.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I am reading the law; unless the commissioners of that day disobeyed the law, then I fail to see how these appointments could be made otherwise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. gentleman understands me, but if he does not I would like to make myself clear to him. So far as those two sections go—and I do not dispute that he has read them aright—the appointment was still left with the government. The commission had no power of appointment under those sections. In the exercise of whatever duty it had—giving a certificate to the candidate—it based the certificate upon the examinations referred to in those sections. I hope that is clear.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I fully appreciate the right hon. leader of the Opposition's point; but section 18 will answer that. Before I proceed with that, however, let me call attention to this provision:

> Immediately after the examination the commission shall make out a list of the successful competitors thereat for each position, in the order of merit, up to the number computed in accordance with scetion 15.

Now, here is section 18:

> From the said list the commission, on the application of the deputy head, with the approval of the head, of any department, shall supply the required clerks, whether for permanent or temporary duty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does that not leave it to the head or the deputy head?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It says that the commission, on the application of the deputy head, shall furnish the required number of clerks. That is, on application being received from the deputy head for a clerk, the commission shall send a clerk to fill that position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But would the head or the deputy head not designate whom the commission should send from that list? I just want to know.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not under that act.

Mr. SHAW: May I ask the hon. member what is his interpretation of the words in section 18, "with the approval of the head of any department"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That means that under the old system, when a stenographer or a bookkeeper or an accountant was required, the deputy minister would ask the Civil Service Commission to send a stenographer or a bookkeeper or an accountant. The Civil Service Commission would then select from the list of eligibles a person to fill the position and would send him on, and on the approval of the deputy minister or the minister—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is all very well for hon. members to laugh, but that is the law. If they fail to see it, it is not my concern.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the law to-day? You can put a man out if he does not suit.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is how it stands.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the law to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have to take that responsibility.

Mr. BUREAU: We always did take the responsiblity.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not under the old law.

Mr. BUREAU: We did before you tried to shift it. We are willing to take it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The act of 1908 applied only to the inside service; the outside service was not then under the jurisdiction of the commission. In 1918 the government of the day proposed certain changes in the Civil Service Act for the purpose of placing the outside service under the Civil Service Commission. That was a commendable idea, because in the outside service there are a number of clerical positions, a number of higher positions, that should quite properly come under the operation of the Civil Service Commission. But here is where we disagree: the act of 1918 does away with the responsibility of the deputy ministers in the matter. Under the old act the deputy minister was really responsible for the administration of his department. As it is now, he has nothing to say in the selection of the clerks that make up his staff; he has no say in the matter of promotions, of statutory increases or sick leave, nothing to say in regard to many things that have to do with the adminstration of his department.

I have no great quarrel with the act of 1918, but that act stipulated—and this is a point that has not yet been touched upon—that the Civil Service Commission should proceed with the organization of the departments and then take up the work of classification. But what was done in that case—and this will appeal to hon. members who sit immediately opposite to me—was to put the cart before the horse; the Civil Service Commission, instead of proceeding with the organization of the departments, proceeded with the classification. That may seem very innocent in itself, but the result is most apparent in the chaotic condition of the civil service to-day, in the turmoil and the trouble and dissatisfaction that exist in the ranks of the Civil Service. This condition, I say, is due to the fact that the commission proceeded with the classification before proceeding with the organization. They should have proceeded with the organization first. That is; they should have said that a given department should consist of a minister, a deputy minister, an assistant deputy minister, if the work required it; a secretary; an assistant secretary, if the work required it—so many divisions and so many clerks to take care of the work. Then you say these divisions carried with them a salary of so much; but they did not. Unfortunately the service has grown up in various departments each practically separate one from the other, with an administration different in each, and requirements in the one that could not fit the other, and so forth through all the departments. You could not apply to the departments any rigid classification, any iron rule. There had to be a certain amount of elasticity in the classification, but the foreign experts were unable to see that, accustomed as they were to classify only large industrial concerns. When the classification came down the government found that it could not apply it under the Civil Service Act as it stood then, because the schedules of salary that had attached to the act of 1918 divided the service into certain well defined categories, few in number, with clear-cut divisions in salary: the act of 1919, section 42, was passed for the purpose of bringing in that classification. Whilst I am on that subject, great faith did the legislators of that day have in that act when they had to embody in section 42 that "the Civil Service shall as far as practicable"—note that—be classified in accordance with this classification. But that was not sufficient. They found out that that classification was a monstrosity, and so they proceeded to say:

> The commission shall hereafter as it may from time to time deem necessary establish additional classes and grades and classify therein new positions created or positions included or not included in any class or grade and may divide, combine, alter or abolish existing classes and grades.

You would have thought that after all the years that had been spent on it and the enormous amount of money that had been squandered—and I use the word squandered because the results show that that was the fact—they would have brought down a real classification, but we found that the classification was not yet a classification. The last report of the Civil Service Commission for the calendar year 1921 shows this: The classification approved by parliament in 1919 contained 1,729 classes. You would think it was a pigeon-hole business or something of that kind. It has since been found necessary to add to these classes that were established. You would have thought after the amount of time and money that had been spent on that classification, that that would be an end to it, but we find according to the Civil Service Commission's report that it was necessary to add 587 new classes, to revise the salary range of 515, to amend the definition of 205, and to abolish 158. The net increase at that time was 429 classes, or a total variation in two years of 1,470 positions.

Let us be serious about this, because this pertains to the Civil Service Commission. The leader of the Opposition has spoken of a large number of exemptions, and I shall refer to that in a moment. I hold in my hand what I called last year "the joke book," the civil service classification. This will appeal to hon. gentlemen sitting directly opposite to me, who in a very commendable spirit are always preaching economy. This first volume, after having been translated into French, was destroyed, burned as it was not satisfactory, after thousands upon thousands of dollars had been squandered upon it. The second edition is now in my hands, and I have also brought in here as an absolute physical demonstration the supplements that have been added to this joke book. There are now four volumes each bigger than the original volume, containing over two thousand additions, modifications, alterations and combinations of that classification.

Does it not seem that it is time for us to stop? As one hon. gentleman sitting directly opposite well said last year, we have created this commission as a machine without a brake. The expenditure goes on perpetually increasing and money is squandered just because of the lack, not of administration, but of a proper legal determination as to what the civil service law should be. I say that those who make the appointments should be responsible to someone. If the commission would undertake to follow out every word of that law of 1919, I have not very much to say, but I say that they cannot, and more than that, they have not in the past stuck to the wording of the statute. If we are going to have a statute and it is not going to be obeyed, then I for one voice my protest as a legally trained man, for I am not going to be an accomplice with regard to a statute that we break every day. I say in all sincerity that the commission is doing the best it can to administer the law, and let me say right now I have the greatest faith and the greatest confidence and the greatest respect for the civil service commissioners. I have received nothing but courteous treatment and considerate attention at their hands every time I have had anything to do with them, and I say that also of the officials of the commission. It is not to them that I am looking. It is not to the law, and I blame those who put that law on the statute book in that way, just as I would blame myself if having an opportunity to change that law I did not change it, and for what? Again I repeat, and I challenge anyone to find in my speech of last year or my speech this year anything but the thought of keeping efficient the Civil Service and promoting its best interests. This act says that all appointments to the Civil Service must be by competitive examination or by demonstration of skill. If the right hon. leader of the Opposition would undertake to make all appointments in that way, I would agree; but the commission have found, quite loyally and sincerely found, and I give them credit for it, that there were certain portions of that act that could not be administered in the way in which the law was put on the statute book, that there were certain appointments that could not be filled by competitive eaxmination or demonstration of skill. Would the right. hon leader of the Opposition appoint a charwoman upon a demonstration of her skill or by competitive examination? Would he appoint a bricklayer upon a demonstration of his skill, or any other of these labouring positions? If he would, then again I have nothing to say. But the commissioners in their wisdom, in their loyalty and sincerity, and I was not responsible for the placing of these gentlemen there, have decided that they could not hold a demonstration of skill for the appointment of people to these positions, and making use of Section 38 of the act, which after all the government of that day was responsbile for introducing, they proceeded to hand back to the departments the positions which could not be administered by the commission itself. True there were exemptions made last year. But let me recall to the memory of the leader of the Opposition that all labourers all assistant labour foremen, all labour foremen, all charwomen—now mark the category—all labourers, all assistant labour foremen were exempted by an order in council passed on September 21, 1921. Then all positions carrying an annual salary of not more than $200 were exempted on August 14, 1919.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why was it done again in 1922?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I beg the leader of the Opposition's pardon. I have here Sessional Paper No. 102 of April 7, 1922, giving the report for the year 1921 of positions excluded, under the provisions of section 38b, from the operation of the Civil Service Act 1918. Now let me answer the leader of the Opposition further: In those positions which were set out, and which he held out to this House were a number of positions that were included in the category released previous to the elections. All the positions contained in these schedules were labouring positions—blacksmith, boiler maker, cabinet maker, carpenter, caulker, cooper, etc., those were all labouring positions and they had been exempted, but the Civil Service Commission proceeded to classify them and then put in the list the names of positions that were formerly included under the word "labourer;" and you have repeated here positions that were excluded on September 21, 1921. You also have in this list, this formidable list, the positions that were excluded by the old administration in August, 1919.

Now the leader of the Opposition has said that if you leave authority to the commission you leave it. But, as I have said before, under the present system you do not leave it. Under the present system the labouring classes have been removed from the operation of the act. I do not propose to criticize or destroy without suggesting anything to take its place, but let me analyze this further situation and then I will proceed to constructive criticism. As it is now when you appoint a postmaster, a local postmaster, one of the sub-agents of the department—he may be an honest man, he may be one of the best officials of the department—proceeds to the constituency and selects, makes inquiries and reports that the man has made satisfactory answer to the requirements of the statute and of the regulations; but he might have asked him, "Who is your leader?" and he might have said. "My leader is the right hon. leader of the Opposition." He might have been asked "what day of the week is this?" and he answered satisfactorily that it happened to be Wednesday. He has made satisfactory answer, therefore the officer reports back to the commission that the man has made satisfactory answer and the commission, acting in a bona fide manner, are bound by the statute, bound by the regulations, and they make the appointment on that report.

Now then if the Civil Service Commission desires to appoint a legally trained man as an assistant counsel, or as a medical officer, what action do they take? You cannot expect the Civil Service Commissioners to be conversant with every trade, or to be learned in every profession, but what do they do? They simply appoint a board to determine the qualifications of the candidates. Now let us consult the report of the commission as to that, because the commissioners, I think, do everything above board and are honest in their desire to serve the public well. I have here the Thirteenth Annual Report of the Civil Service Commission for the year 1921 and on page XVI is to be found the following:

> The Civil Service Commission desires to express its grateful appreciation to the individuals mentioned below who have willingly, and often at personal inconvenience, rendered valuable service by acting on examining boards in a number of the special competitions held under the direction of the commission.

Now what do I find? I have no fault to find with these gentlemen, or with these ladies that happen to be on this list but all appointments to the Civil Service must be made by competitive examination or demonstration of skill. Now then, is this a demonstration of skill or a competitive examination by the commission? Let me read the names of some of those who acted in the capacity referred to:

A. J. Ames, Managing Director, Instruments, Ltd.
Mrs. Andrews, Member of Public School Board, Victoria, B.C.
Chas. S. Bennett, Lawrence Dairy Supply Co.
J. Arthur Bourbeau, Superintendent of Crabtree Co.
C. Franklin Brownell, Artist.
H. H. Claudet, Consulting Mining Engineer.
G. F. Coleman, Canadian Pacific Railway, Montreal, P.Q.

I will not trouble the House by reading the entire list of 47 names of people who may be well learned in their own trades, or callings, or professions, but who are not responsible to this House or anybody else.

Mr. LEWIS: Would you substitute the minister of any particular department for any of the people whose names you have read?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Most decidedly. If a minister or a deputy minister is paid a salary over and above the others there must be some responsibility attaching to the position. I would let the deputy minister select the appointee provided that the latter had passed a proper qualifying examination for that position. But the hon. gentleman would not do this; he would not let Mr. Claudet, or Dr. Lafortune, the president of the Poultry Association at Gatineau Point, for that purpose say to him how to find out the best hen in his barnyard. But the hon. gentleman would take the recommendation of his managing director, or the president, or the vice-president of his company; they would be responsible to him. That is what the hon. gentleman would do if he is a business man, and I think he is.

Mr. IRVINE: Do you not think that a commission appointed, say, from the heads of departments of the Civil Service, would be more efficient than any authority recommended under your proposal?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have not yet said what my proposal is.

