This will give hon. members some appreciation of the magnitude of the role undertaken by Canada in the air, both abroad and at home. To appreciate just what is involved in this in terms of money, I can tell hon. members that to equip, to train, to transport and to maintain overseas for one year the original Canadian infantry brigade of 6,000 men the approximate cost was $60 million.

We also have overseas the first Canadian air division of the Royal Canadian Air Force, with 12 squadrons of Sabre fighters. To do a corresponding operation for them—that is, train, equip, transport overseas and maintain them for a year—costs $600 million, or ten times as much as for the Canadian infantry brigade.

If hon. members will look at the white paper they will see tables showing the proportion of the defence dollar spent, according to the different services. This information appears at page 56. It shows that for 1954-55 the navy would have 15·7 per cent, the army 23·6 and the air force 41·4, the balance of the defence dollar being spent on mutual aid, defence research and other purposes. Of the 80 per cent of the total defence dollar spent on the navy, the army and the air force, the air force is getting 52 per cent—a much higher proportion, very much higher, than in any country of the world. And this has been our policy, because we are a rich country, a country with great resources and with traditions of service in the air, as well as with the necessity for defending our country against air attack, and also a country with limited resources of manpower.

This plan we are working on is the deliberate policy started immediately after the close of the second world war, but accelerated greatly in 1950 when the new and expanded plan came into effect.

The effect of the figures I have just given on defence spending must be obvious instantly to hon. members. If we are to maintain our air force at about its present and planned strength, in terms of quantity and quality, it will require an expenditure of from $420 million to $460 million a year on aircraft alone. This means that 25 per cent of the defence dollar would be spent on aircraft, and that would leave 75 per cent for personnel, construction, equipment, operation and maintenance.

Of the $2 billion sought this year, $426 million will be needed for personnel costs, that is, the equivalent of civilian wages, $184 million for construction and $851 million for equipment of which, as I have indicated, half will be for aircraft. And for operations and maintenance the amount is $546 million.

So that it is all very well to talk about having "a new look" and facing "the long pull"; but "the long pull" and the "new look" are not going to result in very much in the way of economies or changes or savings or reductions, if we are to maintain our defence at its present strength and carry out our commitments. And the same is true of every country. So that when at the end of a three-year period the North Atlantic treaty nations have examined the results of their experience during those three years of rapid expansion and build-up, I feel sure that each one of them will reach the same conclusion we have—because it is inescapable—and that is that we cannot continue to expand indefinitely. Even to maintain our forces at their present quality and quantity will take about the same amount of money we have spent during the period of expansion.

It must be realized that apart from construction—and we are well advanced in our construction work—there really is not anything in defence which is of a capital character. Every item of equipment ultimately becomes obsolete and must be replaced. In the case of aircraft, apart from transport aircraft and similar types, certainly all fighters and bombers are—as is said so often—obsolescent before the first one comes off the main production line. This is so in the sense that there is on a drawing board somewhere an aircraft which is going to be better—so much better that it will pay countries to bring it into production.

I do not wish to delay hon. members much longer, but there are one or two general observations I would like to make about the services by way of summarizing the figures and facts given in the white paper. In the Royal Canadian Navy we have had under construction about 88 ships, practically all of them of quite new types. Like other countries we have not been able to complete construction in all cases in the time planned. I think the record with the new anti-submarine destroyer escorts is creditable, when it is considered that these are ships of an entirely new design, and of extraordinary performance and complexity. We are I think at least level with, if not ahead of, other countries in the production of these ships; and our time of bringing the ships into commission from the time the keels were first laid down will, I believe, be shorter than the time for similar ships in other countries that are undertaking similar types of construction.

At the present time we have 58 ships in commission, of which 36 are committed to NATO. We have over 100 ships today either in commission or in reserve ready for use in the event of war. Those in reserve, of course, would have to be commissioned and manned. But that is carrying out our undertaking as given to NATO, right up to date.

As hon. members know there is still the army brigade group in Korea. This is the fourth group to be there. Altogether some 32,000 Canadians have served in Korea, in the Far East, and one out of five members of the armed forces today wears proudly on his breast the ribbons of service in the Far East during the Korean war—one out of five.

We have the first Canadian infantry brigade in its new quarters in the neighbourhood of Soest, in four magnificent camps. That, by any standard, is a fine formation.

It may interest hon. members to know that in the first Canadian infantry brigade 27 per cent are veterans of Korea, 35 per cent are veterans of the second world war, 16 per cent are trained and qualified paratroopers—although of course this is not a paratroop formation—and 40 per cent are married.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Claxton: I do not observe any cause for levity in that; I think it is a very fine percentage. The reason I mention the figure, if hon. members would only be patient, is to indicate something of the problems that have to be faced by having over 20,000 troops abroad in seven different countries all the time. We have to provide in Europe, at nine different locations, villages for Canadian wives and children and service personnel, and they are not small villages, they are not poor villages. They must have married quarters, schools run according to Canadian standards, equipped with Canadian equipment and staffed by Canadian teachers recruited through the co-operation of the provinces. They must have chapels, gymnasiums, recreation centres, rinks, and also they must have stores.

All this construction at the different centres in Germany will be completed by the autumn of this year. When they are completed, with one single exception, we shall have overseas in Germany and France the finest living accommodation and other services for members of the armed forces and their wives and children that we shall have anywhere or that I believe could be found anywhere in the world. This will enable us to guarantee to married personnel that they can have a home abroad for their wives and children just as in Canada. If you consider it for a moment, that is the only way it should be, and that is the way it is going to be.

So far we have carried out rotation in Korea and Germany exactly as planned, and we intend to continue to do so, but to do it will require very considerable numbers of forces in Canada. Altogether, to provide for the brigade in Korea, the brigade in Germany and mobile striking forces and units for rotation forces with the forces necessary to make up a first Canadian infantry brigade, it will take a total of 15 infantry regiments. Those regiments now exist and they are well up to strength. They are well officered and well manned.

Hon. members have been interested in the study being made of the reserve army, and I propose to deal with that when we come to the item on the reserve in the detailed estimates. It is also proposed at that time to deal with a lot of other points which could more conveniently be dealt with at that time.

With regard to the R.C.A.F., I think I have described the situation so that you can see the picture. I should like to say a word about the F-86E and the CF-100. The F-86E is now being equipped with Orenda engines. Those provide at least 25 per cent more power than the F-86E equipped as formerly with the General Electric engines and are I believe by all odds the most powerful and effective aircraft in quantity production and in use by a number of squadrons in any country today; but they in time will be replaced by a new supersonic fighter. The CF-100 is now being produced in quantity in the mark 4 and it is being shipped to squadrons. They are being equipped and trained, and this has proven capable of meeting all our requirements.

Altogether we now have in the armed forces about 113,000 officers and men. The planned target was 120,000. We hope to secure that target shortly. If we do not, it is no particular cause for concern because we are at a very high proportion of our planned establishment. Most countries in peacetime do not go above 75 per cent of their planned establishments. We are well above that; and this last year we took into the armed forces about 25,000 officers and men, a very considerable proportion of the equivalent in terms of the 19-year-old age group in the total male population.

Some reference was made yesterday or the day before to our concern about wastage and re-engagement. The rate of re-engagement is satisfactory in Canada. It is more than twice as high as in the United States and much higher than in Britain. That is for equivalent personnel, voluntarily enlisted personnel. In the United States last year, one-third of the entire strength of the United States armed forces were separated from the forces last year. In Canada the equivalent figure was about one-seventh. We want to maintain our rates of re-engagement; we want to increase it if we can, but to say that it is a grave problem is a gross exaggeration. Relative to other countries we are in a singularly happy position. We would like to see it still better, because if we lose a man who has been trained, then of course we have to expend time and money in the training of a new one. However, there is one compensation. If a man leaves the forces after he has been trained, he remains potentially available as a fighter who can be retrained and brought to action much more speedily than a man who has had no training at all.

There are two further points I should mention about this as we approach our planned target strength for the navy, army and air force. The first is that wastage comes closer and closer to the intake until, when you get your full planned target strength of let us say 120,000—though this is subject to change; it may be increased a bit—there should be a balance. If 15,000 of the men leave the armed forces in one year we only need 15,000 to join, so that wastage matches the intake and the intake the wastage. That is the ideal situation to which one should strive and there is no doubt that we shall be there very shortly.

But there is another result when you get close to your planned target strength, and that is that your requirements for manpower become quite difficult to meet from the point of view of selection. You need only, let us say, aircrew or tradesmen of a certain class and qualification, so that you must limit your recruiting to the men who can meet the requirements of the particular classes in which there are or are going to be vacancies. That makes planning very much more difficult. We are, generally speaking, not at that point yet and perhaps we may not reach it during the calendar year.

I should say that the commitments we have made towards the build-up of the NATO forces in peacetime have so far been met on or in advance of the planned date. We have formed and furnished all the units that we have agreed to do. We shall be adding to the number of aircraft in each squadron and also we shall be putting in some additional supporting activities for the air division in Europe. We shall also, beyond any question, be increasing our contribution and our work on continental defence.

To do anything additional in the way of continental defence it will be necessary for us to meet the additional cost, and the additional manpower requirements out of what we have today, or else seek increased defence appropriations. I do not think anyone in this country wants to see any increase in defence appropriation. I should like to see a decrease, and it may be that by a further shaving here and there we will be able to do these additional jobs without any increase in appropriation or manpower. Certainly that is what I am insisting upon in our planning and in our program and I believe it can be carried out because of increased efficiency due to the fact that we have a higher proportion of officers and men in the armed forces using the new equipment which has been acquired for them.

In the three-year period we have not done everything we set out to do. No country has or could do that, but we have done substantially what we set out to do, and one of the extraordinary things is that the amount expended is so close to the amount originally planned. The amount originally planned was, as announced on February 5, 1951, $5 billion. The expression was, "about a $5 billion program" and the actual cash disbursements over the three-year period have been $5,005,-479,000. But we have not got all that we planned for that expenditure. We have not all the ships, the construction, and the other types of equipment for which we planned, but we have done much more than four-fifths of what was planned three years ago for the estimated figure.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say, first, that I do not believe we are going to have a war in the near future, but equally I do not see any sign of a change in the long-term objectives of the Soviet union.

Secondly, the planned build-up of strength of the free nations has been a major factor in preserving peace, and consequently it is only common sense that we should continue that effort for precisely the same reasons that five years ago led us to agree in common on this policy and plan.

Thirdly, we are nearing the end of the development of large classes of weapons. It is very hard today to build a gun better than the 25-pounder, or the 155 millimeter. The cost of any improvement in range or operational qualities is out of all proportion to the advantage gained in performance, and that is true of a very large range of weapons. We are entering into the era at last where there are already in operation guided missiles from ground to air and air to air, and their accuracy and efficiency will be increased. We may also be coming close to the time when the pilot of a fighter aircraft will not have much more to do than get the aircraft off and back on to the ground, so that by the time we have our supersonic fighters to replace the F-86E and the CF-100 it is at least possible that these will be the last aircraft to depend extensively on human beings, and we will then be in or very close to the age of the pushbutton. It has been a long time coming and it is still some distance off.

But we will never eliminate the human factor and that brings me to this point, that while the allies have made great advances, everything we know points to the fact that the Russians also have made great advances and we have no reason to believe that we can continue to be superior in science, research, engineering and production unless we continue to make even larger efforts in the field of research, development and production.

As we get into—to use a curious term—the very sophisticated types of weapons and aircraft, the cost increase is out of all proportion so that we must, while maintaining this effort, strive steadily for simplification, economy, efficiency, and standardization. When you get into the field of bombers, fighters, guided missiles, radar, anti-aircraft devices and the like your equipment is no good if the enemy has something which is even slightly better. Consequently, as I say, we must keep up the effort in research, development, engineering, and production, and strive steadily for economy.

Fourth, we will certainly see a build-up in continental defence as the importance of this increases with the necessity of protecting the ability of the strategic air command of the United States to deliver the A and H-bombs, that ability being an essential ingredient in the capacity for massive retaliation.

Fifth, the economic and financial considerations involved in defence planning today are going to become steadily more important. Not that they have not been important throughout, but a steady drive must be kept up and maintained to achieve the greatest possible economy in terms of men and money. This means that in our planning we cannot afford to make mistakes, because if you start out to develop a new aircraft you may be in for an expenditure of $125 million before you have a second aircraft off the line. Consequently, everything must be done having regard to the long term effort, and it must be done in the closest possible co-operation with our allies, particularly Britain and the United States. There I am happy to say that we have the closest working co-operation, not only with those two countries but with every country in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Sixth, and this is perhaps the most important of all, in defence operation, possibly more than in any other operation mankind has to undertake, that operation must depend on the quality of the personnel, the quality of the leadership, and the quality of the men. We have been fortunate in having officers and men of good quality, but with the increasing complexity of weapons, the necessity for insisting on a high standard and getting it becomes even more urgent and important than ever before. So as we face the challenges of "the long pull," not the least important of these challenges is to find ways and means of maintaining the alertness, the professional skills, ambitions, and physical and mental abilities of the officers and men in our armed forces.

This becomes, as has been found in the United States where special studies have been made of it, a matter of their continuing to have the confidence and the respect of the civilian population. This is a matter of the utmost importance if we are to maintain the strength of our armed forces; and that is something to which I believe they are entitled, by their records of service and by their records as civilians, judged by any standard you like. Their crime records are considerably lower than those for corresponding groups in civilian life; and that is as it should be.

Seventh and finally, this whole operation of facing the "long pull" under the threat of a war of total destruction requires stout hearts and a really great degree of understanding on the part of the civilian people. The Canadian Unionist published by the Canadian Congress of Labour in April, 1954 had this to say apropos of the H-bomb:

> The task of the individual, in spite of the threat of world destruction is, in Carlyle's words, "to do the task which lies nearest to hand," and, in the present circumstances, this means that we must simply do our work as well as we can, and let it go at that. We must try to be guided by the lessons of experience and the dictates of reason.

If we apply that statement to the national and defence fields, it is obvious that there is no ground for despair or discouragement or for doing nothing. It is obvious that we must continue to follow what we and the other nations have agreed is the right course in order to preserve peace and to maintain our security. But the A-bomb and the H-bomb force the nations of the world to try to find means of ensuring that they will never be used. It has been said that war is a failure in foreign policy; and foreign policy—understanding between nations—has become of greater importance and greater urgency than ever before in the history of mankind. From time to time specific problems occupy the international stage, as we have seen at Geneva over Indo-China. This crisis or that fills the headlines and the newscasts but no particular crisis should outweigh the preservation of the great alliance of the free world which is the fundamental bulwark of our own security.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, at the outset may I say that the official opposition will agree to the proposal made by the minister, namely, that after the general discussion on this department we shall proceed, as has been done in former years, to the discussion of the various details as shown on page 287 and the pages following, on the assumption that we take the main headings in each case, not every line of the details.

Mr. Claxton: That is agreed.

Mr. Pearkes: That will be a perfectly satisfactory way of proceeding.

I appreciate the minister's comprehensive background statement and review of the international situation which he said at the commencement it was his intention to give to us in order that we might see the defence viewpoint. He has dealt with a great many of the different problems. The statement he has made, coupled with the document "Canada's Defence Program", consisting of some 58 pages, copies of which were issued to us a couple of days ago, make it rather difficult to condense a reply into a comparatively few minutes. However, I made such notes as I was able to make during the minister's speech and I shall endeavour to follow the general broad lines upon which he presented this subject. Again I repeat that I think the committee will appreciate the time the minister has taken to give us this review and to make us aware of the difficulties which face his department. I am fully conscious of many of those difficulties. The magnitude of the problem has perhaps been driven home to us today by the astronomical figures announced by the minister from time to time. I feel almost as though I am endeavouring to reply to a budget speech right after the budget speech has been delivered instead of having a week in which to prepare a reply.

However, to deal with this general background, may I say this. It seems to me that at the beginning of this year we welcomed an armistice in Korea and felt that there was a slight improvement in general international affairs, with the result that we were given some hope that perhaps the strength to which the forces of NATO had been built up was really acting as an effective deterrent to any Soviet aggression. However, the events which have occurred more recently in Indo-China and also the difficulties which have been experienced in the international conferences which have been held at London and at Geneva underline the necessity for Canada to maintain an adequate defence program. The very successes which were achieved in the international field towards stability enhance all the arguments in favour of our continued participation with the other peace-loving countries in an effort to try to ensure that a lasting peace is brought about.

This party therefore will continue to support government programs to maintain adequate forces and effective measures for the protection of our country and for the fulfilment of our commitments abroad. Of course our concern must be whether or not the Canadian taxpayer receives full value for the huge sums he is being asked to provide for national defence. In his speech the minister referred to the fact that the cost of this insurance has been heavy. It has indeed been heavy. We have been able to bear that heavy cost in recent years because Canada has been enjoying good harvests; there has been a ready demand for our surplus agricultural products up until now, and our industry has expanded its productive capacity to new records. The result has been that the burden of these defence appropriations has been less onerous than it would otherwise have been had Canada not been enjoying that degree of prosperity.

It has frequently been said, both in the house and by well-informed persons outside, that Canadian industry today is faced with more intense competition in the domestic and foreign fields than it has been in recent years, and demands for our surplus agricultural products are certainly less urgent than they have been in former years. Therefore for these reasons defence expenditures must be examined with the utmost care.

The burdens laid upon this country by national defence are heavy, even in relation to our immense resources. I think all of us would welcome some reduction in the amount of money voted for national defence. We would like to see some of this $2 billion utilized for other purposes, spent perhaps for social services and other purposes more attractive than armament. However, no degree of social welfare, no amount of education nor health services nor pensions is of the slightest use to the people whom they are intended to benefit if these very people are plunged into war.

The government's program for national defence is not perfect. But there can be no question of Canada abandoning her efforts, nor is it the intention of the official opposition to attempt to whittle down these estimates. However, the taxpayers' money may not be spent to the best advantage if wrong types of organization or equipment are adopted and if, of course, there is waste and unnecessary expenditure in the projects which are undertaken. Following what the minister has said this afternoon, this year seems to be a very appropriate time to examine whether the program which has been followed since it was announced in February of 1951 has fulfilled the purpose for which it was designed, has accomplished at the least cost possible the purposes for which it was instituted, and is in a position to be projected into future years.

In general terms there has been no major war and therefore we may assume, as the minister has assumed, that defence plans have been successful to the extent that they have deterred the enemy from going to war. I rather doubt whether they are in a position to be projected forward into the future. I question whether we have jockeyed ourselves into the best possible position for the next few years to come, and I will deal with that point in a few minutes.

When we entered into this defence program in 1951 it was then assumed that Russia would not know how to manufacture, let alone stockpile, the A-bomb. The only threat to Canada, as was mentioned time and time again, was some diversionary raid. I must call the attention of the house to the fact that time and time again we on this side stressed what is now referred to as the importance of continental defence. It seems to me that, putting aside the possibility that Russia could manufacture the A-bomb, we were rather prepared to say that United States bombers, having the A-bomb at that time, would be able to deal with any threat anywhere in the world which Russia attempted to initiate and which in any way resembled a world war.

The failure to appreciate the fact that Russia would have the A-bomb in a very few years led us into the policy of crash thinking of the past few years. The minister used the term "crash thinking" this afternoon. We built up what were then considered conventional forces to meet other commitments than the danger of continental attack. Because the emphasis in the past few years has been along the lines of crash thinking I suggest we are not in a good position at the present time to project our defence programs into the future.

To emphasize that point I should like to call attention to the fact that all through these years only 2 per cent of the total defence appropriations have been allocated to defence research. We have been crash thinking. We have been building up for the moment without projecting our defence plans into the future because we believed that Russia could not have the A-bomb. We failed to take the long pull three or four years ago. Now we are asked to have a new look and to take the long pull. Had more money and a larger percentage of our defence estimates been devoted to research in those years which we are considering I think we should be in a better position today.

Today the Kremlin does possess, not only the A-bomb but even more advanced forms of what I will call nuclear bombs because it does not matter whether they are H-bombs, N-bombs or something else. They have a stock of bombs and they also have the heavy bombers so that they can deliver those bombs to this country. I think the TU-4's constitute the backbone of the Russian air force bombers and at the present time they are being replaced by more modern jet planes. The result is that, in spite of wishful thinking, such cities as Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and so on are now exposed to attack, as has been admitted today. It is of little comfort to those cities to know that if they are attacked United States bombers are available to retaliate. I certainly hope that this threat of massive retaliation will deter the would-be aggressor, but there are other strong deterrents the knowledge of which would, I think, make the would-be aggressor think twice, particularly if he realizes that any attack on a Canadian target would be extremely costly in terms of the results that he would be likely to achieve.

Now, a second strong deterrent has been referred to today, and I would describe it as an aggressive defensive measure, an adequate civil defence. The minister touched on the question of civil defence, but I am not going to say much about that. It seems to me that at the moment the trend is towards evacuating many of the larger cities if they are threatened as a target. I want to emphasize the importance of the time that is required in order to evacuate a city. Only a few days ago a test was carried out in a United States west coast city, and the thing that was driven home as a result of the test was the importance of plans made ahead of time and opportunities for warnings to put those plans into effect. However, there will be opportunity to discuss civil defence under the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

It is only if we do have these strong local deterrents and the means of receiving the warning that the effect of any future atomic Pearl Harbor can be neutralized. An aggressive defence will become a fact only when we have immediately available, at or near Canadian targets, interceptor aircraft at all times and a generous distribution of the newest weapons such as guided missiles operating air to air and ground to air and the latest atomic devices that science can evolve. I am not sure, in spite of what the minister has told us today, that we do have a warning system in as effective a stage as he would indicate.

Let me just emphasize the importance of this early warning by calling attention to the fact that a bomber formation, which we will say has been located 100 miles away from here, would be over this very building in a matter of a few minutes. I think you will, therefore, realize the futility of relying solely on any local or point defence. I am pleased that the minister gave us some information regarding the McGill fence, which is an indication now there is some attempt being made to get a warning system farther away than what might be described as the point defence or the inward and outward policy to which reference was made a year ago.

Last year when the estimates were presented the minister did indicate there was going to be a substantial increase on the emphasis which would be placed on the defence of the North American continent. I am glad he has re-emphasized that this year. It will be recalled that when the President of the United States, General Eisenhower, was speaking here on November 14 he said that our security plans must now take into account the Soviet ability to employ an atomic attack on North America. Later in his speech he said that now is the time for action on all agreed measures.

The minister spoke on November 26 in the throne speech debate, and I replied on November 30, calling attention to what appeared to me to be the lack in that speech of any assurance that action was really being taken. My anxiety in that respect has now been renewed by a speech that was delivered on April 29 of this year by Mr. Sterling Cole, a representative of the state of New York and chairman of the joint committee on atomic energy. In dealing with the question of a radar screen or early warning device across this continent, he said:

> . . . and yet four years after the need for such a warning line was pointed out, and two years after our scientists developed the equipment which would make such a line possible, it is still not in existence. Negotiations with the Canadian government on the subject of where, how, and by whom the first of such early warning lines would be built and operated have been in progress for nearly two years. Scarcely a week goes by that we are not reassured, through optimistic press releases, that these negotiations are proceeding harmoniously, satisfactorily and with the sense of urgency which the situation requires. We cannot detect enemy planes with press releases and comforting reassurances.

Then, a little later he said—mind you this is the chairman of the joint committee on atomic energy:

> . . . and with all the earnestness at my command, I urge that we immediately cease studying the early warning problem, and immediately begin the actual construction of an advance warning line.

Mr. Claxton: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to interrupt, because this is a rather important question. I should like to say one sentence, that is that there are no negotiations pending between the United States and Canada about this now or for one or two years or for any other time. There are none.

Mr. Pearkes: There are none?

Mr. Claxton: None.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not understand. I was going to ask a question about that, but no doubt the minister will enlarge upon it. I agree with him this is an important statement by someone who would appear to be an authority on this subject.

Mr. Claxton: In fairness, I believe he is thinking of the scientific and military discussions at their level to see what should be done, but there are no negotiations.

Mr. Pearkes: In this year's white paper the following statement is made at page 6:

> In the past year considerable progress has been made in the construction of the joint Canadian-U.S. network of radar stations to provide early warning and communications facilities for directing squadrons of fighters. New radar installations of the most modern and powerful type have replaced practically all of the temporary mobile facilities which were in use since the second world war.

Then, this statement is made, and in the light of the remark the minister has just made I hope he will explain still further:

> United States authorities have been kept fully informed of this project from the beginning.

I am rather at a loss to reconcile those two statements. I hope the minister will take the opportunity to further inform the house, because on the one hand we have a seemingly important United States official referring to the fact that the line is not in existence and urging that actual construction of this warning system be now started.

I am further perturbed on this particular subject because I do notice at page 44 of this year's white paper the appropriation for electronics has been reduced from an estimate of $114,799 last year to $65,666 this year. In this respect the difference between the estimate for 1953-54, and the probable expenditures in that year, are explained in this same white paper as being due to the difficulty of forecasting accurately the rate of expenditure on a large number of production programs in varying stages of development for complicated equipment that is subject to change and modification, in order to assure that the end product is the most useful for the job to be done and the money expended. The paragraph in the white paper goes on to say:

> This applies to all types of production but is especially true of contracts which entail quantity production of many components as in the case of electronics—

And so on.

We are told that 90 per cent of installations are complete—I believe that is the figure the minister mentioned this afternoon. Does that refer to the protective screen around certain selected targets or does it refer to the more general line scheme which would give early warning? It would seem from the statements I have read that, while making progress, our warning system is probably not being developed as rapidly as we would wish. Complaint is made in the white paper as to the difficulty of getting production in the materials required. Therefore I repeat the question I asked on November 30, and which perhaps the minister will consider he answered a moment ago. I think, however, some further explanation should be given. My question is this: Are there any agreed measures between the United States and ourselves that are now being held in abeyance for any reason whatsoever, and are there any measures which are now held in abeyance upon which agreement should be reached without further delay? I think we should have an answer to that question.

Leaving for the moment the question of early warnings, I return to the question of this rapid build-up program of our forces, the crash program to which the minister referred today. That has been based upon the kind of organization which proved successful in the second world war, armed and equipped with the weapons used in that conflict. Well, since formations of the ground structure after world war II ceased with the demobilization program of this government, new units did have to be created; and there were hasty improvisations in many cases during the emergency of 1950, with of course the subsequent expansion which made this method extremely expensive to the taxpayer. Russia did not launch a major war; she resorted to other strategy, the type of strategy to which the minister referred, when she engaged in these wars of limited objectives, the small wars he mentioned such as the Indo-China operation. When the government initiated its three-year program it was estimated that, as the minister said, the cost would run to $5 billion. This amount, plus additional millions, as he explained this afternoon, has been expended. But the program has not been completed.

As he has explained, the manpower targets as set out in 1950 have been reached for all practical purposes. I think that is an achievement for which credit must be allowed. But in reaching those objectives it has been done with a lavish expenditure of money on advertising, and the holding out of many inducements to attract men into the services. But, if we have the bodies, we are still short of much equipment—even equipment along the conventional lines of 1945.

I admit freely that in my opinion at no time have the defence services been faced with decisions of more extreme difficulty than they are today. Scientific research has opened the way to the development of new weapons of enormously increased effect. We are, as it were, in an interim period between the propellor and the guided-weapon age, or, as the minister referred to it this afternoon, the push-button war of the future.

Furthermore, at the present time the services have to be organized to support a foreign policy which at the moment is hesitant and uncertain.

A real danger does exist from communist-sponsored and communist-supported wars of limited objectives, such as the one in Indo-China. In the future these may not be entirely confined to the continent of Asia. Today we are contributing toward a ground screen across Europe, with its air component, in order to check a Russian advance through western Europe which, I suggest, if undertaken would plunge us at once into another major war. But is another major war in western Europe the strategic plan that Russia will necessarily adopt?

The maintenance of these large conventional ground forces in western Europe rests on the assumption that vast quantities of supplies will flow from the American continent to Europe and, from the Russian point of view, from their industrial bases beyond the Ural mountains, to sustain the embattled armies in western Europe. Yet this very supply flow must pass through the very few large ports in western Europe, and through a limited number of great railway centres in eastern Europe. All these ports, all these railway centres will be very vulnerable targets for the atom bomb. They could be destroyed easily in this way. And I think it is for that reason, as much as any other—that is the danger of the ports being destroyed—that Great Britain and the United States are taking this so-called new look, and are placing greater emphasis on air atomic power, and the revolution in warfare that has been brought about by these new weapons.

In a third world war there is no doubt about it that atomic air power will be the ultimate weapon. It is the belief that those who use the atomic bomb will perish by the atomic bomb that leads to the theory of massive retaliation and instant reprisals. Thus we have the concept of a deterrent force rather than a defence force. We ask, how does Canada fit into that picture? In part the minister has explained the role this afternoon, but I do suggest that defence planning today is indeed at the crossroads. Are we to adhere to the conventional methods of the first half of the twentieth century which are fast becoming obsolescent in terms of nuclear weapons? It seems to me that we should retain the greatest possible flexibility in our organization and in the disposition of our forces. A year ago I commented upon the fact that all our Sabre fighting squadrons were already committed to the European theatre. I still question the wisdom of this commitment when we are so pitifully short of fighter squadrons for home defence.

Mistakes have been costly in the past and can be costly again. It is for this reason that we of the opposition feel we have a right to inquire into government policy, even though opposition members do not have the opportunity of attending chiefs of staffs' conferences and receiving all the technical advice that the government has.

In the past in connection with this I have frequently advocated the importance of the air arm. I am pleased to see the increase in the proportions of the appropriations allocated to the R.C.A.F. I have also in the past emphasized the importance of the air arm in connection with the naval services. Several years ago, in speaking on these estimates, I stressed the importance of having additional aircraft carriers. Now the whole trend in both the United States navy and the Royal Navy is toward greater use of helicopters and reconnaissance planes from carriers in all escort and anti-submarine operations. I know the Magnificent is to be re-equipped with Banshee aircraft. The Banshee of course is not a reconnaissance plane; it is essentially a fighter plane and is more to be used in driving off hostile reconnaissance planes than in actual reconnaissance work itself.

Dependence upon the air for escort work and anti-submarine work is brought about very largely by the increased range and effectiveness of the modern torpedo. Escort vessels protecting a convoy operate on what one might describe as a perimeter a considerable distance from the convoy, sufficiently far out to keep the submarine away from the merchant vessels for effective torpedo range; but as the range of the torpedo increases, so must the line of escort vessels be pushed farther out from the actual merchantmen that they are convoying. The type of escort vessel that we are building in Canada is an extremely expensive one. We were told in 1951 that each of the escort vessels would cost over $8 million. I imagine the costs have gone up considerably since 1951. We are going to have 14 of those vessels. According to the white paper of 1951, four out of the 14 were to be launched in 1951 or at the beginning of 1952. This year's white paper tells us that by

March 31, 1954, a total of five escort vessels were launched. That program seems lagging very far behind, if in 1951 it was expected that the first four of the 14 were to be launched that year. It is disappointing to realize that only five have been launched to date. But I am questioning really the soundness of pursuing this plan of developing the very expensive escort vessels. With the increased effectiveness of the torpedo and the increased range we must have more escort vessels for any convoy. The increased effectiveness of the torpedo, which not only is equipped with a homing device, but is able to run on a patterned course, zigzagging or circling after a certain distance, means that any surface ship is extremely vulnerable. Helicopters or reconnaissance planes have an advantage in that they are not vulnerable to torpedoes.

I turn to the other point which I mentioned at the beginning, namely, the guarding of the taxpayer's money and ensuring that there is no unnecessary extravagance or waste. With respect to the elimination of unnecessary waste in the defence department, while, I am very pleased to say, no glaring instances of wrongdoing are disclosed, yet the searching examination to which the defence expenditures committee of a year ago subjected the department, and the investigations resulting from the Currie report of a little over a year ago, show that there was a general tightening of efficiency in the administration throughout the services. Last summer I expressed the opinion that with careful administration the defence estimates could be reduced by 10 per cent without in any way affecting the efficiency of the forces or the pay and allowances of the personnel concerned. I notice that this year the minister has found it possible to reduce his estimates by approximately $100 million, or 5 per cent of last year's estimates. I am sure he does not consider that the efficiency has been sacrificed, and I am equally certain that another $100 million could have been cut off this year's estimates had there been throughout all the services a genuine desire to economize. This reduction cannot be made by the elimination of any one item. It is, however, in my opinion, essential that all commands in all the services should be imbued with the sense of their responsibility in the expenditure of public funds. The economy of the country is not as strong as it was a year ago, and, therefore, the strictest care must be exercised in all defence spending.

When we come to the details of the estimates we shall feel it our duty to examine, and if necessary to criticize, the amounts allocated in the various items of expenditure, and we shall offer such comments as we consider may be necessary. However, the rules and procedures of this house do not provide opportunities for any really thorough examination into the administration as to its effectiveness or efficiency. Therefore I repeat the suggestion which has been made before. In view of the results which were obtained through the medium of Mr. Currie's investigation in a very limited field of inquiry, would it not be advisable for the government to initiate now another investigation of the whole field of the department's administration with a view to introducing substantial economies without affecting the efficiency of the services? I believe that owing to the magnitude of the task which confronts this department the minister would be well advised to call in some expert assistance to review the general expenditures and go into this whole matter to see whether further economies can be effected. I feel that the officers concerned are too busy with their own legitimate work to be able to spare the time which is required for such a thorough investigation.

In closing, I repeat that we on this side of the house appreciate the difficulties confronting the minister and his department in these very uncertain times. We urge caution in accepting new commitments; we stress the importance of continued emphasis on the defence of the home front, the North American continent; we urge care in all expenditures, but forward looking so that full advantage may be taken of the new weapons of warfare which science is now producing.

A revolution is actually taking place in the theory, strategy, and tactics of warfare brought about by these new weapons. The Department of National Defence and our military leaders must come to grips with this revolution in warfare in order that they may be certain they are following the right approach.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, in following the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, who has long experience in military affairs, I do so, of course, merely as a layman but one who has paid some attention to the military commitments and expenditures over the last few years. I shall try to discuss the estimates now before us in the light of the new developments in international affairs, and in the light of methods that might be used in the event of an attack not only on our country but on the countries with which we are associated.

Of course, throughout the country the easing of international tension, to which the minister referred and to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has on occasion referred, and the desire for the control of these new and terrible weapons, about which we heard this afternoon, have led people to hope that we might be able, through agreement, to engage not only in the control of these weapons but in progressive disarmament.

At the moment the world is obsessed with fear. Fear, of course, is not a good motive for the promotion of international peace; but, as a matter of fact, fear is forcing millions of people everywhere to look for peaceful settlements of current difficulties and disputes.

The terror of the new weapons was outlined by the minister in his speech this afternoon, and as I listened to him I wondered if his department has reviewed the commitments of Canada and the policies of the department in the light of these new and terrible developments.

The white paper indicates the amount of money the people of Canada will be called upon to expend on the army, the navy, the air force, and defence in the year 1954-55. The estimates amount to $1,908 million plus $102 million, which is expected to be a net charge on the special account, or a total of $2,010 million, which is an increase of $208 million over the forecast gross disbursements of $1,802 million for the year 1953-54.

May I just say in passing that I have noted there has been some discussion and indeed some dispute, or so the newspapers tell us, between the Department of National Defence and treasury officers about items which should be charged to this special account. What seems to have happened is this, that when the department has some weapons which are obsolete they are sent to one of our allies as mutual aid, and that enables the department to draw on the special account to pay for new equipment and in that way, incidentally, to escape to some degree control of this house in respect to those expenditures.

The figures in the white paper are stupendous and would be stupendous at any time, but they are certainly stupendous in peacetime; and when I look back over the years and think of the first budgets I saw introduced in this house in 1936 and 1937, budgets of around half a billion dollars, and when I remember how Mr. Dunning used to impress upon the house that it was impossible to raise another ten, fifteen, twenty or one hundred million dollars to give the relief which was so necessary and which was called for at that time by our suffering population, I cannot but regard this figure for defence as stupendous.

Because of the fact that these figures are so stupendous I think it is the duty of this house to see whether they are justified, and if justified, how it is proposed to spend the money.

The minister told us this afternoon that these new estimates come at the end of a three-year period, the period which three years ago we were told would require an expenditure of $5 billion to bring us up to the point where we would be moderately secure, the point where, in co-operation with our friends in other countries, we could expect to feel a measure of real security. But this afternoon the minister told us that we have got to expend this huge amount again this year, and indeed he told us we would have to spend the same amount probably for years to come.

Consequently, it is the duty of this house at the present time to see if the Department of National Defence is really doing the job we expect of it when we appropriate these huge sums of money.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich said a few moments ago there had been a revolution in warfare in the last few years. That was pointed out in a very interesting address given over the B.B.C. a short time ago by no less a personage than Sir John Slessor, G.C.B., marshal of the Royal Air Force; chief of the air staff, 1950-52; commandant, Imperial Defence College, 1949; and member of the air council, 1945-47. I would like to quote briefly from what he said at that time:

> For the first time in hundreds of thousands or millions of years that man has existed he can carry or propel through the air for thousands of miles, . . . a missile that by itself can destroy a city. It is silly to behave as though this revolution had never happened. Actually it has completely transformed the whole complexion and dimension of the problem of peace and war. All previous conceptions have become obsolete.
> Let me hasten to say that I am not here to tell you that we can now scrap the navy and disband the army and put all our money on a new model push-button air force. But if there were another major war it would not remotely resemble the last one.

Then in another place in the same speech he emphasized this point when he said this:

> I believe the first and most far-reaching consequence of this revolution is that total war as we have known it in the past forty years is a thing of the past. That may sound a pretty rash statement. But I believe it to be true. War is a matter of wills: nations or coalitions went to war to impose their will on an opponent. You started off by trying to do it by persuasion, that is, by diplomacy, and if that was no good you tried to do it by force. At a given moment—the "declaration" of war—you turned over from an interchange of notes between men in top hats to an interchange of bullets between men in tin hats.
> The next rather obvious thing I must say is that you did not take the initiative in forcing a war unless you thought you could win it. And (this is the important point) we now know to our cost that winning a war does not mean just forcing an enemy to lay down his arms and accept your terms: it means creating world conditions more favourable to oneself than could have been brought about if there had not been a war. Today there is not the remotest chance of anyone winning a war on that definition. A world war in this day and age would be general suicide and the end of civilization as we know it.

Consequently it seems to me that while we are considering expenditures for the defence of our country against the possibility of war, our government, our external affairs department and all the rest of us should be doing everything we can to try to find ways and means of negotiating the difficulties that exist between the nations and of eliminating the possibility of another general war. The world is still trying, of course, to comprehend the tremendous power of the hydrogen bomb as revealed publicly, following the recent tests in the Pacific. Rear Admiral L. L. Strauss, the chairman of the United States atomic energy commission, in a statement made on March 31, 1954, disclosed that one hydrogen bomb could wipe out any city on earth. The power of the atom bomb was measured in kilotons, equivalent to thousands of tons of TNT. The power of the fusion bomb is measured in megatons, equivalent to millions of tons of TNT. The explosive power attained in the March 1 Eniwetok test was estimated at 600 to 700 times that of the bombs that destroyed Hiroshima and Nagasaki. These statements are from the New York Times.

Then in a statement issued recently in England by a group of scientific workers—and incidentally they were scientific workers in whose area will be found the great atomic pile of the United Kingdom—they estimated that two to six hydrogen bombs would be enough to break British resistance in any third world war. As the hon. gentleman who preceded me stated, the vulnerable spots—the ports, railway centres and so on—are few in number, and a few of these bombs getting through could put out of the war any country engaged in it.

Then the other important development, of course, is the development in the U.S.S.R. We have been told authoritatively that United States success in producing the hydrogen bomb was largely owing to the material that flowed through the ether from an explosion of such a bomb in the U.S.S.R. and that it made a change in the manner in which United States scientists were working in order to discover that dreadful weapon. Soviet spokesmen have been at pains recently to underline the point that they had these powerful weapons. I should like to put on the record a comment by Hanson W. Baldwin, military editor of the New York Times on April 4 of this year. He says this:

> The intended import of that (Soviet) warning is simple, that the Soviet union is capable of winning a nuclear war with the United States. This was what Premier Malenkov meant when he said last Monday that any future atomic war "would inevitably lead to the ruin of the capitalist social system," a theme repeated also in communist party secretary Khrushchev's speech the same day.
> It is generally agreed that while the existence of the H-bomb is a very real deterrent in so far as an outbreak of world war is concerned, its deterrent effect is much less in relation to small wars, limited wars or struggles such as those in Indo-China, Malaya, street fighting in Trieste, Israeli-Arabian border clashes, etc.

Thus we see that the obligations of Canada and the other countries in connection with the requirements of the United Nations, NATO, and so on, are not altogether eliminated by any deterrent effect the H-bomb may have. However, I believe an examination of the estimates now before the committee will show that little heed has been taken of what Sir John Slessor called this "revolution in war".

It seems clear that the estimates are based upon the second world war conceptions and that the minister has accepted uncritically the huge demands for weapons and equipment that are either already obsolete or become obsolete even before they are provided. I think that point was well illustrated and emphasized this afternoon by the minister himself when he spoke of the huge expenditures for the production of planes in this country and said that they are obsolete before they come off the assembly lines. One wonders whether we would not be far better off by co-operating more closely with the United Kingdom, for example, and by assisting the United Kingdom and allowing the United Kingdom to proceed, for according to published reports she is the foremost aviation nation in the world in the designing of planes. One wonders whether we would not be better off by co-operating with her so that we both might benefit, without our undertaking, on a much smaller scale and in smaller numbers, the building of planes which may become obsolete even before they come off the assembly lines.

Of course military men have always been prone to ask for more than is necessary, and parliament is inclined to grant all their requests because, as laymen, we are not sufficiently informed to refuse their requests. Indeed, if we did, public opinion might view us with suspicion. The public view with suspicion any suggestions—and perhaps properly so—that seem to jeopardize the national defence against any possible aggression. A prominent member of this house, as reported at page 2810 of Hansard of 1951, said this:

> I have never known an admiral, a general or an air marshal who did not begin by asking for more than his share of anything.

That of course was said by our distinguished friend—himself a major general—the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Thus, all too often, not only the size of the total allocation for defence but its distribution among the armed services depended more on the bargaining between the heads of the three services than on anything else. With today's developments, the dangers of this kind of uncritical, unquestioning acceptance of defence requirements is more dangerous than ever.

The London Economist had something to say about this matter concerning the British estimates when they were introduced into the house. I am quoting from the London Economist of February 20 of this year. It said this:

> The danger is frankly that, while the backroom planners are busy working out the strategy of the new look, the authorities that really matter may succumb to the temptation, in this period of uncertainty, merely to pass round the money among the different claimants in very much the same proportions as they have been allowed to enjoy in the past; and then to leave each claimant to decide how he will spend that money in the new circumstances now emerging.
> There are two reasons for fearing—the layman can, of course, never be sure that this may have happened in the estimates for 1954-55. In the first place, not only is the total defence estimate remarkably similar to the estimate for 1953-54; the different components are suspiciously similar too.

How well that applies to these estimates that are now before the house. There is a similarity to the components of a year ago before the explosion of a hydrogen bomb.

That this has been true in other countries is borne out by numerous articles that have appeared in the press of the world, articles by people who have made a study of defence and military affairs and who may be regarded as authorities. Walter Lippmann, I suppose, is regarded as one of the outstanding commentators on military affairs in the world at the present time. In his column of January 8 of this year he criticized the Truman administration and its attitude to some of these matters. He had this to say:

> To put it bluntly, but I believe truly, the Truman administration lost control in the constitutional and meaningful sense of that word over the war-making powers of the United States. It lost control over the size and the character of the military establishment, over the high strategic planning in which statesmen, not soldiers, must have the last word, and over the theatre commanders abroad. The visible consequences of all this were, for one thing, a gigantic military expansion which became all the more gigantic because it was regulated not by a lucid strategic policy but by the pressure of the military bureaucracies of the three services. Another consequence of the loss of control over the military power was the irreparable political errors of the Korean campaign, particularly the failure to halt at the 38th parallel, or at least at the waist of Korea, before the Chinese intervened.

Leaving out the reference to Korea, how can we in this parliament exercise our constitutional obligations with regard to this department? None of us knows what the requirements really are. None of us knows just how this money is really spent. I say to the house and to the minister that, although I have never been in favour of the proposal made from time to time that a royal commission, an outside body, should inquire into the Department of National Defence, I think we could appoint a competent committee of this house which could go into the affairs of the Department of National Defence and bring back to the house an assurance if it should prove to be so that the money is being well spent, that we are getting what we are paying for in this department.

At the moment there is not one of us who can say whether this estimate is right or wrong. There is not one of us who can say with certainty that the amount is adequate or that the amount is excessive. I think, and I hope to show in a moment, that if the matter is looked into in all probability it will be found that the amount is excessive and, as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich suggested and as I suggested in the address, that it could be cut by at least 10 per cent. I believe it probably could be cut by more than 10 per cent if the matter were investigated thoroughly by the house.

To put it bluntly, we believe these estimates indicate that parliament has lost control of the Department of National Defence, and we believe that a thorough and careful investigation of the estimates now before the house should be made by the house or by a committee of the house before they are approved at this session of parliament. As I said a moment ago, I do not care to hazard a guess as to what savings could be made or the amount by which these estimates could be cut. As I pointed out in a former debate, the United States is reducing its appropriations by about 10 per cent and the United Kingdom by a lesser amount, and I believe that Canada could make a similar reduction in the defence appropriation.

I believe a thorough investigation of these estimates would confirm this view, and I want to cite some of the details which to my mind help to confirm the statement I have just made. Of primary importance of course is that we shall be prepared to implement any undertakings made by this country under the charter of the United Nations, under the North Atlantic treaty or under other agreements that we have made or may make for collective security. In common with other western democracies, our defence program should no longer be geared, as the minister said today, to what has been termed "the crash objectives" of 1950 when war might have been imminent, but rather to what has been called this afternoon the long haul of future defence and peace or the long pull, whatever you care to call it.

I should like to remark right here and now that the North Atlantic treaty is more than a military alliance. It is more than a method of giving obsolete equipment to some of our allies, but as yet we have not begun to fulfil article 2 of the treaty. I want to say quite plainly and frankly that we of this party supported the North Atlantic treaty because we had the assurance that article 2 would be regarded as of fundamental importance. However, virtually nothing has been done to assist the economies of these countries. We have emphasized wholly and solely the military end of the agreement, and that is not good enough when we are fighting a cold war against a communist aggressor who uses economic distress as his principal vehicle of propaganda. It is time that we paid some attention to article 2 of the treaty for our mutual aid and prosperity.

A study of the United States and United Kingdom estimates for defence indicates that those countries have been moving quite rapidly into the new defensive position necessitated by considerations of the long haul while Canada's armed forces are still geared to the weapons and tactics of world war II. I have a number of quotations here from their estimates, statements and white papers which I could quote this afternoon, but I do not intend to do so because I have already quoted sufficiently.

As I said earlier, I am not suggesting that the new and terrible weapons of war make armies and navies unnecessary. Certainly they do not make the air force unnecessary. Quite the contrary, but I am suggesting that we could effect savings by reducing the stockpiling of weapons, planes and equipment which are either obsolete now or are certain to become obsolete in a comparatively short time. We do not know what stockpiling there has been, but if the figures in the previous estimates indicate the purchases that have been made there must be considerable stockpiling by the Department of National Defence.

It seems to us too that there is one branch of the Department of National Defence that is well worth supporting and even expanding. The field of electronics was referred to this afternoon and yet there is a reduction in the estimates for that branch of research, research carried on through the national research council and through our own defence research board. During world war II those organizations gave very significant aid in the achievement of victory. I agree immediately that such research should be undertaken by co-operation with those who will co-operate with us. That means to a very large extent, and in some fields almost exclusively, the United Kingdom and other members of the commonwealth. This should be done so that research efforts can be coordinated and duplication and waste among us avoided and, indeed, because we do cooperate, the program can be speeded up.

As an example, I mentioned a little earlier and I might mention again what might be done in this field. Instead of Canada embarking at great expense upon the production or experimentation of certain new types of planes, we could I think co-operate with Britain more fully. It is generally admitted that Britain leads the world in the development and production of aircraft. Why should we go to the expense of building and equipping new plants, designing new planes when we could co-operate with Britain and together work out the designs for planes, thus saving us both a great deal of expense?

Then, it seems to us that reconsideration should be given to the proposals for defence construction for all three services. We are told that this program of construction, building and so on across the country has now passed its peak. Apparently a further wave of expenditures in this field is foreshadowed in the estimates. I feel the department should be called upon to justify those expenditures. So far as housing for our married men is concerned, yes; but after all that is only a comparatively small part of the appropriation. The need for the other facilities should be carefully examined by this house before the appropriations are approved. If they were scrutinized I believe reductions could be made in that field.

I suggest that to continue to stockpile weapons and ammunition on a large scale, at a time when revolutionary changes are being made in weapons and armaments generally, is nothing but the greatest wastefulness. Apparently, expenditures for such weapons and ammunition as may become obsolete are to continue on a fairly large scale under these estimates. I feel that should be reviewed by this house or by a committee of this house. Then we have noted, too, that the United States is contemplating a reduction of its armed forces in Korea. We maintain a brigade in Korea, and if the United States can withdraw some forces why could we not bring back at least a battalion? The maintenance of troops in Korea is a costly undertaking because we ship supplies not only by sea but by air. While we do that with some of our own military transport planes, we also hire planes from a private company, the Canadian Pacific Air Lines.

It seems to us that if the United States can withdraw some of her troops from Korea, we could withdraw some also. It might be possible to place in reserve some of our ships, our cruisers for example. They are costly to maintain at sea, and they are costly to maintain in port. I have noticed the whole emphasis in the United States and in the United Kingdom, so far as their navies are concerned, is to get away from battleships and cruisers in favour of anti-submarine vessels and aircraft carriers. I saw the other day that the United Kingdom has suspended building activities on three new cruisers, the Tiger, the Defence, and the Blake.

Then, as the minister has already said, we have a large air force in Europe. I believe there are 12 fighter squadrons there. Until recently there were few such squadrons in Canada. We were almost defenceless in the air. I want to say to the minister that no other country had denuded itself of air protection for the common effort as completely as Canada did. The minister told us it costs over $600 million a year to equip, transport and maintain an R.C.A.F. division in Europe. Even if we returned six of those fighter squadrons to Canada a substantial saving would be made, and there would be at least a more efficient fighter protection in Canada if that were required. Certainly no one could accuse us of not contributing equitably to the NATO effort if we did that.

We should review carefully Canada's expenditure for aircraft, which is given on pages 44 and 45 of the white paper. The estimate for 1954-55 is for $430 million, and that represents 43·5 per cent of our air force expenditures. This is a far greater proportion of the expenditure for aircraft than the proportion I noticed in the United Kingdom estimate, which I believe is in the order of 29 per cent or 30 per cent. Other items of the estimates that require scrutiny are numerous, but I am going to give only a few examples. In the details we are told that we have 1,000 inspectors of stores, in addition to the inspection staffs of each of the services. These 1,000 inspectors cost $3,500,000. I am not going to deny that adequate inspection is necessary, but the present estimates provide for no less than $12·5 million for all the inspection services compared with only $10·5 million at the height of our war effort, 1943-44. How could that be justified? Perhaps the minister can justify it when he speaks.

Even the Currie report of the investigation into the forces did not indicate losses as high as the cost of these inspection services. These and other savings run into many tens of millions of dollars when you add them all up. I did a little arithmetic the other day and was amazed at the total I got. I am not going to name it because some of my figures were the result of looking into the estimates and endeavouring to estimate what the totals would be. I am not going to do that at the moment; but, when we have heard from the minister further and we have gone into these estimates further, we may come to a conclusion as to just what savings could be effected in this department. I say tens of millions of dollars but I believe the savings would run into hundreds of millions of dollars —not many hundreds, but hundreds of millions of dollars. Please do not misunderstand and think I am making a plea for a reduction in income tax as a result of defence savings; not at all.

As I said, I should like to see more emphasis on article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty, mutual economic aid, which would be perhaps costly to us. I should like to see Canada take more of a leading part in urging and providing technical aid for the underprivileged nations of the world. I know that is limited by the facilities of the technical aid organization, the Colombo plan facilities and so on, but we could do more than we are doing now, so some of those funds could be used for that. If we improved the living standards of these underprivileged parts we would be doing much to make inoperative the propaganda of totalitarian agitators, whether they are of the fascist or of the communist variety. We have sometimes overlooked the fact that the danger of totalitarianism does not come only from communism but comes equally through various forms of fascism across the world.

Then some of the savings could be used effectively in Canada. We could use them for our social services, in part for a national health plan, for improving the amenities of life in this country. I have always been a very warm advocate of doing something for the cultural life of Canada. I like to see the national gallery buying a few pictures; I like to see the suggestion made that we should encourage a national drama, a national opera, national ballet, national music in the form of symphonies, and the like.

But, first of all, of course, we should see that we have those facilities in the social services for health and well-being as well as the cultural things. The hon. member spoke about aircraft carriers, and that has reminded me that the other day I read we were going to replace the Magnificent with the Bonaventure—in fact, we were told this in the house—and that the Bonaventure would operate off the east coast.

What are we going to do with the Magnificent? Here I am suggesting an expenditure of money. Why not remodel and modernize the Magnificent and make her suitable for what the hon. member suggested, namely the carrying of helicopters—indeed, why not redesign the Bonaventure to do the same thing? Why not use one of them on the east coast and the other on the west—because if aggression should come we cannot be sure that it will come on the east coast; neither are we sure that it will not come on the west. It would be well if we had an additional ship—and this of course would entail additional expenditure. However, that is the kind of expenditure of which I am sure the House of Commons would approve, because hon. members would understand the purpose of it.

From reports that have been made, I do not know to what extent Canada's forces are receiving adequate training for atomic warfare, if such should come. I do not know what they have learned about the use of atomic weapons, guided missiles and the like. Are our forces being trained as are the armed forces in other countries? It does not mean that they have to use those weapons, but they could use weapons simulated to meet training requirements. Is this being done?

If my information is correct the Canadian army has not yet been given training in airborne operations at the brigade level. So far that has not been done, according to my information. Yet we hear a great deal about the necessity for having airborne troops. Of course, in our country air defence and the ability to cope with a group of enemy soldiers parachuted into northern Canada is of primary and fundamental importance. Our forces may have to be flown quite a distance to fulfil this task, and might be required in brigade strength.

I am told, too, by military men that much of the army training is obsolete, and that in this respect to a great extent the money is wasted. But whether that is true or not, I think emphasis should be placed on research; and as I said earlier, in that field all the co-operation possible should be undertaken with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries. And if the United States wishes to co-operate with us, well and good; we would be prepared to co-operate with them. If this co-operation were complete, as it should be, we believe it might effect very substantial savings in our estimates.

As I have said, these savings should be diverted into channels which would be beneficial to the world and to ourselves. Our plea is for a reconsideration of the estimates that have been presented to us, in the light of recent developments. And should this be done thoroughly we believe very substantial reductions can be made in the total estimates of the department, without impairing its efficiency and without jeopardizing the security of our country.

I am not going to discuss the problem of civil defence in relation to new weapons. That will come under another heading. Suffice it to say that we are now told by experts in the United States in this field that only the mass evacuation of populations of our larger centres would suffice in the event of raids bringing hydrogen bombs. What a prospect the world faces, if that is so! And I fear that it is so.

The minister told us that our radar defences are 90 per cent complete and in operation. Well, it is good to know that, but in collaboration with our radar defences we should have adequate fighting air and ground forces in this country. I have noted that recently some CF-100's have been located and are being used in Canada. But, as I said earlier, until very recently we had denuded ourselves of air defence through our contributions to NATO. I am not complaining about contributions to NATO; but I think we also have to think about our own defences, as well as the defences of western Europe, in the event of war.

I do not wish to say anything further, except to express the hope that the House of Commons will examine these estimates. It is true that in the main estimates information is given in great detail, and that they are set out very carefully indeed. I hope hon. members will see to it that, so far as we are able to bring it about, any wastes will be eliminated. But I think most of all we require, first, a thorough investigation into the activities of the department, and its estimates, by a committee of the House of Commons.

All of us are anxious to give our support to any necessary defensive plans for our own country, and to assist those who expect us to give assistance through the United Nations, NATO and the like. But the difficulty in which most of us find ourselves—and I fancy this includes hon. members on the government side as well as in the opposition—is that this department is a law unto itself. And because of the secret nature of many of its operations it is protected against thorough inquiry by the elected representatives of the people.

The age-old struggle in the British democracies has been to make certain that the civilian arm of government can and does control the military. And upon my soul, I think at the present time this House of Commons has very largely lost control of the defence department and the military arm of the nation; and I think we should do everything we can to restore a control that is properly the function of this parliament.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the minister gave us a comprehensive survey of Canada's position, so far as our armed forces are concerned. He went into some detail in regard to the international situation, the military aspect of NATO, and some other matters. As a matter of fact his speech was so comprehensive and detailed that it was almost impossible for one to absorb all he said merely by listening. But I would make a suggestion to the minister. I do not know what he will think of it, but it would certainly simplify matters for those who have to speak immediately after him if it could be arranged in the future that he give his statement, and then allow the item to stand and continue the debate the next day or the day after in order to give hon. members an opportunity to study his statement in detail before speaking.

At the outset I should like to pay tribute to the members of the armed forces. These men of all the services have built themselves an enviable reputation wherever they have gone. They have served with distinction in every theatre of war where they have been called to act. Certainly, they have become well known for their courage, ability and resourcefulness in the field. More than that, the members of the Canadian armed forces have been well liked everywhere they have gone in other than official capacities. In other words, practically without exception they behave like gentlemen, regardless of where they are serving.

On many occasions, Mr. Chairman, we have been critical, and sometimes extremely critical, but that criticism has never applied to the members of the armed forces. We have criticized the department for some of the policies they have brought down, and undoubtedly we shall continue to do so. But our criticisms have always been against the department, against the government and never against the armed forces or any of the individuals of the forces.

The situation in the world today, as the minister indicated, is extremely serious. I go along with the minister and hope also that in the future we shall not find ourselves embroiled in another all-out war. But we cannot allow ourselves to become too complacent. Things look bad. As a matter of fact, I picked up today's Journal and on the front page I saw the headline: "Geneva looks hopeless." I do not know what the article contains because I have not had an opportunity to read it.

With things stacking up the way they are, in every effort that has been made to bring the two opposing sides together, we cannot afford to relax our vigilance even for a moment. We are not actually engaged in a hot war at the present time, but we are in a war. It is not war as wars have been known down through the ages, which were brought about by trade wars and so on. It is a battle between two ways of life, between communism and democracy and between freedom and slavery. We must never forget that the forces of international communism have no regard for life, or the individual; they have no regard for promises made and they have no regard for any treaties that they may have signed. They are vicious. We must never forget also that world domination is their ultimate aim. They have made that known all through the years from the time of Marx and Engels right down to the present regime. I hope, and I know every hon. member hopes, that the peace overtures they are making at the present time and have been making recently are sincere. It is possible that the new administration in Russia has had a change of heart, but I would not bank on it too much. In other words, we have to take every opportunity afforded to maintain peace, but at the same time we must always be prepared for the worst.

We in this group have always supported defence spending. We feel that as long as a large defence program is necessary we should keep at it, and I can assure the minister he will have our wholehearted support in every expenditure that we feel is necessary for the carrying on of our defence program. We realize that with the situation the way it is today defence is all-important. We have been critical many times, not because the government is spending money, but of how they are spending it. We have often maintained, as speakers who preceded me said today, there is no economy in the Department of National Defence. As a matter of fact, I have not found it in any department of government. The aims of the department undoubtedly are very high and to be commended, namely, the protection of our country. But sometimes the results leave a great deal to be desired. I cannot believe, Mr. Chairman, that we are getting a dollar value out of every dollar spent on defence. I think we discovered quite a bit in our defence expenditure committee last year, and in a small way the Currie report proved that there is waste and extravagance in the Department of National Defence.

I regret very much that the government did not see fit to set up the defence expenditure committee during this session. After all, we touched only the surface of defence spending during the last session. We covered a great deal of the ground as far as construction is concerned, but we did not get into the production of aircraft, arms or ammunition, or any of the things that we should like to have made a complete investigation into. I only hope—and I would ask the minister to discuss it with his colleagues—that a committee will be set up again next year, as early as possible in the session, and that it will be allowed to dig into the entire regime of defence spending.

May I say a brief word on fires at some of the installations? The minister made a statement in the house the other day in which he said that compared with civilian fires the percentage of damage was very low. I realize that, and well it should be, because in no other place do they have the facilities for sentries or fire protection and so on concentrated in such a small area. It is hard to believe that if the sentries are being posted as they should be a large blaze could develop before it was discovered. I realize that it could probably happen in some instances, but I cannot see how for example at the air station at Penhold, with the number of personnel there, a fire could get a good start and destroy a hangar, when one takes into consideration the facilities and the personnel there, particularly since they have sentries posted at all the hangars to see that such a thing does not happen.

The minister went to great length this afternoon to show how NATO had been built up to strength, not sufficient to defeat the communists, but strong enough to hold the line until the air power and the atomic power of the NATO countries could be used to interrupt any attack that might be made. I do not think they have the minimum that the minister mentioned this afternoon. The aim for NATO as it was set down was for 90 divisions by 1954, or something like 1,350,000 men.

Perhaps the minister told us this afternoon the extent of the manpower within NATO forces at the present time, but if so I missed it and in any event I do not think it will amount to the figure I have mentioned. At any rate, the estimated power of the Russian forces alone, and in this connection I am taking the figures given by General Gruenther two years ago, amounted to 175 divisions, or something like 4 million men. That takes no account of the satellite forces, and they can certainly muster a great many more men in a hurry. In view of that, it is difficult to see how the NATO forces could hold the communist hordes for even a short time.

I have mentioned the Russian figures relative to about two years ago, and I would like the minister to bring us up to date on the estimated force the communists have at their command at the present time. I would like to know how much they have at their command in terms of land, air, and sea forces. In regard to their air power I would like to have some sort of résumé as to the number of first-line bombers, light bombers, heavy bombers, and fighter planes they have at their disposal. As regards their naval power I would like to have a résumé of the estimated number of first-line submarines, battleships and so on up the line. I do not know whether the minister has these figures, but I have no doubt he has some knowledge.

I paid particular attention to the minister's statement this afternoon to the effect that it was only as long as the NATO nations could maintain their productive superiority that we could hope to deter the communists from attack. I am not sure that we have that productive superiority.

Speaking on the defence estimates in April 1952 I quoted from a technical and trade magazine called Aviation Age giving some figures of Russian productive capacity as far as the air power is concerned, though that was two years ago. That magazine estimated that Russia had about 85 aircraft factories, more than 28 engine plants, and produced something in the neighbourhood of 22,000 aircraft during the past year. That, of course, would be in 1951. Perhaps I should quote briefly from my speech at that time as reported at page 1100 of Hansard for April 3, 1952:

> I should like to refer briefly to six points which were dealt with in that magazine under dateline, Washington, March 13. The first is that there are about 15 large, 30 medium, and 40 smaller plants producing airframes within Russia.

That is in addition to the engine plants and aircraft factories I mentioned a moment ago. The quotation continues:

> The Russian ministry for the aircraft industry supervises 360 factories which do all or most of their work for the red air force. Then they have a number of contributing industries such as 20 rubber factories and 15 to 18 aluminum plants.

The magazine goes on to mention that each plant is capable of producing something like 3,600 engines; and, except for the fact that there is a bottleneck in the aluminum industry, the output could be raised to 50,000 or 60,000 Russian planes per year.

It was pointed out that during the same period the United States had 27 airframe factories, about 15 smaller ones, and some 30 other companies building major subsections, etc. In that speech I added:

> To get back to the claimed production of 22,000 aircraft for Russia, it is believed that about 10,700 are fighting planes, 539 reconnaissance planes, 3,060 light and medium bombers, 1,246 heavy bombers, 1,430 transport planes and 5,000 trainer and liaison planes. The production last year in the United States was something like 5,000 planes.

Now, I do not know how authentic these figures are, but the magazine Aviation Age is considered a pretty reliable sort of publication, and the figures given would indicate that our productive capacity, at least as applied to aircraft, is far below that of the Russians, at least in 1951-52. I hope the minister can assure us that we are now far ahead of them in production in the NATO countries.

The minister indicated this afternoon that we have very few targets in Canada which would attract—but before going on with that, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should call it six o'clock.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, when the committee took recess at six o'clock I was about to say that this afternoon the minister indicated that there were in Canada few targets that would rate an attack by aircraft carrying either the atomic or the hydrogen bomb. In that statement I can agree wholeheartedly with the minister. There are in Canada very few centres that are highly industrialized and that would therefore make a good target. But that very fact brings to mind the question we have raised many times in this chamber—I know I have raised it on many occasions—namely that of decentralization.

The minister knows that if about half a dozen of the cities in Canada were to be wiped out by a hydrogen bomb attack, our industrial potential would be practically wiped out. He knows that it would take very few bombs to absolutely ruin our production. We in this group particularly, as well as many of the other members, have constantly asked the government to put more and more essential war production centres in the prairie provinces, inland somewhere in British Columbia or in the maritimes, so that even if the larger centres here in Canada might be bombed we would still have sufficient productive capacity to carry on.

That suggestion brings to our minds another consideration, namely that of transportation. If the larger railway centres in this country were put out of action, our entire transportation system would be at a standstill. As the situation is at present, if a concerted attack were made on any part of this country outside of the highly populated areas, we have not the facilities by means of which to carry to the field of action the necessary men, materials, armaments and so on. I know that in a statement not long ago the minister said that we in Canada were not in too much danger of a concentrated attack, that any attack on this country would be spotty and of a minor nature, and would probably be made by paratroopers or something like that. However, we cannot allow ourselves to become complacent. We do not know what is going to happen. If the communists should decide to make an attack on the United States rather than on some other part of the world, Canada would be the logical jumping-off place. We cannot allow ourselves to get the "It Can't Happen Here" complex.

In order to facilitate the transportation of ground troops, materials and so on that cannot be carried by air, I think we need an adequate highway system throughout this country. I can think of one good instance, and it is one that has been mentioned in this chamber many times. If an attack should be made somewhere in the north central part of British Columbia or at least if there should happen to be a concentration of troops there, we have no way whatsoever of transporting materials and men through the Yellowhead pass and into British Columbia. I use that as an example because, in my opinion, that route is absolutely necessary. In view of that necessity, I think the government should take greater action and should co-operate more fully with the provinces in setting up not a trans-Canada highway but a trans-Canada highway system that will be adequate.

When I came back to Ottawa after the Easter recess, I was on the train with a considerable number of service personnel coming back from Korea and I had a rather interesting talk with some of them during the train trip. I asked one sergeant what was lacking in Korea as far as the Canadian soldiers were concerned or what they needed most in Korea that they did not have. I was rather surprised at his answer. What he said was this: We have good equipment; we are among the best equipped men in the field in Korea. Our food is good. We cannot complain on those grounds. The medical equipment is good. The dental equipment is good. But what we need in Korea more than anything else are some service canteens.

I know that we went into that matter about three years ago and that the minister claimed there was no necessity for them. I know that on that occasion I protested quite strongly as did other members of the opposition and some members on the government side. The sergeant to whom I was talking said they lacked that little touch of Canada while away from home. They obtained all their canteen supplies and so on through NAAFI. I do not think I need to say too much about NAAFI. The returned men here all know of the complaints—at least I do—that we all had against NAAFI during the second war. For one thing, they rely a great deal on the profits they can get. The men could not get their Canadian cigarettes, chocolate bars and so on. The tea was undrinkable and the coffee was worse. But even of more importance, it was a fact that the men could not walk into a canteen and be greeted by Canadians. The man to whom I was speaking said that the recreation facilities in the matter of canteens and so on were the greatest lack as far as operations in Korea were concerned.

I would therefore urge the minister to reconsider the stand he took at that time and to allow these various service clubs to go into Korea in the same way as they travelled all over the world with the boys during the last two wars.

In my conversation with the boys I also found out something else that was rather interesting. It had to do with the accommodation in Korea, particularly around the brigade headquarters. During all of the campaign the boys had been billeted in tents, but by sheer coincidence a few days before the Prime Minister's visit the tents suddenly disappeared and a profusion of quonset huts came on the scene. There was no shortage of them but they had not been able to get them for three years prior to that. For example, after the radio station had appeared to be at a standstill for quite some time it suddenly went on the air just three days before the Prime Minister arrived. At about the same time sudden, feverish activity with respect to the large recreational centre resulted in quite a definite change taking place a few days prior to the Prime Minister's visit.

After the minister and others have visited some of the overseas bases of the Canadian forces they return with glowing tales, but such things as I have mentioned make us wonder whether or not these stories are perhaps a little rosier than the situation is in reality. I urge the minister once more, as I have done on other occasions, that when he or his parliamentary assistant or other officials make their tours of the Canadian overseas establishments they should take at least one or two of the opposition members with them. If things are as good over there as the minister says they are, then he should be only too glad to have opposition members come back here, stand up in the house and say how good things are. On the other hand, if things are not as good as he says, then it is time that the Canadian people found out.

I have a couple of other brief references. I notice that the minister makes reference on page 11 of the white paper to the fact that nuclear information is being distributed among the NATO forces to enable them to take full advantage of these weapons. I should like the minister to elaborate on that slightly and tell us the extent of that information. I should like to know whether it is merely information as to the method of detonating the bombs or whether it goes a little further and gives information as to the set-up, the means of production and so forth.

To come to the navy, I note that the minister has indicated in the white paper that within a few months of the outbreak of hostilities the Canadian navy would have a hundred ships in action. I should like to know how many of these ships could be considered first-line ships, how many could be used for convoy or escort duty in the Atlantic or Pacific, how many could be used as coastal escort vessels and how many would have to be sunk to form barriers to keep the enemy from getting into our bays. He also said that there were 58 ships in commission at the present time. I should like to know how many of the 58 can be considered first-line ships. I should like to know whether or not they are capable of carrying out anti-submarine warfare as it is known today or whether they are the old, cumbersome, corvette-type escort vessel that was obsolete before the end of the last war.

The Canadian navy has always been engaged primarily in escort work, and once again I should like to ask the minister to give serious consideration to the production of small aircraft carriers, possibly a modernized version of the merchant aircraft carriers of the last war, a ship that is not too fast but will carry a small reconnaissance plane that can search the area immediately around the convoy in order to discover the presence of enemy submarines. In my opinion the aircraft launched from the small converted merchant aircraft carriers won the battle of the Atlantic for us. The cost is not great. They are not an expensive ship, and so far as escort work is concerned they are worth their weight in gold.

The minister referred to the air defence plan, the radar screen and so on. Like the minister, I visited one of the radar stations in the screen some time ago, and I too witnessed the interception of so-called enemy planes by fighter aircraft. I was impressed this afternoon by the figure given as to the high percentage of kills made in the air exercises. But I am wondering just how effective the air defence plan would be against highly modern, fast, high-altitude bombers. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, no matter how efficient the radar screen may be it cannot do us any good if the air power behind the screen is insufficient. We have to have enough modern, well-equipped aircraft here in Canada in order to back up that screen. As the minister says, with the type of aerial bomb being constructed today, not many aircraft would have to get through the screen to wreck absolutely a good many of the larger cities of Canada.

As I mentioned at the outset, we in this group will continue to support any necessary defence expenditures or defence effort. The only stipulation we put on our support is that we get value for our dollars, that for every cent that goes into our defence effort we get a cent's worth of value in return. We can only hope that by negotiations or some other means the international crisis will be solved before too long and people will know once more what peace and security are.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, we listened with interest this afternoon to the minister's review of world conditions. I thought it was a typical statement by the minister, a general review with a touch of the external affairs debate in it; some comment about the amount of money that Canada is expending on preparations for defensive purposes; some comment on the navy; slightly more extensive comment on the air force; some mention of the army, but no close attention to the question of detail. The minister started off by suggesting that a clear meaning should be given to some of the expressions that have been used recently in international affairs, such as "massive retaliation", "the new look", and "the long haul". I had hoped he would have taken my advice on an earlier occasion and dropped the use of the word "aggression", and used instead the simple word "war". It has a very clear and well understood meaning. However, he has not come around to that yet.

I agree with the minister that the development of nuclear weapons affords a great deterrent to a major war, but that there is no evidence yet before us that small wars will not occur, that is, the wars of limited objective. For that reason we still have to place reliance on the so-called conventional weapons. To the extent that the minister and his department are maintaining our forces along conventional lines, I think that they are right. We have not yet reached, as he stated, the push-button warfare stage. However, I thought that there was a weakness in the minister's statement. I thought it was more a quartermaster general's review of the situation, mentioning supplies, accommodation, equipment and things of that nature, with a little word from the adjutant general's branch concerning personnel. We did not hear much, if anything, from the point of view of the general staff, those who are responsible for strategy and tactics. I had hoped the minister would apply his mind to the fighting effectiveness of our armed services.

I think that over the years his attitude has become the infrastructure approach to the problems. He likes to tell us about the camps, the accommodation and so on, for the forces. I have no objection to seeing the services properly housed. I believe that is a good thing. It is good for morale and it is good for health. There is no reason why they should not be well looked after. It is the question of emphasis about which I express some surprise. For example, the minister gave us one of those typical sentences of his in respect of our service people in Europe. He told us that they had the finest living accommodation for the men, their wives and children anywhere in the world. Well, that is interesting and we are glad to hear that they are being well looked after.

But I do not think that strikes at the root of the problem in respect of defence. My interest is, what are we getting for our defence dollar in fighting effectiveness? To that question, over the last two or three years, no satisfactory answer has been forthcoming. The minister said nothing or next to nothing concerning weapons and ammunition; nothing about artillery or tanks and very little about rockets or new weapons. He did not even make any statement or announcement to us about the possibility of the Canadian army adopting a new rifle. Perhaps that will come later when we get to the second item of these estimates. I thought it was of sufficient importance for an announcement to be made during the course of the minister's major speech. On this subject he said nothing about the need for increased mobility of our forces, and that is a matter of considerable concern to those who are in charge of the NATO forces in Europe.

I thought the minister might have gone a little further into the problem of what warfare might be like in the future in this atomic age; that he might have pointed out to us that atomic weapons might be used on the battlefield as between two opposing armies; that they would cause a greater area of destruction; that they would prevent the massing of troops in a leisurely way as has been done in other wars; that heavily populated seaports and vast assembly areas would constitute a grave hazard with atomic weapons available. I thought he would go on to point out that under circumstances such as those, the need to assemble forces rapidly to launch an assault and to disperse them rapidly in case of an enemy attack with atomic artillery would require greater mobility than our army possesses today.

We do not want to be prepared merely for the last war or the one that preceded that. We have to keep in mind that other changes are in the air. It would have been very useful to the house to have had some statement from the minister along those lines. I admit that it enters the realm of tactics, perhaps of strategy, but it is only if we understand what we are up against that we can give full accord to the plans of the minister for his preparations. It is only then that the people of Canada would continue unanimously to provide the money necessary for the equipment and expansion of our forces. We surely must know how they are going to be used, and what our plans are with regard to future developments in warfare.

If we are going to have mobility for our army, tracked vehicles for cross country movement are essential and air transport for troops and supplies is essential. The use of the helicopter is a development that is proceeding apace with some armies in other parts of the world. Surely the minister might have dwelt upon this subject, and shown us whether or not our army was up to date in its planning and in its training. In a recent interview with the press, General Montgomery said that the requirement for the troops under his command was mobility and more mobility. What are we doing about that? I shall refer to that a little later.

I want now to just touch on the minister's speech of last November, to which he referred two or three times. I recall, and Hansard records, that last November the minister entered the debate on the speech from the throne and expressed surprise that nobody had mentioned the subject of defence. I shall just quote his words as reported at page 358 of Hansard for November 26. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, this debate opened two weeks ago today, and a most extraordinary thing has happened which I must confess surprises me very much, that is that during this whole period the subject of defence has not so far been mentioned.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and myself undertook to deal with the subject later on in that debate, in answer to this challenge of the minister. Of course there was no opportunity for him to reply at that stage, and he has not taken the opportunity now to answer some of the questions we raised on that occasion.

I was suggesting to him that it would be a fine thing if the Minister of National Defence were to interest himself in the development of the armoured corps, and in the development of an armoured personnel carrier for infantry, in order that the lives of our Canadian soldiers might be saved, in the event of their being engaged in battle under conditions such as occurred during the last war in northwestern Europe. I had hoped the minister would say something about that today, although some interval has elapsed since I posed the questions to him.

I asked him this: Why is the Canadian army as a whole not being brought up to the standards required in modern warfare? Why is the armoured corps not being enlarged and returned to strength and, most important of all, why is not armoured protection for our infantry being provided?

To the last question I find what is perhaps a partial answer as it is set out at page 39 of the white paper. Paragraph 147 says:

> The army is also developing a new tracked carrier for the infantry.

I think the sentence, however, is rather carelessly written. The word "carrier" has been used in the past to refer, not to a troop-carrying vehicle but to a machine-gun-carrying vehicle. It will be recalled that we had Bren gun carriers in the second world war. Who is to tell what this is? If it is to be an armoured personnel carrier, or a troop carrying vehicle, why not say so? But simply to say that a new tracked carrier for the infantry is being provided is not clear enough.

However, I will assume that the minister and his advisers have now come around to the view that the vehicle which was so effective in the second world war in the saving of lives of Canadian soldiers is now going to be used in the present Canadian army, and incorporated in their training. It will be a major step forward if that is done; and I will simply assume that that is now part of the policy of the department.

During the course of my remarks last November, and on other occasions, I have dealt with this topic. I have also dealt with the armoured corps and have lamented the position to which it has fallen within the Canadian army. I said it had become the Cinderella of the Canadian army.

Just a year ago, when I was discussing this matter, the minister said in reply, on April 16, 1953, as reported at page 3981 of Hansard:

> The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre again referred to our playing down the armoured corps. There is no intention of doing that and there is no indication of that being done. Everyone appreciates the great importance of armour and its proper place in any fighting team.

Well, what has happened in the course of the year? If everyone appreciates that, and if the armoured corps is not being played down, then why is it not being enlarged? Why is it not being utilized effectively? I made considerable reference during the course of that speech in the house to how well the Canadian infantry corps, as well as the artillery and the engineers, had been trained, due to the campaign in Korea and to the stationing of troops in Europe, as well as to the rotation of units that had occurred. I dealt at some length with the number of senior officers in those corps of the army who had received training. There were certainly four infantry brigadiers, and a score or perhaps a dozen or more lieutenant colonels, and over a score of majors, and more than that, of company commanders and seconds in command—men who under actual service conditions received training in the command of those formations of troops. The result has been that the Canadian infantry corps, as well as the artillery and the engineers, under this process must have become a very effective fighting team.

But in the same interval what has happened to the armoured corps? This question may be of no importance, until one recalls the status of the armoured corps in the second world war, when it constituted about half of the Canadian army—two armoured divisions, two tank brigades, and so on. But what have we now? Well, we are reduced to two regiments. What training have they received during the Korean war or while the brigade has been stationed in Europe? One squadron only is serving in Korea and one in Europe, and being rotated. The tanks of those squadrons are apparently being farmed out to the infantry regiment. Perhaps they operate now and again, or have operated as squadrons. But I doubt it in Korea. There has been no opportunity for a major in command of that squadron to exercise his squadron as a whole, and there has been no competent training for majors commanding squadrons in the armoured corps. There is no training for seconds in command of armoured regiments. There is no training for lieutenant colonels of armoured regiments. So that at the conclusion of this period during which the Canadian infantry corps as well as the engineers and artillery have become fully trained under conditions of warfare, the armoured corps has been only partially trained. And no plans have been announced to us at the present time indicating any extension of the training of the armoured corps.

The result is that the officers of this part of the army simply cannot be promoted. There is no expansion of their opportunity because there is nowhere for them to go. I do not know whether the present lieutenant colonels of the armoured regiments will become brigadiers in command of infantry brigades; I do not know that. But I think that those men who have had service as lieutenant colonels overseas would take precedence over those who have had experience only here in Canada, with a reduced force under their command.

I pointed out at that time that this is a bad thing for the Canadian army. It is out of balance in relation to the way in which armies are formed elsewhere. The British army, for instance, is not neglecting its armoured corps. I believe they have three armoured divisions in Europe. The Russians have not neglected their armoured strength, nor have the Americans. Why have the Canadians—and particularly when we were experts in the use of armour during the last war?

The minister mentioned economy in men and money as one of the essential points in the defence program. Well, I would point out to him that you have economy in the use of men when you use armoured vehicles. You can have a much greater fire power with several hundred fewer men by using an armoured brigade instead of an infantry brigade. And if they happen to be engaged in battle, you have a very much smaller casualty list. This has been proved time and again. I have advanced evidence before to this effect in the house.

In the face of these facts, why is the armoured corps in the Canadian army neglected? The minister rejected our proposal last year for the maintenance of an armoured brigade in Europe and an armoured brigade in Canada, with rotation between the two. If he will not accept that suggestion, then I put forward this. Why not constitute an armoured brigade here in Canada? Activate another regiment. Let us have three regiments and an armoured brigade headquarters, and train the personnel and the senior officers in the use of armour. It goes farther than just that.

Let me look for one moment at the training program of the Canadian army as I see it in the white paper and from reading the newspapers. The brigade in Europe participated in an exercise not so long ago and was pitted against a British armoured division, and of course acquitted itself nobly. It was a good exercise for the brigade commander and his subordinate commander, a good signal exercise, good for the transportation of the troops, for the supply of them in the field. It would be splendid for the men themselves participating in the open and simulating modern warfare, but quite unrealistic, of course. An infantry brigade versus an armoured division just would not survive under actual conditions unless it had superior artillery, because what effective fighting strength has an infantry battalion against an armoured regiment? They could put out mine fields, use a few bazookas, but under shellfire, under cover of darkness, they have no effective protection against tanks.

I notice on page 30 of the white paper we are informed in paragraph 115 that brigade groups will be assembled for collective training at Camp Wainwright and Camp Gagetown during the summer of 1954. It also says:

> A signal exercise will be conducted by headquarters first Canadian infantry division at Camp Borden in 1954, in which the divisional headquarters, headquarters second and third Canadian infantry brigades, headquarters of supporting arms and services, and signals units will participate.

That is a typical signal exercise, where officers operate from vehicles or at desks, use the wireless and simulate attack and withdrawal and so on. There is no use of troops under those circumstances.

[Mr. Churchill.]

On page 7 of the white paper we find some mention of the mobile striking force consisting of an infantry battalion with airborne units of artillery, engineers, signals, army service corps and medicals. There is no suggestion there that they have been formed into a brigade, or that it has been exercised as a brigade, and there is no mention of armoured formations at all.

I was saying that this reaches farther than simply the provision of armour to balance the army. It reaches farther than that in this way. We must assume that if we are engaged in a war of limited objective, it might be in terrain where armoured forces could be used. We must assume that if we are engaged in a somewhat larger war, armoured forces will be used. The enemy have armoured forces. Therefore the point is that unless we train the high command in the Canadian army in the use of armour we shall be in a very serious position in a state of war.

I say that it is just nonsense to be preparing simply infantry forces—and we are talking about forming a division of infantry—unless we balance against that the necessary armour to give them protection and support. If we do not provide the armour for the Canadian army, we do not train the senior officers. If we do not train the senior officers, we face a serious situation in time of war. I stood in awe of senior officers for a large portion of my life; but with the passing of the years that awe has diminished very considerably. I have the greatest respect, of course, for my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, but he will agree with me it is essential for the high command, for divisional and corps commanders, to understand the use of all arms within the army. We had many experiences in the second world war of that where people unfamiliar with armoured formations were not able to use them effectively. Repeatedly I told men under my command when we were engaged in exercises in England at which they grumbled: "Put up with it; do anything that you are told to do under these conditions because we are training the high command, and you may live a bit longer if the high command gets trained."

I am a bit worried about the Canadian army. We have a great number of experienced senior officers still with us in the service, and all credit to them for staying in the service, and all honour to them. I respect them. A great many of them have active service experience and understand conditions, but a new crop of officers is being produced, and I doubt whether that new crop of officers is being thoroughly trained. How can they be thoroughly trained unless the armoured corps is brought back to its position within the Canadian army that it occupied heretofore? It simply means that the experienced senior officers in the Canadian infantry corps, in the engineers and in the artillery, are going to rise to the top. They will become the major generals and lieutenant generals; they will command the divisions and the corps and they will not know very much about armour. No armoured corps officer is going to reach high position because no senior armoured corps officer is being fully trained at the present time. We have no armoured brigade; we have no armoured division, and there, Mr. Chairman, is a weakness in the Canadian army which I think should be corrected.

I had hoped that the minister would deal with some of these pressing problems instead of giving us just that quartermaster general's view of the situation. It is an effective fighting force that we want. We want to know how our defence dollar is being spent. Is it producing effective fighting forces? Are we producing with that defence dollar the means for protecting the lives of our men? They will fight gallantly under any conditions. They will die as gallantly as the defenders of Dien Bien Phu, if placed under similar circumstances, but that is not war; that is suicide. The Canadian soldier, who is a first-class soldier, if well trained, should never be subjected to conditions under which he is placed at a disadvantage. My hope is that the Canadian army will become the most effective fighting force available within the NATO countries, and that it will have the full equipment for modern conditions; that it will have the mobility that is required for modern warfare, and that it will have the trained staff that is required in order to utilize to its fullest effect artillery and armour, infantry and engineers and so on. Equipped with the best of weapons, equipped with track vehicles for cross-country purposes, equipped with those protective troop carrying vehicles for the infantry, and equipped with transport aeroplanes and helicopters, if those are found to be satisfactory for use in the field, equipped in this way, brought up to date, modernized, the Canadian army would be something of which we would be prouder than we are at the present time, although we are very proud of it. It would then be an effective fighting force and there would be protection for our men if they were ever placed under modern conditions of warfare, for they would be an integrated, coordinated force which would serve to train the high command, and if we were ever called upon to undertake war in future we would achieve the success which has been granted to the Canadian soldiers in the field in other wars in which Canada has been engaged.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, coming into the chamber this evening I noticed that the committee on procedure was sitting. It struck me at that time, after listening to the Minister of National Defence making his comprehensive statement, then listening to the official spokesmen on defence matters for the Conservative party, our own chief spokesman and the member who spoke on behalf of the Social Credit party, that if this general debate on the defence estimates stopped right there, so far as general statements are concerned, it would be much better, and we could then go into the estimates in detail, thus saving a lot of time. To my surprise, when I was upstairs in the cafeteria, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who is a member of that committee, pretty well expressed the same opinion, so we may be getting around to the time when we can avoid duplication in debate.

Listening to the Minister of National Defence this afternoon, one was struck by the fact that defence today is perhaps the biggest business in the world. The attention of the world is focused on the possibility of war, making preparations for war, and spending huge chunks of national income to that end. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar this afternoon dealt in detail with the defence program as set out in the white paper and I am going to try to avoid any duplication of his remarks. But, as I have already said, the thing that struck me was the difficulty of anyone in or out of the government estimating exactly what the cost of defence might be under the circumstances which today confront the world.

We are in that position simply because our program is defensive, and because we are on the defensive. The people against whom we are arming to defend ourselves are on the offensive, and they are in a position to choose their own battleground and time their attack, when it is going to be and where it will be, and there is no one either on that side of the house or on this in a position to say just when that attack will come. That is what makes the problem not only of estimating the cost but of criticizing the cost so very difficult, because the whole thing is merely a guess based on a hypothetical war. You cannot estimate that cost down to the last dollar, though you can probably make some good guesses.

I could make a speech with a lot of words that would sound all right but which would perhaps not read quite so well, and after I had finished I would not have said anything. But what I am going to try to do is to pinpoint the two things which stand out in my mind in relation to the defence program, and I think they are pretty clear.

The first of these is Canada's defence objectives as set out on page 5 of the white paper, and I think we should keep these in mind. Anything we do in this chamber, particularly of a national or international character, should have a very clearly defined objective, and the first objective set out there very briefly states:

> The objectives of our defence policy remain the same as heretofore:
> (1) The immediate defence of Canada and North America from direct attack;

That is set down as our first objective, to see that this country is sufficiently prepared in the event of a direct attack to resist that attack. And then it goes on to say:

> (2) implementation of any undertakings made by Canada under the charter of the United Nations.

And so on. That is our second objective. And again, in section 9, on the same page, prominence is again given to the first paragraph under those objectives, namely defence against direct attack. That should be the first consideration as far as Canada's national defence program is concerned, and that is the thing to which we, as members of the opposition, should be directing our attention in order to see that the objectives set out by the government are properly planned.

The minister this afternoon did not say anything about what in my judgment is one of the first requirements in any defence program, and that is that one of the first things we should do, if we expect the support of the people who pay taxes and thereby provide the wherewithal for this defence program, is to make it very clear to the general public, and particularly to service personnel, why we are arming ourselves, against whom we are arming to defend ourselves, and what we might expect in the future.

Hon. members will no doubt recall that Bill Boss wrote some very critical articles from Korea early in the Korean war and he said that as far as Canadian soldiers were concerned the thing they did not understand and which was never made clear to them was what they were fighting for. The minister neglected to deal with that particular side of the defence program.

However, I have an editorial in my hand which indicates that the defence department is working on that problem. This editorial states that at Acadia University and McGill University in Montreal a series of lectures on that subject is being given which will eventually be put into book form to be distributed among service personnel. I think that is something which is badly needed because we cannot keep on telling the people of Canada, the United States, or any other country that a continuous war is necessary in order that they may live. We must not forget that we have had practically nothing but war during the lifetime of the present generation, and it must be made clear to them exactly why we are carrying on this huge defence program. I am glad to see the department is doing something about bringing that aspect of the situation to the attention of service personnel, and I think these matters should be more widely publicized so they will be brought to the attention of the average Canadian citizen.

The second thing about which I should like to say a few words is this question that has been referred to by practically all those who have spoken, namely that of the danger of an atomic war, of the throwing of the hydrogen bomb, the possibility of setting the world afire and all that kind of thing as related to our present defence program. As far as I am concerned, I am not afraid of the throwing of the atomic bomb or the hydrogen bomb. I do not think that there is anyone in Russia, the United States or Canada who does not realize that if either the hydrogen bomb or the atomic bomb is thrown, there is not going to be anything left. I do not think there is any country in this world today that wants to commit either national or international suicide. In the event of either Russia or the United States deciding to throw that bomb, all I can say is this. Planes will load up in Russia with bombs for the North American continent. We will load planes in the United States with bombs for Russia. Each group will arrive at their destination, will bomb their targets and return; and when they get back home there will be nothing to land on. Where do they go from there? The situation is as fantastic as that, without any doubt.

I do not think there is anyone today in any kind of a position of authority to give an order to begin that kind of action who is foolish enough to do so, because nobody can win. A great deal of that propaganda, of course, may be coming from certain sources for the purpose of mixing people up on this question of defence. I do not think any such order is going to be given or that any such action is going to take place. In my opinion we are in for a long siege of the kind of thing we are getting in Korea and Indo-China. I believe we are going to get a great deal more of that kind of thing.

I am convinced—as I have been for a long time—that the objective of Russia today is to take control of Asia and that she is not going to do it with atomic bombs or hydrogen bombs. The pattern has already been set. With all due respect to everyone who has expressed the opinion that there is a danger of this other thing happening, I would suggest to them that with all of this talk of new weapons, the only practical demonstrations we have had during the past few years have been in Korea and Indo-China. In both of these actions, manpower was the decisive factor. In my judgment, for some considerable time to come the decisive factor will be manpower with ground weapons. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that we are not placing enough emphasis on armament. I am convinced that is the kind of thing for which we must be prepared for a long time to come.

This afternoon the Minister of National Defence said that the policy of the communist party in the matter of world domination has not been changed. I agree with him. It has not been changed. But they are not guessing about anything. They are on the offensive. They mapped out their objectives a long time ago and the way in which they were going to achieve them. The period they are in now is that of promoting national revolutions from country to country. We started to lose this war at Yalta, Teheran and Casablanca when we granted all of the concessions that were granted for jumping-off places all through Europe. That is where we began to lose it. These contributions they are making, without using their own forces but by supplying material, advice and that kind of thing, are things that we are going to have to contend with for a long time to come.

As to Europe, I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar this afternoon. We have twelve squadrons over in Europe. From the standpoint of defence for Canada, I believe that we could take six of them back. If we save some money through the process, that is all to the good. I believe that six of them could be back here. Instead of there being a brigade of foot soldiers in Europe, I think the forces there should be, to the extent of at least 75 per cent, armoured forces. I think at this time the real purpose our troops in Europe are serving is that of morale-boosters. If the Russians, with the forces at their disposal, wanted to move there, I do not think there is much there to stop them. However, I do not think they intend to move there; I do not think they have any such intentions. But if they did move, it would be much better to meet them with armour than with foot soldiers. In terms of defence for Canada, I think that these squadrons should be back home. I agree with the observations in the white paper, supported by all of those who have spoken, namely that what we should be thinking about is a mobile striking force; that is, in terms of defence for Canada. The minister himself pointed out that we have a large country with long coast line. We do not know where anything may happen. It could happen anywhere. But we should have in Canada a trained airborne force that we could ship from place to place in a hurry, and it should be at the brigade level. I again agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that at least a brigade of well-trained airborne troops, with sufficient aircraft in the country to move them from one place to another, is something that is absolutely necessary in Canada if we are thinking in terms of defence for Canada. With our population and our resources, as far as a fighting force is concerned that is about all we can do having regard to the international picture that exists today.

This afternoon nobody said much about the reserve army. The last time the defence estimates were before the committee a great deal was said about the reserve army. I myself said a great deal as did the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. At that time, in my opinion, the limiting factor in developing a proper reserve army was the lack of barracks in which to train the men and the lack of equipment. Since that debate took place there has been a big improvement in the barracks and in the equipment. I cannot speak for the whole of the country but I know that in my own end of it there has been a 100 per cent improvement and that, with the improvement in the training facilities—new barracks, in fact, and proper equipment—there are a great many boys interested in taking part in the reserve army today who would not do so previously because there was not available a proper place in which to take instruction. Under our system of voluntary enlistment, I think the reserve army is something that is absolutely necessary. It is the mobilization centre of any future army in Canada. It is the place where we get a great deal of basic training done anyway; and it is much easier to put in the permanent force or in the special force troops who have had some basic training and who have some idea of discipline than it is to pick them raw off the street and out of the ranks of the unemployed and expect them to be good soldiers. I think any money we are spending on the reserve army is well spent. In my end of the country the reserve army has been improved 100 per cent since we last discussed the matter here. I also agree with the statement of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar this afternoon that the "Maggie" should be re-equipped so that we might have an aircraft carrier on each coast. I think that is necessary not only for training but for many other purposes, and I support him in that contention.

One could go on for a long time in summing up the whole problem, but as I said when I started, it is difficult to criticize the estimates just as it is difficult to estimate what the requirements are going to be with respect to a matter that is purely hypothetical so far as we are concerned. If we were preparing for a war and knew where and when we were going to be hit we could sit down and make our estimates accordingly; but when the initiative is in the other person's hands and he has the world in which to choose his battleground, then we have got to anticipate where and when the outbreak may take place and what type of war it is going to be, and it is pretty hard to sit down and estimate exactly what your requirements are in such circumstances.

I think we have to begin to think in terms of priorities. What are the first priorities? I think our first priority is set out in the white paper, namely, the defence of Canada. Thinking in terms of the defence of Canada, the main emphasis of the Department of National Defence should be on a mobile striking force that can be moved quickly from one section of Canada to the other. I think that is our main concern, and I believe that one-half of our air force in Europe should be brought back to Canada for that purpose. I do not believe we need twelve air force squadrons in Europe as Canada's contribution. I think the minister should give serious consideration to that.

I am convinced that so far as Canada is concerned we should not be thinking about taking part in the kind of show that took place in Korea in the future. We should be building for something bigger than that. We should realize that so far as any of these sideline wars are concerned the battlefield is not in Korea or Indo-China. I think it is pretty nearly time that the free world gave our potential enemy to understand that there is only one battleground and that we are not going to continue to allow ourselves to be dragged into sideline skirmishes in the four corners of the world, skirmishes that only create confusion, at the beck and call of someone whose aim is world conquest. I think it should be clearly understood that there is only one battleground, and that is the centre from which the whole world disturbance is being promoted.

I believe our build-up should be along these lines, and it should be clearly understood that we recognize what the situation is. If one sifts out what is being said in the United States, I think one can say that that country is beginning to think along those lines. We are in a very difficult position to estimate what our future is going to be. I believe the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich will agree with me that one of the main things a good general will do if he is planning an attack is to choose the battleground upon which he is going to fight. He has a lot in his favour if he can succeed in doing that.

Since the end of the last shooting war we have been in the position of being tossed around like a small boat on the sea because someone who really has a fixed objective, an objective fixed a long time ago, and who has satellites all over the world promoting his aims, is calling the shots in this struggle for world power. It is pretty difficult to sit back on the defensive as we have been doing for a long time and estimate what our future is going to be. First of all, I think we should take care of the defence of Canada and make sure that if anyone does succeed in getting through to us we will be able to give a good account of ourselves. In the second place, we should serve notice on those who are disturbing the peace of the world that they cannot go on forever.

I am not and never have been afraid of Russia starting a world war. She does not have to. She has got the kind of war going today that she wants. This is the kind of thing that she has planned for a good many years. I am convinced she also recognizes that in the countries she has subjugated since the end of the last war there are underground movements waiting for relief. The day an atomic bomb is dropped somewhere in Europe will be the day that Russia will be pushed back within her own borders. She has expanded into Germany. In that part of the world she is like the fly that has captured the fly paper. She is there and she is stuck, and when that paper is disturbed we will have a whole lot of allies in these countries.

That is why I am not afraid of Russia starting a war. She does not need it. She has got the kind of war she wants now. She has been able to drag us to Korea where we have a supply line three or four thousand miles long in order to keep the troops in the field, provide them with munitions and so on. On the other hand Russia has millions and millions of people to throw in there as cannon fodder, people who can live on rice, and thus she can gain her objective of taking control of the whole of Asia. That is the kind of war she wants. She does not want the other kind.

I said, Mr. Chairman, that I was only going to make a few rambling remarks. I should like to suggest that the committee on procedure give consideration to making provision for four main speeches in a debate such as this, one from each group in the house. Such speeches would really express the opinions and thinking of the other members of the groups, and when they were over we could get down to the estimates and do the job of getting them cleaned up as quickly as we can.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, my remarks on the opening item of the estimates will be concerned chiefly with the Royal Canadian Navy. I think every hon. member is justifiably proud of the Royal Canadian Navy, its great expansion in the last war and the work it performed then and the work it has done since in Korean waters. From any observations I have made of naval personnel since the close of hostilities, I can only say that naval personnel at present and during the last few years are in every way a credit to Canada both at home and abroad.

Like many other hon. members who have already spoken, I thoroughly agree that we cannot discard the so-called conventional weapons at the present time simply because new advances in the field of warfare have been made such as the hydrogen bomb, the atom bomb and so on. I agree with the last member who spoke, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, that Russia will probably attempt to hold piecemeal wars here and there, and try to gain control over more territory by the bits and pieces method. We have seen it in Korea, although they did not get too far there. In Indo-China, however, they have been doing fairly well so far. From reports received today, I understand they are very close to Hanoi and are still going. The Russians have been able to succeed in other parts of the world without war, for instance in Czechoslovakia. I rather feel, as many other members have already stated they feel, that this is the kind of thing we are going to have to put up with for a long time.

We may have many localized actions all over the world, and we will not be using nuclear weapons. We shall have to use the more conventional weapons. For that reason, I am quite in accord that the naval forces, with conventional weapons, should be maintained at the highest peak of efficiency. I am glad to see in the estimates put forward by the minister this year that the navy is going to receive its fair share of the funds available. I was pleased also to observe that gracious living is not being taken from the navy. This year 267 chauffeurs are to be maintained as compared with 216 for last year.

The matter with which I should like to deal in some detail concerns the Royal Canadian naval benevolent fund. I mention this because I have received many inquiries about it from naval personnel, so I can only presume that there must be very little general knowledge about the fund. I bring it up at this time because this fund was set up originally by order in council in 1942, P.C. 1067. In due course the fund was incorporated under the dominion Companies Act, and I understand makes an annual report to the Secretary of State. The president of this fund at the moment is an engineering rear admiral, G. L. Stephens, retired. I should like to mention just a few of the directors. They are Commander A. C. Bethune, O.B.E., RCN, retired; Captain J. Jeffrey, O.B.E.; Commander K. Maclachlan; Commodore P. E. Earl; Captain P. B. German; Commander R. P. White, and many others. I just mention those names to illustrate the high qualifications of those who are administering this fund.

The fund has had a rather interesting history, but I intend to deal with it only briefly. I have mentioned already that it was set up in 1942 and was duly incorporated in 1945. I recall very well that at the close of hostilities a signal was sent out by naval service headquarters announcing that the canteen funds of naval ships were to be turned over to this fund. I might say that most of us considered it rather arbitrary at the time because these funds actually were derived from the small profits of ships' canteens and were normally returned to naval personnel on the ships in the form of a bonus when they went on leave or a little extra party at Christmastime if we were in harbour. However, these funds were turned over to the R.C.N. benevolent fund. I believe that at the end of 1945 the fund received $33,000 from the ships that were afloat and $386,000 from shore naval establishments.

Towards the end of 1949 the sum of $1,460,-287.25 was contributed to this fund from the prize money that was owing to Canadian naval personnel as a result of the capture of enemy merchant ships during the war. Normally, these moneys would have been distributed to the various former naval personnel, but I am informed that the cost of distributing them to the ex-naval personnel would have been very high and would have used up most of the funds. For this reason, it was turned over to the benevolent fund. I am informed also that there was some little difficulty as to how the money would be paid out, if it had been decided to distribute it. Some of the senior officers thought they should get more than the lower ranks, while other members thought everyone should be paid the same. Since no one could agree, this was one of the contributing reasons for turning the money over to the benevolent fund.

Since that time many other donations have been received by the fund. There have been gifts from private individuals, money from ships' canteens, money from the navy league, and things like that. The last audit statement, December 31, 1953, showed that there was $2,627,509.79 in this fund, largely in dominion government bonds. Since there is all this money in the fund, many people are naturally curious as to who is eligible for assistance. Very briefly and without going into any detail, all members or former members of the naval service are eligible for benefits, as well as their dependents. There is a long description of the dependents, such as widows, wives, children and so on.

The next question is, what type of assistance is given by the fund? Normally, payments out of this fund are apparently in small denominations up to $150 in one class and then up to $300 in another class, and, in certain exceptional cases, over $300. The assistance under this fund is never in the nature of continuing assistance, but rather in the nature of assistance for some unforeseen difficulty such as illness. It is not used for helping people to build homes, to pay business debts or anything like that. I should like to mention that these loans are approved by an executive committee of the board of directors if they are for more than $300. If the loans are under $300, they are approved by one of three claims committees. One of these claims committees looks after the Atlantic provinces, another looks after Ontario, Quebec and the three western provinces and the third looks after British Columbia.

In cases of extreme emergency concerning requests for less than $150, the nearest naval division may authorize payment. The financial statement issued by the fund last year showed that some $629,126 were paid out in grants and $85,281 were advanced to persons in the form of loans. The balance sheet shows an excess of income over expenditures of $11,548. The income consisted of $75,000 from bond interest and $70,000 in donations, funds from ships' canteens and various agencies interested in the navy.

There is one thing that has come up as a result of investigations by the directors of this fund that directly affects naval personnel and is directly related to these estimates. In a report by Rear Admiral Stephens, who is chairman of this committee, it is pointed out that the directors of this fund are increasingly concerned about applications for assistance from young naval personnel in the active service. Apparently these young people have been getting themselves into debt through buying furniture in an extravagant fashion. They have married while young, and they have not been accustomed to looking after homes. The result has been that they have spent far too much money in trying to keep up with the Joneses, so to speak. Applications of this type have caused the fund considerable worry, and I think the directors of the fund hope that the Minister of National Defence might authorize some sort of brief training course instructing sailors who come to the service in how to run their homes, and how to avoid running up large bills.

The only criticism I have to offer in connection with the benevolent fund is as to the personnel of the board of directors. It would seem to me that it is a bit top-heavy with what might be called the top brass. There are a lot of admirals, captains and commanders, but there do not seem to be any others on that board. It might be helpful if there were one or two able seamen—not too many, perhaps, but just one or two.

In addition to this, people who wish to make applications to the fund might be permitted to make those applications to the local branches of the Legion. The astonishing thing to me is that the ordinary person does not seem to know about it. I feel some effort should be made by the directors of the fund to bring to the attention of the public information as to how one can get at it and how to make application for the benefits it offers. There are a number of naval divisions scattered across Canada, as we know, but they are a long way from the homes of the people requiring assistance. There should be some method of publicizing the fund which, I believe, would be of great assistance to those requiring help from it, and would improve public relations with the fund. Because, from what I have been able to observe, it is being ably run; but because the general public does not know about it, it is not used to the best advantage because people are always suspicious about those things with which they are not familiar.

I should like to leave this point and proceed to another matter. This afternoon the minister mentioned that he was very well satisfied with the naval program, and felt that it was going ahead as well as could be expected. While there were certain shortcomings, he indicated that he was very pleased with it. This however does not seem to be quite in accordance with the view expressed by Vice-Admiral Mainguy, chief of Canada's naval staff, in a speech delivered not long ago. On March 25 Vice-Admiral Mainguy made a speech in Vancouver. The newspaper article commenting on that speech is as follows:

> Vice-Admiral Edmond Mainguy, chief of Canada's naval staff, said Wednesday the navy is "behind" on its 1954 recruiting and expansion program.
> He said at a press conference here that the 1954 target is 100 commissioned ships and 21,000 permanent force officers and men.
> While the program was behind, recruiting had surged this year, and intake for the permanent force was "slightly more than we can handle" at present, because physical establishments were not big enough to handle the flow.
> The shipbuilding program was behind because of a lack of certain technicians, strikes in some cases, and holdups in certain equipment production.

According to the white paper issued by the minister the strength of the navy on March 31, 1954, was 16,955 officers and men, a net increase over last year of 1,409. It is rather interesting to compare these figures with the net increase in previous years. From 1951 to 1952 the net increase in naval personnel was 2,423. In the period from 1952 to 1953 it was 2,041 and in the period 1953 to 1954 it was 1,409.

In other words there has been a steady decrease in the net increase in naval personnel for the last three years. At that rate it seems to me hardly likely that by the end of 1954 the objective of 21,000 officers and men will be reached. The question naturally arises in most people's minds as to the methods used in recruiting, and the advertising costs in connection therewith. In the estimates this year there is a sum of $360,000 as the amount indicated for advertising. Presumably this is for recruiting purposes. I would point out that in the same period last year the amount was $358,000, or about the same as for the coming year.

During the period last year, with a net increase of 1,409 personnel the approximate advertising cost per person on the net increase in personnel was more than $250 each. It would seem to me that at that cost we should have obtained better results. The actual cost of advertising for recruits in the period from 1952 to 1953 was $398,000, for a net increase in naval personnel of 2,041 thus making an actual cost in that period of $188 per person.

As I have said before, advertising costs seem very high, per person, when one considers the number of people coming in. What can we do about it? I would suggest to the minister that he might take certain things into consideration. First of all the obvious thing would be to investigate the type of advertising and publicity that is being used, to see if some improvement can be made. It may be that this is possible, and that we would gain more recruits per advertisement.

On the other hand there is another way that I believe would be more effective—and I have three suggestions in mind. First of all I believe the best results would be obtained if the naval reserve were increased. I would direct the attention of hon. members to page 21 of the minister's white paper where under the heading "Reserve Forces" we find this, in connection with the navy:

> A new command was established during the year past to administer and train the R.C.N. (R) and plans are now in progress to increase the total strength of the naval reserve.

Apparently the minister is of the opinion that the reserve force ought to be increased; and I quite agree with him. If the naval reserve is not increasing at the desired rate, one method that might help out would be to make tax free the pay received by members of the naval reserve. I have talked to a number of people who were interested in joining this force, or one of the other services, and they have told me that they would have done so had it not been for the fact that the money they received for their period of training one night a week is subject to tax. This very often puts them in a higher income tax bracket, and they have felt that the amount they have left is not sufficient to warrant the time involved. I have been told on various occasions that if these payments were not taxable they would have been glad to join the reserve units. It is true that some who would join might be somewhat beyond the age of usefulness. But there is certainly an intangible value in having a strong naval reserve. One advantage is that the people see parades; they see the navy turning out. People talk about it, and it is brought to their minds more than it would be in the newspapers or in movie trailers. People can see the name as the personnel come down the street in a church parade, or they have the chance to see them take training courses. That helps to bring the navy to people's minds, not so many advertisements in the paper of two sailors with great big smiles going on leave from a ship, or more often one advertisement which shows sailors with a big smile going back on board after leave, which is very unusual.

Then there is the matter of sea cadets. If you want to get people in the navy you should get them in when they are young, because at that time they are more easily moulded. They are not settled in their ways as some of us are here. When people are young is the best time to get them in the navy. Sea cadets do a wonderful job in this way. When they join the sea cadets they wear a uniform and they get a certain amount of training. It brings the navy home to them. The advantages of the navy can be pointed out to the sea cadets, and when they are through with the sea cadets they can join the navy. When the public sees the sea cadets it also brings the navy to their minds and impresses them with the fact that the navy is a great service to belong to.

Another branch along the same line would be the naval veterans association. Apparently a number of naval veterans associations have sprung up in Canada during the last few years. One was formed in my riding last fall and it has been a great success. A church parade was held, and it brought the navy home to the public. To use the vernacular: "Talk up the navy". It is such things as these that would help in recruiting. It is much more effective than a great deal of advertising. Some of the money that has been spent in advertising could be better used to assist the sea cadets and the small branches of the naval veterans association. If that were done the recruiting program in the long run would be much more successful.