Mr. IRVINE: You have just suggested that the minister or the deputy minister would be better than the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If I am not wearying the House I will come to the point my hon. friend mentions later. I am afraid I have already spoken at too great length, especially as I went fully into this matter last year. But now, I think, the time has come for constructive criticism on my part. It is now impossible to make appointments to the Civil Service in the case of these minor positions, of these labouring or manual positions, by a demonstration of skill or competitive examination. The only way that it could be done would be by having a board composed of bricklayers, charwomen, boilermakers, and the like, who would put these applicants through the respective tests and grade them in the various categories. I say that the appointment to these positions should be handed back to the department and not to anybody else; that the deputy minister should then arrange a scheme whereby these positions could be handled through his department, and he should carry the responsibility. Now I will be asked in regard to this category, as I will be in regard to the third category: If a member of parliament makes a recommendation, should it be followed? Why should it not be followed? If the deputy minister is the responsible individual in charge of his department, he will obey that suggestion or he will not. If he obeys that suggestion and makes a good appointment, nobody will suffer. If he obeys that suggestion and makes an improper appointment, then the deputy minister is responsible to parliament and he should be censured.

Mr. HOEY: In view of the fact that the hon. member is familiar with the Civil Service in a sense in which some of us are not, would he tell us whether there are many such positions outside the present exempted list?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not speaking for the Civil Service Commission, but I think I say what is right when I state that there are now within the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission the categories of elevator men, caretakers and watchmen. All the other labouring positions have been returned. Why in their wisdom they have kept the elevator man who runs the elevator purely and simply by putting on and shutting off the power, and why they have released the highly technical qualified electrician who makes the repairs to that elevator is more than I can say. Why they have kept the caretaker and watchman and have released, say, a bricklayer who earns six or seven dollars a day, I cannot say, but just at present I think I am speaking correctly when I say that there remains but those three categories within the Civil Service Commission. And then we are told that we are going to disrupt the whole Civil Service.

Now, I come to the second class, that of positions of a clerical nature. I say that all positions of a clerical nature, no matter what the salary may be from the start, where the minimum salary is $800 or $900, up to a standard where they cease to be ordinary clerical positions, and become technical positions, where the salary is about $2,400 or $2,500, should be filled after competitive examinations. All appointments to the Civil Service in those categories should be made by competitive examination, by special board under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, and paid by the government. This board would be responsible for the holding of examinations and responsible to this parliament. All the appointments to these positions would be by qualifying examinations. As a result of these examinations those who came up to the required standard would be placed on the list of eligibles. Here now is where we again part. The deputy minister should assume the responsibility of his office, and from that list of those who have passed the qualifying examination, who have a standard of the minimum marks, the deputy minister would be at liberty on his own responsibility to select the clerks that he thinks are best fitted for the particular positions for which he requires them. Again, I will be told that that is a return of patronage.

Mr. HOEY: Would he have the power of dismissal?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The deputy minister would have the power of dismissal. the power of promotion, and the duty of looking after statutory increases and sick leave. I am coming to all those points. In regard to those particular classes I recognize the necessity just as well as hon. gentlemen opposite, of introducing into the Civil Service of Canada only such men and women as are capable of filling the positions for which they are fitted, and I can say for the credit of the Civil Service that the vast majority are in this category, and it ill behooves hon. members of this House, or any other person, to criticize blindly, and to use the pet phrase of certain people, and say that the Civil Service of Canada is overmanned and overpaid. That is one reason why I urge that a commission should be appointed—to amongst other things dispel this idea. All these appointments to this second category should be by competitive examination. Now I come to the third containing those that I term technical, professional and administrative positions. For those positions I unhesitatingly say that the deputy minister should assume the responsibility. Again, if the deputy minister listens to the recommendations of a defeated candidate, or to a member of parliament, he may go astray or may go right. If he goes wrong there will be no more harm done anyway than there is at present, when Mr. So-and-So makes a recommendation to the Civil Service Commission and is responsible to nobody, and if he is right there is no harm done.

Mr. LADNER: I should like to ask the hon. member, divesting his remark from any confusing words and returning to plain language, does he favour a return to the old party system of patronage?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have endeavoured to state my position. Probably I cannot use the King's English to the satisfaction of all hon. gentlemen, but I have endeavoured to make it as plain as I can. True it is that there is no legislation in this or any other land that is absolutely perfect, but we would be getting nearer to perfection, and I think we should get away from the present system. We can modify our system. There is no law that cannot be modified with a view to making it better, and when a modification is suggested hon. gentlemen say it is a return to patronage. It would not take the hon. gentleman very long to find out—I do not care where he places the responsibility—that to-day there is much more patronage under the present system of irresponsible patronage than there would be under the old system, and those who are familiar with the working of the Civil Service Act, as we are bound to be, living near the seat of government, can understand how it works out. You can only ascertain that by a very close study of the act and by coming into close and daily contact with the administration. I am not going to enter into any personalities, and I am not going to cite individual cases in order to prove that, but I make the assertion, to use a word which is very familiar and highly prized by hon. gentlemen, that there is distorted patronage to-day, and no responsibility attaching thereto.

Mr. GOOD: Would the hon. gentleman give us some idea as to how the patronage is operated at the present time? I cannot quite grasp his meaning.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. gentleman would investigate all of the appointments to the Civil Service that have been made—I have named a few and I might go a little further—he would grasp the idea. When a postmaster is appointed, the subagent himself makes a recommendation. Is that not patronage? Let him call it patronage, or by a better word if my hon. friend wants to use a better word. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." When Mr. So-and-So, Mr. So-and-So and Mr. So-and-So, three legally trained gentlemen are used in Ottawa, or Montreal, or Toronto to appoint to the Civil Service a legally trained man, the Civil Service Commission do not make that appointment by a test of skill or competitive examination. That is patronage. When a technical officer is appointed, and the recommendation for his appointment has been made by Mr. So-and-So of the Royal Institute of Architects, that is patronage, and it is not responsible patronage. Last year I spoke for over an hour on this question, and the word "patronage" never crossed my lips or entered my mind. I would not have mentioned the word "patronage" to-night, but that hon. gentlemen are full of it.

Mr. BIRD: I understand the hon. gentleman wants the responsibility placed with the deputy heads. I notice in paragraph 13 and also in paragraph 16 of the act that a very considerable selective power is conferred upon the deputy heads; also in paragraph 28 a very considerable selective power is conferred upon the government.

Mr. CHEVRIER: From what act is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. BIRD: An act respecting the Civil Service of Canada, chapter 12.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What is the date?

Mr. BIRD: Assented to on the 24th May, 1918. What is the hon. gentleman's opinion as to those sections of the act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend is a year behind, and the portion of the act to which he is referring is repealed. We are operating now under what may be called the 1919 act. If my hon. friend had followed my reasoning, he would have understood that the 1918 act was amended, and that, Sir, is another proof why there ought to be a committee of this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. gentleman right? The act of 1921 is an act entitled, "to amend the Civil Service Act of 1918." If the Civil Service Act of 1918 was repealed, the act of 1921 would not read that way.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Civil Service Act of 1918, was amended by chapter 10 of the statutes of 1919, second session. That, is, this act may be cited as the Civil Service Act of 1918, amended in 1919.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is the one we are operating under, and that act—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The act of 1918?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is called the 1919 act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Well, it is just a rose by any other name. There is no section 16 in this act. Section 16 of the act of 1918 is headed "promotion," is it not?

Mr. BIRD: Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. gentleman will look at the amendment passed in 1919, he will see that the government of that day repealed sections 15 to 21, namely, those referring to professional and technical positions, and those sections do not now apply.

Mr. BIRD: What is the hon. gentleman's opinion as to section 13?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Section 13, which is now carried through this act, the act under which we are now working, covers simply the matter of probation. That is all right; I have no quarrel to find with that. When the Civil Service Commission send in an appointee, the minister has a right, within six months, to disapprove his appointment. But that does not refer to promotions; it does not refer to anything but the power to refuse within six months. Section 13 of 8-9 George V is now carried through the present act, which is the same as the act of 1918, except that sections 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21 of the act of 1918 were repealed in 1919, and those sections are not now in force.

I come now to the technical positions. These positions should be under the jurisdiction of the deputy minister himself, because he has a knowledge of the requirements of the situation. He knows just what is wanted. Let him assume the responsibility of placing in that position the man or the woman who, he thinks, is best suited for the purpose. If he does not select the best one out of the list of eligibles, then he is accountable to parliament. I think I have made my stand clear on that point.

There remains but this. Promotions should be under the exclusive jurisdiction of the deputy minister, and transfers should also be under the deputy minister. Why? How do the Civil Service Commission make these promotions to-day? Do not let hon. gentlemen run away with the idea that the Civil Service Commission do everything in an angelic mood or manner. I do not think they are moved by any sentiment; I give them credit that they do not want to do anything that is wrong; but they are good artisans working with very poor tools, which do not give them the power they should have. Are hon. gentlemen aware that these promotions are made by the Civil Service Commission, who have no means of inquiring into the various positions except that they must rely to a very large extent upon the reports of the heads of the various branches. In very few cases do they get first hand information. They send experts; they send clerks of their own to investigate, and they report upon the recommendation of the heads of branches. The deputy minister can do nothing; but the head of a branch, if he wants to be dishonest, if he wants to boost a friend in that branch, can make the recommendation to the Civil Service Commission and the Civil Service Commission, in the exercise of its greatest good faith, may make that recommendation for promotion, acting upon that fraudulent representation. In that case you have a miscarriage of justice. On the other hand, if a deputy minister looked after his business himself, he would have knowledge of what was going on in his department, and he would make the proper recommendation. In matters of transfers, why should all this red tape and loss of time and money and energy take place? If the Minister of Finance is satisfied to take a clerk from the Minister of Public Works, why should he not be allowed to do so, if both are satisfied? To-day the Civil Service Commission has to examine into all the details, consider the positions, make reports, recommend transfers. This takes weeks, months. You cannot blame the commission for that, for to-day they are in possession of this cumbersome and unwieldy machine. There is no better way of illustrating the point than to say this. When I was in the Civil Service in 1907, in one of the largest departments, it took one clerk about a day and a half to prepare the list for recommendation to council of those who were entitled to statutory increases once or twice a year. Now it takes two clerks thirty days to make up the list because of the unwieldy machinery which the Civil Service Commission has to work with and because the experts in efficiency turned everything upside down in the service. For each and every clerk in the department—and there are 1,400 of them—a large sheet, on which are questions just as silly as those mentioned in the classification book, has to be filled up, three copies of it made, or 4,200 sheets in all, to which must be added the carbons. Instead of the deputy minister signing a report, as he did in the old days, he O.K's one of those sheets, and the other 4,199 are marked with a rubber stamp. These 4,200 sheets are then sent to the auditor general and the treasury board, where they are again manipulated. Thereupon 1,400 of those sheets are returned to the Civil Service Commission, 1,400 files are taken out of their respective places, those sheets are attached, and then those 1,400 files are replaced. You will see, Sir, the immense amount of work involved. I am not blaming the Civil Service Commission, for that is the heritage they have succeeded to under this law. That is one of the many instances I could produce to hon. members to show that there is something unwieldy and cumbersome under the Civil Service Act which ought to be weeded out. That cannot be accomplished by simply arguing the matter on the floor of this House. I am confident that if hon. members who have sat in this House for two sessions would investigate the operations of the Civil Service Commission,—not with any idea of turning things upside down, not with any idea of hostility, they would immediately say that there is something wrong.

Another instance will suffice for the present. Last year the auditor general's report showed that there were 280 odd clerks in the Civil Service Commission drawing salaries amounting to $291,000. For 1921-22 the temporary employees of the commission received $77,-391 in salaries. Did hon. members of the Progressive wing ever sit down and realize how much it costs to run the Civil Service Commission? Last year it cost a total of $342,000. The year before it cost $524,000. In all these remarks I have endeavoured to be frank, and I will at once explain that that total includes about $130,000 for the machinery used on the reorganization of the Printing Bureau. But last year it cost this country $342,000 for the administration of the Civil Service Commission. Hon. members would be well advised to look into the Auditor General's report. The setting of examination papers by outsiders has cost $1,000. That amount has been paid to outsiders. We cannot blame the Civil Service Commisison for that expenditure because they did not have these men in the office. Why not have on their staff examiners composed of college professors, technical and professional men, and pay them reasonable salaries to act as an examining board which would be responsible to this parliament? Last year the stationery and printing account runs to $26,700, telegrams $2,200; the corresponding items for the previous year were $44,000 and $4,000 respectively. There is evidently something wrong, and hon. members who are interested in economy would be well advised to investigate and see whether or not the brakes should be applied.

Now, Sir, in closing let me say that I cannot subscribe to the abolition of the Civil Service Commission. I am not an extremist, I do not believe in radical measures. I stand for everything that will promote and maintain efficiency in the Civil Service at the least possible cost to this country. Therefore I think we ought to set aside any preconceived ideas and agree on the principle enunciated by the right hon. Prime Minister in asking that this House appoint a committee to look into the workings of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to think that hon. members for the city of Ottawa are not in love with the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. genman if he was in his seat with his ears open when I said what my feelings were towards the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I know the hon. gentleman is something of a joker. He has told us that himself. I do not have to prove it; he admits it. The predecessors of my hon. friends took the same stand in regard to the Civil Service Commission. I can only suppose that by reason of living so close to the commission they must think they know better than we do whether or not its usefulness has been outlived.

Now I cannot agree with hon. gentlemen on the government side who think that we should displace the Civil Service Commission. It has been my privilege on a number of occasions to adopt this attitude. I was elected on a promise that I would stand for the abolition of patronage, and I have maintained that stand ever since. I shall do so to-night. The hon. member who has preceded me (Mr. Chevrier) called the classification a joke book. Well, I think he will admit that those who were responsible for preparing the classification had a very difficult task indeed to perform. For many years there was no classification of any kind and the civil service was not in a very satisfactory condition. It became imperative that there should be some kind of classification. I am not going to say that I am satisfied with that classification, or that I have not myself made complaints about it. But that does not prove that there should not be a classification. If the classification is not right, it can be put right. That does not go to the foundation of the system at all; it is a mere detail.

Referring to the matter of expense, the hon. member pointed out that it cost $290,000 last year to run the Civil Service Commission, and he urged that that amount was too large. Perhaps it is; if so, it may be possible to reduce it. Then he says also that the procedure is too complicated; that there are too many details to be attended to. That may be true also. I do not say that the system is perfect, but these are only details, and I submit that it is the duty of the government or of the Civil Service Commission to endeavour to simplify the procedure as much as possible.

I must congratulate the mover of this resolution upon his frankness. He does not beat about the bush; he does not say that he is not in favour of abolishing the Civil Service Commission; he comes right out in the open and says he wants to get rid of it—and when he made that statement I noticed that he received a good deal of applause from hon. gentlemen on the other side. Now, I commend him for his frankness.

Mr. POWER: The hon. gentleman will pardon me; I did not say I wanted to get rid of the commission. I do want to get rid of it, but I did not say so.

Mr. McQUARRIE: To put it in another way, my hon. friend's resolution says so. And if he did not expressly say so before, he says so now, and I again congratulate him on his frankness. In taking that stand he is only following in the footsteps of some very distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the House. I have in mind certain ministers of the Crown; because I remember very distinctly the occasion when, during last session, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) stood up in his place and said, "For God's sake give us power if we are going to have responsibility."

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I never said that. Hansard will disclose that that is not so.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I must accept the hon. minister's statement, but I think he said something like that. He may have put it in different words, but I gathered that it was his view that if he was to assume the responsibility he should also have something to do with the appointments.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Sure.

Mr. McQUARRIE: He says "Sure." Well, I do not see that there is much difference. We have heard other statements from hon. ministers of the Crown and from many supporters of the government. The thing is obvious enough to me, in view of a circumstance which I presume will not be contradicted, namely, that there are at the present time hundreds of appointments to the Civil Service that have been held up for months awaiting the time when the government shall have control over those appointments. If I am wrong about that, I will stand corrected, but that is my information.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend kindly inform us where he got that information?

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is the information and it is not contradicted.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend is simply dealing with rumour.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It is alleged that hundreds of offices have been left vacant, many of them for months.

An hon. MEMBER: That is economy.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It is quite plain what the reason is: the government is not yet in a position to control the Civil Service Commission. I am told—I do not know whether it is correct or not—that the first thing every minister of the Crown did, one and all, after taking office, was to notify the Civil Service Commission that they were going to have control over their appointments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend mention the name of one minister of the Crown who made such a statment?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear—"one and all."

Mr. McQUARRIE: I included them all. If it is not correct, of course, I am very, very sorry.

Mr. MARTELL: May I ask my hon. friend a question? He is a lawyer, and he must know that if he alleges a thing he must produce the evidence. Will he produce evidence as to one single minister in the present administration, from the Prime Minister down, who has in any way interfered with the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. McQUARRIE: No, I won't attempt to do that. I will admit freely and frankly that my information is simply hearsay; that it did not come from any reliable or responsible source. But that is the information which I have received.

Mr. PUTNAM: Now you are frank yourself.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Well, I am telling you the truth. The hon. member who moved this resolution said that the Civil Service Commission was not responsible to anybody; that it was not clothed with the mantle of grace, and that it should not be allowed to exist. I must say I cannot agree with that. He says that the responsibility is cast upon him and other members of parliament when they come to Ottawa to advise His Excellency the Governor General how the affairs of the country should be conducted, and he asserts that he does not intend to shirk that responsibility. I do not know whether or not His Excellency would go out of business if the hon. gentleman did shirk that responsibility. However, he intimates that his business is to see about the appointments in his constituency, and he says that all appointments should be in the hands of the responsible parties —those who are elected by the people. Well, I suppose the hon. member would be frank enough to qualify that by admitting that the appointments should be made on the recommendation of supporters of the government, I do not suppose for one minute that he would give us on this side of the House any say in the matter of appointments. And what does that mean? It means that in respect of practically fifty per cent of the constituencies of this Dominion the appointments would have to be made by defeated Liberal candidates—persons in whom the electors did not have confidence. Would that be the proper thing? I submit not. If my hon. friend wished to do the right thing and would let us in on the appointments, there might be some force in his argument that the representatives of the people would then have some say in the appointments.

Mr. POWER: Will the hon. gentleman pardon me? If I accept his suggestion, will he vote for my resolution?

Mr. McQUARRIE: No, I certainly will not. I do not want the patronage; I never did want it, and I hope I never shall.

A great many things have been said to-night about the Civil Service Commission, about the system of appointments, and so on, but not one word of criticism has been directed towards appointments which have been made. How many cases have been cited here to-night of improper appointments which have been made by the commission? I have not heard of any

We only can speak with respect to our own constituencies. It is said that comparisons are odious, but sometimes I think they are useful, and I think it might be of interest to the House to know something about appointments that have been made by the Civil Service Commission out in British Columbia, just to show how the thing is working out. Within the last few months to my knowledge certain appointments have been made by the Civil Service Commission in British Columbia. One was that of warden of the penitentiary at New Westminster. He was appointed from the staff of the penitentiary. He had been employed in that institution for something like thirty years and was a man of high standing and thoroughly competent. He had previously held the positions of chief keeper and deputy warden. There is no criticism of his appointment.

The next is that of Crown timber agent at New Westminster. That also went to the man who had been assistant Crown timber agent for a great many years. That appointment was also quite satisfactory.

A collector of customs in Vancouver was also appointed. That position went to a man who had been collector of inland revenue at Vancouver for some years. He had been in the department for something like thirty-five years and was thoroughly competent and well qualified in every way. All these appointments have been made by the Civil Service Commission within the last few months, and all are satisfactory. That is one side of the picture.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House say, we can make better appointments if you let us go back to patronage. Well, they have made some appointments out there during the last few months. There were some vacancies on the Vancouver Harbour Board which this government has filled. The board is under the control, I think, of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. If I remember correctly the man who had been in the position of chairman of the board for some time, and who had performed his duties to the satisfaction of every one concerned, a thoroughly competent man, was asked for his resignation, together with the other members of the board, and appointments were made by the government under the old system of patronage. Who do you suppose they got for chairman of the board, Mr. Speaker? A man who had been a druggist up in the interior.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend who the chairman of the board is.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Mr. Beattie.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Beattie is not chairman of the board.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I beg your pardon; I thought he was. He was appointed as one of the members of the board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is not the chairman of the board Mr. Kirkpatrick, who was appointed by my right hon. friend opposite?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I believe that is right, and I apologize. I believe that he was retained for the time being, but it was reported at the time that he was to be removed, and that he was holding the chairmanship temporarily till he could tell the druggist something about his business. That was one of the appointments this government made under the old system—a druggist up in the interior appointed to the Vancouver Harbour Board. I suppose a druggist is presumed to know something about water, but I do not think this druggist had ever seen salt water before in his life. He had perhaps one qualification that I should not overlook, and that is that he had held the seat of East Kootenay in this House, the seat which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) now holds. He resigned his seat in this House to let the Minister of Public Works come in. I say nothing about that. Possibly it is a proper arrangement. I am not criticising it in any way, nor am I criticising Mr. Beattie's appointment. I am simply giving it as an illustration of the way appointments sometimes go under the patronage system.

The government appointed another man out there, and instead of going into the interior for a druggist, this time they went into a brewery and secured a book-keeper employed there in the person of Mr. Prenter. He was also appointed to the harbour board. I have not one word to say against him. He has lived in Vancouver a long time, and had seen the salt water for some years, so perhaps knew something about it.

Then the government appointed a director to the National Railways Board. They went up to Prince Rupert and got a grocer there for that appointment. I guess he is all right, but he did not know anything about railroading. Yet he was made representative for British Columbia on the National Railways Board, when we have in the province many of the most eminent railroad men in the world, some of whom might have been obtained for this position. I am not saying a word in criticism of these appointments, but I do say that is the way things go when you have patronage.

The Prime Minister is not perhaps as frank as the mover of the resolution, although he did congratulate the mover on what he had said and on bringing this resolution before the House. The Prime Minister said: No we do not want to get rid of the commission at all; that is not our idea; we never thought of such a thing, but Dr. Grant, the Principal of Upper Canada College has been saying that there is in process of formation a Civil Service Reform League, and consequently we will have a committee to investigate this whole business. I do not see the force of his argument at all.

The Prime Minister also said that the deputy ministers are not satisfied with the way the Civil Service Act is working out, and they would like to come before a committee and give some of their experiences. We heard the same kind of story in 1921, when we were told that the deputy ministers did not like the Civil Service Commission, and that they would say all kinds of things if they were brought before a committee. But if any hon. member will look up the proceedings of that committee and read the evidence taken at that time he will find that the deputy ministers came and said: The commission is all right, and with one or two exceptions the appointments are certainly up to the standard of previous years, and in some cases better. If, as the Prime Minister says, some of the deputy ministers are not satisfied now, what is responsible for their change of heart? Has all the trouble occurred since this government came into power, and if so, why is it?

I say that we have tried out this committee business before, and to my mind there is no necessity for going through the same painful process again. We know where it is leading to. It is too evident what the object of the government is, and I for one am opposed to this resolution, and opposed also to it in the amended form suggested by the Prime Minister.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): It was not my intention to intervene in this debate and I shall do so very briefly because of certain statements made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), following what I thought was a very reasonable suggestion advanced by the Prime Minister. I may say at the outset that I am opposed to the resolution as submitted by the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). I think it would be a misfortune if we returned to the system of patronage such as we had prior to the act of 1918. But I would not say that the act is not capable of some improvement. I do not suppose that we have ever had a piece of legislation that was perfect, and I believe that to be the case with the Civil Service Act, especially in view of the fact that it deals with a matter of far-reaching importance. I take it, Sir, that all the members of this House—whether they belong to the Progressive party, to the Conservative party, or to the party that sits on this side—despite the fact that they may, perhaps, like to take a little political advantage or make a bit of political capital—that all the members of the various groups have at heart the true interest of the country in the matter of the Civil Service and that what we are looking for is real efficiency. If in the working out of efficiency we find that we cannot make a law so absolutely rigid as the pesent Civil Service Act, and if that involves some slight departure from the act as it is to-day —introducing, if you like, a slight degree of patronage—I, for one, would not be particularly alarmed at the word.

It seems to me, therefore, that the suggestion of the Prime Minister was quite in order, that the various members of the House might get together in committee with a view of investigating the difficulties and the disadvantages that have been exposed during the operation of the act in the last two years. It seems to me also that it does not at all follow, as was intimated by the leader of the Opposition, that it was the intention of the Prime Minister to return to the system of patronage, and I, for one, was glad to hear the Prime Minister say that he was not in favour of the resolution and that he has no intention of returning to the old state of affairs.

But even if that were true I would think that the same reproach could very fairly be made to the leader of the Opposition. He was the leader of the government in 1921 that brought in a government bill, which, in its provisions, went a great deal further than any suggestion of the Prime Minister could possibly be construed to go, and that is one of my reasons for rising on this occasion. When the Spinney bill was introduced in 1921—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member be good enough to tell the House how the bill of 1921 went further? The bill of 1921 was a bill simply submitting the question to a special committee.