The next item I should like to touch on is the matter of some of our new ships. Last fall I, along with other hon. members, had the opportunity of seeing some of our new destroyer type of escort ships which are in the process of construction. From my little knowledge gained in past years I would say that these ships appear to me to be well designed by Canadian personnel, I understand, and are indeed a credit to the navy. However, I agree with the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich that these ships are a little expensive for the type of work they will be doing. Perhaps some other method, as the hon. member pointed out this afternoon, would be better. The question also arises in my mind: Is the construction of those ships proceeding as fast as it should? This afternoon the minister said that construction was proceeding as fast as similar construction in other countries, but I do not think he intimated it was proceeding as fast as he would like to see it. I am informed that shortly before last Christmas there was a hold-up in the construction of those new destroyer escort type ships and this hold-up was due to shortages of materials that had to be ordered from abroad. When the minister replies he may enlighten us on whether any hold-up in construction has taken place, and whether construction has resumed or is still held up.

The information I received is apparently substantiated by the chief of naval staff in the speech that I referred to earlier. He said that the shipbuilding program was behind because of lack of certain technicians and was held up for certain equipment production. These remarks of the chief of the naval staff seem to substantiate the statement made to me that the construction of those ships was not proceeding as fast as it should.

Another type of ship that I had the opportunity to observe at the same time last fall was the new type of minesweeper which was under construction. This minesweeper, unlike the ones used in the last war, was designed largely for minesweeping purposes. It seemed to be an excellent ship indeed with the one exception. A gun was mounted on the ship aft the funnel. It appeared to me to be a type of gun known as a pom-pom. In the last war those guns were not particularly effective against enemy aircraft, and I doubt very much whether this gun would have very much effect against a modern jet aircraft, which certainly travels a great deal faster than the aircraft used in the last war. I made some inquiries at the time and it was indicated to me that this gun was placed there largely for morale purposes and not for any destructive purposes. That is all very well. It is pleasant to keep up morale, but when you have to put heavy gun mountings away above the water line on the ship you have increased the amount of ballast that has to be built in in almost geometric proportion. It would seem that if those ships are going to be used for minesweeping they would be much better protected by supporting aircraft than by a single pom-pom.

There are two other items which I should like to touch on before concluding. The first is the matter of officer training in the navy. This matter is of some interest to me because during the last war I was at one time largely connected with officer training. I understand that at the present time for the first two years the embryo naval officers, along with embryo officers from the other services, attend those tri-service colleges and they all get the same training. That is all very fine, and it may have certain economic advantages. It may serve to get one service more familiar with the activities of another, but on the other hand I wonder whether it is just the wise thing. In the minister's white paper, which he set out very well, he said that the main object of the Canadian navy is to protect convoys and the secondary purpose is harbour defence. Accordingly the inference is that we are not going to be concerned with large combined operations in landings, and so on, as the British navy and the United States navy are. Our purpose is designed peculiarly for convoy work, as we did in the last war. If that is so, it would not indicate that this tri-service training is particularly necessary. If we are not going to be in combined operations, what is the purpose? In my opinion this tri-service training that we are undergoing at the present time causes a great many things to be sacrificed that are peculiar to the navy. I do not use the word "peculiar" in the sense of being strange; but it is in particular, shall I say, the habits and customs, the methods of discipline, all of which tend to engender pride in one's service and increase morale. I think there is a great tendency to lose some of this in having the three services all training together, and nobody knowing whether he is fish or flesh, so to speak. I mention that for the minister's consideration. Has the tri-service college worked out as well as it was supposed to?

A matter that I should like to touch on, which does not concern the navy, was mentioned by the minister this afternoon, namely, the joint United States-Canadian network of radar defence stations in northern Canada. To date we have not received any figures as to what it has cost. It is my understanding that these sums are of a confidential and secret nature. There is very little doubt that the costs of those radar defence stations are very high indeed. It cannot be otherwise. Every hon. member will agree that Canada should do her bit in helping to defend this continent. We are very glad to do our share. There seems little doubt in my mind that these radar defence stations are really far more for the protection of the United States than they are for the protection of Canada. There are far more targets in the United States which would be apt to be the subject of H or A-bomb attacks than there are in Canada. But the minister has not told us what these stations are going to cost and what relative proportion of payment has been worked out. Is the United States going to pay the entire cost or are they going to pay only a part?

Mr. Claxton: If I may interrupt the hon. member, I would point out that that has been put on record through an exchange of notes.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps I could shorten my remarks if the minister could tell us the proportion of payments.

Mr. Claxton: It roughly works out at two-thirds by the United States and one-third by Canada.

Mr. Nesbitt: I had heard rumours to that effect, Mr. Chairman, although I did not realize they had been made official. However, it would seem to me that since the population of the United States is more than ten times that of Canada and their wealth and resources are vastly superior, and perhaps 10 times more than that of Canada—possibly, Mr. Chairman, I had better correct that statement. I would say that American resources and wealth are considerably more than 10 times that of Canada and her population is certainly more than 10 times that of Canada. It would therefore seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that Canada's share should not be one-third but perhaps nearer to one-tenth. As I said earlier, we want to pay our share but we do not want to be goats for the United States. These defences help the United States as much as or more than they assist Canada, and I cannot see why a country smaller in both actual wealth and population should have to pay such a high percentage.

It is true that we have vast wealth and resources which are as yet undeveloped, but at the present time American resources and wealth are infinitely superior to our own and I cannot feel that we should pay one-third of the cost of these stations. It seems to me to be quite ridiculous.

I know these matters are international in character and that we have to play along with the United States. In fact, I would be the first to agree with that, but I still feel that Canada is paying far too much in this regard, and I hope the minister, perhaps through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, might be able to make some other arrangement in future whereby we can pay a little less.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I wish to remark that I do not share the optimism expressed by the hon. member for Cape Breton South when he suggested that modern atomic and H-bombs were so horrible that they would probably never be brought into use and that we could work on that assumption. I can well imagine that after the terrible slaughter at the battle of Crécy it was observed by the people on the scene, and the opinion held by many thereafter, that another war would be impossible when one contemplated the horrible slaughter caused by the blunderbuss against which there was no defence.

I therefore think we would be deluding ourselves and falling into a state of mind which might give us a false sense of security if we were to suppose that that was so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I noted with satisfaction in the introduction to the white paper which was tabled by the minister the other day these words:

> It is appropriate now to provide the fullest possible information on our defence activities and plans in order that this program can be understood in the light of Canada's over-all defence policy.

Having read that, I am going on the assumption that the minister will welcome a close questioning on the activities of the Department of National Defence, and I assume that the more penetrating the questions are the happier the minister will be.

Now, the question of national defence in this country has become a colossal one. It is a department which spends much more of the national budget than any other department, and indeed a very large proportion of our total budget is now spent on defence.

Our defence effort has many new phases. There is the defence of this continent and this country; there is our contribution to NATO; there are the three services to be considered; the reserve forces, and the question of research on methods of defence, which is now the responsibility of the defence research board; and there are many other phases in this vast program of national defence. I therefore consider, Mr. Chairman, that it is impossible and perhaps inadvisable for me to attempt to give even a cursory view of the whole question of national defence because by so doing I could only skim the surface in the 40 minutes at my disposal. Therefore, I intend to confine my remarks to two subjects only which are of special interest to me. However, since it is practically ten o'clock, I do not think I should continue meantime but should ask you, Mr. Chairman, to call it ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I was given to understand unofficially that some arrangement had been arrived at between representatives of the parties whereby the house would sit beyond ten o'clock tonight. I would be glad to hear from those who were parties to that arrangement and whether that is correct.

Mr. Lennard: It is ten o'clock.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I would be quite happy to carry on if that meets with the approval of the committee.

Mr. Claxton: Go ahead.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, it is ten o'clock.

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, before you call it ten o'clock may I point out that it was my understanding that it was a matter of convenience to all hon. members that we should continue this debate in order that we might get on with this work, and I understand it was suggested we might make better progress by taking the hour between ten and eleven o'clock tonight.

Mr. Lennard: It is ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: May I say that we have been trying to work out some arrangement in order that it would not be necessary to start morning sittings next week, and it was my understanding that the estimates would be under discussion tonight until eleven o'clock. I have no control over other hon. members but I hope that some arrangement of that kind can be worked out. That certainly is the understanding of the Leader of the Opposition and I hope that can be done.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lennard: It was not my understanding.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted I was saying that there were two subjects to which I wanted to confine my attention. One of them is the reserve forces of the army and navy in the province from which I come, and in the course of my remarks in that connection I will probably be paying particular attention to the reserve forces in my own riding.

We in Prince Edward Island are very proud of the history and record of our reserve forces which have been built up over the last 150 years. They have a very proud record of service both in peace and in many wars. I think you will pardon me if, in that connection, I quote briefly from the Prince Edward Island magazine for April, 1900, over 50 years ago. Even at that time a record of excellent service by the reserve forces of that province had already been built up. At page 40 in this article I note the following:

> In 1812, we find the "garden province" sending her sons to battle in the war of that date. In that year 100 volunteers left Queen's wharf on one of H.M. ships-of-war en route to the scene of conflict.

And so on. Then again they go on to say:

> In the Crimean war, quite a number of Islanders fought in the British ranks; some went from the Island and others enlisted from different parts of the world. In fact, wherever Britain's battles were being fought, whether in the Crimea, beneath the walls of China, or the battlefields of Europe and America, there might be found the sons of the "Garden of the Gulf" fighting valiantly for their sovereign and the empire.

I cite that merely to point out that it has been traditional in my province for young men to take a keen interest in the reserve forces and to serve in them if at all possible. They automatically considered that service to be one of their responsibilities. In that connection may I say this. Even before the province entered confederation it had a very fine record of service in that connection. In order that my remarks will not be classified merely as an opinion, I should again like to read a quotation. I am quoting now from the report of the inspecting field officer of militia for the year 1868. He had this to say:

> I have dwelt at some length on this portion of the militia because it is the effective force of the island, and too much attention cannot be given to the maintenance of its efficiency as it appears a matter of certainty that the Imperial troops are no longer to hold garrison here. The "material" is unexceptionable and only requires steady instruction, good organization and discipline to render it a force second to none. They are most eager to obtain the means of training, and were the staff of instructors twice as numerous as it is, it would be insufficient to meet all the demands made upon it. The Queen's County Regiment of Volunteer Militia is well commanded by competent field officers.

He goes on to say, in that connection, that during that year 9,178 men in the reserves received instruction. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, in that year in the one county alone, with a population of only 45,000, the colony had 5,213 trained reserves before confederation.

I have a purpose in making these rather ancient quotations, and I hope it will become more evident as I go along. It goes almost without saying that in the later wars—the Boer war, the first and second great wars and now more recently the Korean war—recruiting and volunteering for active service have been highly satisfactory indeed in the island province; and I believe this situation is owing to the fine record of service achieved and the interest which has been kept up by the reserve units over the years. During the South African war there were 75 men who volunteered, mostly from Prince Edward Island. That is not a large figure but it is a large percentage in relation to the population, considering the numbers who saw service in South Africa. In the first world war there were almost 4,000 recruits in the army alone from that province or who were recruited in that province, not taking into account men who served in the navy and men who enlisted in the neighbouring provinces for service in that war. In the last war the total enlistment was much greater. The army had about 6,500, the air force had nearly 2,000 and the navy had 1,500. That makes a total of approximately 10,000. That does not take into account considerable numbers of men from that province who served in the merchant navy and who enlisted in the neighbouring provinces for service.

I think that this record is not accidental, Mr. Chairman. As I have already stated, I think one of the reasons for it was the fine degree of interest in military service which has been kept up in that province over the years by the active reserve units of the army and latterly of the navy in that province. Between the two wars these units included the Prince Edward Island Highlanders, the P.E.I. light horse, two old established medium batteries of artillery and other units such as a company of signals, medical corps and so on. Since the second world war the tradition of these regiments is now being carried on by the P.E.I. R.E.C.C.E. regiment, the 28th light anti-aircraft regiment, a unit of signals, a medical corps unit and so forth. The R.C.N.V.R. reserves in that province have the record of being one of the earliest units of the R.C.N.V.R. organized in Canada. I think it was either the first or the second unit. During the last war, personnel who had served in that reserve unit created a proud record of service for the area, especially the city of Charlottetown. In the last war there were over 100 commissioned officers serving in the Canadian navy from the small city of Charlottetown with a population of only about 15,000. I think that result amply justifies many times over any expenditure which may have been made on behalf of that small naval reserve unit before the last war.

I should now like to consider for a few minutes the difficulties under which these reserve units are working. Last year I put on the order paper a question with regard to the armouries in Charlottetown. It was a very simple question and read as follows:

> When were the armouries in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, built?

I received this rather amazing answer: No information. The reason there is no information is that the armouries in Charlottetown are so old that you would have to dig into the archives to find out when they were built. I therefore took it upon myself to attempt to supply some of the information. I find that the armouries in Charlottetown were built by the colonial government well prior to Prince Edward Island entering confederation. In the report of the inspecting officer of militia for 1867—and he was Colonel A. Douglas Smith—I find this statement:

> Three drill sheds have been erected. Their erection was a matter of absolute necessity and will confer positive important benefits on the inhabitants of Charlottetown, Summerside and Georgetown.

That was the beginning of the present Charlottetown armouries. I find in the public accounts for the same year a reference to warrants which were paid toward the construction of that drill hall to the amount of 1,671 pounds, 11 shillings and 11 pence. That will give some indication of the age of the building. It is an old, inadequate wooden building. True, there have been some modifications and additions.

In that connection I find that the armouries, which are now called the "drill hall"—the two terms are synonymous—were opened on the 15th of January, 1867. A new drill hall at the west end of Kent street was opened by the commander in chief, Lieutenant Governor George Dundas. I find too that the drill hall was widened a little bit on the west side prior to the first great war. Here is another interesting note:

> The new artillery orderly rooms facing Government Pond were opened on the evening of the 8th of April, 1897.

When anything in my province is less than 55 years old it is new as far as accommodation for the reserve force is concerned. I should like you to pay special attention to this point, that these rooms were largely paid for by the officers of the artillery units themselves out of their personal incomes. I believe that should give the committee some indication of the inadequacy of the accommodation provided for the reserve forces in the capital city of Prince Edward Island. Prior to confederation a wave of interest in national defence seemed to sweep over the colony. No doubt this was partly due to the threat of war between the colonies and the United States. Possibly the fervour of patriotic zeal may have been fanned by the excitement caused just a few years prior by the "Charge of the Light Brigade", but in any event the colony saw fit to build a drill hall and we are still getting by with substantially the same building.

I think I should also refer to the accommodation provided for the naval reserve unit, now known as H.M.C.S. Queen Charlotte. As I have already said, it has a very fine record of service but it is housed in a building which is over 100 years old, a building which was first used as a furniture factory, then subsequently as a candy factory, then for a while as an emergency hospital for the insane because of a serious fire in that institution, then was vacant for a number of years, and then H.M.C.S. Queen Charlotte fell heir to it. It is rented from the provincial government at considerable expense, and the building is utterly unsuitable for the use to which it is put. It is in such bad condition that I understand it is not safe to allow more than 60 people on the second floor at any time because it may collapse.

It was also found impossible to instal the training equipment supplied for the division because it was too heavy to be set up in the building. I am happy to have read that the commanding officer of the naval reserve units, Commodore Adams, recently inspected that division, and it is referred to in the press as follows:

> A strong recommendation for better training facilities for H.M.C.S. Queen Charlotte will be made by Commodore Kenneth F. Adams, C.D., R.C.N., commanding officer, naval division, Hamilton, Ontario.

I am confident that this strong recommendation will go through, and when it does I hope it will be sympathetically dealt with because I think the minister will recognize that I am not pleading for any special handout for my riding. Neither am I pleading for any unjustified expenditure of public funds. I think that adequate facilities for the reserve units in the city of Charlottetown are completely justified. It would be good business and in the long run would effect economies in defence expenditures.

That of course is predicated on the supposition that in the future pattern of defence there is a place for the reserve forces. I feel strongly that there is. I should like the minister to clarify the position of our reserve forces and the role they will play in national defence in the years ahead. I think there is considerable demand throughout the country that the role of our reserve forces be clarified so that not only they but the general public will know what the policy is regarding them.

There is another facility used by the reserve units in my province to which I want to refer very briefly. It is the rifle range just outside of Charlottetown at Squaw Point. I understand that the butts there are being eroded by the sea and it is necessary either to move them or to protect them by some sort of sea wall. I hope that the need for maintaining a standard rifle range in that area will be recognized and that at an early time the required attention will be given to that project. That is all I want to say in that connection except to appeal to the minister to see that this ancient injustice is rectified. I do not want to make any special criticism of the present government because the facilities of the reserve forces are so unsatisfactory inasmuch as it is the fault not only of this government but of every government for the last 50 years that the accommodation for the reserve forces in my province is so inadequate.

I want to turn for a few moments to an entirely different subject. I refer to aircraft procurement for the Royal Canadian Air Force. In the white paper tabled by the minister the other day there is the statement that several CF-100 all-weather squadrons are already operating in Canada. I should like some clarification as to exactly what "several" means. I know that the dictionary meaning of "several" is anything more than two. But by using that term, people might be led to believe that it is considerably more than two. I have a suspicion that the number is three, and I should like the minister to say definitely whether or not my assumption on that point is correct.

With regard to the equipment with which these squadrons are supplied, and the people of our air force squadrons as well, I note this statement in the white paper:

> A. V. Roe (Canada) Limited has completed delivery of the Canuck (CF-100) Mk 3 aircraft and delivery of Mk 4 version has started. The Canuck is powered with the Canadian designed and built Orenda engine and will include a new type of autopilot which will be coupled to the fire control system.

Then, a little further on the white paper states:

> Canadair Limited of Cartierville, near Montreal, is making deliveries of Sabre 5 (F-86) aircraft with the Orenda series 10 engine, according to schedule. The latest model, the Sabre 6, also has an airframe similar to that of the American built F-86E but will be powered with the Orenda series 14 engine. It will be superior in performance to the Sabre 5. Sabre 5 and 6 aircraft will meet R.C.A.F. commitments overseas and will eventually replace the Sabre 2s which are now flown operationally by the R.C.A.F. air division in Europe.

I have no desire, Mr. Chairman, to cast any reflection on the excellent work that has been done by the designers of the Orenda engine or any other designers and engineers concerned with the development of the Orenda engine and the CF-100. My first concern, and my chief concern, is to do anything I can to ensure that the R.C.A.F. is equipped with the best possible equipment. I am especially anxious that it will be equipped with the best possible fighting equipment. In that way, the Canadian taxpayers will get the best value for their defence dollar. After all, money which might be spent for equipment which is obsolescent or even obsolete, or too little or too late, is a complete waste. In this connection we should set ourselves the highest possible standards because nothing but the best is good enough in the position that we find ourselves in so far as the aerial defence of North America and our contribution to NATO defence are concerned.

In that spirit I want to draw to the attention of the committee what I consider to be the nub, the starting point of any fighting equipment for an air force. I refer to engines. In that connection I think my thoughts are very well expressed in an editorial appearing in Flight magazine for April, 1954, on page 445. They have this to say:

> Though the statement may seem a truism, engines really are very important—more so, in certain aspects, than the aircraft they drive. A good modern aero engine is an immense national asset; it is the result not only of a multi-million-pound development but the focal point of aircraft development programs costing many millions more. Everything that is done by the aircraft of the future—stratospheric reconnaissance, short-haul transport, supersonic combat or jungle warfare with helicopters—will be vitally dependent upon the provision of engines of the right sort at the right time. All kinds of engines are needed: for fighters, the requirements are thrust, high-altitude performance, low frontal area, reliability, economy and durability, approximately in that order of importance; . . .

Now, this article goes on to make this observation. They have been speaking about the requirements, the vast requirements necessary, such as electronic computing equipment and that sort of thing, in the development of new types of aircraft engines. The development of a modern engine is really a colossal undertaking. This article observes that in the United States great use is made of modern equipment of this sort, and then goes on to say:

> With such tools, there is no reason to doubt that our position as the world's top-ranking designer of aero engines will be maintained. Already our gas turbines are in production, under licence, in Sweden, Switzerland, Italy, France, Belgium, Argentina and the U.S.A.—and, without a licence, in Russia.

I might add that the Avon engine is now in production in Australia.

> Production, too, is going very well, and more than one aircraft factory is probably finding storage of delivered engines almost an embarrassment. (The same sort of situation has, we hear, arisen across the Atlantic.) In fact, our superpriority engines—the Avon, Sapphire, Olympus . . . etc.—are without exception progressing well and showing every indication of forming the backbone of our civil and military power for years to come.

I would be the last, Mr. Chairman, to prejudge any Canadian effort in the field of design or production of aircraft engines. No one will be more delighted than I will be if the minister can inform the committee that Canada has already the lead in that connection, and that the great advances which have been made since the last published figures put Canada in the forefront in this field. But I am not confident that is so. I should like, however, to refer to a comparison of published information regarding modern aircraft engines.

The Orenda is a good engine. It was well designed but it has taken considerable time to get it into large-scale production. It should be remembered that this is a highly competitive field and that time is of the essence. One must not only design good engines, but one must get them into production quickly or they will be obsolescent. As has already been noted, the main characteristics of interest with regard to aircraft engines are thrust, that is to say the power of the jet engine, frontal area, fuel economy and so on. Those are the things of paramount importance.

I should like to put on the record some figures relating to modern British aircraft engines. The Bristol Olympus, for example, is 40 inches in diameter, has a weight of roughly 3,500 pounds. It has a thrust of 9,750 pounds and has a specific fuel consumption of ·766. I will not take up the time of the committee to quote other figures with regard to the Sapphire and the Avon, because they are roughly in the same bracket. I do not want any comparison to be considered unfair. I believe the comparisons I make are as nearly true as they can be made. I note that the engines I have already named are now powering, without exception, some of the best aircraft in the world, so far as operational aircraft are concerned. Among them are the Vulcan, which is powered with an Olympus. And that engine, by the way, is being manufactured in the United States by Curtiss-Wright, and I believe also by Buick. Others of these aircraft are the Vulcan, the Gloster Javelin, the Victor, the Hawker Hunter, Republic F-84F, Martin Canberra, the de Havilland-110 all-weather fighter, the de Havilland Comet 3, the Canberra, and the Australian version of the Sabre.

When one contrasts those figures with the latest data available on the Orenda engine he finds that, as compared with these British engines with a thrust up to 9,500 pounds, the Orenda has a thrust of 6,500, at least in the earlier marks. The really important thing of course with modern aircraft engine design is the specific fuel consumption. To put it in everyday parlance: How far will you go on a gallon? Because the higher the fuel consumption, the lower will be the radius of action, and the less will be the range of the aircraft in which the power plant is installed.

In the case of the Olympus, the specific fuel consumption in pounds per hour of pounds thrust is ·766; in the case of the Sapphire it is ·85; with the Avon it is ·84; and with the Orenda it is one. That is a colossal difference. Those early marks of Orenda compared very unfavourably with the most up-to-date British designs. The only consolation I find in these figures is a brief reference to the later marks of the Orenda.

Mr. Claxton: Those are the marks now in production.

Mr. MacLean: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: And also the hon. member would agree that the most important question is what engines are being flown today, and what the performance is in the aircraft today.

Mr. MacLean: That is true. I have tried to make my comparisons as fair as possible. For instance, I have taken the Avon engine which is now powering the Australian version of the Sabre. I will admit that some of the most up-to-date aircraft I have mentioned are just coming into production in England. They have super-priority, and they will be the aircraft with which the forces of Great Britain and of other countries will be equipped in the very near future.

The consolation I find in these figures is that, having reference to the later models of the Orenda—I refer to mark 11 and mark 14, with the after-burner—we get a thrust of as high as 8,500 pounds, and I believe the specific fuel consumption is well under one.

I just wish to make the point, though, that there are two considerations to be met. One of these is whether national prestige in the aircraft industry is of first importance, or whether the best possible equipment for our air force, regardless of where it can be obtained, is of first importance.

In that connection I will grant you that, if at all possible, the equipment should be manufactured on this continent. But that is already being done. Some of the most up to date engines are already being manufactured in the United States, under licence and, as I have already said, in France, Australia, and the Argentine and many other countries. Canada is the sole exception to the manufacture of advanced designs of British aircraft engines, under licence. I am just a bit doubtful if the fact that we are that exception can be entirely justified. I would ask the minister to reassure us that we are following the correct course in that regard.

Mr. Claxton: We are producing the goods in the most efficient and formidable fighting aircraft in the world today in quantity production.

Mr. MacLean: I am glad to hear the minister say that. But I am thinking not only of today but of the very near future. Because we know that modern aircraft become obsolete extremely rapidly in this very competitive age. I imagine this question has been carefully considered. We know that the Minister of Defence Production has already said that if the Minister of National Defence asks him for a gold-plated piano, it is his duty to supply it. I would hope that if this is considered justified—and I am not putting it in the same bracket, at all—consideration might be given to equipping some of the aircraft made in Canada with the most up to date and the best engines in the world, under licence, if they are not already designed in Canada for that purpose.

I have almost reached the conclusion of my remarks, and the time at my disposal has almost expired. But I do note that in the white paper the minister has tabled it is observed that members of Canada's armed forces are serving on the staffs of nine principal NATO headquarters and large agencies, including Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe, commonly known as SHAPE, as well as Headquarters Allied Air Forces Central Europe—and several others.

As already noted, Canada is contributing a very large air element to the NATO defence of Europe. I am just wondering where Canada fits in, from a military point of view, with regard to the tactical use of the air force, if war should come. I am wondering if consideration has already been given to the possibility of, if not command of the air force, a position of deputy commander, and that if for a time such position might be held by a Canadian. I am curious to know if that suggestion has been made and, if it has been, how it has been looked upon by the Canadian government. Because if that suggestion were ever followed it would give Canada an appropriate command of the situation to which it is contributing so heavily in armament. And when I say "heavily", I mean that we are spending a great deal in national defence, especially in connection with the equipping of our air force.

In connection with the Orenda CF-100 project, I think it is fair to say that more money has already been spent on that—and I am not suggesting it was not justified—than it will cost to build the St. Lawrence seaway. Therefore, I think it is only fair that we should examine very carefully all expenditures which are made in this connection. I have some other questions, but I shall ask them when the particular items are up later on. At this point I shall conclude my remarks on the first item.

Mr. Fraser (St. John's East): I have listened with great interest to the eloquent plea of the hon. member for Queens on behalf of the need for a new armoury at Charlottetown. I hope it will be possible at the same time to provide an armoury for St. John's, Newfoundland. Charlottetown has at least an armoury, old though it may be. St. John's, unfortunately, has none. I would therefore strongly urge that the minister give favourable consideration to the establishment of an armoury at St. John's, one that will be worthy of the historic traditions of the Royal Newfoundland Regiment.

Mr. MacLean: Just in case I have been misunderstood I should like to correct one thing in connection with the armouries in Charlottetown. Perhaps I did not make myself clear, but they were not built by the federal government; they were built by the colonial government and given to the dominion government at confederation.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the minister has been listening to a lot of speeches this afternoon and this evening. I have not got a speech prepared but I do have a couple of questions I should like to ask him. Perhaps he can deal with them this evening. The first has to do with the policy of the R.C.A.F., with regard to commercial work. I got a return, which was dated April 13 of this year, in answer to several questions. The questions which are apropos are as follows:

During 1953, did the Royal Canadian Air Force engage in any flying within Canada except for the Department of National Defence or other government departments?

If so,

(a) For whom;

(b) What types of aircraft were employed, and how many hours on each type;

(c) How many passengers and pounds of cargo were carried in each case?

Was any remuneration received for such flying?

(a) If so, from whom and how much in each case;

(b) What was the rate charged per mile, per hour or per ton mile?

The answers to these questions showed that the air force had been doing commercial flying, and in particular they had flown for the Iron Ore Company of Canada a matter of 181·15 hours and carried 121 passengers and about one million pounds of cargo. The actual figures were 989,432 pounds. They had been paid for this work as follows:

The Iron Ore Company of Canada paid $39,473.52 calculated at the rate of .42 cents per ton mile and $1.56 per ferry air mile.

I understand that there were civilian flying companies in a position to do that work. The minister should explain why the R.C.A.F. was in effect competing with civilian flying companies in work which was obviously of a civilian nature. I am informed that such a policy is directly the opposite of the policy adopted in the United States. I believe that the United States air force fosters the development of civilian aviation and in fact employs civilian firms to do some of the United States air force flying in the continental United States but not abroad. Overseas the flying for the United States air force is all done by air force planes.

There seems to be a difference of policy in the two countries. The United States believes in taking every step to build up a healthy aviation industry; whereas Canada, in this instance at least, has been interfering with the civil aviation industry. I believe the only way we can hope to maintain and build up a strong civil aviation industry in this country is not to have their potential work taken by the R.C.A.F. Certainly parliament is not voting funds for the R.C.A.F. with the idea that air force planes will be used on civilian work.

I understand also that the air service to the meteorological stations of the government is being done by the R.C.A.F., and presumably that comes under the defence vote. It seems that some argument could be made for that flying being done by the civilian companies. Why would it not be a wise plan to encourage civilian companies by giving them work of this type?

Then, there is the flying in connection with the ice patrols on the Atlantic coast and out of the port of Churchill on the opening of navigation. Apparently this work is done by the R.C.A.F. Why could it not be done by civilian flyers? It does seem to me that here is a way in which civilian aviation in Canada could be fostered, if a proper government policy were adopted. I have one other question on another matter. I wonder whether the minister would deal with these questions of the R.C.A.F. doing what is in essence civilian flying?

Mr. Claxton: Am I to understand that the general discussion is completed and that I can reply to all the questions that have been put? If so, I would be very happy to do so right now and as long as it takes.

Mr. Pearkes: Other hon. members are anxious to speak, and I am afraid we cannot consider the general discussion terminated.

Mr. Claxton: This is a special interpolation by the hon. member.

Mr. Green: Just an interpolation for the minister.

Mr. Claxton: I do not know what the purpose of it is. The information might be more readily and more accurately given, no doubt, when the item for the air force comes up for consideration, but I can speak now from my recollection of what happened many months ago. The Labrador iron ore development had a deadline to meet that was in the interests of the national defence of Canada and of the United States. I was told by the general manager of the concern that they did not have an airlift to meet their deadline. I was told that over the long distance telephone. I asked the R.C.A.F. if they had an airlift. They said that by diverting aircraft from other important air work they could do it, if necessary. I said: "Clear this with the air transport board and make sure that we are not treading on anyone's toes." They did. We carried out the airlift. It was carried out successfully in the national interest. It was not any part of the national policy except to get on with the job of completing the Labrador iron ore development in the time that was necessary. If, in consequence of that, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has any complaints, then I shall be glad to answer them when the item in the estimates comes up for the air force. My recollection, speaking as I say from telephone conversations, is that there were only two of them, one from the general manager of the company, and one to the chief of the air staff. When the request was made the general manager of the company said he had no other airlift available and said he had cleared the other air commitments. I informed the chief of the air staff that he must clear this with the air transport board. He did that, and he provided the airlift. I do not know why anyone should have any reason to complain.

With regard to the supply of weather stations, there you go into a very complicated field in which you have to have the men, the special types of equipment, the gasoline and the aircraft capable of doing long range flights. Generally speaking, with the long range operation we find it has been a good thing to employ R.C.A.F. aircraft.

But finally, in answer to the hon. member, may I say that it is just as important that the R.C.A.F. should have and be maintained in the capacity to deliver long lift air transport operations as much as it is to maintain civilian transport companies. Our idea is that we work together. We do not compete, and where a civilian operates and the job can be done by a civilian we never enter into it except in circumstances of extreme urgency such as I have described.

Mr. Green: The minister did not deal with the difference in policy between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Claxton: There is no difference.

Mr. Green: Does the minister say that the United States air force is not now engaging civilian firms to do some work for the air force in the United States?

Mr. Claxton: There is no difference at all. If the United States air force is the only air force to provide an airlift on an essential operation in the national interest they carry out that operation, but if there is a civilian source to do a civilian job then they leave it to the civilians, just as we do. We employed civilians on the airlift to Korea and in fact the C.P.A. has done a magnificent job supported by us. We employ civilians all over the place when they are the best agency to do the job, in the same fashion as the Americans.

Mr. Green: What about the ice patrol, and the patrol out of Churchill?

Mr. Claxton: I would have to look up the record about that. I have not heard anything about it except for some details a few months ago, and I would have to look into the facts. But I would think that was probably an operation which could best be conducted ordinarily by service aircraft because they would have to do a patrol in any event for surveillance purposes.

Mr. Green: But I suggest to the minister that in the case of the Iron Ore Company of Canada it is going pretty far to act on the basis of a call from the general manager of that company.

Mr. Claxton: No, no! We cleared it with the air transport board which has control over civil aviation and they assured us that it was the right thing to do and we did not undertake—

Mr. Green: I understand that at least one member of the air transport board protested against that and considered it an unwise policy—

Mr. Claxton: Then you must talk to him.

Mr. Green: Whether the air transport board approved that or not is not very important. The question is—

Mr. Claxton: What was important was to get the job done.

Mr. Green: But it is not the minister's business to use the R.C.A.F. to get civilian work done, and why the Iron Ore Company of Canada should be in such a great hurry to meet a deadline when they are a civilian firm opening up their own iron mine I simply cannot understand. I do not see why the manager of that firm or any other firm should be able to pick up the phone, call the minister, and ask him to turn over R.C.A.F. planes to carry freight for them. I suggest, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Green: I have the floor.

Mr. Claxton: —the manager of the company—

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.

The Deputy Chairman: I would suggest that you both cannot have the floor at the same time. If the minister is not rising on a point of order I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra should be allowed to complete his statement.

Mr. Claxton: I thought he had finished.

Mr. Green: Well I was still on my feet talking and I do not see how the minister came to the conclusion I was finished.

Mr. Knowles: At this time of night you can come to any conclusion.

Mr. Green: I do not finish quite that easy. I do suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the minister's answer shows that the government was wrong in this case. Why should an official of the Iron Ore Company of Canada be able to ring the minister and say, "Here, Mister, send me R.C.A.F. transports. I want to get some cement"—or whatever it was—"carried from Sept Iles into the district where we are developing a mine, and I want to get it done in a hurry. I have a civilian deadline to meet." The minister acts on that and turns a North Star over and now comes in here and tries to justify that on the ground that it was for the defence of Canada. I suggest that this is really going beyond all reason, and it is all rather far-fetched.

I merely bring this up to point out to the minister the need for being a good deal more careful in the use of the R.C.A.F. for civilian purposes. I know he is very proud of the R.C.A.F., and quite properly so. We are all proud of it and we have very good reason to be not only for what it did in the second world war, but also during the post-war period, and of course the exploits of our airmen during the first world war. But the time has surely come in Canada with the development of the north country, and the attempt to push our borders in that direction, to do everything possible to foster civilian flying. After all, that has been the basis of the R.C.A.F., and Canada has been the leader in the development of northern flying. Here is a case where a company should have been told to look after its own business, hire planes on its own, and not come running to the Minister of National Defence in order to obtain R.C.A.F. planes to do work so obviously of a civilian nature.

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member has finished, then I might comment on the fact that he has expressed surprise that the general manager of the Iron Ore Company of Canada called me up. Almost everyone calls me up about one thing or another, and often about airlifts.

Mr. Knowles: Some people call you down.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, that is quite true, but on this occasion there was nothing wrong about his calling me up, or in my answering the phone. There was nothing wrong about my asking the chief of air staff if he could deliver an airlift, and if that would be the proper thing to do under the rules of the air transport board. That was done and it was in the national interest. They were paid at commercial rates and the national treasury did not lose a nickel. As far as I knew there was no aircraft of similar capacity available to carry out this work. I was assured on that point and if that assurance was wrong then it is not my fault.

The Deputy Chairman: It being ten o'clock standard time shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the house. Tomorrow we shall continue with the program I outlined last night.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 21, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Sixth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. McWilliam.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1954-55

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1955, was presented by Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Acting Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—REPORTED DESTRUCTION OF FISH BELOW POWER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources of which I have sent him notice. As a result of having received many different complaints and many copies of an article published May 14 in the Crag and Canyon, one of which I have sent to the minister, respecting the wholesale destruction of fish in the channel below the Calgary power turbine plant at Anthracite, located in the Banff national park, would the minister assure the house that he will take such action as is necessary to correct this evil?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having sent me notice of his question. The situation to which he has referred has already been drawn to the attention of the officers of the department here in Ottawa, who have requested a report from the field. I can assure the hon. member that as soon as that report has been received we shall take whatever remedial action is practical so that this situation will be corrected.

POLIOMYELITIS

ASSISTANCE TO WINNIPEG PREVENTION ORGANIZATION—USE OF NEW VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received any letters or communications requesting financial assistance for the newly-formed association for the prevention of polio in greater Winnipeg? If so, will he tell us whether the government is prepared to assist in this research?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have received a letter in general terms from the organization to which my hon. friend refers but, as he knows, projects for assistance under the research grant of the national health plan have to be submitted first by the provinces, and an application from the province has not yet come in.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the minister a further question in respect to the new vaccine being tried out in the United States. Can the minister inform the house whether or not the government feels that this vaccine may be sufficiently proved in the United States to be of use, and that we might have the use of it in Canada this year?

Mr. Martin: As I had previously indicated, my hon. friend has been informed of the government's interest in this matter, and just as quickly as it is possible, in the light of all circumstances, to take advantage of whatever may be thought to be useful in the matter, this will be done.

May I just add to what I said, because my hon. friend has asked a question that is of great importance, particularly at this season of the year, throughout Canada and particularly western Canada. The vaccine in question has been tried on many thousands of children in the United States. It is a vaccine that has been prepared in the Connaught laboratory at Toronto and arises out of an earlier research project by Dr. Rhodes with assistance given to him under the research grant of the national health program. I indicated in what I said to the house earlier that it was not the intention of the Canadian government, in co-operation with the departments of health of the provinces, to engage in large tests such as were projected in the United States. This was a decision made primarily by the ten provinces. However, the head of the polio foundation in the United States, Mr. O'Connor, has recently notified us that there could be made available a limited amount of this vaccine for experimental purposes in Canada. This offer came to us during the past few days and as a result we communicated with the ten provincial departments of health. It may be that one province will take advantage of this, but the other provinces, in their best judgment, have at this time—and no conclusion should be drawn from their refusal—decided not to take advantage for the time being of the vaccine for this experimental purpose.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the answer given to my question in regard to polio by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, when the minister stated that one of the provinces indicated that they would take advantage of this—at least that is what I understood—can the minister say which province that is?

Mr. Martin: What I think I said was that one of the provinces was giving consideration as to whether it would take advantage of the offer, but I do not think I should state at this time which province that is.

PARLIAMENT HILL

DIPLOMATIC CORPS CARS PARKING IN RESERVED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Yesterday, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked if it had been brought to the attention of the Acting Minister of Public Works that a number of cars bearing diplomatic corps licences have been occupying space in the parliament grounds reserved for tourists and others.

The simple answer to the question is no, but perhaps it would help if I were to enlarge. It is possible that diplomats' cars park in the tourist area, but I am at a loss to know how this practice might be curtailed except through the co-operation extended by the diplomats themselves, in recognizing the need for tourists to be accommodated. There is no special area on the hill, however, reserved for diplomatic cars, and members will understand that visits by diplomats to the east block are fairly numerous. Some attention is being given to developing a small reserved area, immediately adjacent to the east block, for such use.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Public Works if he is not aware that the parking to which I referred is all-day parking by members of the diplomatic corps who are not engaged on business in the east block, and that this matter was some time ago the subject of representations by the Department of External Affairs to the diplomatic corps in Ottawa in precisely the same circumstances?

Mr. Bourget: That was the only information I could get this morning from the officials of the department and, as my hon. friend knows, the parking problem is one which exists everywhere. We are trying to do the best we can with the limited area at our disposal and I can assure my hon. friend we are looking into the situation to see if means can be found to improve it, and if it is possible we shall do so.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Labour if he can now give an answer to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) with reference to the responsibility for the maintenance of unemployed persons?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for St. Paul's is a matter which affects government policy and which could not be dealt with during the short question and answer period in the house. As I mentioned yesterday in response to another question, I shall be glad to discuss the matter when my estimates come before the house during the next few days.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES

REPRESENTATIONS FROM NEW WESTMINSTER BRANCH, CANADIAN LEGION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, and I am sorry I did not have an opportunity of giving advance notice of this question. Has the Prime Minister received a telegram from W. Cross, zone commander of the New Westminster and district zone of the Canadian Legion, with respect to the war veterans allowance? If so, would the Prime Minister care to comment on the matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before this question is given consideration by the Prime Minister I would like to submit to hon. members that it is not making full use of this question period in the house to stand up and ask if a cabinet minister has received a telegram, communication or representation about a certain problem. I think the hon. member's question could more properly be asked at the committee of veterans affairs or on the estimates of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) when that matter will be before the house. I do not think we should use up the question period for the purpose of dealing with such matters. The hon. member probably knows that whoever sent the telegram has advised him that it has been sent to the Prime Minister or someone else. What is the purpose of checking in this house as to whether or not that telegram has been received?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

239. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $300,000,000 of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies acquired by the Canadian forces after March 31, 1950, are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall, if the governor in council so directs, be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $4,577,641,724 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $2,711,822,159 will come due for payment in future years), $1,865,819,565.

The Deputy Chairman: We were considering item 239. It is my understanding that we are still at the general discussion stage of this resolution after which it is proposed to discuss the item under the main headings appearing in the further details. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of our defence effort is to train, equip and in every way prepare our defence forces to meet the operational role which it is thought they may have to perform in order to carry out our defence policy and objectives. Consequently, like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre who spoke yesterday, I was somewhat disappointed that the minister in his speech did not place more emphasis on the training and operational phases of defence, and seemed to be more preoccupied, shall I say, with the supply, construction, and general Q and A matters concerning defence.

Canada's defence effort from the point of view of the role which our forces are to perform or may be called upon to perform has many phases or facets which connect with and run into each other. In this regard our defence effort should be compared perhaps with a cut stone with its numerous facets each of which is separate but each of which is connected with several others. Now, just as a stone has these numerous facets, so has our defence effort; and I should like to examine the operational roles or facets of our defence effort from two points of view.

The first concerns whether, considering our resources, there are too many phases with the result that they cannot all be carried out effectively. In other words, are we scattering our shot too much and as a result failing to place the emphasis in the proper places? Secondly, how effective are our forces in each of the roles they are required or may be required to carry out?

Now, the phases of our defence preparations stem, of course, from the objectives of our defence policy which have been set out for the past few years in the annual white papers. With these objectives I think practically all of us in this chamber agree. The first of these objectives is the immediate defence of Canada from direct attack, and this, of course, is the primary and most important purpose of our defence, as it is in all other countries.

The defence of Canada from direct attack must also involve the continental defence of North America. I think also we all agree that the only probable method of attack, as was stated in the white paper on defence, is by air. Now, taking that as a premise, the first phase of our defence in the role of countering an attack on Canada by air is the provision and operation of a radar screen or series of screens supplemented by a ground observer corps.

Yesterday the minister spoke of the radar screen which is in existence. He stated that the radar and interceptor scheme of the United States and Canada was now over 90 per cent completed and would be in complete operation by late summer or early autumn. Then he went on to say that kills in practice had been 90 per cent. He went on to say that gaps existed and that more early warning was required, that the McGill fence was going to be gone ahead with, and that the provision of all these things is extremely expensive.

However, I notice that this morning's Gazette has as its chief headline in connection with the minister's remarks one to the effect that our radar screen is 90 per cent completed and that the interception is 9 out of 10. I am afraid that this headline gives an extremely misleading idea to the House of Commons and to the Canadian people as a whole. It was pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich that an American, the chairman of the joint committee on atomic energy, had pointed out that the early warning system, which was essential to the defence of both Canada and the United States, was not in existence. As a matter of fact, all that we have in the way of a radar screen, essentially, is a point system which protects us for only a short distance out. In view of the fact that enemy jet bombers would be on the targets probably within 20 minutes or a little bit more from the time they might be detected by many of the units of this radar screen, what we have gives little real protection.

There is no question that what we need is an early warning system far to the north. As was indicated in this article quoted yesterday by hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, there have been many press releases in regard to this matter, in which a great deal of information along that line has been put out, most of which—particularly that with regard to the statement made by the minister yesterday—are bound to give the public the idea that all is well from this point of view, that we are completely protected and that we have little to worry about. The average man in the street, if he reads that 9 out of 10 enemy bombers in these practice raids are being knocked out, thinks the thing must be exceptionally good and that he is quite safe. As a matter of actual fact, during the last great war in a small country like England, with a close-knit system of radar and large numbers of interceptors, the destruction of enemy bombers was approximately 1 in 10. Since that time, of course, radar has improved and jet interceptors have come into operation, and the performance is going to be considerably better. However, informed American sources whom I have seen quoted have estimated that the probable kill will be 1 in 4. The last thing I noticed in an American paper was a dispatch from Washington written by Lloyd Norman in which he says this:

> Air force officials conceded that at best the air defence screen—

And this is in the United States where it is more highly developed than it is here.

> —could stop no more than 3 out of every 10 Russian bombers.

I think the Minister of National Defence does no service to the Canadian people by giving them a false sense of security with regard to the radar screen which exists or rather with regard to the one which does not exist. It is much better to give the actual situation in connection with the matter. I am quite sure that the Russians are not deceived in that regard. I am quite certain that they do not believe for a minute that only 1 bomber out of 10 is going to get through to the targets.

The next phase in this role of protecting Canada against air attack is the provision of interceptor planes. The minister did not say much about that matter, but we know that the number of interceptor planes in Canada is extremely small. The interceptor plane for use here is the CF-100. We know that the production of CF-100's so far has not been great. We know that the number of squadrons formed has been extremely small. I do not know what that number is, but I feel fairly certain that it is not more than three. That means, of course, that we have not the interceptor planes here in Canada with which to make effective use of the radar screen which does exist or the radar screen which we will have when the McGill fence and the other early warning system comes into effect. In other words, from the point of view of interceptors, at the present time we are not entirely helpless but we are very close to it, especially in large parts of this country.

The interception role in the future, according to what we have been told, is going to be carried on to quite a considerable extent by reserve force interceptor squadrons of CF-100's. So far these reserve squadrons have not CF-100's. If they had them, they would not have trained personnel who could man them and fight them effectively. One of the difficulties with regard to that matter particularly is the provision of navigators. In talking with some of the members of these reserve force interceptor squadrons which are to be equipped with CF-100's, I was told that they think they can train the pilots and keep them up to scratch but that it will be a more or less impossible task for them to train the navigators and to keep them up to operational efficiency. In other words, it is the sort of thing which cannot be done by a man who spends his day working at some other occupation and does a certain amount of practice in the evenings, over week ends and so on.

It would seem fairly certain to me that if we are to have an effective interceptor force with which to make use of the radar screen, we must have in Canada considerably more regular force interceptor squadrons, whether they are CF-100 squadrons or those equipped with other planes. So far as this role is to be carried out by reserve force squadrons, they must be equipped to a greater extent than is apparently envisaged at the present time with permanent force personnel, particularly in the form of navigators.

A third phase of the defence of Canada is anti-aircraft defence to protect likely targets; that is, of course, in addition to the work of the interceptor planes. I have mentioned this matter for the last two or three years. As a matter of fact, on two or three occasions the minister has spoken of our anti-aircraft defence and I have pointed out—and I should like to do so again—that we have practically no ack-ack defence at the present time and have not had any, practically speaking, since the war. We have very few regular force personnel in active ack-ack batteries. While ack-ack defence is supposed to be carried on by reserve army anti-aircraft regiments, these reserve force ack-ack regiments have not the guns with which to do the job nor have they the personnel with which to do the job. If they had a full complement of guns they would not in most cases, in fact I think in all, even be able to look after them and man them. Apparently this situation continues to drift along from year to year. We have no "ack-ack" defence, and so far as I have been able to determine there is no improvement in the situation as time goes on. It seems to me that something definite should be done about the matter. The United States has now developed ground to air guided missiles, which are going to be the ack-ack weapons of the future, and I would hope that we might at least begin to train some people in their use and to get some of them into operation at a fairly early date.

When the minister is replying later to the various speeches that have been made, I should like him to say something about ack-ack defence and indicate what progress we have made, if any, with respect to ground to air guided missiles or even the ordinary type of rockets which can be used for that purpose. It seems to me that is one phase of the defence of Canadian cities and targets generally on which really nothing at all has been done so far as one can see.

The fourth phase in the protection of Canada is the provision of airborne army troops and, of course, the planes to carry them so that these troops can land at any place in the northern part of Canada where enemy landings happen to be made for the purpose of establishing an air base or something of that sort, and thus be able to wipe out an enemy effort of that kind. Considerable progress has been made in this regard. We now have three parachute battalions each with quite a large number of trained parachute troops. From what I have seen of them they are extremely good, well trained and effective battalions. However, in the event of an enemy landing anywhere in the north for the purpose of seizing a northern airfield or of establishing one, we have not got sufficient planes to transport these troops. The troops are not of a great deal of use in that particular role unless we have the planes to transport them to their targets.

In addition, they are not concentrated so that they can be operated as a brigade. I should mention of course that there are also airborne artillery forces and engineers who, I think, are also quite good, but they are scattered right across the country and it would be extremely difficult to concentrate them on a place that had been attacked. With the number of planes we have it would be a slow operation and possibly not effective. I think it was demonstrated during the last war that it is no use to move in a few plane loads of paratroopers piecemeal. By the time more plane loads arrive to reinforce them the first lot has been wiped out. It has to be done on a mass basis.

The fifth phase of the protection of Canada is the protection of coastal waters, harbour entrances and so on. I think probably this phase is more in hand than any other. We have a considerable number of naval vessels in commission that are available for this purpose, and they are probably reasonably adequate for it.

The sixth phase is the mobilization of our reserve forces for local defence and also to reinforce the regular army in the event that an enemy airborne landing is successful any place, and to guard against sabotage and so on. I am going to deal with the reserve forces later so I will not say any more at this point except to say that I do not think the reserve forces are up to this job. The reserve forces are too weak to carry out this role effectively.

Another extremely important phase of the defence of Canada is civil defence. It is not under the minister's department. He mentioned it briefly yesterday. I do not propose to go into the matter in detail at this time, but I see that the minister in charge of civil defence is present and I should like to say that certainly civil defence in Canada at the present time is not in any state to meet any form of attack on the country. It is perhaps the weakest link of all so far as the protection of Canada against an enemy airborne attack is concerned.

To summarize my views on the primary role of our defence forces, the direct defence of Canada, we have not got the minimum defences necessary to meet this first requirement. I think the phases of our defence effort that I have mentioned are all weak except the naval. It seems quite apparent to me that we should have put primary emphasis on these phases of our defence effort and that we have failed to do so. In other words, from both points of view that I said at the beginning I was going to discuss this matter, it is an example of failure to place emphasis at the right place and failure to succeed in the various phases or roles which I have indicated.

I have one general complaint with respect to the information given in the white paper, by the minister in his speech on these estimates and in various other speeches he has made on this matter. The public has been lulled into a false sense of security as the result of reassuring statements of every kind which do not represent the true facts of the case. I do not say that any of these statements in themselves are incorrect, but when you relate them to the general picture they give a totally false impression of what our defences are so far as the protection of Canada is concerned.

This form of misrepresentation has been going on for several years. Before the Korean conflict broke out the minister would assure the house in the defence debates that our defences were absolutely up to date—

Mr. Claxton: When?

Mr. Harkness: —and were quite adequate to meet—

Mr. Claxton: When?

Mr. Harkness: —any possible threat. When we were discussing the defence estimates in 1949, the year before the Korean war broke out, the minister assured us that the airborne brigade would be able to deal with any possible landing that an enemy might make in the north country. It subsequently developed—and I think a number of us knew it—that we had one battalion partially up to strength and partly trained as parachute troops, but we did not even have the planes to transport them. Nevertheless the minister assured the house at that time that everything was fine and that we had no need to worry about any enemy landing in the north. The same sort of statements have been typical since, as was the case yesterday.

If there was any real purpose in making such statements at that time, perhaps because we were so weak, it seems to me that the time for that sort of thing has come to an end. We have improved a great deal since then. Our strength has indeed greatly increased since that period, and it would seem only reasonable to me that the house and the people of Canada should be given a true picture of the state of our defences. If they are inadequate in a particular phase or in any special way, I do not think that the minister should attempt to conceal it.

And now, the second objective of our defence policy is the implementation of the undertakings that we have made as a nation, under the United Nations and NATO, for the mutual defence of the western world. The first phase of that was our participation in the Korean war. The brigade we sent there did a magnificent job. I believe all of Canada was proud of the record that they established in Korea. Similarly, the navy did its part effectively. The air force played a part so far as the airlift was concerned, and a certain number of pilots also took part in operations with the United States air force. I feel our commitment in Korea, so far as the United Nations was concerned, was magnificently made. We were perhaps a bit slow in meeting it because of our poor state of preparation. We were able to send only one battalion at the start, but that was built up to a brigade and those who served there served well and enhanced the name of Canada in doing so.

Another phase of this implementation of our foreign commitments concerns the air division that is now in Europe and the army brigade that is in Europe. Now, that is a considerable commitment. As the minister told us yesterday the maintenance of this air division in Europe is extremely expensive, involving some $600 million. However, from an operational point of view it appears that it is an effective part of the force there, and contributes materially to the air defence of western Europe. Our army brigade is also well regarded. I shall return to these matters a little later.

Another aspect of our implementation of foreign commitments is the provision of mutual aid of various kinds, the sending of arms to our allies and the training of NATO aircrew, things of that sort. All these things are excellent in their way, but it seems to me, from what I know of the armament of the forces in Canada, that possibly a mistake has been made by sending arms to our allies when our own forces are none too well equipped in many ways. This applies particularly to the reserve forces. It seems to me it would have been wiser, perhaps, to keep some of these arms at home until our own forces were adequately and properly equipped.

Now, to summarize, so far as the second objective of our defence is concerned, I feel our commitments have been met, and quite well met. So far as the personnel involved are concerned, I believe they are to be complimented for the manner in which they have carried out those duties. One big question arises and that is as to whether too large a proportion of the defence effort, relatively speaking, has been directed to this objective and therefore too little to the primary objective of the defence of Canada or to the third objective, the general build-up.

Yesterday two or three speakers questioned whether this division of twelve squadrons of fighter planes should be kept in Europe or whether a portion should be returned to Canada for the defence of this country, the primary role of our whole defence forces. I would question that very much, too. It seems to me that, with the speed at which these planes can be taken over to Europe, so long as the airstrips and installations to maintain the planes exist there, there is no real necessity for keeping those twelve squadrons in Europe. A good proportion of them might quite easily be kept in Canada, where they could operate in a dual role. They would be available here for immediate defence in an interceptor role of possible Canadian targets. Then, if they were needed in Europe, they could be flown over there in a matter of hours. Of course this suggestion is based on the assumption that the airfields, supply lines and so forth in Europe were kept in existence for these planes. The keeping of this full number of planes in Europe does not seem to me to be essential to carrying out our commitment to take part in the defence of western Europe.

Several speakers questioned whether the infantry brigade in Europe should not be an armoured brigade. I agree with that; I believe it should be an armoured brigade rather than an infantry brigade. It seems to me that the criticism made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre concerning the proportion of armour as compared to infantry in the Canadian army was extremely sound, and that the lack of plans in that regard should be rectified.

The third objective of our defence policy is to build up strength for total war. All of the phases of our defence effort that I have mentioned previously, of course, enter into this and are part of it. But there are some which are perhaps more directly and entirely related to the build-up, as you might call it. One of these is the build-up of staffs and service units of all kinds. I believe that one of the mistakes that have been made is the multiplication of staffs. There has been far too great a multiplication of staffs and too much manpower has been devoted to staffs of all sorts. As I have mentioned here several times before in previous years, you have only to look at the telephone directory to see the various staffs at national headquarters, and you gain some idea of the tremendous number of people who are carrying on activities there, in some cases activities not very much greater than was the case before the second great war, but with a staff ten or twenty times as great as existed at that time. This is one of the places where I think the emphasis has been misdirected. At the same time the civilian staffs have greatly increased this year. They have been increasing year after year, and it seems to me far too much manpower is used in pushing paper back and forth. The paper war should be cut down to a minimum, but the multiplication of these staffs really increases it. The amount of office supplies purchased is an indication of the enormous amount of paper work, and I am quite sure much of it is not really necessary, in fact it cannot help but clog the defence effort.

Another phase is construction activities, the provision of barracks, married quarters, storage space, the building of airfields and things of that sort. Once again I believe there has been too much emphasis on this subject. It is a good thing to have good barracks, to have ample storage space, to have fine married quarters and so on, and I am saying nothing against it. It seems to me, however, that the emphasis has been misplaced and there are other things that are more important, such as the provision of tanks for our armoured corps, the provision of the most modern arms of all sorts, which have not been provided, although there has been this large expenditure on construction activities. These construction activities, the minister indicated, are tapering off. It seems to me that is one place where a considerable saving in defence expenditures should be possible. The amount of building for married quarters still to be completed under the plan is not so great. The major portion of that program is over. The major portion of the barracks building program is over, and the same applies to the building of airfields. So that I would hope much less would be expended under the construction program in the years ahead, and the money so saved directed into other channels, if the general expenditures are not, indeed, reduced as a result.

Another phase is the build-up of mobilization stores. A great deal of the criticism of the Department of National Defence last year was in regard to the enormous amount of soft goods, as they are called, which were purchased. I think without question there are many examples of waste and extravagance in the amount of soft goods purchased, including such things as raincoats, boots and the like.

The minister said in his speech—or it might have been mentioned in the white paper, I am not sure which—that the build-up of mobilization stores of soft goods is almost complete. Well, I would think it would be complete, in view of the very large quantities purchased in the last two years or so. He has said that weapons, ammunition and equipment for mobilization have been built up. I notice that the amounts for these for the army, the navy and the air force are down this year in many cases from what they were last year. I would hope this does not mean that some of the essential armaments of modern warfare, which our forces should have if they are going to be able to discharge their function effectively, are not being purchased or secured. I would refer particularly to some of the later types of guns, both ack-ack and anti-tank, to tanks and things of that nature.

Perhaps the most important phase of the general build-up of strength is in the reserve forces. They continue to be, as they have been in the past, the framework upon which the mobilization of Canadian manpower, particularly in the Canadian army, must depend. It seems to me that the army reserve force, in particular, has been one of the outstanding failures of the defence department in recent years. We have heard complaints from reserve force officers and personnel, and there has been considerable discussion in the house in the last several years as to the poor state of the reserve forces. The government was sufficiently impressed with what was said to appoint a committee, known as the Kennedy committee, which spent a good part of last year investigating the situation in respect of the reserve army. That committee presented a report, and I am disappointed to find that the minister has not made that report public, so that we can find out what, in the opinion of experts, are the difficulties in connection with the reserve forces, and the recommendations as to how those forces could be improved.

In his speech the minister said he would deal with the reserves at a later time, when we reach the item in the estimates. I hope when he does so he will place on record the results of the Kennedy report, and the recommendations made.

The figures given as to the numbers in the reserve force, so far as the army is concerned, are practically the same this year as they were last. The figures shown at page 84 of the report indicate that there were approximately fifty fewer registered in the reserve army in 1952-53 than there were in 1951-52. The figures also indicate that there has been a small increase in the navy, and a larger one in the air force where there has been an increase from 4,800 to 5,800.

I cannot speak with authority so far as the navy and air force reserves are concerned, but I would say that, with respect to the army reserves, these figures do not mean very much, and one cannot draw any conclusions from them. I do know that the units with which I am familiar—and I believe the same applies right across Canada—are fairly well up to strength in the matter of officers. As the minister indicated, there has been a big officer training scheme and the reserve units have no difficulties so far as the supply of officers is concerned. But they are woefully weak from the standpoint of the rank and file enlistments. As a result of that, they are not able to carry on their training effectively and could not undertake any operational role. In addition to that, they have suffered from lack of equipment.

In many cases the equipment they have had has been old and out of date. This has been discouraging to those who have been recruited, and it has prevented their remaining with the units. I have here a letter from a former non-commissioned officer of the Calgary Highlanders in which he makes a few comments concerning the reserve army which in my view indicate clearly the views of a large number in the rank and file of reserve units. It sets out the reasons why in many cases they do not continue. I should like to read a few excerpts from it.

He says:

> The argument that there are not enough men serving with keenness is just a condemnation of the policies that have governed the reserve till now. Build up morale and the reserve will build up.

We have been trying to impress that upon the minister and the government ever since the close of the last war. Unless the young men of this country feel that there is a real need for their services in reserve units, and that they are doing a real job in those units, we will not get recruits. There has never been any real effort to impress that fact upon the consciousness of the young men of this country. The letter goes on to say this:

> Men join the reserve to work; take them at their word; I never heard a man complain about too much work at any time during my service. Idle periods spoil morale.

One of the reasons there are idle periods in the reserve forces is that there are not enough men to carry on training in many of the phases which should be carried on. As a result of this, much time is wasted. The letter continues:

> They have obsolescent equipment; nothing is more discouraging than to instruct or be instructed on equipment that we all know perfectly well we shall never use in earnest; just wasted time.

This comes back to the amount of equipment we have sent overseas to our allies. While I do not complain about that policy, as I said previously I think we should equip our own forces, including our reserve forces, with up to date equipment before we send equipment overseas. Certainly we should not have the situation we have had, where equipment was sent overseas and units in Canada have been left without it. This has been true particularly in the case of a large number of anti-tank regiments and batteries throughout the country.

Then the letter continues:

> Pay should be free of income tax. Often his reserve pay puts him into a higher tax bracket so he loses quite a proportion of his pay.

That is a matter we have discussed repeatedly. It was mentioned last night by the hon. member for Oxford, when he was referring to the naval reserve force. I do not think there is any question about it; it is one of the causes of discontent which has an effect out of all proportion to the amount of money involved. A large number of people serving in the reserve feel extremely keenly on this point. They do not think they should be taxed on the amount of money they get for the reserve force training. In many instances, the real advantage to them, the amount of take-home pay they get after taking part in various social activities in connection with their service, is very small. As I say, the amount of revenue which the government receives from it is small, and is out of all proportion to the discontent it causes. I would once more urge the government to give consideration to the matter of making reserve force pay exempt for income tax purposes up to a reasonable amount at any rate. The man in the reserve force who is on call-outs, or otherwise puts in a good portion of the year, say a quarter or a half of the year, as some have done, makes quite an income. Then the argument in connection with collecting income tax on it is a different matter altogether; but the ordinary man in the reserve who draws 15 or 25 days' pay a year should be exempt.

The minister's general appreciation of the probabilities in the future—that there is no real change in the fundamental Soviet objectives; that the fear of mass destruction in the A and H-bombs is a powerful deterrent to general war; that the massive destructiveness of those bombs may be the opposite to a deterrent in small wars; and that the existence of those bombs does not remove the need for conventional arms—is an appreciation with which I think most of us will agree. However, once that is accepted, it seems to me that the general strategical thinking perhaps has not been geared to that. It is quite evident that we must be prepared to meet an A and H-bomb attack, and to meet that the chief features are the defence of Canada itself that I mentioned earlier. To meet our commitments under the United Nations and NATO we must be prepared apparently to participate in small wars with conventional weapons.

It seems to me that the general thinking in preparations which have been made by the Department of National Defence has given too little attention to the first of those roles which our defence forces have to take on, and too much to the second, namely, participation with conventional weapons in small wars. As a matter of fact, it would seem from the way in which expansion has taken place in the army that the thinking is almost pre-world-war II rather than up to date.

The minister stated that we now have fifteen battalions of infantry. We have of course still only two regiments of armour.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am afraid that I must draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that he has been speaking for forty-five minutes. Of course, with the unanimous consent of the committee, he may continue; otherwise I must see someone else.

Mr. Harkness: I can finish in two or three minutes. Before Korea we had three battalions of infantry and two regiments of armour. In other words, the armour was in proportion of two to three of infantry. Now it is down to approximately one-eighth, two of armour as against fifteen battalions of infantry. In other words, the emphasis has all been along that line. It is completely out of balance.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre went into this in some detail yesterday, and since my time is up I will not say anything about it other than it seems to me the time is long past due when that lack of balance should be corrected. The emphasis is on infantry to the practical exclusion of armour, which the minister says is not taking place, but it is quite evident it has taken place from those amounts that we have in a force which must be capable of expansion. In case of general mobilization, or even for a small war where you are not in jungle conditions or something of that sort, we have not a force which is likely to be effective or adapted to that. We should certainly increase the amount of our armour as compared with the amount of infantry.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a few remarks on these estimates. They are the most difficult estimates that come before the house for an ordinary member to deal with, in my opinion. In my opening remarks I must say that I wholeheartedly support the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

We in this group support all necessary expenditures to provide adequate defence for this country, but we are very much opposed to unnecessary expenditure in any respect whatever. We were told some three years ago that we would have a defence program for a three-year period, with an expenditure of about $5 billion. I am quite sure that at that time we got the impression that once we had the three-year program pretty well completed and the $5 billion expended we would then be over the hump and the people of Canada could look forward to some reduction in taxation as a result of the lessening of defence expenditures. The minister informed us yesterday that we have to be prepared for what I think he termed "a long haul" at about the present rate of expenditure. We in this group are not convinced that the present rate of expenditure is required to provide adequate defence for this country. We take that view for several reasons. First, I think we are on sound ground, because history proves that no general staff ever asked for a reduction of any defence estimates. It is only natural that those who are engaged in those activities are anxious to maintain their prestige, their positions and things of that sort. It is further proven by the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, as reported at page 2810 of Hansard of 1951, when he said:

> I have never known an admiral, a general or an air marshal who did not begin by asking for more than his share of anything.
> [Mr. Harkness.]

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich is a man with long military experience, and a very responsible member of this house. I am very much influenced by his remarks, as are other members of this group. When he talks of economy in defence I think they prove the general attitude of general staffs and military people throughout all history. Again yesterday, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich in his speech, in which he dealt with a number of things very well indeed, suggested the possibility of the saving of $200 million. On top of that we find that even in the United States with a Republican government, the Truman military budget was reduced by 15 per cent. We feel that if in the United States under a Republican administration the budget for defence can be reduced 15 per cent, in a country where their military expenditures are on a very large scale, then there should be ample opportunity for us to reduce our defence expenditures. In addition, I am informed the Turkish army has reduced its budget by 25 per cent and in the same session, almost at the same time, that little country voted $3½ million to buy pictures for its national art gallery. These things are going on elsewhere while we in Canada are saying that it is necessary for a long period to continue expenditures as high as those that were occasioned during the build-up period.

I was under the impression that when we had this capital expenditure completed, all the buildings erected, and all the equipment purchased, there would be a reduction in the estimates. We in this group are convinced that with the elimination of waste, and economies that could be practised by the defence department, it should be possible to save anywhere from $300 million to $500 million in our defence estimates without any reduction in the essential defence requirements of this country. I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, when speaking yesterday, clearly indicated where a good many million dollars could be saved in our defence expenditures. Owing to the necessity for security regulations and the consequent lack of knowledge, many members of parliament are at a disadvantage and can only base their arguments on their understanding of the over-all picture and on incidents brought to their attention.

Let me say first of all, Mr. Chairman, that I believe that most hon. members are ignorant of our defence requirements and without information generally. They do not know the facts and when you do not have the facts in your possession you are not able to make a proper analysis of any situation. We are suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that we should have a continuing defence committee composed of members of this house which would be entrusted with the task of going into details of expenditures and through that committee, composed of members of all parties in the house, we would have a much greater assurance that the money to be expended now is required and that it will be expended in the proper way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I pointed out that all we had to go on was our general understanding of the situation, our natural fear of the greediness of any general staff, and their attitude toward expenditures, plus incidents which are brought to our attention, and I am going to mention two or three incidents which were brought to my attention. Though they are small incidents they do indicate a state of mind and an attitude towards expenditure of public funds.

I was told recently that some time late in the fall the Minister of National Defence was in an elevator in defence headquarters taking some visiting dignitaries around the defence department and at the same time there was an orderly, or someone of that sort, in the elevator carrying a tray of coffee. The orderly bumped the minister and some of the coffee spilled on his trousers. Well, first of all we know the minister's trousers are inviolate, so naturally the minister was thoroughly indignant, or so I am told, and said something should be done about it immediately.

Mr. Ferguson: Send them to the cleaners.

Mr. Herridge: The staff at defence headquarters immediately sprang to the defence of the minister's trousers by issuing the following order, and I am now going to quote this order which was taken from the bulletin board in the national defence headquarters:

All Officers, D Pers

Carrying of Parcels

(1) The Minister of National Defence has ruled that there will be no more carrying of large baskets or boxes of coffee or food in the buildings occupied by national defence headquarters.

(2) There is no objection to the transportation of a single cup of coffee from one office to another when the need arises.

This was signed by L. L. Mathers (F. LeP. T. Clifford), Colonel, director of army personnel.

I understand that the result of the minister's order has been that instead of 10 cups of coffee being taken at the same time from the basement up to, say, the third storey offices, they have to carry one cup of coffee at a time. Now, just imagine an orderly going upstairs with one cup of coffee at a time.

My point is this, though this may seem only a minor incident, that if this is the general staff's idea of the utilization of manpower when they issue an order, then it is a rather sorry one, because it means 10 times more labour is required than was required formerly for "Operation Coffee". Under such circumstances we have every reason and good grounds to suspect that we are not getting value for the defence dollar.

Mr. Ferguson: Perhaps you are not aware that they are forming a whole battalion of coffee carriers.

Mr. Herridge: Then they will all have to work one at a time.

Mr. Ferguson: That is the reason.

Mr. Herridge: I would like to refer to another small incident. In answer to a question I asked in the house I was informed by the minister's parliamentary assistant that 36 pairs of skates were purchased for the College Militaire Royal de Saint Jean at a total cost of $1,224 or $34 per pair for the cadets in this military college. First of all I want to know why this government is buying skates for cadets who are reasonably paid by the Canadian taxpayer. Secondly, I want to know why they bought luxury skates. There are not very many people in Canada who can purchase skates at $34 per pair.

I think this is another illustration of a completely unnecessary expenditure in the Department of National Defence. Now, I want to mention one more incident, though I admit quite frankly it is a small incident. Nevertheless, it does indicate a state of mind, and disregard of economy.

Not long ago three generals came to the parliamentary restaurant to fulfil, I presume, a social engagement. I do not know whether it was for tea or dinner, but in any event the three generals came from defence headquarters in three beautiful and expensive cars driven by three chauffeurs. They all arrived in their grandeur complete with the three chauffeurs who had to wait outside the parliament building for about two hours.

My point is this. Ministers of the crown in a democracy are senior to the members of the general staff in regard to order of precedence and, in fact, members of parliament are senior in order of precedence to the chief of the general staff, and rightly so. But if our cabinet ministers, and I give them credit for this, can travel around in cars which cost a very modest amount without chauffeurs, surely we do not require such expensive cars for senior officers of the Department of National Defence often used unnecessarily.

I have mentioned three small incidents all of which indicate a certain trend and they are only what we can see on the surface. We can only see the pimples of expense but therefore judge that the carbuncles are somewhat large in size.

I am not going to speak at length but I would now like to turn to something I think should be drawn to the attention of the minister. I am referring to the case of Kurt Meyer, whose kind treatment raised some objection in Canada recently. That matter is now closed. I think we had our legs pulled to some extent by the government in this case. This German general was found guilty of having incited and counselled troops under his command to deny quarter to allied troops and to be responsible for the killing of Canadian prisoners of war. The death sentence imposed by the court was commuted by General Vokes to life imprisonment. A reviewing board without any Canadian members has since granted remission of sentence which will mean that this nazi German general will be released in a few months.

My point is this. If this nazi general can receive that sort of compassion and his sentence can be reviewed by a board with the consent of the Canadian government, surely the same compassion should be shown to servicemen found guilty by courts-martial of far lesser offences during wartime and for which their punishment continues.

That is my argument, Mr. Chairman, and on that account I urge in all fairness and justice that there should be a review of these cases. Many servicemen are still undergoing sentence imposed during the war and they should be shown the same compassion as that shown to Kurt Meyer. Officers who were cashiered should have their sentences reviewed with a view to imposing a much lighter sentence than dismissal from the service.

Officers who were cashiered are now and will be forever barred from holding public office, which for any person is a terrible penalty. It must be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that these officers were volunteers who came direct from military colleges, from business life, or from the ranks, and they had little or no experience of the heavy responsibilities entailed.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that there are many men who are suffering today from sentences imposed during the war and whose cases now in all fairness should be reviewed. When our government can approve a remission of sentence to a general responsible for counselling the killing of Canadian soldiers, surely the government should in justice and in fairness review the cases of the men who are suffering at the present time for lesser crimes committed during the war. I urge a re-examination of these cases and consideration on behalf of these unfortunate men who are still suffering and will continue to suffer unless something is done.

In concluding I want to make just a few remarks concerning enlistment and examinations for enlistment because I have knowledge of some unfortunate circumstances and cases. I have personal knowledge of an unfortunate case which would not have occurred, in my opinion, if the Department of National Defence had been more careful in examining the young man to whom I have reference, who was in Essondale for a number of years. I may say that Essondale is our mental asylum in British Columbia. He was enlisted in the army, later committed a crime in the United States, was sentenced to life imprisonment and is serving that sentence in the United States at this time. So far nothing has been done to restore that young man to Canadian custody. I mention this case because I think it is a most unfortunate one. I am not suggesting that there are many, but when cases like this one can occur I suggest that there must be something wrong in connection with the examination of men seeking to enlist in the armed forces.

In this connection I want to read briefly from an editorial in the Globe and Mail of Friday, April 2, 1954. It is headed "The Real Question" and reads as follows:

> Parliament finally got around to the case of Private Walter Cierpisz on Wednesday, when a socialist member . . .

That is myself, I presume.

> . . . asked whether the defence department took any precautions against the enlistment of mental defectives in the armed forces. (Cierpisz, now serving ten years for manslaughter, was described at his trial as having a mental age of ten.)
> The answer given by Associate Defence Minister Campney suggests that, in his view, Canada's parliament and people are mentally defective. Certainly they would need to be, to swallow the miserable excuses he put forward. Claiming that each of the services gave careful mental and physical tests to prospective recruits, Mr. Campney continued:
> "Those who pass them must be far beyond the mental age of ten. The tests are carefully worked out, and have resulted extremely well in most cases. Of course, there will always be borderline cases wherever the line is drawn. Some borderline cases turn out very well and some not so well. This is one of the unfortunate ones."
> If Cierpisz, with a mental age of ten, was a borderline case, where is the border, and what is the line? Are we to assume that recruits with a mental age of 11 or 12 are considered safely past, or indeed "far beyond" it? In any event, was Cierpisz given the official tests, and by whom? Did he actually pass them, and by whose judgment? . . .
> Parliament must look further up in the defence department. Who makes and supervises appointments to examining bodies of this nature? How is the screening of recruits checked, if it is checked at all? Not until these questions have been answered can we determine who, and at what level, is responsible for the enlistment of men who should never have been enlisted.

I quote from that editorial, Mr. Chairman, because I agree with the suggestions contained in it. When the minister speaks in reply to the criticisms made from this side of the chamber, I should like him to inform the committee of the procedure in connection with examining a man on his application for enlistment into the defence forces.

Once again I want to say that we on this side of the chamber—with the exception possibly of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and one or two others—are at a great disadvantage in criticizing these estimates with knowledge and with certainty. We know this expenditure is a terrific burden on the Canadian people but we cannot discharge our duty adequately by a general discussion during the estimates, while the house is sitting. I certainly think we require a continuing defence committee composed of members of all parties, taken into the confidence of the Department of National Defence and having an opportunity to make certain that every dollar that is spent is necessary for the adequate defence of this country.

Mr. Shaw: It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to occupy the time of the committee for long. However, there are certain matters on which I believe I should comment at this time. Yesterday the Minister of National Defence laid down, in clear and precise terms, Canada's defence policy. He dealt with internal defence and he dealt with our defence from the standpoint of our activities in association with our allies. What was said by him, supplemented by the white paper, gave us a reasonably clear over-all picture of policy. However, I think even the minister would agree that much detail was missing.

I want to concur wholeheartedly in the observation made by the hon. member for Kootenay West and by practically every other member who has spoken with respect to the necessity for the establishment of what I would call a standing committee on defence rather than a defence expenditure committee. Because of what has taken place in the past I fully realize that the name "defence expenditure committee" might cause the minister to bristle just a wee bit, but not if it were a defence committee, an all-party committee, charged with the responsibility of dealing with the estimates and of even dealing with expenditures. Where it seems, in the opinion of the committee members, that such examination is necessary—that is as to expenditure with respect to some specific matter—they should be authorized to pursue the study of that matter.

Certainly practically all members of the House of Commons find themselves in a most unfortunate position when it comes to consideration of these estimates. Actually, if we were to do justice to these estimates we would keep the minister and the committee here for days, weeks and even months. After all, let us just consider for one moment what part of the total budget is devoted to national defence. If we look at it in no other way, from the taxpayers' point of view we would be completely justified in devoting, as I say, even weeks or months to the consideration of that department alone. I certainly suggest, for several reasons, that the minister urge the government to give favourable consideration to the setting up of that committee which would be a standing committee and which could sit almost continuously while parliament is in session.

After all, we have other committees. We realize that even though the Secretary of State for External Affairs from time to time makes comprehensive statements on the floor of the House of Commons, certain of his estimates are referred to the external affairs committee and witnesses are called before that committee. Those who are members of that committee will secure much information from the witnesses and we who may not be members of the committee will certainly have the benefit of the printed evidence. But possibly of even more importance than that, the Canadian taxpayers will have an opportunity of securing copies of that evidence.

Important as defence may be, I cannot lose sight of the fact that the Canadian taxpayers are bearing a colossal burden for defence. Times are reasonably buoyant now. Even though that is so, yesterday the minister stated that the burdens laid upon this country by national defence are heavy, even in relation to our immense resources. He might also have added "even in relation to the general economic picture in the country today". We have no assurance that the general economic picture will continue to be as favourable as it is at the present time. Yet the demands for adequate defence may make it completely impossible to cut back even though there may at some time be a general deterioration in the economic picture. My personal conviction is that as long as international tension continues, as long as the avowed purpose of the communists is what it is today, as long as their actions continue to give the lie to their words, we will not only have to maintain our defences at the present level but will most undoubtedly have to expand them as time goes on. I think it would give a good deal of comfort and satisfaction to the Canadian taxpayers, and certainly to a good many members of the house, if such a committee were set up.

May I suggest to the minister that I think the onus is upon him to give us reasons, if there are such, for not setting up a committee on national defence. Certainly he is aware of the widespread demand from this part of the house. With reference to the lack of information, may I say that it applies not only to members of the house but also to the Canadian people, and undoubtedly much of the criticism that falls upon the minister's shoulders from time to time results directly from the fact that the Canadian people are not as fully informed as they should be.

Let me give an illustration or two in order to be quite specific. There were two fires recently at Canadian air stations, and investigations were made with respect to them. May I clarify a certain matter right at this point. Members who were in the house prior to the last election will recall that from time to time I offered severe criticism of certain things that were happening with respect to defence construction at Penhold in my constituency. I am still absolutely convinced that I was completely justified in doing so. I do not have to go beyond the words of the present Minister of Public Works to believe that much good resulted from what I said on the floor of the house.

But this is what I want to point out. Last summer certain friends of the government went out of their way to create the impression that what I did on the floor of the house with respect to Penhold was to criticize the Royal Canadian Air Force as such. I say that accusation is wholly false. I have had the greatest admiration for the Royal Canadian Air Force both during the war and in the period subsequent to the war. As far as I am able to determine, the Penhold air station is operating in a most satisfactory manner. From what I have learned I am confident that the officers are carrying out their work in a most satisfactory way and are deserving of commendation. Let it not be said again, in the light of what I am going to say now, that I am offering criticism of the Royal Canadian Air Force. I realize fully that they operate under certain rules and regulations which at times may leave them in a position where it may appear that they may be responsible for things for which they are not responsible.

Having said that, may I refer to the rather disastrous fire that occurred at Penhold on April 10 which resulted in the destruction of a hangar in which there were a number of service aircraft. All I have to go on of course are the press reports. It was indicated that it was a million dollar fire. That may be quite wrong, but that is the information I have and that is the information the public has. On May 3 I asked on the floor of the house if the investigation into the fire had been completed and, if so, whether the report would be tabled in the house. I realized when I asked the question that there was slight possibility of the report being tabled because apparently it is not government policy to do so.

I should like to ask the minister this question. Why should it be the policy not to table the report of such an investigation as that into the fire at Penhold? That is a question that a great many people would like to have answered. Why? When police investigations take place into certain things the information is made available to the public. Because of the fact that the people do not know any more than they saw at the time or read in the newspapers, two stories are current. One is that if the wind had been blowing from the opposite direction there might have been very little of Penhold air station left. I did not happen to be home at the time, but persons who were present have indicated to me that that might well have been the disastrous result. It was also indicated that at the end of the fire and before the hangar was destroyed the people fighting it were completely without water. If that is true it simply means that maybe we have not made adequate provision for fire protection.

I think these are things that the minister should clarify. I am not making these remarks in any critical sense. We have a wonderful station at Penhold. The Canadian taxpayers have quite a few millions of dollars invested in other air stations and installations across Canada. I believe it is the practice of the government to carry its own insurance with the result that a million dollar loss in a fire simply means a million dollars lost to the Canadian taxpayers. I trust the minister will be able to assure the house that adequate fire fighting facilities are established at these stations.

Even more important than that, I have before me a short editorial that appeared in the Albertan, a Calgary daily paper, the issue of April 13, and in it a few questions are asked. I suppose they probably would not have been asked if the answers were known. Certainly I cannot answer them on the basis of the knowledge I have now. The editorial reads as follows:

> We would like to know what system of fire watches is maintained at R.C.A.F. stations.

Then they refer to Penhold and ask this question:

> . . . is there one man on duty at all times at each hangar, or does one man have to keep watch on several hangars? We gather from the news reports that the latter condition exists. Loss was at least a million dollars at Penhold when fire destroyed one of the hangars and its contents over the week end. It is reasonable to believe that if one man had been assigned to that building alone, patrolling all corners of it, the fire would have been detected in time to control it.
> Any privately owned building worth a million dollars has a watchman on duty every hour of the day, every day of the year. Isn't public property worth just as much protection? Should the authorities take unnecessary chances just because the taxpayers can be counted on to make up the loss. There are reported to be about 3,000 men at the Penhold station. Surely it wouldn't be a hardship on the personnel to have someone in each hangar at all times.

What the policy is across Canada I do not know, but I think we should know. Of course, if it had been generally known at that time I doubt if these questions would have been asked by the Albertan in this editorial. I trust that the minister will bear that in mind. I am not concerned specifically with Penhold. That sort of fire could occur anywhere. As I say, I am concerned about the water supply. I know that we paid plenty for a water supply there. I am also concerned about the consequences of what the people who were there say would have happened if the wind had been in the opposite direction. I say to the minister that personally I cannot understand why reports of investigations of this kind should not be made public. I think it would ease the public mind. It is not just a question of trying to attach blame to somebody. I am not trying to attach blame to anyone. Whatever is done is done because of policy. The fire watch at Penhold, whatever it was, I asume must have been the same as that in existence at other air stations. It may be good, but we do not know what the general policy is.

There is another matter that I feel the minister should bear in mind. I can judge the importance of this only by the number of letters which have come to me from parents. The minister will understand that I am not in a position to table the letters, so I shall not quote them. They are from the parents of persons in the air force, and certainly I am not going to even run the risk of jeopardizing their welfare by naming them. Recently, while the minister was away, I asked the Associate Minister of National Defence this question. These are not exact words, but it was something like this: Does the government intend grounding all jet aircraft in Canada pending an investigation into the crashes that have taken place within recent times? The associate minister indicated that there were several types of jet aircraft, and therefore it would be rather senseless to ground them all. Perhaps I should have been more explicit in my question and mentioned the specific type of aircraft or asked in my question that the particular type of jet aircraft that is causing the difficulties be grounded.

I am advised with respect to these crashes that we do not know about all of them. I should like to know the total number of crashes there have been in Canada of jet aircraft, say within the last six months. This seems to have been a particularly bad period. I should like the information concerning accidents to jet aircraft, not only in which airmen have been killed, but accidents on the ground. I am told by the parents of young men in the air force, who were told by their sons, that the information is kept completely away from these young men. What they learn they hear over the air or pick up in the newspaper, even though it may be an accident in connection with their own station. They say it is extremely detrimental to morale. I can easily understand how it could be detrimental to morale.

I feel the minister should give this house a clearly-defined picture of the actual amount of training an airman gets before he solos in a jet aircraft. I am not suggesting for a moment that the information I have is correct, but once again it comes from parents whose sons have indicated to them that it is their conviction they are compelled to solo much too soon so far as these jet aircraft are concerned. They get a certain amount of training with Harvards. I am told that after they get that training with Harvards they are given six hours' dual instruction on a jet, and then they are on their own. That is the statement that comes from the parent of one of the boys who is flying a jet. I do not know enough about jet aircraft to know whether or not six hours' dual flying, even though they have had the training in the conventional type of aircraft, is sufficient. Certainly, something is wrong somewhere when one stops to contemplate the accidents that have occurred in connection with jet aircraft in Canada. I trust the minister will try to satisfy us with respect to this matter. These and many other things are based on the lack of specific information before me and before the Canadian public.

I think that probably even before now either the minister or the Associate Minister of National Defence should have been right up on his feet to make a statement with respect to these jet aircraft crashes. I think it would certainly result in much higher morale among the service personnel, more particularly among the younger lads. I know one parent wrote to me and said: For goodness' sake, until they find out what is wrong with these jets, put the older, more experienced pilots into them and not my young lad of 21 with the training he has had. He said he just sits in fear awaiting that telegram to come, and he would be much happier if he knew that for this period, while they are having some trouble, they would keep these young lads out of jet aircraft.

Actually, I did not intend to speak so long. I did not try to deal with defence policy. My colleague the hon. member for Wetaskiwin dealt with that. He made it abundantly clear to the house that we believe Canada should be as adequately defended as possible. As he said, it is not how much we spend, but how we spend it that counts. The government has had no trouble from us when it has come to securing support for defence appropriations. We do, however, feel that the greatest value should be procured for every dollar spent. We do feel, as other members have stated, that so far as we are concerned there is no justification for failure to set up that defence committee. After all, let me repeat, more than $2 billion has been appropriated for defence this year; that is a substantial part of our 1954-55 national budget. If we can take time to have other committees studying other aspects of government operations, then how much more important is it for us to have a defence committee for the purpose of examining into defence.

Mr. Claxton: I think it would be most unfortunate if I allowed a minute to go by without answering the questions raised by the hon. member for Red Deer concerning the accidents to jet aircraft, because to leave even those questions unanswered would have a most unfortunate effect both on the morale of the force and upon recruiting for the R.C.A.F., as well as on the comfort of mind of the parents.

Mr. Shaw: It has already had a very bad effect.

Mr. Claxton: We do not find that within the air force, but I should answer the question. I do not know what caused the hon. member's inquiry if it has not been principally the accidents that have happened to Comets. We have two Comets in the R.C.A.F., and at the moment both are still in existence. We have never had any serious trouble at all with them, and both of them are now undergoing modifications that have been suggested by the manufacturer.

In so far as jet aircraft in general are concerned, the only jet aircraft operating in Canada of which I know are operated by the R.C.A.F. Any question that is raised concerning the accident rate, therefore, of jet aircraft in Canada must refer to the accidents suffered in the R.C.A.F. I should tell hon. members that the fatal accident rate, that is the total number of fatal accidents per one thousand hours of flying by R.C.A.F. jet aircraft, is lower than that for conventional types. The fatal accident rate for jet aircraft flown by the R.C.A.F. is lower than that for conventional types. What is more, the total fatal accident rate for the R.C.A.F. is lower than that for the United States air force or for the Royal Air Force. It is lower for 1953 than it was in 1952.

Mr. Shaw: May I ask the minister a question? The minister mentioned fatal accidents. Does that information include the non-fatal accidents?

Mr. Claxton: No, just the fatal accidents.

Mr. Shaw: I was interested in the other as well.

Mr. Claxton: The figures are comparable with regard to the non-fatal. It is difficult, however, to make a similar comparisan with regard to non-fatal accidents because different countries grade them differently.

I have not got the information here concerning the hours of training that Canadian trainees receive. I can get that information and the question can be answered later when we come to the air force estimates, if it is not available today. We have in Canada a vast experience in the training of aircrew. We gained it during the war in the British commonwealth air training plan when we trained 131,000 aircrew for the commonwealth, 71,000 of whom were Canadians. And Canada, I think, had a higher percentage of aircrew in her armed forces than any other country fighting during the war. Since that time we have kept our methods of selection and training up to date through developments here, and by following very closely the practices in effect in other countries.

I can tell the hon. member, from what I know about it, and from what I am told, not only by our own officers, but also by the officers of air forces in other countries—and we heard frequently from them because they visited their own trainees who were here with the NATO group—that our methods of selection and training are second to none. That is the way we want to have it.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Chairman, when we come to the annual debate on the estimates for the Department of National Defence we cover a lot of ground from the personnel, strategic and tactical standpoints, so that one could speak for a very long time on this aspect of our security. It is not my purpose to go into higher strategy—although I could—or the tactics we have developed to defend this country. That has been gone into by other speakers, and I shall not repeat it today.

However, listening to the minister yesterday one could not help being struck by the position in which this continent finds itself, when he described the terrific power of the A-bomb, and now the hydrogen bomb—and I suppose in a short time it will be the C-bomb. This power of destruction is so great, we have been told, as to stagger the imagination of the ordinary human being. But let me say immediately that all down through the history of war, its basic principles never change, although the means of waging it have changed.

This massive power of destruction which we have is only a continuation of the powers of destruction we have had in modern times. It is something to consider very seriously, and something to drive home in the minds of our people so that they will be fully informed of the dangers which lie at their door, if a third world war were to take place.

We all know that Russian aircraft can reach this continent. We also know that, with all our defences, some of the aircraft will get through. That is a serious situation for people living in the large cities on this continent. It is a situation which I know concerns the heads of our services, and one with which they are grappling all the time. It is a condition with which this and other countries are grappling conscientiously at all times. Nevertheless some of those aircraft will get through. And with that situation, I think we have to face up to the fact that our civilian population should be warned sufficiently so that they may take adequate steps to minimize this danger which confronts us today.

To bear out my point, may I quote from page 4905 of Hansard what was said by the minister. He said:

> It is very risky for people charged with defence to make a prophecy. All we can do is to give opinions and not give assurances, but this system of defence against air attack has reached the stage today where if I were in charge of the Russian air force and were aiming to reach important targets in the United States—

And I am sorry he did not mention Canada.

> —I would not go across the lines of these radar defences. I would go some other way—

And he ends with the words, "and there are other ways". That, to me, if it means anything, means that with all our defences—and they are good; I have seen them myself and I think they are manned by capable aircrew—we are vulnerable. Because if there are other ways, we must be vulnerable. I do not want the minister to give any hint as to what the other ways are. I would not expect that. I do not want him to say it, and I do not want to know it. But that significant statement made yesterday by the minister is something which should be brought home to every man, woman and child in this country—that we are vulnerable.

I come from a province which is vital to the defence of Canada. This afternoon, if I may, I want to confine myself to a problem which, as I see it, confronts us on the eastern seaboard. It was only last Sunday that we, together with the armed forces, celebrated the anniversary of the battle of the Atlantic. We know that we won that battle only by a very short hair. Sir Winston Churchill, in his memoirs, has said that it was touch and go. And there is danger in the Atlantic today, just as much as there was during the second world war. I refer to the submarine menace.

Now, I know we have improved our methods of submarine detection. I also know that the menace is there today, just as much as it ever was. With the modern submarine, and with methods of detection, the menace still exists. Let me say right here and now that it is only two or three years ago that Russian submarines were in the bay of Fundy and around the coast of Newfoundland. I know the number that were there, but I will not mention it. However, I do know they were there—and they were there for no good, so far as we are concerned.

The latest development is that of Russian trawlers fishing on the Grand Banks. I wish to refer to this visit to the Grand Banks which took place a short time ago, because to me it seems that it shows a certain amount of slackness in our military forces in the province from which I come. I shall try to bring out this point.

In this connection I quote from the Evening Telegram of St. John's, which says:

> U.S. Intelligence, the R.C.A.F. and "certain authorities" are expressing keen interest in the goings-on of two Russian trawlers on the Grand Banks.
> U.S.A.F. and R.C.A.F. planes have flown over the trawlers—Odessa and Sevastapol, which are partially "manned" by women—and the R.C.A.F. took some aerial photographs of them.
> Meanwhile captain of the Spanish trawler "Euskal-Erria" has taken sea-level pictures of the Russian ships and taken these photos to "certain authorities in Newfoundland" and to U.S. Intelligence at Pepperrell base.

It goes on:

> F/O Lloyd admitted that most of the information available to the R.C.A.F. in Newfoundland and Halifax, maybe Ottawa, now too, was gleaned from Evening Telegram investigations and reportorial accounts.

In other words the first word our intelligence officers in Newfoundland had was this article in the Evening Telegram. It states further:

> Commodore Gabriel Aguirre of the Spanish fishing fleet told the Telegram his subordinates reported to "certain authorities" in St. John's, giving those "certain authorities" photographs and getting in return (for better pictures) a better camera than that which they were using, so as to get more pictures of the Russians at the Banks.

And it ends in this way:

> Russian trawlers aren't on the Grand Banks to fish. They're there for information relevant to our coastal waters, defences and the like, Commodore Aguirre said in an exclusive Evening Telegram interview.
> W/C Pleasance, head over the R.C.A.F. here, said last night he didn't know too much about the Russian ships ". . . and I'd like to know more."

If that means anything to me it means that the Russian ships were fishing on the Grand Banks for some time before our authorities knew anything at all about it. The first intimation they had that the Russians were there was when this Spanish commodore came into St. John's, Newfoundland, for supplies and notified the authorities. That brings me to a recommendation which I intend to make now. In this fishing fleet on the Grand Banks, which is composed of Portuguese, Spanish, French and other trawlers those countries have vessels on patrol for their protection. I think the time has now come, indeed if it is not overdue, when we must have a warship of some form on the Grand Banks watching what is going on there. It would be useful to our own fishing fleet; certainly they need some protection in case of emergency, and to keep an eye on the Russian trawlers coming out fishing there. We know, regardless of how much we should like to think otherwise, that they are not there for our good. First of all we had a submarine, and now we have Russian trawlers. I am convinced they are not there to fish. They have plenty of places to fish without coming to the Grand Banks.

This brings me to another point. Newfoundland is, as all hon. members know, an island. It is also known, as I mentioned a moment ago, that the submarine menace is a serious one. If we do get into a third world war, which I hope we will not, there will be hell on the Atlantic. We had hell on the Atlantic before, and we in Newfoundland know it because hundreds of seamen who were rescued from the icy waters of the Atlantic were brought to our shores, and it was almost a daily occurrence. Furthermore, iron ore ships were torpedoed in Conception bay, not far from my home, with a great loss of life. They were torpedoed right in front of people living there. Only the other day it was reported in the papers that a submarine in the English channel on manœuvres had disappeared. An alarm was sent out that it had not reported for some time. They thought it was in difficulty, but later it surfaced. It had eluded all the craft that were searching for it. They were searching for the submarine with the latest modern submarine detection equipment. If that could happen on manœuvres in the English channel it gives us some idea of the danger that the submarine menace is to our security today. I could give other examples of that but I do not want to do it here in the committee because I do not want to give any comfort to the enemy, no matter who he may be. It is my firm conviction that the submarine menace is a serious one. The position in which my province finds itself is this, if we should ever get into a third world war, we are dependent almost wholly on the sea for our supplies. If this menace is as bad or as serious as I think it is we shall have to supply our troops in Germany largely by air. We have not the airports in Newfoundland or Labrador to take care of the traffic that would have to be accommodated.

I was told about two or three years ago by those who knew that another airport should be built in Newfoundland. It was not built. I was at Gander at the time and I was told on very good authority that if we ever got into a war Gander could not carry the traffic and neither could Goose, and another airport was needed to carry the prospective traffic. It is a vital necessity. I bring it to the attention of the authorities. I do not want Canada to do it if she is not able to do it. She might make some arrangements with the United States. The United States already have two airports there, one at Harmon field on the west coast and the other at Marquise near the naval base at Argentia. We have Gander and Torbay, and Goose in Labrador. So great will be this traffic going by air that we will not have the facilities to carry it. To me it is going to be a serious thing. I think the time to prepare for it is now; therefore I bring it to the attention of the minister. I am not criticizing him or his department; I am just bringing it to his attention because if this happens, as I see it, then you will have to supply the people of Newfoundland by air. That is the only way you will be able to get the supplies in.

I could go farther and recommend where the airport should be, but I shall leave that to the people who are supposed to pick out the places and when they do probably I shall have something more to say on the matter. I do want to bring that to the serious consideration of the minister. It is serious to our people in Newfoundland and it is serious to Canada. Newfoundland is the Gibraltar of the Atlantic. It played a vital part in the convoy system during the last war, and it will play a greater part if we ever get into a third world war. I want to bring that with all the emphasis I can to the attention of hon. members.

To bear out what I am trying to say and to try to emphasize it I am going to quote from the remarks of the minister which he made yesterday in a very frank way. He said, as reported at page 4905 of Hansard:

> When we were up in the Arctic four weeks ago I was astonished to find that to keep a weather station employing nine men going took 340 tons of supplies a year, and that involved 30 round trips of a North Star aircraft from Resolute Bay to wherever the station was. It also involved getting the supplies to Resolute by aircraft or ship. When we have to use 30 round trips of a heavy transport over these immense distances to supply a station employing nine men you can see how tremendous will be the task of increasing our defences in the far north. However, I am sure that more will have to be done and that it will be done.

If it takes 340 tons of supplies to supply nine men, how many tons of supplies will be needed to supply the people of Newfoundland, to keep life in them, because you will not get supplies in by sea. The only way will be by air. I quote that statement to emphasize the point which I am trying to make here this afternoon.

Others have mentioned the tremendous cost of this defence, roughly $2 billion a year. We are all very much concerned with these tremendous expenditures. We are all very much concerned with the burden that our people have to carry by paying taxes to maintain it; but I say here definitely now, irrespective of anybody else's opinion, we cannot afford to spend less. We have vast areas to defend, and we have a small population. As I pointed out a moment ago, we are vulnerable. Not only are we vulnerable in the air, but on the sea. And the first duty of this government is the protection of its people. Although I regret the heavy expenditure, I say this, and I say it emphatically: We cannot help ourselves. Until such time as international tension eases we have to spend this money if our people are going to get the defence to which they are entitled.

I have no criticism of the Department of National Defence. Mistakes have been made; we all know that, but they are not vital mistakes. I have every confidence in the Department of National Defence and in the heads of the three services that they are doing everything possible to give us the defence which we need. But they have a tremendous problem. We have a vast area to defend, and we have to plan for defence with a small population to carry it out, and with limited means. Therefore they have to plan in accordance with the problem as I stated it a moment ago, and it is no easy job. It is a difficult situation. Nobody knows what is going to happen next month or six months hence.

It has been mentioned here that it looks as if we are going to fight the next war as if it were a continuation of the last war. I do not know. The H-bomb has made a difference in our weapons; there is no doubt about that. There is no doubt that some of the weapons we have today will be obsolete. That is a problem that you have to face. And you get different opinions from the highest authorities. Until they have settled that it will be useless for us to spend vast amounts of money unless we know where we are going and why we are spending it.

I have nothing further to say, Mr. Chairman, except that I regret this emergency and I regret our having to spend this money on defence when it could be used for more useful purposes in the world. But while this threat is hanging over our heads—and it is not lessening; Geneva and Indo-China will tell you that—while this threat is there, we shall have to face it if we are to get the protection which we need. I think if the Canadian people, whom I believe to be the finest people on earth, second to none, are told the true hard facts they will face up to them as they have in the past, they will come through as they have in the past, and they will come through no matter what happens.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to follow the arguments which have been advanced by the hon. members who preceded me, nor to repeat the arguments which have been placed before the committee by other members. I was impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West when, apparently in consequence of the words of optimism expressed by the minister yesterday, he pleaded for a reduction in the amount of expenditure for national defence.

The minister gave the house a very complete outline of the situation which, together with the white paper, revealed in some detail Canada's position. But I think the minister went rather far when he gave expression to the following:

> It is very risky for people charged with defence to make a prophecy. All we can do is to give opinions and not give assurances, but this system of defence against air attack has reached the stage today where if I were in charge of the Russian air force and were aiming to reach important targets in the United States I would not go across the lines of these radar defences. I would go some other way, and there are other ways.

That statement, Mr. Chairman, has much in common with the Maginot-line complex of 1935 to 1939 and, having regard to what knowledge one may obtain by visiting various parts of northern Canada, to say the least it is based upon pious optimism. All of us hope that the minister's prophecy may be attained, but it does indicate an attitude of unreality and a failure to appreciate what I think the people of Canada must realize, namely that the danger to our survival is today as great as, if not greater than, it has been since 1945.

The hon. member for Kootenay West urged the establishment of a committee to investigate expenditures to ensure economic expenditure. All hon. members want economic expenditures, but I personally do not see—and I speak for myself alone based on my experience in this house—how such a committee having regard to its party complex can achieve what the people of Canada expect, namely actual production of armaments instead of a march of statistics based upon the amount of expenditures. With some Canadians already weary of the heavy expenditures and heavy taxation it is time our people were made fully aware of the dangers inherent in the world situation.

Recently I had the privilege of seeing something of the situation in Europe at first hand, and in this connection I would like to say that I was given every assistance by the departments of external affairs and defence. I had the privilege of an interview with General Gruenther, a man of masterful personality, tremendous capacity for leadership and with a knowledge of world events which fits him for the position he now occupies. I do not think those associated with him at SHAPE headquarters would express the hope that the danger is less than it was at any time during the last nine years.

Indeed, one of the greatest fears we face today is this, that nations will weary in well-doing and that the continued preparations for war will cause the feeling of apathy which, as one listens to the debate in this house, is not unrevealed in this chamber, if one can draw any conclusion on the basis of the attendance for this debate.

General Gruenther is coming to Canada early in June. He is a man who could give the Canadian people something of the picture as he sees it, and I hope that some time during his two-day visit he will be given the opportunity through the medium of the C.B.C. to place before the Canadian people the defence picture as he can reveal it from his position as supreme commander.

All of us hope for a reduction in war expenditure. We have the right to expect that the government will institute what it has not heretofore instituted, namely a more meticulous and careful examination of expenditures so that unnecessary and wasteful expenditure will be abolished and the purchase of obsolete weapons will be discontinued.

The minister in his speech revealed a change in his thinking. I well remember some five or six years ago when his emphasis was not upon air power. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, with his unequalled experience and a knowledge of our problems gained during his progress from the ranks to the post of major general, in the infantry during two world wars, long ago indicated that in his opinion what was necessary was an intensification of air power and a lesser emphasis upon other means of defence. In 1949 he made a speech to that effect in this house and I shall read a portion of that speech. On November 18 of that year he said, as reported at page 1960 of Hansard:

> Government policies are revealed in the estimates that are produced.

Then in the next paragraph he continued:

> I have been an infantry soldier most of my life and I have all the pride and tradition of marching men behind me, but I say with that background that where we are spending under these items $1 on the army we ought to be spending $3 on the air force. One dollar on the army and $3 on the air force. I have not had the advantage of discussing this matter with the committee; I have not been able to prepare details of the estimates, but those are the proportions in which the money ought to be spent. That is why I feel in duty bound at this time to oppose the whole policy underlying the maintenance of our forces, because I do not believe the people of Canada are getting the proper amount of protection in return for the money they are providing.

That was his view in 1949. Events since 1949 indicate that his powers of anticipation and prophecy envisaged the world situation of today. The views he then expressed are the views which are accepted now by the general staffs of the various armies. In the British defence white paper of 1954, which to a degree represents the viewpoint of the British chiefs of staff, these words appear:

> If by some miscalculation in communist policy or by deliberate design, a global war were to be forced upon us, it must be assumed that atomic weapons would be employed by both sides. In this event, it seems likely that such a war would begin with a period of intense atomic attacks lasting a relatively short time but inflicting great destruction and damage. If no decisive results were reached in this opening phase, hostilities would decline in intensity, though perhaps less so at sea than elsewhere, and a period of "broken-backed" warfare would follow, during which the opposing sides would seek to recover their strength, carrying on the struggle in the meantime as best they might.
> Such a prospect emphasizes yet again the prime necessity of basing our defence policy upon the prevention of war. It also makes clear the need to keep the lead which we now hold in technical development on which we must rely to offset the preponderance of the communist states in manpower.

Then it goes on to say this:

The basic one must be that by 1960—if not already—the Soviet union will be in possession of an ample stock of tactical atomic weapons, and she may strike in a very different manner from the sort of build-up and attack she would have launched in the pre-atomic days.

The views of the British chiefs of staff in 1954 represent in large measure the viewpoint expressed by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich in 1949. The government can learn much of benefit in the discussions in the House of Commons by members with knowledge and a realization of the issues as they are. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization, with available atomic weapons, apparently stands in a better position than at any time throughout recent years. We are in a position—and I quote the reference to General Gruenther to which I believe allusion has already been made—where the U.S.S.R. have nothing that would match the B-47 today. But with the expansion taking place in connection with atomic energy in the U.S.S.R., our great danger is that if we fail to continue to produce and to secure the largest possible return for the defence dollar spent, five years from now we shall find ourselves in a position where our relative strength in atomic weapons will be lower as compared with that of the U.S.S.R. One of the great deterrents to war is atomic power. Its influence for peace may be lost within five years because of our failure to place greater emphasis on air development and to spend a greater portion of our defence dollar upon aircraft capable of conveying atomic bombs to their destinations.

I well remember when in 1949 the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich advanced his arguments, on behalf of air power, the answer that was invariably given was in effect that his views did not represent the view of those in authority on the staff.

My friend the hon. member for Kootenay West indicated that some nations are reducing their expenditures. He mentioned the United States and he also referred to Turkey. Those reductions are taking place, not by reducing the amount produced but actually by savings and by economies, thus achieving the same return as the expenditure of the larger amount would have achieved.

I believe every facility should be provided to members of the House of Commons to see at first hand the situation in Europe as it is. I have never advocated junkets at the expense of the state; far from it, but Canadian members of parliament should have the same opportunity that United States members of congress have to see what is going on over there. Such visits should be provided not at the expense, as I say, of the state but by utilizing the facilities that are available as the Royal Canadian Air Force engages in routine flights or other training expeditions. Only by first hand knowledge can members of parliament have a knowledge of conditions.

The minister mentioned the power of NATO. The progress that has taken place in the last three or four years has been tremendous. The results are a tribute to those who have given their devotion to the service of the organization comprising fourteen member nations who have been able to work together in a way that could not have been anticipated a few years ago. But certainly one of the great dangers in NATO is that discord and dissension will take place, similar to the divisions among the free nations as have been revealed in the Geneva conference. Disunity and division, confusion and cleavage. Ultimately disunity will result in the weakening of the western democratic and freedom-loving nations. Failure to agree is playing into the hands of the communists.

Two striking things during my trip come to mind. One was to see in France, a matter of but a few days ago, something of what communism can do. I was in the gallery of the chambre des députés the day that Dien Bien Phu was captured. The communists there knew what had happened. They forgot the glory of France in their apparent joy at the fact that destruction had come to the French army that had so gallantly defended that outpost in Indo-China. A day later I saw something of the spirit of France when, in defeat, everywhere there was that attitude of mourning and courage which indicated that out of that defeat in Indo-China will come a new determination and a renewed power for greatness.

It has been said that in Europe communism is in recession. The answer is in the returns of the election which took place recently in northern France where the communists won a surprise local victory and the same in Italy where some 30 per cent of the people are voting communist. These things are of interest to us because to the degree that communism is able to establish itself, to that extent the possibility of the European defence community plan being passed and brought into being recedes into the future.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Prince Albert. Item 239.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I was dealing in general with the NATO organization, the need of its preservation and the realization by all of us that criticism of other nations within NATO is a detrimental course and weakens that organization at a time that the communists are endeavouring to cause dissension, disorganization, disagreement, delay and deferment of decisions. When we sometimes feel prone to criticize the United States of America let us realize one fact, that of the $68 billion this year that is being expended through the NATO organization to maintain and preserve freedom almost 80 per cent is furnished by the United States of America.

The communists' aim and endeavour is to divide, to divide and rule because of the division. They adopt a different policy in every part of Europe to meet the circumstances of the country in which they are. In France they oppose EDC and say in effect that the 500,000 men that Germany would provide are unnecessary. They go back to the hundreds of years of difference and difficulty between France and Germany. In Italy they bring up the question of Trieste and contend that if EDC is ratified by Italy then in that case the hope of the Italians to retrieve Trieste will be gone.

In northern Italy they operate in the trade unions on the basis that they have achieved a great deal for the workmen. Among the farmers they say that there will be no rent. For every area they have a policy. Their purpose is to divide and thereby destroy the security which the unity of NATO alone can preserve. I hope that everything will be done by our leaders to bring home to the Canadian people and to the peoples of all the nations within the NATO organization the imperative need of preservation of the unity of NATO. Unity cannot be divisible and freedom survive.

Next, the maintenance of the spiritual things of free men is important. In that regard I think the recent judgment of the supreme court of the United States denying segregation is one of the greatest steps forward for democracy everywhere in the world in removing as it will one of those stumbling blocks with which communism has been able to block the roadway to freedom for the coloured races. I predict that magnificent judgment will take its place internationally in the years ahead in the struggle against communism to the same degree as Lincoln's emancipation declaration had its effective results in unifying the various states of the United States.

NATO is a tremendous project. Canada has made a worthy contribution. I bring you from among the NATO nations a message of the appreciation of the contribution of Dana Wilgress and those associated with him. I believe that if there had been a similar organization during the 1930's a second world war might have been averted. What NATO has done is to build a shield in Europe that could not have been foreseen two or three years ago.