Mr. EULER: I was just coming to that. The bill of 1921 was known as the Spinney bill, because it was introduced by a responsible member of the government, Hon. Mr. Spinney. I have not the bill before me but, as the leader of the Opposition says, it was referred to a committee of this House of which I was a member. According to Hansard —because not having the bill I cannot quote its exact terms—the measure made provision for the exemption from the operation of the Civil Service Act of certain classes and the result of these clauses if adopted would have been, as the chairman of the Civil Service Commission said, to drive a coach and four through the whole Civil Service Act. The Prime Minister to-day merely suggests an inquiry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows that the government of that day when it presented the bill stated that the committee would be absolutely free. As to what was inserted as a schedule to the bill representing what was exempted, there was no restriction or specification. The government's action was merely a submission of the act to the special committee.

Mr. EULER: On that point I must take issue with the right hon. gentleman. The bill definitely and distinctly declared that professional, scientific and technical men were to be exempted from the operation of the act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not my point. I know that was in the bill, but the government in presenting the measure to the House stated that it was quite prepared to allow the bill to go to a committee without any restraint, restriction, or specification whatsoever, and that the committee should be sole judge as to how the act should be amended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is not that exactly what I have suggested? What objection can there be to my suggestion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As the act was amended there is ample liberty for exemptions from its provisions so there is no further object in submitting it now to a special committee.

Mr. EULER: In reply to the leader of the Opposition I would say there must have been in the minds of the government something very closely approaching what I am arguing; otherwise, why insert these words in what my hon. friend is pleased to term a blank bill. or why, indeed, introduce an amending bill at all? On the face of it, it was an indication on the part of the government that they felt that the law which they themselves had brought into existence was, in its working out, found to be impracticable and undesirable in certain directions. However, the bill was referred to the committee. It was very clear proof—proof at least to my mind—that the intention of the bill was, to some extent at least, to reintroduce the practice of political patronage. I was not at all alone in that impression because throughout the length and breadth of Canada the press took alarm and viewed it in the same way; so much so that protests were made, and these grew so extensive and vigorous that we had not been in session very often in that committee before the words which I have quoted were eliminated from the bill. But the majority of the members of that committee devised something else and I speak deliberately when I say, that, in my opinion, the changes which were made in the bill, even after the elimination of the words which I have quoted, while not apparently alarming in themselves, were, according to the wording, intended to carry out exactly the ideas which were first in the minds of the government when they did insert the original words. Clause 38 of the Civil Service Act, 1918, read as follows:

> Provided, however, that in any case where the commission decides that it is not practicable. . .

And I would draw your attention to the word "practicable"—

> . . . to apply this act to any position or positions, the commission, with the approval of the Governor in Council may make such regulations as are deemed advisable prescribing how such position or positions are to be dealt with.

If it was not practicable, the clause stated the commission could, in effect, exempt those particular classes from the operation of the bill and, I presume, such classes as it might think it was not practicable any longer to control by the commission should be placed back into the hands of the government and thus, to that extent, restore patronage. And the change that was made was this:

> In any case where the commission decides that it is not practicable or in the public interest. . .

And then the rest of the clause reads very much as it did before. The only change made was to insert the words "in the public interest.' Now hon. members may judge for themselves whether the addition of these words "in the public interest" widens the power or whether it does not. The vice-chairman of that committee, the Hon. Mr. Calder, a member of the Cabinet, stated that he thought the power wider than if those original classes—the professional, technical and other classes which I have spoken about before—had been included. But that was passed in the House. Now the point I desire to make is this: The previous government drew up what they thought was a perfect act in 1918. They either found that it was not practicable, that it was not workable, that it was not for the advantage of the public service, or else the pressure upon the government for the return of patronage by their followers was so great that they found it could no longer be resisted. The evidence, as shown in that committee by the actual introduction of that bill, was at least as strong an indication of the desire on the part of the then government to return to patronage as is indicated by any remarks made this evening by the Prime Minister.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to make a further suggestion. The hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) has stated, I think, his opposition to the appointment of a committee. I should like to see him alter that attitude, for this reason: it is amply shown, I think, both by the action of the previous government, and by the instances which have been quoted by hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me, that there are conditions in the operation of the Civil Service Act which might very well be improved. What then is the natural and logical thing to do? Instead of debating the matter here, instead of examining instances, which we cannot do in any great number on the floor of the House, is it not the most natural thing that representatives of all the groups in the House should gather together, take evidence, satisfy themselves of weaknesses in the present act, and make such recommendations as they may see fit to make?

I think that is perfectly logical. I would add to that the statement that during the meeting of the committee, when it was finally decided to add these words "in the public interest," I know as a matter of fact the chairman of the Civil Service Commission was very much opposed to it. He would have preferred to wait a year—these are his own words—to see how the act would work out. My own impression was that it might very well go on for some time longer, and then the commission itself, and the various officials of the department, including the deputy heads, might very well make the recommendations to the government as to what remedy might be applied to make the act more workable. We have now waited two years more. It is time to review the whole situation.

A statement has been made that by order in council some ten thousand employees have been exempted from the operation of the act. I do not know whether that number is correct or not. I believe that there were certain classes of employees that could very well, and with public advantage, be exempted from the operation of the act; for example, such as country postmasters, who, I believe, are now exempt. I do not think hon. gentlemen will argue with any great force or conviction that a body of men sitting in Ottawa will know more about the qualifications of a man out in a little place in British Columbia, or in the northern part of Ontario, or Nova Scotia, for the position of postmaster than the men who come directly from these places. If this means consulting the member of parliament, and to that extent a return to patronage, I am quite willing to say that I would be in favour of it. If ten thousand have been restored, and if as the leader of the Opposition says, that was done with exceeding promptness, I would merely like to say that, if that were done in June, I think the very same thing would have been done in 1921, after the change was made in the act. The change was made in the act enabling the commission to divest themselves of these powers in June of 1921. I think it was about the month of September when the leader of the Opposition, who was then Prime Minister, made the announcement that he was about to make an appeal to the country, and he had not very much time, and the commission had not very much time, to deal with matters of that kind; so that to my mind that is no reflection on the good faith of the government in the matter.

I would in conclusion make an appeal to the Progressives that it is perfectly reasonable and logical that a committee of this House composed of members of all the parties get together, review the whole situation and honestly and fairly make their recommendations to this House on the whole question.

Mr. J. W. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): If it is perfectly logical and natural for the members of this group to whom the last speaker appealed to agree to the appointment of the committee that has been suggested by the right hon. the Prime Minister, is it not just as logical and just as natural, and far more in accord with parliamentary practice, that the government itself should submit certain proposals, if they feel those proposals to be in the public interest, to this House, and then have us consider these proposals, instead of the general question as to whether these proposals should be made or not? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that would be more in accord with parliamentary practice in this House than the procedure which they are taking. I must confess that it was with a good deal of surprise that I saw this resolution on the order paper, and with a good deal of surprise that I saw coupled with this resolution the name of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), because I was of the opinion that not long ago he was very much opposed to any change being made in the Civil Service Act. He admits that two years ago he was very much opposed to any change in the Civil Service Act, and he is quite frank in saying that he opposed the change at that time because he did not trust the Tories. I might just say to the hon. gentleman that there is a large body of public opinion in this country which, in respect of the appointment to the public positions, has a very profound distrust of both Grits and Tories, and why should the public trust either Grits or Tories, or Progressives for that matter, in regard to making public appointments.

The people of Canada desire to see an efficient Civil Service. They desire to see the administration of our public affairs carried out not only economically but proficiently and in the best possible manner, and, recalling what was said by the hon. gentleman from Brandon (Mr. Forke) about patronage being the system that was in use in this country in making public appointments for a good many years, the struggle that there was in this House to get away from the evils of patronage, and the impossibility under either political party of any substantial measure of civil service reform being enacted which would absolutely get away from party patronage, I cannot help thinking that if we go back in the very slightest degree towards that old system and recognize party patronage at all in the making of public appointments, it will be a very grave mistake for this House, it will be a grave mistake for the members of this parliament, and it will be only getting ourselves into difficulty and will not lend itself to efficiency in public administration.

Mr. PUTNAM: Is the hon. gentleman opposed to the government in power making the appointment of Superior Court judges, or would he like that to go to the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Whether I would be in favour of the appointment by the Civil Service Commission of Supreme Court judges and that kind of thing, or whether I would not, is a question I am not prepared to answer offhand. I am quite frank in answering my hon. friend in that way. But I think it has been generally recognized in this country, even in days of patronage, that appointments to the Supreme Court should not be regarded as patronage, and should be above patronage. Whether that has been true in practice or not I am not prepared to say. I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. gentleman from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), whilst stating that there were some phases of the Civil Service Act that might require change and improvement, admit that he would not be alarmed even if a little element of patronage entered into the changing or amending of that act. I quite clearly recall that two years ago in speaking on this same question, while protesting against the very slight change that was made at that time, my hon. friend said that he was afraid that that slight change would do away with the vital principle of the Civil Service Act, which was the abolition of political patronage. Evidently, he is of the same mind as the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power); he is not afraid of political patronage. But he instances the case of country post offices, small unimportant positions in outlying districts, and he contends that the member for that constituency, who knows his constituency and the conditions surrounding his locality, is in a much better position to choose the proper man for a position of that kind than is the Civil Service Commission sitting here at Ottawa. That may be true and it may not; but we have the evidence of men in the Post Office Department, for instance, evidence which was given under oath two years ago before the special committee, going to show that the system now in vogue of making those appointments by the Civil Service Commission is working out fairly well.

Mr. CARROLL: That is not in vogue now.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): The post office inspectors say that they are getting good appointees and good service under the present system.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member say that appointments to small country post offices are to-day under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Of course, there are a few of the very small ones that are not, but very many of them are. It is a small post office, indeed, that does not give a remuneration of $200 or more.

Mr. CARROLL: There are many.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I am speaking only for my constituency and I know that to be the case there. I do not know that there is in my constituency one that is in the category of which the hon. member speaks.

The outstanding feature, to my mind, of the discussion this evening was brought out by the hon. member who just preceded me (Mr. Euler). He said that two years ago, when the bill which is commonly known as the Spinney bill, was introduced in this House, it was done because such pressure was brought to bear upon the administration of that day by many of their prominent supporters in this House, that the government submitted a bill. Is that not the situation that we have here to-day? I suspect that to be the situation, that such pressure is now being brought to bear upon the administration, and has been for the last year, that they are feeling their way as to whether it will be wise to bring in a bill to amend the Civil Service Act or not. That is why I am taking the ground that I am opposed to the suggestion that a committee of this House should be appointed. I was rather surprised to hear some prominent members across the floor state that the Civil Service Commission were an autocratic body; that they had power without responsibility, and that the government, who shoulder the responsibiltiy, should have the power. The present administration have not shown until the present time any particular anxiety to assume responsibility. If they are willing to assume responsibility, why not submit a measure for our consideration?

11 p.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A good deal has been said by my hon. friend and his friends as to the desirability of the government consulting parliament or a committee of parliament before taking matters into their hands. I have intimated, on behalf of the government, that we desire to do that, to as large an extent as possible. Would we not be proceeding more in accord with that spirit if we asked parliament or a committee of parliament, after examining the whole situation, to give us the benefit of their views, and then acted upon their views, rather than if we took the matter into our hands, making an arbitrary suggestion and leaving it to parliament to decide?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I can see there are many cases in which the Prime Minister is correct. I agree in general with the principle that he has laid down, and I think it is quite proper for the government to consult this House on many questions. But it is not two years since we had an investigation of a similar nature, an investigation as wide as one could possibly make it, by a special committee appointed for this very purpose. All the information that was collected by that committee is available for the present administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A very different parliament.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member not think that an additional experience of two years in the working out of that act would tend to throw light on it?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I have no doubt an additional experience of two years would throw more light on the attitude of many members in this House towards that act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman, I hope, remembers that even that investigation was opposed by the present Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said that it was a very different parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have let the cat out of the bag.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): It is quite true that it was a very different parliament, but there were on that committee many members who are sitting in this parliament. The hon. member for North Waterloo was on that committee, and had the privilege of asking any questions he chose to ask. We had the privilege of summoning all witnesses we chose from amongst the civil servants, deputy ministers, heads of branches and other officers from the different departments. No effort was made to circumscribe the inquiry or to deny information, and the information laid before that committee, which that committee elicited from men who know that service from top to bottom, is sufficient ground on which to base any recommendations for a change in the act. It would be more in accord with parliamentary practice for this administration to make their proposals on the information thus gathered and then to bring down to the House a bill for our consideration.