The NATO nations possess 5,800 aircraft, of which 2,400 are jet fighters. In addition, they have a thousand more based in Great Britain. Throughout Europe they have built up airports capable of accommodating 350 jets. They have forces which, while they will not stop the enemy if it moves, will nonetheless act as a deterrent. There are 500,000 on the German front compared with 400,000 in the armies immediately opposite them. Across Europe from West Germany to Turkey NATO today has 3,100,000 men under arms compared with 4 million in the Soviet.

NATO is doing something more. It is organizing the economic strength of these nations. NATO nations have 68 per cent of the oil in Europe, 76 per cent of the shipping, 66 per cent of the steel, 59 per cent of the coal and 62 per cent of the electric power. This has been achieved because there has been unity. I fear that the unity that built this great alliance for defence and survival is in danger of being broken by the disagreements that are taking place at Geneva and elsewhere. Divisions among the free nations help the communists. I believe that above everything else we of the freedom-loving parliaments must take a firm stand against unnecessary divisions, disagreements or cleavages among the free nations. We must realize that only in unity is there survival.

What can NATO do in Canada? One of its programs is called infrastructure. I do not know who invented that strangely sounding word. Under infrastructure NATO builds airfields, communication lines, oil pipe lines and so on. Accepting the general thesis, now accepted by the minister and rather disavowed five years ago, that the major element in our defence is air power, I believe that the nations of NATO and in particular the United States, in view of the fact she is our closest neighbour and realizes our vast mineral resources that are so necessary for the survival of NATO, should give consideration to assistance in building strategic roads within this country that are necessary to defence. Such roads, besides being of great defence value, would be useful at the present time in order to provide a means of ingress and egress of our northern areas.

The opposition of the minister has been expressed on a number of occasions, but he has changed his mind on the question of the need for the intensification of air development. His attitude in the past has been opposed to doing anything in this regard. Having regard to the position in the western provinces, the oil, uranium and other minerals there, I believe our present roadway situation is such that in the event of war many of these strategic needs would be denied to our forces. I believe that there should be not only defence highways into the north, useful in time of war and in particular to provide a means of securing these necessary muniments of war such as uranium and oil, but additional to the trans-Canada highway a defence highway in the north is necessary through the Yellowhead pass. This suggestion is supported by the people of northern Saskatchewan and Alberta, and also by those living in the southernmost parts of these two provinces. The Edmonton Journal of April 29 set forth the situation regarding the Yellowhead highway in these words:

> This much at least must be said for defence minister Brooke Claxton's attitude to the Yellowhead highway project, as displayed on his visit here this week; he does not beat about the bush. Questioned about the possibility of building the road as a defence measure, he stated that it would serve no useful military purpose. An attack on Canada in a future war, he predicted, would be by air, and highways would not be involved in the defence.

If one goes back to 1946 and 1947 and reads some of the speeches made by the ministers of this government at that time, one finds that the possibility of attack by air, now accepted as a possibility, was ridiculed and the need for the establishment of radar stations in northern Canada to effectively meet that danger potentiality was frowned upon.

Then, the editorial says this:

> This will strike most westerners as a rash and hasty judgment. Under modern conditions, an enemy may well choose to attack Canada, and especially its northwestern regions, by air. But the repulse of such an attack may depend in large measure on speedy and reliable ground transportation, for instance in the case of bad flying weather. Moreover it would seem sound defence policy not to have all our eggs in airborne baskets.

Then, again, the Calgary Albertan dealt with the situation in an editorial of May 6 in these words:

> When defence minister Claxton was in Edmonton a few days ago, he said that a first-class highway through the Yellowhead pass, affording direct connection between Vancouver and Edmonton, would serve no useful military purpose. He said that if Canada was attacked it would be by air, and "highways would not be involved in the defence."
> The Edmonton Journal, tireless advocate of the Yellowhead route, took Mr. Claxton to task for that statement, and with justification.

The Calgary newspaper gives its support to this highway and to northern highways in general as part of our defence project. Speaking as a member from the province of Saskatchewan I say that today our situation is such, with the location of uranium and the potentialities of Beaverlodge in northern Saskatchewan, that all that vast area might well be lost to our defence effort unless something in the nature of a defence highway is provided. Indeed, a military man and scientist, Dr. Mawdsley of the University of Saskatchewan, has said that our uranium development might well be lost by the invasion of a few paratroopers. I ask the minister to reconsider his oft-repeated statement that these highways are unnecessary and to secure full information in this connection, from those who have some knowledge of conditions in northern Canada. I believe that from them he will secure a picture as to the need for these highways, which apparently were needed during the war or otherwise the Alaska highway would not have been rushed to completion as it was.

Then I come to one other matter in connection with NATO. One cannot separate the defence sections in NATO from those dealing with economic development. I am one of those who fear that you cannot hold an organization like NATO together by the simple expedient of continuing fear. In order to mobilize the peoples in the free nations there must be something in the nature of economic advantages to the peoples of those various nations. This was envisaged in article 2, which is the essence of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Article 2 says:

They—

That is the nations comprising NATO.

—will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies, and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

That section to date is a dead letter, excepting in so far as co-operation is taking place in any of the nations in Europe under the organization for European economic co-operation. Again I suggest that material defences are necessary, but that to hold this organization together the only means whereby freedom can be preserved is to have due regard for the economic features of this treaty.

These are but a few matters that have occurred to me, that I felt I could bring to the attention of the committee on this occasion. We will not preserve our freedom, we will not preserve our security, simply by vast statistics of expenditures without there being for those expenditures the best possible use made of the money expended. There will not be a building up of unity within NATO unless there is economic co-operation as yet non-existent. There will not be available to NATO the vast resources of northern Canada unless and until the Department of National Defence realizes that highways north and south into those areas, which otherwise will not have such highways, are made available. In the event of war or attack through the north polar areas, or over the ice cap, we must be in a position to make available to our armed forces and to those of the other nations in NATO the vast resources of northern Canada.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take much of the time of the committee but I would like to refer briefly to what was said by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, and also just now by the hon. member for Prince Albert. In emphasizing the need for highways as a means of defence I would not have risen at this time had it not been for the fact that I think it is vitally important that great emphasis be placed upon defence highways in Canada. I believe those highways are absolutely necessary for the protection of our people, and as vitally needed as any other form of protection. I think of the Vancouver area and of the one bridge leading out of that city. I think of the many thousands of people who, as it were, would be cooped up without any way of getting out of the city because of a lack of highways and bridges.

It is time our government took a realistic view of what is needed by way of highways. It is time the government took another look, because in travelling across this country I have found that many people are becoming greatly concerned about the civil defence situation. Co-operation between the Department of National Defence and the civil defence authorities is an absolute must. Furthermore, certain civilian highways now in existence are inadequate.

Any expenditures made by the Department of National Defence in the building of highways would bring about something of a permanent nature which, in time to come, would be of real value to the people of Canada, and certainly would not, as occurs in so many cases, be lost to the civilian cause.

National highways for purposes of defence are fast becoming a national issue because the people are alarmed. It is only reasonable to expect that they would become alarmed—although perhaps the minister would not agree when I say they are. However I do travel around in various parts of the country and find that this subject is continually on their tongues and in their conversation. They point out that nothing is being done in the building of highways for purposes of defence.

Looking at the minister's speech as it is reported in Hansard, and particularly at the figures he placed on record, I note that more than $850 million has been spent for industrial equipment. Surely, looking at the over-all picture, in the light of that great expenditure for industrial equipment there must be some place in the plan of things whereby we can reach a balance and have some moneys allocated to the building of defence highways. I make this reference, Mr. Chairman, only for purposes of emphasis, and because I think it is very important.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, it is with a certain amount of timidity I rise to speak on a subject involving an expenditure of $1,902,823,500. Before coming to the House of Commons I thought that was a lot of money; but if I am to judge by the lack of concern of hon. members as indicated by the slim attendance in the house today perhaps the time will come when I will not consider this a large sum of money.

The fact is however that the amount I have indicated does constitute two-fifths of the budget for this country. I have been advised that if I inquire too closely as to how the money is spent I will be advised, in reply to certain questions, that it is not in the national interest to disclose the way those moneys are spent. It is for this reason I rise to point out to the committee that for any government of Canada, representing the percentage of population of the western democracies it does represent, as indicated by the vote of the electors, to suggest it has any secrets, the divulgence of which would have an adverse effect upon the forces of the western democracies is very close to ridiculous.

May I say with vigour that I am in wholehearted accord with every suggestion made in the house that a committee should be formed, or some other steps taken, to allow individual members to familiarize themselves with what is received in kind for the dollars and cents actually spent. We must not be content with merely a statement by a minister who expresses an opinion on information received, or something of that nature. As a member of the house I do not even know the source of the information on which his opinion is based.

With respect to this Gargantua in our midst, this defence spending, let me say I do not believe there is a taxpayer in Canada who is not prepared to spend his or her fair share for purposes of defence. I make that statement without qualification. But there is also an onus on the Department of National Defence to see that money is not spent needlessly, or that it is not taken unnecessarily from the taxpayers.

I suggest there are certain assets standing in the name of the Department of National Defence which are not serving the defensive system in our country. At one time they did serve the defence of the country and served it well. At the present time they do not. I refer to the fixed assets. One in particular to which I refer is the Long Branch rifle range. This property is situated in the township of Toronto, in the county of Peel. At one time perhaps it was used extensively as a rifle range and may have had some particular purpose. I am quite familiar with the area. It comprises several hundred acres of land and is a sort of luxury gift to be used by certain non-permanent units a very few days in the year. It could now be used by the taxpayers of the municipality of the township of Toronto to bring in large industrial assessments which in turn would lighten the tax load of the taxpayers. Representations have been made over the years to the Department of National Defence to release these lands, and as of the date of my making this speech no action has been taken by the Department of National Defence to release those lands. I suggest to the minister that in all fairness to the taxpayers of the area this is an example of the Department of National Defence holding an expensive asset for no particular purpose.

The argument has been advanced that it is really for a rifle range. When one compares the distance from Toronto of the area when it was first created in relation to the method of transportation then in existence I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that Camp Borden is as close to Toronto today to fill all the purposes for which this rifle range might be used, and that the land should be released.

As to other matters affecting the Department of National Defence, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the minister might well concern himself with his program of advertising pensions. The average person who enlists in the navy, army or air force is probably concerned with the fact that a pension is offered. The minister may say that pensions are not his particular responsibility. Since they deal with the people whom he is hiring I suggest to him that they are in his department, and when I refer to him the treatment which his people and the widows of his people are receiving, he will observe the unfairness of the situation where no pension is received when death or accident is not due to service, although actually the individual is in service. The pension that is given, or rather not given, is, I suggest to the minister, creating a very definite hardship.

I refer particularly to a very recent example of Flying Officer Joseph Goldthorpe, who enlisted in 1940 and served with distinction in the Royal Canadian Air Force for five years. After the war he endeavoured to re-enlist in the air force, but I understand he was advised that he would have to reduce his rank. He enlisted in the Royal Air Force and was offered a permanent commission. Through good fortune, the Royal Canadian Air Force was able to secure him. He came back and re-enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force. I say to the minister that this flying officer, with distinguished service, died one day at noon in the officers' mess. He was buried with full air force honours in North Bay, and his widow received the magnificent contribution in gratia of $100. I suggest to the minister that he might well consider the pension plan set forth in the advertisements and dispose of the pension suggestion in the advertisements because they are not all one might gather from reading them and people are being misled.

While we are dealing with advertisements I would refer the minister to an advertisement which appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail of Toronto, which I understand is fairly widely read in that area. It contains an advertisement of guardsmen marching, and the following:

> Applications now being accepted for the new Regiment of Canadian Guards.

I have great pride in the name "guard". I had the honour of serving in a guards regiment during the war myself. I suggest to the minister that the advertisement is misleading in that it is an advertisement of guards and in the small print says:

> Canadian guards qualifications may be obtained from any recruiting officer.

I suggest to the minister that perhaps he has not complete knowledge of the advertisement. It is to get people into the recruiting office under false pretences. They publish a nice advertisement and then they refer to the special qualifications of the guards in the righthand corner. I would ask the minister to deal with it later on in his remarks and tell us whether it is the intention of the Department of National Defence to discontinue the great tradition which put the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery on the right of the line and then the armoured corps next, and so on down the units; or is the suggestion in this advertisement that the guards will be second to none on the parade ground misleading, because as I understand the expression "second to none on the parade ground" means that you are on the right of the line. Is it the suggestion of the Department of National Defence that this Regiment of Canadian Guards shall be on the right of the line, or shall the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery and the armoured corps continue to occupy this position? It is a fair question to ask because it is causing quite a bit of concern to many people who are affiliated with those regiments.

In connection with the billeting of married men in married quarters in places such as ordnance depots and the like, I am advised that pressure is being brought to bear by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with respect to financing builders of rental units that they must allocate certain units to service personnel, or that before they will finance certain individual houses they require the builders to build certain apartment houses. In certain municipalities this will cause great hardship. I would ask the minister to advise us whether any steps are being taken to give special grants to those municipalities who have to provide services and the like to those additional apartment houses and dwellings right within the municipalities.

> In the United States last year, one-third of the entire strength of the United States armed forces were separated from the forces last year. In Canada the equivalent figure was about one-seventh. We want to maintain our rates of re-engagement; we want to increase it if we can, but to say that it is a grave problem is a gross exaggeration.

In fairness the minister should have continued to say that the bulk of the service personnel in the United States armed forces are draftees, and that the one-third who are leaving the army are merely leaving it at the expiration of the draft period. I would ask the minister if a better comparison would not be to give the numbers leaving the United States army who are volunteers, as compared with the figure in the Canadian army, which is a completely volunteer army. I think that would be a more realistic comparison than to say one-third in the United States and one-seventh in Canada. I would suggest to the minister further that perhaps the fact that only one-seventh are leaving the service in Canada indicates the general economic condition within the country. They are in the army and they do not wish to leave to take a chance on an uncertain employment field in industry at the present time.

I should now like to deal briefly with the problem of civil defence. It is a problem that the minister mentioned. At the outset I would say that the minister should either tell us that there is a threat or there is not, because civil defence in this country seems to be something patterned on the "after you, Alphonse" system. People are trying to throw the responsibility on others. I think that initiative and leadership must be shown. The Department of National Defence means exactly what it says, and I suggest to the minister that civil defence is a matter worthy of his very serious consideration. As he said himself yesterday, it does little to train troops for overseas if civil defence is not properly taken care of.

In that regard I would suggest to the minister that he should make a very careful reconsideration of what I suspect is his attitude toward the reserve army in Canada. During the last war—and before that, of course, though I will confine my remarks to the present time—the reserve army units were very highly commended. In fact they actually produced a general, and I refer to the general commanding the fifth division in which I served. He was from the reserve army. The reserve army units responded tremendously upon the outbreak of the Korean war. They were given certain allocations and they filled every one of them.

I would suggest to the minister that he attend some evening parades of the reserve army and he will find that with very few exceptions—and I say with pride that one of these exceptions is the Lorne Scots regiment which is the regiment from my own county—the officers on parade outnumber the N.C.O.'s and enlisted men. If the minister wishes to accept that suggestion then perhaps it would be better if he gave no notice of his intention but just dropped in to say "Hello".

I would suggest to the minister that the background for civil defence in Canada is the reserve army. They will be required for military duties, policing, and other duties following air raids and they will be the only force immediately available for such tasks. In view of that I would suggest that the minister should take that fact into consideration in his estimates, and make an honest effort to rejuvenate the reserve army.

Many hon. members have referred to the large amounts of money involved in national defence and in this connection I would like the minister to tell me if my understanding of what he said yesterday is correct. I refer him to his remarks as reported at page 4909 of Hansard where he said:

> In the three-year period we have not done everything we set out to do. No country has or could do that, but we have done substantially what we set out to do, and one of the extraordinary things is that the amount expended is so close to the amount originally planned. The amount originally planned was, as announced on February 5, 1951, $5 billion. The expression was, "about a $5 billion program" and the actual cash disbursements over the three-year period has been $5,005,479,000. But we have not got all that we planned for that expenditure. We have not all the ships, the construction, and the other types of equipment for which we planned, but we have done much more than four-fifths of what was planned three years ago for the estimated figure.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw particular attention to the minister's statement:

> But we have not got all that we planned for that expenditure.

In the final sentence I quoted originally the minister did not say nine-tenths or seventeen-twentieths. He said "more than four-fifths" so I take it that that is the closest figure. The minister's estimate for the entire program was $5 billion but I would suggest in the light of these figures that the minister has made a billion dollar error at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer. He has received only four-fifths of the estimated goods for the full $5 billion disbursement, a loss of $1 billion.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the thing that must impress itself most on the mind of any hon. member who has been in this house, and certainly on anyone who has come into the galleries this afternoon, is the spirit of utter unreality in which the material survival of Canada is being discussed. At 3.40 this afternoon, at a time when we were discussing the expenditure of $2 billion in a single year and, far more important than that, the means by which we can defend our freedom, there were 11 Liberal members in the house and not a single cabinet minister.

Mr. Nicholson: There are not many Conservatives here now.

An hon. Member: How many were there on your side of the house?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there have not been many on either side of the house and the reason is because of the soporific speech by the minister which left the impression that we are in a satisfactory state in the defence of this country after having spent more than $5 billion. We must measure that in terms of what we have in reality.

We have been told of the fighter squadrons in Europe. Those squadrons are well equipped, well trained and unquestionably equal to any that are ready for service in that area. We know of the standard of excellence of the members of the armed forces, the infantry, artillery and other branches of the service which have been in Korea and which are there now. We know of the high level of training in the permanent units.

Nevertheless, that is the only final product of the whole defence plan of Canada. It might well be that if we were drifting along in a period of easy assurance and there was no danger of war we could look with some measure of satisfaction, with some measure of complacency at the actual situation in which the reserve forces of this country now find themselves. Every hon. member in this house who has followed the debates, and most certainly every hon. member who has served in one of the armed forces, knows that the reserve units are the backbone of Canadian defence. No one will question that, least of all the Minister of National Defence. Therefore, as we examine our position, as we come close to four years since the outbreak of a very real and very deadly war in Korea, let us see with just what measure of reality we have brought our reserve units up to a position in which they could occupy the field if that dreadful necessity arose.

Either in a direct capacity or some other capacity I have been associated with the reserve forces of Canada since 1910. That is a long time. I say without any hesitation that in spite of the improvement of equipment and things of that kind the reserve units of this country are less able to go into the field today in the event of an emergency than they have been at any time within that 40 years.

Just a moment ago the hon. member for Peel in his speech, and an excellent speech it was, placed before the house the dreadful warning that is to be found in the unchallengeable fact that in many parts of this country, where units with long historic pasts gather to train, there are more officers on parade than other ranks. That illustrates a condition which is behind the statement I have just made with regard to the readiness of reserve units to be mobilized and to be employed.

Let us go back to the days of the first world war. For some that is almost getting back to the Crimea. Nevertheless for some of us those days are still very fresh and real. Just prior to that war the reserve units went into camp at close to full strength, whether they were infantry, artillery, cavalry or other branches of the service. That year I saw infantry units that were well up to the full authorized establishment for camp. That year I saw artillery units some of whose men had to be paid from the pockets of the officers because they had more than were authorized. That is something that happened on other occasions.

Those units were horse units; they were artillery units. They moved their own guns and they moved complete complements of guns. They took them to camp and they carried out their manoeuvres in camp. Infantry units carried out training of a nature that is only possible where you have a complete unit in form. So it was with the cavalry and with other branches of the service at that time. War broke upon the world with a suddenness far more unexpected than in 1939 when, on August 4, 1914 we were confronted with something utterly unexpected at that time by people who had basked in the sunshine of peace for so long. Nevertheless, although that situation arose unexpectedly, less than eight weeks after the sudden outbreak of war the first Canadian division sailed for Britain ready to take their part. I grant you that there were long months of training before they went into the field, but it was not so many months later that those men, who had left Canada less than two months after that sudden outbreak of war, were taking their place against the most highly trained troops the world had known up to that time.

Another war came. There was not the comparative readiness then, although the equipment had advanced so much. Not by any manner of means were the units as ready as they were in 1914, in comparison to their needs. Nevertheless most batteries of artillery, infantry units, cavalry units and other units of the reserve forces had equipment that could be used for training immediately.

Now let us see where we are at after having spent some $5½ billion. Let us see where we are at almost four years after the outbreak of another real war, namely that in Korea. Let us see exactly with what reality the reserve forces have been prepared to be the backbone of our defence. Mr. Chairman, the situation is rather similar in many cases; but let me deal with one branch of the service. What is substantially true there is substantially true in a great many other cases.

Last year at Petawawa—the great artillery camp not so far from here—one of the groups of artillery, that had one of the best firing records last year, consisted of two medium regiments of artillery and five field regiments. That group, which was rated fairly highly, was probably at best at about one-quarter of the strength that was actually authorized. When it comes to the firing that was done—and that was after more than three years had elapsed since the outbreak of war in Korea—may I say that the five field regiments of that particular group that were in camp at the same time at Petawawa last year fired 24 guns instead of the 120 guns authorized for the number of batteries that would be included in that group. This year at best, those five regiments amongst the better regiments in this country at the present time will perhaps fire 28 guns instead of the 120 guns which would be the number of guns fired by five regiments according to their ordinary strength. Last year the total number of guns fired by five regiments was exactly the number of guns alloted to a single regiment up to strength.

Then when it comes to these units going to camp this year, only one of those regiments will have two batteries, although regimental strength is three. The rest will have only one battery and in most cases only a single troop of guns. That, Mr. Chairman, is the state of readiness of one of the better groups of artillery of the reserve force at this time.

Last night, in one of the most accurate and comprehensive descriptions I have heard of the position of the armoured forces, and given to this committee by a gallant officer of the armoured corps, we were told of the ineffectiveness of the armoured training at this time. We know that the same thing is true with regard to the most historic infantry units. This is the situation in which we now find ourselves after the expenditure of this enormous sum of money. We are therefore confronted with the fact that it is not dollars that count, Mr. Chairman, it is what we have obtained for them. The time has now come for everyone to ask, in more detail than has been given, what has happened to that money and why it is that we have not obtained better results for what we have spent.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the subject that we have been discussing is one that transcends all others in importance both as far as the money and the result of the expenditure of that money are concerned. In a large measure members of this house must be called upon to bear responsibility for what is or is not accomplished as the result of that expenditure. In some substantial measure we are in the same position as a board of directors representing shareholders who are the people of Canada. As a board of directors it is our duty to consider the way in which management has been doing its job. In this case management is the government itself, and I think that parallel can be extended to the point that we should ask ourselves how likely it would be that any board of directors of any large company would accept the responsibility of making decisions if they were given the kind of information that the government in this case gives us.

Of course we are dealing with something far more important, far larger in its significance and more far-reaching in its ultimate consequences than any board of directors can ever be called upon to deal with. I mention that particularly because the management in this case have sought the advice of certain experts regarding the organization and effectiveness of the reserve forces. Three very competent officers of long experience were called upon to examine the situation and to make their recommendations. It would be extremely helpful if we, who represent the responsibility of a board of directors, had before us the findings of that group of experts. Possibly there might be some explanations found in that report for some of the things that are otherwise unexplainable. Possibly we might have information as to recommendations that have been made which would in themselves deal in a large measure with the subjects that we are discussing here in the house.

We do not know. We have not seen the report. I submit, Mr. Chairman, there can be no reason of any kind for that report not being before the house. In the past other reports of a similar nature were available; other reports of a similar nature were made public. All those who have followed the development of the reserve or militia training, as it was called in earlier days, will remember the famous Otter report. That was made public. It was discussed publicly and it was acted upon with full knowledge of the recommendations that were made.

The next substantial reorganization of our reserve or militia forces that took place occurred some years before the last war. That was the result of discussions which took place openly in the early 1930's. Decisions were reached by officers of the non-permanent forces. The recommendations which they made were substantially accepted. A plan of reorganization was approved by the council of defence associations at a time when the relationship of the non-permanent forces to the general staff and to the Department of National Defence was somewhat different from what it is today. At that time the reorganization that was carried out, and which made it possible to mobilize with reasonable effectiveness in 1939, was very largely the result of the recommendations of the non-permanent officers whose experience was employed for that purpose.

Now a new examination of this subject has been made. There is not one word in that report that should be kept from the house. There is not a word of that report that relates to anything that would give aid and comfort to any enemy. It would give much aid and comfort to the people of Canada if they knew what these highly competent officers had recommended, and it would assist the board of directors representing the shareholders if we had that recommendation before us so that our discussion could be directed to the same kind of information that is in the possession of the minister and his officials as well as the general staff.

It is largely because of the withholding of reports and information of this kind and the withholding of basic facts which are essential to the satisfactory discussion of this subject that we find ourselves today in this atmosphere of unreality. When I spoke this afternoon of the small numbers on both sides of the house attending the debate I was not forgetful of the fact that important committees are sitting and that many hon. members were attending committee meetings. The very fact that I am called upon to mention that emphasizes one of the reasons why the discussion of these important subjects in the house is so unsatisfactory. Important committees are delayed until the very last minute. We only started a few days ago to deal with veterans affairs although we have been sitting since last November. Even now there is still extremely important legislation to come forward. Members are called upon to attend these committee meetings and generally the whole atmosphere is such that for those members who are concerned about this subject there is great difficulty in finding the time to attend the discussions which should take place and which should be listened to here in the house.

It was not because of any lack of interest, Mr. Chairman, or positive suggestion in the speeches that were made that there was any atmosphere of unreality. The member for Esquimalt-Saanich yesterday made one of the best speeches on national defence that has been made in this house, since I came here, at any rate. The hon. member who made that speech is the best qualified officer in Canada to make a speech of that kind. He is a man who has been through every rank in the army from private to major general, from carrying a rifle in the rear ranks to the command of a division, and after that to the Pacific coast command during the last war.

Mr. MacDougall: Speak up so the general can hear you.

Mr. Drew: The comment that is made, of course, would display something of which the hon. member who interrupted would not be aware, that is that he may have some modesty. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has had an experience which qualifies him to make a statement in this house about national defence in a way that is not equalled by any member on either side of the house. When he speaks of training for battle, and the needs of battle, he speaks as an officer with unequalled experience in battle. Other officers have made similar contributions, officers who are now members of this house.

Nor have these speeches been confined to those in the officer rank, by any manner of means. We have heard speeches from those who served in other ranks, and in doing so gained that type of experience that is of great value here. We have had several speeches of the utmost value. Anyone who reads Hansard will find the value of those recommendations and yet, under those circumstances, we find that there is little exchange of ideas. In this grim and ominous period, when new weapons of destruction are arising everywhere, the vital importance of the subject we are discussing apparently is such that ministers of the crown who are not otherwise engaged find it unimportant to hear suggestions as to how we could best use the immense sums we are spending for this purpose.

One of the problems facing the reserve forces, which are the backbone of our defence, is the problem of recruitment. Every hon. member in this house has a right to know what the three officers who made that inquiry have to say about the problem of recruitment. Surely, there can be no secrecy about that. Surely, there can be no reason to withhold from the representatives of the people the report that has been made, and the information that is available.

If anyone on the other side of the house, whether it be the Minister of National Defence, any other minister or any member supporting the government, has any critical comment to make on the generality of any remarks, then let them go to the root of the problem and that is the fact that the information we should have is being withheld from us. This report should have been before us before this debate started. The debate is not going to finish this evening. I urge the minister to say tonight that he will make available to us before we resume on Monday the report made by the three very distinguished officers who inquired into this whole problem. We would then meet on Monday with knowledge of the recommendations that are before the government. We would know to what extent they are fulfilling the recommendations, and to what extent they are not. We have a right to know whether they are, and not just to have a general statement that the report is being acted upon.

One of the subjects related to recruitment that has been discussed over and over again, and with which I would imagine the report deals in some way, is the question of advertising. Millions of dollars are spent on advertising. Much of it approaches this whole problem from the wrong direction. Young men are asked to join the navy so that they can have a pleasant trip and see the world. Young men are asked to join the army for security and to learn a job.

Young men are asked to join the air force because of the qualifications it will give and the interest in the training. At this time in the world's history, Mr. Chairman, the challenge should be to the spirit of service, and to the fact that the highest service can be given to this country in the temporal field in time of danger such as this is in one of the armed services. It is in that spirit that we will receive the kind of recruits and the number of recruits, who will have the spirit, in the reserve forces that is so greatly needed at this time.

Those who are there have shown a very good spirit and have trained well, but the numbers are far short of the requirements and the numbers on parade are fantastically short of the paper figures presented to us by the Minister of National Defence. There is not a single officer of the reserve in this House of Commons tonight who does not know that the attendance on parade of any reserve unit, whether it be naval, land or air, is far short of the paper strength of the unit. The Minister of National Defence has heard recommendations over and over again with regard to this question of advertising. The units meeting in their annual gatherings have urged that instead of blanket national advertising funds should be provided for local advertising which will appeal to those who have a local interest in those units.

Those who have been working on this subject for years greatly question the real value of much of the general advertising, as compared with the value that would be attached to local advertising which would appeal to the interest and the local loyalty of any unit with an established local tradition. Since the report is not before us we have no knowledge of what the full statement is in that respect, no matter what summary of it may be presented. Here is an example of the kind of practical approach to which reference was made by the hon. member for Peel in his maiden speech in the house this afternoon. I suggest that this is merely one example of the kind of practical detail which should be recognized in dealing with this subject.

Mr. Chairman, this party which after all has had its share of responsibilities over the years in this same field, and bore those responsibilities, is anxious to support and anxious to encourage in every way it can the training, recruitment and efficiency of our reserve forces, as well as the permanent forces, which are in many cases the ultimate service growing from that reserve service. We have given evidence on many occasions of our desire to co-operate in the field of national defence as well as in the sister problem of external affairs. Those two departments march hand in hand. We will come closer to what has, for the want of a better term, been described as a bipartisan policy to the extent that we are taken into the confidence of the minister and taken into the confidence of the government.

Co-operation, support and encouragement can only be based upon knowledge of the things that are guiding the government in its decisions. The government will at no time find us wanting either in assistance or support of these vitally important questions if we are fully informed, and are convinced that the information before the government, and the recommendations, are really being acted upon. Let the minister take us into his confidence. Let him tell us why it is that almost four years after the outbreak of a new war in Korea and after the expenditure of almost five billions of dollars—a fantastic and colossal figure—we still find our reserve units wholly incapable of being mobilized for service, if that dreadful necessity arose.

And in mentioning the possibility of that necessity let no one suggest that I am anticipating the possibility of another general war. The possibility of another general war will be remote to the very extent that we in Canada as well as people in the United States, in Great Britain, in France and the other free nations really face this problem in its realities, and insist that the dollars, pounds, francs, and lira, or any other money spent, really produce results in national defence.

We cannot measure our defence in terms of dollars spent. We cannot measure our defence except in terms of actual defence available immediately on call. In 1914, sudden though the outbreak of war was at that time, there was a substantial time lag. Armies moved slowly in those days. Then, in 1939, we were in a new period of warfare when the great armoured forces of Guderian slashed down through France to Sedan.

Today we are in a new stage of warfare where vast armoured forces and aircraft have given way to guided missiles, to fast jet bombers, and to fantastic devices of destruction. And that speed of destruction will also have increased to such an extent that there may be no third chance. Twice we have come within an ace of the loss of our freedom. In 1914 we were very close to defeat. In 1940 and 1941 freedom was very close to being snuffed out again. There may be no third chance unless we learn the lessons of the past, and unless those who have been chosen by the people to represent them demand all the information they have a right to have in reaching decisions upon this vitally important subject.

I speak of this with all the earnestness of one of that earlier generation who has seen the consequences in two world wars of waiting until war came to meet the test that was to be imposed. Whatever any of us may have thought about the course of events at that time, let no one ignore the evidence that emerged after—that war might well have been avoided if the free nations had been prepared. That was in evidence at Nuremberg. That was the evidence such as was available after the first world war.

With those lessons we who sit in this House of Commons, the house of the people, who speak for the people, who act for the people and have the responsibilities of the people, should insist that we have all essential information before us which would guide us in our decisions, just as we will assume that information would guide the decisions of the government.

Now we have come to a stage in this session when we meet with the suggestion that any suggestion of a reference to a committee of any of these problems might well be regarded as an impractical one. It is not so many days ago when it was argued from the other side of the house that it was not now practical to conduct an inquiry of that kind. I will remind hon. members of this house however that great results did follow the tabling of the Currie report last year. Do not let any hon. member of this House of Commons forget that report, or forget the very substantial improvement that followed the recommendations that were made in respect of one very small segment of one part of one branch of the service.

We face these greater dangers now as represented in terms of the hydrogen bomb as well as the atom bomb. And as we realize that efficiency in the spending of our money may well be the test of survival, and the ability of our armed forces to prevent aggression may well depend upon the quality of our defences, then I do repeat the request made on an earlier occasion, that the government follow the same course that it followed in the case of the Currie inquiry and appoint a similar group of experts to conduct an inquiry into every branch of the armed forces of Canada.

The report I have been speaking about made by three officers—three highly respected and highly experienced officers—related only to the problem of the reserves. With the example of what happened in that one case, let us have an inquiry into the whole field of national defence. Then let us all meet and discuss the findings of that report and see what can be done to increase the effectiveness of our defence organization. Short of that, no matter how much we may respect the earnestness of the minister in relation to his responsibilities, we have to take his statements at their face value. His statements at their face value give us very little real information, give us very little of practical value in relation to the problem we are called upon to judge at this time. Let us remember that it is the private members on both sides of the house whose responsibility is represented in the request for some $2 billion for national defence in the current fiscal year.

Let the minister tell us what has gone wrong instead of telling us that everything is the best in the world, or imitating the very famous literary expression, that all is for the best in the best of all possible worlds. Let him tell us why there has been this inability to get the reserve forces up to a level where they could be mobilized in the event of hostilities. Let him tell us why it is that the equipment is not adequate. Let him answer the question that has been raised in regard to the armoured forces, in regard to the infantry, in regard to the other units which are short of equipment at this time. We will be ready to listen to that; we are not ready to be told that all is well when we know all is not well.

No matter what might have been possible two weeks ago, Mr. Chairman, the loss of Dien Bien Phu ushered in a new period of military appreciation. Whatever may have been valid before that is not valid today unless it is examined in the light of that experience. Brave, well equipped, well trained units were overrun in a fortress that had been prepared with great care. I have no doubt every hon. member heard the description of the bombardment which preceded the final overrunning of that fortress. Those who were there in that earlier experience said that there had not been any barrage like it since the drumfire of Verdun.

That is the kind of thing that has emerged in this distant jungle and in these plains in distant points throughout the world, where Russian guns in the hands of Chinese troops moved from Korea after the armistice now mass their strength against the scattered outposts of the western world. That is the reality we face, and we must face it in terms of cold reality. We must reassess our position. We must examine the kind of forces that are needed to meet that kind of situation. Do we believe for one moment that we are going to meet manpower with manpower on the plains of Europe, if the necessity should come to meet the teeming millions of Russia? I do not think that anyone does. We know perfectly well that under no circumstances can the western world mass forces in the distant jungles and plains of Asia on equal terms.

These call for a new assessment; these call for a new type of organization; certainly, at least they call for the examination of that possibility. Those who remember what happened in Burma during the last war will recall the successful unconventional forces that were organized to fight a different type of enemy through the jungle with great success. Is that the kind of force we need? Instead of heavily equipped paratroops, do we perhaps need some new type of very informal mobile force? We do not know unless the discussion is opened up, with all the information available to us that is available to the government. Certainly the only thing that will give comfort to the enemy is our failure to examine these things in terms of stern reality.

We have another problem before us in Canada. We are the third largest country in the world with fifteen million people. What kind of armed force do we need that will be most effective both in this large area and for overseas service? We have a navy, a well trained navy; we have highly trained and well equipped air units in the permanent units of the R.C.A.F.; we have excellent infantry units in the permanent branch of the service. I repeat, our reserve units are keen and anxious to do their job, but are severely limited both by numbers, by equipment and by the opportunities for training under those circumstances. What do we need? I merely put this forward as a suggestion, but it is one of the things that would be put forward if we were really able to have the recommendation before us that have been made and other recommendations as well.

Is it not possible that we should concentrate entirely on air units of different kinds, except for fairly limited naval and other units? Is it not possible that we should have all our artillery, all our armoured forces, all our reconnaissance forces, all the engineers and all the other forces—we are not including the medical forces—airborne ready to be moved by air transport to any distant point? Certainly that would be the thing that would be most effective to meet a possible threat to this country, and it certainly would be the thing that would be most effective to make our strength felt at distant points throughout the world. I do not put this forward as any dogmatic suggestion; I merely say it is one of the kind of things that should be considered as an alternative to the continuous training of units that are essential segments of the old type of continental force.

We are still training with the same mentality we had when we believed that our units were going to be parts of divisions and army formations in Europe or in some other great mainland, but particularly Europe. Let us with all the ingenuity we have—and we are an ingenious people—devise the kind of force that will be best for Canada and at the same time serve our purpose within the framework of NATO and of the other organizations. Probably there are hon. members who have read the most interesting and illuminating book of all time—I hope they have all read it—under the title "The Reason Why" based upon that classic poem:

> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die.

Well, anybody who is prepared to accept the proposition that it is not for hon. members to reason why, but just to accept the statement of the government, and particularly the Department of National Defence, should read "The Reason Why" and find the reason why we should accept nothing but full information in regard to every aspect of defence here in this country.

The minister spoke of civil defence. It is appropriate that he should speak about civil defence because that is the department under which it should be. Since he spoke on that let us see what he says, as reported at page 4906 of Hansard:

> There has been some tendency by some people here and elsewhere to take the view that the destructive power of the H-bomb makes civil defence measures futile. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Then, a few sentences later he said:

> Our plans must continue to receive the closest examination in the light of all the circumstances, but the planning and oganization of civil defence measures must be pressed forward.

I refer to that because I make this recommendation to the Prime Minister tonight, as I have this opportunity to do in the committee. Civil defence can no longer be regarded as something remote from national defence generally. We had a statement about three weeks ago by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that this subject is now too serious to permit any argument as to whether this is a problem for the national government, the provincial governments or the municipalities. Certainly it is. The H-bomb, which may embrace in its destructive power several communities, has rendered meaningless this division of responsibility, and what the Minister of National Health and Welfare said should leave no doubt that the government should now transfer this subject to the Department of National Defence and bring the whole matter of civil defence under the government here in Ottawa.

The municipalities simply cannot accept the financial responsibility of preparing themselves for this effort. I agree completely, and agree with the utmost earnestness, with what the minister said that under no circumstances should we accept the proposition that these frightful weapons have now rendered civil defence measures futile.

Who knows where the outlying limits of the destructive area of a new bomb of that kind would be? It might only partly encroach upon any municipality, but the municipality which did not prepare for destruction of that kind would simply find people uncared for and no plans made for their removal, for their care, and for their medical treatment. The greater the area of destruction the greater the need for civil defence and the greater the need for a unified command, and for a centralized authority over something that is of national concern.

Arguing as I so frequently do the importance of the decentralization of authority in regard to local affairs, I believe implicitly that national defence is a strictly national affair and civil defence, as part of national defence, should be under the government here at Ottawa and financed by the dominion treasury.

The need for a recognition of what has been said by the Minister of National Defence is all too apparent, Mr. Chairman, and I hope that the government will take heed of what he has said and what has been said by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This is a subject which cannot be left where it is. One day we were told there was an agreement on a broad scale with the provinces and next day we had a statement from the minister responsible in Ontario to the effect that there was no agreement at all.

I hope no one will say they are not particularly interested in civil defence in Ontario. After all, Ontario has close to a third of the population of Canada and it does so happen that the number of other provinces, which bring up the total to a majority of the population of Canada, have not entered into any agreement. Surely this cannot be a satisfactory situation in the face of this threat. Surely there can be no better way of meeting whatever was said by the Minister of National Defence, or the emphasis placed upon this subject by the Minister of Health and Welfare, than to change the pattern and bring this within the authority of this department, and to integrate these activities with other activities and other branches of the service where undoubtedly there could be a greater economy in the use of their forces, and undoubtedly the medical services of the army, navy and air force could be embraced in new plans for civil defence.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there is the question of the whole approach to the items that are going to come before us. Any hon. member who looks at the large figures embracing the entire military service will realize how impossible it is to go into these details.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been critical, and critical particularly of the complacent suggestion that has been made that all is well. All is not well; all is far from well. Ask any member of the conference of defence associations which met here in Ottawa during the past winter if all is well. They will tell you what the finding of that conference was. Ask any member who has attended the annual meetings of the artillery association, infantry association, the engineers' association, the signals association, or any other military association if all is well, and they will tell you it is not. They have been making vigorous and repeated recommendations.

Having said that, I say without any hesitation that the minister will find us anxious to co-operate and anxious to offer any encouragement we can. But after all why should that encouragement not be given, because most of these hon. members who have already spoken on this subject are men who have themselves had reason to know the importance of adequate equipment and adequate training on the field of battle.

The test of that co-operation, the test of our ability to unite behind a vigorous national effort which embraces an all-understood foreign policy and an all-understood defence policy would depend entirely upon the extent to which we are taken into the confidence of the government. Let the government appoint a committee of inquiry similar to the Currie committee to make an all-embracing report in regard to the army organization and to see how our dollars can best be used. Such a committee need not decide policy. But in so far as policy is concerned let us have the report of the three officers who inquired into the situation affecting the reserve forces; let us have any other recommendations in the possession of the government; and then this government will find us ready to go out along the highroads and byroads to any part of this country and be just as vigorous as any government would want anyone to be in the build-up of the defence of Canada with full knowledge of what the facts actually are.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition began his very interesting remarks with a kind of roll call covering the people in the house. I followed that with interest but I found that at about 5.50 there were 10 Conservatives and 34 Liberal members, and since the Leader of the Opposition was speaking at that time one might have thought there would be a proportionately larger attendance of Conservative members. The Leader of the Opposition referred to the apathy in the house, but I think hon. members know that the discussion on the estimates is very largely a matter during which the opposition has a field day. That is traditional in England, it is traditional here, and the opposition here have usually used it as they did today. During the two-day debate which has taken place so far they have had about nine and a half hours.

Mr. Ferguson: The rubber stamps would not be interested.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ferguson: They are all rubber stamps and you know it. You cannot open your mouth.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, it is very interesting to see the hon. member—

Mr. Ferguson: They are rubber stamps.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, there is a rule in this house that one should address you. However, I must say it is very nice indeed to see the hon. member for Simcoe South here.

Mr. Ferguson: North.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, North. At one time during the course of the debate this afternoon, I think it was about 4.25, the time referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, I think there was just one single member of the opposition present, namely the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Drew: The minister must have got that information from someone else because he was seldom here.

Mr. Claxton: No. The Leader of the Opposition said that I was seldom here. I was out of the chamber on three occasions for less than two minutes on each occasion in order to secure information so that I might make a reply which I am about to make. I had hoped that I might have made it before now.

Mr. Fulton: 4.25 was before the Leader of the Opposition started to speak.

Mr. Knowles: Big salvos from both sides.

Mr. Claxton: I do not think that a debate on national defence involving $2 billion and the future security of the country is particularly dignified by this kind of reference. But since it was made, I must say that it was quite interesting to see that when the Leader of the Opposition started to speak tonight three Conservatives were present—

Mr. Drew: I assume that what is now being said is very dignified.

An hon. Member: It is just as dignified as what the hon. member said.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman cannot count.

Mr. Claxton: Let us forget about it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the time has come when I should perhaps remind the committee that at the moment the Minister of National Defence has the floor. We have endeavoured to see that those who were speaking previously in this debate were not interrupted without their consent. We shall expect the same treatment for the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Fulton: Let him be accurate, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Claxton: I would not have referred to these rather minor things had they not been referred to by somebody else.

At the beginning of his speech the Leader of the Opposition referred, in terms which were eloquent and fair, to the work of the permanent forces. I have not a full note of what he said because time has not permitted me to get Hansard, but he said that our fighters in Europe were unquestionably equal to any, and that the state of the infantry was excellent. He referred to the high level of training of the permanent force. Then he made a most curious remark when he said "That only is the final product". What kind of product do you want except something that is unquestionably equal to any, is excellent, and has a high level of training? That being the objective of our defence effort, to have it recognized by the Leader of the Opposition—as it must be recognized because it is true—I must say will give great satisfaction to the officers and men who have done the job.

Then the Leader of the Opposition went on and dealt with the actual situation of the reserve forces and made a number of remarks that I shall not examine in detail at this time. But at the end he asked this question: Why is the reserve not up to strength? It has never been planned in the history of Canada that the reserve army should be up to strength. That is not its purpose. It has never had any such program. The fact is that at the present time the strength of the three reserve forces is about 57,000, a figure which is the highest it has ever been in a full year of peacetime.

Mr. Drew: That statement is not correct. The reserve units have often been up to the full authorized strength.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Claxton: Full authorized strength, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, is not war establishment at all.

Mr. Drew: Of course it is not. Nobody suggested it was.

Mr. Claxton: I should not like to have the impression left that it was. I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition has not left it that way.

Then as to accommodation, may I say that it has been doubled for the reserve forces. As to equipment, if they lack anything all they have to do is to tell the general officer commanding in the district and he provides it. We have ample equipment of every type needed to train the reserves. The reason why the reserves are not stronger numerically than they are today is plain to see. Whereas at the time when he was an active and good leader of an artillery unit before the war or between the wars, the strength of the active forces was about 8,000 or 9,000 officers and men; and I think one must assume that that figure plus the reserve force included a big proportion of the people in Canada who aimed to have a full-time or part-time service career.

At the present time the strength of the active force is 112,000 and in the active forces today there is a big proportion of the same kind of chap as the Leader of the Opposition and others like myself who, for a time, served in the reserve forces. The reason why they are not in the reserve force is that they are in the active force serving Canada full time. I can perhaps bring that point home by mentioning the fact that from March 31, 1951 to March 31, 1954,—that is just three years—we have taken into the regular permanent force of Canada a total of about 100,000 officers and men. Had we not done so they would have been available for the reserve. As a matter of fact, the reserve has contributed a considerable proportion of that group, just as they should and as they are glad to do. But they cannot help feeling that this fact cuts down their own effective numbers of the most active, keen and interested kind. That is one reason. There may be others.

To look into all of this matter we appointed this committee. As I indicated in my preliminary remarks at the beginning of this debate, when we come to the item dealing with the army reserve I propose to go into this matter at greater length or my colleague the Associate Minister of National Defence will do so then.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, by that statement do I understand that the minister is going to make the report available at that time?

Mr. Claxton: Oh, no. A report by a board of officials to the chief of the general staff, so far as I know, has never been made available. There is every reason for not making it available. Here there would be every reason for making it available except that it would create the kind of precedent that the Leader of the Opposition and others would make use of in the future. So far as I am concerned, that procedure is not proposed. We propose to make a full report of what is recommended and of what has been done, but the report itself will not be made available because such reports are not made available in this country or in Britain. A minister of national defence, any minister of the crown or any chief of the general staff is entitled to have the confidential advice of a group that he appoints to give him that advice. Unless they can give that advice in confidence, and unless he can take it and act on it or not as he sees fit, we cease to have responsible government.

I shall not go into any of the other matters mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Chairman, because they can be taken up later. I should like to compliment the hon. member for Peel on his maiden speech and to tell him that some of the questions he raised will be mentioned later. He as well as some other hon. members made reference to not having enough information with which to consider these estimates. I have said—without ever having been contradicted, I think—that in this parliament the members have been given, year after year, more information about defence than is given in any other parliament in the British commonwealth.

Mr. Fulton: The minister's saying so does not make it so.

Mr. Claxton: I think the extraordinary thing is that having been given information and not having found what they want—something of a scandalous nature that they could use—they then forget the fact that they have been given information and continue to protest that they have not been given any information. But we have given so much information in the defence expenditure committee meetings, with over forty sessions during three years, that quite a few hon. members have protested that they are unable to absorb and assimilate the quantity of information they have got.

Another hon. member referred to the fact that he would like to see the product of our defence effort. The product can be seen in Korea, in Germany, in Canada. On every occasion when you see the defence forces you can see the product. That is the kind of thing we are producing, not paper, not words, but trained officers and men equipped and qualified to do the job, and second to none. You know, Mr. Chairman, one of the extraordinary things is that year by year we give opportunities to senators, members of parliament and others to see what is actually going on. We arrange for visits. This year there were visits to the air defence command at St. Hubert, Canadian Vickers Limited, No. 25 central ordnance depot, Canadair Limited, the naval supply depot and to the five major establishments at Kingston, namely, the national defence college, the army staff college, the Royal Military College, the Royal Canadian Electrical and Mechanical Engineers and the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals. Then there was the visit to Churchill, Manitoba.

A total of 129 members of parliament have taken part in a total of 240 visits during this session of parliament, and I have not had one of them report to me anything wrong about anything he saw.

Mr. Fulton: Did he see anything except what you showed him?

Mr. Claxton: I was not on most of the trips.

Mr. Fulton: Or what was showed him on your instructions?

Mr. Claxton: They could see anything they wanted. As the hon. member for Kamloops knows, that was dramatically shown on the occasion when the hon. member for Winnipeg North felt that he had not seen everything he should have seen at No. 25 ordnance depot. He went back. He is a chartered accountant, he saw everything he wanted to see and came back and reported to the committee on defence expenditure that he did not know of any way in which the system could be improved.

The hon. member for Peel asked me a rather detailed question about the guards, but I shall be very pleased to answer it quickly. The guards are on the right of the infantry but they do not change the infantry's place with relation to other formations. I will have something more to say about some of the points he raised.

I thought the hon. member for Prince Albert gave a magnificent and moving account of the progress made by NATO and I do express to him most sincere congratulations upon having made such good use of his time and having given us such a useful report. However, he did talk about strategic roads which seemed to me to have a slightly remote association with NATO. It seemed to bear rather on Prince Albert, The Battlefords and some of the other constituencies in Saskatchewan. With respect to what I said in Edmonton, I have nothing to take back. Roads and communications all help defence. Of course they do. But defence planning and defence appropriations are a question of making the best use you can of the money you have available. No defence minister, no chief of staff ever has enough money available to do all the things that are waiting to be done, and roads come toward the bottom of the list.

He also suggested that at some stage I had indicated that we would never be attacked by air, that I had ridiculed the idea of air attack against us. I have said a great deal in the house and outside about defence but I doubt if I ever made such a statement. In fact I can point to statements from 1946 onwards in the directly contrary sense, statements indicating that we had to build up our defences against air attack, and ever since 1946 the objectives of our defence have been about the same as they are today. Then he also charged me with not agreeing with the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich when he suggested that we should spend $3 on the air force for every dollar on the army. That was said on the 18th of November, 1949.

I have looked up the discussion and I remember it very well. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, or the hon. member for Nanaimo as he was better known to us, did say that, but I did not make the reply that the hon. member for Prince Albert said I made. What I said was, and my reply can be seen in the discussion at that time, was that at that time we could not do it because we were spending only $195 million on defence. Therefore if we had done what the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich wanted us to do we would have had to wipe out the navy and the army, and I was not prepared to do so that day.

But since then events have changed, and I hope a lot of us have changed our thinking because the change has been a very dramatic and considerable one. Since then the extent of our defence expenditures has increased tenfold, I regret to say, from under $200 million in 1948-49 to something of the magnitude of $2 billion in 1953-54 or 1954-55. A very great part of the increase since the beginning of the build-up in 1950 after Korea has been due to our increased effort in the air. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich can accept my full congratulations on having the right idea but not the right kind of money with which to afford it at the time. Since then developments have occurred as I have mentioned.

The hon. member for Prince Albert also said that he did not see how opposition members could appreciate the defence effort unless they were shown the actual production. Well, I say to hon. members: Go to No. 25 Canadian ordnance depot and see the tanks lined up in rows. Go to St. Hubert airport and see the Sabre fighters bound for overseas, more than a thousand delivered, on the way to the places where they are needed. Go to Avro and see the CF-100's and then move around the country, as I hope you all will, and see the radar stations with the latest in electronic equipment. Go and see it. I invite you, as I have repeatedly done in the past. There is nothing to prevent any member of parliament from going anywhere to see our defences. I encourage it. If you will only let the commanding officer of the district, air command or myself know, we will facilitate the arrangements either for groups or for individual members at any time. Let us make sure that you really do see what is going on.

Now, the hon. member for Kootenay West referred to a number of matters, including skates for Collège Militaire Royal de Saint-Jean. He expressed some concern about our spending $34 a pair for skates for the teams. Apparently he is in the same position as I am—he has not bought skates for his children for a long time. These skates were purchased through the Department of Defence Production for the use of the team, in the same way as every other college—Saint Jean's is a college—does. It seems, however, that we did not pay quite as much for them as some colleges do. I made inquiries during the dinner hour, and I found that an Ottawa school paid $40 to $45 a pair for skates. These are about the quality of skates that are used by junior teams. It is the practice now for our colleges to be provided with some funds with which to buy sporting equipment in the same way as other colleges and schools have that equipment supplied. Some of these funds for that purpose apparently were used for these skates, but they got a little cheaper type than a local school does here.

Then he referred to the case of Kurt Meyer, and suggested that all Canadians convicted by courts-martial during the war, and still undergoing sentence, should be released. There are no Canadians still serving sentences arising out of offences committed during the war. He then referred to the case of Private Cierpisz, which was referred to in the Globe and Mail. He should accept such statements, made in the course of the defence of that young man who was tried for his life, at something less perhaps than their full face value. This young man applied to join the armed forces. He gave a misstatement as to his age. He passed the aptitude test; he was taken in and he served. Then, he committed this offence for which he was sentenced to ten years. If any further details are required, I shall be glad to give them to the hon. gentleman outside the committee. I do not think it would be doing the case any particular good to go into it in great detail here.

Then, the hon. member for Calgary North said that I had been saying that our defences were grand, that our defences were adequate, everything was rosy, and that this had been my stock tactic throughout the years. I always asked the hon. member for Calgary North—I hope he will excuse it because we are very good friends—when I said those things; when I said them, where I said them, and what are the quotations,—

Mr. Harkness: And I always indicated them.

Mr. Claxton: —and he has never indicated them yet.

Mr. Harkness: I always indicated them; I indicated them this afternoon.

Mr. Claxton: He said we had no anti-aircraft defence. Here, I am inclined to agree with him up to a certain point. At the present time, as I have indicated before, we are in a stage of transition. We have in Canada the latest anti-aircraft guns that there are. They are very expensive and the equipment, the predictor, the director, the tracking equipment and the firing equipment are very expensive. When you confront these guns with low flying high-speed jets or very high altitude jets, then their efficiency is much less than 100 per cent, let us say. We have been deliberately, as a deliberate calculated risk, not buying more of these guns and more of this equipment, but have that quantity which we think essential pending the arrival of ground-to-air rockets or guided missiles.

In that connection, of course, we have been following the United States and British work in this field. We have people working with them, and we have teams actually training with them. But there is not that type of equipment available yet in quantity for delivery.

With regard to airborne troops and aircraft, we have the aircraft necessary to carry out the kind of lifts we consider is necessary to meet the kind of attack that might be made. This mobile striking force of three airborne divisions, artillery, engineers, medicals and the like, is not a brigade. It was originally planned as a brigade, but the concept changed and now it is planned to operate its units as three separate battalions. They are trained, and the exercises have shown that they do the job. In this connection, and in connection with civil defence to which other hon. members referred, I wish they could see and compare what we have in Canada with what there is in the various countries on the other side of the Atlantic, where the threat of an immediate attack and the consequences of an attack are far more imminent than they would be in our country. I wish hon. members could compare our position with regard to defence against air attack, either by radar backed by fighters and anti-aircraft guns, civil defence and ground observers and so on, with the state of organization that there is on the other side of the ocean. They would be surprised at the considerable progress made on this side relative to the other.

Then the hon. member referred to the build-up of staffs, and so on. We set out in the white paper the distribution of the Canadian armed forces. I doubt if you could get this information for any other country, as between the various components engaged in defence operations. They are to be found there, divided among the effective fighting forces, the administrative and training staffs; those in Korea, Germany and the like. It is extremely difficult to generalize about these things. We strive continuously to cut down the overhead, the staffs, and to make continuous comparisons with the corresponding picture in the United States and Britain. So far as I know the results are generally favourable, despite the fact that we have relatively smaller forces. Still, this is a thing that I agree must be fought for steadily, to reduce the overhead, to reduce the cost and reduce manpower.

In this connection, we are faced with the perplexing problem of having adequate staffs to answer the questions on the order paper.

I might mention one in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North, which appears on the Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day for this day. I refer hon. members to page 11, order No. 10 in the name of Mr. Harkness, as follows:

What percentage of national defence buildings, on a space basis, are heated by fuel oil and by coal respectively?

And then No. 3:

How much oil is used per one thousand feet of floor space where oil heating is employed, and how much coal is used per one thousand feet of floor space where coal heating is employed?

Well, that is a nice one! I asked the department to find out how many buildings we had in national defence. They have made a survey and have found that apart from married quarters there are about 11,000. And we have about 20,000 married quarters. Married quarters are fairly standard, so we will place them to one side. But in order really to arrive at an answer to this question we would have to have a team of people go about and measure the cubic contents of each building, ascertain the square footage of space, and then—if we could possibly find it out—relate to that the quantity of oil and coal used to heat a particular building. And then we could give an answer which might mean something to someone, but certainly would not mean anything to anyone with whom I have discussed the question. But, as it is, we will try to do the best we can, and give the hon. member a fair answer.

Mr. Harkness: I would like to say to the minister, and I think he will agree, that in connection with any question I have asked that involved an undue amount of time to answer I have always been quite willing either to modify or to drop the question.

Mr. Claxton: I think that is right, yes.

Mr. Harkness: I thought the information I asked for would be available in the minister's records. If it is not available, then I am willing to drop it.

Mr. Claxton: Thank you very much. I shall give answers to questions two and four, and give some indication with respect to the rest of the question, as well as we can. And we can talk it over. However, I do appreciate the hon. member's attitude.

Mr. Fulton: When you buy a building do you not know how many thousand cubic feet of space there are in it?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, we do; but quite a few of our buildings go back to the French regime, and we have no accurate information about them.

Mr. Harkness: Some of your methods go back to the French regime, too.

Mr. Claxton: Now, the hon. member also referred to our purchase of mobilization stores in excessive quantities. A good deal was made of this during the recent event in August. But I must say very little reference was made on that occasion to the information that had been brought out by the defence expenditure committee of the House of Commons. However the fact is that we have had brought to our attention no example of excessive purchases of soft goods or hard goods for mobilization stores, with the single exception of those two dreadful things, serving forks and coffee pots. I admit guilt on both counts.

Mr. Harkness: And for the first time.

Mr. Claxton: Oh, no. As I have told hon. members, and as they must know, I suppose this resulted from someone fairly well down in the echelon applying the same multiplier to troops we would have on mobilization that was in effect at the end of the second world war, when we were feeding the troops at tables of six, and had not yet adopted the cafeteria system, which is now practically universal throughout the armed forces. That cut down the number we needed of serving forks and coffee pots very greatly.

However we are taking these into stores, and before very long they will all be absorbed, and nobody will be out a nickel. No doubt the defence estimates for the next year will be reduced by the amount of the forks and the coffee pots we have not had to buy.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, as usual, made a very constructive, helpful and moderate speech. As he and others proceeded to speak in this debate I could not help recalling the time up to seven years ago when the government and the Department of National Defence and the armed forces were being accused of doing too little and too late. Then as this debate has gone on it became pretty clear that the burden of the main opposition speeches was that we were doing too much, too soon. And then we could find a kind of antiphon; "Too little, too late, too much, too soon; too little, too late, too much, too soon", almost being said at the same time.

We did not as was suggested enter this operation of planning the post-war program, beginning in 1950, as a "crash" operation alone. We did not do that. But what I do suggest is that at that time, in 1950, with the outbreak of the Korean war, and with Czechoslovakia just having been brought behind the iron curtain, there was, generally speaking, throughout this country, as in every other country, a feeling that war was likely to come upon us at any time. And we had to prepare for that kind of emergency, as well as "the long pull". So we had to do a great many things as fast as we could, and also at the same time not do more than we felt we could support over "the long pull".

And Canada in this respect was somewhat unique. In the United States they have a system of government under which the administration can put forward estimates and requests for money which ultimately have to be dealt with by congress and which very frequently are changed in congress. In the other countries of our alliance there was always the certainty of mutual aid from the United States and, to a lesser extent, from Canada. However in our case if we put anything down as a commitment, as a planning figure, we had to be prepared to carry it out as a government and as a party, or else we would cease to be a government, and cease to be the party in power.

Everyone dealing with us knew that: We told them. Consequently every figure we put down had to be tested and tried by the standard: "Can we do this, not only this year, but next year, and the next, and the next?" And so our plans were realistic and, as it turned out, our calculations were quite surprisingly accurate. And we have done what we set out to do.

But I must say that the suggestion that we failed to anticipate that the Russians would have the atom bomb and jet aircraft really surprised me. Of course the plan was based on the assumption that they would have the atom bomb, and jet aircraft bombers, capable of delivering it. We worked out, on the basis of the intelligence information available to us, what the likely date would be at which each step would occur; and I must say we are still doing so. Whether or not we are proved right in our present planning for 1957, 1958, 1959 and 1960 will only be established if there is another war. I hope there is not another war; and we will never know if we were right, unless there is another war; but if we pass by the date for which we planned forces suitable to meet the threat at that time, then I think we have done the job that planning should do—match the plan to the estimated capacity of the potential enemy at the time. If he does not deliver the goods at that time, then we are one year ahead. We have bought one year of peace. That is the way military planning must and should work, but it has got to stretch forward almost indefinitely into the future, so long will be the time necessary to make this terribly complicated and complex equipment.

There was some suggestion about our still continuing to plan to fight with the equipment of the last world war or some other world war. At the present time there is no country on the face of the earth that has aircraft in the field to the extent that Canada has, competent to meet the Russian threat at this time. If we had bought, as was suggested by one hon. member, Meteors and Vampires from the British we would have planes that would be at least a whole series back from the present planes we have.

On the other hand, the hon. member for Queens was comparing our aircraft, the Sabre with the Orenda, with some others, and I must say the figures he gave surprised me. I have had them checked and they surprised our people; but what I am sure he is comparing is an estimate of future possibilities with what we have in the field today. We have something coming along better than that estimate—we hope we have. That is what our plan is, to have the supersonic fighter to replace the F-86E and the supersonic all-weather fighter to replace the CF-100, some years ahead. Whether or not we can get them I do not know, but we are investing money so that we stay on top of this job, and have at the time when it is necessary the kind of equipment to down any enemy that comes. And that is the job of military planning. It is related to time, and the time today has to be a long, long way ahead.

Here I would like to correct one impression which apparently the press took from something I said, which was not intended at all. This was with regard to the results of an exercise that we had on air interception. I quote from what I said at page 4905 of Hansard:

> The percentage of kills as they were counted in these exercises was extraordinarily high compared with any experience in the second world war. It was not one hundred per cent but it was about ninety per cent indicating a very successful operational state.

Then, I went on and said that I gave those figures by way of illustration of an operational state. I do not want to suggest for a second that if the enemy came over tonight our aircraft could get into the air and knock down nine out of ten. Nobody could say that; until the battle occurs you cannot say; until you know the conditions you cannot say. The enemy might come over on a night in which fighters could not get off the ground.

Mr. Ferguson: Can the minister give us a rough estimate of what they might do from the knowledge he has of the enemy and our defences? Can he give us that?

Mr. Claxton: I cannot.

Mr. Ferguson: Give us a rough estimate.

Mr. Claxton: I gave it just as fully as possible in the statement I made yesterday.

Mr. Ferguson: The minister cannot tell until the war is over. That is some answer.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Ferguson: That is not what the people of Canada want.

Mr. Claxton: Not "until the war is over", but until the attack occurs you cannot tell and nobody can tell how successful the defence is going to be against that attack. If the attack comes over at night and your aircraft are frozen to the ground with freezing rain the attack is going to be completely successful unless you have ground-to-air radar-guided missiles that will go up irrespective of conditions and no country has those in quantity yet.

Mr. Ferguson: If you had an earthquake that might help.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Ferguson: Under ordinary conditions what could happen?

Mr. Claxton: The full story that can be told I gave yesterday and today, and I do not propose to make any prognostications about it at all.

I have indicated the results of an exercise which we held under fairly realistic conditions. No exercise can be under completely realistic conditions. I do want to make it plain that that was what I was doing.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich then referred to the expenditures on research and development. I am very glad to see that he would like to see those increased. We are getting, we feel, about as much money as can be usefully spent on this operation at the present time. It must be remembered that our research work and our development work, particularly research, is carried on in close co-operation with the national research council, with the universities, with industry, but also in the closest kind of partnership with our allies, particularly Britain and the United States. We aim not to overlap except in fields where it is really desirable that two or three approaches should be made to one problem at the same time. Altogether, I do not think it is possible to suggest that this co-operation in this field could be improved in any way.

But that brings to mind the importance of emphasizing that this whole business of defence planning is not carried out by the Minister of National Defence, the chiefs of staffs of Canada, the cabinet defence committee or the cabinet alone. It is carried out after close intimate discussion and consideration with our partners in the alliance. This is an alliance, and we have with the standing group in Washington a permanent representative in the person of Rear Admiral De Wolf, head of the Canadian joint staff in Washington, sitting in with the permanent representatives of the chiefs of staff in consultation with the standing group. We have at Paris Mr. Dana Wilgress, our ambassador to NATO, with a military staff sitting in there. We have integrated officers, integrated as part of SHAPE, as part of SACLANT, as part of the standing group staff, and so have other countries, and we are all doing this job in cooperation. Therefore, if we arrive at a major plan it has usually had the advantage of discussion with representatives of other countries, and it is designed to fit in with what they are doing. Our aim is to have an over-all balance of forces, without each country having to have something of everything. And our balance of forces of course is related to our particular roles in the air and on the land in Europe and in Canada, and at sea in the anti-submarine escort work.

That brings me to references that have been made to the speech of Representative Cole. In this connection I must say I feel that Representative Cole, when he said that some delay had occurred—not two years' delay—in negotiations with Canadians over continental defence, must have had in mind that some time had been taken by various groups of military personnel, scientists and others, to arrive at a plan of what additional steps should be taken. There has been no delay in this consideration that has been caused by Canadian participation. The problems involved are new; the magnitude of the task is formidable, and anything that has been decided upon would be expensive in manpower to make. It would only be chosen if it meant a series of continuing requirements, so that we here have had no recommendation from Canadian or American or joint groups that has not already been acted upon. There are no negotiations pending. There are no negotiations that have been pending for two years, and there are no negotiations that have been delayed as the term "negotiations" is ordinarily understood. I feel that what the representative must have had in mind was consideration by military and scientific teams as to what was the best thing to do.

This question of continental defence was dealt with in a joint statement by both countries, which was tabled in the house on April 8, 1954, and it appears as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings of that day.

With regard to recruiting the hon. member referred to expenditure, and I would like to emphasize a point I have made repeatedly, namely that to maintain our forces at their present quantity and quality requires a continued effort. We estimate it would require about a 15,000 intake a year, of which about 10 per cent would be officers. That is a very considerable figure in this country in peacetime, and in order to get officers and men of the required quality we require a continuous effort and strong support.

Then the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich spoke, as did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, about the desirability of our having an additional aircraft carrier. Well this would be desirable, but what would we give up? It would cost from $50 to $100 million to begin with for an aircraft carrier, and whatever else would be involved including the modification and renovation of an airfield, the special type of aircraft, training facilities and the like, and the question is how that $50 or $100 million could be found out of the present defence appropriations. It is a question of priority.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question. Does the minister believe this would be a necessary adjunct at the present time?

Mr. Claxton: No, I do not.

Mr. Ferguson: Then the answer is that we will not get one because you do not think it would be necessary. But if you thought it was necessary would you see that the money was raised for that project?

Mr. Claxton: Unfortunately that is not the way in which defence planning works.

Mr. Ferguson: Even if it were necessary we would not have it, is that the answer?

Mr. Claxton: No, that is not the answer, and the hon. member ought to know that.

Mr. Ferguson: I do not know anything about your way of thinking. One would have to be a mindreader, a soothsayer, and everything else to know that.

Mr. Claxton: I think everyone must know that there are a lot of things we would like to have and which I would consider desirable in the interests of our national defence. If, however, the defence appropriation is fixed by parliament at $2 billion then we must see what is most necessary to have out of that $2 billion. Defence planning is not a question of what is necessary or desirable; it is a question of what is most necessary and most desirable. In other words, it is a question of priority.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich referred to the cost of an escort vessel. I agree that these escort vessels are very expensive. They are very complicated and they will have great speed, as we hope to find out when we get them into operation. They have qualities of all kinds which make them very suitable indeed for catching and killing the modern high-speed submarine, and indeed that is their purpose.

Now, the high speed submarine is a threat, and the extent of that threat was made clear by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception when he spoke this afternoon. It is a very serious threat and the type of equipment needed to meet it is, we believe, this particular type of vessel, and that is the belief of the British and Americans and of course we must have aircraft.

Consequently since that is part of our job we are going in for the construction of 14 of these vessels and, of course, as I said before, they are very expensive indeed. We have plans under way for the construction of a ship which would be very much less expensive and easier to build, and which might come close to doing as good a job. We probably will not begin construction of this type of ship until we have the first trials of the first of the destroyer escort vessels so that we can learn from their actual operation what they can do.

As regards the use of helicopters, they are, of course, becoming increasingly important for the army, navy and air force, though they are relatively expensive in view of the light load they can carry. However, we are getting more of them for all three services.

Then the hon. member and others referred to our contribution of 12 squadrons of Sabre fighters to NATO, and the suggestion was made that we should bring 6 of these back. That suggestion I think was made by half a dozen hon. members and consequently I must deal with it. In the first place, the United States and Canada are the only two North American nations contributing forces to NATO. Without the United States, as was so well pointed out by the hon. member for Prince Albert this afternoon, it would be very difficult indeed to conceive of NATO being in existence at all, and it is of vital importance that the other nations continue to feel that in the build-up of their own forces they have the strong support of the United States and Canada.

I do not suggest that it would be fatal from the psychological or the political point of view for us to withdraw forces from NATO, but it would be a course I would hate to see followed by any Canadian government because I believe it would be the trigger which would start a general decline of the whole grand alliance. When you speak about those 6 squadrons not being important, that is not the view of General Gruenther or General Norstad. These squadrons form an important element in the total defence there, and to withdraw them would mean leaving a gap which could not be filled by the air forces in being or planned by other countries, and that gap would be a very serious one indeed.

There is another reason, and that is that these Sabre fighters are really not well suited for the air defence of Canada. They have a relatively short range, they have only one pilot; they have not a complete set of navigational instruments, and if they went into the air and got into a dogfight in Canada they might have great difficulty in getting back to their airfield. If we had our fighter defence in Canada staffed by Sabre fighters it would mean that we would have to have our airfields for fighter defence at least twice and probably three times as numerous as they are today because of the very much shorter range of the aircraft. Along with double or triple the number of airfields at present in existence we would have to have an increase in their attendant facilities, such as runways, oil tanks, hangars, married quarters, and everything else. An airfield costs about $30 million, and we would also have to double or triple the number of emergency landing fields. In addition to that we would be faced with the necessity of maintaining Sabres and Sabre crews and training them for use in Canada as well as on the other side.

Therefore, from the point of view of our own defences this would not meet the need. The CF-100 does meet the need, and by the end of this year we will have all our regular squadrons, airfields, and radar stations operating on continental defence, which is the thing we have planned, and we will do it by about the time planned. That is the best and most economic way of carrying out this operation.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar at one stage, I believe, asked whether the success of the H-bomb was due to the atomic dust which drifted across from Russia. I have never heard that suggestion. He asked about our expenditure on electronics being cut down. This does not mean any less interest in electronics. Last year we had in the estimates a considerably larger figure because we were building up a radar defence and we were transferring a good deal of electronic equipment abroad as mutual aid. He asked about the withdrawal of troops from Korea. It would certainly be most unfortunate if Canada or any other country made any effort to withdraw its troops from Korea until there is some further development in the discussions at Geneva. After that we can all have another look. He spoke about putting cruisers into reserve. The cruisers are used largely for training purposes. You cannot have a sufficiently large number of men on a destroyer, a frigate or a destroyer-escort to meet training requirements; but on a cruiser you can provide training, and that is what they are for. He referred to 1,000 inspectors of stores. As reported at page 4921 of Hansard, he said:

> . . . we have 1,000 inspectors of stores, in addition to the inspection staffs of each of the services. These 1,000 inspectors cost $3,500,000. I am not going to deny that adequate inspection is necessary, but the present estimates provide for no less than $12·5 million for all the inspection services compared with only $10·5 million at the height of our war effort, 1943-44.

The peak wartime year was 1943. The total staff of inspection service was 19,000. The cost was $30 million. The value of the goods inspected was $1·5 billion. For the fiscal year 1953-54 the total staff was 2,295; the value of the goods inspected was $1·1 billion—almost as much as during the war-time peak—with one-eighth of the staff and the cost was $12·5 million.

Then he also talked about our transferring obsolete equipment to NATO. I do not know what he had in mind. There is nothing obsolete about the aircrew that we are training for NATO, and that is the largest single item of mutual aid. We have trained altogether 2,682 and the cost has been $228 million. Then the next largest single item has been the transfer of 370 Sabre fighters to Britain, and the Canadian components in that item represent about $100 million. The rest is divided up between new and old items, none of them obsolete. Otherwise they would not have taken them and we would not have given them. He also seemed to suggest that we should procure aircraft from Britain. We are going to get the design for some Britannias, but as will be seen from what I have said we have been supplying aircraft to Britain, not the reverse.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre made statements about armour and the like. This matter has already been dealt with in the house on April 15, 1953, on December 1, 1953; and on several other occasions we have gone over the same ground. I should like to point out that it is impossible to work our present armed forces, with their commitments in Korea and in Germany and the requirement of having a mobile striking force of airborne troops, and still have two armoured regiments rotating abroad. You just cannot figure out mathematically a way of using the same manpower to do that complicated operation. Once you train a man for armour, you do not want to use him in the infantry and vice versa. Also, of course, an armoured brigade would cost about $100 million more than a corresponding infantry brigade.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South made some interesting remarks, as he always does, and I appreciate what he said about current affairs. I think I have covered the other points he mentioned, and also those of the hon. member for Queens. His question as to whether we would have a deputy chairman of NATO for air is one which will be up for consideration whenever somebody has to be appointed. If we have the right man for the job, I hope they will consider a Canadian. We hoped to have a suitable officer to go over there at that time.

The hon. member for Oxford referred to the representation on the naval benevolent fund and questioned the absence of other ranks. There are sixteen other ranks in the voting council.

I think that covers all the points except the questions by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin about fires. Perhaps I can deal with them later when we come to the appropriate estimates. However, I would say that the cause of the fire at Penhold appears to have been a spark setting fire to fuel that was being poured from one tank to another. The loss by fires of hangars in the air force averaged about $700,000 a year. The cost of the interest on the amount necessary to replace the present hangars with fire-resistant hangars would be $5 million a year. We have a program of hangar replacement, but these two figures would indicate that it was not economical or financially desirable that we should change the present policy. I can tell him that we know nothing other than what I have mentioned.

I think I have covered the points sufficiently, Mr. Chairman. If I have not done so, I know that hon. members will bring them to my attention as we go through the details.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Claxton: Excuse me, but there is one correction I should like to make. I find that when I answered the hon. member for Red Deer today about fatal casualties on aircraft, I said that the fatal accident rate on jets was lower than that on conventional aircraft. On checking over the figures again—at the time I was answering the hon. member quickly because the matter was urgent—I find that the actual number of fatal accidents or fatalities caused through jets has been lower than the number on conventional aircraft, but the rate is higher.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks on the general debate, and particularly on what the minister has just said. The minister's speech has made me rather uneasy. It has been too much of a success story. If the minister had indicated some other mistakes beyond serving forks and coffee pots or teapots—I forget which it was—I should have been more reassured. But as I said, we have really had a success story. I do not propose to try to assess some of the answers the minister has made, because others here are more competent to do so than am I; but I want to indicate my objection to the answer which was made with regard to the reserve army. If the other answers were comparable to that which was made with regard to the reserve army, then they must be highly unsatisfactory indeed.

What the minister said about the reserve army, in answer to the damaging criticisms made by the Leader of the Opposition and others, was that it was not planned to be up to strength. He gave us some figures pointing out that when we had the reserve army up to or nearly up to strength was when our active army was small and negligible. I think that is a fair statement. But there are two comments which may be made on it. Incidentally, I can bear out fully what the Leader of the Opposition said about the adequate equipment of the artillery in the years just before the first war. As I say, if you go back to that time you will find that we were then fully equipped. The minister excuses the present situation by pointing out that we have the active army.

But when the minister says that it was not planned that the reserve army should be up to strength, I imagine he would also agree that it was not planned that there should be parades where the officers on parade would outnumber the non-commissioned officers and other ranks. While that may be an extreme case, I think any of us who know anything at all about the reserve army know that those working in it and taking it seriously are terribly disturbed about the conditions under which they are working.

I have a young friend in the reserve army, an engineer, who works at it very hard indeed. I have a letter from him which I do not propose to take the time of the committee to read, but it indicates that he is extremely disturbed about the whole situation. I am disturbed too that the minister should have sought, as he did, to leave with us the impression that there was nothing to worry about with respect to the reserve army, that it was true it was different from what it used to be but the conditions were different.

I maintain, as I said a moment ago, that the reason he gave as an excuse for the condition of the reserve army, viz. the fact that we have an active army, is utterly invalid. First of all we have got, as I said, a far larger population, but second and far more important is the fact that we are now in a condition of danger where, if we had the right spirit, we ought to be able to have young men crowding into the reserve army.

There is just one other thing before I go on. I want to refer to the minister's answer to the hon. member for Calgary North who said that we had no anti-aircraft defences. The minister passed over that very lightly by saying that we were in a transition. How long does the transition go on? We have been getting ready for three or four years. How long does the transition go on? After all we are not considering a condition which may arrive ten or fifteen years from now. We do not know when it may arrive. We do not know when the need may arrive.

I want to say a word about what was said this afternoon. It seems to me this debate is probably the most important debate of the year. It is not merely that we are considering such huge amounts of money but that we are considering our very existence. Either we take these things seriously or we do not take them seriously. Either there is danger or there is no danger. To see the attitude that is widespread in our country and not absent in this house, one might imagine that the danger threatening was threatening somebody quite different from us, that it did not come very close home to us, or that if there was any danger it was not going to come for another five, ten or fifteen years.

I think anyone looking about this country and coming into this house would think we were taking things very nonchalantly. We all know how easily the abnormal becomes the normal, but I take it it is our job as serious citizens and presumably leaders of thought to see that that is not allowed to happen. Is there or is there not any sense of urgency? I listened to the minister's speech yesterday. It was a good speech as far as it went, giving us an account of things. Someone said it seemed to have more to do with A and Q than it had with G. He discussed supplies. The minister was very pleased to tell us how well supplied the troops are, and that is well, but what we are interested in knowing is what they are going to be able to do and what the position is with respect to the dangers which may arise.

The minister's speech has been criticized by competent men with experience in the last war, the hon. members for Esquimalt-Saanich, Winnipeg South Centre and Calgary North. They have brought searching criticisms and the minister has answered tonight. I make two comments. First of all the answers seemed to me inadequate. It seemed to me that he utterly failed to answer particularly what had been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in respect of armour. Again I say that if the answer with respect to the reserve army can be taken as a sample of the validity of the other answers then I repudiate them entirely.

I come back to the question of the sense of urgency. I sometimes wonder whether it is not easy for freedom to degenerate into irresponsibility and whether we are developing the self-discipline which surely is necessary if we are going to meet the imposed discipline of the communist countries. If we had the self-discipline that is necessary we should not have to lure people into the forces by all the means we are using now, urging them to come in and get in on the ground floor of a good thing. Yet it is not fair to place the criticism on the young men because as they look around what sign do they see of the older people making any sacrifice? We cannot blame the young men. We must blame ourselves primarily, and while one does not want to blame the government for everything, weather included, it does seem to me that the sense of urgency which I believe is necessary was lacking from the minister's speech yesterday.

I got no sense of urgency from it. It might have been a progress report on the construction of some civilian enterprise where we were told that it was pretty well up to time and the excess costs were not any more than we had expected they would be. That was the impression it left with me. Since then we have had, I submit, valid and searching criticisms of it. When the minister came to answer tonight I hoped we might have answers which would carry conviction, that we might perhaps have some of the sense of urgency which was not there yesterday. I failed to find it entirely. If we really believe that it is not all a form of words when we talk about the danger we are in, then all I can say is we seem to be handling the situation very trivially both in this house and outside.

We are not going to save ourselves merely by the expenditure of money. In times of danger when emergency really arrives and we know it is here there is nobody better than ourselves in rising to meet a crisis. We have done that in two different wars, but as has been said already we were always late and we were lucky to get through. At the present time we of course are much further advanced in respect of material preparation. We have never done as much before in peacetime, but I suggest again that unless we have that spirit which will only come from a sense of urgency then all the money we spend may not produce the results that we want.

I am not going to take up much of the time of the committee to discuss the question of some body, presumably a committee of this house, which shall review the matter. I do point out, however, that at the present time a terrific responsibility is resting on the minister and his associate, who are both men of military experience, but it so happens that there are in this house a good many other men of more recent military experience. I am not suggesting that members of parliament are going to set themselves up as experts, but I do suggest that you have got to have somebody to deal with the experts. It is no disrespect to any soldier, sailor or airman to say that their job will be to get as much as they can. Why would they not? If anything goes wrong they are going to be held accountable. Why would they not get every nickel they can get? It takes a lot of courage, it takes judgment to know the point at which you are going to stop giving them money. From this side of the house men have spoken who have had experience. There are men on the other side of the house who have had experience. It is a pity we do not have more speeches from the other side but that is the rub of the green. I have no doubt there are just as many on the other side of the house, but I say most earnestly that it is a great pity that such men have no chance to do anything except, after the policy is determined, to either approve or to criticize.

We are deprived of the judgment of these men. I think that is a great loss to the welfare of the state. I do not want to press the question of information but I want to say this. You can be fairly submerged with information of all kinds. You can go and look at things. It is no good for me to go and look at an aeroplane. All I know is how to get into an aeroplane and ride in it. My opinion on technical questions is of no value whatever.

We have people whose opinion would be of value. As I say, it is not a matter of the quantity of the information. The minister says, and I have no doubt correctly, that he has dished out information in great quantities. What I am suggesting is that we fail in this house, we entirely fail, to avail ourselves of the judgment of some of the best-informed and experienced people in this house on both sides. That is a great loss if we are losing that because of some blind worship of some technical shibboleth. I think it is a great pity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said I was going to be brief, and I shall be brief. I take it at the moment, in spite of the billions we are spending, we cannot pretend to ourselves that we have any sense of urgency or widespread sense of public responsibility that we should have in order to meet this situation, and I think while that condition exists the government had better not take credit to itself and plume itself on the situation which exists.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to bring just a few matters to the attention of the minister and the committee at this stage of the discussion. Before coming to the particular subject I want to mention that perhaps a comment or two on the minister's recent remarks might be in order. I was interested in the matter referred to lastly by the hon. member for Greenwood in that the minister said that he had given this parliament more information than any similar legislative body. This was in reference to a committee which might get at the root of the problem so as to enable parliament to deal in a more intelligent way with the problems of defence in Canada. I wonder if the minister really expects us to swallow that generalization?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, I do.

Mr. Fulton: Well, I do not intend to swallow it because some of us have made a study of what happens in other legislative bodies. I do not agree with the minister, to put it at its mildest, that this house gets more information than the United States congress does when it calls the secretary of defence before a committee, and not only the secretary of defence but the officers and the chiefs of staff. These people are subjected to questioning and the committee does not let them go until they answer the questions satisfactorily, questions of policy as well as masses of statistical information. The minister, I must admit, is prepared, and his department is prepared, to flood any committee we set up with a mass of statistical information. They bring it in in reams, and they are prepared to justify it. They justify their contracts. It does not matter if they have spent twice or three times the original estimate, they say that was inevitable and was all right because they got value for the money.

They are prepared to bring in all kinds of that information and to set up their experts to justify it. However we are not allowed to get at the type of witness the United States congress or British parliament brings before committees and compels to answer questions, the sort of questions on defence matters upon which we want information.

I take issue, too, with the minister's refusal to make available to this house the report of the three distinguished officers who have recently been making a survey of the situation with respect to the reserve army. The minister said that would be, to paraphrase his words, a denial of the whole system of responsible government. We have heard some half-baked arguments on that subject before from such experts as the Secretary of State, whose job it was to keep information from parliament before he became a member. The justification in the past for that sort of refusal of that type of information which did not properly come to parliament was that it was confidential reports of civil servants to their ministers. There may be an argument —I am not admitting that I go along all the way with everything that is said in defence of the government there—but there may be room for argument or room for enormous difference of opinion.

However that is a very different thing from the minister spending public money, over and above what is called for by the estimate, or for civil servants who are on the staff of the department and who are of course the confidential advisers of the minister and upon whose advice he relies—it is a different thing from saying that we are not satisfied with the situation in the reserve army and so take it upon ourselves to obtain outside advice. Then, having set up this special committee, to say that the information derived as the result of the expenditure of public money shall be denied to parliament is, itself, a denial of responsible government. Yet, that is the sort of generality and absurdity with which the minister expects this committee to be satisfied in connection with the study of his estimates.

There can be only one reason why this report is refused, and that is that the government knows that it reveals a situation in connection with the reserve forces that is not satisfactory. Why does the government not admit it, and just tell us where it is not satisfactory and what efforts they intend to make to deal with the situation. Then, we would know not only where the cause for dissatisfaction lies, but what remedies were being proposed and instituted to deal with it. How much longer does the minister expect us to go on being satisfied with his general assurance that they are taking action to deal with this situation, when the situation in fact in the reserve forces is such as we have had revealed tonight by those with knowledge of the situation. The minister expects us to swallow too much if he expects us to swallow that whale.

There were one or two other perhaps minor points in the statement the minister has just delivered with which I suggest he has affronted this committee, and they are typical of the arguments which he uses all the way through. I feel that a reference to them may illustrate the weakness of his whole position. He referred to the suggestion which had been made regarding bringing back some of the F-86 squadrons from Europe so that they might assist in the process of continental defence. Now, I do not go along completely with the suggestion that these squadrons should be brought back, although I do go along with the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich in his criticism in which he questioned the wisdom of denuding the defence of Canada, from the point of view of fighter aircraft, at the expense of building up strength overseas. The reasons given by the minister as to why it would not be appropriate to bring back these squadrons are so absurd that, as I say, they serve as an illustration of the whole statement with which he affronted us a few moments ago. He said they are not satisfactory for Canadian defence. They have only one pilot and if they get into a dogfight, with the prevalence of cloud and so on, it would be very difficult for them to find their way down again. I have never heard it suggested, Mr. Chairman, there is more cloud in Canada than there is in Europe.

Mr. Claxton: There is more space.

Mr. Fulton: More space, yes, there is more space. What does the United States rely upon for continental defence? Do they use the CF-100? Are they not as concerned as we are about the matter of continental defence? That is the sort of half-baked, half-reasoned argument with which the minister—

Mr. Claxton: No part of the United States corresponds to every part of Canada, nor does the continental—

Mr. Fulton: What did the minister say?

Mr. Claxton: No part of the United States corresponds to the area across Canada, with our northern territory—

Mr. Fulton: There is Alaska and the American bases in Newfoundland and Labrador. Why, good heavens, you would think the minister did not know that the United States has the far northern bases. They have a number of bases all over the world.

Mr. Claxton: Their airfields are close together there.

Mr. Fulton: We have airfields in Canada.

Mr. Claxton: Not nearly as many or as close.

Mr. Fulton: I suppose the minister could go on—

Mr. Claxton: I could elaborate on that, yes.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: It comes back to the fact that the minister said they might get lost in the clouds.

Mr. McIlraith: He did not say that.

Mr. Fulton: He most certainly did. I think the hon. gentleman was not in the house when he said it.

Mr. McIlraith: He was in the house throughout the whole of the minister's speech and he listened carefully to the minister's speech.

Mr. Fulton: That was what the minister said, and the hon. member is not going to change it by shouting. Because I say that was one of the main difficulties to which the minister referred.

Then the minister did not deal adequately —indeed, he hardly dealt with it at all— with the very thoughtful and excellent speech delivered last night by the hon. member for Queens. The hon. member made certain criticisms of the expensive policies followed by this government in connection with the building of jet engines. I think it should be emphasized that the suggestion of the hon. member for Queens was in no way that we should not build jet engines in Canada; in no way did he suggest that it was not desirable for us to have an aircraft engine industry. His suggestion was rather that, as has been done in the United States—and that is a particularly notable example where they desired to obtain experience in the building of jet engines—we should build under licence, from designs of countries which had already had experience in that work. Indeed experts in the field of aircraft engineering have told me that the main reason the Americans are now able to produce excellent jet engines in large quantities is because of the experience they were willing to acquire in the first instance, by building engines under licence.

And the point is that they acquired that experience at far less cost, and went into large-scale production in a great deal less time than would have been possible had they started from scratch, as we did here. And I do not think anything the minister has said thus far has even begun to deal with the points made last night by the hon. member for Queens, to the effect that engines are available to be built in Canada, under licence, capable of delivering a far greater thrust, and with far lower fuel consumption ratio, and waste ratio, than in respect of those being built in Canada at the present time.

Mr. Claxton: May I just say this, that assuming what the hon. member says is correct—and it is not—it would take eighteen months to two years from now to get into production of that type of engine; whereas we are probably producing as many jet engines as any country in the world today, except the United States.

Mr. Fulton: But this by no means is the first time it has been suggested. This is not the first time the suggestion has been made. It was made more than eighteen months ago.

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, indeed, it was, and not only publicly but privately. As the minister well knows, that criticism has been made privately; but it was not regarded because of some fetish they had—

Mr. Claxton: Fetish?

Mr. Fulton: —that they had in mind in the government and the department.

Mr. Claxton: All we want is good engines.

Mr. Fulton: Well, again that is the sort of generalization in which the minister indulges, but it does not deal with the statistics produced last night by the hon. member for Queens. Certainly the hon. member dealt with those statistics in an intelligent manner. The inference in the minister's last remark simply does not stand up, because the inference in that remark is that the engines described by the hon. member for Queens were not good ones. Well, the statistics he produced indicated that they are better than the ones being produced here. And I say those statistics should be dealt with before we are asked to accept the general assurances with which the minister expects us to be satisfied.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that there should be some further reference to the speech delivered on April 29 by Representative Sterling Cole to which reference was made last night by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. This speech was delivered in New York at the 135th anniversary banquet of Colgate University. As has been pointed out, and should be emphasized, Representative Cole is chairman of the joint committee on atomic energy of the United States congress. The minister has given us the assurance that, notwithstanding what is contained in the remarks of Representative Cole, there are no negotiations between Canada and the United States which are now pending and, further than that, as I understand him, that there is no suggested construction in connection with the continental defence system and radar screen which is being held up by current negotiations, and by failure to pursue and to conclude those negotiations.

Well that is in direct conflict with the statement contained in this speech. It is obvious from the terms of the speech and the occasion of its delivery that Representative Cole took this opportunity, on April 29, to lay before his country what he considered to be a grave and acute problem arising out of shortcomings in the continental defence effort of Canada and the United States. So these were not any passing or careless remarks.

I have the text of his speech here, and the whole of these seven single-spaced foolscap pages is devoted exclusively to this subject. I wish to make that clear, because I think it should be emphasized that this was a careful, considered and reasoned discussion of the subject of continental defence. And there are some very disturbing passages in this text. Reading now from the third to last paragraph on page 2 I find this:

> The grim statistics are these: Today, the Soviet dictators are capable of manufacturing nuclear weapons of such destructive power that a single bomb could destroy the heart of New York or Chicago or Washington. Today, the Soviet union has planes capable of delivering such weapons—even if on one-way missions—against the majority of our critical target areas. Whether the Soviets could now mount an attack of such intensity and scope that our ability to retaliate would be eliminated may be open to debate. But three or four years from now, the Soviets will be able to launch a saturation attack against our nation—an attack so massive that our ability ultimately to prevail may be open to grave question.
> Were an attack to occur this week, or this year, we would have no effective way of repelling it.

I would ask hon. members to contrast this paragraph with the statement made by the minister concerning a test he observed—a statement he has now modified to some extent, but which now stands on the record—concerning the ability of our defensive screen to deal with attacking enemy aircraft. I quote the minister as follows from page 4905 of Hansard:

> It was not one hundred per cent but it was above 90 per cent indicating a very successful operational state.

And then, here is what Representative Cole said:

> Were an attack to occur this week, or this year, we would have no effective way of repelling it. At best—and this is very optimistic—we might intercept as many as one out of every four Soviet bombers.

One out of every four, or 25 per cent success, is a very long way from 90 per cent success. And yet this speech is dealing with the very interception and defensive screen the Minister of National Defence was discussing yesterday.

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Fulton: "No"? What one does this deal with, then?

Mr. Claxton: No; that is dealing with air defence of the United States, which not only includes the part of it that goes through Canada, but also both coasts.

Mr. Fulton: Well, now, that is very interesting. I shall read on and see if hon. members take the same interpretation from this speech as the minister does. He says:

> At best—and this is very optimistic—we might intercept as many as one out of every four Soviet bombers. It is entirely possible, however, that the ratio of interception would be much less—and I assure you that in saying this I am not revealing any secrets to the Soviet union. The rulers of Russia are probably better aware of our present inability to defend ourselves adequately against an atomic attack than are the American people themselves.

Then going on to page 4:

> If we are to defend ourselves against the planes of today and tomorrow, rather than the planes of yesterday, our first requirement is for advance warning of an impending attack. Today we would have no more than a few minutes prior notice of approaching bomber formations.

Well, I assume that the representative must know that they have this screen in Canada to which the minister referred. He goes on:

> My own belief is that we imperatively need at least six hours of advance warning.

Then, a further paragraph:

> Space, sheer space, can be—if it is wisely used, an ally of untold worth in creating an effective continental defence system. Almost four years have passed since our scientists first proposed putting space to work by establishing an early warning line across the north of Canada and extending it seaward to the east and the west by means of patrol aircraft and picket ships. More than two years have passed since the formidable technical problems involved in making a distant warning system both effective and economical were surmounted. And yet, four years after the need for such an early warning line was pointed out, and two years after our scientists developed the equipment which would make such a line possible, it is still not in existence.

Now, sir, relating that fact to the earlier paragraph where he says we might intercept as many as one out of every four Soviet bombers, I suggest it is absolutely impossible to conclude that the representative did not have in mind the defence screen line in Canada when he made that statement. He concludes the paragraph from which I was last quoting with the quotation already placed on record by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich:

> Negotiations with the Canadian government on the subject of where, how and by whom the first of such early warning lines would be built and operated have been in progress for nearly two years.

Representative Cole went on to point out —and I am just going to summarize the rest of his remarks—that Canada and the United States have a joint stake in this matter of continental defence. That of course has been recognized in principle by the remarks of the minister not only in this debate but in others, and that view is of course shared also by all hon. members. But the whole point of the speech made by Representative Cole is that as yet—although he comes fairly close to suggesting that we are to blame; he does not say so specifically, I think for obvious reasons—we have not even really begun to build up an effective radar or early warning system on this continent. This committee and the country is entitled to know that, and the situation indeed simply demands a much more complete statement from the minister of the situation than that with which we have so far been furnished, because there is too big a contrast between the statement emphasized, the facts outlined and underlined by Representative Cole, and the possibility that we would be lucky if we could intercept one out of every four enemy bombers, and the statement of the minister last night and modified to some extent this afternoon that our early warning device would enable us to intercept approximately nine out of ten aircraft. In the absence of anything further than what we have heard so far, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that this is another of the minister's vague general assurances.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the view of the committee that we shall now proceed to the estimates by subheadings?

Mr. Pearkes: During the remarks I made yesterday I called attention to the fact that the white paper of 1951 forecast that there would be some of the four escort vessels launched by the end of 1951 or at the latest the beginning of 1952, and that the white paper of this year gave the fact that five had actually been launched by March 31 of this year. I ask for some information as to what seems to be a very considerable delay and a very considerable difference in the forecast of 1951 and the results of performance as shown by the launching of the five vessels by March 31 of this year. I presume that the four which were intended to be launched in 1951 are included in the five which have actually been launched.

I wonder whether the minister could give the committee some idea as to the reasons for that forecast which proved so inaccurate in 1951, and the reasons for the very long delay there has been in producing more than five of the fourteen vessels. I must call attention to the fact that these vessels are not commissioned now; they have merely been launched, and there is a long period of many, many months usually between the launching of a vessel and its commissioning. I would ask the minister whether he would give some idea—I hope a fairly accurate forecast—of when those five vessels which have now been launched may be commissioned and when the remaining nine which he has given a forecast of being launched by the end of this year may expect to be commissioned so that we may see when the fourteen escort vessels which were included in this three-year plan may really be ready to take their places with the Royal Canadian Navy in its duties either of escort, or of employment with Canada's forces with NATO.

Mr. Claxton: I have that information though not in quite as full detail as the hon. member has asked for it. I wonder whether we can take it up when we come to the navy headings, but in a general way I can tell him that the main reason, as I have been informed, for the delay in the construction of those vessels was, as I said the other night, that they are a completely new type, new design, and have a power plant which is quite unique. We wanted to produce the power plant in Canada, but in order to get on with the job we bought the first one in Britain. There was delay in securing delivery, and in installing it there was further delay. Now we are well advanced, and I think the delivery dates for all fourteen will be compressed, so that instead of spreading them out as would have been the case fairly evenly at the beginning we shall begin commissioning the first next year, and the others will follow quite rapidly afterwards. The anticipation is that we shall commission those ships probably about five or six years after laying down the keels; whereas, as indicated in the case of corresponding ships in Britain and in the United States, they have had similar delays and will take a bit longer.

One of the reasons for this is that the type of vessel, the electronic equipment, the guns, the antisubmarine equipment, the wiring and the power plants have all been under process of design throughout the period of construction in order to get on with the job, and this proved to be a very complicated operation.

Mr. Pearkes: Have you plans so that you will have the crews available next year when these ships are commissioned? According to the last figures of the naval enlistment strength of the Royal Canadian Navy, we are rather short of the target which has been set, and I presume that would include these crews.

Mr. Claxton: We will have the crews. The most difficult element in the crews are the engine room staff, electronics, wireless and so on, but these key men have been undergoing training in the United Kingdom as well as here.

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members will find the details start at page—

Mr. Drew: Just one moment, Mr. Chairman. I regret to find it necessary to rise again before we pass on to the details. We had a detailed analysis of the defence situation by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich yesterday, and we had a detailed analysis in regard to the armoured units by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, and we have had a very exact statement in so far as anti-aircraft are concerned by the hon. member for Calgary North. But the minister has completely skirted around these statements.

In answer to a statement that with all this expenditure we have practically no anti-aircraft, except possibly two batteries, one on the east coast and one on the west coast, equipped with, so far as one knows, weapons far from the description given by the minister, we are told about our having the best anti-aircraft guns in the world. But where are they? Where are the units? That is what we want to know. We have spent $5,500 million, not since the end of the war but during this period. Now, where is the defence in Canada representing that money. Where are these anti-aircraft batteries at a time when they are an essential part of our defence? What are the use of radar screens unless they bring into action not only the aircraft but the anti-aircraft gun at the appropriate point? I am not going to go into further details in regard to these anti-aircraft guns lest it be suggested that asking more questions might involve some secrecy. But I am going to say they are not in a position to feed those guns at the moment.

In so far as the units of the reserve forces are concerned, instead of dealing with a specific statement that these units are not up to their authorized strength, the minister sought to convey the impression that the only thing that was wrong was that they were not up to their full strength. No one at any time in this debate suggested that we expect the units to be up to full strength. There is a strength laid down by the Department of National Defence. Either they come within striking distance of that figure or there should be a general readjustment of the general training plan. Either that is the figure that is going to be employed or the training plan defeats itself. If you only have a quarter of those who are expected to carry out a certain training program then that training program becomes nearly wholly ineffective in so far as the original purpose is concerned.

To give an illustration and only an illustration, seven artillery regiments will be kept as one group at Petawawa this year. I pointed out this was no mere case of not being up to the authorized strength. I pointed out that of these seven regiments only one of these trained two batteries instead of three, which would make a regiment, and that so far as the other batteries are concerned some would train one battery instead of three, and some only a single troop and that represents one of the better artillery groups in the country. What is the answer to that?

It is not enough to say we are not up to full strength. The very inequality of these units makes that training extremely difficult to carry out. How can regimental headquarters be trained if they never have one troop of a battery in training? The whole thing is so disproportionate in cost, in training, and in the result of that training. I pointed out that so far as the batteries actually in camp are concerned that these batteries would have a complement of possibly 120 guns and they fire 24.

Either we really mean business about the training of the reserves or we do not. If we do not then let us admit it. If we do then let us establish a training plan that can actually be carried into effect. That is all that is suggested. The officers are keen, the N.C.O.'s are keen and the men are anxious to do their job. But the plan obviously is not working, and it is in relation to that plan that there is a report from three competent officers. The answer given by the minister that this is a confidential report to the staff is really not describable in terms that would be permitted under the rules of this house.

That is a report that really challenges the responsibility of the members of this house. It is in relation, I believe, to this very breakdown in the pattern of our reserve training that these officers were appointed. How can we pass on any details, how can we say that a certain estimate of money for the training of reserve units should or should not be allowed when we cannot see the reports of the officers appointed to examine into this and to make their recommendations?

The idea that this is something confidential which should not be shown to the public is such nonsense that no such statement should have been made in this house. I cannot help going back to the time when there was not this pretence about the secrecy of recommendations. There was a very interesting report by Sir William Otter dated January 27, 1912. As those who have followed the training for some years will remember, General Otter was largely responsible for the reorganization of the reserve forces before the first world war. It was largely because of the fact that his recommendations were followed, his recommendation on a sixth divisional organization of balanced complement of infantry, cavalry, engineers and artillery, that it was possible for Canada to send the first division, not a division alone, but over 30,000 men, overseas no less than two months after the sudden and unexpected outbreak of that war. I would like to read the closing paragraph of that particular report by Sir William Otter. I might add that I am quoting from sessional paper number 35 of this house for the year 1913. The closing paragraph of that report is paragraph 197, and it reads as follows—but might I ask hon. members to listen to how up-to-date the wording sounds:

> Have not the plaudits awarded for a church or ceremonial parade lulled us into the belief that we are fit and capable for any military strain coincident with invasion, and in the continuance of that assumption, are we not encouraging a rude awakening some day, to find ourselves far short of such a consummation, with the result, irreparable loss?

Mr. Chairman, that was a warning at that time. The warning on that occasion was acted upon, fortunately for the capacity of this country to meet the test at a time when that contribution was extremely important.

The repetition by the minister of statements already made by every hon. member who has spoken, to the effect that our men on active service, in the permanent force, have a type of training which gives us reason for pride as does the manner in which they are conducting themselves, must not be allowed to divert the attention of any hon. members from the fact that the central feature of this discussion has been the reserve training which is recognized as the backbone of our defence and without which the forces now overseas or the forces in the permanent army, air force or navy could not hope to carry out their responsibilities.

Certainly it stirs us to speak with pride of these young Canadians. Those on this side of the chamber speak about it with just as much feeling, confidence and admiration as does anyone on the other side of this chamber. After all, there are members of the family of those on this side of the chamber as well as those on the other side who share that experience. There are a number of us who have had the privilege of visiting these establishments away from Canada and of seeing what is being done there. The very fact that we can produce units like that is all the more reason why we should decide to get down to brass tacks with regard to the reserve army.

Not one word the minister has said tonight has offered an answer or has given any explanation of the failure of the plans of this government, except one; and if that is the answer, then it is time the minister made another speech to outline completely new plans. What he said was—this is the only point on which he came close to reality with regard to the reserve army—that there is a different situation today from that which was in existence at the time the reserve or militia units, as they were then called, were really up to authorized strength. There is a different situation today. Let us make no mistake about that.

He said that the difference now is that we have a large regular force instead of the few thousand that there were at that time. That is true. We might also recall that this is a much more populous country today. We also might recall that the number of men in the actual service units is only a fraction of the figure that is constantly put before us of the total in the regular force. Let us grasp that fact. The number of young men in the permanent force who are actually in service units is only a fraction of the total that is put before us as the evidence of our contribution in this field. In fact, on the basis of any explanation given, it is still impossible to understand why we need such an enormous staff and training organization for the number we actually have. We are still waiting for some explanation of that situation.

I must say that there is one place where we do not fail, namely, in the spending of money. For instance, we have just learned that Canada is going to spend large sums on a military building in Washington. I do not know whether there is any arrangement by which we are going to have an army of occupation there. Certainly it is difficult to understand why we need to spend more than $2 million for a building down there unless we are contemplating a substantial movement to the United States of armed forces to be served by those who would be going there. Even at present rates you can build something fairly substantial for $2 million; and it is not likely that that figure will be the real one.

Mr. Chairman, not one explanation that has been given has gone to the core of this problem, namely that whatever plans are made should be realistic ones and that there is no reason why this country cannot maintain the reserve forces at the full strength now authorized. May I repeat that I am not saying it should be "at full service strength"; I am saying "at the full strength authorized by the Department of National Defence" and presumably at a figure that they believe will be in camp or will be trained locally. In fact, there could be no justification for carrying out this training on this basis unless that is the intention of the government.

Let us have some explanation of why we carry on with these ineffective plans. Let us find out why it is that there are these discrepancies. Let us know not that there are a number of tanks that can be seen lined up in the way the minister has described tonight. Let us have an answer to the explanation given by an experienced tank officer that there is wholly inadequate armoured training in this country at the present time. It is not tanks in mothballs that we want. It is armoured units trained to use the tanks. That is what we are not getting at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this committee should proceed to the detailed estimates until we have from the minister an answer that does not skirt around this vitally important problem of the training of the reserve and recruitment for the reserve. In spite of what has already been said, I also think we should have before us the report of the three officers who have considered this subject. In this matter I think hon. members opposite have the heaviest responsibility, because they are the ones who can demand it. I would urge them to consider the responsibility of every hon. member in this committee in passing on detailed estimates with regard to reserve training and other training when we do not get the report which every one of us knows deals with this very problem and which in itself may give the answer to this question.

I would hope that the minister would consider this matter over the week end—it is now eleven o'clock—and that when we meet on Monday he will have reconsidered the question of this report which justifies no such secrecy as that with which he is surrounding it. Moreover, I would hope that he will take us sufficiently into his confidence to justify the belief on the part of hon. members that they have at least the basic information required to approach these detailed items with some knowledge of the facts.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition has repeated once more what he said earlier and what was said by other hon. members. I repeat what I said, namely that it was my hope that we would have the consideration of this report sufficiently advanced that we could study the reserve army when we reach the details which appear at page 308 of the estimates. That is what I said and that is what appears in Hansard. I repeat it.

Mr. Drew: Does the minister now mean that we are going to get the whole report?

Mr. Claxton: No. Of course not.

Mr. Drew: We are going to get the report according to the revised version of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Claxton: What you are going to get is the decision of the department of the government.

Mr. Drew: Which tells us nothing.

Mr. Claxton: No, no. It just tells you what we have decided. We take the responsibility of acting on the advice. We take the responsibility of asking for the advice and I take the responsibility of not giving the source of information that is given to me, not on a confidential basis but what is actually marked "secret".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Every hon. member who is now applauding this evasion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Every hon. member who is now applauding this evasion is going to be asked—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: —to pass on these statements without any of the basic information, and we do not know whether or not that report is marked "secret".

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we have made good progress this week and I think we can make better progress next week. There is on Votes and Proceedings notice of a resolution having to do with the Public Service Superannuation Act. It will be called for His Excellency's signification of his consent on Monday and we would like to proceed with it on either Tuesday or Wednesday so as to have second reading and refer it to the banking and commerce committee for consideration on Thursday, if possible. Subject to that, the business on Monday and Tuesday will be as follows: Second reading of an act respecting inventions by public servants; the resolution with respect to crown corporations; second reading of an act to amend the Radio Act; second reading of an act to amend the National Harbours Board Act; second reading of an act to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act; the resolution with respect to disability pensions; continuation of the debate on second reading of an act to amend the Research Council Act.

When we conclude those items we shall take the budget resolutions, and if all this is concluded before Tuesday night we shall move to go into supply. On Wednesday it will be the intention to take the bills reported from the banking and commerce committee, namely, the Bank of Canada Act, an act respecting banks and banking and the Quebec Savings Banks Act. On Thursday and Friday we shall take interim supply to begin with and then the departments of transport, justice, secretary of state and agriculture.

Mr. Knowles: While we are on the business of the house, may I say a word or two. I hope that the leader of the house will not take it from the fact that we did not draw attention to the fact that it was ten o'clock sixty-five minutes ago that we will adopt the same attitude all next week. Some of us feel that if it is the desire to extend the length of the sitting day it should be done by a proper motion, and speaking for those of us in this group we would rather see that extension in the morning than at night.

Mr. Harris: I move that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 24, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

TRIBUTE ON OCCASION OF CELEBRATION OF BIRTHDAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, today the people of Canada are celebrating officially the birthday anniversary of our beloved sovereign lady, Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth. In this house we will be manifesting our devotion to Her Majesty by spending the day in further consideration of Her Majesty's business, but before we proceed to do that I would like to suggest, with the concurrence of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), with whom I communicated, that we mark the occasion by rising in our places and singing together "God Save the Queen".

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang

God Save the Queen

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Seventh report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Langlois (Gaspe).

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GENEVA CONFERENCE—STATEMENT TO BE MADE BY MINISTER

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will have noticed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is in his seat this afternoon. He returned to Ottawa late last night after what I understand was a long and rather fatiguing air journey, and he will be reporting to his colleagues at two o'clock tomorrow afternoon. We had hoped there might be a very early occasion arranged for reporting to the house at a time when the house would not have to be content with his report on what had taken place, but would have an opportunity of asking questions and discussing the matters involved in that report.

Thursday and Friday are to be devoted to the consideration of the estimates and we had hoped that the committee on external affairs would have made its report and that these estimates could be called on Thursday to provide an opportunity, in accordance with the rule, both for the report and for questions and discussion.

However, it has been found that Thursday would not suit the convenience of some hon. members who would be very much interested in the proceedings, and I would therefore suggest that we do that on Friday, and that as soon as the estimates are reported by the committee on external affairs they be referred back to the committee of the whole and called for consideration on Friday, when the minister would report on what took place while he was away at Geneva, and when there would be an opportunity for questions to be asked of the minister and for hon. members to take part in any discussion that might naturally flow from that report, and from the questions and answers.

[Later:]

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISARMAMENT DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When he reports to the house on Friday with respect to the meetings at Geneva, as indicated by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), will he also be in a position to report on the discussions on disarmament which took place at London and in which I believe he took part?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The discussions to which my hon. friend refers are discussions of a subcommittee of the disarmament committee taking place in London, as he has indicated. When that subcommittee was set up, it was agreed that those discussions should be held in private. As long as they are going on, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to report on their substance. They have been going on now for a fortnight and no public reports have been made by any members of the subcommittee. There will come a time, however—and I hope before long—when I shall be able to report on the result of these discussions. Eventually, of course, the subcommittee will report back to the main disarmament committee of the United Nations.

Mr. Martin:

Yes. Under the national health grants program the federal government has just decided to pay almost $1,700 to the province of Saskatchewan to cover the cost of bringing 20 nurses from strategically located areas in that province to Regina for an institute on the latest nursing care of chronic poliomyelitis patients. The funds also meet the cost of bringing a special highly skilled consultant in this field from Seattle. Mr. Bourget: Under the natural resources transfer agreement of 1930 the prairie provinces administer their fisheries, including hatchery services.

Stocking the North Saskatchewan river is, therefore, a matter of provincial responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE PAYMENT OF DEATH BENEFITS UP TO MAXIMUM OF $5,000

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act to provide for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of death benefits up to a maximum of five thousand dollars for the spouse, or the estate

(a) of a public servant,

(b) of a member of the regular forces,

or in certain circumstances,

(c) of a former public servant, or

(d) of a former member of the regular forces,

where the public servant, member of the regular forces, former public servant or former member of the regular forces has paid contributions into the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF MORE THAN ONE DEPUTY COMMISSIONER, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the appointment of more than one deputy commissioner and also to provide for the granting of pensions to certain officers and men not at present eligible.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

CLOSING OF LOBBIES TO BOXHOLDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Postmaster General whether any decision has been made generally effective to close lobbies in post offices where boxholders would normally have access to their boxes on Sundays and on any other days? If that is the case, does the decision also apply to other public holidays?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I am not aware of it. My hon. friend is asking a general question. I know I have considered particular cases. If my hon. friend will give me some more details with regard to the case he has in mind, I shall be glad to investigate it.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Postmaster General a supplementary question? From what he has told me, should I understand that if, in any particular case, a lobby is closed on Sunday, that would be only a particular case and not part of the general procedure laid down by his department?

Mr. Cote: No, Mr. Speaker; I did not say that. I cannot give a definite answer to a general question such as that asked by my hon. friend. We have to take into consideration the hours of work performed by the postmaster. The same cannot be said for all post offices all over the country. There might be some post office where the question that is asked might be considered. I shall be glad to discuss the question with my friend in that particular case.

Mr. Fulton: My point is this—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member for Kamloops that he could perhaps discuss this matter at further length when the estimates are before the house.

GRAIN

UNITED STATES SELLING POLICY—EFFECT ON CANADIAN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister's attention been drawn to "The Washington Story" by Shane MacKay in Friday's Winnipeg Free Press under the heading of "World Sale of Feed Stocks Gets Subsidy"? Can the minister indicate what effect this offering of these surplus stocks will have on Canadian prices of rye, oats and barley?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am aware of the fact that the United States have announced a policy of selling their coarse grains at world prices. It is difficult to assess the effect of this policy until we can be sure just what they mean by "world prices". We believe that we have been selling our coarse grain at world prices. If the United States simply dropped down to our prices, and if it is just a case of dropping down that far, the effect will not be serious. However, we dislike programs of subsidizing exports of any kind. All I can say is that we are watching the situation closely.

[Later:]

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a question supplementary to that of the hon. member for Mackenzie. Would the minister care to comment on the press report that bids for Canadian feed grain have been withdrawn as a result of the policy announced by the United States to which he referred?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have no knowledge as to whether or not bids have been withdrawn. I know we have sold an unusual amount of coarse grains within the last ten days, but whether recent bids have now been withdrawn I cannot say.

IMMIGRATION

CANADA'S ONE MILLIONTH IMMIGRANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Can the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration tell us whether Canada has received her millionth immigrant; and if so, who he or she was and from what country that person came?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): It is a fact that the one millionth post-war immigrant has arrived in Canada, but no one seems to know who he or she might be. I presume my hon. friend has been reading the press reports on this subject and feels obliged to ask about it. We did give some consideration as to whether or not we ought to recognize the one millionth immigrant. However, we felt that this was a continuing policy and that it would perhaps not do any particular good if we recognized one more than another. We feel that they are all good, all desirable and all welcome.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO RAISING OF MARKET QUOTAS IN WEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he in a position to say now what are the prospects of the market quotas for wheat being generally raised throughout the western provinces in order to provide additional cash for the farmers at this time of year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is possible at this time to speed up deliveries from the country. I am told that the outstanding orders for the forwarding of grain will take care of all points that have not as yet reached the five-bushel quota. Over and above the five-bushel quota, considerable progress is being made in bringing all points up to the seven-bushel quota. We believe that situation can be achieved in due course.

The difficulty is that we have a great preponderance of No. 2 northern wheat and there is a limit to the extent that we can block up our facilities in the east by filling them with No. 2 northern wheat. However, we now have a sufficient movement of No. 2 northern wheat to enable us to clean up the five-bushel quota points. I point out to hon. members that the specified acreage is about 70 million acres. On a seven-bushel quota that in itself will amount to a delivery of about 500 million bushels. The special quotas deliverable to coarse grains and for other purposes will raise that amount by at least another 50 million bushels. Hence after we reach the seven-bushel quota we shall be working on total deliveries of over 550 million bushels whereas the average deliveries over the past ten years have been about 510 million bushels.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REASONS FOR SITTING ON QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): In view of the appropriate remarks made by the Prime Minister at the opening of our sitting, I should like to direct this question to him. Will he inform the house as to the reasons why members of the House of Commons and not the Senate, the House of Commons staffs and not the Senate staffs, and the press employees in the building must carry on their normal duties on the day which commemorates the birthday of our Queen, in contravention of the normal practice of government and business on this day?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the proceedings of this house are regulated by the members of the house, and the same is true of the proceedings in the other place. I have been here now for several years and it has been my experience that when parliament was in session on the day fixed for the celebration of the sovereign's birthday this house manifested its devotion to the sovereign by continuing on that day to consider public business.

POWER

SAINT JOHN RIVER—REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? When may we expect the detailed report of the international joint commission which recently recommended in favour of a $200 million power development on the Saint John river basin?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The international joint commission reports to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and not to me. I have had a word with him about this question, and I think he would want to consult the chairman of the international joint commission before reporting to the house whether or not the report in question can be tabled.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT—LETTER FROM PREMIER OF SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received a communication in the last few days from the premier of Saskatchewan or the government of that province undertaking to accept responsibility for one-half of the cost of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project? If so, what consideration has been given to that suggestion?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The last communication from the premier of Saskatchewan of which I have any knowledge was, I think, on the 28th of April, and that is not quite the form the proposal from the government of Saskatchewan takes. It may be that some would be of opinion that what is involved in the portion of the work that the province would be prepared to undertake would amount to one-half of the cost of the whole power and irrigation project. I have not made that calculation. However, the proposal as submitted is still before the government for consideration and no decision has been arrived at. It has been under active consideration, and I hope it will not be long before we will be able to send a reply to the premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the fact that the press has made certain references to this letter as given out by the premier of Saskatchewan, would the Prime Minister care to table the letter received from him so that the facts will be clear from that letter?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think we would have any objection to the letter being tabled, but of course we would not do that without communicating with the premier of Saskatchewan to find out what his views about it might be. But I see no objection to publicity being given to the letter. As far as the federal government is concerned, the matter is one that has to be dealt with on the basis of the national interest of the whole country, and unless there were some reason, such as the letter being part of negotiations that may be varied, I would see no objection to its being made public. However, we would have to communicate with the premier of Saskatchewan before making it public because I personally would not consider that was the final word from the government of Saskatchewan about the project.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the Prime Minister would be prepared to table the government's letter to the premier of Saskatchewan whenever that letter is sent.

Mr. St. Laurent: That will depend upon certain considerations. If the two letters constitute a disposal of the question there would be no objection to making them public, but if they are part of negotiations that are still proceeding then it is usually preferable to wait until something final has developed before making all the stages public.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that apparently a summary was given out by the premier of Saskatchewan, and under those circumstances I would feel that, regardless of whether or not the letter was in the nature of negotiations, we should have the facts and realize what is taking place. Even if there were negotiations—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know this is a very important question, but there have been three questions and three replies. The hon. member is now making his own observations on the appropriateness of tabling part of the correspondence or all of the correspondence and so on. This is not in order at this time in our proceedings. There may be occasions when the hon. member may discuss this very point at great length. I am not suggesting that he should not, but not at this time. If the hon. member wishes to ask a supplementary question—

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege—and I speak on a question of privilege for the members of the house—this is a matter of importance, and the Prime Minister said that because negotiations might be going on—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After all, Mr. Speaker, you do not need that assistance.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister said that in view of the fact that negotiations were going ahead the communications might not be produced to the house under those circumstances. I submit that whether or not negotiations are going on is no justification for refusing to produce the documents.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member had said at the opening of his remarks that he was making them on a question of privilege I would have allowed him to proceed. At this moment, since he has made his statement, I think he will agree that we should now proceed with other business.

Mr. Ferguson: On a question of privilege, if we are going to delay important questions until later we may not have time to discuss them unless members of the house are willing to sit during July. Important questions should be discussed now.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

PUBLIC SERVANTS' INVENTIONS

PROVISION FOR OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT AND PAYMENT

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 444, respecting inventions by public servants.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister in mind adding to what he had to say at the resolution stage?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not really think there is anything to add to what was said at the resolution stage. The explanatory note puts very succinctly the purpose of the bill, which is to substitute a uniform legislative scheme for the various provisions on the subject contained at the present time in four different statutes. If I may have your permission to refer to the sections, Mr. Speaker, the principle of the bill, which is set out in the third section, is that under the three circumstances set out there inventions made by public servants shall be the property of the crown.

I believe, sir, that explains everything except what it would be more appropriate to explain in committee on the clauses of the bill.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I do not believe there is any reason for us, Mr. Speaker, to press the minister to make a statement at any greater length, although there are certain changes to be made by the bill that are quite far-reaching. It might have assisted the discussion if the minister had given us a general survey of their effect. However, I feel that although it may somewhat lengthen proceedings to do it that way, it can be done by discussion in committee. There is one observation I want to make and that is that, so far as my own study of the changes made now indicates, there would not appear to be in the legislation anything to which we would take vigorous exception. There are one or two points I should like to make when we have reached the appropriate sections.

There is, however, one point to which my remarks do not apply, and that concerns the power given to the governor in council to make rules of practice and procedure concerning appeals to the exchequer court. I mention that now lest it might be felt, from the fact we have not said anything about it, that we find the whole bill acceptable. However, since that is a point of detail, the appropriate time to raise the objection and press it will be in committee on the section. I shall reserve any further remarks until that stage.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I feel Mr. Speaker, that I should make a few observations on this bill at this time. You will recall that some time ago, during the introduction of an amendment to the Patent Act, I mentioned the situation of public servants who had invented something while employed by the crown and who had complained on many occasions of the treatment that had been accorded to them. For some time I thought this matter might not come up again because it could be considered by the royal commission studying the Patent Act in the near future. However, I can quite appreciate that this house can dispose of the question without consideration by the royal commission, and since the minister has elected to do so I should like to say a few words about the bill.

While it may be easy for some officials to understand, the house as a whole might not be so well informed as to the implications of the provisions of this bill. We are dealing with a patent which is a reward given to an inventor for having disclosed his invention to the public. In the ordinary course of events, Mr. Speaker, a patent is granted freely to any inventor in this country, provided he is the first inventor and makes a sufficient and proper disclosure. In the ordinary course of master and servant, the problems are not too difficult. The invention belongs to the servant, whether or not he has invented something on the time of the master, whether or not he has done so with the machines or tools of the master. The only thing the master usually gets, unless there is a specific contract, is an equity in the invention or the use of the invention for his own purposes, depending on the specific contract, and some benefits from the invention.

The relationship we are considering today, however, is that of the crown and crown employees. This makes the situation more difficult. As between an ordinary person and the crown, the crown can use the invention subject only to such award as might be made by the commissioner of patents. Now, the crown wishes to establish a proper relationship between the crown and the inventor who is a public servant, and that makes the situation quite complicated. The complication arises in view of the fact that the whole system of patents is based on the reward to an inventor for making his disclosure to the public, and because the intention of this bill is to put the servant of the crown, not in an inferior position but in a different position from that of the ordinary servant in relation to his master.

As I stated before, we are interested here in the relationship between the crown and its employees. The distinction being made in this bill, and an important one, is to define what inventions shall belong to the crown and what inventions shall not. The definition, therefore, that may be given in the bill will be of great importance. I quite appreciate that the purpose of this bill, generally speaking, is to cover certain specific cases in which inventors, who are servants of the crown, made inventions while they were employees of the crown and have not acknowledged their inventions to the departmental minister. The provisions of this bill should not be made so strict as to discourage civil servants from giving of their best, so that the public at large may get the benefit.

Inventions by Public Servants

The provisions in our act now are rather stringent. Broadly speaking, we have a provision in the Patent Act, that is section 47, which states:

> Every patent granted in respect of an invention made by a person while employed in the public service of Canada, and relating to the nature of his employment is . . . subject to the following conditions:

Generally speaking, the conditions are that the crown is declared to have an interest, and that any royalties derived from the said patent will be divided between the servant and the crown. There is another important provision which may not appear in this bill, covered by subsection 4 of section 47, which says:

> Nothing herein contained shall be construed to restrict the right of the inventor to the full enjoyment of his invention outside of Canada.

Now, that is the general situation of an inventor who is a servant of the crown. There is also, however, the National Defence Act, Atomic Energy Control Act and the Research Council Act, which specifically cover the employees of these departments, and which contain stringent regulations. I believe that is understandable because these employees, by their duties, are inventors for the crown. Those acts specifically state that any invention by employees working under those acts belongs to the crown. I thought I should mention those facts in order to illustrate that this situation is not new.

There are broad provisions in the Patent Act covering civil servants, and specific provisions in the other acts covering servants of the crown who are research men. The point now, then, is to find out what is the appropriate course to follow. As I understand it, the government would like to have more uniform legislation on the subject. As I said before, however, the rights and benefits accruing to public servants should not be fettered or reduced so as to discourage them from making further inventions in the public interest. The most important element is that any invention that is not of a type relating to the employment of the civil servant should not be restricted by this bill. This bill should set forth in absolute terms the inventions to which the crown shall have an absolute right, but I am hoping that this definition will release all public servants who are not, by the nature of their employment, directed towards improving and devising new methods, articles or processes. That is the most important part. As I said before, I have no quarrel with restrictions being imposed on people who, from the nature of their employment, are research men.

The second important part, no doubt, is the protection of the rights of any public servant against delays by the minister in deciding whether an invention is or is not of a class which the crown claims to own. An inventor, whoever he may be, should have the right to apply for his patent in Canada. He probably would not go to the expense of doing so if he thought the patent should belong to the crown. But, in any event, any delay in filing an application would be prejudicial in establishing prior conception rights and protecting treaty rights involved in the invention, whether to the crown or to the public servant himself.

I have already mentioned to the minister that the inventor, who is a civil servant, a public servant, might not be restrained from filing an application as soon as he desires.

Another point involved in a patent matter of course is the use of the invention abroad. It is doubtful if the ordinary gratuity which would be granted a civil servant would really cover the value of his invention for use abroad; and in this case under the present bill as I understand it the crown would have the right to the invention the world over. That is understandable. But I wish to point out that it would be hardly fair for the crown to hold the right to inventions universally and not to exercise its right to take out patents in other countries without giving the opportunity within the required time to the inventor to do so.

Perhaps hon. members know that most countries require that application be filed in another country within one year of the filing date in Canada. So if the crown elects not to file the application outside of Canada after the year, we would simply be giving the benefit of the invention to other countries for nothing, whereas we probably would be in a position to charge royalties to our own people within this country. I am sure the minister will bear this point in mind.

I do not wish to deal in detail with the matter of compensation. Under the present statute, in the Patent Act, the right of the ordinary public servant is preserved. There has been no complaint about that and, I believe, there have been no serious difficulties. The public servant is entitled to share his royalty with the crown in accordance with the decision of the commissioner of patents.

I do not know what benefits have accrued to inventors under the other statutes—the National Defence Act, the Research Council Act and the Atomic Energy Control Act.

These matters have not been made public, and I do not know how satisfied or dissatisfied employees are. But apparently they must be satisfied because there has been no mention, at least publicly, of their dissatisfaction. In any event, there is also the fact that people who are not affected by those acts seem to have been satisfied by the supervisory provisions of the Patent Act, as set out under section 46.

These, therefore, are the general problems involved in the bill. The other acts which deal with other departments are well directed, and it is difficult to associate inventions of ordinary inventors with inventors who are of the research type. I wish the house to bear in mind that under a bill of this kind a cleaner or a stenographer, a physicist or a medical doctor would all be treated in the same way. They would all have to submit their inventions to their ministers, of whatever nature such inventions might be, before filing application. And such filing could not be made without the consent of the minister.

That is why I stated in the beginning that any delay caused by the decision of the minister might have serious consequences for the inventor who invented something of a type which the crown should not hold.

Another point that should be kept in mind is that if the provisions of this bill are carried through, necessarily there will have to be an organization to carry out the provisions properly. It cannot be done haphazardly. There should be a central authority to decide which patents are of a type belonging to the crown. Such authority should decide the type of invention which must be retained by the crown or given back to the inventor. That same authority should decide what gratuity there should be, and also should take appropriate action through a patent solicitor to patent the invention either in Canada or throughout the world, and also to defend lawsuits or to take lawsuits or legal action, wherever necessary. That is, in effect, putting ourselves in the patent business.

While I do not wish to deal with this question in detail, it does bring up a very tricky subject. There are definite facts and opinions on both sides as to whether the crown, once it has expended public money on research, should hold a patent and collect royalties from those who exploit the patent for commerce, or whether it should simply give the benefit freely to the people, and let the inventor have his benefits outside, if he can.

As I said before, I do not wish to take the time to discuss that problem at length. Just the same, however, it does involve the question as to whether the crown, as such, should go into the business of holding, maintaining and licensing patents. Obviously it is done under the Research Council Act. Probably it can operate in certain circumstances. And since the matter is not involved here I will not discuss it further.

However, if this bill is to be implemented properly, then a proper organization should be established. At present the departments apply through different solicitors for their own patents. They have different methods of doing it. It might be that, in the opinion of those who are looking forward to proper development, the patent office in time should have a staff equipped to settle all these problems, and that the commissioner of patents, as he does under the old act, should have to settle what inventions belong to the crown, what gratuity should be allowed, and say who should apply for patents in the right of the crown. These of course are matters for regulation and are not matters known to those who are discussing the bill.

In conclusion I have only one further point to make. As I said earlier, I do not know how employees of the government feel about this bill. I have no reason to believe that they are not satisfied; I have no way of knowing that. However, I do appreciate the desirability of protecting the interests of the crown in respect of inventions which are directly connected with the kind of employment carried on by public servants. At the same time I am interested in protecting the ordinary individual who, while employed by the crown, develops an invention which is not of that type. I am also interested in servants of the crown who have invented new processes or new articles of manufacture or new compositions of matters which are related to their employment. I should like to see them get a proper gratuity. That is another important point.

If I have searched too deeply I apologize to the house; but since this subject matter is germane to my usual calling I thought I should bring those matters to the attention of the house. I have no doubt that the minister will appreciate that in doing so I am trying to assist him.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): I think I ought to say just two words about what the hon. member for Ottawa East has just said, particularly about one of the points he has made. There is no desire whatsoever on the part of the government to abridge the rights of public servants as citizens any more than is necessary to protect what under the principle of this bill are felt to be the appropriate rights of the crown.

My hon. friend drew my attention to the fact that one subsection of section 4 of this bill did appear to go beyond that point, and I thought I ought to indicate now, before we go into committee, that when we go into committee I propose to ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment to that section which will leave to public servants the right to file an application for a patent in Canada without the consent of the minister, so that there will be no excuse for saying that the government or the minister is delaying the filing of the applications. It does seem to me that lawyers sometimes, if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will permit me to say so, are a little excessive as draftsmen in their desire to accomplish the objects of some of our legislation, and it seemed to me that this was one case where we could indicate right away that they appeared to have gone a little further than was strictly necessary.

Mr. Fulton: I hope the minister understands that this will be taken down and used against him or against the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Ottawa East has perhaps more experience with patents than any other member of the house, or at least as much, and we are all grateful to him for the interesting and thoughtful contribution which he has made to the consideration of this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Definitions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister give the committee some statistics showing the number of inventions that have been made in the last three years by servants or officials of the crown? What has been paid by way of remuneration, compensation or reward to such servants? In particular, what has been the largest and the smallest payment?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think I can answer that question precisely as the hon. member asked it. I do not think there exist in any one place details as to the number of inventions by public servants because, under the present legislation, there would be no particular incentive for keeping them in that way.

On the question of compensation for those inventions that are vested in the crown, I have some information that I think I can give to the committee that would pretty well answer the question. Under Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, inventions are all handled by a crown company called Canadian Patents and Development Limited, and I am advised that this company received $679.50 from royalties in 1952 and has had no payment since. Because the royalties have been so small and have not been regular, no system of paying inventors for inventions has been established. It is pretty obvious why this is so. In the case of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, nearly all their inventions are secret and there is almost no way in which they can be commercially exploited. That is not quite universally true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister the record from the other departments?

Mr. Pickersgill: I was coming to the research council. The present procedure in the research council is that a regular bonus or royalty is payable to the inventor, which may not exceed 5 per cent of royalties received from the invention. I understand there is some uncertainty as to whether that rather rigid rule is really desirable, or whether there should not be a little more consideration given to the real merits of individual cases. During the two-year period from April 1, 1952, to March 31, 1954, the council paid out a total of $1,480.44 to nine different inventors in accordance with the regulations. I am just advised that the complete figures from 1949 to 1954 are $9,914.01. Therefore no great fortunes are being made by these inventors.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the largest?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am informed that the largest amount is about $3,500. I have some information about the Department of National Defence. The amounts in all these cases are very small.

Mr. Fulton: Are these the royalties or awards?

Mr. Pickersgill: These are the awards.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly they do not get much reward.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the case of the research council and atomic energy which are the most considerable, they represent about 5 per cent net of what the royalties would have been. Up to now no very great sums have been involved. I am informed that during the fiscal year April 1, 1953, to March 31, 1954, in the Department of National Defence a total of $425 was paid in awards to five inventors, two of these being co-inventors. The awards ranged from $50 to a maximum of $200.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hope that when this bill is passed the awards will be different from what they have been in the past, because those awards are picayune and certainly they are no incentive to an individual to maintain the law. Under the section in question, which we are not dealing with at the moment, it is provided that there shall be a penalty of $500 for failure of a public servant to give notice to the minister of an invention. Certainly the awards so far would not indicate that reward for incentive that public servants have a right to expect; for after all they are making a tremendous sacrifice. Many of those scientists are making a tremendous sacrifice, and an award not exceeding $3,000 in one case, and apparently many smaller awards of a few dollars to an individual, are scarcely in keeping with the rewards that a public servant would receive if he were not in the public service.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word about that. After all, most of these inventions are made by people in the research council who may not be getting much reward for the incidental inventions which they make; they are being provided with really quite remarkable facilities for the development of their own potentialities by the taxpayers of Canada and with facilities for doing their own work on a scale which, had it existed when I was an undergraduate, would have been very tempting to me.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I can appreciate what the minister has just said, but we are talking now about the research council and the nature of the research council. The statute as it exists now is absolute and states that any invention belongs to the research council with the provision that gratuities will be paid by the council. However, apparently the system as regards awards and dividends depends on what profits can be made from the marketing of the invention. That comes back to the original point I raised in the latter part of my speech a few moments ago. There surely would not be much purpose in speaking about awards or gratuities for civil servants on inventions made while they are employees of the crown, because I do not think that if the award is based on a percentage of the profits made by the crown organization in exploiting patents such profits could not be very large, and it certainly goes against my principles that the crown should exploit such patents. The crown grants patents, and that it should exploit something which it grants is something about which I am not too happy. However, I hope that this new bill when enforced will bring about a different attitude to the whole system, and that awards will be based on the contribution made by the inventor to the development of research or public manufacture in Canada so that if the crown does not see fit to exploit a patent the inventor shall not lose and will not gain any less than he might have gained under the present system in regard to the Patent Act. As I said before, I am not surprised that the amount is not greater because it is based on a system of net profit and I should not expect that the net profit of the exploitation of the crown patent could be very large.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Interpretation.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, paragraph (b) defines department, and the effect of that, of course, is to provide that a public servant engaged in any department defined according to the act shall come within the scope of the act with respect to the inventions he makes. Now, "department" is defined under this paragraph as follows:

> (b) "department" means a department as defined in the Financial Administration Act, and includes a crown corporation named in schedule C to that act;

Under the Financial Administration Act department means:

> (i) any of the departments named in schedule A,
> (ii) any other division or branch of the public service of Canada including a commission appointed under the Inquiries Act, designated by the governor in council as a department for the purposes of this act,
> (iii) the staffs of the Senate, the House of Commons, and the library of parliament, and > (iv) any corporation named in schedule B;

It will be noted therefore that under the definition of department given in this bill the departments which are contained in schedules A and B and C of the Financial Administration Act are departments for the purposes of this bill plus any such independent board or commission the governor in council may designate under the Financial Administration Act. But by and large, the effect of that is that none of the departments or agencies mentioned under schedule D of the Financial Administration Act come within the terms of this bill. I would like to know what reason there can be for leaving out schedule D, because under that schedule there are included such agencies as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited, and so on, and various other agencies which are commonly designated as crown corporations.

Now, the employees of these corporations are not going to come within the terms of the bill even though the inventions they made actually come within the scope of their employment and are made with facilities provided by the corporation. Such employees will not be covered under this Public Servants Inventions Act, whereas an invention made by an employee of, let us say, Canadian Arsenals, the federal district commission or the Park Steamships company would be inside the purview of this bill. I cannot see why an employee of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to take an example, who makes a discovery or an invention with respect to television or broadcasting with facilities provided by the corporation should not be covered in the same way as an employee of any of the other ones named under schedule C such as Defence Construction Limited, or the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation though I do not suppose an employee of that corporation would make an invention. However, the same thing might be said with respect to the Trans-Canada Air Lines where an employee might make an invention with facilities provided by his employer. If it is fair to include one, I do not see why the other should not be included and I hope the minister can give us an explanation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the explanation is that these companies under schedule D are companies whose employees are not public servants. They have budgets of their own and they manage their own affairs and they may, like any private corporation, have some arrangement of their own with the employees who may make inventions; but such employees are in no sense public servants and are therefore not included.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think the minister has dealt with the point adequately. Here I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa East that while it is desirable that inventors should have facilities provided by the crown and in accordance with their employment with the crown, it is also desirable that the crown should be protected. Nevertheless, I think it is necessary to be fair to the inventor. While it is true that some of the corporations named in schedule D are separate corporations and have their own budgets and so on, it is not correct to say that none of them are supported by public funds, because I think the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which receives funds directly from the taxpayers of Canada through excise tax payments on the purchase of radio sets and appliances, which device was adopted within the last year to provide an alternative method to the annual grant which parliament used to offer the corporation, most certainly receives a very substantial portion of its revenue from the public through payment of taxes, as distinct from Polymer which is now a self-sustaining corporation and obtains its revenue through the sale of its products. I do not want to pick any corporation out in particular, but the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation occurs to me as the best example of the sort of thing I have in mind, and I cannot see why an employee of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is a corporation supported directly by the taxpayers of Canada, should not have the same advantage with respect to the invention he may make as that afforded to employees of the other corporations named under schedules A, B, and C of the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think I can answer the hon. member very easily on that point, particularly on that example. Parliament in its wisdom passed a statute in 1936 called, I believe, the Canadian Broadcasting Act, and it established a corporation which was to be managed and operated by a board of governors and to have employees of its own quite independent of the government. Whether it derives its capital from one source or from another, its employees are not public servants and none of the laws applying to public servants applies to it. It was felt that an act of this kind which deals with what are, by definition, public servants should not be extended beyond the people who are defined as public servants. Moreover, I am not at all sure—I have no knowledge of what the practice is in the C.B.C.—that, like many corporations, it may not have arrangements with its employees about inventions, as many large corporations have. Whether they have any advantage over public servants or not, I am not now in a position to say; but I would greatly doubt it.

Mr. Fulton: That last fact hardly seems to me to apply because if it is going to be argued that one reason why it is not necessary to include them within this bill is that they have arrangements with their employees, one could make the same argument and say that the other crown corporations which are included need only make arrangements with their employees, and then they should also be exempted from the bill. I do not think the minister's argument there has any application to the particular circumstance. The fact is that these corporations are recognized and included in a schedule for the purpose of the Financial Administration Act. So they are recognized in the Financial Administration Act as crown corporations. It is nonsense to say that because they are employed in self-sustaining public corporations they are not public servants, because they are in the public service in very important respects, particularly those who, as I have pointed out, in the C.B.C. are employed by a corporation whose activity is in large measure directly financed by the taxpayer. Therefore, I should like to see the minister amend the act so as to include at least some of these corporations in schedule

D. On the other hand, I suppose that if it is possible that the employees of these corporations may receive, by being omitted, advantage which is not granted to the employees of these corporations which are included, then the pressure and agitation on the part of the employees themselves who feel themselves discriminated against, if there should be such discrimination, will eventually result in a new look being taken at the matter. I think it might save time to do it now; but, having made my point, I will not press it further.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Inventions vested in Her Majesty.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I am thinking of the definition:

> The following inventions, and all rights with respect thereto in Canada or elsewhere, are vested in Her Majesty in right of Canada, namely,
> (a) an invention made by a public servant
> (i) while acting within the scope of his duties or employment, . . .

I want to suggest to the minister that that language might be good if it is properly interpreted, but what I was trying to say in my remarks a while ago—and I want to repeat it—is that it is made clear that it is not just the fact that the civil servant is employed by the government that is to be considered but the fact that he is doing something which is related to the type of work he is carrying on for the crown. For example, if a typist should invent something with regard to a typewriter, it should not mean that the crown should have the right to that invention with regard to a typewriter because she operates a typewriter. But some smart fellow might come along and say that it is related to the scope of her employment because she types and it has to do with a typewriter. I think it would perhaps be better to state that by the invention made by a public servant is meant the invention which is within the scope of his duties or employment.

The only other remark I want to make is with regard to paragraph (b) which I think is almost a repetition of paragraph (a) (i) and which reads:

> (b) an invention made by a public servant that resulted from or is connected with his duties or employment.

However, what I am interested in is to bring to the attention of the minister paragraph (a) (i). I should like to be sure that it is clear that the inventions covered are those which are within the scope of the duties or employment of a crown employee.

Mr. Pickersgill: On this particular point, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. The hon. member spoke to me the other day. I have examined the various provisions of the statutes that, if the house approves, are being repealed by this bill. I find that the actual phrase used here is one that is used in the National Defence Act. I do not say that fact gives it any greater sanctity than the phrase used in any other act. I sought legal advice which I, not being a lawyer, certainly need on the point, and it was pointed out that if we use some such phrase as "related to his employment" rather than "acting within the scope of his employment" there might be a slight difference. For example, you might take the precise definition of a technician at the national research council which states that he is to do such and such and so and so under the direction of the man he is working for. He would have access over a long period of time to the know-how in a particular field and he might well be the last link in a long chain and he might be, in a technical sense, the inventor though in fact he had really little to do with the development of an important process. If the courts looked at this thing they might say that was not related to his employment. He was employed as a technician. It might even be a stenographer, if I may take the example used by my hon. friend—a really intelligent stenographer such as they would have at the national research council or as they would have to have—and who might, through long familiarity with the thing, just see a particular point that would be of some consequence and would affect a whole process. In a great many of these processes, one single invention, as I understand it—and heaven knows I am no inventor—or one single process in a complicated series of processes that make up modern industrial articles may not in itself be very important. But if the crown did not own that one particular invention and owned all the rest of the processes, it might be useless to everyone. It was therefore thought that this particular language would cover a case such as those I have just mentioned a little bit better than would the other. That is the only point.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I quite appreciate the fact that the minister had something more in mind than to cover the case of the stenographer who was familiar with the subject, but that would be covered by paragraph (b); "that resulted from or is connected with his duties or employment". I am thinking more of paragraph (a) (i), and how to make it more specific. Of course I am sure that a court will take a much narrower view of what is a public invention or a crown invention than some of us would. I think the principle must at all times be that of legislating in favour of the inventor and not in favour of the employer, whether it is the crown or someone else.

Mr. Fulton: On this section, Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a point. The opening general words of section 3 vest a right to the invention in the crown. The words are as follows:

> The following inventions, and all rights with respect thereto in Canada or elsewhere, are vested in Her Majesty in right of Canada, . . .

—whereas previously with respect to public servants, except those covered by the National Defence Act, the Research Council Act and the Atomic Energy Control Act, rights to inventions of public servants outside of Canada were left to the public servant. I think the point was made earlier by the hon. member for Ottawa East in his general remarks, but I have a note to raise it at this time under section 3. Will the minister tell us why it was considered to be desirable and advisable to take away from public servants, other than those in the three corporations mentioned where the reasons were perhaps obvious, rights to inventions outside of Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. I think the reason is this. If there is to be uniformity, and I think it is desirable that there should be uniformity, it does not seem to me, because someone is employed in the bureau of mines in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys rather than by the national research council, that, where he is given comparable facilities in every way, he should have greater rights than someone employed in the research council or in the atomic energy control board or, even more, in the Department of National Defence. It seems to me whatever the standard is it should be the same for all of these, if I may hazard the term, genuine public servants. I think my hon. friend's difficulty may arise from this point which occurred to me when I first read the bill, that this seems to be taking away something that might have been thought by us to belong, and which legally did belong, to public servants. But when it is remembered that the inventions covered by this section are only those which are invented as the result of employment or with facilities provided by the crown or in the way that all of us seem to have been agreed, by accepting the principle of the bill, should belong to the crown, and that all other inventions that any public servant may make belong to him, it does not seem to me at all unreasonable that the crown should retain the rights abroad as well as at home which we say should belong to it anyway.

Mr. Fulton: There is an interesting point there. The minister has used an argument here which he rejected a few minutes ago in connection with an earlier section on the question of whether other crown corporations should not also be included. He said then that they were not the same type of corporation, that they did not stand in the same relationship, and that therefore they should not be included under the act. Now he says that they are going to make things the same for everybody so that the person working on highly secret work in the national research council or the Department of National Defence will be in exactly the same position as a person working on ordinary everyday matters in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

I do not think the minister should be allowed to have it two ways. He must decide which way he wants to take it. I point out to him that under subsection 4 of section 47 of the Patent Act it was well understood and contemplated that the rights within Canada to inventions made by public servants within the scope of their employment belong to the crown.

Mr. Pickersgill: The crown has an interest in them.

Mr. Fulton: That was well understood. Perhaps I will modify it. Under that provision the inventor did not have exclusive rights to the use of that invention in Canada but he did have exclusive rights to the use of it outside of Canada even though it was an invention made in the course of his employment and with facilities provided by the public. The relevant words are:

> Nothing herein contained shall be construed to restrict the right of the inventor to the full enjoyment of his invention outside of Canada.

That cannot be held to be in any way an oversight or accident. That is a conscious piece of draftsmanship.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite.

Mr. Fulton: In other words, at that time it was thought proper to give to the inventor exclusive and full rights outside of Canada even though the invention was made in the course of his employment. I am wondering what reversal of thinking has taken place and what is the basis of it that has resulted in this change of position?

Mr. Pickersgill: If you have four statutes containing four different ways of doing things and you want to substitute one that is uniform for all, then obviously you have got to make some changes in some of the others. It was just a question of choosing what criteria would be applied in order to get a uniform provision.

Mr. Fulton: Would it not be in order to say: "except with respect to public servants in the national research council, atomic energy control board and the Department of National Defence, nothing herein shall be deemed to take away the right to full enjoyment outside of Canada"? There would not be anything very difficult about that. That would merely carry forward the present situation. We are not asking for any change.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course that would be possible. This is one of those cases where, as the gentleman said who failed to invite his father-in-law to his wedding, you have got to draw the line somewhere.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who was the father-in-law?

Mr. Pickersgill: The putative father-in-law. This is the point. The hon. gentleman has said that we might have made a distinction between people employed by the Department of National Defence, the atomic energy control board and the research council on the one hand and other public servants on the other. There is a broad distinction now in the law which we are seeking to remove. That is the main purpose of this legislation. It would be manifestly unjust not to remove it. After all, the hon. member assumes that all inventions that might be made by the employees of these three organisms would be secret. He imported that consideration into the bill though in fact it is not there at all.

There are over 100,000 men in the armed forces to whom the National Defence Act, as it now stands, applies. It does not matter what kind of invention they make as long as it comes within these categories, the act applies.

Mr. Fulton: It is perfectly obvious the purpose of that extra restriction was to cover the secret nature of the work.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose the distinction might have been made between what was secret and what was not, but it was decided by the government, after careful consideration of all the alternatives that have been mentioned by the hon. member for Kamloops and quite a number of others that have not yet been referred to, that this was the fairest way to do the thing. It is true that there could be cases where an employee in a department like mine, for example, where no facilities of any kind are provided for the stimulation of invention and that sort of thing, might invent something. He might invent something having to do with medals or decorations.

Mr. Knowles: Yours is the department of political inventions.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I doubt that.

Mr. Fulton: There is plenty of stimulation there.

Mr. Pickersgill: But there are a good many other departments of the government, and I mentioned particularly the department of my hon. friend, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I could equally have mentioned the department of the Minister of Agriculture or the department for which I happen to have very temporary responsibility at the moment, the Department of Fisheries. A good deal of public money is provided for these departments for the express purpose of research and that sort of thing, and it does seem to me it would be manifestly unfair to continue to apply a different set of rules to them from those applied to the research council. Things that exist may sometimes be allowed to go on existing, but when you are making a change like this I suggest it would not be proper to continue one regime for the national research council and the atomic energy control board and a different regime for other departments such as I have mentioned.

So far as inventions are concerned, we are trying as far as possible to protect all public servants. In a sense this is a liberalizing measure as far as the national research council, the atomic energy control board and the defence department are concerned, because we are now making it clear that any inventions made by any of their employees that are quite without the scope of their employment and not done with public money belong to them.

Mr. Fulton: It is clear this is not merely, as it were, an incidental consequence of the legislation but is a change that was designed and is being carried out as a matter of conscious policy?

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite.

Mr. Fulton: The restriction of the rights to the invention outside of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite.

Mr. Fulton: That is also a matter of conscious policy?

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I should like to say a few more words on this subject because a while ago the minister said, in answer to the hon. member for Kamloops, that after all these were crown inventions, that under the bill we were making them crown inventions. But in the ordinary relationship between master and servant the master, the crown, was not, in the past, owner of a patent because the inventor happened to be working for the crown. We are establishing the principle here that if a person is an employee of the crown and invents something within the scope of his employment—I hope this is within the scope of my ideas—the invention belongs to the crown. That is something that is very liberal, if you want to call it that, because it is much more than was ever done before. Now, the hon. member says that research council employees should not feel bad and that we should restrict the rights of inventors in other departments in the same way. Of course, another way of answering the minister and his story would be to invite everybody to the wedding. In other words, we should liberalize the clauses of the Research Council Act, the Atomic Energy Control Act and the National Defence Act, and thus liberalize the treatment of all inventors to give them rights to their inventions outside of Canada in the same way as all other employees had under the Patent Act.

The thing I want to bring to the attention of hon. members is that all these little amendments are amendments to statutes that are technical in nature, but they have a purpose. I do not believe we are through dealing with the question of patents for crown employees. I feel that the matter will come up later. I do not think this is the answer, and I had hoped we would take some time before we came to a decision about this bill.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Duties of inventor.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is an amendment to clause 4. I wonder whether my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce would move the following amendment:

That the word "outside" be substituted for the word "in" before "Canada" and that "or elsewhere" be stricken from paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of clause 4.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: It would then read:

shall not file outside Canada an application . . .

Mr. Fulton: I should like to suggest an amendment to the amendment. I am trying to be helpful. I believe it would be clearer if it were in the following form:

That the words "in Canada or elsewhere" be deleted where they appear in line 15, and the following substituted therefor, "outside Canada."

[Mr. Richard (Ottawa East).]

I think that would make it clearer.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very happy to accept the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. Fulton: If the Minister of Trade and Commerce would accept the suggestion, and move that amendment?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall be happy to do so.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 9—Administration and control of inventions.

Mr. Fulton: The effect of clause 9 is to vest in the appropriate minister the administrative duties of the development or exploiting of any patent issued with respect to an invention made by a public servant. I would point out that these obligations and duties were previously imposed on the commissioner of patents under section 47 of the Patent Act. In other words, previously the situation was that where a public servant made an invention in the scope of his employment and a patent was issued, it was up to the commissioner of patents to determine and to take responsibility for the exploitation of that patent.

Now, as I say, those duties are all to be given to the appropriate minister. Reference was made to this in general terms by the hon. member for Ottawa East on the motion for second reading. He said he felt it would be necessary, in order to implement the bill in its present form, to set up an organization to take responsibility for the exploitation of patents, the registration of those patents overseas, and so on. It does seem to me that there is some point to what the hon. member for Ottawa East has said; otherwise you may get a multiplicity of methods, and perhaps duplication of effort. I make this simply as a suggestion, and I wonder whether it would not be more feasible to leave the administrative responsibility for the development and exploitation of patents, in so far as the technical side is concerned, under the commissioner of patents as it is now by section 47. In other words, we could reproduce, with the necessary consequential amendment, section 47 of the Patent Act, rather than change the system as is being done by clause 9 of this bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, sir, the reason it is done in the way suggested here is that in the drafting of this bill consideration was given primarily to those areas where inventions were most likely to occur, that is in the research council, atomic energy and the Department of National Defence. Actually, the duties of the commissioner of patents were not to exploit and develop. He really did very little but adjudicate. The crown did not own these patents under the Patent Act, but simply had an interest in them. The patents are now being vested in the crown. The place where the crown has had experience is primarily in relation to the research council, and to a somewhat lesser extent in national defence. The Minister of Defence Production has had some practical experience in the administration of these matters so I am going to ask him to say a word to the committee about the reason why it is considered desirable to do it this way.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I had some experience, Mr. Chairman, with the exploitation of patents in connection with the research council, both during the last war and following the war. There were some patents developed that had commercial value, and applications were made to the government by industry to grant the use of those patents under a royalty arrangement. It was thought worth while to set up a crown company to handle the patents owned by the government, and that was done. Some of these patents are now under a royalty arrangement with certain firms, to some extent.

The reason I think that each minister should be responsible for the exploitation of patents developed in his own department is that he has there advice that is required as to the value of the patent, as to whom should go the credit for the development. If we were to start a competition within a department to see who can claim a particular patent, I think that approach might lead to serious difficulty. At one stage it was suggested that perhaps the right to appeal to the courts should be given. In an institution that is really organized to develop new inventions, such as the research council or Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, I think hon. members can see that system would lead to chaos. But if the minister of the department is to be responsible for seeing that the proper rewards go to the proper people, and that proper arrangements are made for exploiting a patent on behalf of the government, then I think that is the fairest way of handling the situation.

Mr. Drew: I think there is a question that arises in connection with this matter. I had hoped that perhaps the right hon. gentleman who has just spoken might have enlightened us in connection with it. It is quite possible that, with all the excellent research work that has been done here, there have only been a few cases where the terms of rigid secrecy could of necessity apply to an invention. Undoubtedly there have been some.

I believe the right hon. gentleman was present at a time when Sir Robert Watson-Watt described, in a most interesting way, the rather unusual circumstances under which the Germans obtained information regarding the invention of the jet engine, and that actually the German government had instituted experiments at government level before the British government had—despite the fact that the jet engine was invented by a young R.A.F. officer named Whittle. I must say that when I heard his remarks on that subject I was tremendously impressed by the fact that every government has a great responsibility, not only to assure that inventions which may be the result of research work either by government employees or by military, naval or air experts should become the property of the crown, under fair conditions and terms, but also that there should be some protection against the possibility of what occurred in that particular case.

As the right hon. gentleman has every reason to know, there was some surprise that toward the end of the war there were Heinkel and Messerschmitt aircraft operating with jet engines of comparable quality, or perhaps in some cases even better quality than the British machines which had been developed from the original British patent.

This is no reflection upon the inventor. It certainly is no reflection on the loyalty and good faith of those sorely pressed and extremely conscientious men who did not see the possibilities of that new invention. It is not very often that a Whittle invents a jet engine or a Watson-Watt invents radar. Nevertheless these things do occur.

I wonder if this is not something that should be under wider discretion than the discretion of a single minister in whose department such inventions might arise. The right hon. gentleman and I have not always agreed on every detail of matters that have come up in the house, but I do recognize his very wide contact with inventions and the handling of these inventions, and I know how readily he will admit that it is difficult to judge in advance the full possibilities of some invention which, at the moment, might seem to be of a radical character, such as the jet engine was at the time it came forward.

Men whose minds were engaged with the immediate problem of defence and the immediate problem of getting engine production felt that this was such a wide departure from the ordinary propellor-driven engine that their minds apparently simply did not grasp the fact that the jet engine ushered in a new era in air transportation.

I place before the minister the suggestion that consideration should be given to some provision for an interdepartmental committee, or some such committee, that would assure that on the one hand there would be adequate exploitation or development of a new invention and, on the other hand, that an invention which is obviously of a highly secret nature and of peculiar value to our own defence, and that of our associates, should under no circumstances be patented, as was the jet engine, in a way that would leave it open to possible enemies.

In saying this I hope no one will suggest that there is any hint of any reflection on any individual minister. We do not know what minister happened to deal with this problem. But, with that example before us of what has occurred, I place this suggestion before him and would like to hear his observations with respect to it.

If he does agree, in general, then I suggest that section 9 should stand so that consideration could be given to a wider supervision of these patents, and to an assurance that patents in such circumstances will not be filed for application, so that they may not become available to possible enemies of this country.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the first precaution to take is to make sure that every patentable idea developed within the public service be patented in the name of the crown. And to that end we have a crown corporation known as Canadian Patents and Development Limited, which has been functioning for the last four or five years. It has officers who are experienced in patent matters, and has the services of a good patent lawyer. Its duty is to make sure that any patentable idea is patented in the name of the crown. And of course it is the duty of that corporation to make sure that the use of the patent is not granted in any way that could possibly be a danger to the crown.

Perhaps in connection with jet engine development there was some laxity in patenting the idea at the time; I am not sure about that. But I think the real answer is that enemy intelligence was bright enough to pick up an idea that the British government had not fully appreciated—

Mr. Drew: But they did make it openly available.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur):—and then carried on the development of the jet engine in their own country. Of course the original development was by Whittle; nevertheless the idea was picked up and the development carried on in another country.

I think that is hardly the point in question. That is a matter of making sure that our secrecy provisions are adequate. I believe that the provision in section 9, which is intended to make sure that every patentable idea is patented by the crown, and that the administration of the patent is to be in the hands of a crown corporation, is the best arrangement that I can think of to bring about the security my hon. friend wishes to obtain.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to labour the point unduly; but I would point out to the minister that under section 6 there is this provision:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Patent Act, the appropriate minister may file an application—

And that means an application before the patent office.

> —naming the inventor, for a patent for an invention vested in Her Majesty by this act—

And so on.

That means that an invention should be patented and recorded in the patent office in the ordinary way. My point is that a minister, who would not be dealing with patents of this kind in the ordinary course of events, might conceivably, in complete good faith and without the slightest suggestion of laxity or otherwise, file an application for a patent, which would then become open to public examination, and which might conceivably be of the most outstanding importance.

In the case of the jet engine, we must remember that one of the factors contributing to the circumstances under which the Germans obtained this was that there was a shortage of metal at the time. There was reluctance to provide the additional metal necessary for these new experiments. In some way, the danger of this becoming available to the enemy perhaps was not fully recognized. Perhaps it was that they simply did not regard this as anything more than a wildly imaginary device. In any event, the fact remains the patent was applied for. It was registered, and without any subterranean channels the Germans were able to go and obtain a description of that invention from the patent office. My only thought is that there might well be some board, an interdepartmental body, which would assist the ministers themselves so that the possibility of that happening in good faith might not occur. I recognize that in matters of this kind and in the secrecy that relates to inventions of this nature, the responsibility must rest with the government. I can do no more than place before the government my observations which were impressed upon me by the unusual circumstances under which the German government actually had a head start in the development of the jet engine, although it was a British invention. That was not generally known until well after the war. That was the way it happened. My thought is simply that, perhaps by some committee of ministers or some such advisory group, individual ministers confronted with this problem would then have the advantage of a general discussion where, based upon past experience, they might receive guidance as to whether in fact it should be filed as a patent application at all. What I am really concerned with is the possibility of its getting into the patent office and being examined and perhaps having revolutionary consequences such as the jet engine had, although nobody saw it in advance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I can say a word on this. We all recognize the danger that the Leader of the Opposition has portrayed rather strikingly. Of course you cannot legislate to prevent human error, but we have, in the Patent Act, sections 20, 21 and 22, which impose upon the commissioner a duty where applications for patents which have to do with munitions, or defence equipment, or with atomic energy are concerned—I am speaking of the ordinary act, not of this bill. It is the duty of the commissioner to see that such applications are scrutinized in the kind of way that the Leader of the Opposition has in mind before anything is made public about them. Of course, some private inventor may come along with something that has been scrutinized by nobody but himself. Nobody knows what is in it and he may make the thing public. No law could prevent that. In so far as the law can prevent it, the existing law does make provision in those three sections to which I referred for this kind of security, and it does give authority to the appropriate ministers and to their advisers in the departments of national defence and defence production and in the research council, and so on.

The Leader of the Opposition has put his finger on a problem, but I think we have gone about as far as anybody has yet been able to go toward the solving of it, in the law as it now stands.

Mr. Drew: It is certainly not my intention to oppose this. I agree with the general purpose; but may I add one more suggestion. Since Sir Robert Watson-Watt, the chief inventor of radar, who is in fact associated with certain activities of government in this regard, has made the points he has in regard to the jet engine and the way in which the Germans got hold of it, he may offer some suggestion, if his advice in that field is available.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Awards.

Mr. Michener: I am not clear from the explanation of the bill what might be the source of the award. Is the award paid by way of a percentage of the receipts from the invention, or is the award paid by way of a grant? Subject to that answer I may have something further to say about the awards under clause 10. In other words, would it be a grant involving expenditures from the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. Pickersgill: It may be either a percentage of a royalty, a lump sum or a grant from the consolidated revenue fund, or anything else that the government is willing to recommend to parliament and parliament is willing to appropriate. Of course, in the case of royalties, that would not really arise, but in the case of a grant from the consolidated revenue fund there would have to be an appropriation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where does parliament come in at all in the section?

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it that the government is always governed by the appropriation acts, and that the government cannot spend public moneys that have not been previously appropriated by parliament for the purpose.

Mr. Michener: The wording is:

> Subject to the regulations, the appropriate minister may authorize the payment of an award to a public servant . . .

It seems to me that is pretty definite legislative authority for the minister to pay out money. I just asked the question whether that was authority to make an agreement by which a percentage of the proceeds of the invention would be payable to the public servant, in which event it seems to me it is all right. If it has to do with the appropriation of public moneys, then this section may be a change from the former principle of the payment of awards under the Atomic Energy Control Act. Under that act the payment was made on the recommendation of the governor in council. Here we are not even requiring the formality of that procedure, but a minister may do it alone.

Mr. Pickersgill: In fact, I raised the same question with the draftsmen. I have not the advantage of the hon. member for St. Paul's of being a lawyer. I was rather shocked at the language: "the appropriate minister may authorize the payment"; and I was told that under the Financial Administration Act and the appropriation acts of course no payment of any kind could be made without there being an appropriation from parliament in the first place and without the treasury board approving the payment in the second place. Of course the treasury board is an emanation of the governor in council; it is a committee of the governor in council, and all its decisions in this regard would have to be ratified by the governor in council. Therefore all that this amounts to is that the appropriate minister may recommend for payment what is felt to be appropriate, but that the payments must be made by law and, as all hon. members know, outside of their own incomes, the ministers themselves have no funds that they can spend by themselves.

Mr. Michener: On that point, Mr. Chairman, where you have a number of ministers involved, would it not be better, in order for these awards to have some uniformity, that they be made by order in council, as they were under the Atomic Energy Control Act? You might have quite a different scale of values in one department by one minister from what you would have in another department. The suggestion I make is that there might be some clearinghouse.

Mr. Pickersgill: The clearinghouse would be the treasury board. The recommendations would go to the board. Of course section 10 has to be read in conjunction with section 12, which says that:

> The governor in council may make regulations . . .

Which will include of course regulations as to the amounts which are dealt with in subclause (c).

Mr. Fulton: There is another aspect to this. Take the case of a minister who decides to recommend, instead of a grant from the consolidated revenue fund, a percentage of the royalty. I can see that there might be what would amount to discrimination between departments. One minister might say: I want to encourage inventors; I am going to recommend that 100 per cent of the royalties earned by the crown in the exploitation of the invention be paid to the inventor.

Another one might say that perhaps that is too much and that it should be 50 per cent, and the next minute it might be suggested that 10 per cent would be sufficient, and that seems to me to make it possible that different inventors for equally meritorious work might get a different measure of reward. I wonder, therefore, whether it would not be appropriate to adopt the small amendment suggested by the hon. member for St. Paul's and restore the words "governor in council" in clause 10. The recommendation must come from the minister in the first place of course, but surely the governor in council far more than the treasury board would be attempting to establish uniformity of award as well as considering the amounts involved. I imagine the treasury board's only concern would be whether there was authority to make a certain payment, whereas I believe the governor in council might take the larger view and consider uniformity as well.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Kamloops is very fond of saying that everything done by the governor in council and by the treasury board is done behind closed doors. I do not know whether I am being disrespectful of the crown if I say anything even in the most general terms about what goes on behind the closed doors, but I am going to take the risk and assure the hon. member for Kamloops that the ministers who sit on the treasury board and the ministers who sit as the governor in council or the advisers of the governor in council are the same people.

Mr. Fulton: But there are only six in one case and the whole cabinet, surely, in the other case. However, the minister knows so very much better for obvious reasons.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have had a certain experience of both and I would say, sir, that this kind of question would obtain much more careful consideration in the nature of things at the board where questions of this character and calibre are in fact considered, and even if we put the governor in council in, under authority of the Financial Administration Act, the governor in council would certainly delegate power to the treasury board and it would come to the same thing in the end whatever language we used, and unless we invent a new process the actual disposal of it will be very much the same.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a rather interesting revelation from a very experienced man. Does the minister say more consideration will be given by the treasury board than by the governor in council?

Mr. Pickersgill: To details yes, and particularly to financial details. That is why the treasury board was set up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are lots of reasons why things are set up though they do not always achieve the end for which they are set up. How many members of the council are on the treasury board? Is it five or six, or does the minister leave the impression that the entire group on the council also sit on the treasury board?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Chairman, the treasury board is of course a statutory committee of the council, though I am afraid I have not got the statutory definition of it at hand at the moment. However, I would hesitate to reproduce from a very defective memory—

Mr. Fulton: I have it here, may I read it?

Mr. Pickersgill: By all means.

Mr. Fulton: Section 3 of the Financial Administration Act states:

(1) There shall be a board called the treasury board, consisting of the Minister of Finance, who is the chairman, and any five members of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, who may be nominated from time to time by the governor in council.

It appears to me therefore as though there are six.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, a minimum membership of six, though as a matter of fact the quorum for the governor in council is four.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, in the last few lines of this section it states, "any such amount as the appropriate minister and the public servant may agree upon". Now, supposing they do not agree and remain miles apart so that they cannot come to an agreement. Has the minister thought of any method of arbitrating the amount?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any point in the whole bill to which more consideration was given than the point raised by the hon. member for The Battlefords, and after a great deal of consideration the conclusion was reached that when all was said and done these awards are awards given to someone who has, in the time of the crown or with the resources of the crown, created something which belongs to the crown, and that then, as a matter of policy, something be awarded to this person in recognition of that. If the minister and the public servant agreed on what would be suitable then, of course, that would make for a good relationship with the employee. On the other hand, though I stand to be corrected by any lawyer in the house, it is essentially an act of grace and in the final analysis it has to be determined by the minister who is responsible to this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am wondering whether the minister would consider changing the word "authorized" to "recommend". As the section reads at the present time I would think the meaning of these words would simply be that the minister without regard to the treasury board, the governor in council, or anyone else has the power from parliament, if the bill is passed in its present form, to authorize the payment of an award. If the authorization comes from the treasury board or from the governor in council, as the case may be, as the result of a recommendation by the minister, then I suggest that much of this argument would be obviated with the removal of the word "authorized" and the substitution of the word "recommend".

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member has troubled me a little because I am not a draftsman myself and never made the slightest pretension to being one. I was informed by the draftsmen that this was quite the usual form of drafting. I must say that it would have to be recommended to somebody who presumably then would be authorized to do the act and that would presumably be through the governor in council. But I would like if I may to stand this section over for a moment and take this under consideration while we continue with other clauses and I may be able to reach a determination about whether I would be prepared to recommend that the hon. member's suggestion be accepted.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say just a word on this before we pass on to other clauses. I have to rise to my feet again because the minister has stated that after all these are crown inventions, owned by the crown, and we are paying these sums as a matter of grace. That may be true once the bill becomes law but at the moment it is not in accordance with established law that such inventions are the right of the crown and payments be made as a matter of grace. This takes us out of the old section 46 which gave the public servant a royalty which was determined after a report was made by the commissioner of patents and under which the public servant could appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada if he were not satisfied with the payment which is made.

There is no doubt that the minister is extremely frank about it. Under this present bill the invention in the future will be the whole property of the crown. The inventor is not entitled to anything, as a matter of fact; as a matter of fact, he may never receive anything. I have no doubt that most of them or at least many of them will receive nothing at all; and anything they receive will be as a matter of grace. There will be no manner of appeal because there is no established procedure for granting the ex gratia payment.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I defer to the learning of my hon. friend; but when he says it is not the law he is not quite accurate. He has referred only to the Patent Act. In three of the four acts whose provisions are being repealed and for which this legislation is substituted, it now is the law. It is not the law only in the case of public servants covered by the Patent Act by whom only a minority of all the inventions that are apt to be covered by this act are likely to be made.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hence it is not true that parliament is now doing something new. Parliament is extending to a wider field a regime that his existed for a long time in the research council.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Oh, yes. My answer to that statement is that before the enactment of the Atomic Energy Control Act and the Research Council Act, the Patent Act was in existence and it was based on the common law. Once again we are doing something with regard to a majority of civil servants who might number 150,000 as against a few thousand that are employed under those acts. We are restricting the rights of the majority on account of the existing conditions which have been lately introduced by statute for certain councils in this country.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 10 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clause 11 agreed to.

On clause 12—Regulations.

Mr. Fulton: This is the section which gives to the governor in council power to make regulations which would include, amongst other things—as has been pointed out—the prescribing of the kind and methods of granting awards, and so on; and it also includes a very important category, as the section stands now, of regulations prescribing rules of practice and procedure respecting any appeal or application under this act to the exchequer court. By an earlier section I suggest that if a public servant questions whether his invention was made within the scope of his employment so as to be within the purview of this act, with the result that the patent to it and the rights to it are vested in the crown, it is a question for the minister to decide. In other words, the minister decides whether it is one of those inventions or not. If the minister gives a decision that is adverse to the public servant, then his only recourse is to appeal to the exchequer court and to try to convince that court that this was an invention made by him in his own time and not so necessarily related to his employment as automatically to fall within the scope of this act.

That may be a highly important question and may involve considerable financial stakes for the public servant. I should think it would be most likely and most probable that he would go to see a lawyer and that his appeal would be taken to the exchequer court in that way. He would probably go to see patent attorneys and other lawyers as well. What I question here is the desirability of giving to the governor in council the right to make the rules or, as the wording is here, the right to make regulations prescribing rules of practice and procedure respecting any appeal or application under this act to the exchequer court.

There are several grounds on which I question the advisability of that provision. Putting it on its lowest possible plane, the first one is that the governor in council, desiring to discourage servants from appealing, might make regulations as to security for costs and things of that nature which would in effect prohibit the public servant from appealing and in effect take away altogether the right of appeal. I admit that that is putting it at its lowest level, but I am looking at all the possibilities. It may just be possible that government policy at some future time would harden against inventors having any rights to these things and there would be the temptation and the inclination to raise the amount required as security for costs.

In the second place, not even the Patent Act itself confers this right, namely the right of the governor in council to make regulations respecting practice and procedure on appeal to the exchequer court, even with respect to sections 67 to 72 of that act which are the sections of the Patent Act now covering the cases of inventions by public servants. There the appeal is to the exchequer court if the public servant and the commissioner of patents disagree; but the appeal is under the ordinary rules of court, as is the case with every other appeal. The governor in council has absolutely no right to lay down the rules with respect to an appeal.

Finally, as a matter of general practice I suggest that since the exchequer court is given the right—as is every other court—to make its own rules prescribing the practice and procedures in that court, whether it be a motion of first instance or an appeal from another court, it is not necessary to give to the governor in council the power to make rules in this case. Furthermore, I submit that it is undesirable and it is a wrong principle to give the governor in council power to make these rules. If the exchequer court did not have the right to make rules governing procedure on appeals in matters of this kind, such a provision might be necessary; but it now has that power. If this subsection were to carry and were to be included, the result would be that a legal practitioner, in addition to having to look at the rules of court in order to find out the rules applicable to this appeal, would have to go and to search through the orders in council and look in the Canada Gazette to see whether just the other day the governor in council had happened to pass another order in council affecting these rules.

Any member of the committee who is a lawyer will, I am quite sure, agree with me when I say that it is difficult enough now to keep track of the rules of court and that it is not appropriate that, in addition to looking at the rules of court and searching them to make certain that he has the latest amendments, the practitioner should also have to search through the Canada Gazette to see whether the governor in council happened lately to have passed any amendments to the rules governing the practice and procedure on this particular type of appeal. Because I submit that this provision is neither necessary nor in accordance with sound principles I move:

That clause 12 be amended by deleting from subsection (a) the following words:

(iii) any appeal or application under this act to the exchequer court.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Fulton: Will you put the question, Mr. Chairman? Has the minister anything to say as to why the amendment should not carry?

The Deputy Chairman: Those in favour of the amendment will please say "aye".

Mr. Fulton: I just asked the minister whether he had anything to say as to why the amendment should not carry.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer. Perhaps I should not keep on apologizing. I am, however, a layman. It seems to me that the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman would not have any effect because the clause states:

The governor in council may make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations:

Therefore, whether or not this particular amendment was made, as long as the general language stood the amendment would not have any real effect. It does seem to me that any regulation which was made for any other purpose than for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act would be illegal anyway, and that if the governor in council made the kind of regulations which in fact did what the hon. member for Kamloops said might be done, set up rules of practice and procedure which in effect nullified the right of appeal, the courts would say those regulations were doing that and would not pay any attention to them.

It seems to me that the draftsman put this in for some purpose which I suspect was to enable the governor in council to make exceptions by way of leniency, much more than the reverse, in order to make sure that the ordinary rules would not preclude appeal. But in any case it does not seem to me that it would be possible for the governor in council to do anything that abrogated any rights under the law.

Mr. Fulton: I submit to the minister, with respect, that he is not correct in his interpretation of the effect of paragraph (iii). In my submission the right to make regulations with regard to the rules of practice and procedure respecting appeals to the exchequer court is not necessarily inherent in the right to make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of the act. When you give the governor general in council the power to make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of the act it would, I submit, not be held by a court that the right to make regulations prescribing rules of practice and procedure on appeal was necessarily inherent in that power. An appeal is something quite outside of and apart from this act or the carrying into force of this act. Therefore, unless these words were expressly included in paragraph (iii) the governor in council would not have that power under the general power to make regulations for the carrying into force of the act, which is the reason why these words had to be expressly included.

I agree with the minister on that point, but if I am right it follows that the governor in council would not have that power if they were removed. Therefore the minister is not correct when he says he has the power whether or not the words are there. In short my submission is he only gets the power to make regulations regarding the rules of the exchequer court if he is expressly given the power and that that power is not included in the general power to make regulations regarding the carrying into effect of the act.

That being the case, inasmuch as I consider it undesirable that rules of the exchequer court regarding practice and procedure on appeal should be made by the governor in council when that court has the right under section 87 of the Exchequer Court Act and can be presumed to be competent to exercise it and indeed does exercise it, I submit that it is not sound to have that provision here.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member is suggesting that this gives the governor in council any power to make rules of practice and procedure for the court itself, that of course is obviously not "for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act", and is beyond the scope of the act. The only rules that could be made would be rules, for example, as to the kind of procedure that the public servant would follow in order to reach the stage of getting an appeal, the kind of form in which he would have to get the minister's determination or the failure of the minister to determine, or things of that sort. It would not be within the scope of the act to make regulations to abridge the power of appeal itself which is expressly provided for in the act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This section is very clear. It actually gives the governor in council the power to differentiate between the right of appeal of the civil servant to the Exchequer Court of Canada and the right of the ordinary citizen of the country. Surely we do not want to incorporate in the law a principle whereby every other citizen in Canada shall have certain rights and shall follow certain regulations when appealing to the exchequer court but those regulations shall not apply to civil servants. The minister says that he hazards the guess that the reason is the one given. Certainly we should not depart from the ordinary principle that everyone is equal before the law and by this provision allow the civil servant to be placed in a lower category than every other citizen in the country.

As a matter of fact, under the present provision the governor in council by order in council could simply place a roadblock in the way of the civil servant wishing to appeal to the exchequer court. In one section the right is provided for, but under the regulations the civil servant should be presumed to be in the same position as every other person, namely, that he should be required to put up certain determined security as the basis for appeal. This section permits the governor in council to make a provision whereby a dangerous immunity from judicial supervision will be granted in so far as civil servants are concerned.

I suggest that we do not wish to set up two types of citizens with respect to right of appeal to the courts, the first being the majority of the Canadian people and the second being civil servants who would be granted lesser rights than those granted to others. I am sure that the other provisions regarding regulations are simply those necessary for the carrying out of the provisions of the act. The section reads:

> The governor in council may make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act, and . . . may make regulations:
> (a) prescribing rules of practice and procedure respecting
> (i) applications for patents pursuant to this act—

There can be no objection to that.

> —(ii) the determination of questions whether an invention is vested in Her Majesty by this act—

There is no objection there, but I do feel that the third provision respecting appeals leaves the door open to inequity, and I suggest that the minister give reconsideration to it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The intervention of the hon. member for Prince Albert has, I think, somewhat cleared my own mind. He says that we do not want to make one law for public servants and another law for other citizens. We are here making a law for public servants that applies to nobody but public servants, so that that question does not arise at all in this case. The only question that does arise is whether or not we are importing into section 12 any possibility of taking away the rights of appeal that are in the previous sections. The substantive part of section 12 reads as follows:

> The governor in council may make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act—

Everything else in that section, as I read the English language, depends upon that, That is clear, simple and unambiguous, and if any regulation is made by the governor in council that is contrary to that provision it is null and void and has no effect anyway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what the authorities say. I wish the courts could say that.

Mr. Pickersgill: My hon. friend has had a lot of practice in the courts and I have had none, but I think perhaps I can claim to have some little knowledge of what the governor in council thinks he can do in making regulations. I know that the greatest care is exercised by the governor in council to make sure that in making regulations he is within the scope of the statutes, and I am perfectly sure that the courts would not say for one minute that a regulation that was contrary to the purposes of the act, that was not for the purpose of carrying out the act, was a good regulation or was good law.

It, therefore, seemed to me that the only possible meaning this provision could have is that certain rules will be made as to the procedure by which the appeal reaches the court. Once it reaches the court, the practice of the court applies under the ordinary law. This bill has nothing to do with the exchequer court. It only has to do with the determination of certain questions by that court.

It does appear to me that it is conceivable that the words may not be necessary, but it does not appear to me that they could possibly cause any injury to a public servant. I am, therefore, not disposed to accept the hon. gentleman's amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has opened a door, but he did not go very far. He spoke of his experience, and it is vast in this connection. He left the impression, and the impression was well founded, that he knows of the vast precautions taken by the governor general in council in order to assure that regulations shall not be passed that are contrary to the purposes and provisions of any act. What are those precautions?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the governor in council does not like to have his face red, any more than anyone else.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not a precaution.

Mr. Fulton: That is a regret, more than anything else.

Mr. Churchill: I have listened to the Secretary of State, and I feel that we have not been as yet fully informed. Under clause 5 of the bill the right of appeal is granted, and it is reasonable under the circumstances. I still do not follow the Secretary of State in his argument under clause 12, paragraph (a), as to why there should be any necessity for the governor in council determining the rules of practice and procedure for the making of an appeal to the exchequer court. There must be some special reason why it should be this way, when the same procedure is not followed in other statutes.

Once the right of appeal has been granted to the exchequer court, then the court itself will determine the rules of practice and procedure. Unless the Secretary of State is prepared to give us some particular reason that has not yet been forthcoming, it is impossible to support this particular clause in the bill.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: Yeas, 31; nays, 48.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 10 was allowed to stand. We shall deal with it now.

On clause 10—Awards.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have drawn on resources outside myself, Mr. Chairman, and I think I can now explain to the committee why the word "authorized" is used and what its significance is. It appears that the procedure, in the first instance, is that the minister makes his submission to the treasury board, and it is either accepted or rejected. When that is done the minister still has actually to authorize the payment out of the appropriations for his department. This term, in that sense, is habitually used in these statutes. It is, in other words, a term of the art.

Mr. Knowles: It is clear, is it not, that that item of money will not come back to parliament for parliament to pass upon?

Mr. Pickersgill: Parliament must first have made some kind of provision out of which any award that is to come from the consolidated fund can be paid.

Mr. Fulton: Has any decision been made as to whether a fund is going to be set up to be known as an awards fund from which the payment is to be made or would the intention be to come each year in the estimates to authorize the approval of certain awards? Has any decision been made on that point?

Mr. Pickersgill: No final decision has been made on that point at all. There are several possibilities that are being explored. Of course, the research council has had a lot of experience in this connection, and those departments where the question is a practical one have practices that are being carried out now. It is intended, when this bill is passed, if it does pass, to bring together an appropriate committee to work out the kind of procedure which will meet this situation.

I would think that so far as coming to parliament for money is concerned, that would probably depend upon whether most of these inventions were going to be exploited by a crown company or whether, in fact, that would be done by the various departments, in which case payment would be made out of the departmental appropriations and they would have to ask parliament for that money.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says now that an appropriate committee is envisaged to work out the general details. In general, that was what the Leader of the Opposition suggested this afternoon. What is the personnel of the committee to be? As a matter of fact, we have spent a great deal of time on this bill this afternoon, and the experience has been, in so far as the inventor is concerned, that inventions have been an arid source of reward. Is it the intention that the amount of the award shall be increased? Would the minister also say what the plans are with regard to this committee, of which we have not heard anything until this moment?

Mr. Pickersgill: So far as the question of whether the award will be more generous in the future than in the past is concerned, that is not a question I can answer. The question of whether or not we are going to increase the scale of awards or change the method of making awards has not yet been considered by the government. Until it has been—if the awards should bear no relationship to the earnings of the invention—and until parliament is asked and has shown it is prepared to provide awards out of public funds, it would be presumptuous in the extreme for me to attempt to forecast what they would be, particularly since, as I said several times, my department will not likely be a very large participant.

As for the kind of committee that is envisaged to advise the government, it will obviously be selected from amongst those public servants who have up to now had the greatest experience with these things.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will it take any cognizance of the next election?

Mr. Pickersgill: I doubt if there is any constituency in this country where the number of inventors is so great that they would be apt to turn an election. So that need not be a consideration in anyone's mind.

But, to be more serious about it, I would think that many of the rewards, if one might put it that way, are not in the form of a mere monetary grant in recognition of a particular invention, but rather in the form of promotions, salary increases and improved opportunities for the kind of people who make these inventions. Naturally, if you find in your employ someone who is really an inventive person and who is furthering the work of his department in that way, he is going to go ahead much faster than someone who is not so inclined.

Those factors all have to be taken into account. One must also consider the nature of the invention, its importance, and the nature of its use. All those matters would have to be taken into account. Perhaps it would be proper for me to say that I have had some discussion with the chairman of the national research council and he has emphasized to me the extreme importance of flexibility in these matters. After all, an invention is something unique: By its very definition it is unique. Thus it becomes difficult to make ordinary and general rules that would apply to 5 per cent of royalties, or something of that sort, and which might work a great injustice as between one very important invention that might be applied only in the field of defence—where the royalties would amount to next to nothing—and another that might have a wide commercial application, but which might not be a very great invention, at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What has been the basis of determination heretofore?

Mr. Pickersgill: In connection with the national research council, anything up to 5 per cent of the royalties. I am advised that there have been other ways of recognition, however—by way of earlier promotions, and by other means. Merit has been recognized in that way, and it is only proper that it should be so. But what the government is going to do is to try to get the very best advice from those who are most experienced in these matters; and then the governor in council will formulate the regulations in the light of that advice.

Mr. Harris: Now, by leave.

Mr. Fulton: Next sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

AMENDMENTS TO CERTAIN ACTS TO PRESCRIBE PENSION PROVISIONS

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend certain acts relating to several crown corporations in order to prescribe the pension provisions for and the manner in which such pension provisions are to apply to persons transferring from the public service to the corporations concerned.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, perhaps hon. members would welcome a brief statement as to the purpose of the resolution. As the resolution indicates, the purpose of this bill is to prescribe the pension provisions for and the manner in which those pension provisions are to apply to persons transferring from the public service to certain crown corporations. It is designed to bring consistency with the new Public Service Superannuation Act and will provide that these transferred employees will become members of the pension plan of the corporations to which they will be transferred.

I should add however that the Public Service Superannuation Act made provision for the entry into reciprocal transfer agreements between the government of Canada and crown corporations to cover the transferability of pension rights when a contributor under that act transferred his employment to that of a crown corporation or vice versa. Thus where these agreements are concluded a transferred employee may obtain full credit for his prior service under the pension plan of his new employer.

Because of its close relation with the Public Service Superannuation Act it is intended that this new act will have effect from January 1, 1954, the day on which the Public Service Superannuation Act came into force.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say only a few words. The object of the bill to be based on this resolution seems to be a commendable one, and one which I believe will meet with general support in the House of Commons.

My main reason for rising is to suggest that the principle underlying this legislation is so important and so commendable that in my view it should be extended to apply on a much wider basis. I believe this is not the first instance of mobility of pension rights being established, and I suggest this move is greatly needed. This is a subject about which my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South has spoken frequently; and it seems to me some thinking should be given to establishing a master plan or broadening the Government Annuities Act, or finding some other means to make it possible for people to move from the public service to crown corporations, or from either of those categories of employment into private industry, or to move from one private industry to another, or from private industry into the public service, while at the same time carrying with them their pension rights. In this way, upon reaching pensionable age they would retain such rights as they had earned across their working years.

Undoubtedly great progress has been made in the concept of retirement pensions. Many more pension plans are in effect today; many more people are covered by such plans than was the case ten or twenty years ago, and this is all to the good. But there are many instances where pension plans freeze employees to certain jobs. After they have been on those jobs for a few years their rights are such that it makes it difficult for them to consider moving to other jobs, lest they sacrifice such rights as they have gained. Similarly there are areas of employment denied to people because they have passed a certain age, and an employer may not want to take in someone who has passed that age, when he has no pension rights to bring with him or no way in which he could transfer such rights.

In both those cases the situation would be improved greatly if, as I have indicated, there was greater mobility of pension rights. We support the principle set out in the resolution upon which the bill will be based. If I have any quarrel with this measure, it is that it is so limited in its scope.

My further quarrel with the government is that though this idea has been spoken of around here on many occasions, not only on the opposition side of the house but on the government side as well, so little seems to have been done to establish the mobility of pension rights for all our people, whether they are in public service or in crown corporations or working for one private industry or another.

Let it be very clear that we have not yet had the last word in establishing an adequate pension system for all the people of this country. Many more improvements have to be made, and one of those necessary improvements is to extend this very principle of the mobility of pension rights.

Mr. Pearkes: Will the transfer of pension rights be applicable to the armed services who have contributed to their pension fund and to the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who have contributed to their pension fund and who subsequently may want to transfer to one of the organizations mentioned in the resolution?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend will find that the categories to which he referred are already referred to in the superannuation act and the schedules to that act.

Mr. Pearkes: It includes the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, does it?

Mr. Monteith: I assume there will be a full discussion of this when the bill is presented to the house. I was wondering whether the parliamentary assistant would tell us what crown companies do now have superannuation schemes and what ones have not.

Mr. Benidickson: It is true that not all crown companies have superannuation schemes. On the other hand, the vast majority of crown corporations are already referred to in the schedules to the Public Service Superannuation Act which came into effect on January 1 of this year. But inasmuch as this resolution has been on the order paper for some time, hon. members will recognize that a bill has likely been drawn up. I should say then that in the bill it is proposed that the crown corporations that will be affected by this resolution will be the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, each of which has a reference to pensions in its own act, and then by virtue of a reference in the bill the Government Companies Operation Act, the Canadian Arsenals Limited and the Polymer Corporation Limited, and the Eldorado corporation will be affected.

Mr. Monteith: Are the superannuation plans of these various crown corporations consistent in nature? Are the contributions and the benefits the same? Is there a similarity between those plans?

Mr. Benidickson: Probably I can take the questions as notice and be prepared to discuss them in detail when the bill is before the house, as is apparently required in detail by the questions of the hon. member.

Mr. Monteith: I assume it will be all right, too, if the parliamentary assistant would make some comparison between the superannuation plans in the various crown corporations and the superannuation plan as it applies to civil servants who might be transferred to those corporations.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise merely to emphasize the importance of the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I believe that the most important social advance to be made in this country now is—let me put it this way—to help people to help themselves. There is at least at this time in our social thinking a limit to what can be done by helping people out of general revenue. But what can be done to help people to help themselves by building up equities in superannuation funds and annuities and that sort of thing has not been fully exhausted. We have not gone very far in that way. As I said, it is the next important advance in our social legislation.

The old age security payments have been a Godsend to a great many people, particularly those people who had small savings and can now use those social security payments to augment them. To use the vernacular, they are sitting pretty, they are economically secure. Perhaps they have not a very lavish standard of living, but at least they have a standard of living that gives them enough to get by comfortably from day to day and, what is more important, to maintain their self-respect at the same time. Anything that can be done along the lines indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will be all to the good.

Unfortunately, as he has said, pensions and superannuation schemes of various kinds today operate to keep people in their jobs. As a matter of fact, they are used sometimes as means of coercion to prevent employees asking for wage increases or better conditions. Employees are often held back for fear of losing the equities they have built up. I myself think it is all wrong. The more freedom of action people have to decide their own lives the better for all concerned. I repeat that everything that can possibly be done should be done to enable people to build up equities for their retiring years.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have one question. Before I ask that question may I, on a question of privilege, congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway on having enunciated the principle that our great duty is to help people to help themselves. I like to hear him say that.

The question I want to ask, Mr. Chairman, is this. The parliamentary assistant has told us that some crown corporations have no pension plan. Where does that leave the people of Canada? We are the shareholders of a company that has no pension plan, as I understand it. Are we really running up a hidden liability? Can we, when the working days of those people are over, say "good-bye" and do nothing about it, or are there special circumstances connected with those corporations?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend will find that there are temporary circumstances as the result of the temporary nature of the functions of the corporation. Again, I shall be very glad to give him the details when we come to sections of the bill.

Mr. Gillis: I am not going to say very much. I do not want to repeat what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. His reference to helping people to help themselves has always been the basic philosophy of this movement. I am sorry my hon. friend—

Mr. Macdonnell: I am always ready to learn.

Mr. Gillis: —seemed to imply that it was news to him. I suggest that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre send him some of our literature and bring him up to date.

Mr. Knowles: I will be glad to.

Mr. Gillis: I know you cannot carry on a broad discussion of the principle of the mobility of pensions under the terms of this resolution, but I welcome the step taken by the government at this time. While the bill the resolution foreshadows intends to extend the right of civil servants to take their superannuation rights with them into one of the crown corporations, such as named by the parliamentary assistant, I hope that the principle will be extended beyond that. The Canadian National Railways, for example, can be construed as a crown company and, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway said, an employee who comes under a superannuation plan whether in industry, the civil service, or a crown company, whether he be there for five, 10 or 15 years, has his superannuation paramount in his mind. He is frozen to the job because if he changes that job he will lose his superannuation and will require to start in somewhere else completely from scratch.

I believe the refusal to recognize this principle in the past has militated against the best interests of this country in that a lot of good men, because of the immobility of superannuation schemes, were obliged to stay on the job regardless of whether they, as individuals, could have made a better contribution in some other type of employment. I hope the adoption of this principle by the government will encourage industrial enterprises outside to make similar arrangements. Some have already done that, but not very many.

The whole principle of superannuation is, of course, another matter, but I still do not believe that in the final analysis you are going to find a solution for people who have reached the age of retirement by adopting the kind of piecemeal legislation we have approved in the past. This resolution indicates the government is finally paying some attention to some of the things said over the years, really getting down to business, and working on these problems. Because of conditions in the past we have lost a good many politicians who would have made good members of this house. The provincial superannuation schemes can be taken as an example, particularly with regard to teachers. If a teacher is nominated and becomes a politician he loses his superannuation, and in some provinces his job is completely out. Let us hope, therefore, that the provincial legislatures will read the discussion which will take place on this bill and amend their regulations accordingly, because no doubt we have already lost quite a number of Sir Wilfrid Lauriers and Joseph Howes because of the restrictions on teachers particularly, some of whom would have made good members of parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think I should point out to hon. members that interchangeability is not being introduced at this stage in so far as relationship between these corporations and the public servant is concerned. That has been provided for in the past by the acts to which I referred in my opening remarks.

Mr. Knowles: But only on a very limited basis.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 461, respecting the superannuation of government employees transferred to crown corporations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RADIO ACT

AMENDMENT TO AUTHORIZE EMPLOYMENT OF UNITED STATES PERSONNEL AND IMMIGRANTS AS RADIO OPERATORS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 446, to amend the Radio Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, section 7 of the Radio Act provides that no person shall be employed as a radio operator on any coast, land, or mobile station unless he is a British subject, and the section goes on to make certain exceptions to this provision.

It has become necessary, by virtue of agreement with the United States for certain operations to take place in Canada by United States' citizens on defence and radar stations, to exempt the operators of radio stations from the provisions of that section. At present the position is, as I previously explained, that none other than British subjects can operate these stations and it is proposed by means of this bill to cover three cases of exceptions.

First, certain aircraft pilots who by virtue of the agreements under the international civil aviation organization may operate in our country. He may fly his plane in our country but there is no point in his doing so if he cannot operate the radio, and in the case of many citizens who are not British subjects that is not possible. We therefore feel that that operation should be recognized by virtue of this amendment.

Then, with reference to the case I mentioned earlier, it was necessary by virtue of the emergency powers regulations to authorize the Minister of Transport to enter into agreements with the United States government whereby United States' citizens could be exempted from the regulations laid down in section 7. That is also covered by a subsection of this bill.

Finally, there are the cases of landed immigrants who have not been in the country long enough to achieve Canadian citizenship and are not yet British subjects. Great hardship is being imposed upon many of these landed immigrants who cannot, for example, even operate a walkie-talkie in a taxi or operate a motor truck on construction jobs simply because of these regulations. The bill purports to exempt them in the performance of their duties. There is no time limit, as can be seen, such as existed in other bills which were enacted under emergency legislation and then put into various statutes of the Department of Transport. The reason for that is that we think this legislation should be permanent.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this appears to be an innocuous little bill but we believe it should be carefully scrutinized by the house before being given a second reading. The minister has given us a brief explanation of the effect of the bill, and he did the same thing on first reading. His explanation on that occasion will be found at page 4769 of Hansard for May 17, 1954 where he is reported as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Radio Act provides that no one shall be employed as a radio operator unless he is a British subject. By virtue of the Emergency Powers Act the Minister of Transport was authorized to enter into an agreement with the United States government providing that it could establish radio stations in northern Canada and employ operators who were not British subjects. The object of this bill is to amend the Radio Act in order to implement, by way of legislation, that arrangement and also to include certain landed immigrants to be employed as radio operators and who are not yet British subjects.

Here we are proposing to hand over some Canadian keys to the United States and for that reason in particular the bill deserves extremely careful scrutiny. I would point out that under the present provisions of the Radio Act, which is chapter 233 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, there is a provision enabling the governor in council to make certain exemptions; and it seems to us to be broad enough as it reads without giving this blanket authority to let in any whole group of operators of radio stations. Section 7 of the Radio Act, in subsection 1, provides as follows:

> No one shall be employed as a radio operator at any coast, land or mobile station unless he is a British subject.

I would point out that three types of stations are described, namely coast station, land station and mobile station. I would also point out that under the bill now before us authority to exempt is so broad that it covers all kinds of stations; it is not restricted to land stations. Subsection 2 of section 7 of the Radio Act provides for the taking of a declaration of secrecy. It reads in part as follows:

> (2) All radio operators at coast or land stations or on mobile stations shall take and subscribe a declaration of secrecy in the form set forth in the schedule, before a judge of any court, a notary public, a justice of the peace or a commissioner for taking affidavits,—

And so on. The next subsection of section 7 of the Radio Act makes it a crime for a person who has taken a declaration of secrecy to disclose any information. There is this firm provision for making certain that the operators have taken an oath, a declaration of secrecy, and that they can be punished severely for breaking that oath.

Then the present subsection 4 of section 7 of the Radio Act is the one which grants the power to make exemptions. As I said a few moments ago, it seems to us to be broad enough to cover the present situation. It reads as follows:

> (4) The governor in council—

Which of course means the cabinet.

> —may, by regulation and on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, exempt from the operation of this section a non-resident of Canada who
> (a) is employed as a radio operator on a radio station in Canada,
> (b) holds a valid Canadian certificate of proficiency or an equivalent certificate issued by the country of which he is a citizen,—

That provision, of course, would make it broad enough to apply to an American who held an American certificate.

> (c) is a resident and citizen of a country that grants a reciprocal permission to Canadian citizens to be employed as radio operators in that country.

If the United States grants a similar permission to Canadian citizens, there is in the act already power for the Canadian cabinet to grant exemption; and that seems to be the basis on which it should be kept. These rights should be reciprocal. If we are to give the Americans certain rights in our country, we should have exactly the same rights in their country. That is what is provided by subsection 4 of section 7 of the present Radio Act. If the situation now is that the Americans do not give Canadian citizens the same right, the government should get busy, negotiate with the United States and get these rights, in which event there would be ample power under the Radio Act as it stands at the present time.

But instead of that procedure, the minister is asking for the following power. In clause (b) of the new subsection 4 there is to be given power to grant exemption—that is, the cabinet can grant exemption to:

(b) a person who is employed as a radio operator on a radio station in Canada by the government of another country or any agency thereof.

That provision just gives the blanket power to allow American operators to come into Canada. They do not even need to be employed by the United States government. They can be employed by an agency of the United States government and still get the exemption. The clause which I have just read is not confined to the United States. It states:

—a person who is employed as a radio operator on a radio station in Canada by the government of another country—

It might be any other country although, from what the minister has said, I take it that he wants this power in order to deal with American operators of these stations. However, I suggest in the first place that the power is not necessary if the United States give us the same rights that we give them. If it is necessary, I suggest that the bill should be restricted to the United States and should not be made so wide that it covers every country in the world outside of Canada. If it is to apply to the United States, then it should be set out that the power is to be exercised pursuant to an agreement between Canada and the United States. These things cannot be too carefully handled. This should be done by agreement between the two countries rather than by our just writing into our statutes a provision that people can come here from any other country—that is, a citizen of any other country—and can be exempted from our laws.

On the first reading the minister mentioned the fact that there is an agreement between Canada and the United States. We should know what that agreement is. The house should be shown that agreement. Possibly it should be made a schedule to this act. But instead of bothering to do that, the department simply brings in a bill giving blanket authority to allow operators from any other country to run these radio stations in Canada when at the same time our own Canadians running these stations are obliged to take this declaration of secrecy and are subject to these heavy penalties.

The whole Radio Act is an extremely strict one, and quite properly so. But that is all the more reason why American operators should not lightly be given exemptions. I suggest that it is time the government stopped handing over blanket authority to the United States, something which in effect is being done by this bill.

Then the minister referred to the provision which is now to be written into the act to cover landed immigrants. That is a new approach. That is a new kind of legislation in Canada. At the present time the only person who can be a radio station operator in this country is one who is a British subject. Of course that includes all who are Canadian citizens. I can see that there may be cases where a new settler has come here and wants to get a job driving a taxi equipped with a radio control system. It may be that provision should be made to permit such a person to operate that type of taxi, but to do so we do not need to have an amendment which can exempt every person who is a resident of Canada from the requirements in connection with any kind of station. The amendment would cover coastal stations, land stations and mobile stations. The bill gives the government the blanket power to grant exemption to any landed immigrant.

I suggest that if a provision has to be put into the act to meet this situation the exemption should be restricted to mobile stations. We find that in section 5 of the Radio Act there is a reference to radios installed in automobiles in these words, "a radio receiving set installed in an automobile". Perhaps power should be given to exempt residents of Canada, even though they are not Canadian citizens or British subjects, in the case of a radio installed in an automobile. I do not see very much objection to a provision of that kind, but it should be restricted to the situation that has to be met today rather than providing authority for a blanket exemption.

We regard these two points, particularly the first one, as serious defects in the bill, and in the face of the objections we have raised we are hoping that the minister will go over the bill again in order to see whether or not some change cannot be made to bring the amendment much more in line with the actual situation which exists. There is one other minor point about the bill. In the new subparagraph (a) (ii) of subsection 4 we find the words:

"Holds a valid Canadian certificate of proficiency—

Then these are the words in question:

—or other authority to operate a radio station issued by the minister . . .

That looks as though the minister is seeking the power to issue some new type of certificate. I may not have read the Radio Act correctly but I cannot find out just what is meant by the words "or other authority to operate a radio station issued by the minister" unless the minister is now asking for a brand new power to grant some new kind of authority for the operation of a radio station which is not already contained in the Radio Act. I place these three points before the house. I am afraid it is not quite as innocuous as it appears at first sight or as it sounded from the explanation given by the minister.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I can imagine that before this debate goes very far someone on the government side may point out that we on the opposition side have objected to this sort of thing being done by order in council and have contended that if it had to be done at all it should be done by statute, which is precisely what the government is now doing. I hope the minister will not take it for granted, because what was formerly done by order in council is now to be done by statute, which is the correct way of doing it, that that makes the substance of this measure perfectly all right. Before I go into the question of the substance of the bill I feel I should say this word in view of the fact that the bill in part at least is designed to carry forward what was done by order in council under the Emergency Powers Act.

It seems to me that the fact that it is now being done this way by a very simple little bill underlies the fact that it should never have been done the other way. It underlines the fact that the Emergency Powers Act was really a matter of convenience for the government.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should not go into the virtues of the Emergency Powers Act.

Mr. Knowles: There are none.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member was not making a little excursion into that field I am at a loss to know what he was doing.

Mr. Knowles: It is very easy to obey your suggestion that I refrain from going into the virtues of the Emergency Powers Act because I do not think there were any. I simply point out, and I notice that Your Honour has a copy of the bill in your hand, that in the explanatory notes on the righthand page reference is made to the fact that part of this bill is a carrying forward of what was formerly provided by order in council under the Emergency Powers Act. I tried to find the order in council referred to there by a certain number and certain date but I could not find it and the officials in the library could not find it either. Maybe the wrong number and wrong date have been given.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Chevrier: I will let my hon. friend see it.

Mr. Knowles: That will be fine. I did not think it was secret, but there seems to be some difficulty in locating it. I have no intention of going into an excursion on that point, Mr. Speaker, but I do think the simplicity of the bill, which is just one page, emphasizes the fact that if matters of this kind are to be dealt with at all, the way to deal with them is by bringing them before parliament in the form of a bill rather than doing it by order in council under an emergency powers act. I have not much more to say at this stage but as it is six o'clock perhaps I can have a few minutes at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: When the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I had pointed out that if it is the wish of the government to have legislation of this kind, it is far better to achieve that end by the enacting of a statute such as this than it is to do it as it was formerly done by means of an order in council under the Emergency Powers Act. However, I should like to say just a few words with regard to the substance of the bill itself.

I am sure that no one can take issue with the desire expressed by the minister to implement the arrangements that we have under ICAO, and to make it possible for the pilots of planes, where we permit them to fly over Canadian territory, to operate their radio sets. Obviously that is in the best interests of safe navigation by air. Similarly we take no exception to the idea that there should not be on the statute books legislation that denies to certain people, such as landed immigrants, the possibility of making their living by the driving of taxicabs which are equipped with two-way radio sets for the purpose of controlling their operations. If there are sections of this bill that are necessary to achieve those two purposes, then it seems to me to that extent to be quite in order and quite appropriate.

However, when one comes to this matter of making special provisions on a one-way basis for persons who are employed in Canada by the government of another country or any agency of the government of another country, I feel the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) was not stating it too strongly when he suggested that goes a little too far. I have no objection to reciprocal arrangements with other countries, and that includes the United States. But it does seem to me that a provision for such reciprocal arrangements—in other words, for a privilege to be granted both ways—is already included in the Radio Act, section 7, subsection 4, paragraph (c). It says that:

> The governor in council may, by regulation and on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, exempt from the operation of this section a non-resident of Canada, who is a resident and citizen of a country that grants a reciprocal permission to Canadian citizens to be employed as radio operators in that country.

If the precise terms of that subsection do not go far enough I would have no objection to that subsection being amended, provided this whole arrangement is kept on a reciprocal basis. It seems to me that is the pith and substance of section 7, subsection 4, paragraph (c) as it now stands. Whatever is provided is on a reciprocal basis. On the other hand, the pith and substance as I see it of the corresponding part of the bill now before us is that we are asked to agree to persons from other countries working for the government of another country or the agency of government of another country in Canada having a special one-way privilege.

I have no desire to stir up any animosity towards any other country, friendly or otherwise; far from it. I see no particular point in trying to whip up any feeling with respect to national prestige or national pride, but it does seem to me it is a matter of common sense, and that it should be a matter of concern to us, that an arrangement like this be kept on a reciprocal basis. The minister indicated to us that the purpose of this part of the bill is to make a one-way arrangement of this kind with the United States, so that employees of the United States government or of an agency of the United States government might have a special privilege as radio operators in Canada. I believe that, particularly at this time in international affairs, when that country seems to be doing a lot of pushing around of other people and doing many things in an effort to get its own way, it would not hurt us to say to that country, this kind of arrangement is all right provided it is on a reciprocal basis. I hope the minister and the government, therefore, will, even at this late date in the stages of this piece of legislation, take another look at it and see if it is not possible to achieve what the minister and the government may feel has to be achieved on a reciprocal basis as provided in the act prior to the introduction of this bill, rather than on the one-way basis set out in Bill No. 446.

Perhaps the minister might let the matter stand in committee of the whole for this point to be considered or, since it does involve relations with other countries, he might be prepared to send the bill to the committee on external affairs. In any event, I hope that further consideration will be given by the minister to the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and the point to which I have spoken just now, namely that an arrangement of this kind should be kept on a reciprocal basis.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I thought at first, Mr. Speaker, that Bill No. 446 was quite an innocent bill, and it may yet prove to be that. I have not made up my mind as to that. I have listened with keen interest to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), and again by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It does seem to me that the minister has not given us sufficient information about paragraph (b) to help us make up our minds whether or not we are granting him too much authority. The whole bill places in the hands of the minister quite wide powers, and if he were to be placed in a position where, having granted the employees of the United States certain exemptions under paragraph (b), I wonder what he would say if another country were to come along and ask him to grant the same exemption on the same basis as that granted to employees in the United States?

I can see that he might get Canada into serious trouble by the exercise of the powers granted to him under this bill. It would seem that his safest position would be to say to any country asking for exemption on a one-way basis, well, the act circumscribes my power and does not allow me to grant exemptions unless on a reciprocal basis. We will be glad to sit down and try to work out some such reciprocal agreement. If we cannot, then I just could not grant the exemption. If I were in the minister's place, rather than lay myself open to all the pressures that might be placed upon me after having granted one country and its employees an exemption as provided for in paragraph (b) I would rather be in the position I have described.

For this reason, and for the three reasons already set out by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I would have very serious reservations about supporting the bill on second reading. If in his closing remarks the minister can shed more light on the necessity for providing the exemptions as set out in paragraph (b), then I might change my mind. But at the moment I must join with those who have already spoken in asking the government to take a very careful look at the implications in this bill.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to repeat the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The minister outlined the various types of persons who might be exempt, namely those operating radio stations in Canada, one who holds a certificate for efficiency, and so on, and also made reference to new immigrants coming into this country. He made reference to the pilots who might be flying over Canada and would be anxious to use their radio equipment. He also referred to taxi drivers who might be working on two-way radio systems.

Of course there are a great many other types of people who use radio. I have in mind all those men employed in our coastwise shipping industry, vessels moving between various ports, particularly on the Pacific coast. These vessels use radiotelephony constantly. Then, every fishing vessel is equipped with radiotelephony, and they are constantly talking from ship to ship, or from ship to shore. In fact, any passenger on one of the C.P.R. vessels plying between Vancouver and Victoria, for instance, for a very small charge may speak over the radiotelephone system from ship to Vancouver or from ship to Victoria, or any other point connected by ordinary land-line telephones.

Are all these people expected to obtain special exemption from the minister, or just how does this work? The minister did not explain, and I do not know. If he can spare the time I would appreciate his telling us how it would operate, and how the regulations would apply to men employed on the ships or who are working in fishing vessels off our coasts.

We must also remember that in Canadian waters there are nationals of other countries whose vessels are also equipped with radio and radiotelephone. Just how would it apply either to United States fishermen working in Hecate sound, for instance, or shall we say, to Portuguese fishermen who might be entering our east coast ports off the island of Newfoundland?

We would like to have some explanation on these points. Then, with respect to stations operated by radio operators of another country, I feel I must share the views already expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. It does seem to me that it is opening the door rather wide if we allow an operator from any country to come and have the right to operate from any of our northern islands or in our Arctic territory. I hope a full explanation will be given by the minister.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, looking over the bill and the explanatory notes I was wondering whether there would be any objection to incorporating in the bill itself the very clear explanation given in the explanatory notes. As has been pointed out by other members who have spoken, the bill seems to be drafted in a way such as to open the door very wide, whereas the explanatory note clearly limits the operation of the bill to United States personnel. In that respect I should think the explanatory note is a bit misleading. For example we see that it reads in this way:

> The purpose of this bill is to amend the Radio Act to authorize the employment of United States personnel as radio operators on United States government radio stations in Canada.

That seems to be very clear, and I doubt whether there would be any objection to it. Then the explanatory note goes on to tell us what was in the order in council—which, by the way, we have not been able to locate. Again quoting from the explanatory note:

> Order in council P.C. 3484 of August 8, 1951, made under the Emergency Powers Act, authorized the Minister of Transport to grant permission to the government of the United States to establish and operate radio stations in Canada, and to employ radio operators in connection therewith who are not British subjects.

In the bill itself there is no suggestion that these exemptions will apply only to personnel employed by the United States government on these operations in which the United States government is engaged in Canada, mainly for purposes of defence. It is to that feature of the bill the opposition is quite properly, I suggest, raising objections. Why should it extend now to almost anyone? Why cannot the bill state in its terms the effect of the explanatory notes? Why does the government require such wide powers in this form?

The additions to the section extend to the minister the power to exempt a person who has either the authority to operate a radio station issued by the minister—that is, rather than a valid Canadian certificate—or a certificate of equal validity from some other country.

It is on that ground that objection is taken to this bill; and it would be interesting to hear from the minister just why it is not possible to express as accurately in the bill itself the purpose and intent we are led to believe is behind the measure from reading the explanatory notes.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask a question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, perhaps he would do so at the committee stage.

If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the contributions made thus far in the debate, and I can assure hon. members that the bill is exactly what it purports to be, namely simply a bill which brings into operation the order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act. If the bill is examined more carefully it will be found that paragraph (b) is the paragraph which carries into effect the powers which were given to the governor in council under the Emergency Powers Act. There is little or no change in the rest of the act, save the covering of the landed immigrant, which was not there before. The other part of subparagraph (iii) was there exactly as it is; subparagraphs (i) and (ii) were there practically identical as they are now with the addition of the words: "or other authority to operate a radio station issued by the minister". So that in effect there is little or no change in this legislation from what was contained in the order in council.

Let me deal with the objections raised by the various members who spoke. The objections of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) can be summarized under three or four headings. Perhaps it can be said that he objects to the whole bill as it is now; whereas the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) objects to the (b) part of the bill only, that part which I am sure upon reflection he will agree simply carries into effect the authority to make regulations under the Emergency Powers Act. I will come to that later on.

Mr. Knowles: Don't forget to come to the one-way basis.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, in dealing with the (b) part says: "Why not limit it to the United States; why say in there, a person who is employed as a radio operator on a radio station in Canada by the government of another country or any agency thereof?" The answer is that there might be a request from a NATO country, a country other than the United States, for the same privileges that are being accorded to the United States under paragraph (b).

Now then, dealing with paragraph (b), and here I shall be limited to some extent in what I have to say because a great deal of this I cannot divulge to the house. I think that will explain the position to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. For instance, the Pine Tree stations in Canada are operated now by the United States government. They are in the mid-Arctic, and they are operated partly by the R.C.A.F. and partly by the United States air force. It has been asked, well, why do we not do this on a reciprocal basis? Well, does anyone suggest that we should be operating radio stations in the United States? If anybody sees any reason why we should do it, I would like him to tell me because I am not aware that we are anxious to establish stations of that nature in the United States.

Well, the next group of stations are the United States air bases in Canada which were established prior to union with Newfoundland, some at Argentia, Fort Pepperrell, Harmon field, and I think there is one more, although I am not too sure. All of these stations are in operation now and they are being operated by radio operators who are not British subjects, under the powers contained in the order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act. The same can be said of our own joint stations in the Arctic. By "these stations" I mean the joint weather stations operated by the Americans and the Canadians for meteorological services. There are, if my memory serves me right, some five such stations. There is one at Resolute, one at Isachsen, one at Mould Bay, one at Alert and the others leave my memory for the moment. These stations are operated jointly with the United States government, by virtue of an agreement which was made on the recommendation of the permanent joint board on defence. This was done as the order in council sets out, on the recommendation also of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). That is why paragraph (b) of the bill is placed therein. All paragraph (b) does is to carry into effect the powers taken under the Emergency Powers Act.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra raised the question of landed immigrants and suggested in his remarks that these should be limited to mobile stations. Let me say to him that a great deal, in fact the vast majority, of radio operations do not apply to mobile stations, but to permanent stations such as radiotelephony and radio operations in various locations which are permanent, in construction and tourist camps which are permanent and in a number of other stations. If an immigrant is not going to be allowed to be exempt from the operations of that paragraph then many of these jobs cannot be taken by him.

Reference was made to subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (a) which reads:

> holds a valid Canadian certificate of proficiency, or other authority to operate a radio station issued by the minister, or an equivalent certificate or authority issued by the country of which he is a citizen.

That is already in the act save the words underlined. Let me give an explanation of that and I think I can deal with the objection raised by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes).

The certificate of proficiency mentioned in the act is required in the more advanced and complicated type of radio communication such as the type my hon. friend had in mind: ship radio, ship-to-shore operation, airborne radio, such as a pilot who operates under the ICAO agreement over Canada. The pilot will not be allowed to operate radio unless there is evidence that he has met a requirement similar to that which we have here or something that is equal in standing. The proof of that is that we apply in our own country the requirement laid down by the international civil aviation organization.

Then, the certificate of proficiency has also to do with ground stations for communication with aircraft or with shipping. At the terminals all across Canada the terminals are in constant contact with the aircraft overhead going from one station to another and others are also in constant contact with shipping. Here we require a certificate of proficiency that has been approved by the department.

The same can be said of commercial communications where long distances are involved, but most other types of radio operating are dealt with by lesser authority which is not covered by a certificate such as that which I have been referring to. That has also been laid out in the radio regulations, and if any hon. member cares to obtain for himself these regulations he will find on page 6 regulation 13 (2). Perhaps I had better read regulation 13 (1) first and then (2), because they go together. Regulation 13 (1) reads as follows:

> (1) No person shall act as a radio operator on any station in Canada without a Canadian certificate of proficiency in radio of such class as may be specified in the licence.

Now, this is the provision on which I wish to lay emphasis:

> Nevertheless, the minister may at his discretion permit certain stations or classes of stations to be operated by persons who are not the holders of certificates of proficiency in radio, provided such persons are British subjects and capable of demonstrating to a departmental radio inspector that they are proficient in the operation and maintenance of the equipment at the station on which they are employed.

Now, that section 13 paragraph (2) is designed to cover cases which are not at all like that raised by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. It is designed to cover the case of the ordinary taxi driver who talks through a walkie-talkie with his office, and the case of the construction camp operator who is in control of a truck with a radio system operating from the truck to the office. However, the fact that he must be a British subject prohibits the landed immigrant from such employment. It seemed to us that it would only be fair and reasonable to allow that individual to operate this lesser class of radio station, if I may so call it that, so that if this bill is passed the regulation which I have just read would remain as it is to cover the secondary class, if it may be so called, and we would take out the words "provided such persons are British subjects"; thus in order to cover the landed immigrant the section would simply read:

> Nevertheless, the minister may at his discretion permit certain stations or classes of stations to be operated by persons who are not the holders of certificates of proficiency in radio, provided such persons are capable of demonstrating to a departmental radio inspector that they are proficient in the operation and maintenance of the equipment at the station on which they are employed.

That would not affect in the slightest degree the complicated and more advanced kind of radio communications such as that employed by a pilot in an aircraft in which radio is essential, such as that operated by the mariner on the ship, or the experienced operator on shore who is in constant contact with the ship and equally, such as that used by the operator at an air terminal who is in constant contact with the pilot above.

As regards the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), I think he put his point extremely well because he stated that if only we would put into effect the explanatory notes then he could see no objection to this. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what was done in the (b) part and that, at least for the (b) part itself, is the object of this bill, the other part being there to clarify more than anything else. The object of the bill in part (b) is to carry into effect the provisions of the order in council, and I hope I have been successful in explaining to the house why it would not be practical to secure reciprocal arrangements for places such as those I described earlier.

Finally, there is in my opinion no difference between what is being done here by legislation, and what was being done by order in council under the Emergency Powers Act. It is simply putting the latter into effect and if we were not to put it into effect I am sure we would have to revise all these agreements and arrangements we have made with the country to the south for the defence of the far north and the mid-Arctic.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Exemptions.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if there has been any attempt made by the government to work this problem out on a reciprocal basis with the United States. I can see no reason why as a condition of granting these privileges Canada should not have asked that she be given the same privileges, even though at the moment she may have no use for them. Take, for example, the situation which prevails on the west coast where you have the panhandle of Alaska dropping down across half of the western boundary of British Columbia. It may be of great importance some time to the defence of Prince Rupert, for example, that there should be a Canadian radio station on one of the islands off that city, or it may be vital to the defence of Whitehorse in the Yukon that there should be a Canadian radio station in Alaska.

Now, why should it not be possible for Canada to negotiate a reciprocal agreement with the United States under the terms of which the two countries would have similar rights? If that were done then the act as it reads at present is broad enough to give the governor in council power to grant exemptions to operators on American stations in Canada. But this business of the Canadian government apparently not making any attempt whatsoever to obtain a reciprocal agreement with the United States and giving them one-way rights seems to me a very poor basis on which to deal with the United States or any other country, even though it is a friendly country.

The minister has excused himself on the ground that this provision was dealt with previously under the Emergency Powers Act, but he told us today that it is now to be permanent and is no longer an emergency measure at all. I cannot see why the Canadian government should not have made permanent and proper reciprocal agreements with the United States under which Canada has the same rights in the United States as the United States has in Canada. If that had been done there would be no need whatever for the one-way provision.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the question which my hon. friend puts is this: Why should there not be a reciprocal agreement? Well, when the agreements were entered into some time ago, some years ago in fact, with the United States there was no reason to ask for Canadian installations in the United States because we did not require installations in the United States. When the hon. member puts that question to me in that direct fashion the only answer I can give him is that I must be guided by the Minister of National Defence who feels that similar stations are not required by Canada in the United States.

The arrangements which were made in Newfoundland, I presume, were made before confederation. I think my hon. friend would have to admit that these should be continued. That being the case, if we are not going to continue them under the Emergency Powers Act we must continue them by legislation. The joint weather stations that I referred to earlier are operated partly by the United States and partly by Canada. I can say that just as soon as Canada is able to obtain the necessary personnel to operate these stations, she will do so. We have succeeded in taking over a number of these stations but not all of them, because we have not had the personnel. The position was that when these joint weather stations were established we did not have the necessary personnel. We have now been able to train some of them and gradually we are taking those stations over.