Mr. EULER: Is the hon. member in favour of the action taken by the Civil Service Commission in the exemptions which they have already made? Does he approve those exemptions or does he not?

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I think, in the main, the exemptions made by the Civil Service Commission are proper exemptions to make from the operation of the act. A few of them may not be. I am not just familiar with all the exemptions that have been made; but I quite remember that according to the information which we elicited from the chairman and secretary of the Civil Service Commission two years ago, they thought the act would be made more workable and more efficient in the public interest by making some of these exemptions which have already been made.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member know that they include those postmasters in favour of whose exemption I spoke this evening and also two years ago? I am glad to hear that my hon. friend is also in favour of exempting them.

Mr. H. B. McGIVERIN (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up the time of the House. My hon. friend and colleague from Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) has gone into this question very fully, and I wish to associate myself with him in the statements he has made in support of the proposal that the Civil Service Act shall go before a committee. I spoke on this subject last year, Mr. Speaker, and I am going to repeat what I said then, that I stand for civil service reform. Civil service legislation was first introduced in 1908 by the Laurier government. I had my experience from 1908 to 1911 under the act as it then was administered for what is known as the inside service at Ottawa. That act was founded on the British Civil Service Act. The idea of civil service reform is that you must have an honest competitive examination for entrance to the Civil Service. If you do not, then you must have influence. That is the point. If you are going to have influence of some kind without responsibility in the making of appointments to the service I would prefer the responsibility to rest with the administration.

Mr. CALDWELL: May I ask the hon. gentlemen if he is suggesting that the Civil Service Commission does not prescribe honest, competitive examinations?

Mr. McGIVERIN: No, certainly not. But I say that one of the reasons given here for the appointment of a committee is that in very many cases the Civil Service Commission cannot possibly prescribe a competitive examination. Take the classes of appointments lately withdrawn from the operation of the act at the request of the commission itself, no competitive examination is possible. For instance, what competitive examination can you set for charwomen? Are they to be required to measure their mops, and so forth? The same condition applies to lots of other appointments. What is the result? It is left to certain men to advise the Civil Service Commission as to who should be appointed to such positions. I submit that the responsibility of making these appointments should rest with the minister or the deputy minister, for it is doing harm to civil service reform to have the commission in charge of appointments which it cannot justify.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing against the personnel of the Civil Service Commission. As a matter of fact two of the commissioners were formerly members of this House and my personal friends; but I do object to the act, and I think a committee should be appointed to investigate not only the making of appointments but the principles governing promotions, transfers, etc.

In the debate last year my hon. friend, the former leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar)—and I sincerely hope he will soon be in his seat again—made it very plain that he was against political patronage. After stating that the Civil Service Commission should be entrusted with the duty and responsibility of seeing that any person coming into the service possessed the necessary qualifications, he went on to say:

> But after that is done it seems to me that on the whole we would perhaps get better results if ministers and deputy ministers in charge of the various departments had greater latitude in control of the services than they have at the present time. If a minister or a deputy minister in a department wishes to promote some one in his department, if he wishes to transfer him from one branch of his department to another, that should certainly rest in his hands.

In other words, the responsibility of administration should rest with the minister or his deputy and not with the commission. My hon. friend continued on the same lines as regards the right of appeal from the decision of a deputy minister. While I believe that the administration should absolutely be in the hands of the minister or the deputy minister or of the heads of branches, I would still leave to the individual civil servant the right of appeal, but not to the Civil Service Commission. Rather I would propose the adoption of the practice followed in Australia and New Zealand. I would have a civil service judge, equivalent to a judge of the Exchequer Court, a man of the highest character, to deal with appeals. I would further protect the civil servant by introducing in the various departments what the civil service organizations have asked for, namely, Whitley Councils in each department and inter-departmental councils. Then any civil servant who feels aggrieved in regard to promotion or otherwise submits his grievances to his fellow civil servants composing the council, and if they think he has a just case against the head of his branch or against his deputy minister they take it before the judge.

Frankly, I want to see the most efficient and the most satisfied Civil Service that we can have, and I believe that it is the honest intent of every hon. member, but if the bogey of political patronage is to be trotted out every time any attempt is made to correct what we believe to be faulty in the act, then we might as well not attempt any improvement. I think my hon. friend and colleague, (Mr. Chevrier) made out a splendid case, and I strongly support the question being taken up by a committee. Let us try to make progress. There are other very serious questions in connection with the Civil Service that later on can be taken up, but in the meantime the law governing the Civil Service Commission needs amending. Mr. Speaker, I shall have much pleasure in voting to have this matter referred to a committee.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (Sainte-Marie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to strongly support the motion proposed by my hon. colleague of Quebec South (Mr. Power). Those were precisely my sentiments last year, and I have no fear to state this evening that my views have not since changed. I wish to congratulate the member for Quebec South on the initiative, courage and talent which he displayed in asserting his contention. This act, as draughted and applied, of which he urges the repeal, is certainly an arbitrary and unconstitutional measure. Such legislation belongs to ancient history, and to find its parallel, one must go back almost a hundred years, when the governors of Canada, at the helm of public affairs, ruled through an executive power irresponsible to the people and also had the privilege of voting themselves salaries and dividing among themselves the public funds. This kind of administration brought on those times of crises of which history still vividly reminds us. During that period we witnessed individuals living in London, rendering no services to Canada, not having even set foot in this country, drawing fabulous salaries. As the same thing is happening here, at present, although on a smaller scale, I shall have the opportunity in the course of my remarks, to ask the Civil Service Commission, who has the care of watching over the interests of the country, why they are paying out salaries to persons who are not even in the country's service. Those powers conferred on the Civil Service Commission, remind us of the times when the country was governed by a group of friends or a Family Compact. At the time, a few persons were allowed to distribute all public offices amongst friends and relatives, claiming salaries to their hearts' content without any compunction, exactly as the thing is practised to-day. This I stated and proved last year, on the floor of this House.

Of all these independent commissions, the Civil Service Commission is certainly the most arbitrary and unconstitutional, owing to its extensive powers. However, the principle which places the administration of the country under independent commissions is a false one in many ways, because under a responsible government, all these commissions are only responsible to themselves, which is perfectly ridiculous.

In regard to these independent commissions although the people's representatives have received a mandate to look after the interests of the county, they find themselves frustrated, on arriving at Ottawa, by persons absolutely independent of parliament. Such legislation legalizes the principle of administrative independence to such an extent that it is interdicted to parliament, to the representatives of the people, to interfere with their decisions or their way of carrying on the administration of the country whatever injury it may entail on the public weal. The people's representatives have no say in the matter. If administrative machinery is invented by which public money is squandered and a representative of the people dares to ask for an explanation, from the pinnacle of their independence the answer comes that it is not in the interest of the country to divulge these details.

By virtue of section 53 of the British North America Act (page 10, 1867-1907 edition) it is stated:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

This section, according to me, is very plain. Taking into account the administrative machinery at the disposal of these independent commissions: such as laws, regulations, promotions, arrears of salaries, creating positions, in a word all the necessary disbursements to start this machinery going, sometimes they are fabulous amounts, I conclude that the Civil Service Commission, in regard to administration, is in violation of section 53 of the British North America Act, because these rules and regulations, arrears in pay, new positions, are no more nor less than an appropriation of some portion of the public money and all this emanates outside of the House of Commons, which is prohibited by this section, and the latter has no other right, under this system of control, than to compulsorily ratify and sanction sound as well as unsound legislation. In my humble opinion, this is arbitrary and unconstitutional, and as long as the British North America Act is not amended, I think that the creation of the Civil Service Commission is an ultra vires legislation.

At page 17, 1867-1907 edition, chapter VI, section 91 of the British North America Act, under the heading Distribution of Legislative Powers, and sub-heading Powers of Parliament, it is stated:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the Peace, order, and good Government of Canada, in relations to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects—next herein after enumerated; that is to say,—
>
> 1. The public debt and property.
> 2. The regulation of trade and commerce.
> 3. The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.
> 4. The borrowing of money on the public credit.
> 7. Militia, military and naval service, and defence.
> 5. Postal service.
> 6. The census and statistics.
> 7. Militia, military and naval service, and defence.
> 8. The fixing of and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the Government of Canada.

There are many other subjects dealt with which I trust you will dispense me from enumerating.

The powers granted to all these independent administrative bodies, such as the Civil Service, Taxation, Harbour and Railway Commissioners etc., etc., are in violation of section 91 of the British North America Act, by depriving the deputation of its exclusive privileges.

All the members of this House are well aware that the fixing of the civil servants' salaries comes under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. As a matter of fact, paragraph 8 of section 91 of the British North America Act states that the fixing of and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officials of the government of Canada is the exclusive right of the Parliament of Canada. I therefore conclude that this act creating the Civil Service Commission which my hon. friend for Quebec South wishes to have repealed, is certainly unconstitutional and arbitrary and that he is fully justified in demanding its repeal.

At the time of the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I heard many of our Progressive friends preach economy in administration. However, I notice, this evening, that they are in favour of continuing this unconstitutional and arbitrary legislation. It seems to me that if they had recommendations to make in regard to the economic administration of the country they might have left us out and bestowed such recommendations on that commission which is so dear to them.

Mention was made, this evening, of the order in council, dated September 22, 1922, from which we may judge of the exorbitant powers which the Civil Service Act conferred upon this commission. As stated by the Premier, we beheld the members of that commission humbly come and beg the Privy Council to release them of such responsibility which was unbearable to them and consisted in having blacksmiths and copper-plate polishers employed in the Department of Public Works, in Montreal, pass examinations on mathematics, geography, and on many other scientific subjects.

I fully understand that it was humiliating to them to be forced to apply so ridiculous a law as that of the present Civil Service Act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that all these commissions based on administrative autonomy, have exactly all the same weak side. I see here amongst my notes that some time ago a member questioned the late Minister of Railways, Mr. Kennedy, about a scandal relating to the Canadian Northern Railway which was managed last year, as all know, by an independent commission. To obtain the required information, the minister met with all kinds of obstructions. However, to comply with the request of the member—whose name I beg to be allowed not to divulge—the hon. Minister of Railways instituted an inquiry, placing the matter in the hands of a group of federal detectives under the supervision of Mr. Page. These detectives, after some clever work, discovered an embezzlement of funds amounting to more than $100,000. This only goes to prove that after all it is always the representative of a riding who is the best judge of what takes place in his own county. It also proves that the principle of governing the country through independent commissions is a false principle. Again I say a member is the best judge of what is going on in his county and these independent commissions are wrong when they inform members who seek for information through the minister, that it is not in the interest of the country to give out the facts. In the case just mentioned, if I am well informed, proposals of reimbursement by the embezzler were made to the government. That goes to show that a member can do something besides drawing his sessional indemnity and giving during twelve months of the year, letters of recommendation, three quarters of which are useless; he would be in a position to save the country hundreds of thousand dollars, if he were not tied down in carrying out his duties by these independent commissions.

Although, Sir, I am willing to give the officials of these commissions credit for their ability, it is not the less true that it is impossible for them to control and supervise their subordinates. They do not know their employees and their various duties, they cannot economically look after the affairs of the country, and, the minister leaves himself open to criticism, each session, by asking unwarranted and entirely ridiculous appropriations as it happened last year. For instance, the Civil Service Commission have under their control the Department of Public Works, at Montreal, so far as salaries above $200 are concerned, if we except the trades people. We now find in the Report of the Auditor General, for the year ending March 31, 1921, volume 3, page 178-V, that a person named A. W. Sullivan, junior engineer in the Department of Public Works, at Montreal, has been so classified that he drew, for the year 1920-21, a salary of $2,040, plus a bonus of $240 and an extra sum of $240 for arrears, making a total of $2,520. Nevertheless, it is admitted that the department does not need his services, because, being a resident of Valleyfield, he practically only appears at the department to draw his salary. Although the Civil Service Act prohibits any employee receiving a salary of more than $1,000 to engage in any other work irrelevant to his civil occupation, this gentleman carries on, in Montreal and Valleyfield, with the knowledge of the Civil Service Commission, a private business totally foreign to his duties. Here is the proof: I hold in my hand a copy of the newspaper Le Progrès, published in Valleyfield, in which we find the name of Mr. Arthur W. Sullivan (successor to J. H. Sullivan) land surveyor and civil engineer, Valleyfield, P.Q., offices at 59 St. Peter Street, Montreal. This goes to show how this commission, from its high pedestal, in the Hunter building, can administer and watch over the interests of the country. It would be much preferable if the members received a more cordial hearing when they have recommendations to make to the commission, but better still, in the interests of the country, that the exclusive privileges of members be admitted.