Mr. Green: The minister did not answer part of my question which was this. Has the government made any attempt to negotiate with the United States a reciprocal agreement under which we would have the same rights to establish in the United States a station operated by Canadians as they have to establish in Canada a station which is operated by Americans? Has the government ever attempted to negotiate an agreement of that kind?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I could not answer that question. I was not a party to those negotiations. These negotiations covered far more than radio operations. After all, the radio operations in the agreements were only a portion of it. While they were part of it, the powers which were given to these American operators were given through the Department of Transport by virtue of a permission from the minister to the United States government. But when my hon. friend refers to the agreement, I am afraid that I cannot be of much help because these are matters which were negotiated by a department other than my own.

Mr. Green: Am I fair in saying that so far as the Minister of Transport is concerned, he knows of no negotiations for a reciprocal agreement having been undertaken with the United States?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I could not say that; that would not be fair because that would not be the position in so far as I am concerned. I would have to take the word of those who have negotiated the agreements and who, as far as I know, tell me that the position is such as I have indicated it here.

Mr. Green: The minister knows whether there have been negotiations for a reciprocal agreement or whether there have not been. Which is the case?

Mr. Chevrier: I told my hon. friend earlier that I was not a party to the negotiations and that I could not therefore be of any assistance in that question. My hon. friend wants me to say yes or no. I am not going to say yes or no. I am afraid that if that information is required it will have to be obtained from some other minister.

Mr. Green: The minister knows whether or not there have been negotiations with the United States with regard to a reciprocal agreement.

Mr. Chevrier: There have been.

Mr. Green: The minister says there have been negotiations?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: Have the Americans turned down Canada's request for a reciprocal agreement?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know that a request has been made. I do not imagine that a request has been made. As I said earlier, there was no requirement for Canada operating such stations on American territory. I have now said that twice.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs know that? Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs answer that question?

Mr. Pearson: I cannot give an answer to that question, Mr. Chairman, but I shall be glad to look into it. I have no knowledge of any negotiations of the kind mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: I would suggest to the minister that an attempt be made now to negotiate an agreement on a reciprocal basis so that both countries are treated alike and so that we get in the United States the same rights as they get in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me that the minister is begging the question, if I may put it that way, when he says that we should not press this point about making these arrangements on a reciprocal basis on the ground we do not need any Arctic stations in the United States. Obviously we have the Arctic; the United States has not, except for the references to Alaska and the panhandle which have already been made. Surely we are taking a valid position when we suggest that when arrangements are given to the United States by Canada, the United States should be prepared to give similar arrangements to this country. If the government were to approach the matter in that way, it seems to me that it could be done, as we have already suggested, under the reciprocal language of section 7, subsection 4, paragraph (c) of the present act. In other words, the minister has not brushed aside as easily as he thinks he has our point in this connection.

While I am on my feet I should like to put one or two other questions to the minister. He said this was a simple bill; and the simplest part of it, of course, is the (b) part which, as he says, carries forward into statute form the provisions of the order in council which was passed under the Emergency Powers Act. I regret that I have still been unable to locate a copy of that order in council, despite my best efforts. However, we can only assume that the summary of that order in council listed under the explanatory notes is a correct one. I point out that according to these explanatory notes we are to understand as follows:

> Order in council P.C. 3484 of August 8, 1951, made under the Emergency Powers Act, authorized the Minister of Transport to grant permission to the government of the United States to establish and operate radio stations in Canada, and to employ radio operators in connection therewith who are not British subjects. This order in council will expire on May 31, 1954.

According to that summary of the order in council there are two main features of it. One is the permission to the United States to establish and operate radio stations in Canada. The other is the permission to employ radio operators in connection therewith who are not British subjects. As I see it, the (b) part of this bill carries forward the second of those permissions. It carries forward permission to the United States to employ radio operators in connection therewith who are not British subjects. May I ask the minister this question? Where is there legislation that carries forward that other permission, namely the permission to the United States to establish and operate radio stations in Canada? The explanatory notes say that that permission was provided in order in council P.C. 3484 of August 8, 1951, and that that order in council will expire on May 31, 1954. Perhaps the minister can find the answer to that question.

While I am on my feet—because others may get the floor if I sit down—may I ask one or two other questions? Since we are talking about reciprocal arrangements, and references have been made to pilots of planes flying over Canada under arrangements made under ICAO, may I ask what the situation is with respect to Canadian pilots of Canadian planes when they fly over United States territory? Do they have the right to use their radio sets when they are so doing, despite the fact that they are not United States citizens? Similarly may I ask whether there are Canadians who go to the United States and get jobs driving taxis with two-way radios? Are they permitted to do so? My assumption is that the answer to these two latter questions is in the affirmative. I assume that there is no prohibition against Canadian pilots in Canadian planes flying over the United States using their radio sets. I also strongly suspect that there are Canadians in the United States driving taxicabs with two-way radios. Those are examples of what might be called reciprocal arrangements in those fields. Why can we not have this other matter on a reciprocal basis as well?

Mr. Chevrier: In answering my hon. friend's two questions may I say that the arrangements are entirely reciprocal in the civil field. My hon. friend referred to ICAO pilots flying over Canada. Reciprocally, Canadian pilots fly over the United States and have the same rights as American pilots have here by virtue of ICAO arrangements. Similarly American tourists who move into Canada in automobiles and operate their radio sets are, by virtue of reciprocal arrangements, covered by the Radio Act. So are we when our own citizens move into the United States and operate car radio sets. There is complete reciprocity in the civilian field. My friend raised another point which is not covered in the bill but is covered in section 5 of the act. If he looks at it, I think he will find the answer to his first question.

Mr. Fulton: In the answers the minister gave before second reading of the bill he emphasized that the necessity for the order in council and for the bill we now have before us was largely because of the arrangements we had with the United States for the establishment by them of certain radar stations and the joint operation by ourselves and the United States of some meteorological stations. With respect to the meteorological stations his words, as I recall them, were that these joint stations were instituted on the recommendation of the joint defence board. It seems to me that with respect to both these types of stations the purpose is primarily in connection with joint defence arrangements for the defence of this continent. These arrangements are a necessity to which no one can object.

That being the case, why is it not possible to insert words in the bill which would limit its operation—I refer particularly to subclause (b)—to installations connected with defence, the terms of operation of which installations are the subject of international agreement in that regard? There could be no objection from here or anywhere else to sensible arrangements allowing the United States to use radio operators who are non-Canadians in these stations which they establish under the joint defence arrangements. Why should there be a wide-open provision?

Mr. Chevrier: What section is my hon. friend referring to?

Mr. Fulton: I am referring to subsection (b) particularly of the proposed bill. Why not limit its operation to those stations which are important from a defence point of view, which is the justification that the minister himself gave for its inclusion? As it stands now, it is a wide-open provision under which the government has authority to give permission to any other country. The minister said we might get an application from another NATO country. All right; when we get the application let us deal with it. For that matter, we might get an application from any other country whatsoever whether or not it is a NATO country, and without any words limiting it to joint defence the government would have the power to make that arrangement. I do not understand that to be the basis upon which the government puts it, and I feel we should hear from the minister as to why he does not think it should be limited to installations having a defence significance rather than a wide-open power with no limitation whatsoever.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to consider that. Perhaps the committee will want to discuss this further. On the face of it it may be possible to meet that point. As I say, the reciprocity arrangements cover the civil field only, and it might be possible to add some words at the end of (b) which would meet the position and which would not affect the bill. Perhaps I could consider that while the discussion is going on.

Mr. Stick: The minister referred to the United States bases in Newfoundland which were established under an agreement made during the war. I understand that the bill in no way interferes with that agreement but rather supplements and confirms it. Is that the position?

Mr. Chevrier: Both supplements it and confirms it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wonder whether the minister has a copy of the order in council that was passed.

Mr. Chevrier: I have it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has he placed it on the record yet? I came in late and did not hear the discussion, but I do not remember having seen that order in council at any time among those that were tabled.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not a secret order. I should like to use it during the course of the discussion but I will put the operative words on the record. It is not a long order. I would not like to read it all but perhaps I might put the last part on the record.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister read the full title and any designation thereof? It does not seem to be listed in the consolidated index.

Mr. Chevrier: It is P.C. 3484, privy council, Canada, and is headed, "At the Government House at Ottawa, Wednesday, the 8th day of August, 1951. Present: His Excellency the Governor General in Council." There follow five whereas clauses, and the final clause reads as follows:

> Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport with the concurrence of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence, and under the authority of the Emergency Powers Act, and notwithstanding the provisions of the Radio Act, 1938, or any regulations made thereunder, is pleased, hereby, to authorize the Minister of Transport to grant permission, from time to time, to the government of the United States to establish and operate by its servants or agents, at such authorized military establishments and authorized weather reporting establishments in Canada as he may approve, radio stations equipped with transmitting or receiving radio apparatus or both, and to employ or authorize the employment of radio operators in connection therewith who are not British subjects, such permission to be in such form and terms and on such conditions and for such length of time as he may deem advisable in the public interest.

While I am on my feet, I think perhaps the point of the hon. member for Kamloops might be met, although I should like to carefully consider it, by the addition after the word "thereof" of the words "in consequence of a joint defence arrangement with the government of Canada". That might meet the position of the opposition. On the face of it I do not see any objection to it, but I should like to ask the Minister of Justice to glance at it in the meantime.

Mr. Fulton: I must say that the form of words suggested certainly embraces the point I had in mind so far as subsection (b) is concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This whole matter suggests the tremendous changes that have taken place in recent years in connection with the surrender of territorial rights or rights of sovereignty in consequence of defence. One only has to go back to 1938 at which time the Canadian government did not feel like granting and did not grant to the British government the right to train airmen in Canada because it might be an invasion of the sovereignty of Canada. I should like to ask the minister this question. With the establishment of these weather stations and radio stations connected with defence what arrangement is there between Canada and the United States whereby Canadian sovereignty will be protected and whereby the population of some of these ice cubes of the north, these islands of the north, will actually remain subject to Canadian sovereignty and that sovereignty will in no way be interfered with as the result of co-operation? After all, that is very important in the granting of these rights.

We are asked to grant certain rights. We are asked to give the governor in council certain powers, and I ask the minister to what degree consideration has been given whereby the granting of these rights shall in no way operate as a derogation of Canadian sovereignty or territoriality? After all, if these rights and the right of occupation, the right to establish radio stations and these other types of stations are given, they might also convey in time the right to claim that territory. Surely there must be an agreement whereby these rights are protected. I should like to ask the minister that question particularly, because after all the granting of these rights by parliament may in the end mean the loss of sovereign rights for Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure the hon. member realizes, Mr. Chairman, the implication of the problem that he has raised. It is a problem that might well be raised, not on a bill such as this, but on the estimates of the Department of National Defence since the question he brings up is one that has to do with defence installations in the north. If it is not raised on national defence estimates, then at least it could be raised on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

I can, however, deal with that part of his question that has to do with joint weather stations because that matter comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. In so far as those stations are concerned, it is clearly understood, and I refer to joint stations, that the moment we have the required personnel we shall take over these stations. I mentioned earlier in my remarks five weather recording stations that Canada and the United States have established in Canada. They were Resolute, Mould Bay, Isachsen, Alert and Eureka. Of those five, we are now supplying four. There is still one in the northernmost part of Canada, Alert, that is supplied by the United States. Just as soon as we have the required personnel, not only will we operate these but we will supply Alert just as we are servicing the others now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says that these matters particularly affect the Department of National Defence. In the sidenote to this bill reference is made to the Emergency Powers Act and also the order in council that was passed under the provisions of that act. As I recall it, when the minister read out the order in council there was a reference not only to the Minister of Transport but also to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that this amendment is to incorporate the order in council in question into the act, the matter does become pertinent to the discussion now and not later on when the defence estimates are before the house.

Mr. Chevrier: I think it is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would appreciate it very much if the Minister of National Defence, who has now arrived on the scene, could tell us and assure the committee, that in the establishment of these radio stations and the like in northern Canada provision has been made, other than the general agreement to which the minister referred, so that there shall be no invasion of Canadian sovereignty. To what extent is such agreement in writing and to what extent has it been incorporated into the terms of the joint defence?

I think of a recent example that to me was most surprising. It has to do with an airport at Goose Bay. About the 9th or 10th of May, the T.C.A. found it could not land in Newfoundland but could have landed at Goose Bay and gone on to Montreal. The Goose Bay airport was closed without any prior notification to T.C.A., and remained closed for some four days. That was the information given by the T.C.A. One naturally wonders, when these rights are being granted to the United States, whether or not Canadian rights are protected or whether sovereignty is being exercised at any time in derogation of Canadian sovereign rights over these areas

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member's remarks about Goose Bay are astonishing. Goose Bay is a Canadian airport, operated by Canadians. We have granted, under an agreement which has been tabled in this house, certain rights with regard to the occupation of land by the United States. I cannot conceive of Goose Bay being closed to T.C.A. unless it was closed by reason of weather.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The reason was given that it was being used for other purposes at that time.

Mr. Claxton: If the purposes were other than weather, they were purposes that were agreed upon by the Canadian and United States defence authorities.

With regard to these other places, we have with the United States a common interest in having weather reports that flow from the weather stations up north. At the end of the second world war a number of those stations continued in operation. Adjustments have been made from time to time, but there is no infringement of Canadian sovereignty. Nothing has been done at any stage that infringes Canadian sovereignty. If there is, it should have been brought to the attention of the Canadian authorities and it would have been corrected at once. It has been a co-operative activity in the interests of both countries because we are both interested in navigation by sea and by air. The reports we get from these weather stations are important to both countries.

We have co-operated in the work of these weather stations. As the Minister of Transport has indicated, plans have been worked out under which the operation of the weather stations is being taken over by his department. Everything that has been done has been in recognition of our sovereignty, which up to recent years was questioned only in view of the United States uncertainty about the sector theory. This is recognized by the weather agreement as a practical co-operative effort, designed for our mutual benefit. There is no reason why anyone should have any question about it, particularly since the minister has indicated that his department, as it qualifies personnel, is taking over the operation successively of all the stations.

Mr. Churchill: In view of the wording of paragraph (b) of clause 6, where the United States is not specifically mentioned, may I ask the minister whether any government other than the United States government is now operating a radio station in Canada or has placed before the Canadian government an application or request for the operation of a radio station?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to both questions is no.

Mr. Churchill: Since the Minister of National Defence is teaming up with the Minister of Transport, perhaps I could get an answer to this question with regard to the little Pentagon that is arising at Washington under Canadian auspices. Has any consideration been given to radio communication between Ottawa and that building in the future? If so, would that not form the basis of a reciprocal agreement?

Mr. Chevrier: So far as I know there has been no indication other than what has appeared in the press.

Mr. Claxton: I might suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that this question of a Canadian pentagon in Washington is totally irrelevant to this discussion. If anyone can build a functional building in Washington suitable for the job that is being done cheaper than it is being done there then I would like to find why their tenders were not received on the call that was made by the Department of Defence Production. But we are talking about radio now, and we have continuous telephone and radio communication with Washington.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister going to move an amendment such as he has drafted, before the clause carries?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Paragraph (b) of the clause would read:

"a person who is employed as a radio operator on a radio station in Canada by the government of another country or any agency thereof, in consequence of a joint defence arrangement with the government of Canada".

Mr. Garson: I move:

That clause 1 be amended by adding after the word "thereof" in the 25th line, the following words:

"in consequence of a joint defence arrangement with the government of Canada".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Green: I have one question to ask before the clause is carried. Is there any certificate required in the case of a plane which flies over Canada pursuant to international agreement? My understanding is that they do not require to have a certificate from the minister's department. I am asking the question because in his speech opening the debate on second reading today he gave that as one reason for requiring the amendment. He said this evening that a Canadian aircraft flying over the United States has the same right as an American plane flying over Canada. Is it or is it not a fact that the minister has to give the pilot of each of those American planes some kind of permit?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer is no. The certificate required by the country which subscribes to the ICAO agreement is a certificate given by the government of that country to the satisfaction of ICAO. That is accepted by Canada, just as our certificate of ICAO is accepted by other countries signatory to the ICAO agreement.

Mr. Green: This bill was not required, then, in order that Canada might carry out her international agreements?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I am informed that up to a point it is, for those pilots who are residents of Canada. Some non-British pilots such as those of K.L.M. live in Montreal.

Mr. Green: They would be licensed in the ordinary way, just as a pilot flying for Trans-Canada Air Lines would be licensed?

Mr. Chevrier: They could be; but the object of the amendment is to cover that case.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister say something more with regard to the question I put to him a short time ago. It is difficult to discuss this without having the order in council to look at. I did go across the floor to take a quick look at it in the minister's possession. From my looking at it, it seems quite clear that the permission to the United States government to establish a radio station in Canada is provided under that order in council passed under the Emergency Powers Act. As I see it, that part of the order in council is not being carried forward in this bill. The only part being carried forward in the bill is the permission to persons who are not British subjects to operate those stations.

My previous question was this: Where is the continuing authority for the establishing and operating of radio stations in Canada? When he was answering me earlier the minister said, very briefly, that I should look at section 5 of the present act. Well that is a section with about twenty lines in it, and I shall not take the time of the house to read it aloud. However, I have looked at it and I am not sure where in that section there is any authority for the granting of permission to the United States to operate stations in Canada.

If the authority was there, why was it included in the order in council under the Emergency Powers Act? Or is this just another case of the government using the Emergency Powers Act as a convenience?

I wish the minister would address himself to the matter. He has the order in council in front of him, and that is more than we have. He can see that it says in there that it included permission to the government of the United States to establish stations in Canada. When the statutory basis for that order in council disappears, what is the basis for the continuing permission?

Mr. Chevrier: It is covered in the amendment before the house now. I tried to answer my hon. friend's question, in part, when I said that it had been covered by section 5. Section 5 of the act now says that: no person shall establish a radio station or instal, operate or have in his possession a radio apparatus or on any aircraft registered in Canada, except under and in accordance with a licence granted by the minister in that behalf.

That, I think, covers the point my hon. friend raised.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says the authority to grant such licence is contained in section 5 of the Radio Act. Why, then, was it spelled out in the order in council under the War Measures Act?

Mr. Chevrier: To deal with persons qualified to operate.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is just jumping back and forth from one question to the other. I recognize that this bill carries forward the right to grant permission to persons to operate these stations, even though they are not British subjects. That part of what was in the order in council is being carried forward in this bill. But the other part in the order in council is permission to establish stations in Canada, and that certainly is not being carried forward in the present bill. The minister now says it is contained in section 5 of the Radio Act, initially. If so, then surely there was a mistake when it was included in the order in council under the Emergency Powers Act.

The Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister put the order in council on Hansard. As a matter of fact, I was not able to find it. The minister has said that it was not secret, yet it does not seem to be included in the registry.

Mr. Chevrier: I shall table it after we finish discussion on the bill, because this is the only copy I have. If there is no further discussion I shall table it now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Include it in Hansard.

The Chairman: The minister cannot table a document while we are in committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It could be included in Hansard.

Mr. Green: It would be very helpful if the order in council were printed in Hansard with the debate. Part of it has been put on now.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps when we get back to the point where Mr. Speaker is in the chair I could ask for permission to revert to motions, and then table it.

The Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 3484

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister permission to revert to motions to table a document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: I now table order in council P.C. 3484 of August 8, 1951.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING POLICING, HARBOUR TOLLS, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 421, to amend the National Harbours Board Act.

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to state now that at the conclusion of this debate a motion will be made to refer the bill to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and therefore my opening remarks will tend to give as complete a picture as possible of the contemplated legislation whilst not burdening the house with lengthy details which can be obtained more efficiently when the measure is before the standing committee.

The National Harbours Board Act was passed by parliament in 1936. It has never been amended since that time, except in 1938, and that was to give the board power to sue and to be sued in its own name in tort. It is evident that over a period of some eighteen years many changes have occurred, and these amendments are being included for the purpose of bringing the act up to date. The purpose of these amendments is to clarify the existing legal position; to eliminate provisions which have been rendered superfluous by other acts; to remove cumbersome phrases and to make a few substantive alterations. While these are few in number, I should like to list them for the house now.

One has to do with the extension of the provisions of the act, to include additional persons who may be charged for services under the act. At the present time charges are made against owners. This amendment would extend the liability to include carriers and bailees as contrasted with the actual owners thereof. In many instances the carriers or the bailees are the only persons with whom the board has any dealings at all. Also to empower the governor in council to name a temporary member to the board where a member has been delegated to other governmental duties. This situation occurred during the second world war, and it was dealt with under the authority of the War Measures Act.

A new section is provided to eliminate all necessity of swearing in harbour police as special constables of some municipal or provincial police force or the R.C.M.P. The status created would be analogous to that established by the Railway Act for railway constables. To raise the limit of non-tender contracts from the former $10,000, fixed by the way in 1936, to $15,000; to empower the board on the approval of the governor in council to purchase and sell supplies, salvage and so forth; in fact, anything except land or real estate property up to a certain limit designated by the governor in council as the board's bylaws may prescribe. And here I wish to add that all the board's bylaws have to be approved by the governor in council.

There are also express provisions that the governor in council may make bylaws governing the handling, storing and so forth, even on private property in the board's harbours, of explosives or dangerous goods within any harbour under the board's jurisdiction.

There is also a section to enable the board to contract itself out of liability for negligence. In a number of instances, such as the granting of permission to bring explosives into a harbour, or the acceptance of highly perishable goods in storage, the revenue does not justify the risk incurred by the board unless the board, like any private operator in the same circumstances, possesses a capacity of restricting the liability which could conceivably arise through the negligence of some minor board employee.

[Mr. Langlois (Gaspe).]

There is also a clause in the bill to enable bylaws and the charges thereunder to be made binding on other agencies or departments of the crown, whether in the right of Canada or in that of any of the ten provinces, the reason being that the board operates to a large extent as a quasi-commercial corporation and must submit separate reports to parliament on its financial operation.

There is also an express provision in the bill for the acceptance by the courts of a copy of any bylaw, certified by the secretary of the board, as full evidence of such bylaw. This is merely a matter of convenience and is a common provision in statutes of this type.

There is also a clause to broaden the so-called "commutation authority" to cover explicitly commutations, reductions and waivers in respect of board charges imposed by bylaw.

There is a provision in the bill to give a general lien which would be enforceable against any goods of a debtor of the board whether or not the debt was incurred on the specific goods.

The period during which board tolls shall continue to accrue on goods seized and detained would be restricted to a maximum of thirty days. In the absence of such an amendment the period of accrual of charges could be almost unrestricted, and it is considered that this point should be clarified and explicitly covered.

There is an alteration extending the purview of the board's bylaws to all property under board administration as contrasted with the harbours alone. This would, for instance, apply to the grain elevators at Prescott and Port Colborne.

Apart from the foregoing, the bill also contains a few additional but very minor amendments which, like some of those already mentioned, effect no substantive change but serve to make more explicit, or to place in a more logical position within the act, provisions already existing. Such minor alterations would constitute a clarification of those provisions of the act relating to the awarding of contracts and relating to the use of harbours, and so forth, by vessels and aircraft; seizure, detention and sale of vessels and goods; board's right to sue for charges notwithstanding the seizure of goods and the repeal of a few obsolete provisions of the act.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I feel something should be said on this bill by those who are concerned with the seaports of our eastern provinces because of the prominent part played in their life by the national harbours board. Since the bill is to be referred to a committee for study I will make my remarks as brief as possible.

This is an act to amend the National Harbours Board Act and someone has said that it is routine with no great change in principle. While I would not go that far, Mr. Speaker, I think it might be suggested that it is an example of a government body grabbing more power, and it is an example of government by order in council.

There are one or two sections proposed in the bill which will fill the gap left by the Emergency Powers Act and the following considerations should be kept in mind when we consider the bill as a whole.

I believe most hon. members will agree that it is desirable we should have provision in our statute law for the efficient working of our waterfronts. In this regard we have two important matters that should be considered, and I refer to strikes and to explosions. It is necessary in this day and age that we have sufficient authority to deal with strikes, but we should be careful to consider the arbitrary power that might be given to police officers in dealing with such strikes.

The matter of explosions is also considered in this bill and I feel that in this respect we are still in need of greater restrictions as regards ammunition ships in our harbours. Surely the lessons of the Halifax explosion and others should convince us that we must be more careful in this respect. I think we are still behind the United States in the restrictions placed on ships in regard to explosives, and also in the authority given to the various boards that have to deal with such matters.

This bill has already been dealt with in the other place, and I feel it was given the most careful consideration by the other place both on second reading and when it went before the transport and communications committee. However there are still two or three points which bother me and I will just touch on them briefly now.

The matter of police officers and their policing duties is still a sore point. The bill deals with their appointment, jurisdiction, and authority, and while amendments were proposed in the other place which have cut down the further power sought by them I still feel an explanation will have to be given in committee as to some of their rights and powers. Their jurisdiction has been extended to cover a fifty-mile radius, and I would like an explanation, when the time comes, as to why such an extensive distance has been included.

Another matter which was referred to by the parliamentary assistant in his very careful explanation is the restriction on liability. I feel that perhaps the right of the harbours board to be able to contract themselves out of certain liability as regards explosives responsibility in the various ports could be considered, though I feel that if this right is to be passed off to someone else there should be some restrictions on the parties who are to assume that right. In other words, we would not wish to see the responsibility for explosions in our harbours passed on to some bodies who are not in a position to accept this liability and to make amends in the case of an explosion.

Generally, I think the details of the bill are commendable. It is a good measure and we are pleased to see that the financial administration of the board is being changed in some respects so that it may come under the Financial Administration Act.

I believe that down our way the administration of the national harbours board has been fairly good, and I was pleased to see that new appointments were made at Ottawa the other day.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that this is another example of piecemeal legislation. In this legislation hunks have been taken out here and hunks thrown in there and it is rather confusing when one considers it all. But I would like to emphasize that we must be careful to bear the individual's rights in mind when considering this granting of arbitrary power to police officers. That, to my mind, is most important. The phrase "the rights of the individual" is used very loosely nowadays, and one can always argue these matters. Nevertheless when you get local conditions in which police officers of the harbours board come in contact with longshoremen and with men working in the ports there arises a considerable amount of animosity, though the actual criminal negligence that might be a consideration amounts only to petty pilfering, liquor traffic and things such as that. Therefore, we must strike the happy medium between the two, and we must see to it that the officers of the harbours board are given enough authority to conduct their business, though at the same time it must not be sufficiently arbitrary as to interfere with the rights of our citizens. We will be looking closely at this bill in committee.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up the time of the house in any long discussion on this bill in second reading, though I might say, as one of the representatives for the city of Vancouver, that to our city any change in an act of this nature is of the utmost importance.

I have read the bill through twice and I have found it very technical, so I am glad that the minister is going to refer the bill to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I find myself in the same position as the previous speaker in wishing to emphasize the importance of close and careful study being made of the bill when it is referred to that committee, and the fullest possible information being made available to members of the committee because I do not understand the technical aspects of this measure and I will certainly expect to hear some explanations when the committee meets.

As the hon. member who has just spoken pointed out, there is a change in the granting of authority for the appointment of police officers and I note that in their appointment these officers are to have the powers of peace officers within the meaning of the Criminal Code. That is quite understandable on property which is administered by the national harbours board, but I cannot understand why a special constable should have the authority of a peace officer, within the meaning of the Criminal Code, fifty miles away from the property owned or under the administration of the harbours board. It is because of these technical questions, which I feel should be explained, that I am very glad this bill is being referred to a committee of this house.

Mr. Speaker: If the parliamentary assistant speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation of the reasonable tone adopted by the two hon. members who spoke on this subject here tonight. I wish to refer briefly to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell). I can assure him that it is not the purpose of the bill to grab more power, as he expressed it, but rather that it is brought forward, as I said in my opening statement, only to clarify the existing act and to add whatever modifications or amendments have proved themselves to be necessary over a period of some eighteen years of experience and operation by the national harbours board.

He made some reference to regulations with regard to explosives. There are in force comprehensive regulations made under the authority of the Canada Shipping Act. There are also some regulations made by the national harbours board and also some under the authority of the Railway Act. But with regard to the carrying of explosives in naval vessels, may I say that this matter comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) exclusively.

Both the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) have expressed some views with regard to the making of harbour constables into peace officers and have also expressed some opposition to their jurisdiction over a distance of fifty miles, as mentioned in the bill. I must repeat here that all we propose to do is to give the harbour constables a status which is comparable to that at present enjoyed by railway constables under the Railway Act.

Mr. Green: May I ask the parliamentary assistant a question on that point?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Yes.

Mr. Green: Is it not a fact that under the Railway Act the jurisdiction is only half a mile?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): No. I wish to refer my hon. friend here to section 456 of the Railway Act and subsequent sections, especially section 457 which gives the territorial limits of constables' jurisdiction as follows:

> Every constable so appointed, who has taken such or made such declaration, may act as a constable for the preservation of the peace, and for the security of persons and property against unlawful acts
> (a) on such railway, and on any of the works belonging thereto;
> (b) on and about any trains, roads, wharfs, quays, landing places, warehouses, lands and premises belonging to such company, whether the same are in the county, city, town, parish, district or other local jurisdiction within which he was appointed or in any other place through which such railway passes or in which the same terminates, or through or to which any railway passes which is worked or leased by such company; and
> (c) in all places not more than a quarter of a mile distant from such railway.

Mr. Green: It is a quarter of a mile. I said half a mile.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): It might be more than a quarter of a mile from the place where the offence was committed—it is a quarter of a mile from the railway, but it extends over the distance which the railway runs.

Mr. Green: There is a big difference between that and fifty miles.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): To answer this point about the fifty-mile territorial jurisdiction of a constable of the national harbours board I must say, for example, that the harbour of Montreal extends over a distance of some thirty miles and, if my memory serves me correctly, it is in four different municipal districts. The same thing applies to the harbour at Vancouver. The hon. member for Vancouver East will correct me if I am wrong, but I think the property of the national harbours board in the port of Vancouver extends over the districts of three different municipalities, namely that of Vancouver city, that of Burnaby and that of North Vancouver. That is why it has been found necessary to give this fifty-mile territorial limit to the jurisdiction of harbours board constables.

Mr. Green: May I ask the parliamentary assistant a question on that point?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Yes.

Mr. Green: Is it not a fact that the bill gives these constables jurisdiction over all the harbours board property and, in addition, over fifty miles in every direction from the harbours board property?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I must remind my hon. friend that the offence must have been committed in connection with some of the board's property and the fifty-mile limit—and this will be explained in much more detail when the bill is before the standing committee—is, as I understand it, from the property in connection with which the offence was committed. I must give another instance. For example, suppose you have a motorist violating the speed limit on the Jacques Cartier bridge in Montreal. It is rather difficult to determine exactly where the offence was committed. Was it committed just on that line separating the two municipalities of Montreal on this side and St. Lambert, I think it is, on the other side? In addition to that consideration, you must give the board's constable the right to pursue this violator of the speed limit, and he may have to travel quite a few miles chasing the motorist. In any event, as I stated, many more instances and reasons in support of this particular feature of the bill will be given when it is before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I just wish to say that, before this standing committee, every opportunity will be given to hon. members to get any information they wish from the representatives of the national harbours board and their counsel, who will be in attendance.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) I move that this bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion for second reading of this bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

DISABLED PERSONS

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF ALLOWANCES—AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting allowances for disabled persons and to provide for the payment to the provinces out of the consolidated revenue fund of amounts in respect of allowances for disabled persons paid by the provinces, to certain persons who have attained the age of eighteen years, and who are totally and permanently disabled and in need of such allowances, not exceeding in respect of any recipient fifty per centum of forty dollars monthly or of the amount of the allowance paid by the provinces monthly to the recipients, whichever is the lesser; and to provide for the making of agreements with the provinces in relation thereto and for the conditions and duration of such agreements.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister going to make a brief statement about the matter at this stage?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I had thought that if we could agree to have the discussion of the measure on second reading it might avoid duplication and save some time. Of course I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. Knowles: I think it will meet with the approval of hon. members generally that we have the main discussion of this legislation on second reading and in committee of the whole. May I take a minute or two to suggest to the minister that in view of such information as is contained in the resolution now before us I hope he will come prepared at these other stages to deal rather seriously with certain points. I shall refrain from going into them in any detail at this time, but I do wish to suggest that as the resolution now reads it indicates certain inadequacies in the proposed legislation.

The house has been asking for legislation of this kind and waiting for it for a long time, and I do hope that when it is brought in the definition of "disabled"—with those qualifying words "totally and permanently"—will not be so restrictive as to limit the pension to too few of those of our citizens who need and deserve it. I also want to say that when we reach the later stages we will have something to say about the proposed amount, the age at which it is to be paid, the fifty-fifty division between Ottawa and the provinces, the residence qualification, the means test and other matters. In other words, as the minister knows we welcome this legislation but there is certainly room for improvement in the terms in which it is forecast and we hope that those improvements may be made even before the bill is introduced.

Mr. Blair: Last year when a similar resolution presented by a private member was before the house I think every hon. member was in favour of it. It is a matter that has been before the house a great many times during the past few years. We welcome this resolution. We are glad that the legislation is being introduced, and we also feel that we would like to withhold our comments until the bill is up for second reading. This is not going to be an easy bill. I quite realize, and I pointed out to the house last year, the difficulties in trying to formulate some type of legislation to cover the proof of disability. At that time I cited the various regulations in vogue in the United States where a bill of this type was brought before the legislative body some years ago. Practically every state to which I referred gives a different meaning to total and permanent disability.

When the matter was before the house last year I remember describing it as a gap in our social security program. Therefore I appreciate the fact that the bill is now being brought in, and we will discuss it clause by clause when it comes up later.

Mr. Castleden: I should like to ask the minister a question. He mentioned previously in the house that certain provinces had not passed enabling legislation and others had. I wonder whether he intends to give us that information this evening. Perhaps the Secretary of State can also help us out in this regard. I see him helping the minister. I know that this legislation is being anticipated with a great deal of hope and expectation by people throughout Canada. I have in mind particularly a young couple in my own constituency with four children, three of whom are totally and permanently disabled. This kind of thing is a tragedy. It is a terrific handicap not only to the parents but to the child who is well. I hope that the legislation will cover them. I should also like to know whether or not the enabling legislation in the various provinces will in any way hinder the coming into operation of the act.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Castleden: Would the minister make a statement with respect to the enabling legislation?

Mr. Martin: I had suggested to the house that perhaps this was not the moment for a general discussion of the measure. Having expressed that wish I would not want to violate what I urged on the committee. Therefore I will simply say that when the measure does reach second reading I will be prepared to discuss it in detail and to indicate that the bill in its main features was discussed with all the provincial governments. Generally speaking it represents not a compromise but an acceptance of their most common position, and I am sure when the measure is introduced it will appeal to all hon. members as a very important contribution toward providing assistance to a great segment of our population whom we all, within our capacity, want to help.

Mr. Castleden: We can all agree with that, but the point as to whether or not certain provinces have passed enabling legislation is not something that you are going to put in or leave out of the legislation. I wanted to get the information. After the very fine discussions the minister has had with the provinces, perhaps he might tell us how many of them have already passed enabling legislation. Could he not give the committee that information now?

Mr. Martin: Some five provinces have already passed enabling legislation. While I am on my feet, I should like to say at the outset to the house and to the country that, while I am sponsoring the bill, the real author of the legislation is the Prime Minister himself. Within a week of the holding of the last general election the Prime Minister wrote to me from his summer home. He said that he had been giving this matter his attention and he was now of the opinion, although the matter had not been discussed in the months immediately before the election, that this was a measure to which we should now address ourselves. I think that I should pay this tribute to the Prime Minister's humanitarian instincts by saying that this bill would not have been introduced at this time but for the initiative which he himself took.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Martin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 462, to provide for allowances for disabled persons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LICENCES, REGULATIONS, ETC.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. 422, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacInnis: Before anything is said on this matter, I want to rise on a question of privilege. It is now past ten o'clock, our adjournment time. If we are to continue each evening for some further period then there should be a motion moved in the house to make the procedure regular. I know there are some members who would prefer, if the working day is going to be lengthened, that we should lengthen it in the morning rather than at night. There may be others who are of a different mind, but the house should decide and we should not be carrying on without a vote of the house.

Mr. Harris: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is the government's intention, based I understand on the unanimous consent of other parties in the house, to present a motion that commencing next Monday morning we shall sit in the mornings. In the meantime, however, if the house feels that they can do extra work for an hour in the evening, I think perhaps that ought to be done if it suits hon. members. Rather than make a formal motion to cover the whole of the time, we thought that perhaps each evening a decision might be made, having in mind the amount of work done and the general progress made.

If that is not acceptable we could, of course, make a formal motion, but I suggest that we should not. Each evening at ten o'clock, if hon. members feel they can carry on for another hour they might do so, for the time being at least, and for tonight I suggest we might carry on until eleven and consider the situation tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister if he thinks it is fair to other members and to the staff not to know from day to day at what hour the adjournment is to take place? I am not objecting to the lengthening of the day. I have tried to be co-operative throughout with respect to this matter, and the minister will confirm that. However, I do believe there should be something definite for the benefit of all concerned.

Mr. Harris: I suppose the government ought to accept the responsibility. My hon. friend has just said he has no position on it, and therefore I would not want to impose upon him now the order for the rest of the week if that did not suit him.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I did not say I had no position. I said I was trying to be co-operative. I stated my position on Friday night, and it was the same as that of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I thought there should be a proper motion—and there could be one even now if you want an extension.

Mr. Harris: Could we, for the 57 minutes remaining, continue by consent and consider this tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of National Health and Welfare moves that this bill entitled "An act to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act" be now read a second time.

Mr. Castleden: It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I understood there was general agreement that we continue for a few minutes. If my understanding was not correct, of course I will call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Castleden: I do not think there is any general agreement. There are several members who have mentioned ten o'clock. I do not think there is agreement to continue.

Mr. Martin: If it will help the hon. gentleman, I am willing to continue.

Mr. Castleden: What good is that?

Mr. Speaker: Will the minister adjourn this debate?

Mr. Martin: If you ask me, Mr. Speaker, I shall do so.

On motion of Mr. Martin the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall take the third readings that are ready, and then the bill with respect to the extension of the Canadian National Railways; the resolution with respect to the Public Service Superannuation Act; the resolution with respect to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; second reading of the Research Council Act; second reading of the bill for which we have just passed the resolution with respect to the allowances for disabled persons; then go into ways and means and take the budget resolutions.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 25, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FREIGHT RATES

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER UNDER INQUIRIES ACT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table order in council P.C. 1954-760 appointing as a commissioner under the Inquiries Act the Hon. W. F. A. Turgeon, Q.C., LL.D., a member of the Queen's privy council for Canada, to inquire into the application and effects of agreed charges made by the railways under part 4 of the Transport Act.

Hon. members will recall that in 1951 the Railway Act was amended to provide that where competitive transcontinental tariffs are established by the railways, freight rates on the same goods shipped to or from intermediate points shall not exceed by more than one-third the rates in such competitive transcontinental tariffs. This amendment was made in accordance with one of the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation, of which the Hon. Mr. Turgeon was chairman.

The government of the province of Alberta has recently made representations to this government that this so-called one and one-third rule in the Railway Act should be extended by parliament to apply to agreed charges made by the railways with the authorization of the board of transport commissioners under part I, section 4 of the Transport Act. The government has come to the conclusion that this proposal requires detailed study before its merits can be properly assessed. There are many interests involved —those of producers, purchasers, the railways and other transportation agencies and the public generally at intermediate points as well as in eastern Canada and on the Pacific coast. The subject is one which is closely related to the subject matter of the report of the royal commission on transportation but on which the commission did not make any recommendation. Consequently the government has arranged with the Hon. Mr. Turgeon to serve as a commissioner to inquire into this particular question of agreed charges, taking into account the representations that have been made on it and all other relevant considerations including developments since the royal commission reported in 1951.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO SALE OF SURPLUS TO U.S.S.R.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Agriculture and to ask whether or not within the last few days there has been a sale of surplus butter to the U.S.S.R.; if so, at what price and how much; and are further sales expected?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there have not been any sales of butter held by the agricultural prices support board outside of Canada up to the present.

PUBLIC SERVANTS' INVENTIONS

PROVISION FOR OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT AND PAYMENT

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 444, respecting inventions by public servants.

Mr. Speaker: The Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) moves—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would you allow a further question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid that the hon. member was not on his feet quickly enough. The deputy clerk has read the orders of the day and I am now about to put the question for third reading of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I want to take just one minute to refer to the report of the debate which took place on the bill yesterday which appears in the Montreal Gazette this morning under the heading "Military Inventions Unprotected". I have not the slightest doubt that this Canadian Press report was written in perfect good faith but in the first paragraph it says the precise opposite of what I said in the house, and I do not think that is an impression that any hon. member would want to have spread about. It said:

> State Secretary Pickersgill said today there is no law to prevent a privately-owned invention of a military nature from becoming public property and reaching a potential enemy.

Inventions by Public Servants

What I actually said in reply to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) who made a most useful intervention on this point yesterday was that the law did provide, in so far as we thought the law could do so, for precisely this kind of thing in sections 20, 21 and 22 of the Patent Act and that under the provisions of the law it was the duty of the commissioner to see that such applications are scrutinized in the kind of way that the Leader of the Opposition had in mind before anything is made public about them. The government has been given authority to keep them secret if they have military significance. I felt it only right yesterday to go on and point out that there was one danger against which the law could not, as far as we could see, provide, namely that if someone invented something and, for example, did not try to patent it but rather made a speech about it or wrote an article about it or something of that sort, no law could prevent that kind of thing. In view of what was said yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition I feel that it would be desirable, when the commission of inquiry into the Patent Act is set up, to have this point drawn particularly to the attention of that inquiry and I shall be glad to do so.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) has raised this point, I should like to supplement the remarks he has made because I appreciate greatly the manner in which this subject is being approached. My concern related to a warning which had been given by Sir Robert Watson-Watt with regard to the possibility of very important secrets being disclosed in the filing of patents. I welcome the statement by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) that when the patent commission is being set up he will draw to their attention the necessity of guarding in some way against the dangers pointed out by Sir Robert Watson-Watt as exemplified by the disclosure of the Whittle patent to German agents resulting in the actual development of the jet engine in Germany before it was developed in Britain. I welcome this assurance, but in view of the assurance may I also add the suggestion that Sir Robert Watson-Watt made, namely that in addition to being as careful as possible to prevent the filing of patents which would disclose very important secrets care should also be taken that anything of that kind should not become a barrier to development, and the lack of enthusiasm for a new idea on the part of officials should not be permitted to become in itself a hindrance to development.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

I recognize that this presents a very great problem for the consideration of the commission. I would refer to the speech of Sir Robert Watson-Watt in which he suggested a combination of technical and official skill in order to determine the very difficult balance between protection against publicity on the one side and on the other side protection against interference with possible development.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

RADIO ACT

AMENDMENT TO AUTHORIZE EMPLOYMENT OF UNITED STATES PERSONNEL AND IMMIGRANTS AS RADIO OPERATORS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 446, to amend the Radio Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. FELICIEN AND HILLSPORT LINES—PROVISION FOR FINANCING

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 442, respecting the construction of lines of railway by Canadian National Railway Company from St. Felicien to Chibougamau and from Chibougamau to Beattyville, all in the province of Quebec, and from Hillsport on the main line of the Canadian National Railways to Manitouwadge lake, both in the province of Ontario.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: I might point out to hon. members that this bill has been considered by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

On clause 1—Construction and completion.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, there has been considerable discussion of the bill now before us. We have had an explanation from the minister and the bill has been discussed in the standing committee. I think it is possible to say that in the way this problem is being attacked it is being attacked by men with little confidence in the future of at least part of the area which the line in the province of Quebec is designed to serve. Those who have little thoughts are going to accomplish only little things. Those who have great thoughts and great confidence are going to accomplish great things. I think that those of us who have true faith—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hamilton: —not only in the central area of Canada, not only in the parts which are already built up, not only in the parts which have already proved themselves, but who also have faith in the hinterlands of this country, in the areas about which we do not know a great deal yet except that we do know they hold great promise, are disturbed, worried and unhappy about the attitude displayed in the information given us on this bill.

I think we can call it a sort of lick and promise bill. One half of it is the lick inasmuch as we are informed that half the line will be built, and the other half is the promise because we have no indication as to when, how or under what circumstances the second section of the line will be built. It is a lick and a promise measure, one part of the line to be built in the immediate future and with respect to the other part a rather vague and indefinite promise extending far into the future. One of the things we must note about the bill is that it contains the indication that any time within the next ten years the second section of the line may be constructed, and if it is not convenient to do so within the next ten years then at any time in the future beyond the ten year period, beyond the year 1964 mentioned in the bill, the governor in council may continue its provisions in force in order that the line may then be constructed.

Can anything, Mr. Chairman, be much more indefinite than that? Can anything be much more foolish in the light of the circumstances than to suggest that we should build a railway line, half of which we will build now leaving the end almost suspended in mid-air, and the other half, the half which logically completes the line, the half which runs to the sea, the half which connects finally with a seaport which can become great, will not be built until some indefinite time in the future? The minister and the witnesses who appeared before the standing committee advanced reasons why this course is being followed. From the information given to us I think these reasons may be summarized by saying that the part of the line extending from Beattyville to Chibougamau is to be built through an area from which sufficient traffic can be guaranteed for the railroad line through signed contracts to ensure beyond any shadow of doubt that it will be an economically feasible proposition. The other half is to be built through territory where, according to the information given to us, such written guarantees are not possible. In the light of that the minister suggests: Let us build the line in so far, so to speak, as the money is on the line, but let us not take any chance, let us not have any faith, let us not go beyond that point and develop the rest of the line. Let us simply leave that hanging in the air as a promise. When we examine the minister's statement we find that he says that he will build it at some time in the future. He and the witnesses who appeared before the committee indicated that they know there is promise in that area, that some day they will be able to build the line, and that almost from the day their trains run over it they will have an indication that it will be a profitable part of their operations. We then ask: What indications are there that this change is going to take place? What is going to happen between Chibougamau and St. Felicien in the next few years that will make this economic change possible? We know of nothing, we cannot pinpoint anything, that is going to happen. We just believe that the natural growth of the country is going to merit the construction of this line within the next few years. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, thereon hangs one of the most disturbing facets of this entire proposition. There is no concrete indication that anything is going to happen in that particular territory within the next few years to merit the building of this line.

We are told by the minister that he definitely plans to build it within the next few years. To me, Mr. Chairman, that indicates clearly a lack of confidence that this line is going to be actually built. If these things are going to happen—I believe they will happen, I know they will happen because they have happened so often before in this country—within the next four or five years, they could be speeded up immeasurably, the area could be made more profitable and more interesting, more developmental projects could be undertaken immediately upon the construction of this line. But if we are going to stand back and wait for the normal growth of the territory, we are displaying a lack of confidence, and worse than that we are putting off until some indefinite date in the future the construction of a line that merits building now.

It seems to me, and I think to many others, that we have a choice here between helping the growth of this area through the building of the railways and waiting for the growth of the area to help the building of the railway, the two propositions being unalterably opposed to one another. The development of Canada, almost without exception, has followed not preceded the construction of our great railroads. The west was opened up following upon the construction of the great railway line which this party supported. The other part, the area around Hudson bay, for example, and mining and lumbering particularly, developed as a result of the growth of that railroad that is now known as the Ontario Northland railroad, or the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railroad, as I like to think of it.

We cannot expect people to go into an area, to open up mines, to construct mills, to cut lumber and to do all these things to aid industrial growth, if we, as a government and as a nation, do not have sufficient confidence in the area ourselves to supply them with the basic transportation that it is essential for them to have. Let us remember that if this line is built in its entirety it will have at one end Chicoutimi and Port Alfred. Port Alfred is a deep-water port at the head of the Saguenay river, a port which even now handles a great volume of shipping. Almost all of this shipping is concerned with the area immediately around Chicoutimi and Port Alfred. If the railroad line were built it would run back from there over an area that is rich in timberland, that has great agricultural possibilities, an area of which we do not yet know the mineral possibilities. It will go into Chibougamau, where some of Canada's greatest mines are located, and then over the line that it is already agreed to build immediately and cut back over another area of great mineralization. Ultimately, it will go through Beattyville and into Noranda, thus connecting up the great territory of Ontario and Quebec, which would become tributary to Port Alfred and Chicoutimi. Through the port would then flow, over far less rail miles than are now necessary, supplies for a great part of Canada which must now get them at greater expense through more southerly ports.

Let us remember, Mr. Chairman, that if this government does not have confidence in that area at least the provincial government has, and has backed that confidence by the construction of a road from Chicoutimi into that territory. Approximately $4 million went into the building of the road. At the end of it grew mines where there were no mines before; there grew industry where there was no industry; there grew merchandising and marketing as well as a city, where there was no city before. These things are the result of confidence, the result of a belief in the future and the result of doing something. I am not standing here, Mr. Chairman, to make a political argument out of this thing. I am standing here because I come from a province which, in the past few years, has grown into something that one would hardly have believed possible.

As I argue for the construction of this railroad line, I am thinking of the man, for example, who threw away his hammer near Cobalt and dislodged a piece of ore that resulted in the building of mines, cities and industries that one would not have believed existed. I am thinking of the fact, that always in the development of this country we have developed one area and said there is nothing beyond that. We did not believe very much lay beyond that. Then, our pioneers have gone forth, our people who would just not take that sort of reasoning, and risked their lives, if they were that kind of men; they have risked their capital if they were that kind of entrepreneur; and they have brought us the things that have made this nation great. They have brought us tremendous areas that are now devoted to agriculture. They have brought us the great watersheds, the great sources of pulpwood which now floats down to our paper mills.

All these things, Mr. Chairman, have been the result of not sitting on our posteriors and saying that there is no certainty that this proposition is going to pay from the date it is built. They have been the result, rather, of faith, and with that faith came the results which we wanted. The great fortunes, and there have been great fortunes, that have been built in this country have not been the result of wanting something certain. They have been the result of taking a chance, a measured chance based on the confidence that it would turn out the way it should and the way that would be best for the country as a whole.

And so, to sum up, lest someone say subsequently that this is visionary, that this is impossible, that this is asking the government to assume, through the construction of a portion of this railroad line from Chibougamau to St. Felicien, a burden which will continue into the indefinite future, let us recapitulate. We are suggesting that while the idea behind the bill we are now considering in committee is an excellent one, of which we wholly approve, the bill falls short in so far as it builds only one-half of the line which, only in its entirety, can do what it is supposed to do. The half of the line which it is not proposed to build immediately is the half which would connect a great area with a seaport, the half which would traverse an area which is rich in resources, the half which would connect an area of mines, which need smelters, with a community which is now considering the erection of one smelter, and is planning the erection of another in the field of zinc.

The half of this line, Mr. Chairman, which is not being built is the half which confidence in our country and faith in its future dictates should be built. And, Mr. Chairman, to the extent that people do not build this line, and do not support its building now, immediately, they display to all the world a lack of confidence and a lack of faith for the future of one of the greatest areas in Canada.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I am as capable as the hon. member who has just taken his seat of adding any new material to the discussion. I think he has done very well; but I would point out that this bill has been considered by one of the best committees of the House of Commons, where we have had before us officials who have given us much information. The minister convinced us that he has been assured it would pay; and all we have to do is to read the reports.

I do not want to attempt to shut off debate, but I believe the road is needed and that the bill meets that need. The minister has convinced us that it will pay.

Mr. Nicholson: Before the clause carries I should like to say a word. Hon. members will have noticed that in it there is provision to give to the governor in council authority to build such portion of the lines as the governor in council may decide is necessary, prior to December 31, 1964, or such later date as the governor in council may fix.

I think all hon. members will agree that the building of railways is a matter of concern to the people of Canada, including members of parliament. Officials of the railways gave the committee an explanation as to why one part of the railway should be built immediately, but pointed out that the revenue in sight would not warrant the building of the other part mentioned in the bill. I think most hon. members will agree that a quite reasonable argument was presented on the point.

That being so I do not see why the government should ask parliament now to give it a blank cheque to build this other part of the railway any time within the next ten years, prior to December 31, 1964 or, if it is not built by that time, by such later date as the governor in council may fix. I suggest that is a very dangerous principle, and I am sure if the government did not have such a large majority in parliament this kind of legislation would not be presented to us. Therefore I move, in amendment:

That clause 1 be amended by deleting therefrom the words, "or such later date as the governor in council may fix".

As I said before, parliament has always been most anxious to give its support to the building of any railway line that would be feasible; and I should think that ten years would give the cabinet plenty of opportunity to build this extra line. If however by 1963 work on this branch line was started but would not be completed before December 31, 1964, I am sure parliament at that date would be most co-operative in extending the period. But I think it is undemocratic for this parliament to tie the hands of all parliaments in the future to a proposition which is not more definite than the one now before us.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I must confess I have not yet heard any satisfactory explanation as to why the date should be set so far ahead. I am not speaking alone of the amendment suggesting the removal of these words from the clause. I do not know that the amendment will satisfy the situation because, if it were going to be much later than 1964, I am not sure that this parliament would be particularly interested in the matter.

This line could be completed in a comparatively short time; and I must confess I am wholly at a loss to understand the government's position in deferring the date until 1964 if, in fact, it has any intention to proceed. Now that the amendment is before us I should like to hear from the minister, not merely as to why there should be a later date mentioned, but why a date as late as 1964 should be used.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad the Leader of the Opposition has suggested that I make an explanation. I would point out that the explanation has already been made in committee, because the argument now offered by the hon. member who has moved the amendment was made before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I do not know that he moved an amendment in committee, but certainly he made the point forcibly more than once.

To explain the position I believe I could put it thus: As the matter now stands, the Canadian National Railways have obtained guarantees from a number of corporations and companies, which would confirm the financial estimate of the railway in so far as that part of the line is concerned which extends from Beattyville on the west to Chibougamau in about the centre of the arc from Beattyville to St. Felicien. But, in so far as the other half of the line is concerned, namely that part extending from St. Felicien to Chibougamau, the Canadian National Railways, through their officers, have given evidence to the effect that, from a financial standpoint, the position is such that they would not recommend the immediate construction of that portion at this time.

However, they are hopeful that with the construction of the line from Beattyville to Chibougamau industry will be encouraged, and that it will, in fact, see the establishment of a zinc refinery, or even of a copper refinery, in the lake St. John area, perhaps at Chicoutimi itself, in which case it would then be profitable, if the Canadian National Railways obtained the necessary guarantees, to continue the construction of the line on to St. Felicien. So that it may be possible to begin the construction of the east end of the line fairly soon. It may not be possible to begin it within the ten years and that is why the government have seen fit to accept that recommendation of the railways. After all, the Canadian National Railways is the body responsible for the construction of the lines that have been built from time to time with the approval of parliament.

It may not be possible to complete the line within ten years. If that should be so, then it was felt that this authority would enable Canadian National Railways to construct the line even after the ten years, and for that reason the clause is worded as it is.

Mr. Coldwell: May I just say one word. Since this parliament is responsible when the Canadian National Railways have deficits, we should be called upon to decide, after hearing representations of the railway, whether this extension is economic at the time it is proposed to make it. My hon. friend is on very sound ground in asking the committee to delete the authority of the governor general in council. From time to time we have argued against governor-in-council decisions. This is the kind of decision which under no circumstances should be approved of. If the time comes when the railway can show that this extension is economic, then the railway can come to the house and ask for the authority to make the extension at that time. We should delete this very objectionable feature of the bill at this time.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, in the ordinary enabling legislation of this kind, under which the Canadian National Railways is authorized to construct a branch line, the first section sets out that the governor in council may provide for the railway to build the line from one point to another point within a certain set period of time, which is a reasonable time for completion. That was the practice followed in the case of the branch line from Terrace to Kitimat, British Columbia, and from Sherridon to Lynn Lake in Manitoba, and I believe also in the case of the line from Barraute to Kiask Falls in Quebec; but here we have two very significant variations.

In the first place, we find the words: "in whole or in part" qualifying the completion, so that the governor in council may authorize only the completion of a part of this railway. As I pointed out, in all the other bills the authorization must cover the completion of the whole line. I repeat, here we have these very significant words, "in whole or in part".

Then instead of having a time set within which the railway could reasonably be constructed, we have a time limit of ten years, to December 31, 1964. There again is a provision completely different from the standard provision written into legislation of this kind.

The amendment of the hon. member for Mackenzie is a sound one, because, while these qualifications "or such later date as the governor in council may fix" are used in the other enabling laws to which I have referred, it was done because there might be some slip in completing by the date set, and therefore the precaution was taken of allowing what I am sure was intended to be a slight extension. But here the effect of the extension is to add it on to the ten-year period.

Mr. Knowles: From here to eternity.

Mr. Green: Yes, from here to eternity. In the first place, that line need be built only in whole or in part, and then it need not be finished until 1964, and then the governor in council may put it off after that time just as long as he sees fit, which may mean that the line will not be constructed for fifteen or twenty years.

The position we have taken is that the government came into the house and asked authority to build the line from Beattyville to St. Felicien. Well, why not go ahead and build it instead of having this qualification of building half now and the other half in five years, ten years, fifteen years or twenty years.

The vice-president of the Canadian National Railways in charge of development indicated before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines that the eastern half of the line would be a development project; in other words, that there was not the traffic there to make the line pay immediately. He advocated it on the basis of its being a development project.

He went on to say the C.N.R. hoped that there would be established at Chicoutimi a great zinc smelter which would handle zinc concentrates from the whole of Quebec and Ontario. This bill covers also a short line in Ontario called the lake Manitouwadge line, and in the lake Manitouwadge area there is zinc ore. The vice-president said it was hoped that zinc ore from as far as the lake Manitouwadge area, which is up near Port Arthur in Ontario, would be taken by the C.N.R. right across to Chicoutimi, and in Chicoutimi there would be a smelter.

There are also of course great power resources in the Chicoutimi area. There is the foundation for a great development in Canada. But at the same time the government takes the position that this connecting line from Chibougamau to St. Felicien need not be built for at least ten years and perhaps longer. How they expect to get a zinc smelter at Chicoutimi with that gap in the line of 139 or 140 miles from Chibougamau to St. Felicien, I cannot quite see. They are expecting private industry to go into Chicoutimi and build a $25 million smelter without the railway being connected. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that that does not make sense at all.

Either this is actually a development project or it is not, and if it is a development project which is in the interests of the nation —and the minister said on second reading that it was in the interests of the nation— then the government should go ahead and build the whole railway. Certainly the amendment moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie is a proper one and I would hope that it would be carried by the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: May I refer to the question raised by the leader of the C.C.F. party. I view his query in this fashion. As he knows, in respect of the previous branch lines which were built a statement is tabled in the house within a certain number of days after the house meets. That was the case with the Lynn Lake line and with the Barraute-Kiask line. These reports form part of the subject matter which is dealt with by the officers of the Canadian National Railways in the committee on railways and shipping, and each year it is therefore possible for the members of that committee or any other member to find out what the position of the line is.

The reason why the words, "1964 or such later date as the governor in council may fix", are in there is that we were following practically word for word previous legislation. If my hon. friend looks up section 1 of chapter 20, 1 Elizabeth II, an act respecting construction of lines of railways by the Canadian National Railway Company from Terrace to Kitimat, he will see the same wording, namely:

> The governor in council may provide for the construction and completion by Canadian National Railway Company prior to the first day of November, nineteen hundred and fifty-four, or such later date as the governor in council may fix.

Likewise, in 1951, 15 George VI, chapter 44, an act respecting the construction of a line by the Canadian National Railway Company from Sherridon to Lynn Lake, there is a similar provision, namely:

> The governor in council may provide for the construction and completion by Canadian National Railway Company . . . prior to the first day of November, nineteen hundred and fifty-three, or such later date as the governor in council may fix . . .

Therefore, the wording in both cases is exactly the same. It is not sought here to take the extraordinary powers such as have been suggested. On the contrary, the legislation has been based on the experience of two, if not three, similar lines, and the only reason, which I do not wish to repeat again, other than that which I have already advanced, is what I said in answer to the Leader of the Opposition a moment ago. It would strike me that for that reason we should not accept the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Coldwell: I would like to ask the minister a question. In these other cases the minister has mentioned, is it not a fact that the lines were looked upon as economic projects by the officers of the railway? In this particular case is there not a doubt that the extension eastward would be economic, at least at this time and perhaps for some years to come? The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra mentioned the possibility of a smelter being constructed, but there is not definite assurance that such a smelter will be built. Consequently, it seems to me that in this particular respect we would be doing something quite different from the cases outlined by the minister when we had assurances that these lines would be economically sound as far as the railway officials could judge. But in this case the railway officials tell us that the eastern extension would not be economic under the present circumstances but might be some time in the future.

My suggestion is that at that time they should come back to the house, go before the committee, and hon. members on that committee can question the officials, though there is no guarantee after that questioning that the matter would be decided upon favourably by the house. That is what I have in mind.

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to the first part of the hon. member's question is yes. The eastern half of the line may not at this time be economic, but that is the very reason why it is sought to have the words in clause 1 of the bill as it exists now because, while we believe it will not be long before the other section of the line is built, it may take more than the ten years. Why should it be necessary to come before parliament when there is already before parliament, by virtue of the report tabled under the last section of the act, an opportunity of having the position explained and examined in the railways and shipping committee and by members of the house.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister will admit that in connection with the Kitimat and Lynn Lake lines we had definite propositions put before parliament and there was no doubt about the lines being built. But in the present situation the railway officials have negotiated on the assumption that parliament will grant approval of the building of the Beattyville extension. I think it is unfortunate that the legislation is before parliament in this particular form. Parliament, I believe, is quite prepared to give support to the spending of $17 million for the construction of the Beattyville branch, but if we pass this bill the railway will be able at any time in the future to proceed with the spending of $17 million for the construction of the remaining 139-mile branch, and I believe that is unfair to parliament.

I believe the minister and the cabinet should be prepared to come to parliament every time there is the expenditure of a major amount such as $17 million, particularly on a branch line. We know from bitter experience that branch lines have been forced on the Canadian National Railway system in the past and have been found uneconomic. Unfortunately, political pressure at election time has been responsible for the building in Canada of branch lines which have been a headache for succeeding governments, and I think no government should ask parliament to vote $17 million for the construction of a branch line by order in council at some time in the future. I hope the minister, after this discussion, will agree to the proposal to limit the expenditure of the $17 million to the end of December, 1964.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, there is one question I think should be cleared up at this time, more particularly in the light of the amendment which has been moved just now. The minister has suggested that the line from Chicoutimi to Chibougamau might not be feasible and therefore might not be built. I am wondering whether that would mean that there should be a new extension of that branch line from Chibougamau to Chicoutimi. If so, would it not be better, in view of the fact it is necessary to have the whole line completed at another time, to give consideration to a line from Beattyville to Chibougamau and then down to Chicoutimi immediately?

The Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Hahn: Could the minister let me know whether he expects the line to become financially profitable from Chibougamau to Chicoutimi before they extend the branch line after 1964?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think I dealt with that in committee. In the first place the line is not to be built from Chicoutimi, but from St. Felicien to Chibougamau and it was explained by the officers and myself that until such time as the Canadian National Railways are able to obtain sufficient guarantees of traffic they would not begin the construction of the section of the line from that area. The information that the vice-president of industrial research of the Canadian National Railways gave to the committee was that he was hopeful and it was expected that these guarantees would be forthcoming, and when they were the line would be built.

(Translation):

Mr. Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words about the amendment moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). I do not intend to support the amendment because I do not see what purpose it would serve. It is evident that if the eastern section of the railway from St. Felicien to Chibougamau is not built within ten years, it would greatly help the government to be able to extend the time provided for its construction. Hon. members will remember that last week during the debate on the motion for second reading of the bill I obtained from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) the assurance that as soon as we can give for the eastern section the same guarantee as for the western section, the Canadian National will be able to undertake the building of that part of the railroad.

Last Friday, when the committee was examining the bill, I also obtained the same assurance from the vice-president of the company. I therefore do not see the necessity for that amendment, Mr. Chairman, especially since I am confident that within six months or a year at the most we shall be in a position to give the Canadian National the guarantees they require before a start can be made on the eastern section.

This morning I was in touch with the secretary of the Saguenay council for economic development, who expressed the same confidence. The people of the Saguenay district are determined to work constructively and intelligently for the fulfilment of the project. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am confident that as a result of the guarantees we will give or of the subsidies that may be granted by the government, we shall be in a position to undertake the building of the eastern section of the railroad within a year at the most.

(Text):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I think this piece of legislation is very peculiarly drafted because what we have before us is, in effect, two different bills. There is one bill which the government has a real intention of going through with. This bill is to build a railway line from Beattyville to Chibougamau. The government should have another bill for the building of a railway from Chibougamau to St. Felicien and should explain to us the various reasons and so forth. The minister might say that I am making a political speech, but it is quite evident that in drafting the present bill in its present form the government was just trying to appease public opinion in the lake St. John region and that that was about all. The government did not have the immediate intention of building the eastern part of this railway. The government had the immediate intention of building a railroad from Beattyville to Chibougamau and it had a general intention, which I am sure is quite sensible, of building another railway when and if the circumstances warrant the building of such a railway. The minister says it will be built if there is enough guaranteed traffic or enough guaranteed business to justify the building of the other part of the railway. I sincerely hope the government and the minister are ready to do that for any part of Canada. I mean, that is just nonsense. I mean, if there is enough traffic for it to be a profitable venture for the Canadian National Railways to build a railway anywhere in Canada, the government and the railroad should do it right away. There is no doubt about that. From the way this bill is drafted I think it is just to appease public opinion in this part of Quebec in the lake St. John area. What the government had in mind was to build a railroad from Beattyville to Chibougamau. At the present time the government has no intention of building the eastern part. The government should not be afraid to say so and should not present such phony legislation. That is the reason why I am speaking.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I could not allow my hon. friend to go unchallenged in connection with the statements he has just made. He made them originally in the course of the general debate when he said that it was not the intention of the government to go on with the complete construction of this railway. May I say that it is, having regard to the circumstances as outlined by the officers of the Canadian National Railways who gave evidence before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. The intention of the Canadian National Railways is quite clear and the intention of the government is equally clear. This is not a matter of two bills, one to build a portion of the line and then to come back later on and build the other portion. It is one bill. This line is considered by the Canadian National Railways and by the government not as two separate projects but as a whole line, the western half of it being built immediately because of the guarantees that have been forthcoming, and the eastern half to be built just as soon as the guarantees are forthcoming. I hope—and in fact it looks as though the assurances will be forthcoming—that the traffic guarantees will permit of the construction of the line as soon as possible after the first half is completed. When my hon. friend says that this is phony legislation, that it is queer legislation and that the government has no intention of going on with the construction of the line, I must say to him that such is not the case at all. I am sure that the House of Commons would not want responsible officers of the Canadian National Railways to come forward with the explanation which they gave in the committee and not be sincere. I am sure that the House of Commons would not believe that they would act in that fashion.

Then there is another statement my hon. friend has made with which I take issue. He said that by constructing first the western half of this line, namely that part which extends from Beattyville to Chibougamau, the effect would be the draining of Quebec traffic out of the province of Quebec into Toronto.

Mr. Balcer: I did not say that.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend had been in the committee, he would know that the position is exactly the converse. In dealing with that problem the officers of the Canadian National Railways explained that the whole intention of the railway in building the first section of the line, namely from Barraute to Kiask Falls, was to develop the timberlands of the Abitibi area so that the pulpwood could be fed down into the mills of the St. Lawrence valley. Certainly it was built with the express object of developing the timber industry and the pulp and paper mills of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Dufresne: The same thing could be done here.

Mr. Balcer: If my hon. friend will permit me to do so, I should like to say that I do not complain about that part of the bill; I agree with it. I mean that I accept his explanation that it would be good business for the C.N.R. to build that part of the railroad. There is no doubt about that. But what I disagree with is when they come here and say that they are going to build the other part some time, from here to eternity. That is what I do not agree with.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may, I should like to carry on with my argument, because I think it has some bearing certainly on what other hon. members have said. It has a great bearing on my position in the House of Commons. When the officers of the Canadian National Railways dealt with the Ontario line, with the lake Manitouwadge line, and when they explained to the committee that a great deal of the traffic, if not all of it, comprising the concentrates of the mines in the province of Ontario would be fed by this line of the Canadian National Railways into the smelters at Noranda, I did not hear any member from the province of Ontario rise and take any objection to Ontario traffic moving down in to the province of Quebec; nor, for that matter, did I hear any member from the city of Toronto do so. On the contrary, I have had members from the city of Toronto say to me that they are delighted that such is the case. After all, we do not build railway lines in any particular region for limited reasons. Railway lines are built for the development of the country as a whole. That is all the officers of the Canadian National Railways had in mind when they proceeded to recommend to the government the construction of this line of railway which should be considered as a whole line and not as two lines.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there is one statement made by the minister which conveys an impression that is hardly in accordance with what the record shows. He says that this bill is in its wording similar to other bills dealing with construction of this kind. However, there is a great difference. In the case of the bill approving of the construction from Terrace to Kitimat there was a definite time limit of construction to be finished in the present year. I believe the total time was just over two years. In other similar cases, instead of ten years the time provided is normally two years. In construction of this kind there would seem to be no reason why that is not the figure that might very well be used here. Neither from the record of the committee nor in what I have heard here has there been suggested any reason why a ten-year figure should be included in this case. The statement is made that the construction of the Beattyville-Chibougamau line is going to proceed right away. If that is so, why have a ten-year period for that? And most certainly why have the further provision that it should be left until such later date? It is obvious that it is not intended that this provision should apply to the Beattyville-Chibougamau part of the road. From what the minister has said I think it is clear that this provision applies to the construction from St. Felicien to Chibougamau.

That being so, the question then arises as to why we should extend an already very long postponement to 1964 by a still further possibility of postponement. The government either intends that this line be constructed or it does not. The minister has said he hopes that there will be assurances from those who would use this line and that with those assurances construction would proceed. I need not remind him that the line in Ontario which will have a business connection with the Beattyville-Chibougamau road, the Ontario Northland Railway, was built as a development road. It was built with confidence in the future and with the expectation that the resulting development would justify the expenditure. It seems to me that the St. Felicien-Chibougamau part of the construction forms an essential link in this whole development. As the minister has said, concentrates from Ontario will move into the mill at Noranda. Certainly no one is raising any question about that. That is a very good balance of interest in this matter. It would also seem there are obvious advantages in completing the link and in having a road that will run right through St. Felicien to Noranda and on into northern Ontario so that these areas are connected by that road.

I would not wish to have it suggested that in supporting this amendment I do so with any idea that further representations should be made. I think this is an essential part of the whole construction. The date of 1964 set out in the bill is already too far away, but at least if a date ten years away is going to be placed in the act there can be no such reason as would ordinarily apply to extend that date still further. The reason I support the amendment is simply that I believe this work should proceed now as part of the construction and as part of the network of rail lines which will open up that whole area.

Mr. Chevrier: The Leader of the Opposition asked why there is a distinction between this bill and the other bills. Of course one must remember that the other lines were much shorter than this one. This line is 294 miles in length and if you add the Ontario mileage plus the mileage from Cache lake to Chibougamau you have construction of something over 300 miles in length. When you compare that with the 46 or 47-mile line from Terrace to Kitimat and the somewhat longer line from Kiask Falls to Barraute that explains to some extent the difference.

I would not want the committee to think for one moment that Canadian National Railways or, for that matter, the government, feel that the railway should take powers which parliament thinks they should not take. It was the feeling of the Canadian National Railways that because of all the circumstances they should have a ten-year period, and the bill was drafted with the provisions that were mentioned earlier and such as are to be found in the other bills.

But if the committee feels that this is taking powers that should not be taken and if it will please the committee I have no objection to accepting the amendment as it has been moved and leaving it to the Canadian National Railways to build the three lines, or two lines rather—I will put it that way—from now until 1964 in the hope that they will find sufficient guarantees during that period to be able to continue the extension from St. Felicien to Chibougamau. If that will meet the pleasure of the committee then perhaps I can accept the amendment.

Mr. Drew: In welcoming acceptance of the amendment that has been moved, I do want to mention one thing. The minister has very carefully chosen his words when he said that what he has just said to us now explains to a certain extent the difference. The inclusion of the words "to a certain extent" was very carefully done and I commend him for that caution because it only explains it to a certain extent. The fact is that there has been no suggestion at any time it is going to take ten years to construct that 294 miles of line. In fact I think we are given reasonable assurance that one of the most difficult pieces of railroad construction that has been undertaken in a great many years, that of the line running north from Sept Iles for well over 300 miles, is going to be completed in four years. Therefore the minister is quite correct that what he has said only explains it to a certain extent.

Nevertheless, since the date, 1964, has been put in the bill and since it must be assumed that it is going to remain there, I welcome acceptance of the amendment in the hope that this indicates that there will be a re-examination of the other situation and that perhaps on further re-examination the decision may be made to proceed with the construction of the St. Felicien-Chibougamau extension at the same time.

Mr. Campbell: I want to say a word of appreciation to the minister for having taken the attitude he has. I listened very carefully to the vice-president of the railway and other witnesses who appeared before the committee, and the information I gathered from the whole discussion was the C.N.R. witnesses went so far as to say that the construction of the eastern part of the line was a dream but that it would give the railroad more bargaining power if they had the right to build the line. I think that perhaps some hon. members are worrying too much about the line not being built right away. What I got out of the whole discussion in the standing committee was that the railway is anxious to build the line and that just as soon as it is economically possible it will be built.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question? Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Nicholson) agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Chairman, I consider it a duty to participate again in this discussion and to renew my plea for the simultaneous construction of both sections of trunk line No. 1.

The economic development brought about by this railway in our district would benefit not only the people of the kingdom of the Saguenay and of the province of Quebec, but the people of Canada as a whole. This government in 1953 renewed its contribution to the Colombo plan to the amount of $25,400,000, for financial and technical assistance, thus bringing to $76·6 million the total amount devoted by this country to the development of the countries of south and southeast Asia. Would it not be possible also to grant subsidies to the Canadian National Railways to enable them to realize the whole of this project?

On May 11 of this year, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) said:

> Some subsidy on such a line may well be justified as it was in the case of the northward extension of the Pacific Great Eastern in 1949.

Could it be that the representations made to this government by the citizens of the Chicoutimi-Lake St. John district, as well as the newspaper editorials on this matter have not convinced the minister of the necessity for such a decision?

The vice-president of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Fairweather, told us in committee that he was strongly in favour of subsidies for the construction of new lines.

Pending the time when the Chibougamau-St. Felicien section will have brought dividends, I feel that parliament should vote a few million dollars for that purpose.

(Text):

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Girard):

> That this clause be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding thereafter the following words:
> "provided, however, that the construction of sections A and B of branch line No. 1 shall be undertaken at the same time."

(Translation):

Mr. Villeneuve: Mr. Chairman, on my return from a journey last week to the riding I have the honour to represent in this house, I was told of the discussions that took place here on second reading of the bill authorizing the construction of a railway line to the mining district of Chibougamau, and I would not like to let this opportunity slip by without voicing my humble contribution, as this question is of great importance to my constituents.

I read the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) during that debate, and I am very much surprised at the unfair accusations of partiality which were levelled against him later. Since my election as member for Roberval, I have asked the help of the hon. Minister of Transport in many circumstances, in the interests of my county. I even had occasion to introduce two delegations to him, and he welcomed them with true understanding; I am certain that my constituents are in a position to appreciate his frankness, his courtesy and his kindness to them, and I say that, just as I have every confidence in the minister, their trust in him remains unchanged, for they know the facts, and are able to view the situation objectively.

The future of the county of Roberval, for instance, is dependent upon the decisions which the Department of Transport will take with regard to this Chibougamau railway. My colleague from Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier) and myself have put this view on record in this house, and mentioned it a sufficient number of times to the appropriate department for this principle to have been embodied in a bill, such as is now the case. That is one of the reasons why the electors of the constituency of Roberval preferred putting their trust in a government supporter, knowing full well that his actions on their behalf would be more effective. Events have proven them right, and will certainly continue to do so. That is, after all, the important thing. I am not here to attack the government which my electors have given me a clear mandate to support. I am here to protect my constituents' interests and even those of the people of Chicoutimi, although, in order to do so, I will have to repudiate certain statements made by the member for that constituency (Mr. Gagnon). The member for Chicoutimi is an independent, and doubtless acts independently of the progress of his constituency if we are to go by certain of his diplomatic absences on the attendance of certain important delegations which have come here to make representations in connection with the Chibougamau-Lake St. John railway, more particularly that of March 1953, or again if we go by the fact that he had remained absolutely silent on this matter until such time as, desiring to show himself under his true colours, he rushed headlong into indiscriminate criticism. He has attempted to make a bugbear of the neighbouring province in order to make us forget his past inertia and biased arguments, now that he has made up his mind to wake up and concern himself with this all-important matter. Such attempts to take credit for something done by others is what we can really expect of these so-called independents.

My colleague from Lake St. John and myself have never stopped concerning ourselves with this vital matter of a railway connecting the mining district of Chibougamau to that of lake St. John. We have obtained from the government as well as from the Canadian National Railways sufficient guarantees to cause us to remain optimistic with regard to the ultimate implementation of this project which is very close to our hearts and to those of our constituents, for a number of reasons.

Even though the amendment proposed to Bill 442, in the railway committee, by my colleague from Lake St. John and myself was defeated, we remain confident that the Chibougamau-St. Felicien stretch of railway will be built within a reasonable length of time and we would ask the Minister of Transport to continue his sympathetic support, even though some eleventh hour converts should continue their pessimistic pronouncements, thus showing how certain all-important considerations escape them in this connection.

Mr. Girard: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Another disappointed man!

An hon. Member: Another disappointing man!

Mr. Girard: In spite of the wonderful statements made by my hon. colleague from Roberval (Mr. Villeneuve), in spite of the other things which have been said, drawing the province of Quebec into the argument, I shall go on, as I did from the start, with the few words I have to say on the subject, without paying attention to the direct and indirect attacks coming from my good friend.

It would have been better for him to have been here when we debated the matter, because instead of criticizing his fellow members from our district, he would have realized that all we were asking was exactly the same thing he himself had requested.

Mr. Chairman, I now leave that matter to say a few words in support of the amendment moved by my colleague from Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon). I must say that I find in the statements of the Minister of Transport himself (Mr. Chevrier) very good reasons for building both sections now.

Did not the minister just say that the government has only one aim in undertaking to build railroads, that is to further the development of our natural resources? Therefore, relying on that one statement alone, I cannot understand why the government does not undertake to build both sections now, because judging from the opinions expressed by hon. members on both sides of the house, nobody doubts that the industrial development in the Saguenay district will be sufficient to justify the building of that section, and I think that nobody would deny, after what the minister just said, that, as far as we are concerned, the "development" of the natural resources of our district is at stake. Otherwise, if they keep on thinking only of financial guarantees, it means that this government is interested only in finding new markets, new outlets, for the Canadian National Railways, and not primarily in the industrial "development" of a district. And as the minister surely does not intend to confine himself solely to a consideration of the dollars and cents that the Chibougamau-St. Felicien line will yield during its first year of operation, he must first of all consider what measure of development would be brought about in the Saguenay district. I feel there is no doubt as to that. This is the reason for my urging the government to support this amendment, so that both sections of the railway may be built now.

Mr. Chairman, during the discussion, reference was made to the provincial government, and that is when we were accused of playing politics. Mr. Chairman, the only intervention on the part of the provincial government in the region has been the building of a five million dollar road. It did not bother to ask whether the road would pay back immediately the amount required for its construction; if it had, the road would have never been built. The federal government must take the same attitude: it should not consider only the financial angle and the number of tons guaranteed by contract but should consider whether that railroad will further the development of the Saguenay region.

For that reason, nobody in the house can refuse to support my colleague's amendment, in which the minister is asked to build the two sections immediately.

Mr. Dufresne: When the minister introduced the resolution preceding this bill, for once—and although it is not my habit to do so—I congratulated the minister and the government on their decision to build the Chibougamau railroad. However, at that time, we did not have the explanations given later to the effect that the section that the people of Quebec deem the most important, that is the Chibougamau-St. Felicien section will not be built immediately, but that work on it will be postponed indefinitely.

It is not my intention today to congratulate the government—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You were very sorry you did so the other day.

Mr. Dufresne: —because I now find that the government has changed its mind. I cannot understand why it is that when the resolution was introduced we were told that a railroad would be built to Chibougamau, while the bill mentions construction of only part of this railway, action on the other part is being put off indefinitely.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order may I remind the hon. member that if he had listened to the speech I delivered before he extended congratulations to the government on its attitude and decision to build this railway, he would have noted that I said then that we would start building the Beattyville-Chibougamau section before the St. Felicien section. The hon. member would, at that time, have extended his congratulations and his thanks to this government on its decision to build the western section before the eastern section.

Mr. Dufresne: The minister took good care not to tell us that the second part of the project would be undertaken only in ten years, or even more, from now. And, according to the second part of this bill, or at least according to section 1, it is possible that that part of the project may never be undertaken, and that is the whole problem, as the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Girard) has pointed out.

One must not always live in the hope of making money; the main thing is to be an optimist. And if the government of the province of Quebec had not anticipated that large mineral deposits could be mined in that area between St. Felicien and Chibougamau, it certainly would not have spent millions and millions on the development of that area.

I want to protest also against this bill because the government's stand on the matter will encourage the shipping of Quebec's natural resources to another part of Canada, and that will be detrimental to the population of that province. I find rather strange the stand taken by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Villeneuve) who, a moment ago, was rather optimistic and expressed such confidence in the government that he was even ready to give it a blank cheque. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not ready to give such a blank cheque to the government, especially when it introduces a motion which says one thing and a bill which says practically the opposite. I say that the part of this line which, under the circumstances, looks to me to be the more important one is the section which runs from St. Felicien to Chibougamau, and, consequently, I shall vote for the amendment presented by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon).

Mr. Gauthier (Lake St. John): Before the question is put on this amendment, I would just like to point out, as I did in committee, that I propose to support the amendment. I have twice, in this house, asked that both sections be built simultaneously, and the proposed change being along these lines, I shall support it. I must say that, like my hon. friend from Roberval (Mr. Villeneuve), we on this side of the house put our trust in the government, and that the people of Quebec province share this confidence.

Mr. Dufresne: We shall know at the next election.

Mr. Gauthier (Lake St. John): As I said, that is why we need not worry about the next election, and we trust that the Saguenay district will also put its confidence in the government, because, by then, we will have our railway. If it is not then completed, it should at least be well on its way.

Mr. Villeneuve: Mr. Chairman, I would like to mention that I feel the same way as my hon. friend from Lake St. John with regard to the government, and that I shall also vote for the amendment. I want to tell the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) that neither he, nor our friends opposite are going to build this railway; it is going to be built by the government through the Canadian National.

I am convinced that will be done soon and that is why I have shown much optimism and have thanked once more the minister for the consideration he has shown and still shows for the population of my riding of Roberval.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Gagnon) negatived: Yeas, 23; nays, 62.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Issue of securities.

Mr. Green: The committee passed an amendment to clause 4. I wonder if we could have that.

Mr. Chevrier: I was under the impression that the chairman had referred to it earlier. My hon. friend is quite right. Both clause 4 and clause 5 are amended by striking out the words "forty-four million five hundred and sixty-two thousand five hundred dollars", and substituting the words "thirty-eight million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars" so as to make the bill conform with the resolution passed earlier in the house, and which authorized the expenditure of an amount estimated at $38,750,000.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 5 as amended agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Green: Next sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE PAYMENT OF DEATH BENEFITS UP TO MAXIMUM OF $5,000

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act to provide for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of death benefits up to a maximum of five thousand dollars for the spouse, or the estate

(a) of a public servant,

(b) of a member of the regular forces,

or in certain circumstances,

(c) of a former public servant, or

(d) of a former member of the regular forces,

where the public servant, member of the regular forces, former public servant or former member of the regular forces has paid contributions into the consolidated revenue fund.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Knowles: Is the parliamentary assistant going to give an explanation of this resolution?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The bill to be founded on this resolution will provide a scheme of contributory death benefits which will supplement the other benefits already provided in the Public Service Superannuation Act. In the case of members of the regular armed forces, it will provide similar death benefits to supplement the other benefits provided under the Defence Services Pension Act. The benefit will be payable in the form of a lump sum to the spouse of the contributor or, if there is no surviving spouse, to the estate of the deceased. It is designed to provide funds immediately to cover the inevitable expenses arising out of or consequential upon the last illness and death of the contributor.

As the resolution indicates, it will be possible for a participant in this plan to elect to participate after retirement, provided that he regularly makes the required contributions.

I do not think that I need say more about the details of the proposed bill at this stage. Because of its nature the Minister of Finance thinks that the most effective way to deal with the details of the bill will be to refer it to the banking and commerce committee for study and report after second reading, and he proposes to make that motion at the proper time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am sure we appreciate the proposal that after second reading this bill will be referred to the committee on banking and commerce. I believe the committee will generally approve of that way of dealing with this legislation. The fact that it will go straight from second reading to the committee on banking and commerce means that this is the only opportunity, before it goes before that committee, for questions to be asked and answered here on the floor of the house.

I realize that we sometimes have a little difficulty getting all the information we should like at this stage as to the details of a bill to be introduced after the resolution has been passed, but it does seem to me that the nature of this proposal is such that there are one or two questions which the parliamentary assistant might answer more specifically. I note that the resolution does give one figure, namely, $5,000, as the maximum amount of a death benefit which is available under this legislation. Can he indicate what formula the government has in mind on the basis of which that $5,000 maximum is reached or on the basis of which any lesser amount is the maximum in the case of other participants? Can he also indicate what the contribution, or the premium payable under this legislation, is to be? It seems quite clear from the resolution that the legislation envisages the making of payments into a fund by civil servants or by members of the regular forces, receiving in turn the protection or the benefit of a payment at death either to the spouse of the participant or to the estate.

Our views on the matter might of course be affected by the amounts to be paid in and the corresponding benefits to be received, but generally speaking this proposal looks good to us. I find myself in the position where I have to say almost exactly the same thing I said yesterday with respect to another matter which the same parliamentary assistant was piloting through the house. To the extent that this is good for civil servants we think it is good for Canadians generally. It looks to me that what is being provided is a form of life insurance, term insurance, and very good protection too. Although the figures are not in the bill as to what it will cost, my guess is that it would be much less costly, indeed considerably less costly, than would be the case if the same kind of insurance were purchased from private insurance companies. I can well remember the hue and cry that has been raised in the newspapers and in some quarters in the country when on occasion we have suggested there might be room for improvement in the field of life insurance if it were handled on a government basis rather than on a private basis. But here it is. It is for a select group; it is just for civil servants; but if I read this resolution aright, it is a form of socialized life insurance. It is restricted to one form of life insurance, namely, term policies, which incidentally life insurance companies do not peddle very zealously. But to that extent I suggest it is all to the good, and I hope the parliamentary assistant will answer some of these questions now, bearing in mind the fact that we will not have a chance to ask questions when we are on second reading, and after that the bill will go to the committee.

I should also be glad if the parliamentary assistant would elaborate on his statement as to the possibility of civil servants who are now retired coming under this plan. If they do elect to come under it, what amounts will they have to pay in order to get the benefits? May I ask also whether the benefit provided under this arrangement, or under this term insurance policy, is a fixed benefit, or does it go up or down with the passage of time or with the advance in years of the participant? A colleague of mine suggests that I use the words "the insured". The point is well taken. The resolution refers to these people as participants, but in point of fact they are being insured under this government scheme. I should like to reserve final comment until we have all the details, but on the basis of such details as I can get from this resolution, it looks very good. My hope is that a plan of this nature, good as it is, will before long be available not only to civil servants but to all the citizens of Canada at the same relatively low cost at which I am satisfied the government is in a position to make this insurance available.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the parliamentary assistant prefer to have me defer my questions until he has answered the previous questions.

Mr. Benidickson: Go ahead.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then I shall ask my questions now. I listened with interest to the inferences that have been drawn by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which I have no doubt he has been glad to draw and which the rest of us will have to ponder.

Is this compulsory? When I say "compulsory" I mean for everybody. For instance, does it apply to bachelors and others who may need no death allowances? Secondly, has there been any contact with representatives of the service forces and of the civil servants to see what their attitude is? One has heard of instances here and there of people who did not like the compulsory feature. Would there be anything in the operation of the act, in so far as the superannuation or the pension benefits are concerned, which would indicate that there was any substantial measure of opposition or discontent in that the measure would also be compulsory? These are the questions I should like to ask, and in particular I should like to know whether any means has been taken to sound out the views of the proposed beneficiaries.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two questions I would like to ask in connection with this resolution. I presume it is of a compulsory nature for all members of the civil service and the armed forces and for that reason I have certain qualms as to whether it is highly desirable that we should compel members of the civil service and the armed forces to take out this kind of insurance.

There are large numbers of persons in the civil service and armed forces who have for years contributed to various life insurance schemes and have provided themselves with such security as they feel necessary or desirable for the safeguarding of their families after death. Are they now to be compelled to take out another $5,000 worth of life insurance which may place considerable hardship upon them, and hardship particularly in the case of a widow? For this additional $5,000 would be subject to succession duties if the estate was such that the succession duties had to be paid.

Then, will it also apply to the female members of the civil service and the armed forces? Many of these young ladies who are in the civil service and in the armed forces would I think prefer to take out an annuity rather than life insurance. They regard the responsibility of providing for their families, should they marry, as the responsibility of their future husbands, whereas if they are single and intend to remain so then they would much rather have security in their old age in the form of an annuity rather than life insurance.

Is there any means in this scheme by which the life insurance could be commuted in old age and used to look after their needs after they have retired from the service and have reached old age?

Now, regarding the paragraph dealing with former public servants and members of the armed forces, does that refer to personnel who have already retired, or only to such personnel as those who will not have completed their payments up to the maximum of $5,000 and then will be able to make contributions after they have retired? Also, is there any intention of extending this scheme to crown corporations, and does this scheme also include members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, several questions have been raised and probably I should deal with them in the order presented. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised the question of the amounts and the reason for selecting these amounts. The maximum is set out in the resolution and it will be $5,000, but it will be $5,000 or a year's salary, whichever is the lesser amount. That is the manner in which the figure has been arrived at. It is proposed that all people who are contributors under the Civil Service Superannuation Act will be contributors under this scheme, and the reason for that is that when everyone is in a group scheme the rate is much lower.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benidickson: The rate proposed will be 40 cents per month per thousand which, as hon. members will recognize, is a pretty low rate of insurance.

Questions in regard to the compulsory feature of the scheme were raised by the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, and one of them raised the point of a bachelor not desiring to take out insurance payable on his death and probably not having any close relative to whom he wished the benefits to pass. However, as I indicated in my statement, this is not intended to create an estate. It is primarily intended to take care of the expenses which normally are connected with death, and particularly if death is preceded by an illness. That, of course, would apply to the single person in the same manner as to the married person.

Then, the cost is much lower if everyone in the group participates, because hon. members will recognize that the group will then include the old and the young, the healthy and those who have not good health.

In the case of the bachelor, he might while a bachelor decline to take insurance but then in a few years he may change his status and be very glad to come into the scheme. If that was left optional hon. members can see the kind of difficulties which would arise by allowing such people to remain outside the scheme. It would not be fair to the original participant to allow these people who have had second thoughts to come in probably at a time when it was strictly to their advantage and when they would lessen the advantage to those who were in the scheme from the very beginning.

The reference I made to the possibility of continuing to participate was not necessarily applicable to a civil servant after retirement. A provision would be made to allow persons who had participated over a certain number of years in the scheme to continue with their payments even if they were leaving for other employment. Similarly, it is expected that where the crown corporations have a desire to allow their staffs to participate, arrangements will be made to provide for that.

Mr. Knowles: Before the parliamentary assistant leaves that point, do I understand from what he has just said that any former civil servant now retired on superannuation would not have the opportunity to elect for this scheme?

Mr. Benidickson: No, there is no opportunity for someone who has retired. Then, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre overlooked the point that we already have under the Civil Service Insurance Act an optional insurance scheme, though only a portion of the members of the civil service have taken advantage of that act. From now on, there will no longer be an opportunity to take out insurance under that scheme, and it is expected that this scheme will take the place of the other one.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether the government will contribute in the same way as those who are members of the scheme? In other words, will the government be contributing 40 cents per month per thousand?

Mr. Benidickson: The intention is that the government contribution will be made at the time when the benefit is payable, and they will pay a portion of the benefit. Under, I think, the Civil Service Act, there is a provision whereby, in respect of employees who have had more than two years of service, a gratuity of two months' salary is paid if they die while in the service. The group insurance, of course, will provide a death benefit amounting to a full year's salary, but it will be in substitution of this gratuity which has hitherto been payable by the government.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): In other words, the government will be contributing only on death?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes; and of course the government will carry the cost of administration through the insurance department.

Mr. Pearkes: Could I get an answer to the other questions I asked? I asked if there was any form by which there could be a transfer to an annuity. I presume not from what the parliamentary assistant has said—

Mr. Benidickson: No.

Mr. Pearkes: —and it will only be paid on death, although they are to take care of the terminal illness. Is that correct?

Mr. Benidickson: No. I said that it is frequently the case that there are illness expenses preceding the death of the insured. The amount of insurance that is provided under this legislation is not particularly large and it is considered that on average it will just be sufficient to pay the expenses of that illness, of the funeral and so forth.

Mr. Pearkes: Are the Royal Canadian Mounted Police included in this scheme?

Mr. Benidickson: I have not that specific information.

Mr. Knowles: I hope the parliamentary assistant is aware of the very excellent statement on an extremely important principle that he has made this afternoon in presenting this measure. He has pointed out that the value and the secret of social insurance is universal coverage of whatever group one is trying to insure. I can see one hon. member sitting not far from him over on the other side who is enjoying it immensely and I am glad to see him applauding now.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member is now looking for commitments.

Mr. Knowles: We have had a commitment from the parliamentary assistant. We have had a recognition of the principle that you can do far more—

Mr. McCann: Within limitations.

Mr. Knowles: —for members of a group when they are all in than when you try to do it on an individual basis. I am sure the hon. member for Spadina agrees with me even if the Minister of National Revenue wants to make a certain reservation. However, there are one or two more questions I should like to put to the parliamentary assistant. First may I pursue the question that my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North put to the parliamentary assistant a moment ago? Has any estimate been made as to what portion, we will say, of the maximum death benefit of $5,000, when it is paid at the death of a civil servant, is covered by the premium payments and what portion is covered gratuitously by the government?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Benidickson: It is expected that the government contribution to the death benefit will be about one-sixth of the amount payable on death.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, Mr. Chairman, these premiums which are fairly low cover about five-sixths of the cost. I applaud it too, as does the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. These premiums which are quite low cover about five-sixths of the cost of this term insurance. We have now been given—

Mr. Benidickson: Plus the government assuming all the cost of administration.

Mr. Knowles: All right. What do you want to add for that? Another sixth? No; not that much. In any case, we have now been given the rate, namely 40 cents per thousand per month. The maximum amount is $5,000. That works out at $2 a month or $24 a year for protection in the amount of $5,000. We are now told that that figure covers something approaching five-sixths of the cost. This means that this is a provision which enables civil servants to get term insurance protection at the rate of somewhere around $6 a thousand. You cannot get that from any private insurance company. In other words, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You cannot get it in Saskatchewan either.

Mr. Knowles: —we are having here a good example of what can be done on an over-all basis by using the insurance principle. We are glad that this step is being taken. As I said a moment ago, we hope the day will come when protection of this kind will be available not just to civil servants but to all the citizens of Canada. We hope that the excellent statement of principle on social insurance that has been given this afternoon will be extended into certain other extremely important and necessary fields. I am glad to see that my hope in this respect is greeted with such pleasant approval by hon. members opposite, both in and out of the cabinet.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am sure we are all delighted to see the pleasure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is getting from greeting his brother socialists across the gangway. I do not think we should try to deny him any of it at all. I do not think the parliamentary assistant answered my question as to whether any attempt had been made to sound out any representative body.

Mr. Benidickson: I overlooked that question. On a confidential basis the government indicated to the national joint council of public servants of Canada its proposals in this respect. The council itself had been suggesting that the old insurance scheme should be improved upon. The government also knew, from its own point of view, that the act required some revision from the point of view of present interest rates and the like. As a result, this step was proposed. Representatives of the civil service groups will be invited to come before the banking and commerce committee to express their views.

Mr. Pearkes: Has any attempt been made to find out whether the armed services would like to participate in this scheme?

Mr. Benidickson: They have not a direct organization. I think that is the situation there.

Mr. Pearkes: They were told to come in.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I of course support this legislation but I am rather intrigued by some figures which the parliamentary assistant has given us. I should like to know if I have them correctly. A person in the fund will pay 40 cents a month, which is $4.80 per year and the government will then pay one-sixth of that amount, which will bring the contribution per thousand up to $5.60. In other words, the government is in effect gambling $5.60 against $1,000 that so-and-so will not die. What is the mortality rate in the country at the moment? Is the mortality rate not running about nine per thousand? If so, would the gamble, on an actuarial basis, not be $9 per thousand? I merely ask, not in opposition to this legislation but in order to find out whether the parliamentary assistant is really accurate in his statement that the government's share will be only one-sixth?

Mr. Benidickson: I indicated that the government intended to pay one-sixth of the capital amount paid out at the time of death. In so far as the mortality rate, the costs of administration, the experience of the insurance department in the past under the old act and all those things are concerned, I suggest that they are more properly matters that could be delved into when the committee has the bill referred to it.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to ask one question of the parliamentary assistant. I wonder if he could tell the committee what the annual figure is likely to be that the taxpayer will have to bear if this legislation is passed? Has no estimate been made by the treasury board?

Mr. Benidickson: An estimate probably has been made. I do not happen to have that information with me. As I say, it could be available to the committee.

Mr. Thatcher: I think it is not an unfair question. I should like the parliamentary assistant to give that figure, if he would, before the bill comes down.

Mr. Knowles: What is the position of the civil servant after he discontinues or after he is retired but is still alive? Does he continue to make payments or not? Does any change take place in the value of his death benefit after he has retired?

Mr. Benidickson: If he does not continue his payments—it is term insurance—then he does not keep rights under the provisions of the act.

Mr. Knowles: The parliamentary assistant says it is term insurance. When does it end?

Mr. Benidickson: It would end upon death during the service or if payments under the provisions of the act are discontinued.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris (for Mr. Abbott) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 463, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF MORE THAN ONE DEPUTY COMMISSIONER, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the appointment of more than one deputy commissioner and also to provide for the granting of pensions to certain officers and men not at present eligible.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: I notice that the bill to be based on the resolution deals with the appointment of a deputy commissioner and the matter of the granting of pensions to certain officers and men of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police not at present eligible.

As I know there are a number of what are regarded as anomalies in the present pension situation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I think it would be appreciated if the minister would give us a general outline of the scheme of overhaul which is contemplated because that might obviate unnecessary discussion.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the appointment of the deputy commissioner, the position is that part I of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act provides that the governor in council may by commission appoint a deputy commissioner. This position was established on the first of April, 1932 and since that time, as is obvious to all of us, the responsibilities and the strength of the force have increased greatly. The senior assistant commissioner, under the authority of an order in council dated March 26, 1953, now receives the same rate of pay as that authorized for the deputy commissioner and is performing duties of equal responsibility. We consider that it is desirable to regularize this situation by providing in the establishment for two deputy commissioners and by cancelling the establishment and salary provision of the senior assistant commissioner. There are therefore, as is obvious, no financial implications involved.

With regard to the proposed pension provisions, there are, as hon. members are aware, two separate pension provisions for the force. One is outlined and referred to in parts II and III of the act and represents the original non-contributory pension for which until March 1949 all members of the force had been eligible. Under these parts II and III non-contributory pension members who have completed over ten years service and who have been discharged for inefficiency or misconduct are automatically entitled upon discharge to a pension of one-half of the disability pension ordinarily available to them on retirement until the age of 65, and then two-thirds of such disability pension after that age. In addition, authority is given to increase that amount, if, according to the circumstances of such inefficiency or misconduct, that seems to be desirable, to two-thirds of such disability pension until 65 and the full pension after the age of 65.

In 1949 a new contributory pension scheme was inaugurated in the force which was to be available for all new members of the force who came on strength after that date and to those old members who wished to join the contributory pension fund. It provided a number of additional features such as an allowance to the widow and children of the member, and other features of that sort which were not formerly available under the non-contributory pension scheme. But in the new contributory pension scheme there was no provision for a pension in the event of the member of the force in this scheme being discharged for inefficiency or misconduct.

Upon further consideration we now think that the position of the pensioner under the two schemes should be equalized in that respect. That is the purpose of the bill to be introduced by the resolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many have been discharged for inefficiency or misconduct since 1949?

Mr. Garson: Seven.

Mr. Pearkes: At the convention of the Canadian Legion in Montreal in 1952 recommendations were made that those members of the force who had served in armed forces during the war other than armed forces raised in Canada should be permitted to count their time towards their pension. I believe that under the old act members of the force who had served with the imperial forces were permitted to count their time in such service towards their pension from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. But when part V was introduced it was limited to those who had served on active service in the naval, military and air forces of His Majesty's forces raised in Canada. That excluded those members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who had served in the imperial forces.

I very much appreciate the traditional Canadian character of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but ever since the force was formed there has always been a percentage of the men who have seen service in forces of the crown other than those actually raised in Canada. I was wondering whether any provision had been made in these amendments to allow these men with overseas service with forces other than actual Canadian forces in the wars in which Canada has taken part to count that time towards their police pension.

Mr. Garson: No. The present projected act does not contemplate any amendments other than those which I have mentioned.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Will the amendment give the men who were discharged the same privileges and rights as men who retire on account of sickness?

Mr. Garson: No. They are, I think, under a proper disability by reason of their misconduct, but it does not seem fair that a man who has served for quite a period of time and who commits some serious item of misconduct, perhaps of a momentary character but which means that he cannot be kept in the force, should be penalized in respect of his whole accumulated pension. This provision is to meet a case of that kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of that statement, is it intended that the amendment shall apply to the seven discharged recently? I know that usually retroactive legislation is not to be encouraged, but if it is now ascertained, as the minister says, that it is unfair there should be that discrimination as it were between the two classes, is there any reason why under those circumstances, and after second thought, the provisions of the amendments that will be introduced in consequence of this resolution should not be placed in a position where they would be effectual since 1949.

Mr. Garson: No, there is no such reason. My hon. friend from Prince Albert is quite right, and we propose to secure authority by this proposed legislation to consider the cases of these seven discharged members.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 464, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

AMENDMENTS TO ENABLE COUNCIL TO ACQUIRE FUNDS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) for the second reading of Bill No. 375, to amend the Research Council Act.

Mr. Speaker: As the house will recall, there was an amendment moved by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) when we adjourned the debate, and at the request of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) the amendment was allowed to stand so that argument could be presented in favour of the amendment. Hon. members will recall that I had declared the amendment out of order because under our rules 48 hours' notice of the appointment of a special committee must be given in Votes and Proceedings. Unless there are arguments that can be presented now I shall have to maintain the ruling that I made on the earlier occasion and declare the amendment out of order.

I have already declared it out of order, and unless cogent arguments are presented which may compel me to change my mind—for the comfort of hon. members I might say that during the time at my disposal I have looked into the authorities in order to reassure myself I was on sound ground—I might say now that I think no matter what argument might be presented, I would still declare the amendment out of order. We might as well leave it at that, and say the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Fulton: I find it almost impossible not to accept your warm invitation, but under the circumstances there probably would not be much point to it.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) will agree with me that before I made this last pronouncement I had patiently waited for some sign from him that he was going to rise and argue the point.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): When the debate was adjourned on May 11, I was discussing the need for keeping our young men and women scientists in Canada, particularly for research purposes. The minister had this to say about that, as recorded on page 4624 of Hansard for that date:

> I should like also to emphasize that research is not a static thing. It is continually changing to meet changing conditions and also, like an organism, must grow from small beginnings. The development of research is not merely a matter of money. Money will not buy trained men if they are not available, so that in looking at and assessing the growth and development of research in any country, one must always keep in mind that it is a changing picture and that it is often impossible to provide at any moment everything that may be desirable.

I would have you note there, Mr. Speaker, that the minister did say money will not buy trained men. What happened to the men that we did have in this country who were trained at the various wonderful universities we have in Canada? Most of them I dare say—I should not say most of them—have gone south of the border. They find it is more lucrative to enter the scientific field there, especially the field of research. I have spoken to a number of them from time to time, and their contention is that our economic standard is of equal value to that of the United States, and therefore they feel that they should be paid as well as their United States counterparts.

I have no doubt but that the minister feels, and rightfully so, that we are doing everything we can to encourage those individuals to stay here. Now that he has pointedly indicated we are entering the research field on a grandiose scale, we might say, we should invite these young men and women to return. In many instances they have not accepted United States citizenship, and have intimated that they wish to return. Possibly a gesture from our government might lure them back so that we would have them available for research purposes. I would heartily endorse what the research council subscribes to, namely that no brilliant young student should be prevented from receiving training because of lack of scholarships or grants.

In so far as grants are concerned, as a young nation we probably are giving as much as we feel we can afford, but I think that the more money we spend on research, the more results we will have and the greater the number of industries that will be set up. This fact has been illustrated by the minister himself. We would be, therefore, getting our dollar's worth, in some instances multiplied many times. My main concern in this regard, of course, is how do our grants compare with the grants and bursaries given by United States universities? What happens to the trained research worker after he has received his education here? What special privileges are we prepared to give to trained personnel who indicate their desire to come to Canada? Anyone who has taken a trip to the United States in recent years, I am sure will have discovered there is an increase in the number of requests for information about the vast mineral fields in British Columbia that have been opened up, the oil fields in Alberta and the mining interests in Ontario and Quebec. We could use many of these personnel if they would agree to come to Canada for research purposes.

It is now five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Since it is five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of public and private bills.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE QUORUM OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 81, an act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Knowles: I shall be very brief in closing the debate on the second reading of Bill 81, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to the quorum of the House of Commons. As hon. members are aware, the purpose of this bill is to increase the quorum of the House of Commons.

At the present time, according to section 48 of the British North America Act, the minimum attendance for the house to transact business is fixed at 20 members. As I have pointed out on previous occasions, there has been no change in that figure since 1867. Since that time, however, there has been a fairly substantial increase in the membership of the house. Originally the membership was 181, whereas our present membership is 265. For my part I feel the quorum should be a much larger figure than that proposed in my bill. However one realizes the difficulty of having changes made, particularly when he is dealing with the British North America Act. Therefore my bill proposes simply that we maintain the same proportion that was established when the quorum was fixed in 1867 at 20 members.

Incidentally, as I pointed out previously, the figure of 20 members was carried forward from the figure which served as the quorum in the legislative assembly of the Province of Canada previous to 1867, when the total of members representing the two parts, Upper and Lower Canada, was considerably fewer. It does seem to me that to maintain that proportion and thereby to increase the quorum to 30 members is the least that we should be doing.

Various arguments have been advanced as to why this should not be done, the chief argument being that there are many committees members have to attend. But I press the point that at no time are there enough committees sitting—in fact there are not either rooms in the building or reporters sufficient to make it possible—to take away enough members to make a quorum of 30 members, or even a much larger number, impossible to attain.

It has been said to me in recent days, on occasions when at one time or another attendance in the house has fallen rather low, that if my bill were to pass it would be that much more difficult to keep the house working. It has been said that it would be more difficult to keep 30 members here than to keep 20. Well, if at times the attendance in the house falls within reach of the minimum fixed by law, that is all the more reason why the minimum should be a little higher than it is at the present time, so that we might have a better attendance at all times.

People outside cannot understand why the quorum is set so low. Some have questioned my bill on the ground that it does not fix a high enough figure. As I have said, I think it should be considerably higher; but surely this is the least that we should approve, namely the maintenance of the same proportion as was established in 1867.

This then is the purpose of my bill. If it were to pass the house and receive approval in the other place and the assent of His Excellency the Governor General, by virtue thereof the British North America Act would be amended. No further steps would be necessary. This is in consequence of the amendment to that act we obtained in the fall of 1949, as a result of which we now have the right to amend the British North America Act, the constitution of Canada, with respect to matters exclusively federal, by a bill put through the parliament of Canada.

It is in the exercise of that right that this bill is presented, and I believe it would meet with approval outside the house if we were to take this step to increase the minimum attendance required in the house. Therefore, I urge hon. members to adopt the bill, which might now be put to a vote.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles) which was negatived on the following division:

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 152, REVISED STATUTES OF 1952—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate. Does the hon. member for Vancouver South wish to speak in this debate?

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of the principle of the check-off. It seems to me that in provinces where the principle of the check-off has been applied the ground of difference between employers and employees has been very much narrowed, and that is a condition which should be favoured by anyone in Canada who believes in supporting the best interests of our country.

I am well aware, of course, that there are conditions which do not make this bill as potentially effective in the federal field as would a similar principle applied in the provincial field. But I wish to make it clear that our experience in British Columbia is that since we have had the principle of the check-off available on the basis of a majority vote in any given industry then the relations in key industries such as that at Trail and in other great industrial centres of British Columbia have been greatly improved, and the really marked improvement there has been in the relationships between employer and employee in British Columbia in the past 10 years or so is due to the fact that an enlightened Liberal minister of labour did make certain great improvements in industrial relations. The check-off was one of these reforms which the Liberal minister of labour enacted and I therefore wish to make it very clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favour of the check-off and believe it deserves consideration by this house.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am very happy indeed to hear the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) expressing himself along the lines on which he has just spoken, and speaking as an hon. member from the province of British Columbia I must say that my own experience in connection with the introduction of this check-off principle confirms what the hon. member has said.

He mentioned that improved industrial relations had resulted in such industrial centres as the city of Trail. Certainly I know that in the coastal areas, where the principle of the check-off has been accepted in the great British Columbia lumber industry, it has certainly served in my opinion to narrow the areas of difference which exist from time to time between employers and employees.