The Civil Service Commission might possibly be able to tell us what amount they recommended to be paid to a person named Mousseau, so-called inspector of heating installations in the Department of Public Works, at Montreal, an employee who only called at the department to draw his monthly cheque of $115, when no inspections were being carried out. This employee, at the same time that he was drawing a salary of more than $1,000 per year, had, to the knowledge of the Civil Service Commission, a butcher's shop at Ahuntsic, a trade which took up all his time, with the exception of his monthly visits to the department to draw his cheque.

I am convinced, Sir, that none amongst us who have private business to look after would wish to have such a system perpetuated. So far as I am concerned, nothing in the world could induce me to connive at such a state of affairs.

To my mind, it behooves the government to bring on a change in the administration of the country. With this system of independent commissioners, the representatives of the people are but honourable messengers in touch with a receiving and transmitting instrument, which is the Cabinet, and which in turn is powerless and has but to transmit requests and recommend the disposal of public funds at random to unchecked officials which are uncontrollable under the law. I urged before the electors of my county, a return to responsible government, and, I urge it again to-night. In my county I was listened to and understood; I hope to be equally understood here and that my request will be given due consideration. I will admit that a commission may at times be necessary, but only when it is entirely under the jurisdiction of parliament and not when it creates a system of administration obliging the representatives of the people to vote public money blindly. For my part, I refuse to be dragged into the current, dead fish only are swept away by the current and I am not one of them. I protest against my colleagues being considered as parliamentary pedlers promenading through the country, and held responsible for other people's doings.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to abuse the patience of the House, but I think I have sufficiently stated in a few words what I think of these independent commissioners and so long as you have not acceded to the request made last year, to have a parliamentary commission verify the charges which I brought forward and that cannot be contradicted, I shall maintain the same stand. It gives me pleasure, this evening, to support the resolution of my hon. friend, the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), even though the resolution is somewhat of a sweeping nature, however, I believe in applying the hot iron to all evils.

Mr. SHAW moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Unless there is really a desire to have the debate go over I hope my hon. friend will find it possible to continue to-night.

[Mr. Deslauriers.]

Mr. SHAW: I would very gladly indeed accede to the wishes of the Prime Minister, but it is a matter of some importance and I see no objection to the debate going over unless there is some special reason for continuing the discussion to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have no objection to having the debate adjourned, but I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that there is a great demand for economy and the duration of the session is one of the factors in that regard. If we can expedite business we are ready to go on. However, we will not insist if hon. gentlemen opposite wish the debate adjourned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are now half an hour past the regulation hour so long promised by the government before it came into power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Monday, February 19, 1923.

The House met at three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance), moved:

That the name of Mr. Archambault be substituted for that of Mr. Laflamme on the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections.

That the name of Mr. Bouchard be substituted for that of Mr. Provost on the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

That the name of Mr. Michaud be substituted for that of Mr. Robichaud on the select standing committee on Forests, Waterways and Water-powers.

That the name of Mr. Robichaud be subtituted for that of Mr. Michaud on the select standing committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance), moved:

That Messieurs Anderson, Bancroft, Gordon, Putnam, Macdonald (Pictou), Rinfret, Papineau, Wallace and Wilson be appointed to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the Restaurant, as far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Restaurant, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

KITSILANO INDIAN RESERVE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to ask one or two questions of the government, based upon a very important despatch which I see in the press. I must apologize for not having notified the minister, but I think he will be able to answer the question without the usual courtesy of a notice. The despatch is from Victoria and, in part, reads:

> The Vancouver Harbour Board in future will control the Kitsilano Indian reserve, announced Hon. J. D. MacLean, Acting Premier. A telegram was received from Premier Oliver at Ottawa advising acceptance of the sum of $500,000 for the property and the Executive Council ratified the agreement.

And then it says further—I do not wish to read more—that an unstated amount over the half million will go to the Indian fund, the province retaining the customary reversionary rights. I wish to ask the Minister of the Interior: Has the transfer been agreed to as indicated in this despatch; is the sum of $500,000 correctly quoted; what is the amount to go to the Indians, referred to in the despatch; does the arrangement allow to the province its contention for reversionary rights?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil), (Minister of the Interior): That is a very difficult question for one to answer from memory. All the despatch indicates that is new in the matter is that when Mr. Oliver was here I succeeded in getting him to agree to accept $500,000 as the amount claimed by the province in the settlement of this dispute. True, the harbour board are desirous of obtaining the reserve. I have just forgotten the sequence in which this thing runs, but at all events there was an arbitration the terms of which the federal government refused to accept. No price has yet been fixed as the amount that the harbour board would pay for the island. But the $500,000 mentioned in the despatch is the amount that the provincial government, as announced by the premier, would be willing to accept as settlement of their interest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does that mean that they get $500,000 for their alleged reversionary interest?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It does not mean they get anything. That is their own proposal; there has been no acceptance of it.

Mr. STEVENS: Then the despatch is not correct in saying that there has been acceptance of the sum of $500,000 for the property, and ratification of the agreement by the Executive Council.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will try to give the information, but this whole question involves a considerable amount of detail.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps my hon. friend will give it to-morrow—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. STEVENS: —because it is a very important question.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I might say for my hon. friend's information that no further progress has been made with the settlement than that one statement from the provincial government that they would be willing to accept $500,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just to clear up one point that the minister attempted to answer to-day, and which I did not understand: he said that the government had prevailed on Mr. Oliver to accept the $500,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought that was my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If I left that impression on my right hon friend's mind, I did not intend to do so. That was their own suggestion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government have not accepted that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, we have not accepted anything. We are trying to settle it.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 18, respecting The Dominion Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Ryckman.

Bill No. 19, respecting certain patents of Albert Manvers.—Mr. Jacobs.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPHS

Mr. SALES:

1. What is the number of miles of telegraph lines between Fort Qu'Appelle and Humboldt, and between Humboldt and Battleford?
2. What is the number of telegraph stations maintained on these lines?
3. What is the cost of maintenance, exclusive of salaries, of these stations?

4. (a) What is the number of telegraph agents employed on these lines, and (b) the total salaries paid?
5. What is the number of repair men employed on these lines, and what is the amount of the salaries and expenses paid to them?
6. What is the cost of material for repair of said lines?
7. What number of messages were handled by these lines during the last year?
8. Are the said lines serving any territory which cannot be served by telegraph lines along the railways?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Qu'Appelle to Fort Qu'Appelle, pole line 17 miles; wire, 17 miles; Fort Qu'Appelle to South Humboldt, pole line 162 miles, wire 163 miles; South Humboldt to Battleford, pole line 127 miles, wire 171½ miles.

2. East of Battleford 7 offices viz:—Qu'Appelle, Fort Qu'Appelle, Lipton, South Humboldt, Saskatoon, Henrietta and Baljennie.

3. Proportion of general average of outlay (aside from salaries) for all lines and offices in Saskatchewan, $18 per mile (wire): For the section embracing the above 7 offices, $6,327.

4. (a) 7 agent-operators and 1 lineman; (b) $10.980.

5. 2 linemen, 1 at Fort Qu'Appelle, salary $1,476 per annum; and 1 at Saskatoon, salary $1,620 per annum. Outlay for keep of horses, etc., is included in above-mentioned general average.

6. Cost of material used in maintaining the line is included in the above-mentioned general average.

7. 5,762 messages sent.

8. With the exception of Baljennie, the lines of the Canadian Pacific Telegraph and the Canadian National Telegraphs are now serving all points in the territory covered by the above described lines, in consequence of which the above lines and offices east of Baljennie, along with some other sections farther westward in Saskatchewan and in Alberta, are, in pursuance of an Order in Council, P. C. 141, of 30th January, to be discontinued and withdrawn by 31 March next.

YORKTON INCOME TAX OFFICE

Mr. SALES:

1. What is the total cost of the office of Assistant Inspector of Taxation at Yorkton, Saskatchewan?
2. What staff is employed in the said office?
3. What are the salaries paid?
4. What rental is paid for the office?
5. What amount of income tax has been collected by this office, (a) from farmers, and (b) from other persons?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

1. Cost including rent, 1 April, 1922 to 31 January, 1923, $11,756.80.

2. At 31 January, 1923, 8.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

3. Salaries per month: G. H. Bradbrooke, $225; A. V. Laban, $133.33; A. J. Blackwell, $100; H. Hing, $100; G. W. Butt, $100; C. McNair $75; M. I. Lorimer, $75; J. Smith, $50.

4. $720 per year, which includes heating and lighting.

5. (a) None. (b) None.

Yorkton is a sub-district office and not a collection office.

The functions of a sub-district office are to assist taxpayers in the preparation of returns, build up and maintain a tax directory for the territory covered by the sub-office, conduct investigations and perform such other duties as are assigned to it by the Inspector of Taxation for the district.

Mr. DUNCAN MARSHALL

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. Is Duncan Marshall now an official of the Department of Agriculture?
2. If so, since when has he been drawing salary as such and at what rate?
3. Is he the same Duncan Marshall who was several times defeated as Liberal candidate in Dominion Elections?
4. Was he appointed through the Civil Service Commission?
5. If not, how was the appointment made?
6. Has the said Duncan Marshall addressed a number of Liberal political gatherings while drawing salary as an employee of the Dominion government?
7. If so, how many, and where were such gatherings held?
8. Did Duncan Marshall and W. A. Dryden go to Argentine, Chile, or Patagonia or any other South American countries at the expense of the government of Canada as announced in the House of Commons by the Minister of Agriculture on April 3, last?
9. Have the said gentlemen visited Great Britain at the expense of the Government of Canada?
10. Did Mr. Duncan Marshall or Mr. Dryden, while on any such trips purchase stock on their own behalf or on behalf of either of them, and import such stock into Canada?
11. If so, what number of animals were purchased by each of them, what were the breeds of such animals and when were they imported?
12. What is the total amount paid to each of these men by the government of Canada for salary and all expenses up to the present date?
13. Are these men or either of them now in the employ of the government?
14 If not, when did their duties cease?
15. How many pure-bred cattle or horses, sheep or swine have been exported from Canada to South America in the present fiscal year?
16. Have reports been made by either of the said men as to the duties they discharged while drawing salary or expenses from the government?
17. If so, are such reports available to members of the House?
18. What duties has Mr. Duncan Marshall performed that could not have been well discharged by expert officers already in the department?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Duncan Marshall is now an employee of the Department of Agriculture.

2. Since January 15, 1922, at the rate of $6,000 per annum.

3. The records indicate that Duncan Marshall, like many other able gentlemen, was defeated in the general elections of 1921.

4. No.

5. By order in council, P.C. 223 of February 7, 1922. (Under authority of Sec. 38C of the Civil Service Act as amended by C22 of Statutes of 1921).

6. No knowledge of such.

7. Answered by No. 6.

8. W. A. Dryden went to Brazil, Uruguay and the Argentine Republic on a mission for the Department of Agriculture but was not accompanied by any other agent or employee of the department.

9. Mr. Marshall spent some months in Great Britain on government business and, naturally, his expenses were paid by the government.

10. Not to the department's knowledge.

11. Answered by No. 10.

12. Duncan Marshall: Salary, $6,274.19; Expenses, $2,677.89; total $8,952.08. W. A. Dryden: Advance for expenses, $2,000.

13. Mr. Marshall is still in the employment of the government.

14. Mr. Dryden was never an employee of the government. On the mission indicated in the answer to question No. 8 his expenses were paid but he received no salary or other remuneration.

15. None.

16. Mr. Dryden has submitted a report on his observations and findings in connection with his trip to South America and Mr. Marshall has submitted a report on the Agricultural Instruction Act.

17. Both of these reports will be laid on the table of the House but it is not proposed to print either of them.

18. The investigational work conducted by Duncan Marshall in connection with the Agricultural Instruction Act, Dominion Exhibitions, and attendance at various international live stock and dairy conventions could have been performed by expert officers already in the department only by considerable neglect of their present duties. Mr. Marshall's special knowledge of pure-bred live stock and the importation thereof, together with his previous study of and experience with the embargo question marked him out as the one man, with Dr. Grisdale, to act as expert adviser to the Canadian Cabinet representatives at the recent British-Canadian Conference on this important question.

WHEAT SHIPMENTS TO MONTREAL

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is it a fact that in August 1921, eighteen hundred to two thousand cars of wheat remained unloaded for weeks in the Port of Montreal?