I must confess though that the remarks of the hon. member struck me as being much more in line with the best traditions of Liberalism than have some of the remarks I have heard coming from that side of the house in recent months. Hon. members will no doubt recall that the debate on this particular bill has progressed at a rather leisurely pace, which may be just as well because it has perhaps allowed some of us who are convinced of the sanity of this measure to cool off a little before making a reply to some of the remarks which have been made. I have before me a record of Hansard containing a speech made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) in which she refers to this bill as "such compulsory legislation as is here proposed." It seems to me that one has only to take that phrase from that particular speech to demonstrate how absurd that contention is.

I would like to add that the remarks I have heard on this bill in the previous discussions seemed to me to be echoing the arguments I heard a number of years ago almost ad nauseam from some of the employing interests who were opposed to the introduction of this principle, and which were based upon the supposition that the working people of this country know nothing about maintaining democracy and are less able to look after their own affairs than the rest of the citizens of this country.

I maintain this is an utterly false assumption. Some of the arguments which have been advanced from that side of the house reminded me, in their reference to certain leaders of the trade union movement, of nothing so much as a Tory attempting to describe the actions of the present Canadian cabinet, and while I might admit that people who become somewhat accustomed to power and responsibility may have a tendency at times to abuse that power, I would submit that that is certainly no more true of the leadership of the trade union movement than it is of the government of Canada. Anyone who keeps these things in perspective and who has a proper sense of proportion in connection with them realizes how absurd those arguments are.

This is an extremely simple arrangement that is suggested. Far from being a proposal for compulsory legislation, it is simply a proposal for permissive legislation. It only means that if a group of workers have decided amongst themselves that they wish to adopt this system, the law says that they shall have the right to do it without having to fight an economic battle with their employer in order to achieve it. That is one of the ways in which the agencies of the various levels of government in this country can help to reduce the area of conflict that exists between the various groupings in our society.

I suggest that it is something that we have in many fields within the provinces today and certainly the experience we have had there has been good, in my opinion. Even the new labour act which was introduced recently by the present government of British Columbia—much as I disagree with many of the sections in it—did not seek to eliminate this particular type of provision. I suggest that there certainly can be no harm in this parliament's setting an example to the people in all parts of the country with regard to allowing this form of democratic right to the workers of Canada.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a word or two with regard to this measure.

An hon. Member: The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Of course Mr. Speaker does not know that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have before me a list of the speakers in this debate. I understand that the hon. member spoke previously.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): We are in agreement with the proposal, in any event, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise for only one moment in order to point out that, owing to his having to attend upon public business elsewhere, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) was not able to be present today. However, his views on this bill were given to the house immediately after the sponsor of it spoke on February 23. In his remarks he made it clear that this was one of the many matters which were being studied by his officials, the department generally and himself, with a view to the introduction of possible amendments to the act. In the course of his remarks he asked that further time should be given for the purpose of making those studies and of bringing amendments to the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief in order that the house might come to a decision on this matter before the conclusion of this hour devoted to private and public bills. I am glad that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) made it clear that the absence of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) today is due to a previous engagement. He knew that this bill might be proceeded with today but was satisfied that it might be dealt with in his absence. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has, I think, stated his position with regard to it.

May I just remind the house that this is a matter which has been before parliament on a number of occasions. It may seem a bit tedious for me to tell this part of the story again, but I feel that I must remind the members of the house that as long ago as 1948, when the present Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act was first drafted and placed upon our statute books, when that legislation was going through parliament there was one stage at which it had in it the very principle, the very wording, that is contained in the bill that is now before the house. That principle, namely the voluntary revocable check-off, was written into the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act in the committee on industrial relations, on the motion of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). Despite the fact that the voluntary revocable check-off was written into the bill when it was in the committee on industrial relations, when the bill came back into the house an amendment was moved by another Liberal member to strike out that provision. On a division, the provision was lost in the committee of the whole house. Since that time this identical bill has been before the house a number of times. The votes have varied. The last time that the matter came to a vote was in 1951 when some 67 votes were cast in favour of it, including 17 on the Liberal side of the house, and all those on the opposition side who were present at the time. That was the largest number we have yet obtained by way of a vote in favour of this bill. I hope that today it might be larger, and that one of these days we may win the acceptance of this principle.

May I remind hon. members of the house again that what we are asking in this bill is not a compulsory measure. Rather we are asking for the very minimum of union security, namely the voluntary revocable check-off. The provision would be that in any case where a union is recognized as the bargaining unit for a group of employees, it would be the right of any employee in that union to request in writing that his dues to the union be deducted at the source and be paid over to the union by his employer. It would be the further right of such employee to revoke that request at any time. In other words, Mr. Speaker, as others have pointed out—indeed others on both sides of the house—this is the minimum form of union security that can be written into any labour legislation. It seems to me that the least this parliament should do is to accept this minimum form of union security and make it the law for those who come under federal labour jurisdiction.

I remind hon. members that in a number of the provinces of this country there is in existence legislation like or similar to that which is proposed here. I also remind hon. members that in 1953 when this bill was before parliament there was made an amendment that it be not read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the committee on industrial relations. That committee considered the subject matter carefully and in its report indicated its endorsation of the principle. That was the position taken by that committee, with the additional recommendation that the matter be studied by the government in its review and proposed revision of the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. That stand taken by the committee was confirmed by the house when the committee's report was made to the House of Commons. That then is the last position taken by parliament, namely endorsation of the principle of the voluntary revocable check-off and a recommendation that the matter be considered by the government.

I suppose the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration feels that it is a case of carrying out that recommendation for this consideration to go on. But some of us—including labour generally—feel that there comes a time when action is required rather than just the promise of still further consideration. When this matter was before the house several months ago I was ready to agree to the request of the Minister of Labour that it stand over for still further consideration to be given to it. That was in addition to the consideration given from the time the report was made to parliament in the last session—over a year ago—through the period between sessions and through the time of the election. In addition to all of that, we have given this additional time since this bill was introduced on December 11, and I think the time has come for the house to decide on the principle itself. In my view this house should now support the principle of the voluntary revocable check-off of trade union dues by voting for this bill.

RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

AMENDMENTS TO ENABLE COUNCIL TO ACQUIRE FUNDS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) for the second reading of Bill No. 375, to amend the Research Council Act.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this third instalment of my speech I have only a few more observations to make along the lines I had followed earlier, when I had made reference to getting our young scientists and students back from the United States and other foreign lands to reinterest them in the research work we propose to carry on in this country.

The cost of living is about the same in the United States as in Canada. Wages paid to our industrial workers are about the same, and certainly neither the government nor anyone connected with it should claim we cannot afford to pay these scientists the same amount for the research work we expect them to do as they are being paid by similar organizations in the United States. I would go so far as to say that it seems quite likely at this time that the United States might attribute its success to the fine work its research scientists have done in the last several years; and if one were to check into the persons who are probably responsible for that in all likelihood he would find that a good many of our young Canadian men and women have been responsible to a great extent for that success.

I should like now to leave that field of discussion and turn to one or two statements made by the minister with respect to expenditures made in 1938 and 1939. Industry in the United States spent three or four times the amount spent by the United States government on research. From a standpoint of comparison, the Canadian government spent twice as much as was spent by industry in this country for that purpose. This is a very commendable fact, and those in Canada who are responsible for it should feel quite proud that our government saw fit to spend that much on research, as compared with the amount spent by industry.

One fact should be kept in mind, however, and that is that a good many of the industries to which reference was made, including such companies as Northern Electric and Westinghouse, have their main offices in the United States. Probably they did not feel they were justified in setting up huge research laboratories in Canada when they could use the knowledge they gained from their Canadian scientists in the United States and pass that knowledge on to their Canadian counterparts.

When one turns to the problem facing the research council today he must see at once the tremendous field offered by the coal industry. I do not wish to spend much time discussing this subject, because all hon. members are aware of the necessity of trying to get our coal industry back on a sound financial basis. It is a fact that not so many years ago we were proud of the fact and, indeed, announced it to the world, that in Canada we had one-seventh of the world's total coal resources. That fact gave us considerable comfort. What should have proved to be one of the greatest assets has, in the hands of this government, turned out to be one of its biggest headaches.

Possibly one of the reasons for this is that we have not done sufficient work in our research laboratories in connection with the utilization of coal. It may be urged that other countries have not spent enough time in discovering a complete utilization of coal, and that their industry has lagged, as well. However, when in trying to excuse ourselves we accuse somebody else we do not give ourselves any legitimate reason for our action. I would ask the research council, through its laboratories, to find more uses for coal so that we may utilize our supply to the fullest extent.

In my correspondence with the research council I have noticed that there is a reasonable amount of co-ordination between laboratories under government jurisdiction and research facilities set up by industry. This is to be commended, and as a result excellent work is being done. I sometimes wonder however whether we have not gone too far in accepting the statements of research laboratories. My view is that we should have a closer check-up to see whether those laboratories are telling the truth. I think more particularly of some of the highly advertised soap products offered for sale in Canada today. We hear of one soap advertised as being 99-44/100 per cent pure, and apparently the claim is made because this soap floats. This does not mean that it is particularly pure; yet the manufacturer is permitted to advertise this product as being pure, and the reason given for its purity is that it floats.

Then we have other claims such as, "It makes clothes whiter"; and another soap that "Duz everything". And so on, down through the list. I come to a comparatively new product in connection with a certain type of clothing advertised in Ottawa. I have reference to dacron, which is another form of nylon, and also to orlon. We have several different types of materials made of these synthetic substances; but there is no guarantee as to what value there is in these products. There is a good deal of indiscriminate advertising with respect to them. Our research council has not indicated whether these are or are not good products.

I gather the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Byrne: No; I was just saying that people voted for Social Credit, but they did not know what they were getting.

Mr. Hahn: They knew what they had, and they got something better.

Mr. Blackmore: The same is true of Liberalism, and look what they are getting!

Mr. Hahn: I might go so far as to say that they may not have known what they voted for when they got the hon. member for Kootenay East.

To carry on with this discussion, I should like now to turn to some correspondence with the foreign trade service of the Department of Trade and Commerce. This is a letter dated May 10, 1954 signed by D. G. W. Douglas, chief of the consumer goods division, in which he says, replying to my inquiry concerning nylon hosiery:

> In the meantime, however, Mr. Gerridzen, the commodity officer for wearing apparel, has already delved into the matter of testing facilities. This department has no machinery for such purposes and we are, therefore, making outside inquiries as to which agency would be the most logical one to deal with your problems.

I do not censure the department for this because I realize that the Department of Trade and Commerce or the national research council cannot have testing departments for everything. However, if we are going to accept the unqualified word of industry, there is just the possibility that industry may be somewhat prejudiced in its own behalf. For that reason we cannot accept the word of industry, without first making some examination. I suggest that because the textile industry is of such major importance in Canada a considerable amount of work should be done by the research council in an effort to establish ways and means of obtaining a product that would sell more cheaply and also compete in world markets today.

Now, Mr. Speaker, over the period, on three separate occasions, friends of mine have said that my time is up and possibly I shall have more to say on the subject at another time.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, although the amendments to the national Research Council Act are more or less formal, this debate gives us an opportunity to consider the extent of this parliament's responsibility in matters of research. It is interesting to note in the estimates this year the extent of the funds which are voted for research. In the Department of Agriculture votes 5 to 15 deal with the science service of that department, and they call for just short of $10 million; in the same department the experimental farm service calls for just over $10 million. Then, in the Department of Fisheries votes 144 to 147 deal with the fisheries research board and call for expenditures of $2,500,000. In the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources vote 329 deals with the forestry branch and, together with the grants to universities for research work, amounts to $1 million. Then of course there is a very large item appropriated for the national defence research board amounting to over $50 million, and we have not yet come to the main agency of research, namely, the national research council, which is listed for $16,081,000. Following that is the atomic energy control board which has $13,500,000 assigned to it. These figures amount to a total of over $105 million, which is to be voted by this parliament for purposes of research. One cannot help but be impressed with the extent of the research work which is the responsibility of this parliament.

In making these remarks tonight I do not approach the work of any of our agencies in a critical or complaining frame of mind. I believe that we are being well served by the agencies in their respective spheres. I believe the national research council might well consider expending a larger proportion of its budget in grants to universities. My opinion is that to some extent universities, in which much of the actual research work must be done, are cramped for funds which they receive through grants from the national research council, and that perhaps a larger proportion of the budget could usefully be used in that direction. But what impresses one most, Mr. Speaker, is the opportunity that this country offers for research which would be beneficial. It would not be possible to overestimate the importance to Canada of efficient and active research agencies directed towards the maintenance of the enviable position which Canada has attained today in the world as the third trading nation of the world, in which the material equipment for life and the pursuit of happiness are equal to those of any other country of the world.

We have attained that enviable position through the initiative and enterprise of our people, largely our inventive people and research workers. If we are to proceed from the point we have reached, which I describe as an enviable point, and maintain our position, it seems to me that we must never let that vital spark to this kind of society die down.

We have recognized the needs of underdeveloped and less privileged countries in various ways and are aiding them with very large sums of money, such as the vote for the Colombo plan, to which we are devoting $25 million a year. The difference between such countries and Canada is largely accounted for by the application of ingenuity to the material things that we have and from which we build up our comfort and maintenance in an industrial society.

Canada itself, Mr. Speaker, is an underdeveloped country, and we shall go forward from our present position at a rate which will largely be conditioned by the efficiency and efficacy of our research service. If one looks back over recent history I think it is clear that no one fifty years ago in his best imaginative moments would have conjured up a vision of the society in which we live today. There have been so many changes in the mechanical field that anyone fifty years ago attempting to forecast the life of this country which we enjoy today would have been completely at a loss to foretell what was ahead. I can see that in the future the same relative changes will take place but probably at an accelerated pace. We are living in an age of great speed, and it may be that those of us here tonight, if we were to try to foretell what society in Canada would be like, even fifteen years from now, would be very wide of the mark. What it will be like will largely depend on the efforts of the scientists.

What I wish to direct attention to tonight, Mr. Speaker, is the responsibility of this parliament to see that the best is being done, the best use is being made of the public funds which are devoted to that end. It may be instructive, or at least interesting, to recall what was done in the province of Ontario in recent years with a view to assuring the legislature that it was making proper use of the public funds which it had voted for research purposes. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), who was then premier of Ontario, instituted an inquiry in 1945 under the public inquiries act by a volunteer commission of industrial, scientific, professional and union representatives who were interested in this project, under the name of the Ontario research commission. Its terms of reference were to review the research agencies which existed in the province and the expenditures which were being made to see what overlapping there was, what conflict, what gaps and generally to see what could be done to co-ordinate the work of those various agencies and to make the best use of the funds which were being voted for this purpose.

These agencies consisted of federal agencies with which we are all familiar, the departments of the provincial government, many of whom had research agencies, the universities and the agricultural schools, industry with its private research laboratories and the Ontario research foundation, which was a joint enterprise of government and industry financed by the two many years ago, and doing a sort of custom research work for industry.

In the course of their inquiries they came to some conclusions which were reported and embodied in legislation in 1948 which I had the honour of having some part in. The Ontario research council act which was passed in that year, set up a council whose responsibilities, I believe, can best be described in the words of the Ontario research council's annual report for 1952-53. This report was issued after the council had been in operation for five years, first under the chairmanship of Dr. R. C. Wallace for a number of years, and latterly under the chairmanship of Dr. R. K. Stratford, who is scientific adviser to Imperial Oil Limited.

This report describes the four main interests and activities of the council with which I shall deal briefly. The first one was to provide scholarships, because it was recognized that research can be done only where there are trained personnel competent to undertake the work. Paralleled with the scholarships of the national research council some $50,000 a year was devoted to scholarships and, in view of the remarks of the previous speaker, it is interesting to note that these scholarships have not been used to train scientists to emigrate to the United States, and that the men who were trained in scientific research methods by these scholarships are, for the most part, now engaged in scientific work in the Dominion of Canada. I have not the figures at hand, but I believe some 166 out of over 200 persons who benefited by these scholarships are doing the work for which they were specially trained.

The second feature of the council's responsibility was that of correlating government research efforts in the province in order to ensure a balance with the needs of the various natural resources. It was intended from the beginning that assistance in each important field of research should be given by an advisory committee representing all the active interests and agencies. These committees were to serve as a medium for discussion and closer co-operation between already well-established research agencies. In addition, the advisory committees would be responsible for initiating further research needed in their respective fields. This might be indicated by problems requiring immediate solution, by future long-term needs, or suggested by research developments elsewhere.

In pursuance of that purpose the council's eight advisory committees are now functioning in various areas of natural and physical sciences. These are agriculture, forestry, fisheries and wild life, highways, industrial research, industrial waste, mines and metallurgy, and aerial surveys. The advisory committees have been very effective in bringing together industrial, governmental, and university research people to examine the problems and supervise programs of research.

By way of illustration, Mr. Speaker, may I refer to the work of one of these eight committees I have mentioned to indicate how such an advisory committee may eliminate overlap, may bring all the workers in one particular field of research together so they are aware of what the others are doing, and so that you do not have two or three working on the same problem leaving other problems completely untouched.

For example, the agricultural research committee is convened three or four times a year, has several subcommittees, and is composed of leading research workers in agriculture, not only in the dominion Department of Agriculture, but also in the Ontario department of agriculture, the Ontario School of Agriculture, the Ontario federation of agriculture, the Hydro Electric Power Commission, the Ontario Veterinary College and so on; there are some 18 or 20 different men whose work is in this research field and who come together periodically to review what is being done in that field, and what work is being carried out in that field by the various agencies.

The third purpose of the council is the establishment of grants in aid to encourage industry to combine to solve problems affecting an industry, and which operates somewhat in the manner of the research organizations to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) referred when he spoke of such bodies in Great Britain, though on a smaller scale.

Only two of these projects have been undertaken in Ontario. One is a forest research project at Heron Bay, Ontario, where the Ontario Paper Company Limited and the Abitibi Power and Paper Company Limited are co-operating in a silvicultural program with the provincial government. The other one is in the field of air and water pollution in the Sarnia area where five companies are co-operating with the research council in a study which is under the direction of the council's committee on industrial waste. Here I must emphasize again that this advisory group is a voluntary organization of men who may be described as leaders in our industrial life, particularly in its scientific aspects.

The fourth project which they considered to be essential was that of making known the information which is being accumulated by scientists and researchers, particularly to the smaller industries. It is astonishing to note how much of the industry of this country is carried on by smaller groups which employ 50 men or less. In fact 94 per cent of the industries in Ontario employ 50 persons or less and account for 30 per cent of the province's production. That may not pertain throughout Canada but it does indicate that these smaller industries are in the greatest need of information to guard against obsolescence and backwardness in the industrial struggle, because they are not always aware of what is available for them.

I know that on a national scale there is a great accumulation of information and the Ontario agency, in co-operation with the national research council and its technical branch, have established an information service whose sole duty it is to provide information to these smaller industries so that the best use is made of what is known. It is astonishing how much useful information is already available to these industries which could be put to use and profit in cutting down the cost of production if it were only realized and made available.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have only to apply this excursion into what was done in Ontario to our own situation throughout the dominion. The example I have given demonstrates the effort made by a legislature to see that the best use is made of its research dollars, and I think we should ask ourselves some questions along these lines when we come to deal with the expenditure of $105 million, which is not the entire budget, and in the expenditures which are being made in other fields in order to see that we are getting the best value, whether there is any overlapping in research, whether there is any waste, and whether there are any gaps to be filled.

It seems to me that that is the area with which parliamentary inquiry should periodically concern itself. I appreciate that the amendment has been ruled out of order and I am speaking in more general terms, but I do suggest that this parliament would be well advised to review periodically what is being done with these research dollars to see that the best value is being obtained. We should ask ourselves whether the national research council as at presently constituted is the right body to co-ordinate the work being done by the various agencies. We should also bear in mind that the national research council is spending $16 million out of $105 million and is therefore by no means the only agency engaged in research which is responsible to this parliament. We should also ask ourselves whether it is the right body to advise parliament as to its over-all needs and expenditures for research.

I suggest that the members of this house should be sure that we are making the most of our research brains and agencies. Let us be sure that there are no duplications. Let us be sure what more there is that can be done. A review such as I have suggested would give assurance to the members of this house that they are making the best use of the money which is voted for research purposes. As I have said, this research plays a vital part in the future of this country if it is not only to maintain the position it has but to remain in the forefront of industrial nations.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I think there are several remarks I might be able to make which would perhaps sum up the interesting and useful debate that we have had on the second reading of this bill. First of all I should like to thank the hon. members who have taken part in this debate for the interest they have shown in the important matter of research and for the contributions they have made by their comments. The speeches we have heard indicate not only the importance to this country of research but also the opinion held by many hon. members of this house with respect to that importance and the need for parliament to discharge, with care and attention, its responsibilities in connection with research.

I thought that the speeches of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) who has just taken his seat were particularly constructive and helpful. The hon. member for St. Paul's gave an interesting description of some of the work of the Ontario research council. It is true that a number of the provinces have followed the lead given in the wider federal sphere by the national research council and have themselves organized research foundations or councils which have done important and helpful work.

I should remind hon. members that starting tomorrow the national research council here in Ottawa is holding open house. During this open house the facilities of the council will be open to the public for three days. Members of parliament are particularly invited to come tomorrow afternoon for the opening of the open house and to get what might be called a preview before the general public are invited. I hope that many members will be able to avail themselves of this opportunity. Any who are not able to come along tomorrow afternoon will be more than welcome during the concluding three days of the week when they can come at any time they wish.

In summing up the debate, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should refer at some length to the speech made in this debate on Tuesday, May 11, by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). The hon. member for Lambton West has shown a great interest in the general over-all question of research and we listened to his speech with considerable interest. The hon. member had placed a resolution on the order paper at the beginning of the session and in his speech he made reference to it. Because of the particular wording of the reference, I think one remark should be made about it. At page 4628 of Hansard of May 11, the hon. member said:

> The restriction on time allotted for consideration of private members' resolutions effectively excluded the opportunity for parliament to consider this important question.

As the hon. member saw fit to use those words, I think it should be put on record that, in fact, his resolution—and it was an important one—in the ordinary course of the procedure of this house was called for discussion on December 7 but it was, at the request of the mover, allowed to stand and therefore was not debated on that day. Unfortunately it went to the foot of the order paper and was not reached again.

Several hon. members have made suggestions with respect to a parliamentary committee to consider the broad question of research and also to consider the operations of the national research council. I for one did not think that this suggestion, at the time it was made, was a practical one for this session. However, in the past we have had extremely useful committees on matters of this kind. Several sessions ago there was set up a committee specifically on the national research council. In recent years we have had two separate committees which studied the specific fields of research and atomic energy and I think they did extremely useful and worth-while work. I can see no objection to the possibility of there being a parliamentary committee at the next session or at some future session of this parliament if hon. members feel that it would be a constructive and worth-while committee to have, keeping in mind the other business with which parliament must deal.

The hon. member for Lambton West in his speech made a number of general remarks on the importance of research and the care with which we should look into our activities in research. But taken as a whole and eliminating the matters of general interest and that sort of thing, I think his speech comes down to, first, the suggestion that there should be a committee, to which I have referred and, second, a list of questions which he felt should be answered. I think it was the intent of his speech to suggest that they were questions of a kind that a parliamentary committee should answer and should report upon to the house. These questions are found at page 4630 of Hansard of May 11. The first one is as follows:

> Are we doing enough in the way of research in this country, . . .

Then he goes on to elaborate on that basic question. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the committee could sit for a long time and never come up with a better answer than to say: We never can do enough in research. It could never be said that enough is being done in research. The question rather is this: In all the circumstances how much can we usefully do, and are we spending in the best way possible the money which is provided by parliament for research? But to suggest that a parliamentary committee or any other body would ever come to the conclusion that we are doing enough in the field of research is not, I think, very practical. The second question that the hon. member asked is as follows:

> Are our universities in a position to continue to provide the trained scientific minds and undertake the fundamental research necessary to assure the continued development and productive expansion of this country?

That, Mr. Speaker, is a very basic question, and I think it touches on what is almost a unique feature of the research program carried out by the national research council in this country and to a more limited extent by some of the bodies set up by provincial governments in connection with research. The extent and the development of the program of scholarships and grants which are provided through the national research council to students who are prepared to enter upon scientific studies and to prepare themselves for work as research scientists are quite extraordinary. I think the best way to give the house an idea of the kind of program that the national research council carries out in this field is to quote a part of the annual report of the council for 1952-53. On page 36 of the report there is the following:

> The awards branch—

That is the awards branch of the national research council.

> —administers scholarships and grants in aid of research awarded annually by the national research council. Scholarships awarded in science and engineering include bursaries, studentships and fellowships which have values of $600, $900 and $1,200 respectively for the academic year, to which a summer supplement of $500 may be added. In addition special scholarships valued at $1,500 per year and post-doctorate overseas fellowships at $2,500 are offered. The council also awards two classes of graduate medical research scholarships which have values of $1,800 to $3,000 for awards involving graduate training, and up to $5,000 for senior awards in advanced research.

Then it goes on to deal with dental research and with post-graduate fellowships and certain important fellowships that are provided out of private funds but are administered by the national research council. This program, as I said, is unique, and it is a program that has been very substantially developed over the last few years. For example, in the fiscal year 1938-39 the total of national research council scholarships and research grants for that year was $81,378. In 1953-54 that total had risen to $1,909,000; in other words, almost $2 million.

This program is being expanded just about as rapidly as the research council can see the possibility of spending this money satisfactorily. In other words, they try to ensure that any promising science student in this country who wishes to follow advanced studies of that kind in order to prepare himself for research or other scientific work is able to do so without difficulty. As has already been said in this debate, the objective of the research council is that no promising science student in this country should have to give up his training because of lack of financial support. It is never possible to say that everything is being done in a field of this kind, but I think that the way in which this program has been developed, the tremendous increase in the annual amounts expended and the number of young men who have been trained for scientific work in this way is a very great achievement. I can assure hon. members that it is one feature of the council's work that is a source of great pride and satisfaction to the president and members of the council and to all those connected with the council's work.

On that point I was very interested, as I am sure all hon. members were, in the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for St. Paul's with respect to the training of scientists in Canada. The program of the national research council is of course intended in the first instance to provide training in Canada wherever that is possible. However, I think it would be unwise, and not the kind of policy that parliament should favour, to exclude training outside this country, if necessary, so that our students can have the benefit of the research facilities and the university and other facilities for study that are available not only in the United States but in England and European countries. The real problem is to get the services of these trained men in Canada when they have completed their training. Everything that is possible is of course done to ensure that they either remain in this country or come back to this country and take jobs either in the government service or in industry.

The third question that the hon. member asked reads as follows:

> Would accelerated efforts in the field of industrial research, resulting in new products, new uses for old products, improved techniques that lower production costs, enhance or help us, an exporting nation in ever-increasingly competitive world markets?

The answer to that is yes, and no parliamentary committee is required to provide the answer. It is obvious that the only answer is the short answer, and it is in the affirmative.

The fourth question he asked reads as follows:

> Are our present fiscal policies, in relation to research expenditures, adequate to induce private industry to undertake the amount of research that should be undertaken . . .

Then he goes on to refer to the activities of government agencies. The point of the question is: Are the fiscal policies of this country properly designed to provide the utmost incentive to private individuals and private enterprise to undertake research projects both in basic research and in specialized research in their own fields? That, I think, is one of the very fundamental questions in this whole problem, and I cannot help feeling that if the hon. member had really gone into the question of what our fiscal policies are and how they compare with the fiscal policies of other countries he would have come to the conclusion that we are doing just about as much as can be done in this field.

The hon. member was good enough to indicate that the interest of the government in this particular feature of research programs dates back at least to the budget speech of the Hon. Charles Dunning, which he quoted and put on Hansard. At that time, and up to the budget of 1944, the situation with respect to incentives to industry to make expenditures on research was that current expenditures on research or research facilities were regarded as an element of expense if they could be established as an outlay necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning the income. In other words, if the research expenditure could be shown to be a cost of doing business, then that was a deductible expense and no corporate income tax was chargeable upon it. In so far as capital expenditures were concerned, they were not allowed as deductions and only normal depreciation was permitted.

Now, the result of this was that the cost of laboratories, pilot plants and the like was not exempt and the current expenditures that could not be directly related to earning the firm's income were not deductible. In making his budget speech in this house in 1944, the then minister of finance, the Hon. J. L. Ilsley, said this, as recorded at page 4181 of Hansard for June 26, 1944:

> All will agree that Canadian industry must expand its research and technical development if we are to apply the most advanced technical knowledge to our resources, and maintain our competitive position. By all means, let us borrow from whatever is best from other countries, but what we can borrow is not always what we need.

I believe the hon. member will agree that that statement puts into words fairly well what he had in mind in dealing with this subject, the necessity of expanding research and technical development in order to maintain our competitive position. At that time in 1944, Mr. Ilsley and the government were looking forward to the transition from a war to a peacetime economy, and they were considering ways of assisting the expansion of industry. The government brought into effect with that budget what I feel is, by all standards of comparison, the best system of fiscal incentive to industry to undertake research that any country has today.

The present arrangements are that a research project approved by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) entitles the company to a deduction of current expenses without limit, that is to say up to 100 per cent of all profit can go into research and can be fully deducted. I do not see how that could be improved. A company can invest 100 per cent of its earnings in current expenditures on research, and they are fully deductible for income tax purposes.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Dickey: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Perhaps I misunderstand, but is that not subject to approval by a certain committee or organization?

Mr. Dickey: As I said, if the project is approved by the Minister of National Revenue the company is entitled to make these deductions.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Just a moment, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Dickey: I am going to go ahead and deal with the whole problem. If the hon. member will just possess his soul in patience I think it will be clear. Even if a research project is not approved, the company is permitted to deduct for research expenditures up to 5 per cent of the total income of the company in the previous year. In terms of research expenditures, that represents a generous deduction.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): That is taxable income?

Mr. Dickey: Applications for approval of projects, I am informed, are received at the rate of about two per month. According to the memory of officials in the Department of National Revenue who deal with this subject, only two or three applications have ever been refused. The practical situation is, therefore, that almost every application that has been made by a private company or organization to get this 100 per cent deductibility for research expenditures has been approved. The practice is that the Minister of National Revenue consults the national research council with respect to these matters, and makes a decision.

A very important feature of the system is the definition of scientific research. I think I should like to put that on the record. It is:

> . . . any activity in the field of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge.

This is amplified further on in the regulations as:

> references to scientific research relating to a business or class of business, include any scientific research that may lead to or facilitate an extension of that business, or as the case may be, business of that class.

In other words, that means that while research must be related to the taxpayer's business, it need not necessarily be in the particular line of production in which he is actually engaged at that time. It may be a similar line or a by-product or some line quite different from the main line of production. Any bona fide research program undertaken by a taxpayer in Canada to further the interests of his business is almost certain to receive this approval.

Now, these expenditures may be made for research directly carried out by the taxpayer, or they may be payable to approved bodies that carry out research for the taxpayer, such as research associations undertaking scientific research related to the class of business to which the taxpayer's business belongs, or something of that kind. It may be an approved university, college or similar institution. Now, the capital expenses, as opposed to current expenditures, are on a little different basis. There is no deductibility for the land. All other items of a capital nature that are directly undertaken by or on behalf of the taxpayer, that is buildings, equipment, machinery, whatever might be required, are depreciable at the rate of one-third of the value per year. In other words, those items are completely written off in three years. I would submit to the hon. member and to the house that is a very generous write-off indeed.

How does this situation compare to the situation that exists in other countries? The hon. member was interested in that. I feel the hon. member will agree that the scale of industrial research in the United States is extensive indeed. The situation there is that the internal revenue code of the United States does not contain any special provision dealing with the deduction of expenditures for scientific research. In administering their particular law, however, the bureau of internal revenue recognizes that most manufacturing businesses have experimental, research and developmental departments, and allows the cost of this work as a deductible expense. I am advised the main concern of the bureau appears to be whether any cost in developing a new process should be capitalized, that is regarded as a capital expenditure, and written off over a period of years or should be classed as a current expenditure.

In brief, with respect to current expenditures, the situation in the United States is just about on a par with the situation in this country prior to 1944. It does not appear to be as generous a provision as we now have in Canada. Though scientific research programs do not have to be officially approved any deduction made by a taxpayer has to meet the general test of being a necessary expense of doing business.

That brings us right back to the situation we had in Canada prior to the fiscal provisions made in 1944. Expenditures on scientific research of a capital nature in the United States do not qualify for any quick write-off but would obtain only the depreciation allowance for property of their class used in the general course of the business. That is obviously a very much less generous provision than that provided in this country for capital expenditure.

In the United Kingdom the provisions of the income tax law which allow a deduction for expenditures on scientific research are similar in many respects to those in the Canadian law. Scientific research is defined as:

> Any activities in the fields of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge.

There is a deduction for expenditure of both a current and capital nature, but the deduction for expenditures of a capital nature must be spread over five years, as compared with three years in Canada. Their law does not have the requirements that the scientific research program must be approved, although it does require that when expenditures are made by scientific research associations, universities and the like, these institutions must be approved. And they have a lengthy definition which ties the expenditure down to research related to the trade in question. This is regarded as quite a bit more restrictive than the situation here in Canada.

In his speech the hon. member for Lambton West referred to provisions made in a recent budget brought down in the British parliament on April 6. He referred to a special 20 per cent write-off for research expenditures. I was interested in that, as it seemed to indicate a change in the situation as I had understood it. With that in mind I looked up the parliamentary debates of the House of Commons at Westminster, volume 526, No. 90, and I believe that portion of the budget speech to which the hon. member had reference is to be found at page 225, where the Hon. Mr. Butler said:

> In general, the field over which the new investment allowance will operate will be the same as that of the initial allowance, which applies to plant and machinery generally and to new industrial buildings and mining works.

Looking further, I find that this is not a deduction specifically for research purposes. It is a special allowance made over the broad field of industrial expansion for new plant, new industrial buildings, and new undertakings of that kind. They are eligible for this 20 per cent allowance, whether or not they are connected with research. It is true that if they are connected with research, they may qualify; but it is not a program that is intended specifically to encourage research. It is a program that is intended rather to encourage the expansion of business over the general field.

That, I think, deals in some detail with what I believe was the main theme of the hon. member's speech. He went on to ask questions about whether we are doing enough agricultural and medical research. Well, I think the answer to that is exactly the same as the answer to his first question. It can never be said we are doing enough. The question is: Are we doing the best we can in all the circumstances, and with the facilities available?

Then he asked how the situation compares between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) put some figures on record in this debate on May 11, when he dealt with that subject. I am not going to tire the house by repeating the figures, but I would state briefly that the figures of expenditures on an absolute basis, on the basis of per capita expenditure, and also on the basis of expenditures as related to national income and gross national product, show that Canada has been expanding research, and particularly government research, in a manner that is very creditable indeed, as compared with either the United States or the United Kingdom.

I do not suggest for one moment that we are doing everything that could possibly be done; but I do suggest the general program compares favourably with programs under way in the two countries I have mentioned. The hon. member referred particularly to arrangements being made in the United States and the United Kingdom for special committees or advisory councils. The fact is that for many years neither of those countries found it necessary or thought it advisable to have any organization of the nature of the national research council, which we have had for a long period of time.

We think the job the national research council has done has been pretty effective and pretty worth while for Canada. I do not doubt that the types of organizations selected in the United States and the United Kingdom will be designed to meet the problems with which they are confronted. But I do submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the performance we have had from the national research council indicates that we have followed a pretty clear and pretty worth-while path in that regard.

Then the hon. member asked a final question, which amounted to his wondering whether the national research council is doing enough: Is its work sufficient? Well, that again is a question to which no one can give a categorical answer. I think the hon. member will agree that the reputation of the national research council in scientific circles, not only in this country and in the United States, but throughout the world, is very high indeed. Names of many men connected with the national research council, and the work they have done, are known everywhere. Perhaps the most recent and most outstanding honour that has come to this organization, or anybody connected with it, was the awarding of the Kelvin medal to Dr. Mackenzie. That is an accolade that is an honour, not only to the distinguished man who received it but to the organization in which he has worked and which he has headed so effectively for many years.

He would be the last to suggest I am sure that the national research council has done everything possible. I am sure every scientist realizes, perhaps better than hon. members in the House of Commons, the tremendous extent of knowledge as yet undiscovered, and the magnitude of the problem with which research men are faced. Having that knowledge, they realize even better than we do that no one can say, "Well, the organization is doing enough".

We come again to the basic question: Are we doing the best we can, in all the circumstances, and with the facilities available? I believe there is very little more I can add, except to say in conclusion that the national research council does cordially invite members of the House of Commons to come to their open-house tomorrow, and if not then to come later in the week.

In his speech the hon. member for Lambton West used an expression that I thought was quite extraordinary. As reported at page 4632 of Hansard, referring to the development of Canada, and what he termed a new phase in Canadian history, he said:

> We are beginning to grow up in spite of ourselves.

Now, that may be the considered opinion of the hon. member. It is not my opinion, and I hope it is not the opinion that is shared very widely in this house and in the country. I do not believe this country has grown in spite of itself, in any sense of the word; but it has grown because of what has been done in this country in many, many fields, and not the least of these fields is the field of research. The circumstances of our development in Canada have meant that a very large proportion of our research has to be done by government, not only the federal government but by other governments. Happily the extent to which private initiative and private interests are making contributions to research is growing every day. I think that the kind of climate that this government has created in this country, both over the whole sphere of the economic life of the country and also in the measures that have been taken to try to make it possible for companies to undertake research, has been largely responsible for the scale of our progress.

It has taken hard work and an intelligent approach to problems and a willingness by governments, by individuals and by private enterprise to search and to find the best path towards our continued and sound progress, but that has in large measure been done. I hope that we have built well on the foundation that was provided for us by our ancestors, and I hope that our children and our children's children will not consider that we have grown up in spite of ourselves.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations, prompted partly by what the last speaker has said and partly by what the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) said. We owe a duty to the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) for introducing the amendment he did, even though it had the fate that amendments sometimes have of not passing the scrutiny of Your Honour. There are other worthy amendments that lie in the same scrap heap, so that we need not sympathize too much with this particular amendment.

We have had a speech at length by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) answering many of the questions which were asked by the hon. member for Lambton West. I found the hon. member's speech interesting. I was surprised that he picked up so emphatically the phrase, which seemed to me a very ordinary one, used by the hon. member for Lambton West when he said "in spite of ourselves." I would point out to the senior member for Halifax that he did not say "in spite of the government". He just said "in spite of ourselves". I think it is just part of the natural modesty which we on this side of the house try to cultivate. I do not think there is more than that in it.

As I say, I was interested in the speech of the senior member for Halifax who said many interesting things. I was, however, surprised that he emphasized so much "the tremendous increase in the annual amounts expended". He would have been wiser to dwell wholly on the results achieved.

One of the reasons why I think it is a good thing that this amendment was moved is that it has prevented the debate on this bill being just a mere competition in adulation. It would be a very queer person who would not wish to give great credit to the national research council for all it has done. It just so happens that the officials have been very kind to me this week, and I have them particularly in mind.

It is interesting to look back to the constituting act of 1924 and to find how exclusively at that time it appears to have been directed to immediate utilitarian objectives, but as time has gone on and as we read the last report we realize how far the institute has gone in its operations. Because of the extent of the operations it almost makes one dizzy as one reads the report. We begin with the science laboratories; we go on to the division of pure chemistry, then the division of applied chemistry and on to physics, and so on. I am ashamed to say that there are many words here I do not even know the meaning of. I think, however, there is a danger which is always inherent in an organization which is to some extent in a position of isolation and which is presided over by a man of immense driving energy and who likes to see things done and likes to play a big part in doing them. There is always a question as to whether it goes on accumulating, growing, without any really critical view being brought to bear on it. I say "critical view". I think it is extremely difficult for a committee composed merely of members of parliament to bring an informed criticism to bear on the work of the research council because it is so highly scientific. We admire so much what it is doing that we really hesitate to become anything but a mutual admiration society, and yet that is bad.

There is a great danger that when people get to the top of an organization of this kind they naturally want it to grow. I remember when I was in business my chief saying to me once after a small new department had been founded: "Remember, Jim, you have got a new king now and he will want to have as many subjects as possible". I think that is true in all kinds of relations in life. Therefore I feel that if the result of this debate shows that, we shall be more determined to have a committee which will be able to collect opinions from various people across Canada. The people, for example, that I think would be worth consulting are the heads of provincial research institutes, selected university people, selected manufacturing people and others who can bring to the work of the institute an informed criticism.

When I say "criticism" I mean it only in the sense of trying to assess what has been done, so much of which we know is good. Certainly, I do not know anything that is not good; but I still feel that it would be very desirable if next year—it is too late this year—there could be a committee which, by getting the opinions of other experts, would try to come to an informed view as to whether there is a danger of this excellent institution getting the bit in its teeth and running away with it.

Let me say again, Mr. Speaker, that the farthest thing from my mind is criticism. I am sure the council has done and will do great things. All I am suggesting is that in some way the members of this house should put themselves in a position whereby, if it is suggested to them that the council, so to speak, has the bit in its teeth and is running away with it, we can say that is not so because the views of people who are competent to express them have been heard and we are satisfied with the conditions.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this discussion on the assistance for promotion of scientific or industrial research. As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has indicated, it was interesting to note that the parliamentary assistant agreed with the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) that some time before too long we should have a committee set up to go into this question of research. I would be interested to know if that question of research is something that has to be looked after immediately. The minister himself indicated that it was not a static thing but something that has got to be promoted and continue to be promoted.

No doubt most hon. members who have given this matter any thought will be in agreement. Research is not only one of the greatest factors in moulding our lives, but within the sphere of research rests the well-being of practically every phase of our economy, as well as the future of this great country of ours. We have been particularly and abundantly blessed with practically all the elements known to man and all the impetus possible should be given so that these elements of the field, the forest, the mines, and waters within and around us can be studied by our scientists. The benefit of that study should be passed on to every phase of our economy. It is a field that is as old as man himself. Today we are living in the reality envisioned by the poet who saw "the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails".

In the Globe and Mail of Monday, March 22, there appeared an article bearing the headline: "V-2 Man Says Atom Progress Means War Impossible Soon." I will read part of the extract. It states:

> The man who invented Germany's V-2 rocket said today he thinks atomic research will make war impossible within the next 12 months.

Professor Hermann Oberth said that by then it will be possible to reach any point on the globe within 45 minutes with atomic rocket.

This means that in the case of war all big cities of the enemy can be destroyed within two or three hours. I definitely believe that then no minister will decide himself for a war because he would sign his own death sentence at the same time.

So, by this means, the latter part of that great poem which ends like this:

There the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law—

—may come true.

During this session of parliament and during the debates which have taken place we have heard a great deal about the depressed economic conditions of certain sections of our industries. I feel that some small measure of relief can be found for these industries through the field of research, and I would suggest that in many of our industrial fields we could, through the medium of research, definitely establish a more pronounced Canadian trend in the field of textiles, for example, rather than bask in and profit by the ideas promoted, particularly by our neighbours to the south.

I find that in my own business as regards women's apparel, American fabrics are not selected particularly on account of their more reasonable price but rather because of their distinctive patterns and novelty materials. Some phases of our textile industry are recognizing that fact, and I would like to quote in this connection a news item which appeared in the March issue of a Canadian magazine called Canadian Business which carries a story entitled "Salesmanship plus New Products" with a subtitle "A formula for textiles?". That article carries the story of the Bruck brothers who are running one of the largest synthetic fibre mills in Canada. They heard of milium being developed in the United States and they went over to the United States and attempted to get the rights in order to sell that product in Canada. But the American firm which controlled it did not want to give the rights to the Canadian firm because they thought they could promote it in Canada. But the Bruck brothers came back to Canada and through the medium of research developed thermalon and went out and sold it. They made such a wonderful job of it that the people from the states were glad to give them milium.

However, every textile mill has not the capital which the Brucks had for carrying out this type of research activity and they should therefore be given encouragement by the government in that respect. As the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) intimated, it is not every organization or manufacturing firm that is large enough to have these facilities, but there are a tremendous number of small factories and firms in this country employing people which are a definite part of the economy of this country. Some phases of our textile industry are recognizing that fact.

In this connection I would like to quote from a news item which appeared in the March 3 edition of Style which is a women's wear newspaper issued to the trade. This article carries the heading "Nova Scotian Tartan Will Hit Market Soon" and the item states:

There is something new under the sun . . . it's Nova Scotia Tartan.

This should provide good news for manufacturers and retailers alike, especially those who keep an eye on the tourist trade.

I am not going to read the entire article but it goes on to conclude with this:

Already many inquiries have been received about the tartan . . . who will be manufacturing it and when it will be available in any marketable quantity. All these questions will be answered when the copyright and registration have gone through.

Tourists will soon, it is hoped, get their first introduction to the new tartan when they cross the Nova Scotian border and behold the Scottish piper blowing the bagpipes to the accompanying swirl of Nova Scotia tartan kilt.

From the same paper I have taken another small item entitled "Canadian Ideas". The article states:

Better still, who not try to create—and we mean create—some truly Canadian fashions, based on Canadian ideas, history and folklore?

The same thing might hold true on the question of housing about which we have heard so much, and to which I think one of the main objections was that even though down payments have been reduced the price of the houses available is still too high for the average wage earner. I feel that through the medium of research a house could be evolved that would make it possible for the ordinary man to have his own house.

In my own experience as chairman of our district high school board, I know that we were confronted with the problem of building a new high school. The provincial department of education set a maximum of $300,000 as the completed cost of our new school. When we first approached the subject we found that schools were costing approximately $14 a square foot. This would mean that the type of school we wanted completed would be around $385,000 which was out of our reach. However, we went into this matter seriously and found that a new school was being built in Mount Forest at a cost of a little over $9 a square foot. This firm of architects, through the medium of considerable prefabrication and other money saving devices, was able to prove to us that the school we required could be built for $300,000. That school is now in process of being completed and is already being used to a certain extent.

I therefore feel that through the medium of research we in Canada could do as they are doing in so many other countries of the world. In this connection I would like to quote from an article which appeared in the Journal of Thursday, February 20, under the heading of "Prefabricated Housing". The article states:

I. F. Fogh, logging development engineer of the Canadian International Paper Company, Montreal, gave a revealing picture of prefabricated housing in Sweden based on a visit to Sweden, Finland, Norway and Denmark last summer.

He then goes into considerable detail in describing the type of modern house being built over there and goes on:

The saving to the purchaser compared with a similar house built to the same standards by conventional methods was estimated by Mr. Fogh at about $3,000 plus about two months' time.

This development is the result of the efforts of one of Sweden's large combines of water power, iron ore and forest products which was faced with the problem of providing adequate yet economical housing facilities for its workers.

In this connection there is a suggestion I would like to make to the government even though my observation has been that the government apparently sees no good in suggestions coming from this side of the house. My suggestion is one which was urged upon me by the fact that we are paying a large sum of money to an architectural firm in New York for plans for the new national film board building in Montreal. I maintain that as this question has been under discussion for so long and the need for this new building has been realized for so many years, the Department of Public Works should have had the foresight to appoint a team made up of architects, technicians, engineers, draftsmen and so on to study this question. I realize that as this is a specialized type of building, it requires specialists in this field to create it, and I maintain that had this plan been followed we in Canada would have had the benefit of this advanced training for this and any other similar types of buildings that may have to be built in the future. I maintain that this suggestion could hold good for many other departments of the government which, through the medium of long-term planning and research, would have available the men to carry out major projects of this type as they arise.

But how are we going to keep pace, Mr. Speaker? How are we going to ensure the future of Canada in order that she may continue to take her place among the greatest nations of the world? I think it is through the immediate assistance and promotion of scientific and industrial research in Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, how are we going to ensure that this great realm of research will have available men with the brains, the courage and the fortitude to carry on the work of our great scientists of today? In this connection I should like to read from page 181 of the Massey report a paragraph which deals with this question:

79. The conclusion presented to us, then, is that the great need is for first-class men to give leadership and inspiration through their own brilliant, original discoveries. The future depends not only on the continued liberality of governmental agencies but on the number and quality of the men induced to work at research. The greatest need is to discover and train these men and then to make sure that they are provided with research facilities and opportunities to enable them to render the services of which they are capable.

I think a group of young people in my riding have come up with one of the answers. I should like to read a resolution that was passed by one of our high school student bodies. It was passed by the student council, Fergus district high school, at their regular meeting on Monday, February 8, 1954, and reads as follows:

That, as possible future recipients of the scholarships and rewards, this council, on behalf of all students in the Fergus district high school, urge the dominion government to organize a committee to bring about the immediate awarding of the scholarships recommended by the Massey report.

At this time I should like to pay a tribute to young high school students who will give serious consideration to a problem which is as old as the world, namely that of the child who through no fault of his own is unable to pursue learning to the extent for which he is fitted by natural abilities. No doubt many hon. members can recall friends of their youth who showed remarkable promise but who on account of their particular status in life were unable to continue at school. Thus Canada was the loser.

In that connection there appeared in the Globe and Mail of March 29 an article entitled "Extending Pure Research" and which speaks about research in the United States. It reads in part as follows:

President Eisenhower has directed the National Science Foundation, an official U.S. government body, to survey the government's research and development program. The stated purposes are to speed the attainment of federal research goals, to stimulate basic research, ascertain possible economies and to propose methods which would safeguard the strength and independence of educational institutions.

I have here some figures from the Massey report as compiled by a committee on education of the Canadian Manufacturers Association and published in February, 1950. This report emphasized the fact that out of 100 Canadian children attending school, only 22 finished high school, only 3 graduated from college and that 54 per cent of those who dropped out did so for economic reasons.

In 1946 the Ontario department of education discovered that only 7 per cent of the young people who had completed their primary and high school education had registered at a university. To us the disturbing thing is not the percentage but the fact that there is no assurance that this 7 per cent comprises the best qualified students. From page 362 of the Massey report on arts, letters and sciences I quote the proposals—as indicated by the resolution I have received—made by that very wide and comprehensive study:

16. We are proposing that the present scheme with which the federal and provincial governments are familiar, and which is operating satisfactorily, be enlarged. As for the number of undergraduates who should thus be aided, we do not think it appropriate to suggest a precise figure, although it is our view that as far as may be possible young persons who have the necessary ability and diligence should receive reasonable assistance to enable them to become more useful citizens.

Paragraph 17 lists the scholarships to be given to these undergraduates. Rather than take up the time of the house by reading it, I would ask the permission of the house that these be incorporated in Hansard of today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to have these paragraphs incorporated in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Paragraph 17 reads in part as follows:

17. The following plan has been proposed to us and is respectfully suggested for the guidance of the government and of the agencies which may be charged with the administration of these scholarships:

1. 100 annual scholarships of $1,000, tenable for four years, to be known as Canada scholarships. These scholarships are intended to confer not only a valuable award but considerable prestige upon students of outstanding ability and exceptional promise. These scholarships at least, in our judgment, should be granted only after personal interviews.

2. 250 national scholarships annually of $500, to be tenable for four years. These are intended for distinguished and promising students.

3. 2,000 bursaries of $500 a year tenable for four years, for able and diligent students on the basis of need.

4. A loan fund open to all students whose work is acceptable to the authorities of their universities.

It was interesting to note from the minister's speech how many scholarships are being given by the national research council and it was interesting to note that in the estimates of the national research council they have suggested an increase in the allowances from $448,500 last year to $563,000 this year. However, these scholarships are only for a few of those students who have completed their university training and are in the form of fellowships and doctors' degrees for advanced studies. I feel that this is a move in the right direction, but I think that the government of Canada, in co-operation with the provincial governments, should go further and should put into force the recommendations that I have mentioned in order that we may be assured that our own Canadian research will have the benefit of all the brains and ingenuity to be found among the youth of our country. The Canadians who will inherit this country, the ones who will have the responsibility of guiding this young giant which is now awakening from its slumbers, are sitting in the classrooms of the schools today. It is our duty and responsibility to help them contribute to the Canada of tomorrow.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a contribution to the discussion of this extremely important matter that is before the house at the present time. I say it is important because it is recognized today by everyone in responsible positions that research is absolutely necessary if modern nations are going to maintain their position among the nations of the world. Ever since the western world applied the scientific method in the solution of its problems it has been possible for the researchers of the western world to carry on almost indefinitely, in terms of physical progress, by means of the art of invention.

Actually with the advent of the scientific method man invented the art of invention. In the physical sciences we of course have some outstanding examples of what this has meant in terms of development in the field of materialistic progress. For instance, the most recent and perhaps the most outstanding example of what can be accomplished as a result of the discovery of the art of invention is the successful completion of what has become known as the Manhattan project. A group of scientists banded together in order to meet the challenges arising from world war II, and by pooling their own knowledge in the field of physics and bringing together the vast amount of knowledge that had been accumulating from the nineteenth century onwards they were able to complete successfully the construction of the atomic bomb. That, I think, demonstrates very dramatically the potentialities, particularly in the physical sciences, that are inherent in the field of organized and co-ordinated research.

It seems that in Canada, as in the other western nations, the emphasis in research has been placed upon the development of the arts of war. In looking at the record of our own national research council we find that it came into existence in the year 1917 largely as the result of the pressing demands that had arisen from Canada's participation in world war I. Since that time the national research council has made definite strides in Canada, and in my opinion its greatest work, as I read the record, has been as a co-ordinating body bringing together various research projects under way in Canada.

These projects largely fall within four fields. First of all there are the projects undertaken by the federal government. Second, there are the projects undertaken by provincial governments. Closely connected with the activities of provincial governments in the field of research are the provincial universities and private provincial educational institutions. Finally we have the very excellent work that is being undertaken by private industry. Today private industry spends a good deal of its time and resources in seeking new areas of activity and new methods of production, endeavouring to increase its efficiency by applying scientific ideas to the field of research.

I should like to support the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) in his submission that there is room for the expansion of research activities in Canada, particularly in areas other than those concerned with the development of the arts of war. Canada is engaged in tremendous activities so far as the arts of war are concerned. The atomic energy project at Chalk River is commanding a good deal of our attention. The new demands of warfare in the Arctic climate are also receiving considerable attention from Canadian researchers. These activities are very necessary and essential to our national defence.

However, I think that we might well give consideration to greater promotion of the arts of peace and the field of domestic research. In this connection I should like to refer to the activities of our provincial governments. Through the provincial agricultural colleges they are largely responsible for agricultural research. In my own province of Manitoba there has been much discussion in recent years about the fact that the faculty of agriculture of the University of Manitoba has not devoted too much attention to fundamental research. Actually the only original research being carried out in the field of agriculture in that province, and also in the other prairie provinces, is being done through our experimental farm services. It seems to me that the faculties of agriculture of the respective universities are in an ideal position to tackle the agricultural problems peculiar to their own provinces. I believe some attention should be given by the federal government to encouraging in every way possible the promotion of essential research, particularly in the prairie provinces which are so dependent upon the well-being of the agricultural industry.

While governments, both provincial and federal, are making their contribution together with industry to the field of original research, I believe fundamental research is essentially a function of the universities. From time immemorial, even before the advent of the application of the scientific method to the field of creative thought, our universities have been the custodians of new ideas and creative thought and activity. Our universities, along with the other agencies responsible for carrying on research, have devoted much of their attention to physical research. Indeed, there is an excellent plan of research assistance under federal government sponsorship by means of which the various university faculties are tied into research projects. That applies particularly in the fields of physics, chemistry, electronics and so on, areas which again are essential to the defence of Canada.

I do not have the details on the matter, but I wonder whether the same amount of assistance is being given to university faculties, which are so well equipped to carry on research, as is being given to research projects operating directly under government sponsorship. For example, how would the grant per researcher to one of our Canadian universities compare with the grant per researcher to some scientist directly engaged in the atomic energy project at Chalk River? I would venture to say that the grant to a university scientist would be somewhat smaller than that to the scientist operating at the Chalk River project. I wonder also just how the grant per university for research work compares on a proportionate basis to the funds that are being supplied to carry on the project at Chalk River?

The universities with their highly qualified staff, most of whom have become experts in their respective fields as a result of long years of study in Canada and abroad, are merely waiting for the opportunity to expand their activities in the field of creative research. Not only are there members of the faculty who are qualified, but also the universities are responsible for the experts who, in turn, will carry on creative research activity of the future in the research projects that are being undertaken under government sponsorship. We find that the faculty members depend substantially for assistance on their graduate students, particularly those proceeding to the Ph.D. level. Because of the fact they have these graduate students available to participate in research projects, these projects can be carried on with a minimum of expense. The greater the support, the better prepared these graduate students are to carry on further work when they pass beyond the confines of the university and go out to carve out their own careers in their chosen field of activity.

This, of course, applies to the realm of the physical sciences especially in Canada. Perhaps even more so than in countries such as the United Kingdom and the United States, we have restricted our research activities largely to the realm of the physical sciences. There is, for example, no body operating in the social science field that compares to the national research council of Canada. There is a voluntary organization that calls itself the social science research council, but it is not incorporated directly into the activities of the national research council.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if there is room for further development in the physical sciences to deal with the urgent problems that face us, there is definitely a more challenging area of activity open to study and investigation in the field of the social sciences. It is true that the social sciences are comparatively new. Various social sciences, so far as universities are concerned, are relatively new scientific disciplines. Some of them, such as sociology, have not as yet established themselves as a scientific discipline. Even economics, which is often referred to as the dismal science, has its severe critics when it is viewed from the standpoint of a scientific discipline. Notwithstanding all this, Mr. Speaker, I feel that this government, as well as the other agencies who have the necessary skills and resources to promote research activity, would be well advised to give closer attention to the necessity of carrying on their research in the social science field.

Actually the political scientist comes under the classification of a social scientist. We who participate in the activities of the house are well aware that there is a wide area of investigation that we have not even touched so far as endeavouring to rationalize what takes place here, and in the whole democratic processes for that matter. Certainly if we cannot meet the challenge in the field of human relationships, which is the area of interest that the social science concerns itself with, there is not much hope that all the research we are doing in the physical sciences, particularly in the arts of war, will be of any value to Canada or to any other nation.

In speaking to this very important topic, Mr. Speaker, I would definitely support the hon. member for Lambton West who has made such a comprehensive statement on the board aspects of the subject, particularly in reference to the need for further development in the physical sciences. At the same time, I should like also to suggest in the strongest terms possible that the time has come when this government, through its various departments and agencies, might consider the possibility of giving closer support to the various social science faculties operating in our universities in Canada. This would enable them to pursue with greater enthusiasm the work to be undertaken in this field, and also be in a position to expand. As we view the situation, I believe we are forced to the conclusion that Canadian universities are merely on the fringe of the research that is necessary if we are going to solve the very pressing human problems that confront us in this twentieth century.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to call it ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Dinsdale: I understand we are sitting until eleven o'clock this evening. I did not know of the arrangement because I was in the committee on veterans affairs. I think I have covered the field I had intended to emphasize in my remarks, other than to give one or two details concerning the problem I have stressed, namely the lack of social science research.

There are two outstanding universities in Canada that have made remarkable contributions to this field. The University of Toronto has moved forward very rapidly in the field of social science research. Its efforts are largely sponsored and supported by a voluntary organization known as the social science research council.

The University of Laval, too, in the province of Quebec, has an excellent reputation in this regard. I know from my contact with the University of Toronto that their work is inhibited because of a lack of funds; and it is only because of the persistence of such outstanding men in the field of social science as the late Professor Harold Innis that they have accomplished as much as they actually have accomplished.

The University of Laval, too, has its great names associated with outstanding work being conducted there. Then, out in the west, our social science faculties are just in the early stages of development. The work that has been most outstanding in our western universities has been that in the field of history. Historic research is only now getting under way in Canada. There is a rich field of history that has not yet been touched, and still remains to be explored. In the University of Manitoba, under Professor Morton, several excellent studies have been completed. But, there again, it is merely touching the fringe of the need. If this government could see its way clear to establish research scholarships in the field of historic research, research in economics, in sociology, in political science and in the other related social scientific fields I am sure such expenditures would more than be repaid in terms of betterment of conditions in Canada, through a knowledge of the past and a deeper understanding and realization of the human problems of the future.

With these remarks I would conclude by re-emphasizing that we take into consideration not only the necessity for research in the physical sciences, but also that we cast our sights on the much more important field, the very urgent necessity for giving consideration to problems of human relations, a field which is essentially one of investigation in the social sciences.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Green: Next sitting.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we will take third readings; then the second reading of the Public Service Superannuation Act, which will then go to the committee on banking and commerce. We will then take the committee stage of the act respecting banks and banking; the Bank of Canada Act, and the act respecting savings banks in the province of Quebec; and the second reading of the bill to amend certain acts respecting the superannuation of government employees transferred to crown corporations.

Mr. Fulton: When will you take the mounted police act?

Mr. Harris: If that is reached before six o'clock we will take budget resolutions.

Mr. Knowles: What about going into supply?

It being seven minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS—TEMISCOUATA COUNTY

Mr. Pouliot:

Will the historic sites and monuments board, this year, place commemorative plaques at the Ecole Supérieure Mgr-Taché, Rivière-du-Loup; at the birthplace of the late the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, former minister of justice, at St. Eloi, county of Temiscouata; at the summer residence that was occupied for fifty years, at Pointe de la Rivière-du-Loup, by the late the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, who was premier of the province of Quebec for fifteen years?

Mr. Lesage:

A tablet commemorating Monseigneur Tache has already been erected at Riviere-du-Loup. The question of placing a second tablet to Monseigneur Tache at Riviere-du-Loup, at the Ecole Superieure Mgr. Tache is being referred to the historic sites and monuments board of Canada for recommendation, at its meeting in Ottawa next month.

No representations have been received respecting either the birthplace of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, at St. Eloi, county of Temiscouata, or the summer residence of the late Hon. L. A. Taschereau at Pointe de la Riviere-du-Loup. As the matter has now been raised by the present question, the desirability of erecting tablets at these places will also be referred to the board for recommendation at its next meeting.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TELEVISION APPLICATION, HULL, QUE.

Mr. Gagnon:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Transport or any agency under that department and the CKCH Hull Broadcasting Company Limited and the Canadian Marconi Corporation, in connection with a project for the installation of a television station for the Hull-Ottawa district.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, owing to the absence of the minister on official business, I would ask the hon. member to agree to allow this motion to stand.

Mr. Gagnon: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN PROJECT

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and telegrams that have passed between the government of Saskatchewan and the federal government, since the 1st day of March, 1954, regarding the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, there will not be any objection to any letters that have passed in the period between the 1st of March and a time not very far distant being brought down in the house. There is only one letter, and there are two very short telegrams. The position at the moment is that I am in the midst of discussing with the premier the facts contained in the letter itself.

[Mr. Lesage.]

We have no objection to bringing it down but we must discuss it further with the Saskatchewan government before doing so. Then we will be able to bring it down in due course.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is carried subject to the remarks made by the minister.

KOREAN RELIEF

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all communications received by the government, or by any minister or department thereof, from or on behalf of groups or organizations, dated since January 1, 1952, urging that Canada make gifts of wheat or of other Canadian products to help meet relief needs in Korea, or seeking information as to the possibility of such gifts being made or their scope being extended, together with a copy of the replies to all such communications.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether my hon. friend would be satisfied to have samples. I am informed that several departments have received great masses of communications in identical terms. The copying of them would probably take a great deal longer than we hope this session will last, and I do not think it would be very profitable to anyone.

Mr. Knowles: I will accept samples if they are well chosen.

Mr. Pickersgill: They will be.

Mr. Knowles: I mean that from my point of view and not from the point of view of the government. I would hope they would include letters written in reply by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: Before we leave this order I wonder whether I might ask the Secretary of State if the return just passed might indicate the number of such letters received?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be glad to see that it does.

ANTLER, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged between any person or persons and the Post Office Department, since August 10, 1953, concerning the post office at Antler, Saskatchewan.

TRADE

SPAIN—STATEMENT ON AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs the following question:

What progress has been made in the recent negotiations for the sale of salt codfish to Spain and Portugal?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. gentleman was kind enough to give notice of this question yesterday. I am now in a position to give a fuller reply than I would have been at that time. A Canadian delegation headed by the deputy minister of trade and commerce has been in Spain for some time carrying on trade negotiations with Spanish officials. My colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) recently went to Spain to conclude the final phases of these negotiations with the Spanish government, and to sign the resulting agreement on behalf of the Canadian government.

I am pleased to inform the house, Mr. Speaker, that an agreement has now been reached with the Spanish government. This agreement is the first direct trade agreement between Canada and Spain. It will be signed today in Madrid by my colleague, Mr. Winters, and His Excellency Martin Artajo, Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs, and will come into force provisionally on July 1 of this year.

The new agreement provides for the exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment with respect to customs duties and related matters. Both countries undertake not to impose discriminatory import or exchange restrictions, except for balance of payments reasons. Such restrictions must not discriminate between dollar countries. As part of the agreement, the Spanish government has undertaken to make available import licences and dollar exchange for minimum annual imports from dollar countries of 2,000 metric tons of dry salted codfish. This arrangement will improve and stabilize sales of Canadian salted cod in our traditional Spanish market.

Canada has accorded the following tariff concessions to Spain: the binding of free entry on olives from Spain as from July 1. Formerly, olives were subject to a duty of 17·5 per cent ad valorem. We have agreed to reduce the duty on edible olive oil from 7·5 per cent to 5 per cent and to eliminate the one cent per pound duty on almonds. We are also making a small reduction in the duty on paprika. As mentioned earlier, these tariff concessions become effective July 1, 1954.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the minister if he is in a position to make the text of this agreement available for distribution amongst members?

Mr. Pearson: I would have been glad to table this text. However, I have only one copy and it has to be translated, so it could be tabled tomorrow. I could table the one copy now, in English, with the permission of the house.

Mr. Fleming: May I suggest that the same practice be followed in this case as was followed with the Japanese trade treaty, namely that it might be printed as an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings for the use of members. May I also ask the minister if the treaty makes any provision for the purchase by Spain of Canadian wheat?

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to have the agreement appear, as suggested by my hon. friend, in Votes and Proceedings. The details will then be available to the house. There is no specific provision in the agreement covering wheat.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I noticed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs sent a copy of the trade treaty with Spain to the table. I did not ask the house if it agreed to revert to motions at this time so that this treaty could be tabled. I should like to point out that perhaps we might consider this problem. This copy of the trade agreement that has been tabled will have to be translated by our own personnel. When the minister tables the copy in French, translated by his officials, there might be some discrepancies. Perhaps we might wait until tomorrow when the copies in English and in French, issued by the minister's department, are ready, and they could be tabled at the same time, as has been the practice in the past. In this way, we would be sure that the copies in English and in French were issued from the one source and were official translations, the one of the other. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore I take it the minister will table both documents tomorrow.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PETER BALCOMBE—DISTURBANCE OUTSIDE UNITED COUNTIES JAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the report in yesterday's Ottawa Journal to the effect that a crowd of citizens, estimated to have exceeded 500 in number, gathered within the sight of, and less than 100 feet away from, the gallows in the United Counties jail where Peter Balcombe was hanged, and conducted themselves in a semi-riotous and hoodlum-like manner?

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Winch: Will the minister inform the house as to whether, in view of this unfortunate incident, he has in mind any changes in regulations that will prevent a recurrence of such an incident?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we ought to at least know what the question is. The preamble was much too long. Would the hon. member be kind enough to repeat the question the minister is supposed to answer?

Mr. Winch: Just the last part, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: That is the only part the hon. member should have given in the first place.

Mr. Winch: Will the minister inform the house as to whether, in view of this unfortunate incident, he has in mind any changes in regulations that will prevent a recurrence of such an incident?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of these questions. The answer to the first question is yes. With regard to the second question, the answer is that arrangements for the execution of the sentence of death are made by provincial authorities, to whose attention I shall draw the question my hon. friend has just asked.

BUTTER

EXPORT OF SURPLUS AT LESS THAN MARKET PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): In view of the enormous surplus of butter that is being offered to the trade at 2·5 cents less than the going market price, will the Minister of Agriculture state whether or not it is the intention of the government to export surplus butter at less than the market price or at the same price as it is put into the Canadian trade?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I would not agree with the preamble to the question, that there is an enormous surplus of butter.

Mr. Rowe: Thirty-three million pounds.

Mr. Gardiner: Even that is not enormous. There are not 33 million pounds of that butter now.

Mr. Rowe: There were yesterday.

Mr. Gardiner: No, there were not yesterday. It is down by about 4 million from that point.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Rowe: It is still 20 million up, though.

Mr. Gardiner: It is in the 20's, somewhere, but even that is not what I would term an enormous amount, so I do not accept that statement as being correct. There has never been any announcement made here by me or by any member of the government that all that butter is going to be offered at any particular price. We have offered some of it for sale day by day at 55·5 cents to the trade within Canada, but there has been no arrangement made to sell any of it outside of Canada up to now. If an offer from outside is made for the butter, that will be considered on its merits.

Mr. Rowe: May I ask a supplementary question? Is 55·5 cents per pound not 2·5 cents less than the government paid for it?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, in some cases that might not be a correct statement. We started buying butter at 58 cents last spring, and the costs of carrying it through until this spring are added on to the cost to the government. The two and a half cents is approximately the cost of taking the butter out of the boxes, and putting it into prints and in a position to put it back on the market. I do not know what the difference between the two prices is. I would not like to say it is two and a half cents.

Mr. Rowe: It is more like five, then.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to ask the minister a question. Will that butter deteriorate to the extent that it is not fit for use after it is kept a certain period of time in storage?

Mr. Gardiner: I am told the experience is that it will remain practically the same as fresh butter for eighteen months.

Mr. Ferguson: A supplementary question; has any of this butter been kept more than eighteen months?

Mr. Gardiner: There has been butter—not this particular butter—but there has been butter kept that long.

Mr. Ferguson: Then, may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a question. Could not this butter that might be kept for a period of eighteen months be shipped, without charge, to the starving people in one particular part of the world, namely South Korea, as a gift from the taxpayers and the people of Canada who are enjoying prosperity in this country? Rather than have it destroyed, could we not ship it as a gift.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

[Later:]

Mr. Ferguson: May I have a reply from the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked what the government will do if a certain condition prevails in a certain number of months. Why not wait until several months have elapsed, and then ask the government what will be done with the butter in question?

Mr. Ferguson: We already have waited, and it is being thrown away.

Mr. Speaker: Let us not debate the matter at this time. Orders of the day.

POLIOMYELITIS

DISTRIBUTION OF VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the report that 10,000 units of polio vaccine will be made available in Alberta this summer, will arrangements be made for a similar quantity of this vaccine to be made available in other areas where there were epidemics last year, notably in Manitoba and Saskatchewan?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): I shall call the hon. member's question to the attention of the minister.

LIVESTOCK

REPORTED UNSATISFACTORY CONDITION OF HORSES IN LUMBER CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources arising out of a recent press release which stated that many horses in lumber camps are in poor condition. The report goes on to state that out of 77 horses examined—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member be kind enough to put his question.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): I should like to ask what is being done to prevent a recurrence of the practice of abusing horses in lumber camps.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I do not know of any lumber camps which come under the jurisdiction of my department, but I shall look into the matter. I do not know what the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Knowles: Ask the Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Canadian National Railways

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. FELICIEN AND HILLSPORT LINES—PROVISION FOR FINANCING

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (for the Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 442, respecting the construction of lines of railway by Canadian National Railway Company from St. Felicien to Chibougamau and from Chibougamau to Beattyville, all in the province of Quebec, and from Hillsport on the main line of the Canadian National Railways to Manitouwadge lake, both in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Girard):

That Bill No. 442 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house, for the purpose of reconsidering clause 1, dealing with the construction and completion of the proposed lines of railway.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Gagnon) which was negatived on the following division:

RESEARCH COUNCIL ACT

AMENDMENTS TO ENABLE COUNCIL TO ACQUIRE FUNDS, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 375, to amend the Research Council Act.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion agreed to?

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take up about five minutes and no more of the time of the house on this bill. I believe that only by a vastly expanded program of industrial research can we hope to retain those domestic and export markets which are slipping through our fingers every day.

The fact that unemployment today is nearly double what it was a year ago is no mere chance. It is due to the fact that Canadian products are being steadily undersold by products being produced in other countries and which are being generally accepted by the Canadian buying public.

The astonishing part of all this is that what we have experienced so far is as nothing compared with what we will experience when Japan and Germany really get into their stride.

Now, what are we going to do about this? We have got to get costs down so that our products can be competitive with those they are competing with from other countries. How are we going to do it? There is one way, and this is by a greatly expanded research program aimed at two things. One is to develop new and better products with which to compete with these other countries and, secondly, to develop new, better and more efficient methods of producing the products we already produce.

The way to get a program like this started is to set up a committee of parliament on which would be included representatives of labour, management and educational institutions. Such a committee could study and discuss the best means of getting a program such as this under way, and obtaining the best results from it.

Such committees are not new. They have been proved to be a tremendous success in Great Britain and the United States, and there is no reason at all why such a committee would not be just as successful here in Canada. I am sorry, as I am sure most Canadians are, to see that the government has not already set up such a committee following the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) last fall. Much valuable time has already been lost.

One of the reasons Canadian products are being steadily undersold by products from Great Britain and the United States is simply the fact that tremendous and continuous programs of industrial research are carried on in those countries. I believe that industry in this country has been unnecessarily handicapped by the unwillingness of the government to take any action so far in this regard.

Because the government has refused to take action and take this first step toward helping industry to get its costs down, this government must take the responsibility for the fact that Canadian products are continuing to be undersold; that we are losing markets day by day; and that unemployment, compared with a year ago, is steadily increasing in this country.

A glint of hope was given last night by the parliamentary assistant when he intimated that the government might be willing to accept the idea of setting up a committee of this kind. I hope that that is the view of the government, that the government has changed its mind, and that the government has at long last decided to accept the excellent suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Lambton West last fall, and that by the beginning of next session we will see a committee on research set up and under way.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Now that the hon. member for Oxford is following the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), I might point out that when I put the motion for third reading and the hon. member for Broadview rose and said he would speak for only about five minutes I thought I would be lenient and allow him to make remarks of a general nature and even go into the question of a committee which had already been dealt with. Now I am very sorry for the leniency I have accorded the hon. member for Broadview. I see the hon. member for Oxford rise in his place and I want to tell hon. members now that I am in full agreement with the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) when he said yesterday that this was merely a formal amending bill. If by virtue of the wide statement made by the minister who sponsored this bill on second reading we had a rather wide debate I do not propose to allow the same latitude on the third reading. Discussion on the third reading will have to confine itself to the bill which, as I have said, is merely a formal amending bill, and if hon. members intend to repeat the debate which we had and which was wide in scope on second reading I must inform them now that I am not prepared to give the same latitude on third reading.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, in view of your remarks I think possibly I may forgo the remarks I proposed to make which were of a somewhat general nature and purported to demonstrate the value which agriculture could derive from the institution of a research program. However, in view of Your Honour's ruling I think it would be wise to forgo the remarks I had intended making.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE PAYMENT OF DEATH BENEFITS UP TO MAXIMUM OF $5,000

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 463, an act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to supplement or round out the pension benefits provided under the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Defence Services Pension Act by adding to them a scheme of contributory death benefits.

It covers all public service employees who are contributing or who have completed their contributions under the superannuation act and all members of the regular armed forces.

The amount of the death benefit, in the case of public service employees, will be the employee's annual salary adjusted upward where necessary to make it an even multiple of $250, but with a top limit of $5,000. In the case of the armed forces the amounts will be an even $3,000 for persons below the rank of chief petty officer in the navy and equivalent ranks in the army and air force, and $5,000 for all others.

The rate of contribution by all those covered will be 10 cents a month for each $250 of benefit, that is, the rate will be 40 cents per $1,000 per month.

The government, of course, takes full responsibility for this measure, but I should like to say that the general outlines of these proposals were referred confidentially to the national joint council of the public service of Canada. The national joint council made a number of suggestions, most of which have been incorporated in the bill. I would not wish to imply that every member of the national joint council agrees with every detail of the bill, but I can inform the house that the national joint council has endorsed the broad outlines of the plan as a whole. I should also like to record my appreciation of the constructive assistance given by the national joint council in formulating this plan.

Yesterday on the resolution stage the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) asked whether the armed forces had been consulted in connection with this plan. The plan was formulated for the public service in the first instance and representatives of the armed forces then asked to be given a chance to participate in the plan. Thereafter all the commands in Canada and abroad were asked for an expression of opinion of a good cross-section of all units under each command as to whether members of the armed forces should participate in a compulsory plan of this nature. Most were in favour of so doing. As regards the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to which the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich also directed his attention, I might say that they are not covered because they already have a group insurance plan of their own in force.

Participation in this added benefit will be obligatory upon all those covered by the superannuation act and upon all members of the regular armed forces. This compulsory feature of the plan is one which is bound to give rise to some individual objections. It has been included by the government only after very careful consideration and with the benefit of the advice of the national joint council.

The plan itself arose in part out of the review which was being conducted as to possible amendments to the Civil Service Insurance Act and in part out of the request of the national joint council and other bodies, for a group plan to provide benefits such as the one being introduced. The remarkably low rate of contribution is made possible only by the fact that this is a compulsory scheme and that those in good health as well as those in poor health are included. In addition to substantially higher rates of contribution, a voluntary scheme would have involved much greater administrative costs. As time went on, larger numbers of those who had not wanted to be under the plan in the first place would wish to participate as their family responsibilities increased or health deteriorated. If these persons were to be included there would have had to be the complicated addition of varying rates of contribution and medical examinations in all fairness to regular participants.

This plan is primarily designed to provide funds which will be readily available to pay the inevitable expenses arising out of or consequential upon the last illness and death of a contributor. The contributions are designed to cover the benefits under the plan on a month-to-month basis. I would not expect any large surpluses to be built up, and there is provision for an actuarial review within five years at which time, if the results warrant it, the rates would be adjusted upward or downward to keep the scheme in financial balance.

While to the younger civil servant or member of the forces who has no dependents now, and who has no present intention of remaining permanently in the public service, the compulsory feature may seem to be unattractive, it will be possible to remain a participant under the plan by electing to do so upon retirement or withdrawal from the public service provided he has had a minimum of five years of service substantially without interruption immediately prior to that time. In that event, of course, it will be necessary for the individual to keep up the regular payment of contributions which will be higher than those paid while in the service because no government contribution will be payable in respect of those who have retired before they were eligible to receive an immediate annuity under the Public Service Superannuation Act or the Defence Services Pension Act.

The government contribution will take the form of the payment of one-sixth of the benefits of those who die while in the service or who had qualified for an immediate annuity upon retirement. This will replace the present gratuity of two months' salary on death which the government has been paying under section 56 of the Civil Service Act. In the case of those civil servants who are not covered by this scheme, the two months' gratuity on death will still be available under the same conditions as before. A similar basis of contribution will apply in the case of the armed forces, replacing the present interim allowance payable for two months following death of a married member of the forces. Interest will be payable on any balance to the credit of the accounts which are to be set up for those in the public service and those in the armed forces. Assuming normal mortality experience, there should be no net increase in government expenditures as a result of the introduction of this scheme.

One further general point: It will be clear from a reading of this bill that it is not intended to provide for the normal life insurance requirements of individuals. It provides only a reasonable and moderate death benefit of a kind commonly made available to employees by a growing number of large private employers. Public servants, like all other citizens, will continue to make their own provision for their own individual life insurance requirements in accordance with their individual needs and circumstances.

Turning now to some of the details of the plan, I might mention that the amount of the benefit will be subject to reduction of one-tenth of the nominal maximum for that participant for each year that the participant's age exceeds 60. This is subject, however, to an over-all minimum of one-sixth of the salary while the person is still employed. A person who elects to contribute after retirement will be subject to the same reduction so that there will be no benefit available once that person is 70. In the case of members of the armed forces their earlier retirement age will mean that no reduction would normally apply until after retirement.

In conclusion, I should recall the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made in the House of Commons on April 30, when he announced that this legislation was to be introduced. He indicated that the government proposed to discontinue the issuance of new individual contracts under the Civil Service Insurance Act. Later that day I issued a statement to the effect that no new contracts of insurance under the Civil Service Insurance Act would be issued unless the medical examination was begun prior to May 1, 1954. This bill contains a section to implement this policy. This step has been taken on the grounds that it is not usual for an employer to provide individual policies for his employees and that the introduction of this new plan of supplementary death benefits provides the best means of meeting the minimum financial needs on the death of an employee over and above the indirect protection given by other legislation. All policies issued under the Civil Service Insurance Act will, of course, remain in full force and effect.

As my parliamentary assistant indicated at the resolution stage, since this bill has a number of technical aspects I believe it can best be considered in detail in the banking and commerce committee; and unless there is serious objections to such procedure I would move that it be referred to that committee at the conclusion of the debate on second reading. Officers of my department and, no doubt, officers of the civil service associations will be available to discuss the bill there.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this bill has come before us in such a manner as to suggest that it is really almost a routine matter which can go through without anyone bothering much about it, but it seems to me that there is much more to it than that. It was only on Monday that the Governor General's assent was indicated. Yesterday we had the resolution stage and it was originally proposed that we should have second reading yesterday, but that suggestion was not pressed when we asked for further time for consideration. Actually hon. members received this bill only this morning. As I say, it is a measure of some length and of some considerable importance.

The first thing that strikes one about it is the title, namely "An act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act". Actually it has nothing to do with superannuation or pension. Indeed it seems to me that it could much more properly have been called an act to amend or indeed to replace the Civil Service Insurance Act of 1893, which was subsequently amended in 1914 and in 1920. I do not wish to make a great point about the title except to say I feel that there is something not quite natural about bringing in these measures and just tacking them on as a schedule to the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Actually it is not clear what the principle of this bill is. Is it the principle to force civil servants to come in and insure themselves? I understand that under the provisions of the present Civil Service Insurance Act only some 13,000 are insured. If you consider that figure and consider the situation if this bill becomes law—it will automatically affect, I suppose, some hundreds of thousands of people —the question of compulsion looms rather large.

The other question that arises is one that has already been raised: Is this really a step forward into the insurance business by the government of Canada? As I said a moment ago, it seems to me that what this bill really does is to replace the Civil Service Insurance Act and that it has nothing to do with superannuation. The Civil Service Insurance Act was a voluntary measure. As I said, some 13,000 people were insured under it. While I have noted what the minister said about consultations had with representatives of the service, both military and civil, nevertheless there are those who have been looking after their own insurance, who have been ordering their own affairs and who do not welcome this interference in their lives.

These and other questions, it seems to me, might well be gone into by the banking and commerce committee; and I welcome the fact that the bill is to be referred to that committee. Nevertheless, for the reasons I have given, until we have a good deal more information as to some of the details and really until we have a chance of finding out what the principle of this bill really is, it seems to me that we should not be asked now to approve second reading. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe):

That this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to say a few words with respect to the motion for second reading. Perhaps I can combine what I intended to say on the main motion with a few words I should like to say concerning the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell).

Obviously the purpose of the amendment, to put it at its minimum terms, is to avoid a vote on the principle of the bill at this stage. I imagine that really the hon. member for Greenwood is against the principle of the bill but maybe he would say I was pressing his amendment too far if I interpreted it in that way. Perhaps the best way to find out where he and his party stand on the principle of the bill would be to have a vote on the main motion as well.

In any case, in view of the support for this measure which I indicated when it was at the resolution stage yesterday I may say that we support the bill now that we have it, and therefore we are opposed to the amendment which would have the effect of negating the principle of the bill. An amendment of this type is a well known device which we often employ ourselves when there is a measure before the house to which we are opposed, but since we are in favour of this measure we shall vote against the amendment that the bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to a committee.

As I indicated yesterday, Mr. Speaker, we welcome the measure. I realize that the minister must know that he has very effectively proven the point which we have tried to make for a long time, namely, that life insurance can be provided at a much lower cost than is the case in this country at the present time.

Mr. Ferguson: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Where do you get your figures for such an assertion? Produce them.

Mr. Knowles: I would be very glad—

Mr. Ferguson: Give us the answer to that.

Mr. Knowles:—if the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) would give the name of any company in Canada that will sell term insurance of this kind at $5 or $6 a year per thousand, which is what is being offered to federal civil servants under this measure.

Mr. Ferguson: He is asking me a question, Mr. Speaker. I would say that almost any company would if you would exempt them from taxation and give them the financial aid that the government obtains from so many sources. They would make a lot of money.

Mr. Knowles: They could also sell it a lot cheaper if they were not out to make a profit.

Mr. Ferguson: Why don't you give up your indemnity?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: The plain fact is that things you can obtain at cost are a lot cheaper than when the profit element has to be included. I am not surprised that my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party are annoyed and offended at this intrusion into—

Mr. Ferguson: Private enterprise.

Mr. Knowles: Into private enterprise—that is right.

Mr. Ferguson: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Into a very profitable portion of private enterprise, namely, the life insurance business.

Mr. Ferguson: We do not want to kill the goose that lays the golden egg for your people.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: As I indicated yesterday, the effect of this measure is to make it possible for federal civil servants and members of the armed forces, all those who are contributors to or participants in any public service superannuation plan, to purchase for themselves term insurance in the amount of their annual salary with a ceiling of $5,000. The rate to be paid by the participant or insured civil servant is to be 40 cents per thousand per month or $4.80 per thousand per year. We recognize that $4.80 per thousand per year does not pay the whole cost of this insurance because about one-sixth of the amount will be paid by the government at the death of a member of this plan.

The minister has made it very clear that the measure does not involve any additional expense to the government at this time. It does not involve any increase in cost to the taxpayer because the one-sixth takes the place of the two months' salary gratuity now being paid when civil servants die while in the employ of the government. Therefore there is no increase in the cost to the taxpayer so far as this plan is concerned. I mention that because I recognize the fact that the total cost of providing this protection, including the amount paid by the civil servant and the amount paid by the government in carrying forward the two months principle, is a little more than $4.80. To be on the safe side, I will say that it may go as high as $6 per thousand.

That, anyone will have to admit, is very cheap term insurance and it is being made available without any loss for about $6 per thousand. It is mighty good to know now that it can be done. When we have said that it could be done there were those who argued that we were indulging in theory. I give the hon. member for Simcoe North, the hon. member for Greenwood and others of their party credit for telling us what is really in their minds today. What they do not like about this measure is that it interferes with a very profitable sector of private enterprise.

Mr. Ferguson: That is not so. That remark is far away from the truth, and you know it is.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ferguson: That is not so. That is not our motive at all, and you know it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member for Simcoe North not to interrupt the member who has the floor.

Mr. Knowles: I am quite prepared to let the motive of the hon. member for Simcoe North in opposing this measure rest on what he himself said a few moments ago when I first started to speak. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) wants it to be understood that this measure is not to take the place of the normal life insurance requirements of civil servants. The inference is that the average civil servant might like to have additional protection, and I am sure we all agree with and understand that position, although the amount provided under this bill is more than many Canadians are able to purchase. But I think the point is surely quite clear that if it is possible to provide this much insurance by way of protection at a cost of approximately $6 per thousand, an even higher amount of protection could be afforded at that same cost.

Similarly, if it is now established that when you put it on an over-all compulsory universal basis you can provide protection like this without regard to health, age and so on, surely that proves our point that this principle could be established for our whole population as well as for civil servants. We are glad that the bill is being brought in. It is a good idea that it should go to the banking and commerce committee so that it can be examined carefully, so that some of the ridiculous objections that are being made to it can be answered by the officials of the government, and so that we can have on the record more excellent statements about the value of the insurance principle such as those that were made yesterday by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance and this afternoon by the Minister of Finance himself. We welcome the bill. We would like to see it go further with respect to civil servants. We would like to see the principle extended to cover all the people of Canada. Because that is our attitude towards this measure we shall vote against the amendment, the purpose of which is to negate the principle of the bill at the second reading stage, and we shall vote for second reading of the bill.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, the insinuation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will only take a moment so that the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) may have a chance to reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) if he so desires. I should like to say at this time that I listened carefully yesterday to the discussion that took place on the resolution preceding the introduction of the bill. I listened carefully to what the minister has had to say today, and I cannot escape the feeling that this is a good bill. I would not like to support the amendment, because if I did then I would not have a chance to find out what I want to find out about the bill in committee. I am glad to see that the bill is going to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Macdonnell: We want it to go to the committee, you know.

Mr. Knowles: Just the subject matter; not the bill.

Mr. Low: I believe I understand the purpose of the hon. member's amendment. So far as I am concerned, I should like to have the bill as it is presented to the committee for a complete investigation. I am quite certain that when it does go to the banking and commerce committee it will receive a full investigation.

There are a number of things that I am not satisfied with in my own mind, but I shall wait until the matter is before the committee, and I shall ask questions to assure myself on these points.

Mr. Macdonnell: But your hands will be tied.

Mr. Low: I do not think they will be tied. I believe the committee chairman will see to it that we have ample opportunity to examine into every phase of the bill, and to ask questions. Furthermore, I am quite sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will allow any officials it may be necessary for the committee to question to be brought before the committee.

When we have all the information before us about the bill, what it is going to cost the taxpayers of the country, if anything, what principle it may violate or what principle it may introduce here for the first time, then I shall be in a far better position to say whether or not I can give the whole bill my support. Until then, I am going to reserve the right to take any objection I may want to take. In the meantime, I am supporting the second reading of the bill.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I would say, Mr. Speaker, at least 80 per cent of the members of this house know practically nothing about insurance policies of various types that can be procured from insurance companies. The hon. member for Winnipeg—

Mr. Knowles: Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Ferguson: —North Centre—I want to pinpoint you right down to where you come from, said the Conservative party's sole idea was to protect the profitable interests. That is the farthest from our thoughts.

I am supporting the private individual, the one source of energy, efficiency and guidance in proper business management. I cannot see why this government wants to go into the life insurance business, when they can purchase satisfactory protection for all civil servants from a private corporation. Let me assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that I am in favour of every civil servant purchasing life insurance at the lowest possible cost from the private corporations that have been in the business for years. I believe all civil servants should have reasonable pensions. I believe everybody in the country should have some money to leave to dependents when they die. If such a scheme can be worked out, I will back it. I want the scheme to be placed in the hands of competent people. I cannot see why the government should be extending its departments to handle a business about which they know nothing.

Mr. Knowles: You want it done at a profit.

Mr. Ferguson: We are all entitled to a profit; that is the incentive that creates progress and success, profit sharing. If anyone in this country says he will work for nothing, and does not want the rewards of his efforts, if that occurs in this country we will not stand still, because that is impossible, but we will not be progressing. We will be going back.

Hon. members have only received this bill today. The subject is not a run of the mill thing such as giving civil servants a pension. It is more than that. There is a principle involved. Why should the government be running an insurance company? There is the principle involved of the government taking dictatorial powers to say that a man must take out insurance. This is an interference with civil liberties. The scheme will take business from concerns that are recognized by the finance minister as competent financial institutions in this country; firms that have purchased millions of dollars of government bonds; firms that are headed by some of the greatest men in this dominion. These corporations are taxpayers. These people have cleared the paths in the insurance business, and now make it possible for almost every man and woman in this country to purchase life insurance at a reasonable figure, with a slight remuneration to those who have done the work.

The principle of this bill has a lot involved in it. Every member of this house should take a copy of the bill to some person who knows a little about the subject and ask, whom does this affect? How badly does it affect them? Why should the government go into the life insurance business? Our party is not against civil servants receiving a pension in any way, shape or form. We are not standing up for any corporation that charges an excessive amount or gouges the civil servant. We want to see that civil servants are protected by private corporations who have proven themselves, beyond the shadow of a doubt, capable of managing matters of this kind. We do not like to see the matter sloughed off, without the attention of the men who have been duly elected to represent their constituents properly on all matters that are brought before this house.

You know what I say is true. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows practically nothing about insurance. I have spent my life in the business. I can tell from the words he uses that he has not spent any longer in an insurance office than it takes to pay his premiums.

Mr. Speaker: Because sometimes in the heat of debate certain expressions are used, I know the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson)—

Mr. Ferguson: I retract any expression, Mr. Speaker, that I should not have used in this case.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): We were not going to take any objection to what the hon. member for Simcoe North said because he is always most delightful when he is most indignant. He makes the most interesting speeches in the house, and I am sure everybody enjoys them. I am quite sure he has no ulterior motive in whatever he says, but he has also demonstrated a capacity for error which is perhaps not unnatural when one considers the party to which he gives allegiance.

Mr. Ferguson: You see the friendly feelings between us, Mr. Speaker. Oh, how I love them.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): But, as a matter of fact, the reason for the government going into this insurance project is that it can do it more cheaply than the private insurance companies can.

Mr. Trainor: Would the hon. member prove that point?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I might be permitted to join in the debate at this time, are we going to have a debate as to the merits of government insurance as compared with private insurance? I think that is merely an offspring of the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when the matter of private insurance was brought in. The subject really came in by the back door. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking to the bill, and it was as a result of interruptions that he referred to this matter of private enterprise. That is how it slipped into the debate.

If the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) is going to offer as the main subject of his speech the virtues of this government plan of insurance, as compared with what could be given under a private enterprise scheme, then I think we are deviating from the principle of the bill. If that debate is to continue we will forget completely the subject matter that should be under discussion, namely a bill to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act. If we continue in this way we will have a protracted debate on the point as to whether this government scheme is better than one which could be provided by private insurance companies.

I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North sees my point, and that he will cooperate with the Chair in making certain that he does not go too far afield in discussing the principle of the bill.

Mr. Rowe: On the point of order; if that is your ruling, Mr. Speaker, then most certainly we would abide by it. But, naturally, the very principle in the amendment offered by the government is the principle of the government going into the insurance business.

Mr. Abbott: No, it is not going into the insurance business, at all.

Mr. Rowe: Methinks thou dost protest too much.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members may advance the argument that the government should have left this field to the private insurance companies and, of course, that would be a proper argument in debate. But I am sure that is not all the argument which could be made as to the principle of this bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg North initiated his remarks by referring directly to what was said by the last speaker. I believe we have heard a full exchange of views between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson). But, in the process of these interchanges, let us not lose track of the bill; let us discuss the principle of the bill and refrain from any deviation which would lead us into a discussion of a branch of the subject with which we are not concerned now.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am quite convinced that everything you say is correct. I was just indulging in a little innocent jousting with my friend from Simcoe North. However, I notice he has now left the chamber for a moment perhaps in the hope that he can read in Hansard what I have to say.

Mr. Ferguson: No, here I am. I would sooner listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The hon. member intrigues me with his suggestion that the constitution is being violated and civil liberties endangered in Canada because the government decides to enter into this particular insurance scheme.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor) asks me how I can prove that this insurance will be cheaper than that offered by the commercial companies. Well, the answer is obvious. We have as supervising officials in this country a group who, I am told, are not only hard-hearted but flinty-hearted. I refer to those who sit on the treasury board. And I am quite sure treasury board would make certain that they were going to save the taxpayers money through this scheme, rather than throw it away.

I should like to answer the hon. member for Winnipeg South much more fully, as indeed I could; but if I were to do so I would not be following Your Honour's very sound advice offered only a moment ago.

All I wish to say is that the measure is an excellent one, and we would like to see more of it.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment. I really had not expected that this debate would generate quite so much heat. I do not agree with the point raised by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that this is not a proper amendment to the superannuation act.

I have given this measure a great deal of my personal consideration. It has been under study for many months, and I am satisfied both that it is a good measure and that the proper place to have it is in the superannuation act. I do not mean that my opinion should prevail necessarily; nevertheless I am convinced that this is so. I do not think anyone has ever accused me of being a socialist. I am convinced that this is not socialization of the life insurance business.

As I said in my opening statement it is intended to provide death benefits, of a relatively small amount, which will take care of the inevitable liabilities which are accumulated in most cases just prior to death.

The superannuation act itself, as the house knows, contains a substantial insurance element. Every superannuation plan which makes provision for a widow or children to receive an annuity after death of an employee or a civil servant, contains an insurance element, in the true sense of the term.

Like my hon. friend from Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson), I like to think I know something about life insurance. In earlier days I used to earn a fair part of my living by advising life insurance companies how to operate, according to the legal aspects of their business. So that I believe I do know something about life insurance contracts.

Mr. Ferguson: Was that advice given gratis?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, rarely, if ever. As I say, I had to make my living doing it; consequently I had to charge a fair fee for my services.

As I say, every superannuation plan of this kind contains some insurance element, in the strict sense of the term. This is the type of plan which I do not think any insurance company could possibly undertake. It is tied to the superannuation plan. In order to participate, a member must be a contributor to the superannuation account, in the case of civil servants, or to the pension account in the case of members of the regular armed forces.

I have refrained carefully from using the word "insurance" in connection with this matter, because I do not think it is insurance, in the commercial sense of that word. I agree with the remarks made here by some hon. members, that the life insurance companies of this country are providing an excellent type of coverage, and providing it at reasonable costs. So far as this sort of thing is concerned, as I have said this is merely a supplement to our existing superannuation scheme. I think it is a good plan. I think it is one that the majority of civil servants will appreciate.

I cannot agree with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood, that the bill be not now read a second time, but that we should refer the subject matter to the banking and commerce committee. The government takes full responsibility for the bill, as I said in my statement, and I shall therefore hope that, in the not too distant future, we may send the bill to the banking and commerce committee where I am sure all the information hon. members may want can be made available.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the discussion of the bill unduly. However, I can see that the amendment is not meeting with unanimous approval. I can realize that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is anxious to get rid of the bill as quickly as possible, because it does smack a little bit of socialistic trends; and from the support he is receiving from the left it is not surprising that the Minister of Finance blushes.

Mr. Abbott: It is just the suntan I got fishing.

Mr. Rowe: I am glad the minister has time to fish, because we all realize that would not do any harm over the week end, but I would have thought that in his quiet moments of private thinking while he was fishing, unless the fish were biting better than they were for me, he would have reconsidered this bill and thought of it in a little different way.

Unlike the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) and the Minister of Finance, I have not made much of my living out of the insurance business. Therefore I am not just as much of an authority on all the rules of the insurance business as they appear to be, although like them I have contributed something toward insurance in the past, and in fact if I live as long as my ancestors I am afraid the insurance companies will be the winners.

I am a great believer in insurance. I have a keen regard for any plan that gives security to families by way of pensions and superannuation to civil servants or pensions and insurance plans to industrial workers as well. I have had some experience in that field, and I have always encouraged pension plans so that when people are out of a job or reach maturity they might benefit from some such plan.

The minister says he has given this a lot of study. I have great regard for the minister's judgment on some occasions; in fact, I have a high regard for his sincerity on all occasions, but I do not just agree with him that because he has given it a lot of study it is necessarily a hundred per cent right. He says it certainly is not socialistic and that the principle of it cannot be termed an insurance principle—the amount is too small. Well, amounts rise and fall but principles never change. To my mind, the size of the insurance amount does not alter the principle. He has said that every pension plan has some insurance element in it. That is true. That is the intention, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, there is a unique difference in this. This is not the same as the ordinary superannuation or pension scheme. It is not merely, as the minister says, only a supplement to that. This is a case of where, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has quite properly said, many thousands are involved in addition to those who are on superannuation or pension schemes today.

The minister says that he has carefully avoided calling it insurance because he does not think it is. I can understand why he would carefully avoid calling it insurance or getting into the insurance business, but I submit that because he carefully avoids calling it that it does not follow that we of the opposition cannot so describe it. We call it as we see it. In so far as pensions and superannuation are concerned, I do feel that the insurance feature of it is one thing, but I do not believe we should have an act passed under which everybody in the civil service and in the armed forces must take their insurance in this way.

I can agree with the Minister of Finance that our insurance companies in this country are doing a grand job. They are among our soundest and best institutions in the country. They have given a fine service to this country by encouraging people to prepare for their old age, sickness, hospitalization and so forth. They have co-operated with industry in an excellent way, and have encouraged industry to look after their labouring men. They have given a fine service in the development of this country and in having money available. Despite what my hon. friends to the left may say, I must agree with the hon. member for Simcoe North that after all service without profit is a misnomer. It is certainly through companies like insurance companies that industry has been able to obtain capital to the extent of $10,000, $12,000 and sometimes $15,000 per man employed in great industries across this country. Insurance companies have played a very important role in the development of this country and are doing so at the present time. They are sound; in fact, they are a pattern to many other places where insurance companies have not been as well handled perhaps. I must say that through the government and government regulations our insurance and banking business have been well handled in this country over the many years of that development.

But I do believe that this bill should not now be read a second time but that the subject matter thereof should be referred to the committee on banking and commerce. I say that not merely because the hon. member for Greenwood has moved it; I say that not merely because this party does stand for free enterprise and the encouragement of initiative and genius in our financial set-up which I believe has stood the test of time here and has been demonstrated as successful on this whole North American continent, and in fact we might say in the free parts of the world.

I believe the government should be getting out of private business rather than getting more and more into it all the time. While the minister does not claim to be other than a sound free enterpriser, I am glad that he is not any more of a non-free enterpriser than he is because it would be dangerous to this country. I remember many years ago that the party to which he belongs swung widely to the left, and some of his followers swung with it; in fact, they tipped over and some of them almost got into the socialistic ditch, as it were.

Mr. Macdonnell: The slough of despond.

Mr. Rowe: They have had trouble ever since getting back. In fact some who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, seem to be wobbling over in that direction yet. I notice that those who are left who are free enterprisers, as I say, claim to be free enterprisers, blush when the—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid I will have to interrupt the hon. member. I cannot allow the hon. member to carry on in that vein. I think he is deviating from the subject matter which should interest us at the moment.

Mr. Rowe: I will certainly submit to your ruling. Despite your rulings, Mr. Speaker, I know you are a free enterpriser, and I shall certainly submit to your ruling. I will not proceed along the line that you say is not connected with the bill, because I would rather bow to your ruling than follow my judgment in that regard. I do feel, however, that this bill might well have been considered by the banking and commerce committee. Let me read the explanatory note:

> The purpose of this bill is to provide death benefits up to a maximum of $5,000 for the spouse or the estate of a public servant or a member of the regular forces, in addition to superannuation or pension benefits. The right to the death benefits will continue in certain circumstances after a public servant ceases to be employed by Her Majesty or a member of the regular forces ceases to be such a member.

I hope I am not in error and that the hon. member for Greenwood is not in error when we say, as we have stated, that there is a compulsory feature to it. If I am in error the Minister of Finance might interrupt to correct me. I would think that the compulsory feature is quite conspicuous. I hope it is not, as the hon. member for Greenwood has just interjected in an aside, that the government seems to be so accustomed to compulsory measures that they just take this one for granted.

Well, I do not expect ever to have a civil service job, certainly not while this government is in power. However, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the Minister of Finance would look after my security even if I were a civil servant, though I must add that if I did belong to the civil service I would like to have a choice as to whether I should entrust my future security to the government now in power or to a private insurance company. I hope I am not breaking any rules, Mr. Speaker, when I say that if I personally were a civil servant I would rather depend on a sound insurance company than the changing policies of the government as demonstrated in this act.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. It seems to me that it would be of some assistance to everyone if we could have the principle of this bill defined. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) implies that he knows it but he is keeping it a secret. I wonder if he could state that principle and we might then find out if the Minister of Finance approves.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a so-called question of privilege. I think generally the principle of this bill is well understood.

Mr. Knowles: It is quite obvious.

Mr. Speaker: When I intervene and call an hon. member to order I regret doing so but I am quite sure he understands why I do so. I do not want a debate on private enterprise versus government enterprise. That is the point which has been raised. I think the principle of the bill is well understood and hon. members should not rise on a question of privilege in order to have the principle of this bill defined, especially after the statement made by the sponsor of the bill.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in support of the amendment to the effect that the subject matter of this bill be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. I believe that the debate this afternoon, instead of clearing the air regarding the principle of this bill has to a certain extent clouded the issues. However, I am not going to enter into any discussion as to the advantages of government entering the field of insurance, though I certainly believe that before the committee evidence could be adduced as to which might be the cheapest method of dealing with the matter.

Last night I expressed some doubts as to the wisdom of proceeding with the resolution upon which this bill is based, and since then my doubts have been reinforced by representation made to me from outside the house regarding the desirability of making this form of additional benefits to the superannuation act compulsory. There are many groups in the civil service and in the armed forces who do not appreciate being compelled to take out this new form of benefit.

I think I may point out that the more senior members, either of the armed services or the civil service, have over a number of years been able to build up the security they considered necessary to look after their families after their death. They have been investing their savings in various forms of insurance to augment their pension over a great many years. Many of them are carrying all the insurance their salaries will permit them to carry at the present time. If they are to be compelled to take on another $5,000 that will mean a reduction in their present salary to the extent of the contributions which are necessary, and it will also mean a consequent lowering, though not too great, in their standard of living.

Again, those who have already provided for their families know that their estate will be subject to succession duties when they die. This means that another $5,000 will be added to the estate to be subject to taxation for succession duties when they die, so that instead of the widow receiving $5,000 she may receive only $4,500, the other $500 being deducted in succession duties for a senior member of the services.

There are many forms of group insurance, but I do not believe that any of these group schemes now in existence demand that all employees contribute to that group insurance scheme, so I do not see why it is necessary to insist that every member of the civil service or the armed forces, whether they have already provided for their families after death or not, must contribute to this scheme.

There is also the problem of the junior member, particularly the female members in the civil service and in the armed forces. They regard the provision of an estate after their death as being the responsibility of the male member of their families, and those who do not marry and do not intend to marry at the present time do not see why they should have to put their savings into a form of life insurance rather than into an annuity.

Many young people contribute to life insurance in order that they may have some capital on which they can borrow money. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will explain whether an individual will be able to borrow money on the amount of his contribution paid into this particular fund.

Another field of activity was brought out in the debate last night. The parliamentary assistant said that crown corporations could, if they wished, enter into this scheme. That is a field in which various insurance companies have been carrying group insurance policies for these employees in crown corporations, and that will certainly be an invasion into the legitimate field of these insurance companies.

A good deal of emphasis has been laid upon the fact that this is a death benefit designed to assist in the payment of bills connected with the final illness of the contributor. I would like to point out that in many provinces hospital insurance is already provided by governments. For example, in the province of British Columbia there is hospital insurance. Contributions are made in various ways and there are similar schemes in other provinces so that commitments for the final illness may not be particularly heavy, and they are already being provided for through one medium of taxation or another.

Again there are voluntary schemes such as the Blue Cross scheme which provide for the expenses paid during illness. It seems to me that there is every reason to refer the subject matter of this bill to the committee on banking and commerce. The experts can then come before that committee and can explain the necessity for the measure and the committee can hear the objections which are held by various members of the civil service and by members of the armed forces to having to contribute to this scheme.

Mr. St. Laurent: Again, it was because of the absence from the house of the Leader of the Opposition that I abstained from voting on the main motion.

Bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILLS MARKED "CONFIDENTIAL"—CONSIDERATION OF BANKING LEGISLATION

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I just happened to pick up a printed copy of Bill No. 462. In fact, I have two of them in my hand and they are both headed "confidential." I wonder how it happens that bills printed and available for distribution to members happen to be marked "confidential".

Mr. Speaker: I think that matter can be easily explained. Before a bill is introduced, a copy is sent to the Clerk as confidential. It is by error that the mark "confidential" has been kept on the bill after it has been introduced and is ready for distribution. It is really a minor point, and I do not think the hon. member should concern himself any more about it.

I noticed that according to the order of business as announced last evening by the leader of the house, the act respecting banks and banking is to be considered first in committee of the whole, followed by the act to amend the Bank of Canada Act, and then the act respecting savings banks in the province of Quebec. These three bills, as hon. members know, have been reported by the standing committee on banking and commerce. By leave of the house, I would suggest that these three bills be referred to the committee of the whole at the same time. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE BANK ACT

PROVISION FOR DECENNIAL REVISION, EXTENSION OF CHARTERS, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 338, respecting banks and banking.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I might say a word to reiterate what I said in the banking and commerce committee, that is to express my personal appreciation of the very efficient and workmanlike job that was done by the chairman and members of that committee in considering this and the other two bills which we shall have before us. The proceedings of the committee, I thought, were exceptionally helpful this session. They were helpful to me because, unlike some other hearings of the banking and commerce committee, they made very little demands on the time of the Minister of Finance and for that I was truly appreciative.

Quite sincerely I think the committee did a splendid job. They heard a great many witnesses, they examined the bill with great care and some amendments were made, perhaps not ones of great significance from the point of view of policy although one or two were of considerable importance. In this connection I think of the amendment to section 75 which removes the prohibition on taking as security goods, wares and merchandise with respect to small loans. The security, of course, has to be taken in accordance with the laws of the province in which it is given. That is, I think, the important amendment that was suggested by the committee, and one to which the government was glad to give its approval. There were some other amendments proposed, and we shall deal with them as we come to them. However, I did want to express to the house my personal appreciation for the work that was done by the committee.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to add a word or two merely to comment on what the minister has said. The committee, under the able and energetic chairmanship of the hon. member for Spadina, who I think is the reincarnation of a benevolent slave driver, had 28 meetings altogether. I think, on the whole, the committee did good work and the matters that came before it were very fully discussed.

I think the discussion was useful. I was interested in the reference to the fact that it took less time than, I gather, it did for the minister ten years ago. And, indeed, those whose memories go back ten years assure me that the proceedings on this occasion, while I hope they generated at least as much light, did not generate nearly as much heat. In fact, it seems to me, they were very useful indeed.

We had the advantage of visits from the minister, the deputy minister, the inspector general of banks, and the governor of the Bank of Canada, the president of the bankers' association, and representatives of other organizations, notably those of farmers.

As I say, the discussions were carried on with tolerance and in a co-operative manner. The result of the standing committee's work is before the committee of the whole house today and I think there would be no point in my making any further observations at the moment. Anything I may have to say in addition to what I have said can be said when the sections are called.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say only a few words. I do not intend to make a lengthy speech, because I do not believe it is called for at this stage. However I do wish to join with the minister and the hon. member for Greenwood in complimenting the chairman upon what I think was an excellent job all the way through the hearings of the committee. I found him fair and just in every respect, and I feel it incumbent upon me to acknowledge that fact.

The committee did a good job. I think it was a good committee, and I enjoyed serving on it. I was able to attend most of the sittings, and discovered that very early in proceedings the committee got into the mood of a thorough and objective inquiry. That mood was broken only occasionally, and for just a short time on each occasion. Of course it would be too much to expect a group of political representatives from four political parties to meet for over two months in an intensive investigation of various fields without occasionally slipping from their objective approach into something like a bit of politics. I suppose that is not only to be expected, but in some measure perhaps it enlivened the proceedings of the committee. I enjoyed every bit of it.

I believe the work was done thoroughly; and if anything related to banks and banking, as well as monetary or financial policy, was overlooked I would think it would be something of very little importance. Because the committee, generally, was very careful in its work. I feel the public interest has been fully protected so far as the committee was able to protect it. The intensive investigations and studies made over a period of more than two months, together with the careful study made of the bank bills, served to reinforce the views my colleagues and I have held with regard to banks and banking, and monetary policies generally.

No evidence was brought forward which changed substantially the main conviction we had before the committee began to work. I wish to say only that at this time. During the examination of the bills, clause by clause, there will be occasion where I may have something further to say. At the moment, however, I shall leave it at that.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words at this point. I hesitate to offer any more congratulations to the chairman of the banking and commerce committee in the fear that it would not be good for him. But I must say this that as a new member in the House of Commons and, of course, of the banking and commerce committee, I did appreciate very much the endless courtesy extended by the chairman and also by the witnesses to a very inexperienced member on the committee trying to play his part in an unaccustomed field.

I found it intensely interesting and extremely educative to be on the committee. I believe I speak for all members when I say that I am sure we benefited immensely from the evidence given by the various distinguished witnesses who appeared before us, and who answered so frankly and so fully the rather groping questions of those who, like myself, were new to that particular field.

I should like for a moment or two to speak about some of the changes made, and the implications of those changes. As the minister has said, the amendment permits the chartered banks to lend money on chattel mortgages. It remains to be seen of course just to what extent the chartered banks will take advantage of that new provision. I, myself, was somewhat in doubt as to whether we were wise in not getting a clearer definition of the legality of the existing method of imposing effective rates of interest on personal loans. Apparently there have been two conflicting legal opinions in that regard, and it is possible that we might have been wiser had we put in operation a course of action that would have resulted in a final court decision in that regard.

There were also in the banking and commerce committee a number of other interesting developments. A point I found most interesting was the very clear evidence that now we have an entirely different banking system from that which existed twenty years ago. I doubt whether anyone in the banking business today would deny that fact for a moment. It was for that reason that some of us in this group who served on the committee pursued the question of the much debated inner reserves. I speak for myself when I say that this was done, not so much from the point of view that here were some hidden profits that malefactors in the banking business were hiding from us but because we felt that the whole concept of inner reserves was an example of, shall we say, a hold-over of thinking from a previous banking system, and that today the arguments which might have been made in favour of inner reserves are no longer valid.

As those who attended the meetings of the committee will recall, the Minister of Finance was extremely careful not to commit the government to any blanket proposition that nowadays the government of Canada cannot afford to let any chartered bank fail. But I think I was not alone in that committee in gathering the very clear impression that it would be extremely unlikely for a government in Canada to let a bank fail today. In fact that was one of the things that seemed to me to come out most clearly from the hearings of the banking and commerce committee. I was impressed by the fact that today we have an integrated banking system of which the Bank of Canada, the publicly-owned institution, is the one part, and the chartered banks are the other part.

No longer can we ignore the fact that the two functions of the chartered banks—and there are two quite distinct functions—indicate that in Canada we have a somewhat anomalous position with regard to our banking system. Those two functions, of course, are first the guarding of the savings of the general public and making loans to industry, and secondly the distribution, expansion or contraction of the money supply, in co-operation with the Bank of Canada and the government of Canada. Because of this latter function, I think the contention that those of us in this group have been making all along, the contention that the banking system inevitably must sooner or later become classified as a public utility is a valid contention.

I would conclude by suggesting that long before the Bank Act comes again before a banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons it will be accepted generally that such a development is in the interests of the orderly development of Canada.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Chairman, as a member of the banking and commerce committee I should like to say just a word. I am going to congratulate the chairman because he did a good job, but I do not think he could have done the job that he did unless he had the full co-operation of the committee. Every member on the committee tried to do his best to see that the Canadian Bank Act was the best in the whole of the world. I think we have an excellent Bank Act. I feel that the banking association of Canada is doing its best to see that banking in Canada is kept on a very high level.

In congratulating the chairman I do think that the inspector of banks should be included. Mr. Elderkin, as a witness, never hesitated once all through the gruelling questions that he had thrown at him. He seemed to know the answers, and he seemed to know his business right down to the ground. Mr. Atkinson, the chairman of the bankers' association, also did an excellent job, and did not hesitate to give us a yes or no answer and to explain what was what.

I know that the banking and commerce committee of 1954 did as good a job as, if not better than, the banking and commerce committee of 1944, of which I was a member. We had lots of fireworks, as was mentioned at that time, but we did not have the co-operation of the members on the 1944 committee that we had this time. At this time everyone was in harmony and tried to put everything on a fair basis. There is not very much more that can be said about the Bank Act, the Bank of Canada Act or the Quebec Savings Banks Act at this time. However, there is one matter to which I should refer. I still feel we should not allow the Bank of Canada to have unlimited say as to how much money they can put into circulation. There should be a limit on that.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, I may be forgiven for rising to say just a few words. I want to tell the committee and those who have spoken how touched I am and pleased with the kind words that were directed at me as chairman of the committee. It is only too true that the work of the committee was a co-operative effort. I appreciate the kind references very much, but all the members of the committee will be very glad to know that I deflate very easily after praise.

The three bank bills—

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Don't we all?

Mr. Croll: —which were examined by the committee were, in my opinion, the most important items on the agenda at this session of parliament, and yet, in the main, they were non-controversial. There was a difference of emphasis, and members stressed particular points, but whatever they did they did in a constructive manner.

The aim of the committee was to let us freely hear all sides. It was exhaustive in its study; it was hard-working; it was diligent. It held 28 meetings and reviewed the bills painstakingly and constructively. There was a complete lack of partisanship and partisan consideration in almost 1,000 pages of evidence.

The committee, as has already been said, was fortunate in having before it some extremely capable witnesses. I should like to single out Mr. Graham Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, for special mention. He spoke his mind and he expressed his opinions, and they were both valuable. Mr. Elderkin, the inspector general of banks, was in constant attendance and was particularly helpful to the chairman and to the committee, as was Mr. K. W. Taylor, deputy minister of finance, both of whom the committee heard. The president of the Canadian Bankers Association, Mr. T. H. Atkinson, was informative and helpful to the committee. He gave the committee whatever information it required and asked for and answered all questions to the best of his ability, and that is considerable. The general managers of the other chartered banks were in attendance throughout the sittings.

We were pleased by a visit from the Hon. Lucien Maynard, attorney general of the province of Alberta, who presented a brief on behalf of his province. All members of the committee did not agree with the implications of his remarks nor with the emphasis, but we profited from the submission.

The Minister of Finance appeared before the committee. He was heard and questioned by the committee on some matters which required more than technical knowledge on the subject of banking. Others were heard and they made their contributions. Early in the session the Minister of Finance, in discussing members' salaries, spoke of rewarding things in public life: the inner drive for public service which members of parliament and others make at a sacrifice. In this respect I think the study of the Bank Act was one of the rewarding things that came to us during this session.

When the green-backed drapes were opened, there was displayed to us the inner workings of these great banking institutions. We studied them in a pointed, precise and knowledgeable fashion. We righted what was wrong and corrected that which needed correction. As a result, our examination gave to these institutions added strength which we feel confident will be exercised in the public interest, and we brought them a greater measure of public confidence. To the banks it was beneficial; to the people of Canada it was reassuring; to us it was rewarding.

During the greatest period of growth and development of Canada as a nation the banks have kept pace and have served this country extremely well. That has been recognized by most Canadians who have attributed to the banks security, efficiency and convenience.

The principle of the decennial revision is important. Conditions change with the passing of time, and that is particularly true in Canada. By having their charter reviewed every ten years it gives the banks an opportunity to place their record before the people of Canada whose representatives give it careful examination. This gives our banking system added strength.

A network of banking facilities is provided for the convenience of the public, and the view is held in many quarters that Canada is better served by her banking facilities than almost any other country. The branch system makes it possible to give service to hundreds of communities which could not otherwise support a bank.

I came away from the committee with a sense of pride in our democratic processes and confidence in our financial institutions.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the house only for a few moments. I approve of the amendments which are being brought before the committee today. However, there was, in my opinion, at least one shortcoming in the Bank Act before it was referred to the committee. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that one of the major weaknesses of our banking system has been its failure to provide long term credit facilities for agriculture. I am afraid that even with these amendments, the act is still not going to provide such facilities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are today in Canada a great many farmers who, for one reason or another, cannot go to their bank and get the kind of credit they need. I think this situation is serious, because since the war the price of land has skyrocketed, the price of machinery has gone up, and it is becoming ever more costly to establish a herd of livestock.

Out in western Canada today the price of a half section of land together with equipment has risen to almost $20,000, and though in eastern Canada it is not quite so expensive, young farmers still find the price is so high that they usually find it impossible to purchase a farm.

There is no place under our present banking system where they can obtain long term credit. I am well aware that over the years the government has brought in the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Both of these acts have proved beneficial, but the experience, at least in western Canada, has been that their provisions are too restrictive. Either the down payment required is too high, the terms are too severe, or the ceilings are too low.

I therefore think the time has come, while we are dealing with the Bank Act, to consider whether or not there is something we can do to give Canadian farmers long term credit facilities. We can, of course, extend the provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act, or the Farm Improvement Loans Act and I think such a policy might be a good idea. However, may I suggest another alternative.

Earlier this session, parliament amended the Bank Act in such a way that the government now guarantees the losses banks may incur in making a 20 or 30-year loan to urban dwellers on the construction of new homes.

If it is possible to do this for urban dwellers to help them build homes, I do not see why it should not be possible to adopt a similar principle where farmers are concerned. I see no reason why the government could not guarantee bank loans made to farmers over a 20 or 30-year period in the same way for the purchase of farms or equipment.

I think such a policy would give farmers the kind of long term credit they need without being in any way costly to the taxpayers. I hope the minister will give this suggestion some consideration while this act is before parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, the speech of the hon. member for Spadina and the hon. member for Nanaimo interested me and there is just one comment I would like to make. The hon. member for Spadina, and I think we all agree with him including the hon. member for Nanaimo, spoke of the excellent service Canada has received from the banks, but the hon. member for Nanaimo, while speaking very appreciatively in this sense, used a phrase on which I wish to comment. He said, if I took him down correctly, that within 10 years banking would become a public utility. I would just like to say, and I believe most hon. members in the committee will agree with me, that it is a public utility at this moment.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: Before calling clause 2 I should point out that hon. members have before them a reprinted copy of the bill whereas I have before me the original bill with a notation of the amendments which were adopted by the banking and commerce committee. Hon. members will find that in their reprinted copy the amendments are underlined, and I wondered if it would be agreeable to hon. members, in order to save time, if they would merely indicate on any particular clause whether they wish me to read the manner in which the original bill was printed. In that fashion we might perhaps save time; otherwise, when calling a clause, I should have to indicate the nature of the amendments adopted in committee.

Mr. Abbott: I would think that suggestion a very practical one, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clauses 2 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 14—Permission to commence business.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, this clause reads:

> The bank shall not commence the business of banking until it has obtained from the treasury board a certificate permitting it to do so.
> (2) No application for the certificate shall be made until directors have been elected in accordance with this act.

I wonder if the minister would mind just saying a word as to the functions of the treasury board. I do not carry in my mind the actual requirements which have to be complied with and I think it may be worth while if the committee had them brought to their attention.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that this section has been in the Bank Act since 1871 and has been continued in successive provisions since that time. I assume that the provision is there in order that the treasury board may make certain that the requirements of the act with respect to the subscription of the minimum amount of capital required, the election of directors, their qualifications and so on, have been complied with. A somewhat similar provision existed, as I recall it, in connection with insurance companies which are subject to supervision by the superintendent of insurance.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 15 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 19—Bylaws.

Mr. Macdonnell: I did not quite realize, Mr. Chairman, when you made your proposal what was actually intended. What we are really doing now is treating all these amendments as incorporated and taking this as a new bill. On page 10, clause 19, I notice there is an amendment which makes the paragraph read as follows:

> (h) the amount of discounts or loans that may be made to directors, either jointly or severally, or to any one person, or to any shareholders;

That apparently is an amendment and I would like to have the significance of that explained by the minister.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I understand it was simply a change of wording. The legal draftsman felt that this wording more accurately expressed the real intent of the clause. As the hon. member knows it is an enabling clause which permits shareholders to make bylaws with respect to certain specific matters, and my information is that this was merely an amendment to the wording to make what was the admitted intention of the clause so much clearer. There is no change in policy.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 20 to 35 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 36—Offer of shares of capital stock.

The Chairman: There has apparently been an amendment to clause 36.

Mr. Macdonnell: I was just going to ask if that might be explained. There seems to have been some important changes made.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend is aware clauses 36 to 39, inclusive, deal with the issue of new stock by the banks. Some substantial amendments were made to these sections in order to enable the banks to issue stock or to offer stock to shareholders residing outside of Canada under the conditions set forth in these sections. As the committee is aware, some jurisdictions require the filing of a great deal more information than is required here in Canada. Broadly speaking, these sections enable the banks to do two things, namely to issue rights which a non-resident shareholder can sell and dispose of or, if they so decide, to sell shares which would be allotted to non-resident shareholders and to apportion the benefit among those non-resident shareholders. That is the purpose of these four sections. I know they have received careful consideration by the committee as well as by the law officers. I have been over them fairly carefully myself, and I think they accurately express what was intended to be done.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 37 agreed to.

On clause 38—Disposal of shares not subscribed or offered.

Mr. Macdonnell: Clause 38 is a completely new one as is clause 39. Perhaps I might ask with regard to the two of them at the same time.

Mr. Abbott: I covered those two sections rather briefly in the comment I made a moment ago. They provide machinery for the disposal of shares which are not subscribed for or rights which are not taken up by non-resident shareholders and the disposition of the proceeds.

Clause 39 provides for keeping certain stock books, for the purpose of recording the disposal of shares under clauses 36 and 38.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 39 to 60 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 61—Auditors.

Mr. Macdonnell: It seems to me that it would be worth while to have on Hansard something said by the minister with regard to the shareholders' audit. In that connection I suggest that he might make some reference to the duties of the inspector general of banks so that we shall have on record for public information the two checks which are provided, the one imposed and carried out by the shareholders themselves in their own interests and the other imposed and carried out by the government. As the hon. member for Peterborough has said already, we were all greatly impressed with the work of Mr. Elderkin and his knowledge of the banking system. I think it would be worth while to have some brief statement as to the scope and nature of his functions as well as something about the shareholders' audit.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend is aware, the provisions with respect to the shareholders' audit have been in the Bank Act for a good many years. Some changes have been made in this section. Those which were made were rather technical in character but they were made on the suggestion of the institute of chartered accountants. As hon. members will see on examining the section, there is a provision that an auditor, in order to be qualified to serve as a bank auditor, must have been practising his profession continuously during the six consecutive years immediately preceding his appointment. Under the 1944 act these auditors had to be selected from an eligible list furnished by the provincial institutes and published in the Canada Gazette. The minister had the right to remove from that list the name of any accountant.

There is an amendment with regard to the work which may be carried out and the remuneration which may be received by an auditor of the bank. I understand that it has become the practice for auditors to act in an advisory capacity on matters such as income tax, issue of new capital stock, accounting methods and so on which are outside of the scope of a straight audit. Provision has been made that they may be remunerated for such service if approved by the directors. However, I think it is fair to say that there has been no substantial change in the audit requirements so far as shareholders' audits are concerned. Perhaps I might defer my comment on the inspector general of banks until we reach the section which deals with that officer.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 62—Inspector general of banks to be appointed.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I have any extended comments I care to make on this section. It is not changed in substance from the section contained in the previous act. The office of inspector general of banks was created in the revision of 1924 and has existed since that time. The inspector general, of course, is an officer of the Department of Finance and reports directly to the Minister of Finance. Broadly speaking, his responsibilities are to see that the banks carry on their functions in accordance with the requirements of the Bank Act under which they operate. In the exercise of his duties he obviously relies to a considerable extent upon information furnished to him by the auditors of the bank. That procedure is quite appropriate. It is desirable that that should be so for this reason. To set up a completely new or separate auditing staff would be quite unnecessary, I think, and unduly expensive. My experience now extends over a period during which we have had two inspector generals. Needless to say, I endorse wholeheartedly everything that has been said here today about the work which has been done by the present inspector general whom I knew for a great many years before he became inspector general of banks. I do not know whether my hon. friend wanted me to elaborate any further on the work of that officer.

Mr. Macdonnell: No. I think the minister has covered it. I was impressed with one thing in particular, namely the incredibly small staff with which the inspector general works. That fact convinced me not only that he must have some Scottish blood in him but—and this was more important—made me feel that he was not dealing with a lot of non-essential and niggling details but was having regard, as he should, to the principles involved and to important considerations. Am I right in thinking that his staff consists of one or two outside of himself?

Mr. Abbott: I think it is two, Mr. Chairman. The job is essentially a personal one. It requires a man with special qualifications. As I say, for the technical data he needs he can rely upon the banks' internal audit and upon the shareholders' auditors. He gets that information from them. It is quite unnecessary to set up a duplicate staff in order to get that information. Then, of course, he is able to get from the Bank of Canada such additional data as they may have. Taking it all in all, I think the introduction of the present system of an inspector general of banks reporting directly to the Minister of Finance, responsible to the Minister of Finance, and with a small staff but who is in constant personal contact with the banks' operations, has proved to be a fairly satisfactory one.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have not the slightest intention of reflecting on any other civil servant, but may I say that if by some means there could be a general inoculation with the same virus as that which infected the inspector general of banks it might produce wonderful results.

Mr. Abbott: It would please the Minister of Finance greatly.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 63 to 67 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 68—Report to Minister of National Revenue of excess reserves for bad debts, etc.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister say a word about this clause? I think it was one of the clauses which most interested the committee, and I think it is very desirable that the public should have some understanding about it.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend is aware, there is no change in this section, which corresponds to section 56 of the previous act. This is the section which provides for contingency reserves, the so-called inner reserves. I do not know that there is very much I can add to what I said before the banking and commerce committee. These particular classes of reserves have existed in commercial banks since time immemorial. There was a fundamental change made in the act in 1944 by which it was provided that the Minister of Finance takes the responsibility of determining whether the reserves are excessive. If they are excessive he can then require the banks to bring the excess back into income and pay income tax on it.

Of course, as I explained to the committee, these so-called contingency reserves can never be available to shareholders until tax has been paid on them. But banking being a special form of business in which confidence is one of the most important factors, if not the most important, the purpose of having these inner reserves is well known, namely, to take care of special situations where unforeseen losses in a particular period might give rise to public misunderstanding and misapprehension if they were made public at the time.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think the minister made clear at that time that these inner reserves were not and could not be a device for tax dodging.

Mr. Abbott: I tried to make that clear a moment ago too, and I did before the committee.

Mr. Low: I want to make one brief comment. I think in previous years there has been a good deal of mystery about the whole matter of contingency reserves which I believe was very largely removed as the result of the work of the committee this year. I believe that in the course of the committee's hearings it was established that under present circumstances these reserves could not exceed $320 million, which was tantamount to drawing aside the curtain and giving us a peek at the facts. Since that time I have been wondering whether it is necessary any longer to keep all the facts hidden. I wonder whether the minister has not also changed his views a bit on that matter. The public are not likely to have any suspicions in their minds if they have access to the facts. I believe that was one reason why the inspector general of banks tabled in the committee a report which showed that the aggregate amount under present circumstances could not exceed $320 million. That has set at rest a good deal of speculation, and I was wondering whether the minister had changed his mind.

Mr. Abbott: I do not think I have. For the first time the inspector general of banks indicated to the standing committee the formula which is used in determining whether the reserves of a particular bank have reached the permitted maximum. He also gave the maximum which would be permitted for all banks under that formula. I think I indicated to the committee that in a case of this kind I would prefer to have too much in those reserves than too little. It might well be that at some later date it might be considered appropriate to break down that information a bit more, but I do think this is a matter with respect to which we should proceed rather slowly. My understanding is that in other commercial countries such as Great Britain and the United States, whose banking systems are most closely comparable to ours, they do not disclose under any circumstances the amount of the banks' inner reserves. But I am satisfied that as a result of the work done by the committee in 1944, the formula which is now in effect and the responsibility which is placed on the minister of finance there can be, as the hon. member for Greenwood has said, no question that these reserves can be used as a method of tax avoidance.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 69 and 70 agreed to.

On clause 71—Cash reserves.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister make a comment on clause 71, because it does represent some change?

Mr. Abbott: This section really needs to be read in conjunction with the section in the Bank of Canada Act which is here referred to. The method of computing cash reserves is altered. The minimum rate is increased from 5 per cent on a daily basis to 8 per cent on a monthly average basis, and provision is made in the section that the Bank of Canada may increase this percentage within the provisions of its act as proposed in the 1954 amendments which will be before the committee a little later.

Mr. Low: It was with interest that we learned in the committee that at least one of the chartered banks, and perhaps others, has already made rather extensive loans under the new housing act provisions. I believe it was the president of the Canadian Bankers Association who said in his evidence that if any substantial amount of housing loans was made by the chartered banks it would doubtless require some increase in cash reserves. I wonder whether the minister has any information with respect to whether the cash reserves of the banks that have made substantial loans have been increased.

Mr. Abbott: I have no information. I would doubt if the banks would need to increase their cash reserves substantially as yet. All the banks, as my hon. friend knows, hold cash reserves in excess of the minimum set out here, some quite substantially in excess. That is a matter of judgment on the part of the individual management, but so far as any information I have is concerned I would think that the banks would not have been required to make any appreciable change in their cash position as a result of the housing loans which they may have made so far.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 72 to 74 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 75—Business and powers of bank.

Mr. Croll: May I ask that this clause stand for a moment and be dealt with a little later.

The Chairman: Is that agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Clauses 76 to 81 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 82—Loans on hydrocarbons.

Mr. Michener: This is a new section, and I noticed that the minister did not mention it in dealing with the main changes. It seems to me that it is an important extension of the lending privileges of the banks.

Mr. Abbott: Quite right. I covered it in my speech on second reading. I pointed out that section 82 was a new section which was introducing security analogous to the security already existing under section 88, and was designed to enable the banks to lend money on the security of oil in the ground. It is an important section and one, I think, which the committee was right in approving. I am told that in other jurisdictions the banks can and do lend money on that type of security, and it seemed to me, with the growing oil development in Canada, that we should have a comparable provision in our Bank Act.

Mr. Low: I should like to ask the minister whether he has satisfied himself that the taking of such security for loans for oil development will not interfere with provincial rights. I think that matter was brought up and discussed at some length.

Mr. Abbott: I satisfied myself in this way, Mr. Chairman, that so far as the legal position was concerned, I had the benefit of the advice of the officers of the Department of Justice, as well as the legal advisers to the Canadian Bankers Association. I was informed also that this legislation had been discussed with the province of Ontario and the western provinces, and it met with their approval. I took that as evidence that they were satisfied this was legislation that would not conflict with provincial laws in this respect.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 83 to 87 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 88—Loans to certain borrowers and security.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish the minister would say something about clause 88 because there was a good deal of discussion about it. As I say, for the readers of Hansard I believe it is worth saying something about it. I was impressed with the statement made by the president of the bankers association, who was also the general manager of the Royal Bank, to the effect that while this security was so vital to the banks, if my memory serves me correctly he said that in 40 years he recalls using it three times. I was amazed at the figure. If the minister sees fit I should like him to say a few words about that section because it is cardinal to the banking operation and yet there were some questions raised about it to which perhaps the answers were not satisfactory to everybody.

Mr. Abbott: This is a very familiar section. It is unique in our Canadian banking system and has existed for a great many years. So far as this revision is concerned, there have been really no changes of great substance. There have been a few procedural changes, and seed potatoes have been added to the list of products on which money may be lent to a farmer. I believe that is the only change of substance, but there have been one or two procedural amendments with respect to the destruction of the rather voluminous records it is necessary to keep.

I think myself that section 88 has performed a very useful purpose in the history of Canadian banking. I feel it has provided credit which might not otherwise have been available. I am also one of those who believe that in due course it may cease to be necessary as a form of security to be taken by banks. I would not be at all surprised if in the next revision or some subsequent revision of the Bank Act it would be found that this was no longer necessary as the country has developed. It is a rather expensive way of taking security. There is a great deal of paper work involved. The banks, themselves, are not particularly keen about it. Nevertheless, as I say, I think it has fulfilled a very useful function over the years. I do not think the time has yet come when we could safely do away with it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 89—Priority of bank's claims.

Mr. Macdonnell: There is a substantial part of this clause that is new. I think it might deserve some comment.

Mr. Abbott: My understanding is that while there is some change in the wording, there is really no change of substance, except in subsection 4. No, I am informed by the inspector general of banks that is really just a drafting change, and there is no change of fundamental policy at all.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 90 agreed to.

On clause 91—Interest exceeding 6 per cent shall not be charged.

Mr. Thatcher: I have one matter I should like to discuss, though I do not know whether I should mention it here or on clause 75. Since 91 is the clause which fixes the ceiling on interest rates, I think I shall discuss the matter now.

Clause 75 is a new amendment which permits banks to lend money on chattel mortgages. I think this idea is certainly a good one, because many Canadians who are today forced to go to small loan companies will now be able to go to the banks and borrow at considerably lower rates. I noticed in the proceedings of the committee that Mr. McKinnon of the Bank of Commerce suggested that the banks could do a more effective job in making these small loans if they were permitted to charge interest rates of one per cent per month. I was not in the committee and there may have been reasons why the suggestion was not desirable. However the argument Mr. McKinnon put forward was simply that the bank's administration costs in connection with these small loans were so high that they needed a higher interest rate to make the proposition economically feasible.

It seems to me there may be some sense in Mr. McKinnon's argument. If we want to get the banks into the small loan business, if we want the banks to provide a better service to small borrowers, we must let them charge rates which are economically sensible. As I understand the law today, a bank can charge up to 10·46 per cent by discounting the note originally at 6 per cent, and then obtaining monthly repayments. Mr. McKinnon asked for one per cent per month, which would be about 1·5 per cent higher than the present rate. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the house should give careful consideration before passing this 6 per cent ceiling on the chattel mortgage business.

I have had a good deal of experience with this kind of paper financing. Frankly, from what I have seen of it, I doubt if the present rate is going to be sufficiently interesting for the banks to go after the small loan business. I am only speaking personally. I could be wrong, because as I say I was not in the committee when the evidence came up. However I urge parliament to remember that banks, in dealing with this kind of loan, are dealing with risks which are greater than they have in the ordinary loan. Moreover the cost of servicing personal loans is greater, because the repayments come once a month. I certainly think the 6 per cent ceiling should be maintained on standard loans, but I should like the minister to make a statement as to whether or not we might not have more Canadians benefit if the banks were able to make these personal loans now at a slightly higher rate.

Mr. Abbott: I gave that very careful consideration, Mr. Chairman, but on balance I came to the conclusion I was not prepared to recommend an increase in the maximum permitted interest rate at this time. One reason is that it is quite difficult to distinguish between the different types of loans. While admittedly these so-called small loans to purchasers of individual consumer goods do carry a higher rate of interest, I would be afraid there might be some temptation to get a little higher rate of interest on loans on which perhaps that higher rate was not justified. On balance, therefore, I came to the conclusion we should not at this time raise this permitted 6 per cent maximum.

One other reason, too, was that the banks are now engaged in loans on residential housing, and with the demands on them for ordinary commercial accommodation, I think the result will be that all the resources of the banks will be fairly well utilized in the immediate future. I was, personally, unwilling to recommend an increase in this permitted 6 per cent ceiling. I think the matter should be studied. Some banks may want to engage in this personal loan business extensively, and others less extensively. I know there is experience in the United States which shows that the rates there, even allowing for escrow deposits and so on, are substantially in excess of the 6 per cent. I would not be prepared to take the responsibility of recommending an increase from that figure at this time.

Mr. Thatcher: I thank the minister for his statement. He may be correct.

Mr. Abbott: It is a matter of opinion, I grant you.

Mr. Thatcher: I do hope the government will keep the matter under review. I would remind the minister that even if the rate which Mr. McKinnon asked were granted, it would still be one-half the rate which the small loan companies are often charging for the same type of loan. My reason for making this suggestion is that it might be a progressive step. I believe the banks would go after this type of business if it were more lucrative.

Mr. Abbott: I think that is right.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 92 and 93 agreed to.

On clause 94—Transfer to Bank of Canada of unclaimed deposits, etc.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, this provision requires the banks to pay over to the Bank of Canada the amount standing at the credit of inactive accounts after 10 years of inaction. Of course this act applies only to the chartered banks. It would be a salutary thing if the same provision could be extended to the postal savings bank, as was recommended by the Auditor General. This of course might not be the legislation under which that could be done. The postal savings bank is carrying forward a great many inactive accounts—I believe there are 150,000 of them. One has been inactive since 1878. There appears to be no corresponding provision for the postal savings bank.

Mr. Abbott: No, there is not. As my hon. friend appreciates, when anyone puts money in the postal savings bank he is, in effect, lending it to the government at an agreed rate of interest. Whether it would be desirable to turn many people from that department of government to a wholly owned subsidiary, the Bank of Canada, I do not know. I assume no one would question the solvency of either institution. That is probably the reason the difference is made.

Mr. Michener: I think the chief problem is one of bookkeeping, and the cost of administration.

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Michener: This undoubtedly relieves the banks of a great deal of bookkeeping and administration of accounts that are inactive.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 95 to 120 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 121—Charter to remain in force for calls and winding-up.

Mr. Macdonnell: With regard to this clause, and the others following in this group, I believe it would be of interest if the minister would make a general statement as to the consolidated stability and general strength of our banking system.

Mr. Abbott: There is no change in substance, so far as these clauses are concerned. I believe there were some improvements in wording. On a number of occasions I have expressed my confidence in the Canadian banking system, which has developed as a result of the process of trial and error that has taken place over a good many years. Some of the defects either in law or in banking management have been eliminated, and today I believe we all agree that we have one of the strongest banking systems in the world. I think, too, that the introduction of a central bank has helped to assure that the banks would be in a more liquid position than they might have been under preceding legislation. I think the very effective work done by the inspector general of banks, as it has been done over a number of years, has contributed to that end.

I know the hon. member for Nanaimo would like me to admit that it is now impossible for a bank in Canada to fail. I am not prepared to make that admission. I think that the responsibility for solvency must continue to be the primary responsibility of the managements of banks, and I think they are discharging that responsibility admirably.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 122 to 134 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 135—Commencing business without certificate.

The Deputy Chairman: I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that clause 135 is now 156. If it is agreeable I shall call them in that order. I believe that would be the order which it would be easiest for the committee to follow.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Just a moment; we have the corrected bill before us, the amended copy.

The Deputy Chairman: Then if the committee has the reprint, perhaps it would be desirable if I were to slow down in my reading of them and take them in the order in which they appear.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 136 to 143 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 144—Bank doing prohibited business.

Mr. Macdonnell: As this is a new section, would the minister comment upon it.

Mr. Abbott: I think it is just a change in wording; there is no change in substance. I am assured by the inspector general that my recollection is correct in that regard.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 145 to 161 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules A to R inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: I would remind hon. members that clause 75 was stood aside.

On clause 75—Business and powers of bank.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 75 carry.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I just wish to say that I think this is a very satisfactory clause. Under it I believe chattels are allowed to be accepted as collateral for bank loans. In my view this will help a great deal, and I have heard much favourable comment from different people. They feel that this is a very good move, and that the banking and commerce committee was wise in making this provision.

Mr. Abbott: I congratulate the committee, because I think it is a good move, too. It removes one of the prohibitions, but it limits the field of action, so far as the type of security is concerned, to a narrow field, and quite properly so. It also makes it quite clear that the security to be taken must be taken in accordance with the law of the province in which the loan is being made and the security is taken. We are not creating a new type of banking security; we are simply removing the prohibition which existed.

Bill reported.

The Bank Act

Mr. Speaker: When shall Bill No. 338, respecting banks and banking, be read a third time? Now?

Mr. Macdonnell: By leave.

Mr. Knowles: It was not read the second time today; you do not need leave.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that. I take it that at this time hon. members say "by leave" just to show that they are in agreement that this be done today, although they might perhaps have asked that it be done some other day.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Last week I announced for tomorrow consideration of the estimates of the Department of Transport and the Department of Justice. I understand this is not acceptable to hon. members opposite, and so we shall begin, as I indicated, with interim supply and then take transport and the departments of national revenue, fisheries, mines and technical surveys, and labour

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 27, 1954

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE LIONEL CONACHER

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): We were all profoundly shocked yesterday evening, Mr. Speaker, by the death of one of the members of this house, Mr. Lionel Conacher. Those of us who were present at the annual baseball game between the members of parliament and the members of the press gallery were pleased to see him taking part once more in this popular event, and noticed that he seemed to be in his usual good health and good spirit. His collapse on the playing field was therefore a much greater shock as it was so unexpected.

Lionel Conacher was only 52 years of age, having celebrated his 52nd birthday last Monday. He spent the day with his family and friends in Toronto, but was back in Ottawa in time to play his usual important part in this annual sporting event, which has been a source of so much pleasure and good fellowship. Mr. Conacher was a native of Toronto, and I am informed had been a resident of that city for most of his life. He was one of a family of great sportsmen, and he himself became one of the greatest and most versatile athletes of our time. Canadians right across this country, and sportsmen all over the world, will recall his exploits and will remember him affectionately as the "big train". He received, we know, the honour of being named in 1950, by sports writers in this country, as the greatest Canadian athlete of the half century.

It was in 1937 that he began his political career, having been elected to the legislature of the province of Ontario as the representative of the constituency of Bracondale. While he was a member of that body, he served as vice-chairman and then as chairman of the Ontario athletics commission. In 1942 he was placed in charge of the Royal Canadian Air Force sports and recreation facilities with the rank of squadron leader, and in that capacity made a valuable contribution to the maintenance of morale in the air force in the war years.

Mr. Conacher was first elected to this House of Commons as the member for the constituency of Trinity at the general elections in 1949, and was returned on August 10 of last year. He was not only a very popular member, but he was a very hard-working and effective one as well. He spared no effort to justify the confidence of his constituents in him, and he brought to our deliberations the keen insight, common sense and high sense of fair play which distinguished him outside of parliament as well. Both in this chamber and in the committees of which he was a member, his remarks were listened to with attention and respect.

Mr. Conacher's death came at a time when it might have been expected he still had many more useful years of public service ahead of him. However, he had already made a significant contribution to this country, and earned the lasting respect of his fellow citizens. He will, I am sure, be remembered as an outstanding Canadian, both by us who knew him so well here and by the younger generation to whom he devoted so much of his time and his great energy. I am sure I speak for all members in asking you, Mr. Speaker, to extend to Mrs. Conacher, their five children, and to the other members of the family, our most heartfelt sympathy in their bereavement.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): It was with a sense of shock and amazement, Mr. Speaker, that I learned in Toronto last night of the sudden and extremely tragic death of Lionel Conacher. He had the warm friendship of every member of the House of Commons. I do extend my personal sympathy to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in the loss of one of his associates with whom he had been on such close terms for several years.

My own personal friendship for Lionel Conacher went back a considerate time. I had sat opposite him in the Ontario legislature, as I have here. At all times our friendship had been close and understanding. I recall so well the days when he was an example not only of great athletic prowess, but of good sportsmanship in the days of his football, hockey and other attainments. As commissioner of the Ontario athletics commission, he made a contribution to his native province which extended beyond that province. A man can be a good athlete and not always be a great sport. But Lionel Conacher was undoubtedly the greatest of all the athletes this country has produced, and he was one of the best sports this country has known. I think that perhaps the highest praise that can be given any man is that he is a good sport in whatever his field of activity may be.

Lionel Conacher was a good sport, and he gave the sense of sportsmanship to those with whom he came in contact as commissioner. It was also in a wider field that he expanded that interest and encouraged young people to take part in the healthy games that give them the physical strength to face the tests of life. I think there are many grown young men and women of this generation who will recall that their interests in one sport or another came from the example and inspiration he had given.

There was no type of sport in which he was not interested. I have one very vivid recollection which shows that it was not only in the hard-hitting and muscular sports, but in other sports as well that he was extremely successful. I recall a couple of years ago seeing a disabled boat in Georgian bay, and going over and finding that it was Lionel Conacher and some friends who were there. He was not in any way downcast by the fact that they were marooned. Instead of that he was fishing—and fishing very successfully—in the spot where they happened to stop. And that was typical of him.

He took life as it came, and took it as a good sport at all times. Every one of us in this House of Commons joins with the Prime Minister in the expression of sympathy to his wife and to the bereaved family, who have been deprived of their father in such tragic circumstances. All of us here today say farewell to a good friend and a good sport, in the very best meaning of that word.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, for the second time in less than two months this House of Commons meets with a sense of shock and a sense of sorrow. As has already been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), all of us who learned the news last night, whether we were on the playing grounds or heard it over the radio or by telephone, were deeply shocked by the sudden passing of one whom we had come to know and to respect.

When yesterday afternoon those of us on this side of the house looked across the other side and saw Mr. Conacher in his seat as usual, we little thought that this afternoon we would be rising to express the deep feelings of sympathy we all feel for his sorrowing wife and family.

I think one of the really poignant features of his passing last night was the fact that he was looking forward so much to today, when one of his daughters would graduate from the University of Toronto. Surely this is a reminder to all of us that in the midst of life we are in death. Twice in less than two months we have had this sorrow in our hearts.

On behalf of those associated with me I join with the Leader of the Opposition in expressing that sympathy we all feel, to Mrs. Conacher, to the children, and to the relatives of our deceased friend. And to the Prime Minister, too, we express our sympathy in his loss of a good colleague. Mr. Conacher was one whom we knew as a good sport, one whom we knew as a man of independent mind. The house will not mind my mentioning the fact that on occasion I have noticed that he exercised his right to speak, think or act as he pleased. And I am sure that his colleagues around him respected him for that. We all did.

Today on this very sorrowful occasion we extend our sympathy to the Prime Minister and to the Liberal party and, as I have already said, to the sorrowing widow and family, as well as other near relatives of Mr. Conacher.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate the group for whom I speak with the tributes that have been paid this afternoon to our colleague who passed away so suddenly last night. I am sure we all endorse everything that has been said about this good man.

I looked upon Lionel Conacher as a personal friend. He was always affable and kind—surprisingly so, I think, for one who played his games so vigorously and aggressively. I suppose one of the things that made him great is that he played with all his heart, and still was kind and considerate. He was always interested in the sports activities in which I was involved, and he gave me personally much encouragement.

For many years Lionel Conacher has been an inspiration to Canadians both young and old, and has done more, I think, than most people to promote good and wholesome recreation in sports for young people. At all times he set an excellent example.

We were shocked and saddened by his death, and want to be associated with the expressions of sympathy that have been extended to Mrs. Conacher and to the family. And may I also say to the Prime Minister that we sympathize with him and the members of his party in the loss of a very fine supporter.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I knew Lionel Conacher in my undergraduate days, when he was writing his name in flaming letters on the gridiron. He then acquired the name of the "big train". His later participation in many athletic activities gave him the deserved legendary reputation of being the greatest all-round athlete in Canadian history.

I knew him extremely well when we were members of the Ontario legislature. We maintained our friendship and common bond when we came to the House of Commons as members, and more particularly with our mutual concern for the interests of the city of Toronto. We members from Toronto, who shared a special kind of friendship, considered him a colleague of merit. He had a quick and alert mind, and good solid common sense. He was a man who was devoted to his family and was particularly painstaking and considerate of the interests of his constituents.

He was respected in his native city and admired by many Canadians, to whom he was a personality. As a fabulous athlete he inspired the youth of the country. His contribution in war as well as in peace did not go unnoticed. He died, as he lived, playing the game. All these people, and many others, will be saddened today because the "big train" isn't running any more. To his wife and family I extend my deepest sympathy.

Mr. A. H. Hollingworth (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I got to know Lionel Conacher very well in the way one always gets to know one's roommate, and I developed a deep feeling of affection for him. Once you got to know Lionel Conacher you could not help liking him, and I feel that is one of the finest tributes one can pay to one's fellow man. He was ostensibly brusque and blunt but inherently kind and generous; he had an infectious grin and a certain innate charm. Perhaps I might use a well known expression to describe him—he wore well.

Possessed of an incisive mind, as the members of the committee on railways and canals well know, he could analyse a problem clearly and sum it up succinctly. He would go right to the root of the matter. He was essentially a man of few words and always believed in direct, sledgehammer-like action. Thus was this colourful giant of a man.

Much abler men than I this afternoon have paid tribute to his prowess as Canada's greatest athlete. I feel certain in saying that there never will be another name like Lionel Conacher emblazoned across the sports pages of this country. He was the idol of every young boy of my generation. Finally he was immensely proud of representing the good people of Trinity riding, proud of being a Liberal, proud of being a Torontonian, proud of being a Canadian. I drove down with him this week from Toronto and he casually told me about the swimming pool and picnic grounds he had almost completed on his farm north of Toronto for his constituents.

Our deepest sympathies go out to Mrs. Conacher and the family, all of whom have distinguished themselves scholastically as well as in athletics. A pall of grief is hanging heavily over this house which will not easily be lifted.

Thus will Lionel Conacher be missed by his family, by his constituents, by those of us in this house, and by his legion of friends across this country.

And so the "big train" has gone on his long, final, inexorable journey.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the leaders have spoken today for all members of this house. May I just add this personal word which comes from the heart.

After a long and quite intimate association with the late Lionel Conacher, in politics, sport and socially, I can say this of our late colleague. Under all circumstances he never failed to be a gentleman. His instinct of fair play and generous consideration of others was outstanding. Though the idol of every sport lover in Canada, the outstanding Canadian athlete, a man who attained success also in business and politics, his success had never deprived him of his essential and altogether admirable quality of modesty.

He was essentially a family man, and the hearts of his wife and five children, to whom he was deeply devoted, and who are a great credit to him, are sore and heavy today. His daughter Diane was to have graduated from the University of Toronto today.

It happened that when the tragic moment came, in last night's game, Mr. Speaker, I was at bat and it was my uncertain hope to bring Lionel Conacher home from third base. A higher power intervened, Mr. Speaker, to bring Lionel Conacher home.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): For a few moments I should like to speak about our departed friend. During the life of the twenty-first parliament Lionel and I were roommates. I can say that in those four years never as much as an anxious or an angry word was ever passed between us. Today we as members of this house and many hundreds of thousands of Canadians across the country are paying our respects to a great symbol of Canadianism—I might say, almost a fabulous symbol—of what Canadianism means from the east to the west coast of our fair land.

The late Lionel Conacher

On occasion we discussed instances of amusement that occurred in our various fields of endeavour in the line of sport, and I think it is fair to say on this occasion, sir, that we here today and across Canada pay tribute to a great Canadian, not only great in sport, great in character, great in the open-mindedness of his views and great in the warmth of his heart, but greater still as husband and father of a fine Canadian family.

If Lionel could have chosen the hour when the great Geometrician of the universe was to call him to his last resting place, Mr. Speaker, I do not think he could have selected a more appropriate moment than he did. Because of that we, together with his family, have less to mourn than we otherwise would. We can visualize what a terrific burden it would have been to our friend if the great Physician had decided that he should lie inactive for months and possibly years. Though we mourn, though we are sad, though we are sick at heart, we can for a moment rejoice in the fact that the great Physician gave him this opportunity of transferring from this mundane sphere into the realm of the unknown. While it is still unknown, we are confident in our hearts that the day will come when, on the other side of the Jordan, we shall renew our comradeship not only with our friend who has just passed on, but with all those who have gone before.

Like the other speakers, I extend to the family and to his wife our deepest and sincerest sympathy, and pray that the Almighty in His wondrous judgment will aid them as well as us in this temporary separation. We in this chamber today reiterate all the fine things that have been said about Lionel, and pray that God in His wisdom will give grace and peace to his loved ones to bear the cross.

Mr. W. K. McDonald (Parry Sound-Muskoka): As one who had the privilege of playing with and against our great friend and Canada's greatest athlete, I wish to extend to his family, to his brothers and to his father and mother deepest sympathy on behalf of the sport-loving people of this country.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Second report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Picard.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That items Nos. 84 to 103, inclusive, of the main estimates 1954-55, approved and reported upon this day by the standing committee on external affairs, be referred back to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS PURCHASES

Mr. Knowles:

1. What items which could be manufactured in the shops of the Canadian National Railways are being purchased from outside firms?
2. What was the total value of such items in each of the last three years (either calendar years or fiscal years)?
3. From whom are brake shoes (a) for cars; (b) for diesel locomotives, purchased by the Canadian National Railways?
4. From whom are malleable castings (a) for refrigerator cars; (b) for box cars; (c) for cabooses, purchased by the Canadian National Railways?
5. To what extent do purchasing agents of the Canadian National Railways consider having manufactured in the shops of the Canadian National Railways all such items as those shops are capable of producing?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1, 2 and 5. The shops of the Canadian National Railways are operated primarily for repair and maintenance work and normally their capacity is only sufficient for this purpose. Specialized equipment and skills developed by individual outside manufacturers make it more economical to procure the great majority of the items required from them rather than attempt their production with railway maintenance facilities.

Any effort to determine what the shops of the C.N.R. are theoretically capable of producing would involve a detailed and costly examination of the more than 175,000 individual items in common usage on the system.

3. Dominion Brake Shoe Company, Limited —Montreal, Que. Monsarrat Machinery and Foundries, Limited—Riviere-du-Loup, Que.

Dominion Wheel and Foundries Limited—Toronto, Ont.

4. Smiths Falls Malleable Castings, Limited —Smiths Falls, Ont.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION—MINESWEEPERS

Mr. Hahn:

1. Has the Department of Defence Production recently let a contract for the construction of laminated pressurized wood keels for six minesweepers to a Bellingham, Washington, shipyard firm?

2. Was there a bid on this construction made by a British Columbia firm? If so, for what reason was it not awarded the contract?

Mr. Dickey:

1. No. However, on April 29, 1954, a contract was placed by Davie Shipbuilding Limited on Bellingham Shipyards, Bellingham, Wash., U.S.A., for one only laminated red oak keel with five to follow. Davie Shipbuilding Limited is the "lead yard" in the building of six MCB minesweepers for the Department of Defence Production. Laminated keels are regarded as a shipyard supply item, the procurement of which is the responsibility of the "lead yard".

2. A bid on this construction was submitted by American Fabricators (Canada) Limited, Bynne road, Vancouver, B.C. This firm serves as agent for Bellingham Shipyards, Bellingham, Wash., U.S.A. Since it is D.D.P. purchasing policy to buy direct from the manufacturer instead of through agents whenever possible in order to obtain lowest prices, this contract was placed direct with Bellingham Shipyards instead of with their agent American Fabricators (Canada) Limited.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BELL TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mr. Noseworthy:

1. Has the board of transport commissioners, the Department of Transport, or any other government department made any inquiry (a) regarding the number of potential Bell telephone subscribers unable to secure telephone service at the present time in (i) metropolitan Toronto area; (ii) the province of Ontario; (iii) other provinces of Canada served by the Bell Telephone Company; (b) whether there is a shortage of equipment for the provision of ample telephone service; (c) what types of equipment, if any, are in short supply; (d) whether any such shortage is caused by (i) lack of raw material; (ii) lack of manufacturing facilities; (iii) lack of manpower; (iv) the existence of a monopoly in the manufacture of wire and cable; (v) the existence of a monopoly in the field of telephone services?

2. If any such inquiries have been made, what are the findings of such inquiries?

3. If no such inquiries have been made, has the board of transport commissioners, or the Department of Transport the constitutional right to make such inquiries?

4. If so, will such inquiries be made?

5. If not, who has the right to make such inquiries?

HARBOUR EXPENDITURES

Mr. Nicholson:

How much has been spent by the federal government since 1945 on harbours at the following places: Halifax, Saint John, Montreal, Churchill, Vancouver?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING AND WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS ON AND AFTER MAY 31

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, May 31, 1954, until the end of the session, the house shall meet at eleven o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that, in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from 1.00 to 2.30 o'clock p.m., and that on Wednesday, June 2, 1954, and every Wednesday thereafter until the end of the session, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules as are now provided for other days.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION TO BE BROUGHT DOWN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before you proceed with the orders of the day may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in relation to the motion placed before us, if there is any further legislation or any further government business to be placed before us of which we are not yet aware?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No; I do not think there is any, Mr. Speaker, of which I have not already given notice in the house. I think I have already mentioned there might be legislation to repeal the National Physical Fitness Act. That is the only thing about which I am uncertain. I know of no more legislation I have not already disclosed to the house.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—THREATENED CONTEMPT OF COURT PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice of which I have not given him notice because the material only came into my possession a very short time ago. Has the Minister of Justice had the opportunity to consider the effect of the statement by the Chief Justice, Sir Albert Walsh, of Newfoundland, in which he threatened the Daily News of St. John's with possible contempt of court proceedings because of their publication of his statement of claim and extracts from certain affidavits in a civil action?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity of examining the statement to which my hon. friend refers, but in any event the subject matter of that statement and the action to be taken in respect of it, having to do with the administration of justice, would be a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this subject and the fact that a Criminal Code amendment is before us, may I point out to the Minister of Justice that there is an amendment which has been introduced into the Criminal Code calling for an appeal within the province.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very disagreeable for me at this time to have to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) but I feel that I am compelled to do so. He asked a question and a reply has been given. Now he is making a suggestion to the minister that might better be proposed by correspondence, or otherwise. I must insist on the rule to the effect that at this period questions are to be asked and there should be no debate on any one point. I am always confronted with this problem—although especially at this time I would like to see the Leader of the Opposition make his point because of a possible lack of further opportunity to make it between now and the end of the session—which is that if I allow the Leader of the Opposition to do this, then I must allow others to make similar representations on this point or on other points. Now, I do hope the Leader of the Opposition will understand my position and will, as he always does, co-operate with the Chair.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to debate what Your Honour has said although I will say, with respect, that I do not agree. The fact remains that it is very easy for me to put this in the form of a question. Will the minister give consideration to the possibility of an amendment to the Criminal Code which would define the ground on which contempt of court proceedings can be taken, and in doing so will he consider the extraordinary situation which would result from any contempt of court proceedings which deny the possibility of publication of civil proceedings which has been the accepted method at all times?

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Garson: Without implying any agreement with the point which my hon. friend has raised, I shall be glad to look into it.

GRAIN

MARKETING—REFERENCE TO CONFERENCE IN WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the house whether there is a Canadian delegation now in Washington engaged in talks regarding the marketing of grain, and is the purpose of the conference to prevent an unnecessary cut in the prices of other countries?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we frequently have conferences of the officers of the department with their opposite numbers in Washington discussing various matters and at the moment there are representatives of the department and the wheat board in Washington. Just what they are discussing I am not sure, but after their return, if there is anything of interest to the hon. member, I will make a statement.

COMMUNISM

ALLEGED COMMUNIST INFILTRATION INTO GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, there are two questions I would like to direct to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a statement made in the last few days by Mr. John Leopold, ex-superintendent of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, regarding the existence of communist infiltration into departments of government, among others, the departments of national defence, external affairs, and the national film board? If so, since such statements revealing the seriousness of the danger, what additional measures does the government intend to take in order to cope with the situation?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) for giving me notice of his two questions. The hon. member asked if my attention had been drawn to statements attributed to Mr. John Leopold, ex-superintendent of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police regarding instances of communist infiltration into government departments, among others being the departments of national defence, external affairs, and the national film board.

My attention was drawn to an article written by Peter Dempson and carried in the Toronto Telegram of April 23 last. I am informed that this article was based upon an informal interview which Mr. Dempson had with ex-superintendent Leopold. In that article no mention is made of infiltration into government departments. On the following day a more or less similar article was carried in the Ottawa Citizen, written by Mr. Frank Swanson. Mr. Swanson had, I am informed, contacted ex-superintendent Leopold by telephone and secured his agreement to using the material already published in the Telegram. There is a reference in this Citizen article to infiltration and, while ex-superintendent Leopold does not remember being questioned on this particular point, I would draw attention to the fact that the Citizen reference to this item is by no means as positive as the question of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) suggests, and I quote:

> He was asked if he thought communists were active in government departments or agencies such as national defence, external affairs, national research council or the national film board.
> "It's possible", he said. "They would be 'plants' or employees who had become 'converts' to communism."

It is on the basis of material such as this that I think the article in Le Petit Journal to which my hon. friend refers was made up. My attention had not been previously drawn to the article in Le Petit Journal of May 30 but ex-superintendent Leopold states that he had not been interviewed by this paper. I therefore have no doubt that the item in that paper stems from the articles published previously in the Toronto Telegram and the Ottawa Citizen.

The various agencies of the government dealing with internal security are alert to the danger inherent in the infiltration of government departments by communists and procedures designed to detect such individuals have been in effect for years. I do not think that the casual statement attributed to ex-superintendent Leopold, which merely refers to infiltration as a possibility, need cause us to alter our present practices. The possibility of infiltration is something that security authorities and the government itself have been keenly alive to for a long time.

Mr. Dufresne: May I ask a supplementary question of the minister? In view of this statement from ex-superintendent Leopold, would it be possible for the minister to investigate or would it be possible to have certain contact with the ex-superintendent in order to find out whether his assertions are true?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I thought that I had made it clear at three or four points in my previous reply that they were based upon checks that we had made with ex-superintendent Leopold.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, the government said they are quite aware of conditions and that they have been aware of them for years. It is not many years ago since the wife—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferguson: I should like to ask this question. Is the Minister of Justice aware that within a very few years the wife of an avowed communist was working in the late prime minister Mackenzie King's office, that this fact was brought to his attention, but that he did nothing about it for months?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Ferguson: That again proves that they are not very alert.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SYSTEM-WIDE LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport supplementary to the exchange of question and answer between us a week ago today. On that occasion the minister will recall that he expressed the hope—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: I am referring to the answer to my question of last week in which the minister expressed the hope that we were at the end of the lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways. In view of that hope which the minister expressed and in view of the fact that further lay-offs have been announced for tomorrow in Winnipeg,—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Knowles: —is there not something the minister can do to prevent these lay-offs from taking place?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has succeeded in getting his speech on the record. All I can say in reply is what I have already stated, namely that the management of the affairs of the Canadian National Railways is in the hands of that company. They have indicated that some time in the future —I did not notice that it was tomorrow; I am sorry to hear that it will be tomorrow— some 60 people will be laid off in the western region. The reason that has been indicated to me for these lay-offs is the reduction in traffic. I indicated earlier that the traffic of the Canadian National Railways compares very favourably with that of American railways and with that of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as does their employment position. It is simply because of the reduction in traffic that they find they have to lay these men off. Again I express the hope, as I did a week ago today, that this will be the last of these lay-offs.

TRADE

TURKEYS—IMPORTATIONS FROM UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It is further to the question that I asked him on May 19 with regard to the importation of turkeys into British Columbia. At that time he indicated he might have a statement to make at another date. Would he indicate what that statement might be, if he has one now?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received the information but I will make inquiries.

POLIOMYELITIS

DISTRIBUTION OF VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he is in a position to answer the question I asked yesterday with regard to polio vaccine for provinces such as Manitoba and Saskatchewan?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member asked me this question yesterday but I was not here. However, my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said he would direct the question to me, as he has done. I am sure that the hon. gentleman has already received a good bit of information from the outstanding address given in this building about two hours ago by Dr. Defries, who is one of Canada's outstanding scientists and directors of medical research. I can say that we have been kept fully informed of the trial being conducted in the United States. The vaccine in question is just in the trial stage and no final assessment will be possible for many months. The dominion council of health made up of the ten provincial deputy ministers of health are now meeting with us in Ottawa and this matter is being further discussed. The decision in every case rests not with the federal government but with each province. Each province will decide whether or not to accept the vaccine for trial purposes.

FERRY SERVICE

STEVESTON-GULF ISLANDS—CONTINUATION OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Public Works. Can arrangements be made for the ferry Lady Rose to operate out of Steveston from the government wharf there in order that service may be continued to the gulf islands?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am taking notice of my hon. friend's question and will try to give him an answer as soon as possible.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $263,003,811, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items to be voted, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition thereto, a sum not exceeding $1,413,731.92, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 19, 199, 202, 203, 218, 221, 223, 225, 227, 231, 431, of the said estimates be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955.

He said: Mr. Chairman, the proposed bill is the usual bill at this time of the year and will provide, first, for one-twelfth of all items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1954-55, and second, an additional one-twelfth of eleven special items to provide for services of a seasonal nature on which the heaviest payments fall due in the early part of the year. That includes the items respecting legislation, some of the items respecting the experimental farms, items respecting the sending out of survey parties, and the item concerning the international trade fair which opens very shortly.

The general proportion of one-twelfth for all services is intended to provide for all necessary ordinary requirements to the end of June. The additional proportion requested is, as I have said, for certain special items of a kind for which it has been usual to request an additional proportion in excess of the normal one-twelfth for the month of June. In no instance is the total amount of any item being released. The form of the bill is the same as the bill passed at the end of May, 1952, which was the last time it was necessary to obtain interim supply for the month of June.

The passing of the bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize and discuss any item in the estimates which will come up for consideration from time to time throughout the balance of the session, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister will remember that when interim supply was granted on March 29 there were certain special fractional adjustments of certain items to which he referred at that time. I take it that the fractional amounts now being taken are such as to dovetail with the amounts then asked for and fit into the whole scheme of the year.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. The previous supply bill covered a total of something in excess of $530 million. This bill will provide for an additional $264 million odd and, as my hon. friend said, the additional items dovetail with those which were passed in the first interim supply bill.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I propose to avail myself of the opportunity presented by these supplementary estimates covering the various departments of government to deal with a matter to which I referred earlier and which of course relates to one of the departments affected by any supplementary supply. I raise this question because I believe it is one of the utmost importance, particularly with respect to the freedom of the press in Canada. I have had a message sent to the office of the Minister of Justice that I am raising this matter, but in any event the Prime Minister is here and I wish to place the facts before the government in the hope that consideration may be given to the general effect of a situation such as results from the statement to which I refer.

On May 18, as reported in the press of St. John's, Newfoundland, on May 19, a statement was issued by the chief justice of Newfoundland, Sir Albert Walsh.

The Chairman: Order. I have been waiting to apprehend the purport of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. I would remind him that we are not discussing supplementary estimates as he indicated in his opening words. I would also remind him that this is not a motion to go into supply on which a grievance can be raised, and that what we are actually considering is an interim supply resolution. I think the discussion should perhaps be limited to questions concerning interim supply.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I used the words "supplementary estimates" inadvertently and I should like to correct the record. We are of course dealing with interim supply. At this stage of the proceedings we are called upon to deal with both. I was quite aware that we were dealing with interim supply and the use of the term "supplementary estimates" was simply an inadvertent choice of words relating to another matter that has been before us.

In dealing with interim supply we are dealing with one-twelfth of the requirements of all the departments of government, and I submit therefore that there can be no question about the propriety of raising at this point a matter that relates to any department embraced in the interim supply estimates. While the circumstance does not ordinarily arise, I submit that in no way challenges the propriety of raising such a matter at this time. I was referring to the statement issued by the chief justice of Newfoundland on May 18 which is reported in full in the press of St. John's, Newfoundland, on May 19 of this year. I wish to quote from the report in the Daily News of St. John's of May 19. Mr. Chairman, since I can hardly hear my own words because of certain discussions that are taking place, I assume you will have difficulty, so I am pausing until it will be possible for you to hear.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: The statement issued by the chief justice of Newfoundland was supported by the other members of the supreme court bench of Newfoundland, Sir Brian Dunfield and Mr. Justice Winter. The reference is to discussions that have taken place in connection with a matter that has been drawn to the attention of the people of Canada over the past weeks and is known generally to them because of statements that have been made in connection with those proceedings. The statement refers to the principle that everyone who is accused must be tried on the evidence produced in the court and there only, and so far as possible without prejudice of any kind. The statement then goes on to point out that anything which would prejudice that trial might be contempt of court. The statement then gives this broad and embracing warning:

> We now therefore issue a clear warning to all concerned, and this includes counsel, newspapers, radio stations, public men, indeed everyone, that this court will be on the watch for anything which may come within the classification of contempt of court, that is to say, anything said or done in public which may tend to prejudice fair trial, and that anyone transgressing proper principles will be regarded as having been warned and having done it in spite of warning.

I then go on to the specific reference to what was published in the Daily News and I quote from the statement:

The judges have noted in the Daily News of today's date an article under the heading "Judge Dunfield issues order for arrest of Dr. Alfred A. Valdmanis." In this article the statement of claim in an action before this court is published together with abstracts of affidavits filed in the matter. It appears to the judges that there may be a contempt of court in this not only in so far as the conduct of the civil case is concerned but also in the conduct of the criminal proceedings against a person who is under arrest, in that certain of the matters which may be evidence have been published in advance of the trial.

I am availing myself of this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to raise this matter at this time because there has been great concern about the extent to which judges, who after all are appointed by the government of Canada, have exercised the very loose authority in regard to contempt of court proceedings. In many cases this authority has been exercised in such a way that responsible members of the press must have great difficulty in knowing exactly what should be or could be defined as contempt of court.

I need not refer to several recent occasions—

The Chairman: Order. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition realizes that I have been extending, I am afraid, too much leniency. He has drawn to my attention that this resolution embraces one-twelfth of the item for the Department of Justice. I do not believe, however, that gives him the right to the same broad discussion as would be the case on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Justice. I was hoping that the Leader of the Opposition would limit himself to a very short discussion or preferably confine his remarks to the terms of the resolution before us.

Mr. Drew: I submit that this is a proper matter to be brought before the committee at this stage. At this moment we are dealing with a request for the provision of interim supply. We are dealing with a request for the allowance to various departments of one-twelfth of their requirements, a very substantial sum of money. While it may not be customary, on many occasions, to avail oneself of this privilege, I submit that there can be no question about the right of any hon. member, on the first item of interim supply, to raise a question that is important in relation to one of the departments that is receiving one-twelfth of the amount which it will require for the coming year.

It is upon that basis I am at this time raising this point. I do so because I wish to place before the Minister of Justice in this way, and I submit properly in this way, a situation that I am sure is a matter of concern to him as the custodian of justice generally throughout Canada. I wish to draw his attention to something of which all hon. members are aware, and that is the discussion there has been throughout Canada in regard to the effect that many of the proceedings which have been taken already by way of contempt of court have had upon the freedom of the press. I point out in this case a direct threat of possible contempt of court proceedings has been issued by the chief justice of Newfoundland against the Newfoundland Daily News and, may I add, also against the Telegram in regard to another matter.

I wish to submit to the Minister of Justice for consideration the possibility that in some way there still could be an amendment during this session that would define the basis upon which contempt of court proceedings can be taken in so far as they affect any subject matter under the jurisdiction of this parliament, and I would submit even in those matters affecting the provincial authorities because of the concern of the Minister of Justice and the government with justice to all Canadians. Even if the matter were outside the limited realm of federal jurisdiction, still it would be very natural for him to raise the question as to how the whole subject of contempt of court proceedings might be brought under some clearer definition.

I am sure that the Minister of Justice knows full well, from his wide experience, that civil proceedings are published with complete freedom throughout the whole of Canada. If a veil can be placed over civil proceedings, because it happens that the attorney general of any province decides to institute civil proceedings simultaneously with criminal proceedings, then by that device the justice that is made for the whole of the people through open public trial might very well be denied. I submit that this is an extraordinary statement. This is a direct threat in relation to the publication of civil proceedings because there happens to be at the same time a criminal action pending.

After all, if the attorney general of Newfoundland had any concern about any matter of this kind, there was no necessity to start civil proceedings contemporaneously with criminal proceedings that had been instituted by the same officer. I think it will be seen that this could produce an extraordinary situation in which the justice of an open trial could be denied to Canadian citizens. I submit, therefore, for the consideration of the Minister of Justice the possibility of examining this situation and discussing the circumstances, by letter or otherwise, with the chief justice of Newfoundland, and of seeking some way in which a better understanding of what really constitutes contempt of court in cases of this kind may be reached.

Here is a case where not only the accused but those who are responsible for the accusations should both desire all the publicity that is reasonable and sensible. I might point out that publicity is an essential part of even-handed justice in this country. Publicity is a safeguard to the accused, just as it is to those who institute proceedings, whether they be criminal or civil. Unless there is a very clear case of an attempt to distort the processes of justice, then I think that there most certainly should be no attempt to start contempt of court proceedings.

I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the Minister of Justice, that this blanket warning to all citizens of Newfoundland that they must be careful what they say is a unique announcement in the history of Canadian jurisprudence. It is in that light I raise it now and urge the Minister of Justice to give this his careful consideration, merely with the thought that through his wide offices he may make sure that neither may those who are responsible for the prosecution or the institution of civil proceedings have their rights limited by secrecy, nor an accused man have his possibility of freedom in any way impaired by binding a trial in this country with terms of secrecy.

Mr. Garson: As I indicated previously on the orders of the day, Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to go further into this matter with the attorney general of Newfoundland to ascertain if there is any substantial foundation for the impression the Leader of the Opposition apparently has obtained from a perusal of the Daily News of Newfoundland of May 19. Pending that further investigation, I think it would be only fair to Sir Albert Walsh if, instead of there being upon the record only the interpretation my hon. friend has placed upon Sir Albert's remarks, I placed upon the record for comparison the actual statement that was attributed to Sir Albert Walsh in the Daily News. This is what he is reported as having said:

> Under British law it is a principle that every one who is accused must be tried on the evidence produced in the court and there only, and, so far as possible, without prejudice of any kind; and the court has ample powers, and will use them, drastically if necessary, to ensure this.

Well, Mr. Chairman, up to that point, I for one would not dissent from those truisms. It continues:

> There may be places where trial by newspaper and trial by radio are tolerated, but this court will see, to the extent of its powers, that no such practice arises in this jurisdiction, and that all cases are tried as routine cases.

Does my hon. friend object to this principle? If he does, then I must disagree with him. I myself would endorse it.

Mr. Drew: Since my hon. friend has asked a question, I shall be very happy to submit to him not merely the reading of the report from the newspaper but the transcript of the statement in court of Chief Justice Walsh, which I have before me in full. I shall be happy, if he wishes me to do so, to place it all on the record.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister asked a question, and you are making a speech.

Mr. Drew: The chairman may need assistance, but I have not heard him asking for it from the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Chevrier: You were asked a question, and you are making a speech.

Mr. Drew: Will the Minister of Transport remember that there is a chairman to whom he should direct his remarks—that is, if he has any remarks worth hearing.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend should follow that advice himself.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition would confine his remarks to the point. I asked his co-operation some time ago when I indicated that I thought this entire subject was somewhat out of order on a resolution of this kind.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I was merely offering to put this on the record.

The Chairman: Order. I do hope that this discussion may terminate shortly, and that we may resume the business which I feel is properly before the house. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Drew: No. I say now—

Mr. Garson: Just a minute, on a point of order. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the minister did not have the floor. He sat down and was waiting. But if the Minister of Justice wishes, let him speak.

The Chairman: I understand the Minister of Justice sat down, as he should properly have done, when the Leader of the Opposition rose.

Mr. Drew: No. He sat in his seat—

The Chairman: And if he still wishes to have the floor, I think he still has it.

Mr. Garson: I asked a question and naturally sat down while it was being answered. My hon. friend should not mistake my courtesy.

Mr. Drew: Well, does the minister want to have an answer?

An hon. Member: Speak to the Chair.

Mr. Garson: I understood my hon. friend had replied at some length.

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. Garson: But I have the right to complete the reading of the quotation. If the hon. Leader of the Opposition wishes to supplement it, he will have the opportunity.

Then, to go on from where I left off:

> The conduct of proceedings in re A. Valdmanis has been very unfortunate up to the present. There has been a great deal said about these cases in the papers and upon the radio, and elsewhere. There appears to be on all hands a disposition to give these cases a political flavour.
> We now therefore issue a clear warning to all concerned, and this includes counsel, newspapers, radio stations, public men, indeed every one, that this court will be on the watch for anything which may come within the classification of contempt of court, that is to say, anything said or done in public which may tend to prejudice fair trial, and that anyone transgressing proper principles will be regarded as having been warned and having done it in spite of warning. This applies to both sides.

Now, I think that up to that point—and perhaps my hon. friend has other material which will shed further light upon the matter—but up to that point, if there appears to have been any reason for supposing that contempt of court was likely to take place, the chief of the court might perhaps have been open to criticism if he had not taken the steps that he thought were necessary to ensure that the accused would get that fair trial, to which he is entitled under British justice.

That being so, I am rather at a loss to know what my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition thinks we can do about the matter in this parliament. Because, as I am sure he is well aware, the administration of justice is wholly the responsibility of the provinces, under the British North America Act; and this statement is objected to, as I understand it, by the Leader of the Opposition as being an improper act in the course of the administration of justice in Newfoundland.

[Mr. Drew.]

Now, it may be that he thinks—and I think he made reference to the fact—that we should make a change in our law to deal with the matter which he has raised in this particular case. In making that suggestion I think the Leader of the Opposition has perhaps overlooked the fact that when we were considering Bill No. 7, an act to consolidate the Criminal Code, we provided in those cases of contempt committed ex facie, that is, outside the court, by newspapers, by radio commentators or by citizens, something that had not been provided for before, and that is—

The Chairman: Order. The Minister of Justice is now discussing the Criminal Code. I really do not think I can allow a discussion of this kind under the resolution now before us.

Mr. Garson: May I, Mr. Chairman, on this point of order, make this point clear, that I entirely concur in what you say, Mr. Chairman, that this is all out of order. But if my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition in what he has said is purporting to discuss anything that comes within the purview of this parliament, then it must be the Criminal Code; because that is the only connection we have here with the question he has raised.

Mr. Drew: The minister has asked two or three questions and made a general statement—

The Chairman: Order. This shows the predicament in which a chairman finds himself in a discussion of this kind. The chairman must wait until he ascertains the purport of an hon. member's remarks, or he might be doing an injustice by interrupting him before he should be interrupted.

On the other hand, after waiting to hear what an hon. member has to say, we find that we are launched on a debate. As I indicated earlier, after I had ascertained the question the Leader of the Opposition was raising, I pointed out that I thought it was not in order on a resolution of this kind, and requested his co-operation.

The debate has now proceeded to some length, and I think it should be terminated. I must now rule that any further discussion on this subject is out of order on this resolution.

Mr. Drew: I am not challenging your ruling, Mr. Chairman, because the matter is before the minister. But I point out, in reference to the comments of the Minister of Justice, that the paragraph which he quoted in full from the Daily News of Newfoundland does refer also to the conduct of criminal proceedings. And it was in relation to that part of this particular question that I suggested possibly this might come within the ambit of the authority of the Minister of Justice.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Stick: On a question of privilege—and I do not want to go into the legal aspects of the debate which has been going on for a considerable time—but coming from Newfoundland, and knowing—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stick: On a point of privilege; would you hear my point of privilege before making a decision on it?

The Chairman: Would the hon. member please state his question of privilege; because if he is speaking on the same subject as the previous two speakers I would need to be sure that he is speaking on a question of privilege, and not taking part in this debate.

Mr. Stick: The point of privilege is this, that as I understand the debate that has taken place thus far, the integrity of the supreme court of Newfoundland has been called in question; and I do not want any impression of that kind to be abroad here.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stick: I was hoping the Leader of the Opposition would not say that.

The Chairman: Order: I have listened sufficiently to be able to say I do not think this is a question of privilege within our rules, and I must rule accordingly.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I would point out that not one word of what I said was in any way a reflection on the courts of Newfoundland. This is the highest authority in Canada, and within the ambit of the jurisdiction of parliament it is for us to say what laws should be passed. My suggestion merely related to the possibility of defining a law which was entirely within the authority of this parliament.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

443. Departmental administration, $1,456,640.

The Deputy Chairman: We are dealing with item No. 443, to be found on page 59. Details will be found on page 509.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to take a few minutes of the committee's time to deal now with a number of questions that were asked of me some days ago when we were considering the estimates of the Department of Transport? Some clarification was asked in regard to a number of objects in the estimates, which I had not dealt with, particularly those having to do with increases. I should like to deal with those and other matters arising out of the consideration of these estimates. I was asked for an explanation of the increase of $90,000 in telephones and telegrams. In the statement which I gave on the estimates I referred to the national facsimile circuit established for the accumulation of weather data at Dorval. Inasmuch as this circuit was established during 1953-54, it was necessary to provide funds for only a part of the year, whereas today we must provide funds for a full year's operation, and this accounts for an additional $157,000. Then, too, we must allow for an extra $45,000 for air traffic control purposes in order to cope with the continuing expansion of air transport. These two major increases are only partially offset by the decrease of $123,000 through the sale of the government telephone and telegraph service.

Then there was the question having to do with the stationery item. There was an increase there of $106,000. A major part of this increase is in the meteorological services, because of two requirements, the necessity of supplying special facsimile paper for national defence equipment and secondly, the need of establishing punch card equipment at Toronto for the compilation of weather data.

The increase in repairs and upkeep of equipment, namely $150,000, was mentioned. Approximately $100,000 of that is because we have more ships. We have added the C.G.S. d'Iberville and other ships, and additional equipment repair is required because of that.

An explanation was demanded of the increase of $1,261,000 in deficits. Well, that is due first of all to an increase in two items of deficits. One is $730,000 additional for the North Sydney-Port aux Basques ferry operation, and the other is $581,000 for the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made quite a lengthy speech and his suggestion was that the Department of Public Works could do a number of things that were being done by the Department of Transport. If the hon. member had given the matter any reflection I am sure he would not have made the speech he did. I say this of course with all due respect to him because I know that generally he spends a great deal of time not only on the consideration of legislation but also on the estimates. I do say seriously that if he had considered the position at all he would not have made the suggestion he did. I say that for these reasons. First of all, let me deal with the major projects which are under consideration in the estimates. I refer chiefly to the Canso causeway. The Canso causeway is a facility that is replacing the ferry service of the Canadian National which has been in operation there for years. It is a facility that has always been associated with the Department of Transport. These ferry services were becoming obsolete, and the Department of Transport determined that an investigation should be made as to what was the best method of crossing the strait of Canso, whether it was by tunnel, high or low-level bridge, or by causeway, and it was the engineers of the Department of Transport, in co-operation with the engineers of the department of public works in Nova Scotia, who considered the problem.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The point I wish to make is this. This is essentially a water and railway operation with which we, and I say this respectfully, and we alone are competent to deal, and that is the reason why the Department of Transport has been charged with that responsibility.

The same can be said about the Port aux Basques-North Sydney facilities which, again, are part of a railway and water operation. In fact, the Railway Act says so, and the act of union with Newfoundland said that the movements by sea from Port aux Basques to North Sydney should be considered as a railway operation. That is the reason we have done it.

The same argument is applicable with reference to the two tunnels under the Lachine canal. These are navigational projects and it would be impossible to have that kind of operation entrusted to other departments. This is a Department of Transport operation because the control of the flow of water is involved, though I should not be insisting so much on this because over and above that the statute is quite clear. It is laid down in the statute that this is the work of the Department of Transport. If my hon. friend looks at section 9 of the Department of Transport Act, chapter 79 of the statutes for 1936, he will find this, and I quote:

> The minister shall direct the construction, maintenance and repair of all railways and canals, and of all other works appertaining or incident thereto, that are constructed or maintained at the expense of Canada and are placed under his management and control.

So that there is no doubt about it. Even if the Minister of Transport did not want to do this and wanted to turn it over to the Department of Public Works the act would have to be amended before he could do so.

Furthermore, why should he want to amend the act? Why should parliament want to amend the act? Because there are in the Department of Transport competent engineers whose lives have been spent on such navigational matters. In fact, the deputy minister of transport is a former superintending engineer of the Welland canal. He was there when the Welland canal was built and there is no other man I know of in any of the other departments who has the experience he has had in the construction of canals, locks and the like.

Therefore, I think it would be a retrograde step to refer to any other department the projects that were brought to the attention of the committee by the hon. member. And what I have said with reference to these projects applies with equal force to projects having to do with aviation.

The construction and repair of radio facilities, meteorological facilities and all facilities having to do with the air services branch are of a highly technical nature and I am sure my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) would agree with me to the fullest extent that this is a matter with which his department is not competent to deal and which should be undertaken by this specialized group.

Again, the matter is clearly set out in the Aeronautics Act, section 3 paragraph (c), which states:

> 3. It is the duty of the minister
> (c) to construct and maintain all government aerodromes and air stations, including all plant, machinery and buildings necessary for their efficient equipment and upkeep;

There was another matter raised by the hon. member. He asked: "Why is the St. Lawrence waterway being built by the Department of Transport?" Well, my hon. friend knows full well that we passed legislation two years ago authorizing the construction of the waterway from Montreal to lake Erie, either in their Canadian territory or jointly between Canada and the United States, by a crown authority to be known as the St. Lawrence seaway authority. Parliament has authorized that construction, not by the Department of Transport, but by the authority in question.

Then my hon. friend raised the question of tenders and stated that the Department of Transport was now the only department where tenders were not opened publicly. There have been reasons for that in the past. I do not know whether these reasons still exist. I personally have an open mind on the subject. It may be advisable to follow the practice which was followed by other departments and it may be well, at some future date, that tenders in the Department of Transport as well as in all other departments should be opened publicly. There is certainly much to be said in favour of that argument, although there are some things to be said against it.

Mr. Green: What can be said against it?

Mr. Chevrier: Many things, but I hope my hon. friend will forgive me if I do not deal with them now. But let me say this. Because of the feeling that exists among certain officers of the department I would like to have this matter studied, and I would like to have a committee of the officers of my department look into it, review it, and report to me so that by the time the next session of parliament comes around we will be in a position to make a decision on it.

Then there was a question which seemed to occupy the attention of my hon. friend and other hon. members in the house perhaps more than anything else. That was the question having to do with the Canadian merchant fleet, and questions were asked repeatedly as to what was being done about it.

Well, I do not think that I should be asked to repeat now what I said during an earlier debate at quite some length, and give the reasons for the action by the government in so far as the fleet is concerned. But I would like to put on record some figures and facts because a number of highly exaggerated statements have been made during the course of the debate on that part of my estimates.

Some hon. members have claimed that the fleet has disappeared entirely. Well, as my hon. friend the member for Vancouver-Quadra knows, and as I am sure other hon. members will admit, this is somewhat of an exaggeration. The figures I have up to May 13 show that there were a total of 46 ocean-going ships on the Canadian registry amounting to a total of 316,911 gross tons. I would also like to add certain other figures because hon. members seem to be of the opinion that that constitutes the entire fleet of Canada. The house knows that is not the case. We have, as I just said, 317,000 gross tons of ocean-going shipping, 181,000 tons in coastal trade, 343,000 tons in lakes and canals, and 479,000 tons in upper-lake shipping, or a total of 1,320,000 tons exclusive of what I am told amounts to about 700,000 tons transferred to the United Kingdom under the transfer plan.

Mr. Green: Can the minister break down the figure of the 46 ships into tankers and dry-cargo vessels?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot now, but I will put them on the record. Now, dealing a little further with that problem, I would not want the house to get the impression that the government has done nothing for the merchant shipping industry, because the truth is that it has done a great deal. I do not want to repeat what I put on Hansard in November of last year, but if any hon. member is interested in the policy of the government with reference to the merchant fleet he can look up my remarks on that occasion.

However, in order to deal briefly and quickly with the position, let me remind the house that we approved a shipping replacement plan which was to allow a measure of relief from the flag covenant. Then we granted the privilege to owners of certain funds held in escrow under the plan to assign them to others. Then for a period of one year we granted a subsidy of $3 million to a number of ships. This was paid to the industry for the years 1949 and 1950. Then we approved of special transfer arrangements which were agreed on with the United Kingdom authorities, with some difficulty. This year we liberalized the policy governing the use of escrow funds whereby they may now be used outside of Canada.

In November I explained to the house—and I repeat now—that if we were to follow these suggestions made by certain groups outside of this chamber and in it we would have to subsidize the shipping industry to the tune of about $5 million. I think that the minimum number of ships that was taken at that time was, say 50 at $100,000 each, which would mean an annual subsidy of about $5 million. With the position such as we see it today, where costs in Canada and those in other countries including the United Kingdom do not seem to be levelling off, there is no way of seeing on the horizon any end to this subsidy. But even that subsidy, were it alone in itself, might be attractive to the government were it not for the fact that even in the minds of most of the owners these ships are obsolete or are about to become obsolete. If this is so, having subsidized them from an operational standpoint, we would find ourselves in the position of having to subsidize them from a capital or construction standpoint. What would that mean? I gave the figure of $200 million. Does the committee think that figures of this kind would commend themselves to the house?

I am not at all surprised at the speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway who, coming from the city from which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra comes, took an exactly opposite view.

Mr. Green: He is a socialist.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, he does not take that view because he is a socialist. He takes that because he thinks this is protection. He thinks that the time has now come when we should cease to subsidize industry of this kind and when we should cease to bottle-feed certain industries, because that is what we would be doing if we in Canada were to accept the kind of obligation to which I referred. I am not saying now that it is not possible to give some assistance. I hope that it will be possible to give some assistance, as I shall mention later on. But I do not see how this government could subsidize the shipping industry, to the extent that has been asked of the government by the various organizations that have asked for a subsidy, without subsidizing many other industries.

We have been told that we should increase the tariff in order to come to the assistance of a number of other industries. If we do that, I can see no reason why we should not come to the assistance of the shipping industry. However, I am still hopeful that we shall be able to find a method whereby we can be of assistance to the shipping industry. Whether it will be in the form suggested in the policy laid down earlier in November or whether it will be in some other form, I am not able to say at this time. All I can say is that up until now there has been no change in the policy which was announced in November. I should perhaps add to what I have said this comment. That policy is under continual and constant review and I am hopeful that, from the study and review which is being made, it will be possible to assist the industry.

I want to say something about coastal shipping because that is an important matter. It was raised by a number of hon. members. It was said that Canada, for instance, is the only country in the world which permits foreign ships to come in and ply her coastal trade. That is not so. There are many other countries that permit coasting along their shores. In the first place, there are countries such as the United Kingdom, Belgium, The Netherlands, Norway and South Africa which have no restrictions whatsoever and which do not restrict in any fashion whatsoever their coastal shipping. I would not want the committee to think that there is no restriction on coastal shipping in Canada, even with reference to British and United Kingdom vessels, because there are serious restrictions. For instance no foreign ships may engage in our coastal trade but only British ships in the broad commonwealth sense of the word. We have a commonwealth shipping agreement with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries whereby there is a certain liberalization of trade between those countries. But the opening of our coasts to foreign ships is restricted. Then, in the second place, even among British ships, ships that are not British built must pay a duty of 25 per cent if they seek to engage in the coastal trade of Canada. As my colleague the Minister of National Revenue knows, this duty runs into a substantial amount of money.

I know that my friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South and other hon. members here are keenly interested in that subject. I also know that it is a serious and complicated problem, because a number of factors enter into it, such as the shipping interests, the shipbuilding interests, and the interests of trade and commerce. Again there is a certain protectionism that enters into this field. I do not think it is going to be possible to get unanimity of opinion, even among the experts, unless we give this matter more careful study. I hope it will be possible for me to make a statement in the House of Commons at a later date. I hope it will be possible to find a method whereby we can study the whole question of coastal shipping in this country, the effect which the construction of the great lakes-St. Lawrence seaway may have upon coastal shipping, and the effect it may have on the various commodities that move up and down the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river. With that statement I hope it will be possible to allay the fears that have been expressed here and elsewhere.

May I say just one word further. The hon. member for Cape Breton South was extremely generous in his remarks with reference to the Canso causeway and the name for it. This is not the first time the matter has been raised. Then again I think his speech in the chamber has been instrumental in having all sorts of letters and recommendations sent to me with regard to names. I think there is no better name to give to a project of that kind than the name which already exists. While there will perhaps be other recommendations that should be taken greater cognizance of than the one I am going to make, it would seem to me that no better name could be given to it than that of the Canso causeway. The gut has that name. The strait has that name. I think there is even a small port bearing that name. If my recollection serves me right, I think there is a section of railway bearing the name of Canso. That name is found in the whole region. To my mind it would be unfortunate if the name were not carried on in some form.

There is one other thing I should like to say as the result of a remark made by the senior member for Halifax. He dealt with a number of things but more particularly with a matter which I thought deserved some reply, namely, the condition of the lightkeepers in the isolated areas of Canada. I think there is a great deal to be said for what the senior member for Halifax implied in his statements and also what other hon. members have implied with respect to our lightkeepers. I remember a statement being made in the house about the lightkeeper on Sable island by the former senior member for Halifax who is now in the other place. The reason I mention it is that during the Easter recess I took a trip on the C.G.S. d'Iberville and visited some isolated spots.

This was the first trip made by the d'Iberville this spring for the purpose of bringing supplies to the lightkeepers at Ile Perroquet, at West Point and North Point on the north shore of Anticosti island, and while this was not my first trip to West Point on Anticosti island but my third, I believe, I got a pretty good idea of the life that these people have to lead. I think that we in the Department of Transport will have to give serious consideration to the modernization of the equipment and facilities with which these lightkeepers are called upon to work. Following my visit, particularly the visit I made to lightkeeper Duguay and his family at West Point on the north shore of Anticosti island, I have already asked my officers to give consideration to that suggestion, and of course such consideration will have to apply not only to the one station but to all stations under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. I am not making a statement now as to future policy. I am simply saying that we are giving the matter careful consideration. I have spoken five minutes more than I intended to, but I hope I will not have to answer more questions.

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the general grade level railway crossing situation today. Owing to the rapid growth of many new communities in the dominion, a program that was planned to remove and correct a menace to travel on our highways has now proved inadequate. Instead of being overtaken, the problem is now getting away from us. More hazards are being created with the increase in the number of level crossings and the sharp advance in the tempo of our national life.

I am measuring the magnitude of this menace in the dominion by knowledge gained through familiarity with certain areas, and I am quite sure that corresponding conditions must exist in other municipalities. The continued and mounting toll of fatalities and of the permanently crippled should be given serious consideration by the house. For example, in the municipality of Scarborough, which forms a part of the ridings of Danforth and York-Scarborough, four persons have been killed and four have been permanently injured since the first of the year. The question now arises whether this condition, which I understand is being reviewed at the present time, has been handled with the necessary energy and determination to overcome an apparent delinquency.

The majority of the provinces have established organizations for the prevention of accidents in industry and on the Queen's highways. They have set up programs to encourage safe driving, and they have provided incentives to use safe methods and processes in the manufacturing and construction industries. However, under the railway level crossing fund administration it appears to be the formula that a number of accidents must take place at a level crossing before any consideration of the hazards will be undertaken. Their policy is accident accumulation instead of accident prevention by hazard elimination.

This callous indifference to the lessening of the causes of accidents should soon come to an end. Section 265 of the Railway Act, chapter 234 of the Revised Statutes of 1952, provides for the setting apart from the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of $1 million each year for six years, from 1951 to 1957, to aid in the actual construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public in respect of crossings at rail level, on the basis of 40 per cent from the fund, 30 per cent from the railways and 30 per cent from the municipalities, the cost not to exceed $150,000 for any one crossing.

I would ask the house to compare the urgent appeals made by the municipalities that greater effort be made to give them more money from the fund to remove hazards with the amount actually spent. As found on page 19 of the 1952-53 report of the Department of Transport, out of the last appropriation of $1 million only $457,000 has been used. Not half of the appropriation provided was used, and even if the whole amount were used it would be insufficient to give the necessary protection, safety and convenience to the Canadian public as set out in the act.

I now ask: Do you not believe that the municipalities have a justifiable complaint against the board's parsimony and indifference? Here is an opportunity staring us in the face to accomplish a twofold purpose.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I rise on a point of order. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member. I know he is a new member and I have not interrupted him so far, but I should like to call to his attention that the government referred this whole matter to the board of transport commissioners for study. The hon. member is making a number of recommendations which I am sure are all to the good, but the matter is under review by the board and while it is under review by the board I do not think it should be discussed in the house. The board of transport commissioners has held hearings all across Canada in the course of its highway crossing and grade level investigation. If the hon. member is going to be allowed to make the speech that he is making, I am sure other hon. members will want to do the same thing, and in fairness to other hon. members I think I should raise this point.

[Mr. Small.]

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, unless this particular crossing has been actually recommended to the board of transport commissioners and is under study by them I submit there is nothing in the minister's point of order. His estimates contain a reference to the grade crossing fund. It is a statutory item and the only opportunity a member has to discuss it is on the first item of the department. Certainly the minister cannot rise in his seat and say now that because the board is looking into the question of highway crossings nobody can say anything about any highway crossing.

Mr. Chevrier: I said no such thing. May I say that I do not take umbrage at my hon. friend's statement that there is nothing in the point of order raised by me; my hon. friend is free to make that statement if he wants to. But the point I am making is that the subject matter raised by the hon. member is under investigation, and in my humble opinion he has no right to deal with it. He can talk about individual crossings as long as he likes. There is nothing to stop him from doing that, but he is dealing with recommendations to increase the grade crossing fund, to increase the amount of payment, and so on. These are matters that have been given to the board for study, and I do not think the hon. member should do that. If he wants to deal with an individual crossing, let him do so. I think he has done that pretty well.

Mr. Knowles: This is an important point, and I imagine, Mr. Chairman, that you are trying to figure out how you are going to handle it. It seems to me that the point of the rule that we must not discuss matters that have been referred to the board of transport commissioners is that that applies when the matters have been referred to the board for what is in the nature of a judicial decision.

There is no question but that when a matter is before a court for judicial decision, that is sub judice. When the question of freight rates has been referred to the board of transport commissioners, it has been accepted that is in the nature of a judicial decision. I ask you, sir, is a subject matter that has been referred to the board for review a case of seeking a judicial decision?

Mr. Chevrier: It is.

Mr. Knowles: The minister suggests it is. I doubt very much whether you could call that in the nature of a judicial decision. Obviously, the hon. member cannot be prohibited from discussing specific grade crossings, at least I hope not because I have one I am going to talk about. It seems to me he should not be prohibited from discussing the division of the fund that he thinks should be made.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may be permitted one further interjection, I would say it is not a matter that is referred to the board for judicial decision that should determine the point. The point is the subject has been referred to the board of transport commissioners which, in itself, by statute is a court of record. The moment it goes to the board, then it is sub judice.

Mr. Knowles: Then, you could refer your whole estimates to the board and avoid discussion.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think we will do that.

The Deputy Chairman: Unless anyone else wishes to speak to the point of order—

Mr. Green: There is this one point. I submit the board of transport commissioners is merely making a study and not holding hearings in any sense of the word.

The Deputy Chairman: I believe the minister has raised a point of order that is going to be extremely difficult to decide. However, it is going to be my duty to make a decision. That the board of transport commissioners, formerly the board of railway commissioners, is a court there can be no doubt. It is definitely stated in Beauchesne's third edition, citation 251, but in another connection. That matters which are before the board of transport commissioners for adjudication are sub judice is also stated quite definitely in citation 252. It says:

> Matters which have been adjudicated upon by the railway commissioners and taken in appeal to the governor in council cannot be considered sub judice while the appeal is pending, because—

Then, the citation goes on to point out that the governor in council acts in an administrative and not a judicial capacity.

I am of the opinion that if the matter is officially under study, whether or not it is adjudication as between opposing parties, by the board of transport commissioners, pending their decision it cannot be discussed here. However, what I do not know, and I am going to be dependent upon the minister and other members of the committee to advise me, is what is before the board of transport commissioners at the moment. My view is —it may be wrong but it is my view until it is overruled—that if there is a general matter before the board of transport commissioners dealing with policy on level crossings generally, I do not think that would stop the hon. member from bringing before the committee the special needs of a specific instance.

Similarly, if the board were holding hearings on a specific instance, I do not think that would stop an hon. member from discussing the administration of the level crossing fund generally. At the moment I am in the position where I shall have to ask the minister or someone in the committee to advise me on what it is that is before the board of transport commissioners at the moment. If both sides to this little argument can agree on that, then I shall do the best I can to go on from there.

Mr. Chevrier: I have to draw on my memory a great deal, but earlier in this session I tabled in the house an order in council appointing the board of transport commissioners to make a study of the grade crossing situation; of the matters incidental thereto; of the problem of railway-highway crossings in Canada, and to hold hearings across Canada if need be in order to determine whether or not the amount appropriated by parliament for the grade crossing fund was sufficient; whether it should be increased or amended; whether the amount paid for each individual project now fixed at a certain sum should be increased, and whether a number of other things having to do with the whole problem, which at that time and even today is causing concern I am sure to every citizen in this country, should be changed; and to make a report to the government. That is so far as I can remember, but I have not the order in council with me.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Danforth wish to add something to that?

Mr. Small: Not any more than to say it has probably accomplished the point I was seeking to make, that is to get consideration of this question. I was not aware that the situation had been referred to the board, because I had been continually requested by the corporation of the city of Toronto and the corporation of Scarborough to bring this matter before the house.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member will bear with my interruption at the moment, I may say that no one seems to have contested the statement of fact the minister has given us. Assuming that the board of transport commissioners is now officially charged with investigating and making recommendations in connection with the handling of the grade crossing fund, I am going to state that in my opinion it is not within our rules for the administration of this fund to be discussed at this time for the obvious reason that no form of political pressure from here or elsewhere should affect the decision to be arrived at by the board.

In so far as any hon. member of the committee may see fit to bring before the attention of the minister the needs of a specific instance, I cannot see that a general investigation into the administration of the fund should prohibit any member from doing that.

Mr. Small: If I had not been stopped at that particular juncture by the minister I probably would have completed the remainder of my remarks. I would urge that the Minister of Transport amend the act to provide for a much larger appropriation from the fund—

Mr. Chevrier: That is the very matter that is before the board.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. member is now doing the one thing which, rightly or wrongly, I decided should not be done. I am going to ask him not to continue to discuss the various types of amendments to the grade crossing fund and matters analogous thereto which are under review by the board of transport commissioners at this time.

Mr. Small: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. If I were to continue to deal with some specific cases, I would shut off some of the speakers who want to follow and speak in general terms. Therefore, I could leave it until we come to the general item on the grade crossing fund.

An hon. Member: You cannot discuss it there, either.

Mr. Small: There seems to be no place where you can discuss this.

The Deputy Chairman: If my decision is correct, that is also a correct statement of fact. The hon. member is speaking to the general item, and it is not necessary for him to resume his seat if he has other remarks to make pertaining to the Department of Transport.

Mr. Small: The problem I have is one shared with the hon. member for York-Scarborough. Within the municipality of Scarborough there are some 82 level crossings that are causing some concern. Of these about 30 can remain as they are for some considerable time because they have not been causing too much trouble. There are 52 of them which remain in the position of needing immediate consideration. The people in that locality are quite alarmed by the situation that has developed in the last two or three years with the expansion of their community and with new centres opening up. There are seven or eight grade level crossings requiring underpasses or grade separations. There are 26 or 27 requiring signals and another 22 requiring bank reduction and site line clearance and realignment of grades.

The fatalities there are mounting year after year, and naturally the people are becoming alarmed. They want to have some action taken. Their grievance is that an insufficient amount of money is being allocated to take care of their needs. The action taken to review the situation has taken too long. Instead of having this condition prolonged, they want to have something done about it immediately.

The city of Toronto is in a somewhat different position. In that city there are four or five large projects, one of which is at Pape avenue, another at Greenwood, and another in the west end at Symington avenue. These will cost in the neighbourhood of $800,000 or $900,000 each, and the board supplies only about 40 per cent of $150,000. It does not begin to come anywhere near the amount required to remove the hazards there. The province generally gives some further assistance perhaps to the extent of 40 per cent of the balance, which is required to take care of its end of it. These people are alarmed by the length of time it is taking the House of Commons or the board of transport commissioners to come to a decision to make larger appropriations.

Therefore I broach this subject, as part of a broad discussion of a condition which applies in the whole dominion. I have tried to tie up the local situation with the over-all picture, and I say the minister should recommend that something be done about it immediately, as the review cannot be completed for two or three years. Because of the growing menace in that area, something should be done.

In what I have said I have tried to avoid any contravention of the rules of debate. The matter is most serious, and we are asking that action be taken to terminate this situation.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to say a word in reply. I am sure the hon. member is not conversant with the facts because, if he had been, I do not think he would have suggested that there has been any laxity, either directly or indirectly. On the contrary the city of Toronto has had more grade crossing projects approved by the board of transport commissioners than any other city in Canada. Certainly the amount paid out of the grade crossing fund to the province of Ontario far surpasses that paid to any other province; and the city of Toronto gets the major part of it.

It had been brought to my attention by the hon. member's predecessor that there are a large number of grade crossings there. But my hon. friend should remember that it is not the department that makes the decision. It is the court. The board of transport commissioners must sit and hear the evidence. Then, having heard the evidence they must determine whether or not the elimination of the crossings is warranted, having regard to all the circumstances. When that is determined, then there must be an apportionment of the cost as between the railway or railways concerned and the municipality.

While I have not before me the position with respect to the particular crossings to which the hon. member referred, I think he will find that the city of Toronto has been pretty well looked after by the board of transport commissioners, having regard to the very small amount of money that is in the hands of the board from the grade crossing fund.

Mr. Small: Replying to the minister, I would say that that is just the crux of the whole matter. It is not that I want any greater consideration for the city of Toronto or the municipality of Scarborough. That is beside the point. I have pointed out the general picture, and I am appealing to the committee so that it may place more money in the fund. This would be an opportunity to take care of unemployment.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a matter the board is looking into, sir.

Mr. Small: But the people can starve while they are looking into it.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a moment or two to express my thanks to the minister, his colleagues in the government, and the officials of his department for the many improvements, particularly in aids to navigation, which have been carried out in my own province since confederation.

Most of the lighthouses and fog stations have been renovated, and new machinery has been installed. In addition, in my own riding, two new radio beacons, two new fog stations and several new lights have been established. I am sure my constituents would want me to express on their behalf their appreciation for these improvements.

Although much has been done, much still remains to be accomplished. Newfoundland has probably more coast line than any other province in Canada. The island of Newfoundland has more than 2,000 miles of coast line, and Labrador has over 1,000 miles of coast line, making a total of well over 3,000 miles altogether. Most of this coast line is studded with treacherous rocks and shoals; and it should also be borne in mind that, so far as my riding is concerned, navigation is rendered extremely difficult because of the prevalence of dense fogs or snowflurries during the greater part of the year.

In terms of tonnage, traffic may be very small; but in terms of the number of small boats and human lives involved, it is great indeed. There are more than 50,000 people in my riding, and 80 or 90 per cent of them derive their living from the sea. Human life is precious, however lowly the occupation may be. The saving of a single life more than offsets all the expenditures that have ever been made or ever will be made in the future in this connection.

We need more lighthouses, especially those in the form of light and whistle buoys, which are particularly suited to the conditions on our coast. I understand the establishment of these lights and whistle buoys have been retarded chiefly because the Newfoundland branch of the Department of Transport has no ship at the moment large enough to handle them.

I would draw the minister's attention to the very great need of such a ship specially adapted to and suitable for the handling and servicing of these light and whistle buoys, so that these extra aids to navigation may be provided as quickly as possible.

I have a very special interest in fog stations, because I spent the greater part of my childhood in one, and I always make a point of visiting them whenever I can. In my travels around my riding I have discovered some lack of uniformity in the grading and classification of these stations, and the salaries allocated thereto. I understand a program of reclassification is now under way, and I hope it will be completed and implemented at as early a date as possible.

In conclusion I should like to express my appreciation to the minister and his officials both here in Ottawa and in Newfoundland, for the sympathetic understanding and the co-operation I have always received from them.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the matters one can discuss on this general item are of great importance to the people of Canada generally, and particularly to those of western Canada.

The matter of freight rates across the nation has always been a very important subject, and has usually been contentious. A royal commission inquired into the general freight rate structure and the general freight rate policy, and a report was made in 1951.

Since then the board of transport commissioners has been endeavouring to carry out the recommendations made by the royal commission on transportation. The recommendations of that royal commission could be summed up in one sentence, namely, support of the principle of equalization of freight rates.

Since that time the board of transport commissioners has taken steps toward equalizing freight rates across the country. Those of us who come from western Canada particularly are very grateful for the extent of equalization that has been brought about. As the minister himself pointed out on an earlier occasion, the class rates have been made more equal by a reduction of 5 per cent in western Canada and an increase of 10 per cent in eastern Canada. The question of transcontinental rates was dealt with by the commission in the one and one-third rule, and that has been of benefit to the people on the prairies.

Another of the recommendations was the $7 million subsidy to help bear the cost of maintenance of railways in that area of northern Ontario that has so little revenue-producing freight. The step in providing the $7 million subsidy was a very important departure from general policy up to that time. I should like to point out to the minister that the benefit he told us had resulted from the $7 million subsidy, namely, a reduction in east-west rates by about 8 per cent, can easily be taken away by action in some other way or by action in another department.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that since this subsidy was inaugurated there has been a reduction of 7 cents a bushel on grain coming through Fort William and Port Arthur. That is equalization in reverse. That, in my judgment, is the very opposite type of policy to that which was set forth in the recommendation for the payment of the subsidy; and if one multiplies the 7 cents a bushel with the quantity of grain coming through that route, it is easy to see that the result is a cost to the prairies more than twice as great as the benefit coming from the $7 million subsidy.

One of the things that has disturbed me over the last few weeks and months is the continuing suggestion by people in responsible positions that there may be a change in the Crowsnest pass rates. I should like the minister to assure us that no consideration is being given to a change in those rates that would result in an increased burden on the people of western Canada. One of the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation was that the Crowsnest pass rates should not be tampered with. Since that time, as was pointed out in the Financial Times of May 21, the board of transport commissioners on February 15 referred to—and this is in quotation marks—the abnormally low statutory rates on western export. The writer of this article, whether he has reason for his speculation or not, goes on to say that consideration is being given to a change in the Crowsnest pass rates. I am hopeful that the minister will give the committee and western Canada the assurance now that no such change is contemplated.

In his recent address to the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway at the annual meeting, the president, Mr. W. A. Mather, dealt at some length with the question of the Crowsnest pass rates, and as one would expect, he criticized them very severely. I think his criticism was well answered by the minister at page 3124 of Hansard of this session when he said:

> The railway business is dependent upon the general activity in transportation services in the country as a whole.

Therefore, any drop there may be in revenue for the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. is not because we have the Crowsnest pass rates, but merely and solely because there has been a drop in general freight revenue. It is easy to see the advantage of the Crowsnest pass rates in western Canada when one compares, for example, the lake freight rate for the shipment of grain that prevailed in 1936 with the rate that prevails today. In 1936 the rate was 4⅞ cents per bushel; the lake freight rate today is 14½ cents per bushel. The rate has increased three times since 1936. This increase in lake freight rates and in ocean freight rates has meant a lower price to the producers of grain. In the face of these other very substantial increases in the cost of moving grain to the markets of the world, I am hopeful that the government will continue its present policy of maintaining intact the present Crowsnest pass rates, and will resist the pressure that is being placed on them apparently by the railway companies, the C.P.R. in particular, and will say no to any suggestion that the Crowsnest pass rates be increased.

As I have said, I believe the minister pointed out very well the reason for any decrease at the present time in railway revenues, namely, the decrease in the general freight traffic. As a matter of fact, any time that the railways have hauled higher than average quantities of grain at the so-called low Crowsnest pass rates, in those periods of time the railway companies have made their largest profits. Nothing will convince the people of western Canada that any tampering with the Crowsnest pass rates is justified.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, I am hopeful that the minister will quell those rumours now and give us the assurance that no consideration is being given to a change in those rates.

Mr. Nowlan: At the outset I should like to express my appreciation to the minister of what he said a few moments ago with respect to his trip along the coast and the reaction that he got to the services being rendered by lighthouse keepers at various isolated communities, of which we all know. I am sure it is an expression that will meet with the approval of the public generally. It is something which is tardy in recognition, and I am very glad that the minister has taken the position to express the views which he did this afternoon.

The other night the senior member for Halifax referred in some detail to facilities at the port of Halifax. Since he represents the city of Halifax, this naturally comes especially within his prerogative. But Halifax is also the great port of the province of Nova Scotia, one in which we all have a great interest, and I want to refer for a moment—and I shall speak only briefly—to the situation as it exists there.

Everyone knows that the port of Halifax is one of our great winter ports. It has also developed a very great summer import trade as well, because Halifax is a port of call for New York ships and others and there has been a demand for increased facilities there.

During the last year or so we have had a situation where the ships have had to lie in the stream for as long, I am told, as three days before obtaining dockage facilities in order to unload. Needless to say, shipping lying in the stream is an expensive matter; it can amount to as much as several thousand dollars a day. In order to cope with that situation we require additional facilities. I believe when the port was first envisaged many years ago there was a provision made in the old blueprint for the construction of pier A as a sort of twin to the existing pier we have there now. I know that that matter has been brought to the attention of the minister by the voluntary commission representing the business interests in Halifax, and I hope the minister and his department will be able to provide funds in the estimates so that construction can be commenced on that project in the very near future.

As the minister knows, pier 34, which we have there now, was considered to be a temporary structure but it lasted for a very long time until a locomotive engineer became exasperated and drove his engine right through so that it went right through the floor and by the time it was dug up the foundations had been irreparably damaged.

Now we are deprived of pier 34 and we have additional shipping to handle and we require not only an additional pier but the present pier facilities extended and the building of additional sheds. In fact a long-term project should now be brought forward for the development of the port of Halifax, and I simply want to put myself on record as being thoroughly in accord with that. I hope that the minister, with the speed with which he is known to act, particularly when he knows that he has public opinion behind him, will examine these matters and push through the completion of this project.

Although it is true that imports through Halifax port have been increasing yet I think the situation with respect to exports of Canadian goods through Canadian ports is not entirely a happy one. The minister has already heard me speak on this subject and I know he has said: "Well, what can I do about it?" That is the question, and if he asked me now I do not know that I would be in a position to give him a categorical answer, but I know he is cognizant of the problem and I would urge him and his departmental officials to do all in their power to improve the situation.

Two years ago I put the figures on the record with regard to the export of Canadian goods through Canadian ports and I do not want to repeat these now. But I have one or two cases which are a striking illustration of the situation and I would like to put them on record.

For example, though we only have official figures up to 1952, it can be shown that in 1950 the number of Canadian automobiles exported through American ports amounted to 23,046 and the number exported through Canadian ports for the same year amounted to 11,227, or roughly in proportion two to one. That means in effect that for every car exported from Canada two went through an American port for every one that went through a Canadian port. I will not put the figures for 1951 on record but the proportion amounted to five to one which means that for every five cars exported through American ports only one went through Canadian ports.

In 1952, 71,361 cars were exported through American ports and 8,406 through Canadian ports or a proportion of nine to one. If you want to consider automobile parts in 1950 it will be seen that more were shipped through Canadian ports than through American ports, but in 1951 the proportion was two to one through American ports and in 1952 the proportion was three-and-a-half to one in favour of the American ports.

The same thing can be said as regards farm machinery. The figures are almost exactly the same for there was a proportion of one-and-a-half to one through Canadian ports in 1950 and over five to one in favour of American ports in 1952.

Now, I know one can say, "well, that is business. What can we do about it. Do you suggest we bludgeon business into moving freight through Canadian ports?" I am not suggesting that, but I do suggest that some steps could be taken.

The automobile industry is an example of one which is prospering greatly through a national policy of which I do not complain, but I do say that a national policy should work both ways and if industry can prosper under such a policy then that industry should utilize Canadian ports and Canadian facilities as far as possible so that we may be able to build up a balanced economy.

It is a rather striking thing that other industries have apparently been able to use Canadian ports. For example, the International Nickel Company which, I imagine, is as well-managed as any other company, has increased its exports through Canadian ports to a striking degree during 1951-52. They have not found it necessary to use American ports. In addition, the great paper industries export through the Canadian ports and their exports recently went up from 3,900,000 hundredweight in 1950 to 8,819,000 hundredweight in 1952.

Some of these, of course, depend on port facilities and the places to which the goods are being exported, but if Canadian industry generally can find it profitable and advantageous in their international trade to use Canadian ports then I think that some fairly strenuous suggestion should be made to some of the other companies which for some reason have not seen fit to use Canadian ports and in fact almost ignore them completely.

The minister some time ago, and the hon. member for Halifax the other night, mentioned the work done by the department in maintaining the Canadian National steamship freighters and we are glad that that has been done. The old "Lady" boats were probably obsolescent, but they served a useful purpose and we are glad to see that Canadian National freighters are still operating, and that the minister has been able to play a part in their maintenance under the aegis of his department.

However, I do think these facilities should be extended. After all, if we are going to develop this nation, the outer periphery of it as well as the centre, then the government must spend money even if it means subsidization in order to build up our economy.

In this connection I am thinking particularly of the maritimes and the shipment of agricultural goods to, we will say, Venezuela which is a country on the gold standard and therefore without any dollar exchange problem. Venezuela, for instance, would like to buy through Nova Scotia anything up to 3,000 or 3,500 cases of eggs per week. The market is there, indeed a very considerable market, and what we require now are steamships and refrigerating services which can be operated through the port of Halifax direct to Venezuela. As it is today the progressive producers are going as far as they possibly can and adopting methods of transshipment sometimes through the port of New York, unloading them there by truck, and then putting them on ships through American harbours and shipping them to Venezuela. That has been done with several carloads within the last few months and it justifies the existence of that market but it is only an indication of what could be done if additional facilities were provided and we could ship direct to South American and West Indies ports generally, for these markets are of great value to the maritimes.

I think there are real opportunities for development there. We need regular services for freight, including refrigerator services, as well as passenger services. The Canadian National Railways have pioneered services through there to a certain extent and I can appreciate the fact that there have been great difficulties in so doing but a trade such as this is something that should be extended.

The minister will probably find that from an operating standpoint there would be a deficit on the first year. I do not know about that, but I do know that the money would be returned to the national economy. On balance it would be very much worth while and an expenditure which I think is more than justified.