2. What is the cost per bushel of transportation of wheat from Port Arthur to Montreal?

3. What does the Montreal Harbour Commission charge per bushel for the transferring of wheat to its elevators?

4. What is its charge per bushel to load the grain on board ship?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. In August 1921 there were at different times in the Montreal terminals and Port of Montreal from one thousand to two thousand cars waiting to be unloaded, but the peak of from eighteen hundred to two thousand cars did not exist for longer than six or seven days.

2. The cost of transportation of wheat from Port Arthur to Montreal at the present time by rail is 34½ cents per 100 pounds or 20·70 cents per bushel.

3. The charge for elevation of wheat from vessels to commissioners' grain elevators is four-tenths of 1 cent per bushel, including storage in the elevator up to 10 days free, and free fire and explosion insurance. In addition there is a charge of $2.75 per thousand bushels for shovelling the grain to the elevator buckets in the vessel's hold. The charge for elevation of wheat ex railway cars is six-tenths of 1 cent per bushel including storage in elevator up to 10 days free, and free fire and explosion insurance. The shovelling in this case is absorbed in the elevation charge.

4. The charge for delivery of grain to ocean steamer over the grain conveyor system or otherwise is four-tenths of 1 cent per bushel.

MISS BARBARA LEE

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

1. When, and in what capacity was Miss Barbara Lee employed at the Immigration Building, St. John (West), New Brunswick?

2. By whom were her services engaged?

3. Was she dismissed? If so, by whom?

4. Was she at any time required to perform services for which she had not been engaged? If so, by whom?

5. Who is in immediate charge of the dining rooms at this immigration building, and is such person in charge as an employee of the government or under contract?

6. Had such person any right to engage or dismiss help?

7. Is the government aware that Miss Lee has for some years given capable service in connection with immigration service dining rooms, and has been driven out of her position by the actions of the person in charge?

8. Does the government propose to restore Miss Lee to her position?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. Nov. 20, 1922. To do general work in the catering department in the Immigration Building, West St. John, N.B.
2. Department of Immigration and Colonization.
3. Yes, by the Department of Immigration and Colonization.
4. No.
5. Mr. J. Byrne, as an employee of the Department of Immigration and Colonization.
6. Yes, upon the approval of the department.
7. No.
8. No.

CONVERSION LOAN

Mr. GOOD:

With respect to the recent Conversion Loan:
1. What was the total amount converted?
2. What was the total cost of the conversion?
3. What was the cost of the advertising in connection therewith?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

1. $114,449,250.

2 and 3. Expenses paid to date, $322,635.46, of which $117,828.29 was for advertising. Charges are practically complete.

TUG MURRAY STEWART

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Has the Department of Marine and Fisheries invited tenders for repairs to the tug Murray Stewart, owned by the Dominion government?
2. If so, what date has been set for closing such tenders?
3. If the date for receiving tenders has expired, what are the names of the parties tendering and the amount of their respective tenders?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.
2. February 8, 1923.
3. P. Payette Co., Penetanguishene, Ont., $4,489; Midland Shipbuilding Co. Ltd., Midland, Ont., $5,862; The Great Lakes Foundry & Machine Co., Midland, Ont., $6,077; Midland Engine Works, Midland, Ont., $8,607.45.

SYDENHAM HOSPITAL SITE

Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

1. Has the government decided to convert Sydenham Hospital site, Kingston, into military headquarters or barracks?
2. If so, what will be the probable cost of such change?

Hon. Mr. COPP: (For the Minister of National Defence): This matter is under consideration, but no decision has so far been arrived at.

[Mr. Baxter.]

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION

MOTION BY MR. GOOD FOR ALTERNATIVE VOTE IN SINGLE-MEMBER CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant) moved:

Whereas the special committee on proportional representation appointed at the last session of the last parliament reported in favour of the adoption of the alternative vote method of election in all single member constituencies when more than two candidates were running for election, and also found much merit in the system of true proportional representation;

And whereas the last general election has fully demonstrated the many serious anomalies of the existing electoral system;

And whereas this matter was debated at the last session of the present parliament but did not reach a vote;

And whereas the government has promised to submit a Redistribution bill during the present session;

And whereas it is important that any desirable electoral reforms be adopted in conjunction with Redistribution;

Therefore be it Resolved,—

That in the opinion of this House the alternative vote method should be adopted for use in future elections for this House in all single member constituencies where more than two candidates are running for election.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last year when I brought this matter to the attention of the House I included both of the proposals for electoral reform in a single resolution. I think that a mistake was made in so doing, a mistake into which I fell, I presume, because the two questions had both been referred to a committee in the preceding parliament (1921) and were both investigated and reported on by that committee. This year, however, I am submitting the matter in two distinct resolutions. The first proposal was unanimously recommended by the parliamentary committee of 1921, and no objection was raised to it in the course of the debate last year. I take it, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that we might dispose of this resolution without further debate, and proceed to the consideration of proportional representation upon which I presume there is a greater difference of opinion.

However, before putting the question I deem it advisable—in view of the fact that there may be some here who were not in the House last year when the matter was discussed and have not read the debate in Hansard—to explain very briefly the meaning of the expression "the alternative vote method". But before doing that let me point out, as I did last year, something of the need for this reform. In the Ontario elections of 1919, out of 111 contests there were 74 three-, four-, or five-cornered contests. In the Dominion elections of 1921 out of 235 contests there were 140 three-, four-, or five-cornered contests. I have not the figures as to the number of three-, four-, or five-cornered contests in the last British elections in 1922, but 178 were elected by a minority vote.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having thus pointed out very briefly the needs of the situation may I explain three points in connection with the system itself.

First, as to the ballot. The ballot under the new method would be identical with the ballot that we are accustomed to use at the present time. Second, with respect to the duties of the elector. Instead of placing a cross opposite the name of the candidate whom the elector wishes to vote for, the elector places the figure 1 opposite his first choice, the figure 2 opposite his second choice—if he so desires—the figure 3 opposite his third choice, and so on to any extent to which he may desire to go. In case of three candidates running it would be sufficient, of course, for any elector to mark on the ballot paper his first and second choices, to mark them by the figures 1 and 2. In the case of four candidates, he would be invited to place the figures 1, 2 and 3 opposite his first, second and third choices.

In the third place, in respect to the count. The candidate who has the lowest number of votes is declared out of the running, and his votes are distributed among the remaining candidates according to the preferences expressed thereon by the elector. The process is simplicity itself, and the result is that we are quite sure that every candidate who is elected is chosen by a clear majority over all.

Mr. HOCKEN: May I ask whether, in the event of an elector only marking his first choice, that would be a good ballot?

Mr. GOOD: Yes, I intended to mention that point. In answer to the hon. gentleman from West Toronto I may say that if an elector marks nothing on the ballot, of course the ballot is useless; but if the elector marks his first choice, either with the figure 1 or with an X, that ballot is perfectly good and it operates as our ballot does at the present time. But the elector's wishes in that event are impossible to discover in case his first choice comes lowest in the first count, or should be eliminated later in the count. The elector is, therefore, requested to put the figure 1 opposite his first choice, and he is invited, if he has any preferences, to express them on the ballot paper. If he does not choose to exercise the right which he has, then, of course, we cannot help it, he simply does what he does now; but the new method of voting permits the elector to express his preferences beyond merely voting for one candidate.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that as there was no objection raised to this particular reform last year, and as I have not heard any objection, it is needless to spend further time upon the resolution at present, and we might have the question put.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask whether the government has any policy upon this question?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The motion having been brought forward by a private member and not by the ministry, any member of the government is free to vote as he pleases on the subject. For myself I intend to vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Good). I may say that when this matter was debated last session the Prime Minister expressed his views upon it, giving his assurance of support of the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Motion agreed to.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION IN MULTI-MEMBER CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant), moved:

Whereas the special committee on proportional representation appointed at the last session of the last parliament reported in favour of the adoption of the alternative vote method of election in all single member constituencies when more than two candidates were running for election, and also found much merit in the system of true proportional representation

And whereas the last general election has fully demonstrated the many serious anomalies of the existing electoral system;

And whereas this matter was debated at the last session of the present parliament but did not reach a vote;

And whereas the government has promised to submit a redistribution bill during the present session;

And whereas it is important that any desirable electoral reforms be adopted in conjunction with redistribution;

Therefore be it resolved,—

That in the opinion of this House, for the purpose of demonstrating the working and effects of the system of true proportional representation, one or more multi-member constituencies should be constituted by the redistribution legislation in which that system should be applied at the next general election.

He said: May I be permitted for a very few minutes to give a resumé of the case I presented last year, in view of the fact that there may be some members present now who have not read the debates in Hansard and who were not here last year?

I traced last year, first the history of the attention which had been given to this subject by this parliament from the time when the late Hon. Mr. Monk introduced it on the 15th March, 1909, up to the the time at which I spoke, covering a number of cases when this matter was submitted to and debated by this House and action taken thereon. Without mentioning all of the cases which I mentioned last year, I would like to draw attention to the fact that in 1921 a committee was appointed to consider this matter, which committee reported quite late in the session of 1921, too late for anything to be done during that session.

Now, as the House has already adopted the first recommendation of that committee, I wish to deal with the other question presented to it. I pointed out last year that, having adopted the alternative vote method, we would not necessarily get very far towards a true representation, and I instanced a number of cases under the old system which showed how difficult it was either with the voting method we have followed in the past, or with the alternative vote method, to secure a true representation. May I briefly enumerate the cases which I presented to the House last year in that connection? They were: Nova Scotia federal election of 1904; British Columbia federal election of 1911; Dominion federal election of 1896; Manitoba provincial election of 1914; Dominion federal election of 1908; Dominion federal election of 1911; British elections of 1918; Transvaal elections of 1914; Ontario provincial elections of 1919; Alberta election of 1921; New York aldermanic elections of 1921.

I then proceeded to make a somewhat exhaustive analysis of the last Canadian general election and gave a very large number of facts in that connection. Next I pointed out—illustrating this point by referring to the Canadian federal elections of 1908 and 1911—the way in which the pendulum swung from one extreme to another, with a very small change in popular vote; and in that connection I pointed out that in 1911 a majority of 47 representatives could have been wiped out by a change in the popular vote of less than 3,000. So there is a great deal to support the statement that under the old system the result of our elections was pretty much of a political gamble. I pointed out, next, the very remarkable accuracy in representation which occurs under the system of proportional voting, referring in that connection to the Tasmanian elections of 1909, 1912, 1916 and 1919; the Belgian elections of 1908; the Finland elections of 1909; the New South Wales' elections of 1920; and the Winnipeg elections of 1920.

I dealt next with the growth of the sentiment in favour of proportional representation throughout the world, referring to a number of places and countries which had adopted this newer system of representation. Among these I may again mention the following: New South Wales—and in that connection I may say that Queensland and Victoria have adopted the alternative vote,—Tasmania; New Zealand; South Africa (for the Senate); England (for the university constituencies); Scotland (for the school board); Ireland; India (the alternative vote); some cities in the United States; Switzerland; Belgium; Bulgaria; Sweden; Finland; Norway (optional for municipal elections); Germany; Austria. Moreover Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Italy and France have adopted half-measures of proportional representation. In addition I pointed out that a number of Canadian cities had adopted this system, among them the following: Winnipeg, Vancouver, Calgary, Regina, Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, and so on.

I referred next to the report of the committee appointed by the Ontario legislature about three years ago, which reported two years ago. And lastly I considered a number of advantages and disadvantages, or advantages of and objections, to proportional representation First, I discussed the idea of majority representation as against proportional representation. In the second place I showed the security of tenure of office of outstanding men which is obtained by this better system of representation. Third, I showed that the claim that proportional representation will necessarily lead to small majorities in legislative bodies cannot be substantiated, and I examined a number of cases to prove that point, namely, British Columbia, New South Wales, Australia and New Zealand. I examined, in the fourth place, the charge that proportional representation encourages the formation of groups, and I think I showed pretty conclusively that that charge could not be substantiated. In the fifth place, I pointed out that proportional representation makes impossible or difficult the spoils system. In the sixth place, I examined the allegation that proportional representation is un-British. In the seventh place, I discussed the supposed difficulties of holding by-elections under proportional representation. In the eighth place, I dealt with the alleged difficulty in canvassing large constituencies. In the ninth place, I discussed the effect of proportional representation on the power of a small minority of floating or purchasable voters. And, in the last place, I discussed the question of the difficulty of operating this system in large, sparsely settled areas.

That, Mr. Speaker, in brief, is the case which I presented last year. I want to discuss now just for a very short time one or two objections that were raised last year, and which, owing to the adjournment of the debate, I had not the opportunity of dealing with on that occasion.

I wish to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) last year, which are found in Hansard at pages 1651 and 1652. In answer to a question of mine the hon. member for South Vancouver to-day, spoke as follows:

> Unfortunately I did not hear the hon. member—

Referring to myself.

> But I have had the advantage of reading Lord Bryce's "Modern Democracies" in which that aspect of the question is very ably dealt with.

A little further on, in answer to another question of mine, the hon. member said:

> If the hon. gentleman puts it that way, I may tell him that I heard very little of what he said, and if I had heard it I do not think my view would be changed by the hon. gentleman's argument, having read the words of Lord Bryce and a number of other constitutional authorities for the past fifteen years.

The inference from these remarks is that the late Lord Bryce was opposed to proportional representation. I want simply to point out that Lord Bryce was a vice-president of the British Proportional Representation Society, and I wish to read at this point—

Mr. LADNER: Has the hon. gentleman read through my speech of last year? I do not say that Lord Bryce is an exponent against proportional representation; but I say that he gives such an analysis of the federal systems of government that it is impossible for a person studying those systems to apply in practical politics and statesmanship the principles underlying proportional representation. I do not suppose my hon. friend intends to distort my speech; but that is what he is doing. He is leaving the inference that something which I stated to the House last year is not correct. If my hon. friend will read through my remarks, he will see that in the application of the principle of proportional representation to our federal system, there is a difficulty which he has yet to overcome, and so far, in his speeches of this year and last year, he has not overcome it.

Mr. GOOD: I am very sorry if I misunderstood the hon. member last year. I certainly heard all his address last year, and I think I read it all again this year in Hansard. But it is possible that I misunderstood the hon. gentleman, and I am very glad to hear him state now that Lord Bryce did not oppose proportional representation. Since the matter was raised last year and since I was afraid that a wrong impression had been given as to Lord Bryce's position, I wished to read some remarks which Lord Bryce made in a debate on the Representation of the People Bill in the House of Lords in England, on 22 January, 1918:

> My noble friend, Lord Harcourt, poured some scorn upon the whole plan of proportional representation as if it was a fad confined to certain persons in this country. It is the fact that over nearly all the free countries at this moment men's minds are very much exercised upon this question of proportional representation. There is hardly any considerable country popularly governed which has not been confronted with the very same difficulty which proportional representation is meant to meet as we are trying to grapple with here. The experiment is being tried in an additional number of countries almost every year. New Zealand has just adopted it. I was in Tasmania a few years ago and I can tell my noble friend Lord Harcourt that the opinion of Tasmania was in favour of the plan which has been adopted, and that I did not hear of any desire to depart from it. The same thing is true about other countries which I will not enumerate. And the reason is this, that conditions have changed. My noble friend quoted the opinion of Lord Beaconsfield, Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Bright. It is thirty-eight years since Lord Beaconsfield died. Our politics and our party system have changed completely. We have now got three or four parties and we cannot tell whether the process of dividing up parties, which has gone so far in some countries, may not fall upon us also. Under conditions so different it has surely become desirable to find new expedients for meeting the evils which have arisen. I think these considerations justify my noble friend in the proposal he has made, a proposal which of course is capable of modification, which need not be extended to that amplitude which he indicated, but which can well be adopted in more modest form, and which, I think, in one form or another, well deserves to be tried.

Just in that connection I may say that after investigating this whole question in 1909 and 1910, the British parliament appointed a Speaker's Conference in 1916, which reported in 1917. Lord Bryce was a member of that committee, and I might here refer briefly to the recommendations made by that Speaker's Conference in Great Britain in 1917. They are as follows:

> A parliamentary borough which may be entitled on a basis of population to return three or more members shall be a single constituency; provided that a constituency entitled to return more than five members shall be divided into two or more constituencies, each returning not less than three, nor more than five members. The election in any such constituency shall be held on the principle of proportional representation and each elector shall have one transferable vote.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the recommendation with respect to proportional representation. At the same time, with reference to those constituencies which would not be thus grouped, the conference made this recommendation:

> At any election in a single member constituency where there are more than two candidates, the election shall be held on the system of voting known as the alternative vote.

So I think we may conclude that Lord Bryce was distinctly in favour, not only of the alternative vote, but of proprotional representation, and I do not know of any man who was better qualified to express an opinion on a question of that sort than the late Lord Bryce.

I should like also, to refer to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in the debate of last year on this subject. His remarks will be found on page 1655 of Hansard. He said:

> In a word, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in entire sympathy with the resolution, and, so far as an individual member has voice in the House, would like to express myself as supporting it as it stands. In this matter, the government would wish to be governed by the opinion of the House, and if the House approves the resolution the government will do all in its power to give effect to it as opportunity affords.

Answering a question asked at that time by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the Prime Minister said:

> I confess that as I study the question more and more, it is my view that instead of adding to the number of groups in the House, the adoption of what is proposed here might tend to limit the groups.

And so on. I should like also to refer, just in passing, to a remark which the Prime Minister made the other day when he was introducing the Redistribution bill. He spoke about the bitterness that was aroused one or two decades ago in connection with the process of gerrymandering. I would suggest that there is no possibility of gerrymandering being effective under proportional representation, and that is a consideration which, I think, we ought to bear in mind.

I have not much more to add at this time. No doubt a good many objections will be raised, and I shall have an opportunity of replying a little later on. But there is some additional information which we have now, which we did not have when this matter was debated last May. I would just briefly call the attention of the House to some of the information which we have received since that time. In the first place, I would point to the adoption of proportional representation in Edmonton on 11th December last by a vote of 5,664 to 3,075. The Edmonton Journal of the next day, December 12, comments on the election as follows:

> Proportional representation was not defeated yesterday in a single polling sub-division and received the approval of the citizens by practically a two to one vote.
> It seldom happens that a political reform is so emphatically endorsed when first submitted. Those who have watched its operation elsewhere can have no doubt that it will realize all that is hoped for from it in the improvement of the character of our city government.

I might also quote from the Calgary Herald, which extended greetings to the city of Edmonton in these terms:

By a decided majority Edmonton has voted for the proportional representation system of conducting municipal election. Edmonton is the last of the cities of first class importance in the West to decide to employ that system. Calgary's experience with it has been so satisfactory that we are in no doubt of the success of it in Edmonton and we can indeed congratulate our northern neighbour on joining the cities that have adopted the system which best reproduces the political preferences of the voters.

Next, I would refer to the last British elections. I do not wish to burden the House with all the figures that I have here, but I may give some examples that go to show the extraordinary unfairness of the results in Great Britain last year. The Conservative party won 296 seats. In proportion to its voting strength it should have won only 208. The labour and co-operative forces won 138; they were entitled to 164. The Liberals won 54, although they were entitled to 101; while the National Liberals, who won 51, were entitled to 61. Independents and others won 8 seats, but they were entitled to 13. In this connection, let me quote from the late Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Lloyd George:

The result of the elections has fully justified those who maintained that no party standing alone could hope to secure the measure of public support which will guarantee stable government. It is true that the Conservatives have succeeded in obtaining the return of a majority of the members to the new parliament, but the most notable feature of the elections is the return of a decisive majority of members by a very definite minority of electors.

I observe that the Prime Minister, in returning thanks to the nation, claims that he has received a vote of confidence from the people of this country. Out of a total of 15,000,000 his candidates secured fewer than 3,000,000 votes. Making full allowances for uncontested seats, this figure cannot be stretched out to a height much above 6,000,000. That means that only two-fifths of the electorate voted confidence in the administration, while three-fifths voted confidence in other leaders of groups. A minority of 3,000,000 in the national referendum could hardly be claimed as a vote of confidence.

I do not wish to quote all that Mr. Lloyd George says, but towards the end of this extract, I read:

Of one thing I am, however, certain. That is that a minority administration in 1922 and onward will help to discredit the government with certain classes of the community. A minority administration will weaken the respect of other classes for representative government, and between them, an atmosphere will be created inimical to the moral authority of all government in this country.

I therefore earnestly trust that in the interest of stability and good government, which must be based on the good will and co-operation of the community as a whole, this Parliament will apply its mind seriously to finding some means of preventing a repetition, either in one direction or the other, of this freak of representative government.

[Mr. Good.]

Next, I shall refer very briefly to the second trial of proportional representation in the city of Winnipeg last summer. I have here an article that appeared in the August 2 issue of Canadian Finance, a magazine which is not especially given to propagating the Farmers' platform, or the Progressive policy. In the course of this article the writer states:

There are a number of general criticisms against P. R. which should be either admitted or denied by supporters of P. R. They include the following:

(1) P. R. is too complicated. People will refrain from voting under it.

(2) There will be a heavy percentage of spoilt ballots under it.

(3) The counting takes too long.

(4) The voter cannot understand what happens to his vote.

(5) P. R. breaks up the party system and leads to group government.

(6) It is not a perfect system.

(7) It does away with government by the majority or tends to create governments with small majorities.

This article goes on to examine each of these criticisms against proportional representation. Let me read one or two of its answers to these criticisms:

The reply to the statement that people will refrain from voting under P. R. because it is so complicated is effectively given by the recent Winnipeg elections, when 45,000 persons voted out of a total of 61,736 persons entitled to vote, a higher percentage than was usual under the old system, and this despite the fact that the ballot paper contained 43 names and was 22 inches long. The next objection regarding large numbers of spoilt ballots is also shattered by actual facts. In the recent election at Winnipeg spoilt ballots were less than 2 per cent of the total votes, a percentage which compares favourably with the results obtained under the old system. The assertion that P. R. leads to group government is without foundation. Ontario has group government, but they do not have P. R. there. The Dominion government is without a majority in the House—

This, of course, was written last summer—

—but they have no P. R. elections under the Dominion Elections Act. The Farmer party in Manitoba is a minority party at the present time, mainly as a result of the vote in the rural districts, where P. R. is not in force.

I do not wish to weary the House with any further quoting of these answers, but I submit that the various criticisms that have been levelled against proportional representation can all be, and in my judgment, have been, very effectively answered. Of course, one must admit very frankly that it might break down in operation if those who are responsible for counting the ballots do not know how to count them, or if the voters do not take the trouble to read the instructions and to vote according to those instructions. But our experience has shown that these difficulties are no more under this system than the same difficulties under the present system.

4 p.m.

The allegation has been made that proportional representation is un-British. I happened to hear this statement at a meeting of the Social Service Council of Canada a short time ago in the Chateau Laurier, and Mr. Gisborne, who was Parliamentary Counsel for many years, combatted the idea very definitely and emphatically on that occasion. I fancy the evidence which I have already given as to the action being taken in Great Britain, and the fact that the Australasian countries are generally committed to this reform, constitute a pretty effective rejoinder to that criticism. I have here a certified copy of an interview that took place in Saskatoon not long ago. The date of the letter enclosing the certified copy is December 4. I read as follows:

"The proportional representation single transferable vote has undoubtedly proved a great success in Saskatoon," says Mr. M. C. Tomlinson, city clerk. "First it has stimulated greater interest in the election. Last year there was practically 5,000 votes polled, while the highest number at any previous election was 3,000.

Secondly, it was found that there were fewer spoiled ballots under this system than under the old.

Prior to the election last year we heard on all sides that numerous ballots would be spoiled by the voters, chiefly due to the western cities having a large foreign population.

This was not the case. The percentage of rejected ballot papers under the P.R. system was actually lower than was the case with the X-marked ballot, when voters were called upon to mark their ballot papers for more than one candidate. This would lead one to believe that the P.R. system is easier for the elector than the old.

Although this was the city's first election under the P.R. system, the carrying out of the voters' wishes as expressed on the ballots proved to be a very simple process.

The new system has won favour with the city council, the press, and the public. There are a few objectors, of course, but they are very few."

I have here a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the British Proportional Representation Society, Mr. Humphreys, to the secretary of the Canadian society, in which he says in part:

P.R. has never been so much discussed in England as it has since our recent general election.

I do not know that at the present juncture I should say anything further. I should be very glad indeed to hear any further objections that can be made to the proportional representation system, and I shall do my best to meet those objections when my turn comes.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member who proposes this motion has taken a great deal of interest in the subject and is thoroughly informed with regard to it. I wish to put to him a few questions concerning phases of the subject with which he did not deal, at least so far as I could hear him.

The first question is: Does the hon. member not distinguish between municipal government and its operations, on the one hand, and the federal system of government, or government by majority rule and cabinet responsibility, on the other hand? The second question is: Does he consider that the application of proportional representation to our system of government will have the effect of dissipating cabinet unity and cabinet responsibility to the House?