To revert again to Halifax for a moment, when the minister was raising the point of order with my hon. friend about the grade crossings a little while ago I was reminded of another matter that I do not think comes within the jurisdiction of the transport commission and I doubt whether it comes within the grade crossing fund. However, I know it is a matter which has been brought to the minister's attention. I am sure it is going to be brought to his attention and to that of other ministers in the immediate future. I refer to the drastic situation which the people of Halifax face in so far as so-called bottlenecks are concerned.

The minister knows full well of the situation at Halifax, which is situated on a peninsula, where two main arteries coming out of there both have railway crossings. If something were to happen there, such as a bomb being dropped, you could have possibly 100,000 to 150,000 people sealed off thereby. So far as the Minister of Transport is concerned, while it may be a matter for civilian defence, it comes to a certain extent within his purview with respect to grade crossings. It is a matter which is attracting a great deal of attention at the moment. Halifax is certainly a city where, unfortunately, if we were ever to find ourselves in another war the people would be in a most vulnerable position. Even with regard to the explosions which took place in the dockyard at the end of the last war, in that city there was created a situation which could easily have got out of control. It is beyond the scope of the municipality and of the province. It is a matter which, as I said, must be dealt with. I believe it will be under review in the not too distant future. I mention it now as something which concerns not only the city but the province as a whole.

Much has been said about the Canadian mercantile marine. I notice that the minister said this afternoon that he hoped that some time in the near future—I gathered it might perhaps be before this house rose or at some early date—he will be in a position to make a general statement, in view of the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, with regard to the whole situation.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just make it clear that the statement I had in mind concerned the restrictions on coastal trade and not on the other matter, although I said that the other matter was under review. I do not want to be misunderstood.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister for what he has said. With respect to coastal trade the situation is a difficult one. I realize that the co-operation, shall we say, with regard to commonwealth and British ships along the coast is a matter of policy which is to be reviewed in the over-all picture. It is possible that the minister will say that this criticism is not well founded. I have drawn it to his attention before and I have had it drawn to my attention again by captains in the coastal trade who, rightly or wrongly, believe this and I believe some explanation should be given. They complain of the fact that the other boats coming in—British boats —do not have to comply with the provision of the steamship inspection act, whereas they are obliged to do so. They contend that the cost of that inspection service, having regard to the relatively small amount of revenue which they derive from their annual business, puts them in a most unfortunate position regardless of the difference in salaries and other costs and operating expenses. One captain told me that in his boat the costs made a difference of $10,000 a year, in connection with his complying with that inspection service. Their argument there is that if other boats take part in the coastal service, then at least they should be in the same situation and under the same regulations, and that if others are not forced to comply with these regulations, they should not be obliged to do so.

Speaking of the steamship inspection service, Mr. Chairman, I should like to express my appreciation again to the minister—I do not want to be too thankful and too complimentary this afternoon—for the co-operation he showed in a matter which I raised. Under the provisions of the act I think unfortunately —at least I say that I did not notice it in the act or I would have questioned it at the time—a certain situation has arisen. Now boats of over 15 tons come within the provisions of this inspection act. In Nova Scotia we have had a situation where small fishing boats, motor boats, just over 15 tons have been ordered ashore. Sometimes they have been ordered ashore even at the busiest season of the year, and have been told that they have had to undergo renovations and repairs running into thousands of dollars before they can operate again. I must say that when one particular instance was brought to the attention of the minister he acted most co-operatively and at least avoided any injustice being done for the particular season and permitted the boats to continue operating. Otherwise they would have lost practically all the money they would have earned that year.

I think that provision is too far-reaching. I hope the minister will at least have the regulations relaxed in so far as the statute permits. After all, these men going out in these little fishing boats—they, their fathers and their grandfathers have been doing it for three generations—do not intend to drown themselves or get drowned. They go out in the morning and come back at night. I am speaking now of the small fishing boats on the Nova Scotia coast. Their fathers did it and their grandfathers did it. They do not think they have to have lifeboats with copper water tanks and a whole lot of the other things they might need if they were carrying passengers or were pleasure boats or were going out to sea for two or three days. They have shafts in their motor boats of $3\frac{3}{4}$ inches. These motor boats with these shafts have carried them and their fathers back and forth for twenty years. They do not see why they should take out these shafts and put in 4½ inch shafts at consequent expense. Because this act now applies to everything over 15 tons, I think it is creating a hardship among fishermen operating in these smaller boats. I know that the minister has adopted a most reasonable attitude in connection with other matters that have been brought to his attention. I hope the regulations can be systematized and regularized rather than having to deal with them on an individual basis.

There is one other thing I wish to mention. I was reminded the other day of the battle of the Atlantic. I was thinking of Halifax harbour, the traditions of the harbour, the physical layout of it and particularly of the little island in the centre of the harbour which is known as George island. There may be jealousy between Saint John and Halifax, between Halifax and Vancouver or between east and west but I do not think there is any jealousy of the fact that in the minds of most Canadians Halifax is associated with the navy, the navy tradition and the tradition of the mercantile marine and that Halifax in time of war, at any rate, is looked upon as one of the great traditional fortresses of this country and one which, from the standpoint of service in the Atlantic, has a tradition of service which is recognized by all of Canada and of which Canada is proud.

In this harbour we have this little island known as George island. I suppose it is a matter of historic sites and monuments more than a marine matter. However, the control of that island lies between the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Defence. They have both used it in connection with transport facilities and it was also used in the old days as a magazine. In New York harbour, for instance, there is the statue of liberty. In Gloucester harbour there is the great statue to the fishermen who have died in the course of going out and maintaining the tradition of that port. It seems to me that it would be a happy thing indeed if on this island, which is no longer of any use to the Department of National Defence or to the Department of Transport, there could be erected a memorial of some kind in which all of Canada would join, in this great port which typifies all of the traditions, as I have said, of seamanship in Canada of which all of Canada is proud.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, earlier in the session I placed on the order paper a resolution calling for the increasing of elevator space and port facilities at Churchill, but before I had a chance to have this resolution debated the minister was kind enough to announce that the facilities were being doubled. At this very late date I must thank him for such prompt action. I may say that his announcement was made just prior to Christmas. It so happened that I had made a tour from Churchill through Hudson bay to the United Kingdom last fall, and some of my friends were kind enough to give me credit for the announcement. Members of the house who know how difficult it is to get the government to accept resolutions even when we have very good arguments will know that I cannot claim the credit for this decision.

I do not expect that during my lifetime Churchill will become as large as Montreal, Halifax or Vancouver, but the Canadian people have an investment of over $50 million in the railway and the harbour facilities and I think it is in the interests of Canada that we give this development a fair chance. I must express my appreciation to the minister for the sympathetic consideration which has been given since he took over the department. Some years ago we had a Saskatchewan homesteader in the person of Mr. Dunning as minister of transport, but although he was from Saskatchewan I do not think he gave Churchill and the Hudson bay route the sympathetic consideration that the present minister has.

However, there is one matter that I should like to bring to the minister's attention. On the 18th of February his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, announced a differential that is really going to place Churchill at a great disadvantage. As of the 18th of February wheat was being offered at Fort William at $1.79, at Vancouver at $1.86 and at Churchill at $1.88. It was not possible in February for wheat to be sold for immediate delivery out of Churchill, and the minister did indicate that the matter would be reviewed later. I think he will appreciate my position as a farmer at Sturgis. Some of our wheat moves to Churchill and some to Fort William. Wheat moves to Churchill at an 18 cent rate and at a 20 cent rate to Fort William. I think it is unreasonable for the wheat board to offer wheat moved from Sturgis at a price of $1.88 at Churchill and $1.79 at Fort William.

I know it is an accident that the Minister of Trade and Commerce happens to come from Port Arthur, but it is a fact that he does come from there and I want to suggest to the Minister of Transport that he keep a very watchful eye on the price at which wheat is offered at Churchill when ships are in a position to move in and out of the port. As I intimated earlier, I travelled from Churchill to London on the S.S. Begonia. The captain of the ship had come into the port of Churchill on half a dozen occasions, and with radar, the gyrocompass and the excellent aids to navigation provided by the Department of Transport Captain Reekie indicated that it was quite safe to go into Churchill, that it was no more hazardous than to go into Montreal.

I think there are two things that are important. I think we should have more cargo coming into Churchill so that the people who live on the plains may have the advantage of the short rail haul and be able to get goods from overseas markets by the most direct route. As I said, we want to make sure that the increased facilities will be used to capacity. I have one further suggestion which I think will provide a little additional revenue. I do not expect that in the very near future there will be a large volume of passenger traffic through Churchill, but most of the ships that come there have accommodation for some passengers. The cargo ships that move out of Halifax and Montreal carry a great many people who prefer to travel on cargo ships because they get away from the noise and crowds of the passenger ships.

Last year I found it very difficult to get information as to what ships might be sailing, when they would be sailing and whether or not there would be accommodation. It so happens that the railway line from The Pas to Churchill is operated by a separate branch of the Canadian National Railways. The C.N.R. employees where I live are very co-operative but they did not seem to have information as to when ships were sailing and whether there would be accommodation. In my opinion it would not cost very much to have a better liaison between the national harbours board at Churchill, the Hudson bay branch of the railway and the Canadian National Railways. If a ship were coming into Churchill with accommodation for ten passengers that information could be made available to the C.N.R. passenger agency in Winnipeg and in turn to their branch agencies throughout the west.

As I said, I do not expect that there will be thousands of people wanting to travel by way of Churchill, but having crossed the Atlantic on several occasions by way of Montreal may I say—and I do not think I could be accused of being partial—that I never enjoyed an ocean voyage more than the restful trip from Churchill to London, England, which took seventeen days. Therefore I hope the minister will be able to make arrangements so that Canadian National Railways can make available to prospective travellers information as to the cost and the possible dates that ships may be sailing from Churchill.

Mr. Quelch: I am somewhat concerned about the question raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia with respect to the Crowsnest rates. I am a little bit afraid that some of the opponents of those rates may say that only one or two members of the House of Commons made any protest against changing them. Of course the reason that only one or two members are protesting is the fact that no measure is before the house proposing a change in these rates. On the other hand, I am satisfied if any measure were brought in to make a change in the Crowsnest rates every member from the prairie provinces would rise and protest, and I think that we can promise the minister one of the bitterest fights the house has seen for many years if such a measure is introduced. The hon. member for Assiniboia asked the minister to give the house the assurance that the government is not considering any change in these rates. I think we would appreciate getting that assurance from the minister—

Mr. Chevrier: It will not be difficult.

Mr. Quelch: —because we could not hear what he said before. To us he seemed to be whispering. I wish he would give us that assurance in a more audible voice at this time and in that way save a lot of debate.

Mr. Chevrier: I can tell my hon. friend immediately that he can cease worrying at once because there is nothing before the house, nothing before the government and certainly no change in the position which I announced earlier so far as the Crowsnest rates are concerned. I do not know what may have brought this about other than the fact that the railways may be losing money on the movement of grain through the Crowsnest pass. I mean comparatively speaking in so far as the rates for the movement of grain elsewhere are concerned.

Mr. Quelch: But actually there is no loss of money on the transportation, is there?

Mr. Chevrier: I asked my officers to get a statement I have in my office. With it I could have dealt with the matter more intelligently, but unfortunately I am not able to get my hands on it. Perhaps that is the basis for the fear that hon. members have in their minds. I hope that I can put something on the record at a later date. In any event, even if that were the position and it was found necessary to give some attention to the problem, there is certainly no intention of amending the act. Certainly no consideration has ever been given by the government to amending the act. If that will allay the fears of my hon. friends, I am happy to give that assurance right now.

Mr. Hamilton: I was extremely interested, Mr. Chairman, this afternoon in hearing some of the remarks of the Minister of Transport concerning the jurisdiction which he and his department had over the canal system of Canada, and the deft way in which he made it quite obvious to us that he and his department controlled the canals of Canada. It brought to my mind the desire of those of us on this side of the house to have an excellent corps of people behind us to do research, to dig out facts and to develop arguments so that we could always be as accurate as the minister.

I had a little premonition that perhaps the statement was not technically and completely correct. I know the minister felt it was. I went upstairs, and the first thing I did was to look up the item in the act that gives him the power. The item is very definite and says that the minister shall have the management, charge and direction of all government railways and canals, and of all works and property appertaining or incident to such railways and canals, etc. Then, I leafed through the first 786 pages of the Canada Year Book looking for something I had seen there before and I found this at the top of page 786:

> Under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Public Works are the St. Andrews lock (length, width and draught, respectively, 215, 45 and 17 feet) at Selkirk on the Red river, Manitoba, and the lock at Poupore, Quebec.

I mention this not really to niggle away at the minister at all, but just to point out how easy it is for even experts like the Department of Transport to lose a lock in a canal, and to tell us that everything comes under their jurisdiction. Then, suddenly, we find something that is a fair size—after all, something 215 feet long, 45 feet wide and 17 feet deep is not something one tucks underneath an arm. You would think someone would know about it, but apparently somehow it slipped away from the Department of Transport into the Department of Public Works. I think it points up, Mr. Chairman, not only the care with which we have to examine all statements that are made in this house, but the impressions that are left with us and even sometimes the wording of an act.

It points up also some of the inconsistencies in these government operations. Could anything be more foolish, could anything be more senseless, than that the Department of Transport should have jurisdiction over practically all the canals and locks in Canada except two, one out in Manitoba somewhere and the other down in Poupore, Quebec. One can see how this would gradually drift so that eventually the two departments perhaps would each have an interest in the canal. Before we know it we could get into quite a confused situation.

Most of all, Mr. Chairman, it points up the minister's diatribe this afternoon in answer to one of my colleagues who had made a suggestion that was not based on the facts of the case, and then the minister indicated that he was the sole person responsible for canals and locks in Canada. The minister was arguing from facts which were not quite correct, and I have cited my authority for stating that.

Then again, I cast my mind back, Mr. Chairman, to a rather innocent question I asked of the minister a while ago. It appears in Hansard for April 14, 1954, page 4074. The question referred to something called the Wellington street tunnel in the city of Montreal. I remember at the time the chuckles that arose, and the smile on the minister's face, when he good-naturedly and I presume also seriously, pointed out twice in the course of about four sentences how the member for St. Ann had raised the same question previously in the railways and shipping committee. The only trouble was, you see, Mr. Chairman, that despite the fact I had carefully telephoned the minister's office and given him an indication I was going to ask this question, this was another case where somehow the cogs had slipped a little. We were not talking about the same thing, although my question was quite clear. The minister indicated it had been discussed, and something vaguely relating to the subject had been discussed. As a matter of fact, it is rather amusing. The committee evidence at page 110 shows that the member for St. Ann had questioned the replacement of the tunnel on Wellington street between Congregation and Richmond. He said:

> This tunnel is over 80 years old.
> Mr. Gordon: You mean bridge?
> Mr. Healy: It is a subway.
> Mr. Gordon: An overpass.
> Mr. Healy: Yes, that is right.

So, they finally decided it was an overpass. They reached agreement on the overpass. An overpass is something that goes over, Mr. Chairman, it carries traffic over and a tunnel is something that goes underneath.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Hamilton: Well, I think it is necessary to point that out because obviously the minister had missed the import of this particular question. I would point out, just so he can dig back into the facts, that I was talking about what is very commonly known in Montreal, and by the people who deal with it, as the Wellington street tunnel. The Wellington street tunnel is about a half mile removed from the project to which he referred in his answer and it goes underneath the canal. It is a very sizeable operation. I would still like, at some point, to get an answer to my quite legitimate question asked of the minister in this house on April 14, and I hope perhaps without the levity that marked that occasion.

Turning for a moment, Mr. Chairman, to the airports of Canada, may I say that the transportation of passengers by air in Canada has had a tremendous growth in the past 10 to 15 years, as I think all of us know. Perhaps it is well to remind ourselves, however, that in 1941 Trans-Canada Air Lines carried some 103,000 passengers, and in 1952 it carried more than 10 times as many, 1,133,000 passengers. All air lines combined in 1941 carried 181,000 passengers, and in 1951, 10 years later, carried 1,789,000 passengers. Up to now the air transport industry has had a phenomenal record, and with the growth and development of tourist flights as well as the other innovations that are being introduced, we can expect it to grow steadily and rapidly.

But, Mr. Chairman, we do not find that adequate facilities exist at the present time to compare with the quick moving steps that are being taken by that industry. Let me make it quite plain, sir, that I am making a difference here between such things as landing strips and equipment of the airport, with which I am not concerned, and the passenger facilities at the airports, with which I am concerned. I have a reasonable acquaintance I think, though perhaps not as extensive as the minister's, with Canada's airports, and they are shamefully inadequate in almost every case. In fact, I think the minister recognizes this because he was quoted in Canadian Aviation magazine, which is a recognized trade paper in the field. In the issue for March of this year—

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think, even if the hon. member will quote what I said, that I used the word "shamefacedly", which is the expression he used.

Mr. Hamilton: I was coming to your quotation.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend has said that I have already admitted that, as he put it, airport facilities are shamefacedly lacking in Canada. If that is the statement my hon. friend has made, then I am afraid I have to deny it.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, there is a terminology in use in radio in which you say, "I did not hear you properly; will you say it again." I think that in this case that is what has happened between the minister and me. I did not use the word "shamefacedly". I said—and I think perhaps the record will show it—that Canada's airports—and these are my words, this is my interpretation, and as a result of my experience—that Canada's airports are shamefully inadequate in almost every case.

Then I went ahead to say that I felt the minister perhaps recognized this, and then I was going to go ahead and—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I am not going to allow the hon. member to put words in my mouth, which he has no authority either directly or indirectly to do. If my hon. friend is resorting to a trick, then I am sure this is not the place in which to resort to it. He may use his own words, if he wishes, and he may quote me if he wishes; but he certainly should not leave the innuendo here that I have admitted that airport facilities of this country are shamefacedly lacking—because I make no such admission.

Mr. Rowe: He did not say "shamefacedly"; he said "shamefully."

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not think there is any necessity for this little interchange to go farther. I would say here that I do not think it was the intention of any member to resort to a trick, and I do not think it was the intention of the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace to misquote the minister. I listened carefully to what the hon. member said, and he made it clear that he was putting the words in his own mouth, when he was indicating the situation. Then he went on to say that he believed the minister recognized the situation as such; and the minister has made it clear that he has made no such statement, which the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace must accept.

However, I think in fairness to the hon. member who has the floor, I should point out that he was interrupted in the middle of a sentence, and that he proposed to go on to quote words the minister had used, and which of course the minister will have the right to confirm or to deny. The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace may proceed.

Mr. Hamilton: I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And certainly I had no intention whatsoever—it was not the purpose of my remarks—to put words in the mouth of the Minister of Transport. He is quite capable of doing that for himself. And if he does not recognize the situation in the airports, that is for him to say.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to when he speaks of the air force. This department has no jurisdiction over the air force.

Mr. Green: Yes it has.

Mr. Hamilton: Without attempting in any way to link the quotation I shall now use with my previous opinion—and which I very carefully defined as being expressed as my previous opinion—I shall quote from the March issue of Canadian Aviation in which, as a result of a query, the minister is quoted as saying:

> My own extensive experience as a user of air travel has made me acutely aware for some considerable time that our terminal facilities have not kept pace with the growth of air traffic. In offering these comments I should like to make it clear that I am not apologizing for the present situation since those of us who are responsible have done all that the circumstances in the case have permitted us to do.

That is the end of the quotation; and that was the quotation which I intended to use in the beginning. I hope it is satisfactory. Then, let us see what this magazine, one of the standard periodicals in the field, has to say about our present air terminal facilities. It says:

> Our air terminals seem to be regarded by those responsible for them in much the same way as our weather is regarded. They do not come up to expectations but willy-nilly we the public should put up with them the best way we can.
> While the weather remains largely beyond our control, we believe the present inadequate state of our air terminals could and should be improved. Like the majority of informed public opinion we polled on the question, who describe our terminals as outhouses, barns and stockyards, we think that any change would be an improvement.

And that is the end of that quotation.

Now, we must remember that the attitude of the public toward transportation generally is largely conditioned by what they find at the beginning and the end of their journey. And to the extent that our terminals are inadequate and poor, we are holding back and harming this air transport industry which has done so much for the development of our country.

We do get the impression, from various expressions of opinion and by government figures, that the long-range planning they have under way provides better facilities. Unfortunately, in the long-range we are all going to be dead. And I, for one, am much more interested, as I believe the travelling public of Canada are, in the terminals we can use this year and the next year, and in the immediate future. It will be very nice for those who come after us to have fine terminals, too. But certainly I would like to feel that they are going to be available for us; now, in the next year or two.

It comes down to a charge which I laid at the door of the minister not too long ago, in another debate, a charge of lack of confidence, lack of belief that these things can actually be happening in Canada, things that justify big thinking, that justify sound planning which will fit in with the type of thing which is happening day after day here in our country.

Let me give the committee the opinion of one of the recognized authorities in air transportation, Sir William Hildred, who was formerly located in Canada in conjunction with the international air transport association, in Montreal. Sir William Hildred says:

> If you build an airport small, with due regard to ratepayers' interest, you lose all their money and build a white elephant and not an airport; if you build with due regard to the future and make it a size which you think is about right, you lose half your money and build a grey elephant; but if you make the best estimate you can and multiply it by three and calculate on a size which seems extravagant, you have a reasonable chance of not losing your money, and of not building an elephant at all; but an airport which will serve its time and generation.

Let me say at once that I do not want that word "extravagant" thrown back in my face in the course of the next few moments, because I am not counselling extravagance. I am counselling a realistic realization of what is happening in air passenger traffic in Canada today, and suggesting that we must build in accordance with that.

Just in case the minister would be interested in the comments of one or two of the travelling public on this question of airports, the comments of people who are quite conversant with airports generally, I turn to the February issue of this same publication, Canadian Aviation, because it has made an exhaustive study of the subject. Mr. G. W. G. McConachie, president of Canadian Pacific Air Lines, says this in part:

> The passenger-handling facilities, on the other hand, will require major improvement if air travellers in this country are to receive the high standard of service on the ground that they have come to expect in flight.

John Fisher, the C.B.C. commentator, has quite a lengthy and a burning commentary on our airport facilities. I shall just quote this:

> They are the most unimaginative and uncomfortable facilities I have found in any civilized country. We simply cannot hold a candle to Europe and most places in the United States. Even Hutchinson, Kansas, has a better terminal than Toronto, Ontario.

He continues:

> It is unfair to have the good name of T.C.A. and C.P.A. linked with such poor service. Unfortunately they get the blame for these shortcomings. I think both carriers should have more say in the original planning of these terminal facilities.

Another man who is perhaps well-known here in Ottawa is Mr. Austin Cross, the Citizen writer. He says in part:

> As to our air service, it is excellent, dependable, and safe as your Aunt Emma.

It is only when you land you think you are in Lower Slobbovia and not in Canada.

My final quotation will be from a well-known public man, Mr. Joseph M. Pigott, president of the Pigott Construction Company Limited. He says:

Our airport facilities to my mind have always been planned without regard to the expansion and service that was going on. It has been my observation in a great number of cases that, just as the construction of an airport is nearing completion, a start is made to expand and enlarge it.

I could go on with these quotations but I do not intend to. There are many; they all pay tribute to the facilities for handling the aircraft in the air, the safety facilities, and things like that. We may have seen isolated cases in the past where the government has been at fault in respect to regulations, but I do not want to misinterpret the article here or the opinions of many of these people. Many of them are prepared to accept as reasonably adequate or better than adequate what happens when the aircraft leaves the ground, but almost without exception they make burning comments about the quality of the buildings and the facilities that are available to handle passenger traffic.

I have a few little examples from my own experience in this country. There is what you might call class distinction in the toilets at Dorval airport, and I understand this exists in other places. Where else but in a government office would you find three such utilitarian objects set up side by side, one of which is free, the next one where, for the payment of a nickel, you get the same facilities and the next, for the payment of a dime, you get something which is sterilized and heated with ultraviolet ray lights? Really, I could not believe it, Mr. Chairman, when somebody brought this to my attention. I had to wait until a few days after when I was at the airport, and I went in and checked it myself. I could not believe that the government would be doing anything quite as senseless as that. That is the sort of thing which is going on in our airports. If that is the sort of thing that is going on in our air terminals I can easily understand why they are not as adequate as they might be.

Then of course we have the airport out here at Uplands which is familiar to us all. What an amazing building it is to be located in the capital of one of the world's great countries. Frankly, it is little better than a shack. There are no restaurant facilities. In one corner there is a cooler, and if you put a coin in it you get a bottle of Coca-Cola or some other soft drink. On the other side of the room there is another cooler, and if you put a coin in it you will get a cup of coffee, and that is all. Those are the restaurant facilities in the air terminal of Canada's capital. Your baggage is slung across a counter. It is attended to by the personnel, but they have very little facilities for handling it. You are crowded into a room which is so limited in capacity that it is seldom, when you are going out and coming in, that everybody can find a seat at once. To my mind, Mr. Chairman, it is a damning indictment of the entire operation of the Department of Transport in so far as air terminal facilities are concerned across this country, because it is not an isolated case. It is not the sort of thing that just happens, but it does happen in varying degree, some a little bit better, and some a little bit worse, right across this country in airport after airport. If anyone doubts my word I suggest that they take the time to go out on an inspection tour of the air terminals.

Mr. Chevrier: I doubt your word very seriously.

Mr. Hamilton: May I suggest you make an inspection?

Mr. Chevrier: I have made an inspection. I do not think you are competent to deal with this matter.

Mr. Hamilton: I am delighted to hear the minister say that because I am one lone person, sir. I doubt very much whether, from the many facilities which you have at hand and the millions of dollars that you are spending on these airports, along with the people that you have at your disposal to think these things through for you and to plan and to see that these can be done, you are justified in making a remark like that, sir.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, not only do I make that remark, I say that your speech is one of sour grapes.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest you address the Chair.

Mr. Green: On a point of order, the minister should not interrupt an hon. member who is speaking, and having interrupted he should not make the statement he did. He should withdraw.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no intention of withdrawing the statement. The hon. member raised his voice in such a way that he prompted the interruption that I made.

Mr. Drew: The minister should address the Chair.

Mr. Chevrier: I agree with the Leader of the Opposition, and the hon. member should address the Chair, also.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not consider that the expression "sour grapes" can be regarded as unparliamentary; but I would remind both hon. members who have apparently held the floor in the last two minutes that the debate will be carried on better if both of them were to obey the standing practice and address the Chair.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the Chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, when we rose at six o'clock there was a short intermission for a discussion which did not bear perhaps directly on the subject I was dealing with. We were outlining the present state of Canada's airports and certainly, in so far as the public is concerned, they are in a sorry state. I think, just to finish the discussion, I might add that in Montreal, for example, one has to leave the main building on a rainy day and go across an open space in order to pick up baggage which is of course inconvenient to those who are using the airport. Many of our airports lack adequate porter facilities and many, many of them lack other niceties. I question whether I have ever been in an airport that really had adequate seating accommodation for people who are using it from day to day.

Now, from the various quotations and expressions from various people I have tried to show that there is general agreement on the inadequacy of these facilities at most of our major airports. I am not quite sure what the minister meant when, in an interjection at one point, he said "sour grapes", but I do know that Montreal is perhaps fortunate in the present plans for the airport. I am glad at least that the plans are under way and we understand that within this year construction will commence on something that will begin to approach and perhaps to arrive at the type of facilities required. But I think we should remind the government that just as one swallow does not make a summer, one airport does not make a system, and that we have got to give consideration to this situation right across Canada.

I am not one who feels that just as long as we are satisfied within our own constituency that all is going well. That is a narrow point of view and I think that those of us who are here try to look at this thing from a broad national angle. We realize that these facilities are definitely needed in many, many parts of Canada.

Leaving the question of terminal facilities aside for the moment we might just remind the Minister of Transport, because it does come within his department, that low-flying aircraft are a continuing problem in the part of the country from which I come, and I would like to express my hope, and I go no further than that, that he will ask his officials and his department to make every attempt to control that and eliminate it wherever possible. I would think that many of the commercial air lines particularly who now route themselves straight across certain cities could be persuaded to fly around them coming into the airport, because of the danger inherent in any aeroplane flying over a large concentration of people.

Then, I would like to mention one other thing which I do not think the minister has heard referred to in this house for some time, perhaps not for ten or fifteen years because most of the people who came from my area have sat behind the minister over that period instead of facing him. I refer to the need for adequate fire-boats in the Montreal area. Hon. members will recall that it was only a few months after the fire-boats were supplied in Vancouver and provided with modern and up-to-date equipment that the city was saved from what might have been one of the most disastrous fires of all time on the Vancouver waterfront. It was bad enough, but it was not as bad as it might have been.

In Montreal they have very limited facilities and lack even one really modern adequate up-to-date piece of equipment with which to protect that great port, and I think it would be most unfortunate if anything should ever happen. I would not want the minister to look back and say, "I wish I had put that fire-boat in Montreal." I would much rather be prepared to have the minister supply the required protection in the port and then come back to me in five or ten years time from now and say, "Well, you did not really need it." Fortunately with many of these things we do not know whether we are going to need them or not, but we do have to protect our investment and we have to constantly bear in mind, particularly in these uncertain times, the great value of really adequate waterfront fire protection in the city of Montreal.

Just to recapitulate for a moment, I think we have shown first of all that there is a little uncertainty as to just how many canals are controlled by the minister. We have asked him for an answer on this and I have no doubt one will be forthcoming, arising out of a question asked well over a month ago.

We have outlined some of the inadequacies of the air terminal situation. And here let me emphasize again, Mr. Chairman, that much of the material from which I quoted was not my own. The minister chose to say I was not qualified to deal with it. I did not take umbrage at that and question whether it was parliamentary or unparliamentary. I might have taken umbrage but I did not, and I quoted from authorities who are quite independent. It is not a question of sour grapes or someone who is unqualified. I suggest that Sir William Hildred, Grant McConachie, president of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines, and a man like Austin Cross, who has travelled this country and who has been in and out of all these airports, should know what is happening. They represent various points of view. The government expert in the case of Sir William Hildred, the point of view of the operator in a man like Grant McConachie, and the point of view of the ordinary travelling citizen in the case of Mr. Cross. Then, of course, there is the case of Mr. Pigott. These comments, and there are many others in the material I had, are, and I think I used the phrase before, a damning indictment of what this government proposes to foist off on the people of Canada at the present time as adequate airport facilities. Finally, I have drawn attention very briefly to one or two things such as the need of adequate fire protection in Montreal harbour and waterfront, and also the possibility of giving careful consideration to the problem of low-flying aircraft.

Just as I sit down, Mr. Chairman, I do hope that the things I have tried to point out to the minister tonight will not meet with quite the cool reception which was evident about half-way through my speech, because he has a great responsibility to some million and a half people who travel this country on his railroad, through his airports, and along his canals, and they are looking to him to do the best job he can, perhaps even a better job than he is doing now, and to take heed of their complaints and observations.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, normally I would not rise in my place to reply to an hon. member in the middle of my estimates because, like any other minister, I am anxious to have them considered with all dispatch. However, I cannot sit here in my seat and allow the hon. member who has just taken his seat to get away in this chamber with the inaccuracies, the exaggerations, the misstatements and the unethical practice in which he has indulged.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I submit to you that the last two statements made by the minister are unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Green: If the minister cannot take criticism in a better spirit than he is showing right now, there is something wrong.

An hon. Member: Where?

The Chairman: What were the two words to which the hon. member takes objection?

Mr. Green: Unethical,—

Mr. Chevrier: Unethical, inaccurate, exaggerated.

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Chairman. The minister said that they were misstatements—which statement is unparliamentary—and also that they were unethical. Both of those statements should be withdrawn.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to be allowed the opportunity to show where the statements are, first of all, inaccurate, exaggerated and unethical.

The Chairman: On previous occasions certain phrases have been declared to be unparliamentary either by a chairman presiding over the committee or a Speaker presiding over the house. I have not before me a complete list of those phrases but I have read them from time to time, and my recollection does not convince me that either of the words to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra refers have been declared to be unparliamentary. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra could draw my attention to a citation which would support his point of order. However, my own recollection is that these two words have not been declared to be unparliamentary.

Mr. Green: The statement by the minister that the hon. member had made a misstatement was, in effect, saying that he had told a lie. Therefore it should be withdrawn. To accuse an hon. member of making unethical statements means that he is not speaking as a member of parliament should, and is a reflection on him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: I do not intend to be howled down, no matter how many government supporters may feel like doing it.

The Chairman: Order. I assure the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that he will not be howled down. But I also am afraid that he is not on sound ground when he says that to say an hon. member made a misstatement is equivalent to saying that a member is lying. If any such suggestion were made that the hon. member were lying, I would of course have to call that suggestion unparliamentary. But the words to which the hon. member has taken exception I do not think are words that I can call unparliamentary.

Mr. Green: Is Your Honour ruling that a member may rise in his place, accuse another hon. member of making a misstatement and not have to withdraw that accusation?

The Chairman: The minister, I think, has used the word "misstatement". He has said that he is prepared to go on and elaborate on the misstatement. I do not think that is equivalent to saying that the hon. member who previously had the floor is lying, to use the words used by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I do not think it is any reflection on an hon. member if in the course of a speech a mistake is made. I certainly think the minister has a right to show whether a mistake has been made or not. I cannot see that there is anything unparliamentary in that.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: I do not intend to be howled down if I have to stand here for an hour. There is quite a big difference between a mistake and a misstatement. The minister accused the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace of making a misstatement. He did not say that he had made a mistake. There is a great difference, because there is a difference in intent. I submit to Your Honour that the minister should withdraw that charge that the hon. member has made a misstatement. As the minister used the expression, one could only take the meaning that he was charging the hon. member with doing it deliberately. I submit to Your Honour that that charge should be withdrawn.

The Chairman: Order. I am totally unable to take from the word "misstatement" the implication the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is apparently taking. A misstatement could be anything from a mistake to something much broader. I cannot possibly call "misstatement", with no amplification whatsoever, out of order. I am afraid that I cannot do it.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may be allowed to proceed, Mr. Chairman, I should now like to deal with some of the inaccuracies of the hon. member in his remarks. In his statement earlier this evening he referred to the deft way in which the minister made it quite obvious that he and his department control the canals of Canada. A little bit later he said: I had a little premonition that perhaps that statement was not technically and completely correct. Still further he went on to say this: Then the minister indicated that he was the sole person responsible for canals and locks in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the hon. member who made those statements to read Hansard and to see whether, at any place, I made any statement akin to that. I deny having made such statements. During the recess I read Hansard twice and nowhere in Hansard—nor did I correct it—could I find any place where I said that I was responsible for the control of canals in Canada or that it was quite obvious that my department controlled all the canals in Canada. I therefore say that I did not make that statement. To that extent my hon. friend was inaccurate in the statement which he made.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: No, no. I should like to get on. I have waited ten minutes now.

Mr. Hamilton: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. As to the quotations which the minister is using from my speech, I was under the impression that Hansard was not available officially for such use until the following day. I am wondering whether the minister took down the material that he is using.

Mr. Abbott: What is the question of privilege there?

Mr. Chevrier: No. I did not take the notes. I have the actual words which were uttered by my hon. friend.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Hamilton: —that was my point. Is the minister entitled to abstract material from Hansard before it has been made available to the remaining members of the house? Nobody brought me a copy of Hansard.

Mr. Chevrier: I want to deal with the second inaccuracy in the remarks which my hon. friend made, when he took me to task for the answer which I gave to him on the orders of the day in answer to a question concerning the Wellington street tunnel in Montreal. On that occasion he said this:

> The only trouble was, you see, Mr. Chairman, that despite the fact I had carefully telephoned the minister's office and given him an indication I was going to ask this question . . .

It is true that he telephoned the minister's office five minutes before 2.30 o'clock indicating that he intended to ask the question. The hon. member says that he gave me an indication. The hon. member knows that when he wishes to ask a question in the house the usual procedure is to give notice. The notice may well be oral but if oral notice is given five or ten minutes before the house opens he cannot usually expect to get a complete answer. But in this case he did get a complete answer because it so happened that the hon. member for St. Ann had been dealing with this very matter, although my hon. friend thinks not. He then gets up in the house and says that I refused to answer the second part of his question. Furthermore, he expects and insists that I answer it at a later date. Let us see if I did answer it on the orders of the day. I refer to page 4074 of Hansard of April 14, 1954 where I find the following:

> Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Has he knowledge of any plan for federal aid to improve the Wellington street tunnel in Montreal, or consideration of a new tunnel in its place in the near future?

This was my answer:

> All I can say is that during the sittings of the railways and shipping committee, when Mr. Donald Gordon was under examination, the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Healy) raised the same question. After some discussion during the course of the proceedings the president of the Canadian National Railways undertook to give the matter consideration. I understand since that, because of the representations made by the hon. member for St. Ann, the chief engineer of the Canadian National Railways and one of the representatives of the city of Montreal have been in consultation about the matter.

Then follows the answer to the hon. member's question:

> With reference to the second part of the hon. member's question, as to the tunnel, I would say that the federal government has already provided, in co-operation with the city of Montreal, two tunnels under the Lachine canal, one at St. Remi street and the other at Atwater street, the first at a cost of about $5 million and the second at a cost of about $7 million. I have no information as to any additional tunnels being provided at this time.

That is the second inaccuracy in my hon. friend's statement. The greatest farce, if I may use the expression, about my hon. friend's speech was the attack which he made on the airports of Canada, his unfairness to me in not quoting fully the letter which I sent to the Canadian Aviation magazine and in not quoting a number of other things which I propose to indicate as I go along. My hon. friend used expressions like this:

> . . . we do not find that adequate facilities exist at the present time to compare with the quick moving steps that are being taken by that industry.

Then he said that Canada's airports are shamefully inadequate in almost every case. Again he repeated that Canada's airports are shamefully inadequate in almost every case. Then, to use his own expression, he said a little later that the condition of Canada's airports is such that it is a damning indictment of the Department of Transport across the country. My hon. friend is free to make that statement, and any hon. member is free to make that statement, but what are the facts? The facts are that that is not the position. The facts are that the airports of Canada are as good as any other country. The airport facilities of Canada compare favourably with those of the United States having regard to the population of our country.

I come now to what I think is the unethical part of my hon. friend's attitude.

An hon. Member: He does not mind about that.

Mr. Chevrier: He quoted from a letter which I wrote to Mr. Willmot who is the editor of the magazine, Canadian Aviation. I should like to read the words that my hon. friend quoted from that letter. They were these:

> My own extensive experience as a user of air travel has made me acutely aware for some considerable time that our terminal facilities have not kept pace with the growth of air traffic. In offering these comments I should like to make it clear that I am not apologizing for the present situation since those of us who are responsible have done all that the circumstances in the case have permitted us to do.

Then my hon. friend said, "That is the end of the quotation; and that was the quotation which I intended to use." But that is not the end of the quotation, Mr. Chairman. The letter goes on and explains the position as it is today. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that no hon. member has the right to rise in his place in this house and say that that is the end of a quotation he is using when in fact it is not the end. I will put on record now the remainder of the quotation which my hon. friend forgot to put on Hansard.

An hon. Member: Forgot?

Mr. Chevrier: It reads as follows:

> These circumstances, however, may be of interest to you and your readers, and I should like to place them before you.

There follows the position with reference to air facilities in our country today. I do not want to read the letter but I will deal with air facilities in Canada as I understand them to be and, as I stated earlier, they are excellent. I state now that our airports are in excellent condition. We have one of the finest systems of airports in the world considering our size and population. I say this to my hon. friend, that when one deals with the question of airports there are not only the air terminal buildings, as he seemed to indicate in the latter part of his remarks, but there are the runways, the taxiways, the lighting systems, the meteorological facilities, the radio facilities, and last but not least, the terminal buildings.

It is impossible to have adequate airport facilities in any country unless you start from the bottom, and that is what we did after planning very carefully. We started by building airstrips, and we have two long, strong runways at each of the major airports in Canada, at Gander, Dorval, Malton, Winnipeg and Vancouver. Furthermore, we have established lighting and meteorological facilities since the end of the war in the amount of almost $100 million, so that we have not neglected these facilities in the way that my hon. friend indicates. But my hon. friend seemed to express the same view in his speech that he expressed in an earlier speech and an earlier debate when he said that the Canadian National Railways lacks confidence in this country and that the government lacks confidence in the country. Let me say to him that his speech the other day and his speech today were the most pessimistic speeches I have ever heard in this house. That is why I think I properly termed it "sour grapes".

In the remarks my hon. friend made he was very careful not to quote a number of statements that were made outlining the position of Canada's airport facilities as they are today. Does my hon. friend realize that we in this country, because of the size of Canada, not only have five or six but perhaps ten major airports, that we have ten secondary airports and perhaps 105 or 110 other airports, whereas in the United Kingdom there are not the same number of major airports as we have in Canada? The same can be said of continental Europe. We are in the unfortunate position because of the size of this country that we must have major airports in far greater number than any other country such as those that I have mentioned.

My hon. friend also quoted Sir William Hildred. I thought it was an excellent quotation and I need not repeat it here. But what Sir William Hildred said in the quotation my hon. friend gave is exactly what we are doing in the Department of Transport. I can say this, that in my conversations with Sir William Hildred, he had indicated to me that he believes that we have been farsighted in planning airport sites in Canada. My hon. friend, in quoting from the February issue of Canadian Aviation magazine, quoted three or perhaps four statements made by certain people in the field of aviation, but he omitted or thought wise not to quote several other statements in the same magazine which were favourable to the position of the Department of Transport.

Let me quote what Mr. English says. He is vice-president of Trans-Canada Air Lines, that is the air line which uses the facilities of the Department of Transport far more than anybody else does. He says this:

Mr. Hamilton: And who works for you.

Mr. Chevrier: No, he does not work for me. He works for Trans-Canada Air Lines, and that is not under the Department of Transport.

An hon. Member: Wrong again.

Mr. Chevrier: I quote:

> We feel that within the limits of the money it has had to spend, the Department of Transport has done an excellent job in providing the travelling public with the basic requirements for a safe aeronautical operation. Since the war they have expended their annual budget, which is not large, with emphasis on runways, navigational aids both en route and at terminals, and items of that nature. In our opinion this was the correct approach.

Then, I quote from a statement made by Earle Birney, a Canadian writer and professor of English at the University of British Columbia. He had this to say:

> On the credit side I'd say Canadian air terminals are clean, with good facilities for telephones, telegraphs, enquiry; washrooms good; well heated and ventilated. Passenger handling, baggage, etc., seems fast, courteous, efficient.

Then I quote from a statement made by a British air line executive, as follows:

> In point of fact, I have always been very impressed with the Canadian airports that I have visited in such places as Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver. It appears to me that not only has a great deal of thought gone into their planning, but that by and large there is an excellent mental attitude of flexibility which permits modifications to the facilities as and when they become necessary.
> My own personal view is that this is a proper approach. It is frequently possible to plan for the optimum, but it would be unwise, from a financial point of view to create immediately facilities far beyond the actual and immediate anticipated needs. It is important, in my opinion, so to plan the facilities that they can be increased, modified or amended as the requirements become known.

There are four other quotations that I could give from that issue and the following issue of Canadian Aviation, which my hon. friend could have read, but he put on Hansard the worst possible position in so far as the facilities of the department are concerned. He thus helped to create an impression which I say with the greatest of deference is not in accordance with the facts. I repeat that we in the Department of Transport have had in mind a program of development for our airports. First of all, we had to begin with the facilities that were most important. We did not begin to build air terminal buildings before the business developed, before the air lines could bring in the passengers. We kept that for the last phase of development.

Most of these facilities were built, established and approved by this house when my hon. friend was not a member of this house. I do not say that to him with any degree of reproach, but I ask him to look at some of the things that have been done in the past by the department, in co-operation with other departments. If he had done so, I am sure he would not have made some of the statements that he made this afternoon. With these estimates we are now beginning a program of expansion of air terminals. We have already built two air terminal buildings, one at Moncton and one at the lakehead. I would invite my hon. friend, and any other hon. member in this house, to go to Moncton and the lakehead and see for himself the kind of air terminal building both of these are. Having regard to the population in the areas, they are excellent facilities and compare with similar airports in the United States of which there are a far greater number of people using the air lines than in either the lakehead or Moncton.

We are proceeding to build two other terminal facilities at the moment, one at Gander and one at Saskatoon. They are being built this year. Of course, as my hon. friend says, at Dorval in the city of Montreal we propose building what we expect will be a large terminal building. There are other places in Canada which I need not mention at this time because I have not the time at my disposal at which we propose to proceed with the construction of air terminal buildings. I say that my hon. friend should have a little more confidence in the desire of these employees, these public servants in the Department of Transport who are as anxious as he is to see to it that adequate facilities are provided for the travelling public.

Let me add this. I think that my hon. friend, in his statement of lack of confidence, is also inaccurate and exaggerated, because I do not think that any organization has shown greater confidence in the future of Canada than has the air transport board, the air services branch, and the Canadian National Railways of which my hon. friend was highly critical. I believe no institution has shown greater confidence in Canada in the building of the many lines which it has built, than has the Canadian National Railways. I know the house is not satisfied with the number of lines built and would like to see far more, but so would I and so would the Canadian National. Under all the circumstances, the Canadian National Railways must work with the funds that are available to them.

Lastly, my hon. friend raised the question of a fire boat for the city of Montreal. As I understand my hon. friend is an alderman in the city council, I am sure he knows that fire protection and the like are matters which fall under the jurisdiction of municipalities. The city of Montreal has made representations from time to time, and knows what the position of the federal government is. The position has always been that fire protection is a matter for the municipality, and not for the federal government. There were exceptions during the war that were removed as soon as the war was over. There is one exception in the case of Vancouver, where a subsidy is paid to the city but the ship was furnished at the sole expense of the city of Vancouver. On all occasions I have clearly indicated in this house and elsewhere that if the city of Montreal or any other national harbour wishes to do the same thing as the city of Vancouver, their application will be considered in the same way.

Now my hon. friend also condemns the facilities at Uplands. I doubt that he should have made the statements which he has, because if he had been here the last years he would have seen how the house approved the tremendous expenditure for runways at Uplands. There will be at Uplands, I think, the longest and the strongest runways perhaps of any airport in Canada, and that for specific reasons. We have I.L.S. facilities there; we have established full traffic control facilities such as at Gander and we have the best meteorological facilities. These facilities cost a tremendous amount of money. We have not been able to build air terminal buildings at Uplands thus far, but we will. We will have a small item in the estimates, either later supplementary estimates or next year's main estimates for a terminal building at Uplands.

As I said, planning must begin from the bottom up, and we must wait until we have other facilities before we can go to the fancier and better type of air terminal building. Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say. I think I have established that many of the statements which were made by the hon. member would not have been made, had he known the facts.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with a matter now which I have raised before. It has been brought to the attention of the minister on previous occasions. I refer to the Canadian National Railways line leading out of Edmonton and going east as far as a point called Heinsburg. Heinsburg is west of the Alberta-Saskatchewan boundary, and is only 39 miles away from another point which would complete this line—this point is called Frenchman Butte. For some reason or other—and I still do not know what it is—this line has not been completed. As I said a while ago, I have brought this matter to the attention of the minister before. In 1950 when I did so he gave me a very encouraging reply. He said at that time that the Canadian National Railways officials had this proposed project very high on their list.

Now I do not know what has happened since that time; but I would like to point out to the minister that this particular line is one of the most densely populated farming areas in western Canada. It is also running through an important oil sector known as the Redwater field, one of the biggest oil sectors in western Canada. Then there are other new developments by way of natural gas, and other developments in the oil industry. There is also a salt mine along this particular road.

I would like to know just what the position is today. First of all, why has this matter been left in abeyance until this time? Is there any possibility of this project being dealt with some time in the near future?

Mr. Chevrier: May I say to my hon. friend that what I told him earlier was the position at the time I did indicate it to him. The Heinsburg-Frenchman Butte line is one which has been under discussion in this house for many years by a number of hon. members, including the hon. member for Athabaska, some of the members in the C.C.F. group, and of course the hon. member for Vegreville. They have brought it to the attention of the government.

The position taken by the Canadian National Railways has always been that until there is a sufficient amount of traffic available to make the line profitable, it was not justified in recommending the construction of it to the government. At the time I spoke to the hon. member there was some question as to a mine—I do not know whether it was a salt mine or a mill—that was to be established in the area. I do not think that finally came to fruition. Because of that the Canadian National Railways have not recommended in recent years the construction of that line. However, in view of what my hon. friend has said I will ask them to review the position again, and ascertain if there is any change.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the minister has had occasion to be a bit out of sorts this evening I would like to preface my remarks by thanking him for something, namely the new additions to the old C.N.R. station at Woodstock, Ontario, although I must confess I was not exactly pleased by the manner in which this news was communicated to the riding.

However, before I get around to that I should like to deal first of all with this matter of the Canadian merchant navy, which has been dealt with already by several other hon. members in the debate. At the outset let me say that I fully agree with the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert with regard to the merchant navy, and as to why at all costs Canada should retain her merchant fleet.

The merchant marine of this country is every bit as essential an arm of our defence forces as are the army, the air force and the navy; and I think it is a very dangerous thing for any government to take a chance on gambling on the security of the country, when it comes to a small subsidy of $100,000 for a ship which, I understand, would amount to a total of about $3 million.

In the hope that I may not be accused of making inaccurate or wild statements, I should like to point out something which I think will back up my argument that the merchant navy is as important in its own way as the other fighting forces of Canada. First of all, let us take the example we have often heard. We have heard it said that Canada does not need a merchant navy because if there is a war we could send our goods to those points in the world they may have to go by using ships of the United Kingdom, the United States or others of our allies. That, of course, is very true. But the same argument might apply to our regular navy, that we can be well defended by the ships of the United States and of the United Kingdom. And if the argument is carried to its extreme it could be used in connection with the air force and the army.

I am sure no hon. member would agree with that argument. But if we are to take the argument to its logical conclusion, that is where it would lead. I feel Canada should do its share to maintain its merchant navy, or its share of the merchant fleet of the allied countries. Let us see for example what might happen if we do not have a merchant navy of our own. It might very well occur that Canadian materials of war would have to be shipped to some countries in, let us say, South America, during the term of the so-called cold war. It might be that, for reasons of international policy, ships of the United States or the United Kingdom might not wish to carry those arms. How could we get them there?

Perhaps that is a hypothetical example, but it illustrates the point I make. Let us also suppose that there might be a sudden invasion of the northern part of Canada, and that we might be required to get supplies and equipment up there. With no merchant ships of our own, it might be that our neighbour to the south would not have any ships available.

That is an example of what could happen, and for these reasons I say it is dangerous to be without a merchant marine. Then, a further point is that in the event of a world war, Canadian harbour, dock and repair facilities would be a little farther out of the reach of potential enemy bombers than are the great cities of Europe or, for that matter, the large centres of the United States. If we let our merchant marine go completely, it would mean that dockyard workers would be out of practice in repairing ships. Our repair facilities probably would be transferred to some other type of industry. These facts, in themselves, are dangerous.

Perhaps the most important reason of all from the point of view of defence for retaining the merchant marine is the question of what is likely to happen if there is another war. If war should break out—and I am referring of course to a general world war—undoubtedly it would come with unexpected swiftness, and might very well be decided in a few days. Undoubtedly the large ports of England, the continent and the United States would be hit by nuclear weapons; atomic or hydrogen bombs, or future refinements of the same thing. With the possible exceptions of Vancouver, Halifax and Montreal, most Canadian ports would not likely be the targets for those atomic or hydrogen bombs. And, with all due respect to Halifax and Vancouver, I doubt very much whether even they would be thus attacked. Montreal would be the only imminent possibility, or probability. The same could not be said of San Francisco, New York, Boston or Philadelphia.

It is very likely that in these great world ports a large amount of the merchant shipping which would be available to the allies would be knocked out of commission right off the bat. If Canada keeps a merchant marine, even though it is a small one, there is a reasonable chance that a certain proportion of it at some time or other would also be in Canadian ports. Those few ships of ours, even though they might form a very small percentage of the merchant pool of shipping, might prove to be the saving factor in a future world war, because we would have them and our larger allies, the United States and the United Kingdom, might be temporarily incapacitated by a sudden and unexpected attack. Because of the new type of warfare that may be carried on I feel that even a few extra ships at Saint John, Halifax, Quebec and St. John's, Newfoundland might form the saving grace at some future time.

Another matter to which I should like to refer is that of training personnel. Unlike at the time of the second world war when Canada had a very small permanent navy to start with—we had to rely to a very great extent at that time on former merchant service people to help man the ships which we obtained from the United States or we eventually built ourselves—we have a large number of ex-naval personnel who are civilians in active or inactive reserves. We have a much larger permanent navy, but nevertheless a lot of people who are in the naval reserve, active or inactive, have been away from the ships a long time. In addition to that, some people who have recently joined the permanent navy have not had too much experience of seamanship and navigation. I should like to remind hon. members who have never been in the navy that you cannot learn seamanship or navigation overnight or out of a textbook. You have to get that by experience. In the event of war breaking out the navy will require tugs, tenders and all that sort of thing, not to mention trained seamen to man new ships or ships pulled out of mothballs here or in the United States. We would require personnel who are competent seamen and competent navigators. They would be the saving factor that they were the last time. For these reasons it is a great mistake, for the matter of $3 million, to sacrifice our merchant navy.

Let me summarize once more the reasons why I think it is necessary to have a pool of trained personnel in the event of an emergency. First of all, there is the fact that the great ports with large numbers of merchant shipping in the United States and the United Kingdom could very well be knocked out of commission at the start of a war which involved nuclear weapons. Any Canadian ships that were lying in Canadian ports would be a safety factor.

Then, there is the fact that it is dangerous to let our shipbuilding facilities go out of commission, which will undoubtedly happen if we let our merchant navy disappear. Lastly, and probably the most important, is the fact that the merchant service is a branch of our armed services, the same as the regular navy, the army and the air force, because in the matter of logistics it requires the merchant navy to keep the supplies of material in position at points A and B. Without a merchant navy we are placing ourselves in a dangerous position and gambling with the safety of our country for a so-called pittance of $3 million, which is a pittance when compared with the rest of the defence estimates.

There are two other items which I should like to deal with very briefly. The first is the matter of the St. Lawrence seaway. I was pleased to observe in the press today that we are going to start building the seaway in two weeks' time. This will be of very great value not only to the riding I represent but to all the ridings in southwestern Ontario. The very fact that small ocean freighters and large lake freighters will be able to move freely along that waterway will make a great deal of difference. For example, limestone, which is found in the township of West Zorra—and I believe it is the highest grade of limestone in North America for smelting purposes—can be moved down the St. Lawrence to Sydney and to the smelting mills which may be built down the St. Lawrence. Large bulky cargoes, such as turnips, tobacco and machinery can be moved by slow water transport along with limestone and be of great assistance to my part of the country. In return, coal can be brought back from Cape Breton and thereby help the hon. member for Cape Breton South to get rid of the coal they have down there, which we hear a lot about. That coal can be brought up to various parts of Ontario where it can be used, although it is soft coal rather than hard.

The last item I should like to mention is again a localized item in my particular riding. I refer to the railway station which I mentioned earlier in my remarks. This station was built 85 years ago, and I am very glad to know that it is to be fixed up. The sum of $35,000 is to be spent on it. I was pleased to see the suggested plans for improving the station, and they look very good to me. One of the particular objections there is not that the station is old and decrepit, so to speak. We could get along with it if there was some better way of getting to it in the city of Woodstock.

I should like to point out to the minister, as I have already done to Mr. Donald Gordon, for the purpose of the record, that the Canadian National railway station at Woodstock is located to the south of the city.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Eighty per cent of the city is to the north of the tracks. The only way of getting to the railway station from the rest of the city is over a very narrow one-way wooden bridge. "One-way" is perhaps not completely accurate. Two automobiles can pass on the bridge, but they will scrape fenders. If you get a truck or a transport or anything of that nature on the bridge it is impossible for more than one vehicle at a time to go over the bridge. This bridge is built in the shape of a large rounded arc. If you start from one side of the bridge you cannot see whether anything is coming up from the other side, and if you meet another vehicle in the middle one of you has to give way, and it is usually not the truck.

As I said, this bridge was built about 85 years ago. In the wintertime it is heavily covered with ice. A traffic problem is created at the bottom of either end of this bridge. There are frequent petty accidents, and it makes it almost impossible to get to the station on time. It too frequently happens that somebody trying to get to the station leaves to get there on time and he gets to one end of the bridge and finds some big transport or truck still on the bridge or coming over and the individual finally arrives just in time to see the train pulling out of the station.

As I say, this bridge which forms the main method of approach to the station, was built many years ago before the age of large transports and motor trucks. To aggravate the situation even further, on the same side of the railway tracks as the station there is a company which manufactures trucks and trailer equipment, and there is a large transport company as well, the vehicles of which go over this bridge all the time, not to mention the regular farmers' trucks and everything else and the other delivery trucks that use the bridge. In addition, one of the largest feed companies in Canada, the Purina Company, has commenced to build six new grain elevators on the south side of the railway tracks, on the same side as the station is located, and more trucks will be going over and the problem will be getting worse instead of better.

All this leads up to one thing. As I said before, we are very grateful to have the station fixed up and to have modern facilities of all kinds there, to have it well lighted and a clean and comfortable waiting room; but if we can get a modern two-way approach to the railway station from the main part of the city we shall be even happier. So that the minister will draw no wrong inferences from my remarks I should say that there are ways of getting from the main part of the city to the Canadian National Railway station apart from this one-way approach. If you go about ten blocks one way it is possible to cross the tracks, but it is an exceedingly long and roundabout method. At the other end of this railway station there is a narrow wooden bridge of the same vintage as the one I mentioned earlier, but I do not think it has been used at any time. Because the approaches to this other narrow wooden bridge are so difficult to get at no one ever used it and I believe it is narrower than the first one I mentioned. To conclude my remarks on the station I would just like to express the hope that this matter will be referred through the minister to the C.N.R. officials so they can study it at some future date.

Lastly, and before sitting down, I would like to refer to a local railway crossing in the county of Oxford which is quite famous in that part of the country, but famous inasmuch as it collects anywhere from between one and two to several, which is more than two, carloads of people every year. This railway crossing, known as Creditville, crosses No. 2 highway, one of the principal highways in Ontario. This crossing carries the main Canadian National railway line from Montreal to Chicago and one of the principal reasons for the multiplicity of accidents at this Creditville crossing is due to the fact that it is double track. People see the train coming one way and start up before realizing that a train is coming from the other direction concealed by one of the passing trains.

I do not think there is a railway crossing in western Ontario which has had a greater number of accidents than this one. No doubt the minister will be able to check into that. There might be some others which have as many but none I think have more. The terrain there would not be suitable for the construction of an overpass, but it would be very suitable for the construction of an underpass. I do not think it would be very expensive, particularly in view of the fact that it would prevent a great many accidents in future.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to allow this opportunity to pass without expressing the appreciation of the people at the lakehead for the construction of the airport there. We asked for a permanent building about five years ago and we have now got one of the finest in Canada. It was constructed two years ago and the runways are to be extended so that the largest planes in Canada can land there. Those hon. members who expect to make a trip to Vancouver this fall will get an eyeful.

I have just one more thing to say, namely that this is in keeping with Canada's need. The head of the lakes is fast becoming the hub of Canada and with the opening of the St. Lawrence waterways that airfield will be greatly in demand. I have one request though to make of the minister and that is that when the contract in regard to this work is being let he will see to it that local labour is employed and not men from Toronto and Montreal or anywhere else who cannot do half as good a day's work as the men from the head of the lakes.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we live in an age of rapid transit I am sure the Minister of Transport will not have too much difficulty in moving his mind back and forth from one side of the country to the other, and perhaps rather rapidly on occasions.

I have some matters I would like to draw to his attention particularly when we are discussing this item on his estimates. I have had some matters brought to my attention which represent quite a considerable problem, and while I am coming to realize that the department for which the minister is responsible is a very complicated one—one in which some of the complications arise out of the fact that the technical questions in relation to transport are becoming increasingly complex—and that can to some extent be explained by the fact that his department, perhaps as much as any other, is affected by the current growing pains of the Canadian nation.

I think you will understand that in various parts of this country today various problems arise which affect every one of us specifically. However, on this occasion I will attempt to set these problems before him and the house and then attempt to draw one or two conclusions which I hope he will consider to be of a constructive nature as they affect the solving of these problems.

I think I can do this in no better fashion than by making reference to some of the communications I have received since I became a member of this house, all of which are related directly or indirectly to the question of transportation. I will start by mentioning a typical one which was addressed to me by the secretary of the co-operative at a place known as Owen Bay. The letter reads as follows:

> We wish to call to your attention the serious situation arising from the fact that residents of the numerous islands are left without adequate boat service.

That is typical of the sort of letter which I seem to have been receiving in an almost endless chain. Similar letters come to me from such places as Mansons Landing and Seaford; in fact, Mrs. Dowling of Seaford wrote me as follows:

I am taking the liberty of writing you a few lines to see if you could help us to get the boat to stop in at Seaford again.

I feel rather foolish about the boat not calling at Seaford as I made a trip over to the public works department at New Westminster in regard to the float at Seaford.

It appears that the wharf there was eventually repaired but by the time it was repaired the boat in question had decided not to call there any more. She goes on:

We are getting to the point where we don't know whether to laugh, cry or sell our places and head for the city.

My grandfather was one of the first settlers here so, of course, I rather hate to leave if there is any chance of getting things straightened out again.

Then I have another letter from this place which states:

I am dropping you a letter regarding our mail service at Seaford P.O. which is non-existent at the present time.

We trust that you will be able to contact the correct party and have the aforesaid condition corrected.

I assumed that in this instance the correct party would be the Postmaster General and I wrote him and received a very courteous response to my inquiry in regard to this matter. Here is a case where, in effect, I would like to come to the aid of the Postmaster General through the good offices of the Minister of Transport. I think this letter from the Postmaster General dealing with this problem serves to illustrate very well the nature of the problem which I can see developing in the coastal areas of British Columbia. The Postmaster General's letter reads as follows:

At the beginning of February 1953 information was received that the wharf had become unserviceable, and steamer calls were discontinued. It was therefore necessary to discontinue the above mail service. Arrangements were made for a temporary service between Seaford post office and Mansons Landing.

Later the letter continues:

There was some question of whether the Department of Public Works would repair the wharf at Seaford, but eventually they decided to do so. Repairs were completed in December 1953 and it was anticipated that the regular Seaford and wharf mail service, described in the first paragraph, would be resumed.

However, even though the wharf was repaired, the Tidewater Shipping Company advised that they were unwilling to call at Seaford directly—

So that, under the circumstances, he goes on to say that they were not in a position to give that mail service. Then we come to another island, namely Hornby island, where over a period of time they have been attempting to develop some sort of ferry service to replace the steamer service which is no longer existent so far as that island is concerned. In a communication from the Hornby island people setting forth their problem, we find it described in this fashion:

Existing Conditions

1. A beach landing craft ferry boat is now operating on a daily schedule under a provincial government subsidy of $5,000 per annum. This ferry is now the only means of passenger and freight transportation to and from Hornby island. No other boat service is available or pending.

2. The ferry is operating at present between Gravelly bay (Denman island) and Phipps point (Hornby island) because the latter is the only point where cars can embark or land at present.

3. The service is crippled by lack of adequate landings. At no tide lower than 6 feet can cars embark or disembark under any circumstances on either side of the channel.

4. Tides during the winter are reasonably high during the daytime so that in general service has been maintained, though in a hazardous fashion in rough weather and particularly in snow and ice conditions.

5. Tides during the summer months are generally low during the daytime and service will be seriously curtailed during the time when it is most needed and particularly during the tourist season from June to September.

6. There is no protection whatsoever available for the boat when tied up and during stormy weather conditions are extremely hazardous to its safety.

That communication sets forth another aspect of this problem. Then we go up a little bit further north to Quadra island. In a brief drawn up by the Quadra island ratepayers association and endorsed by the Campbell River chamber of commerce some facts in connection with their problems are set forth as follows:

The residents of Quadra island have been attempting to have a car ferry instituted between Campbell River and Quathiaski Cove. Transportation between these points is now served by a small passenger vessel of twenty-four person capacity.

This vessel, which has outgrown its usefulness, is subsidized by the provincial government. The present provincial minister of public works, the Hon. P. A. Gaglardi, recognizes the merits of our necessity for better transportation by agreeing to raise the subsidy to such a level that it will make the operation of a combined car and passenger ferry possible.

However it is his contention that the necessary landing slips are the responsibility of the federal government. The Hon. Mr. Gaglardi points out that the federal government constructed car ferry landing slips in the Gulf islands recently, and suggests there is no reason they shouldn't build them here.

We have recently been in communication with Hon. R. H. Winters, federal Minister of Public Works, requesting that he give favourable consideration to our request. This he has failed to do, contending that the slips are the responsibility of the provincial government and we must look to our local authorities for help.

If the Minister of Public Works were here, I am sure he would agree that the correspondence and the discussions I have had with him confirm that particular statement with regard to the policy of this government.

Then we move across to the far west coast of Vancouver island where Canada really meets the Pacific. I have here a letter from a gentleman by the name of Mr. Rustaud. He discussed the sort of boat service they have on the west coast of the island and asks me to do something about it. In this letter he explained how he has been living on that west coast for the last thirty or forty years and that never in his experience has the boat service been as bad as it is at the present time. Just to show that the Canadian people, wherever they are located, retain some sense of humour, may I say that I have even had suggestions coming from the west coast of the island that they might consider establishing a mule service across the back of Vancouver island. In describing the problem they had, he said that they do not know whether they can provide the right kind of snowshoes for winter service across the mountains or whether they should use mules or donkeys for the purpose.

Then I also have here a letter from the secretary of the Zeballos school district, which is a copy of a letter which he wrote to the department of education in Victoria. Apparently the department had been complaining that the necessary documents of the Zeballos school district were not reaching Victoria within the prescribed time according to the provincial education regulations. He has to reply and explain just what happens in order for them to get their mail, bank vouchers and that sort of thing back and forth. Here is a telegram which I received from Kyuquot and which states:

> Our telegram today's date sent forward to Postmaster General Ottawa requesting an immediate extension of air mail services to Kyuquot post office.

This telegram is dated January 3. They say the last mail delivery received was on December 15. Anyone who had been reading the British Columbia papers at that time would recall that a good many of the residents on the west coast of the island did not get their Christmas mail or their Christmas supplies.

Then we come back again to Texada island which is in the gulf. There we find a situation arising out of the fact that the C.P.R. steamer service to Powell River, which had included this island as a port of call, was being withdrawn and that the residents not only of Powell River but of Texada island were not going to have any means whatever of getting their cars in and out of that area. It is perfectly true that plans had been made for the building of a road and the establishment of a car ferry which would make car and truck transport to Powell River a possibility. But we find there a situation where a service which has been provided for years is being arbitrarily withdrawn before any substitute is provided to take its place. In the last few years that sort of thing has been happening all over the coastal area. When you follow through correspondence like that which comes consistently from so many places, it seems to me that a sort of pattern begins to emerge. I could, of course, have read a great many more letters than those which I have read, and I could have referred to other places to which I have not referred. Partly because of improved technical facilities and methods of transportation I feel that not only is a revolution taking place in transportation all over Canada but that a particularly difficult one is taking place in an area which relies on a complicated combination of air travel and sea travel and, in some instances, road travel.

It seems to me that a few things emerge out of that picture. In my opinion no one in the house can quarrel with the idea that the purpose of the functioning of the Department of Transport is to assist in meeting the transportation needs of the people of Canada and that if this is not being done then all these millions of dollars or a large part of them are really being spent to no avail.

It seems to me that the correspondence to which I have referred indicates that somehow or other there is a lack of proper co-ordination between the various agencies interested in transportation. It would appear to me that the administration of the various agencies within the Department of Transport, such as the air transport board, the board of transport commissioners and the Canadian maritime commission, is being carried out by very competent people so far as any experience I have had in dealing with them is concerned. However, with respect to an area such as the part of Canada in which I live it would appear that these bodies are not being co-ordinated so that there is an over-all arrangement.

I think further that while the pattern shows that so far as the Department of Transport, the Department of Public Works and the Post Office Department are concerned, each one may be attempting to do a good job within its own sphere. Nevertheless there is no co-ordinated arrangement to see that the most effective type of service is given. I also believe that the car ferry transportation situation to which I have referred indicates that some better form of co-ordination must be devised between the federal transport authorities and the same agencies at the provincial level than exists at the present time. I cannot see that it is necessary, for example, that there should be a runaround on the question of responsibility for a ferry slip here or a ferry slip there, and the people in various communities should not have to resort to the haphazard hit and miss method of appealing first here and then there in order to get action.

Suggestions are being offered in various quarters now that there should be ferry services here and there, but no one seems to accept the responsibility for creating an over-all pattern of transportation development. With the technical advances that are being made it would appear to me that that is becoming an increasingly necessary thing to do. As one of the new members of the house I hesitate to attempt to make any detailed analysis of the over-all policy that should be established with regard to such a complicated department as the Department of Transport, but if I may be permitted to make one or two observations I would say that in my opinion there has to be a change in the fundamental concept of the function of the department.

The functions of such bodies as the board of transport commissioners, the air transport board and the Canadian maritime commission are primarily concerned under the present set-up with the question of regulation; they are regulating bodies. It seems to me that if the transportation needs of the country, particularly of the part of Canada which I have been describing, are going to be met the concept of a regulating body has to be changed to that of a planning and co-ordinating body, and that there must be a close liaison between the various forms of transportation.

Some hon. members will recall that for quite a long period of years a subsidy of $100,000 a year, I believe, was paid towards the operation of the famous west coast steamer, the Princess Maquinna. She has now seen the end of her service but while in operation met a need which could have been eliminated almost overnight if certain highways had been built by the provincial government. Without attempting to go too deeply into the question of federal participation in developing a highway system, I believe that in the long run it would be sounder economics if the $100,000 a year which was paid for many years from the federal coffers had been used to assist in the development of a highway system on Vancouver island so that the west coast communities might have had quick and easy access by road to the rest of Canada. We would now have something to show for the money whereas that subsidy, as indeed in the case of every other subsidy that might be granted, is in effect money down the drain.

I do not know that I expect the minister to accept my thinking with respect to planning transportation entirely, but it seems to me that within certain limitations there has been very effective planning of transportation in Canada. Where some of our able people have been put to work they have produced such services as Trans-Canada Air Lines. The only point I make there is that the planning does not go far enough. It seems to me that if the transportation needs of Canada were regarded as something to be provided for by a national public utility like the Post Office Department it would be possible to plan an over-all transportation system. No one, I think, would quarrel with the idea that it would not be proper if mail service was established from Ottawa to Vancouver and stopped at Vancouver with the result that people living anywhere beyond Vancouver had to get their mail by any sort of hit-or-miss arrangement that they might be able to devise.

In my opinion transportation falls essentially into the same category as the postal service so far as the people of Canada are concerned, and because of the kind of transportation methods being developed I believe the time has come when the only agency in Canada that can accept over-all responsibility for the co-ordination of that service is the federal government. If that responsibility were accepted then provision could be made for the most logical methods of transportation to all communities in Canada, either inland or coastal.

So far as I can see, it would not necessarily mean that some new transportation monopoly would have to be set up. It would mean that there would be responsibility upon someone to see that the most economic transportation services were being provided to all the people, just as the postal authorities accept the responsibility for seeing that the mail is carried by the best possible method. Of course, the mail service, as indicated by some of these letters, is very closely tied to the question of transportation facilities that are available. To that extent, at least we could be killing two birds with one stone.

I would suggest that as a minimum step in this direction consideration should be given to extending the powers of the Canadian maritime commission at least to equal the powers of the air transport board with regard to arranging what facilities are going to be provided, and under what conditions. The arbitrary manner in which various steamer services are being withdrawn, without any regard as to whether a substitute for them is available, certainly is not creating a satisfactory situation so far as the people in the coastal areas of British Columbia are concerned. When I say that I do not mean that I feel steamer services should have to continue to operate where their operation is completely uneconomic. It should be obvious that with the proper development of the road system, and the use that people are making of cars and trucks, this question of car ferry service is closely tied in with a proper solution of the transportation problem on the coast.

Certainly the passing of responsibility from one level of government to another is not something that should continue. I feel that in mentioning this subject under the estimates of the Minister of Transport I am attempting to point out the fact it is a problem that is beyond the range of policy of only the Department of Public Works or only the Post Office Department. So far as I can see the only department of the federal government that can make a move in the direction of a logical solution is the department for which the Minister of Transport is responsible.

Mr. Michener: Before we start the consideration of the details of these estimates, I should like to invite the minister's comments on a problem that has not been raised so far this session, that is the problem of the control of that unwelcome by-product of steam transportation, smoke. I shall just take a moment, Mr. Chairman, to indicate to the minister what I have in mind. There have been a good many studies of the control of smoke and air pollution in the major cities. I suggest that it is a matter of concern for the Department of Transport, one of the many concerns of that department, because steam locomotives and steamships are very substantial contributors to air pollution and they are not so directly under the control of the municipalities as industrial plants and other factories, which add to the pollution of the air in our major cities.

I wish to refer to a paper by Professor E. A. Allcut, of the department of mechanical engineering of the University of Toronto which was delivered last year to the American Society of Mechanical Engineers. In this paper he says:

> Among the worst offenders with regard to smoke emission are the railroads and steamships, but the municipal authorities have no control over these agencies, as they are under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners for Canada. This is a dominion (federal) board and has the usual characteristics of a governmental department.

I am not sure whether that last ambiguous statement is by way of praise or condemnation. He goes on to refer to the problem on the Detroit river where there is a great deal of shipping and transport, and then he comes back to the question of the railways in these words:

> The railways also are causing some trouble, particularly in the round-houses. However, they are installing oil lighting-up systems and external steam-starting equipment in several places and are giving special instruction to firemen on proper methods of lighting-up and feeding the fires.

Then, he refers to certain general orders of control and goes on to say that the solution lies largely in the adoption of the diesel locomotive.

Just to give the background of my reason for referring to this matter, Mr. Chairman, the main problem is in the bigger cities. Toronto according to the Ringelmann scale which is used by people who make these studies has an index of smoke density of ten, which is the highest in Canada and is shared by Hamilton, Kingston, Saint John. Montreal, the largest city in Canada, has an index of nine. I should like also to refer to a chart showing the density of pollution in the city of Toronto. This is rather an older chart, 1932, and it indicates that the greatest deposition of smoke material in Toronto is in the vicinity of King and University avenues, just opposite the railway station. At that point the deposit of solids in tons per square mile per year was 645 tons. Going north a half mile to College and University, it is reduced to 453 tons, about two-thirds as much.

The cities have been making substantial efforts to control this problem through by-laws. What I wish to ask the minister to consider is whether there is anything further that can be done under the direction of his department to limit or reduce the pollution in so far as it comes from railway locomotives. I have the figures on dieselization, if I may use that term, on the Canadian National, and the Canadian Pacific has about the same ratio. At the end of last year the steam locomotives numbered 1,804, that is road locomotives, and switching locomotives numbered 498. Then, there were 33 electric locomotives, and I would like to ask the minister where those are employed.

Then we come to the diesels. Of diesel electric road locomotives there were 176; road switching, 101, and diesel switching locomotives, 226. The use of diesels in the larger cities for switching purposes, if practicable, for purposes of taking trains in and out, would make a great contribution to the solution of this difficulty.

And it is not an imaginary difficulty. A normal human being takes in 30 pounds of air each day, 2·7 pounds of food and 4·5 pounds of water. We are very careful about the food, and the purity of the water. Notwithstanding the fact, however, that we take in a great deal more air—and some of us seem to give out a great deal of it—we are not so careful about the purity of the air.

While this subject may be considered somewhat remote from a discussion of the estimates, it seemed to me that this was the proper place to raise the issue. I feel some help can be given to the cities. While those cities can inspect locomotives and their fires, to see whether they are being properly fired, they appear to have no control over their operation.

As a final word on the subject may I refer to inspections. Up to July 1 last year, inspectors in Toronto inspected 5,940 industrial plants, 3,787 locomotives and 24 ships, making a total of 9,700 inspections of smoke-emitting fires and furnaces. Inspections disclosed unsatisfactory conditions in 398 plants, 108 locomotives and 22 ships. So that there is a real problem here which may be a proper subject for the minister's attention.

Mr. Chevrier: May I take only a moment to deal with this problem, which is indeed a very important and difficult one. I have no doubt the statements made by the hon. member for St. Paul's about the density of smoke in Montreal and Toronto are accurate. The problem has been approached in Montreal—and I shall refer later to Toronto, although I do not know just how it has been dealt with there. But in Montreal the problem was pretty serious and acute, and it was felt that the municipality should do something about it. They made representations to the board of transport commissioners. While the board may not have direct jurisdiction, it does have some control over smoke nuisance. They suggested in the course of the hearing that took place that a committee be established, and this was done by the city of Montreal. It was composed of engineers from that city, as well as representatives from the board of transport commissioners and other groups, such as the board of trade.

I recall that I saw a delegation of about 25 people from Montreal three years ago with respect to this subject. They were then seeking to remove the smoke from the Turcot yard roundhouse. While they did not succeed entirely, their efforts were not in vain because in their anxiety to assist the Canadian National Railways added new equipment which proved to be helpful. While I am not suggesting that the problem in Montreal has been solved—because it has not—the fact is that it has been attacked in a different fashion. Since that time the railways have decided to dieselize their service.

I know that in Toronto, while there are still some steam locomotives operating in and out of the city, there are far more diesels being operated now than ever before. And with the coming into operation of more and more diesels and switchers the condition will be improved substantially.

The hon. member dealt also with steamships. The board of transport commissioners has no jurisdiction over steamships, certainly not over the smoke emitted from the stacks of steamships. I should think that perhaps if a committee such as the one to which I have already referred has not been established in Toronto, that might be the method of approaching it. I know the railways are anxious to find new technical developments which will assist in doing away with smoke. I can assure my hon. friend that the railways, both the C.N.R. and the C.P.R., in co-operation with the board of transport commissioners, are giving the matter serious consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of taking much time during the debate on the estimates of the Department of Transport.

However, I believe I would be remiss in my duty if I did not inform the house at the proper moment of the opinion not only of the constituents I have the honour of representing but also of all the citizens of Quebec city, on two thorny problems which arouse public opinion at home.

My fellow citizens of Quebec who like their city and have for it a deep attachment are as concerned as anyone else about its progress, development and improvement.

Quebec's greatest industry is undoubtedly the tourist trade which brings every year numerous visitors to the old capital; it has indeed become proverbial and is generally recognized.

Millions of people visit us each year, confident that they will find in Quebec something different, in our way of life, our tradition and our history, as well as in our sites that so eloquently tell of our past.

Referring to the capital city of my province, we always say "Old Quebec". Is it because our city has existed since 1608, when it was founded by Samuel de Champlain, that is, 350 years ago, or is the expression meant to underline conditions which have existed too long already and cannot be improved because of a lack of co-operation?

Both interpretations of the term "Old Quebec" are full of truth, but I prefer the former to the latter, which I endeavoured to reproduce faithfully.

Without further delay, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) will allow me, no doubt, in the name of those I represent, as well as in the name of the people of the city of Quebec in general, to discuss as briefly as possible these two problems which are vital to the development and progress of the city of Quebec, namely to remove level crossings, deepen the St. Charles river and put an end to water pollution in the Lairet river.

The Chairman: Order. May I interrupt the hon. member, in view of the fact that we are expecting a message. Shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again?

Mr. Harris: Yes, later this day.

Item stands.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of supply, item 443, Department of Transport. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. I am very sorry but I believe the hon. member for Quebec West had the floor.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: It is surely not a new thing for those who live in Quebec to hear about those two problems this subject having been on everybody's lips for the past 25 years and more.

The Quebec municipal council or our chamber of commerce have on occasion been requested to express the whole population's point of view on this matter, so that this problem may be solved with the least possible delay. These two very important and highly representative public bodies have been joined by a great number of organizations of no less importance, social clubs for instance, whose devotion and merits are countless and various citizens' leagues formed in every ward of the old capital city.

All these groups, on several occasions in the last quarter century, and on behalf of all the people of Quebec, have demanded the removal of a number of level crossings situated in two historic constituencies of the capital, namely Quebec East, represented in this house by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and Quebec West, which I have the great honour of representing in the national parliament of the Canadian people.

On September 17, 1953, the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada held hearings in Quebec city. On that occasion Quebec city, in conjunction with the Quebec chamber of commerce, submitted to the commissioners a brief including a serious and exhaustive study on the removal of the main level crossings in Quebec city.

On February 3, 1954, the representatives of those two influential bodies who had been summoned to Ottawa heard a report and a discussion on the written briefs of the railway companies on the general problem of level crossings across the country. They argued their case in a summary way and promised to produce an additional brief with comments on:

1. The general principles set forth by the companies.

2. Their suggestions or recommendations on the general problem and its several aspects, financial, legal and so forth.

3. The level crossing conditions peculiar to Quebec city.

I do not intend to mention here all the discussions that went on then, but I want to point out the rather strange position taken by the railway companies who wanted the Canadian taxpayers to bear the cost of that grade crossing removal in direct proportion to the benefits they would derive from it.

The companies claim that they should not be called upon to pay for any improvements or systems of protection at grade crossings, when the work is required for the benefit of the users of the road or the public in general, particularly when the railroad has been in existence for a long time. The companies also claim that the road transport companies which compete with them would benefit from, and enjoy all improvements made, without having anything to pay.

In a word, the railway companies warn the general public that if improvements and appropriate protection are deemed necessary, the public should pay for them in the proportion of 90 per cent, while they—the railway companies—would only pay 10 per cent, and this only in the cases that are considered.

The federal government is asked to pay 70 per cent, the provincial and municipal governments not less than 20 per cent.

The federal government can certainly contribute the main part of the amount since it collects from the Canadian taxpayers 77 per cent of the total national revenue. It seems altogether absurd to ask the provinces, which collect only 13 per cent of the taxpayers' money, and the municipalities, who get barely 10 per cent, to contribute for that purpose. Personally, I think that the federal government and the railroads should bear the whole cost of those improvements.

The grade crossing situation in the city of Quebec is intolerable. Not only does it endanger the lives of the individual citizens but it brings about traffic congestion which is detrimental to the best interests of the city. All day long, numerous passenger and freight trains use the tracks in both directions and very often it seems that the trains are assembled right where the level crossings are situated.

Not only does that fact create a constant risk of death but such interruptions of traffic are prejudicial to the interests of Quebec city. That deplorable situation surely does not encourage the numerous tourists who visit us each year to make, upon their return to their own country, the kind of publicity we would like to have.

Following representations made by the Quebec municipal authorities, the Quebec chamber of commerce and every important organization in the old capital, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the government to give this serious and urgent problem all the attention it deserves and remedy the situation with the least possible delay. By doing so, the government will enable people from Quebec to add, without hesitation, when asserting that they love their city, that they are also proud of it.

I take this opportunity to submit another request to the Minister of Transport and I am confident that he will gladly support it.

There is only a central station in Quebec city; it is located, as we know, in the eastern part of St. Roch ward. Since the population of Quebec now exceeds 200,000, not counting its floating population, the station has become inadequate for the needs of the large number of people who have to use it. As a result, at certain hours of the day when trains arrive and depart, there is a traffic bottleneck in all the lower part of the city that greatly delays travellers anxious to return home.

I therefore ask for the construction of a new station, which is vitally needed in Quebec, and this station should be located, as everybody agrees, at the foot of St. Sacrement hill, at the limits of the city of Quebec, for the convenience, first of all, of the people of the constituency of Quebec West, and of an important part of the constituency of Quebec South, including the town of Sillery and the municipality of Ste. Foy in the constituency of Quebec-Montmorency. This station would serve a community of no less than 100,000 people.

I lay this request before the minister, and I feel assured that he will take into consideration the interest of the people of the city of Quebec.

The second urgent problem, which I have had the opportunity of mentioning several times already since the beginning of this session, has to do with the deepening of the St. Charles river and the purification of the Lairet river, both of which run through the Prime Minister's constituency.

The St. Charles river, moreover, runs between the riding of Quebec East and the constituency which I have the honour of representing in this house.

For at least 25 years and to a growing extent these two rivers have been little else to the people of Quebec than open air sewers. From them rise nauseating odours that threaten the health of our people. These sickening smells are particularly offensive in the densely populated St. Sauveur and Limoilou districts inhabited by fine, low-salaried working people who, during the summer, have to breathe the foul smells rising from these veritable dumps. These working people are not sufficiently well off to be able to spend the summer in the country and enjoy it as do those who have more money. It would seem that these families, which for the greater part are large, are entitled to some consideration. They should not be forced, during the summer, to breathe these innumerable foul stenches, to say the least, with which these rivers are polluted. The doctors of Quebec all agree in branding these rivers as a source of infection which may well breed contagious diseases, and even epidemics.

I have often heard it said in Quebec city that when there is a flu epidemic or an epidemic of some sort of fever, it is on account of a virus that spreads in the air. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that a more thorough medical investigation would soon show that such a virus—there may be more than one—is to be found only in the St. Charles and Lairet rivers.

I want to assert again that a lot of diseases with which our people are stricken are due to the infectious conditions to be found in these two rivers which are a constant health hazard.

I have already appealed directly to the right hon. Prime Minister in order that those projects which everyone in Quebec is asking for may be started without further delay. Unfortunately I received no answer, and no hope has been given to our good people.

In the dying days of this session I appeal again to the right hon. Prime Minister to provide the solution which every citizen of Quebec is waiting for. The carrying out of such projects would first of all protect the health of our people, it would improve the aspect of Quebec, would free our people from the foul smell of that open air sewage, and would help to solve in Quebec unemployment conditions which are still acute.

People ought to stop telling us that there is no money. The Canadian nation has never been taxed to such an extent since its very beginning, and the federal treasury never was so full.

I do not object to Canada helping foreign nations, and presenting India with $20 million so that it may build a hydro project.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Order.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Dufresne: —but please let us not be so prodigal with the people's money, before our own population benefits from projects that are essential to the protection of its very existence.

(Text):

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, before we go on to the details of the estimates of the Department of Transport, I want to bring the minister's mind back again to a matter that he and I discussed some months ago now. I would refer him to page 151 of Hansard of November 19, 1953 where he had an interchange with regard to the establishment of a coastguard on the Pacific coast of Canada. At that time, in answer to my query in which I had suggested that we are dependent on the United States coastguard and had asked if the government had any plans for the establishment of a coastguard service of our own, the minister had this to say:

> Mr. Speaker, I find myself in disagreement with my hon. friend as to the first part of his question. I do not think it is accurate to say that we are dependent on the United States coastguard on the west coast. On the contrary, we have two very modern life-saving stations on that coast, on Vancouver island, with two modern boats operating at pretty fast speeds. Then, over and above that, we have a voluntary service covering the whole of the west coast of Vancouver island. Under the circumstances I do not think that I can answer the last part of my hon. friend's question in the affirmative.

[Mr. Dufresne.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, that exchange gave rise to a number of reactions from different quarters. It gave rise in the first place to an editorial in the Victoria Daily Colonist condemning me very heartily for having asked the minister this question because apparently in the view of the editor of that paper the minister and his colleagues in the government are so subject to pique, shall I say, that the Daily Colonist was quite sure that because I had raised the matter the government would unreasonably refuse to take any action with regard to a resolution that was passed by the British Columbia legislature on the 17th of October last year. The suggestion was that had I left the matter alone in due course the federal government would have taken action with regard to the resolution which was passed unanimously by the British Columbia legislature on October 17 last. For the sake of the record I am going to read the resolution. It reads as follows:

> Whereas the volume of water-borne traffic on the coast of British Columbia is of considerable magnitude, involving many millions of dollars worth of equipment and the transportation of hundreds of thousands of persons annually;
> And whereas the incidence of accidents involving considerable loss of life and property has risen to an alarming rate in recent years;
> And whereas no efficient organization for the protection of such lives and property has been established on the British Columbia coast;
> Therefore be it resolved that a petition be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor praying that His Honour will cause representations to be made to the dominion government that, in the opinion of this house, it is desirable to establish an adequate Pacific coastguard service with men and lifesaving equipment so stationed at points on the coastline as to extend the utmost protection to lives in peril through marine disasters in coastal waters.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that resolution was passed unanimously by the British Columbia legislature, and because the majority, in fact almost all the members of the British Columbia legislature now belong to parties that are not represented in this government or in the official opposition in this house I suppose it might be said that it is easy enough for such a legislature to take this action and not to worry about putting the federal Liberal government in an embarrassing position. But I would remind the minister, before he might be tempted to make such a suggestion, that when I was in the British Columbia legislature, sitting as an opposition member faced with a Liberal government, a precisely similar resolution was passed unanimously. So I think we can take it for granted that British Columbia legislatures of whatever political stripe are of the opinion that this government should establish a coastguard service.

However, I was not content with that and I did not agree with the view of the Victoria Daily Colonist that this government would be deterred from taking what it considered to be a necessary and useful action merely because the Minister of Transport had been asked a question by an opposition member. I, on the other hand, took the position that this government would reach its decisions after sober consideration of the facts and sober consideration of the opinions of those in a position to know the facts. Therefore I got in touch with the people who earn their livelihood in the coastal waters of British Columbia, and I have a letter from the fishing vessel owners association of British Columbia which I am going to place on the record. It is addressed to me and is dated January 15, 1954. It reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

Your letter of November 27, 1953 referring to the statement made by Mr. Chevrier regarding our existing coastguard facilities was read to a recent general meeting of our association. Our members cannot understand how our government can be so thoroughly misinformed. In our opinion, the federal fisheries department is very efficient and well posted on this and relative questions. It is no problem for the government to get the facts if it wishes to do so. As far as we are aware, there is no voluntary service in operation at the present time. However, the formation of such an organization, composed of personnel, vessels and aircraft from the various services and government departments under a unified command, for the purpose of rescue and salvage, would not be too difficult or expensive and could well be the answer to the problem.

The lifeboat stations at Tofino and Bamfield are satisfactory for lifesaving purposes and salvage of small vessels in their immediate area. However, their sphere of operation is so limited that they are not too important as far as coastguard activity is concerned.

During the latter part of the last trolling season, one of the larger vessels, the M.V. Francis R., caught fire and burned to such an extent as to be declared a total loss. Within five minutes of the call for help, an aircraft arrived over the scene to be followed shortly by two vessels, all from the American coastguard. They were instrumental in putting out the fire and seeing to the safety of the owner. The Bamfield lifeboat arrived after the fire was out and towed the hulk into Bamfield.

Many times each season Canadian vessels are given assistance and towed to safety by the American coastguard. We are very thankful for their help, but we would prefer a Canadian service in our own waters. Surely Canada is able to carry her fair share in this respect and look after her own citizens when they are in need. . .

The letter is signed by Mr. H. A. Christenson, secretary of the fishing vessel owners' association of British Columbia. Then I have a letter from the united fishermen and allied workers' union dated December 2, 1953 which reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

We were pleased to receive your letter of November 27 regarding a coastguard service for the Pacific coast.

We certainly cannot agree with Mr. Chevrier's remarks on this question. It is true that the Department of Transport maintains lifesaving stations on the west coast of Vancouver island. These stations are located at Bamfield and Tofino. Each of them is equipped with one 36-foot lifeboat powered with a 110 h.p. G.M. diesel engine. Anyone who has had any experience on the west coast of Vancouver island will readily agree that these craft are entirely inadequate for the area and type of work involved. It is granted they could perform a limited service under certain conditions. However, in heavy weather they would be next to useless and in any event they are incapable of carrying sufficient equipment and rigging to do a real job of saving lives and property at sea. They would be more suited to act as auxiliary vessels or for work in an area like the gulf of Georgia.

In our opinion the nucleus of an adequate coastguard service should consist of a minimum of three ships of approximately 150 feet in length. One of these should be stationed on the west coast of Vancouver island, one in the vicinity of Bull harbour to take care of Queen Charlotte sound and approaches, and one over on Queen Charlotte islands looking after Hecate strait, Dixon entrance and the west coast of the Charlottes.

These larger ships should be equipped with all the latest in lifesaving gear, marine radio, etc. In addition, there should be a network of smaller vessels stationed at strategic points along the coast to supplement the work of the large coastguard ships. Ports such as Vancouver, Victoria, Nanaimo, Campbell River, Alert Bay, Ocean Falls, Prince Rupert and other points along the coast should have one of these smaller vessels available for rescue work as part of the coastguard service . . .

Mr. Chevrier mentions a voluntary service presently in existence. Probably he failed to explain it in any detail. This is a service handled by the twelfth air force squadron in Vancouver. They work in co-operation with the Department of Fisheries, Department of Transport and the Royal Canadian Navy.

All government ships, including naval tugs, fisheries patrol vessels, lighthouse tenders etc. maintain contact with the twelfth air force squadron. They maintain a staff which continuously plots the position of all government ships on a large map. When a distress call is received, they contact the vessel or vessels closest to the ship in trouble to render whatever assistance is possible.

There are two main weaknesses in this service—(1) they have no control over movements of the ships involved but can only plot their positions. Thus a shipwreck or disaster can occur when all of the voluntary service happens to be hundreds of miles from the scene; (2) the ships involved are not fitted out for the job of saving lives and property at sea. They are suited to the main job they are performing and cannot be classified as a coastguard service.

We might point out that probably 90 per cent of the lifesaving on this coast is performed by freighters, tugboats, passenger ships and fishing vessels. They always help or try to help a fellow mariner in distress. However, this mutual aid does not remove the necessity of a well-equipped properly planned and trained coastguard service.

We would therefore appreciate any further action you may take in regard to our request.

Fraternally yours,

United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have here a report from the Fisherman, the newspaper of the fishermen's union, with regard to the most recent tragedy on the Pacific coast, that is the tragedy in which the Chelan was sunk, and all her crew were lost. Here again I must call the attention of the minister to the fact that the only available help came from the United States coastguard service. Because of the position of this wreck, and the position of the nearest unit of the United States coastguard service in Alaskan waters, that help was quite ineffective and so far has not resulted in locating any trace of the wreck or any sign of those who were drowned.

Well may the Vancouver Sun in an editorial of March 16 of this year say "But we need a coastguard". This editorial says:

> There is a simple reason why tugboatmen around the port of Vancouver are setting up their own rescue service—they are fed up with Ottawa's repeated "No" to requests for a fully manned, properly equipped B.C. coastguard.
> Lives of hundreds of men and millions of dollars' worth of property are at stake on one of the trickiest stretches of coast in the world. "The federal government won't help. We keep seeing valuable lives lost every year", said Capt. Cyril Andrews, of towboat employment agency, who has been the guiding spirit behind the new rescue plan. "So we're linking up with R.C.A.F.'s air-sea rescue organization in a day and night operation. What we're doing is co-ordinating into a set-up the desire of every crewman and officer to help his fellow seamen".
> It is roughly calculated that of 318 tugboats located in this area, about 250 are at sea at any given time. This is obviously a handy rescue force available, with the vessels equipped with ship-shore radio or wireless and many with radar. Details of fitting these vessels in with the R.C.A.F. are being arranged.
>
> The plan will be that when R.C.A.F. air-sea rescue watch receives a distress call, in addition to owner, R.C.M.P. and government vessels being alerted as in the past, headquarters of the towboat employment agency will be warned and they will radio tugs at sea in the area.
> It is a self-help plan deserving the highest praise. But it is not the complete answer to safety needs on B.C.'s dangerous coast. The Sun repeats again that B.C. must have a coastguard of trained men in fast, seaworthy vessels, one type for use in inland waters, a second for deepsea work.
> Ottawa must recognize that it is a national duty to safeguard the lives of seamen and the property they have in their charge.

I noticed the minister was smiling very gaily as I was reading that editorial. I wonder again, as I wondered last year—

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order; I was not smiling at what the hon. member was saying.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): All right; I beg your pardon.

Mr. Chevrier: I was talking to my officials in front of me, and was listening very carefully to what the hon. member said.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am glad to have that assurance from the minister, and to know he realizes this is a very serious problem; that it involves a stretch of coast that has earned the unenviable name and reputation of being a graveyard of the Pacific. Despite the assurance someone has given the minister that the coast is adequately protected at the present time, the fact remains we are dependent in large measure upon help from the United States coastguard service. In the last few disasters that have taken place, this help has proven inadequate; there has been no effective rescue work performed. These men who are risking their lives every day, because of governmental neglect, are now trying with their inadequate means to protect their own lives through the sort of voluntary organization I have described.

I hope the minister will take this problem and give it serious consideration. I hope he will realize that it is not merely a demand for government help, it is a serious cry for help from men engaged in a most hazardous occupation along probably one of the most dangerous stretches of coast in the whole world.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure my hon. friend will expect me to say something in answer to his observations, and I will say it just as briefly as I can. I am sure he is not aware of what the government has done, otherwise I do not think he would have approached the problem in the manner in which he has. The government has given very careful consideration to this whole question. Some years ago a committee was appointed composed of representatives of the maritime commission, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Department of Fisheries, the Department of National Defence, army, navy, air force, Department of Finance, Department of National Health and Welfare and Department of Transport, to review the arrangements for search and rescue and make recommendations for a more efficient service. That committee considered the subject in detail and there was a debate in the house on the very matter to which my hon. friend now refers. The reference to the committee arose in a similar debate that took place in this house at that time.

I would ask my hon. friend to bear this in mind. The chairman of that committee was none other than a Vancouverite, the then chairman of the Canadian maritime commission, namely Mr. Justice Clyne of the supreme court of British Columbia. He was assigned by the Department of Transport to inquire into the whole question of a coastguard service. In the course of the studies of this committee, this is what they found. To permit Canada to establish an efficient coastguard service there would need to be a capital cost of $9,033,000, and an operational cost of $2,684,000. A statement made to me by one of the members of this committee indicated that the setting up of a new coastguard service to perform search and rescue duties on the coasts and the great lakes would involve a capital cost of roughly $9 million, would require an annual maintenance additional to the present cost of the R.C.M.P. marine service and the R.C.A.F. search and rescue service, of about $3·25 million, or $12·25 million for such a service.

I do not deny, and neither does the government, that that would be a good thing. The government did not feel it could spend that amount of money because of conclusions of the committee in regard to the cost of establishing a coastguard service at that time. The committee went further and made recommendations which I placed on Hansard at that time, and which are too lengthy to repeat now, but there were a series of recommendations, the object of which was to protect our coasts. One of the main suggestions was that all the departments concerned should review and centralize their activities under one head, and that was the Department of National Defence air service, which would take charge of search and rescue operations on both our coasts.

The same debate took place then as is taking place now; and it was said that we depended on the American coastguard service for safety on our coasts. During that debate the Minister of National Defence placed on the record a number of instances where Canadians went to the rescue of Americans, and pointed out that we did just as much in the way of assistance on the east coast and in the international section of the great lakes for Americans as did Americans for Canadians.

I do not wish to go into this matter in greater detail; but if my hon. friend will look at the debates which took place at that time he will find that there was no intention then, any more than there is today, to neglect the safety of our waters. It was felt that because of the tremendous cost the only thing and the best thing to do was to adopt the recommendations of the committee. But I would not want the hon. member to think that the Department of Transport, through its marine service or any other branch of government, is taking this lightly. On the contrary it is a serious matter, and the day may come when we will have to establish a coastguard service. But because of the many demands which are made not only for this fine service, but for the many others that are raised from time to time, thus far it has been found impossible to meet the wishes of my hon. friend.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, there are just a few further remarks which I think might be made in connection with some I made earlier, in reply to the Minister of Transport. The first thing, of course, that perturbed me—perhaps it was a matter of misunderstanding—was that he did not seem to hear clearly some of the remarks I was making. I remember, for example, saying in, I think, a reasonably strong voice, though perhaps not as strong as the minister's, that Canada's airports are shamefully inadequate in almost every case. The minister was very much worried and said, "I do not think that even if the hon. member will quote what I said that I used the word shamefacedly". That is the expression he used. Well, obviously he was not hearing very well.

Then, later on in the same debate I had said that if he does not recognize the airport situation, that is for him to say. And the minister said, "I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to when he speaks of the air force". So perhaps if he had been listening to my remarks that would have helped us along.

Secondly, I was interested to hear him say that his airport and building facilities compared favourably with the United States, having regard to the population. I think perhaps those five little words, "having regard to the population", are an interesting commentary. After all, our population is only 10 per cent of that of the United States; so I presume the minister is happy if he feels that his buildings at our various airports are 10 per cent as good as they are in the United States. Frankly, I do not think that is good enough. And my point is that I definitely cannot accept a statement of this kind, with words such as that hedging it around.

Then the minister attempted to show where he had been misquoted. Well, I was very careful to point out where my quotations started and finished, particularly because the minister had been so worried and we had got into an altercation earlier, even before the quotation was made. And that is why I was so careful to delimit the quotations.

Then of course, in his rebuttal, he missed the point of my argument completely, because I had made a sharp differentiation between landing strips, equipment and buildings. And he, in his reply, went into detail about landing strips, radar and other things which I agree we have. He did not deal adequately with buildings. I tried to be as kind as I could. I did not mention the international airport at Montreal, and I do not propose to mention it now. I imagine however that the minister has some acquaintance with it and knows just what a miserable front door it is for those coming to Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: The front door is Gander.

Mr. Hamilton: The minister quoted an official of T.C.A. saying how good his airport buildings were. Well, I am not too concerned with whether T.C.A. responds to the Minister of Transport or responds to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have a suspicion that if they do—as they do—respond to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, they jump through the hoops even more readily, and they would be even more inclined to pat the government on the back than they would be when responding to the Minister of Transport.

And, incidentally, is that not a curious situation? We have a Minister of Transport; but the air lines, the stock of which is owned by the C.N.R., report to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. One would think that the Minister of Transport would be responsible for that. It sounds logical. But logic is not always perhaps the thing which we find most evident in this government.

Then, I should like to touch on another point rather briefly. It is that such words as "unethical", "misstatement", "inaccuracies" and "exaggerations" seem suddenly to have become parliamentary—at least they are parliamentary, it would seem, when they are used by the Minister of Transport. I was curious about the point, and took the trouble to look in this little book which contains the standing rules of the house. It will take only a moment to find the rule in question, and I think it should be drawn to the attention of the committee that some of the expressions the minister used when referring to my argument were hardly in line with rule 238 which says:

> The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him in his turn, of misrepresentation, charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind; all these are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference.

I was delighted, actually, to see that these words he had used—particularly "unethical" —seemed suddenly to have become parliamentary; because I am sure we will have occasion to use them many times in the future when we are dealing with various actions of this government.

Finally, here is an interesting example of the type of argument the minister used in attempting to refute my argument. He said some rather strong things. He does not think we are qualified—and certainly does not think I am qualified—to deal with his department at all. Well, on that point, I am prepared to go along with the people who elected me. I think if they are reasonably satisfied, I will stay. And I have much more confidence in their decision as to whether or not I am qualified than I have in that of the minister in the heat of arguing as to the deficiency in his operations.

And let this be my final word. Here, Mr. Chairman, is the minister who has suggested that the full case was not presented in the course of my remarks. He has made that suggestion and that imputation and made that charge. And then, Mr. Chairman, this same individual stands up in this House of Commons and abstracts one paragraph from a group of three paragraphs, abstracts a paragraph which gives the bright side, and ends the quotation there, and omits everything else completely, and absolutely gives a false impression of what this particular man said.

Let us put it on the record, so that we can see the argument that was used tonight in an attempt to show that my case was not as strong as it actually is. The minister had referred to remarks made by Mr. Earle Birney, a Canadian writer and professor of English at the University of British Columbia. The quotation he used was this:

> On the credit side I'd say Canadian air terminals are clean with good facilities for telephones, telegraph, enquiry; washrooms good; well heated and ventilated. Passenger handling, baggage, etc., seems fast, courteous, efficient.

The minister stopped there. But as we know, where there is a credit there is a debit. Let us hear what the next paragraph says:

> On the debit side, no terminal is big enough. Space is cramped. Seating is inadequate whenever there is a holdup, a general grounding. For example, I waited four hours once in Vancouver airport (Sea island) for ground fog to lift. Winnipeg is even more crowded, and awkwardly cut up. The restaurant is hard to find and too small.

Mr. Birney continued in his article to deal with the delay while repairs were being made to a North Star engine, which I cannot lay at the door of the minister. Later on he continues:

> Also, taxi facilities were inadequate and the airport bus had already gone when we found our plane was delayed.

All this was left out by the minister. Mr. Birney continues:

> All the airports need public entertainment facilities. Every American airport I've been in had both radio and TV. And nice! There is a civilized airport, with an open air restaurant (windscreened by glass) where you can sit and watch the planes come in and take off, while you have good food, not expensive, and drink what you want, and enjoy the sun if there is any and listen to music. Seattle has an excellent cocktail bar and a view gallery. If we can't have cocktails—but why not?—at least we could have esplanade restaurants, open in summer, where you can wait, eat, watch T.V. and the planes.

I can understand that the minister was making his own case, and I can also understand why he would omit this as well:

> Every Canadian airport seems to have been designed to prevent people seeing the planes. Ring in some architects who have imagination and give them some space to play with.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the material that was left out by the minister who had the unmitigated gall to say that I was not giving both sides of the case.

Mr. Stanton: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to voice my concern with reference to the many dangerous level railway crossings that exist throughout Canada. I know that this concern has been, and is, in the mind of every citizen of this country, when we realize that the level crossing fatalities are increasing year by year. Yes, these tragic accidents are increasing every month. Boys and girls, young men and women, who are in the vigour of life, and who have many long years and perhaps a magnificent career ahead, are suddenly snuffed out in the midst of life or are maimed and crippled for the remainder of their days.

I had a communication from my constituency on Monday telling of the tragic death of one of our young men in his late twenties who was suddenly snuffed out at a level railway crossing. This crossing is comprised of two lines of tracks, which makes it all the harder for trains to be observed by approaching cars. One train goes by—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member—

Mr. Hodgson: It is his first speech.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If it is the hon. member's intention to discuss the general policy in connection with the administration of the grade crossing fund, and so forth, I would have to point out to him that it was my duty this afternoon to rule out his seatmate when he was making a speech on the same subject. I have no desire to interfere with the remarks that the hon. member may wish to make on the general item dealing with departmental administration; but I am afraid there would be no excuse for me to refuse one member permission to discuss a subject and then permit another member to carry on, on the same subject. With those views in mind I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks within the ambit of the Department of Transport, and not discuss the subject matter which has been referred to the board of transport commissioners, and is under review.

Mr. Green: I understood your ruling this afternoon to be that a member could discuss any particular grade crossing.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is perfectly correct. While I was not too certain of what the hon. member for Leeds was leading up to, I considered it only fair to the hon. member whom I interrupted this afternoon to make these remarks at this time.

Mr. Stanton: Mr. Chairman, I was just leading up to a grievance in my own constituency and the situations that exist there at certain points within the county and within the city of Brockville which I represent. I should like to read from a clipping from the local paper with regard to the lack of signals at this particular railway crossing. The article reads:

> The railway crossing is not marked by a wigwag signal nor is there any sign indicating a crossing to northbound motorists.

That proves beyond doubt that the Department of Transport should be more particular in seeing that railroad crossings are properly marked at different intervals. What untold suffering and agony many of our good people are enduring because of those accidents which could have been prevented if only there had been an overhead pass, a subway or some warning signal! I know that many of those fatalities would have been prevented if proper caution had been exercised by the driver of the car or whatever vehicle it might have been. But let us be honest with ourselves. How many of us in this house today or, I may say, how many of us who drive cars have not at some time forgotten and have crossed a railway track or tracks without stopping? When we see so many blind approaches, of which we have many in my own constituency, when we realize there are so many heavily driven roads and highways where the traffic must go over dangerous crossings, and there is no protection whatever, not even a wigwag, gates or signals of any description, it makes us begin to think that we, or some or all of our own families may be the next to suffer that horrible tragedy.

I should like to direct, in as friendly a manner as I can, the attention of the Minister of Transport to a situation that exists at Brockville. The citizens of that city are sadly in need of a subway to carry the heavy traffic under the tracks. It is not only dangerous, but extremely inconvenient. When the east or westbound train comes to a halt at the station it blocks the old highway No. 29 that carries all the traffic to and from Brockville to the north part of the county. And that is not all. It also blocks what is known as the new Stewart boulevard, which is a portion of highways Nos. 29 and 42. Since the city is expanding north very rapidly the tracks will soon be in the very centre of the town.

On these two heavily travelled roads the cars at times are nearly bumper to bumper. When the traffic is halted for a passenger train to stop at the station, or for a long freight to go through—and they sometimes stop for long intervals because Brockville is a divisional centre—it not only causes many words to be manufactured by the motorists that are not found in the dictionary, but it also frays the nerves of the city and township councils. At times the traffic is halted for long intervals. On one occasion a car was rushing a patient to hospital when it was forced to halt until the train pulled away from the station, and the delay was for some time, but I am glad to say that the mother and child are doing nicely.

There has been so much criticism about blocking the two roads that lately the trains pass beyond the station so as to leave one road open to traffic. This creates a hardship on the passengers, as they must walk and carry their heavy luggage for nearly two blocks back to the station or to the taxis, as the case may be. This does not create a very good impression on the visitors coming to the city. In this connection I would like to quote an article which appeared in a local newspaper on March 10, 1953.

An hon. Member: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Stanton: Mr. Chairman, I shall only be a few minutes.

Mr. Gillis: Let us finish it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If the hon. member is nearly at the conclusion of his remarks I am sure the committee would be willing to allow him to continue.

Mr. Stanton: I shall only be a few moments, Mr. Chairman. This letter addressed to the editor of the local newspaper reads as follows:

> I wish to make a complaint about the poor system which now exists in Brockville with regard to the stopping of trains at your station.
> Being a traveller I have crossed this country from coast to coast and have never experienced such an inconvenience as exists in Brockville. The train stops so far from the station that the passenger is tired out by the time he carries his baggage to the taxis. There is neither porter, red cap nor a convenience to carry one's luggage.
>
> When I arrived in Brockville the other day, the walk from the train to the station was the worst experience I have ever had and I was compelled to rest quite some time before I began breathing in a normal manner again.

An hon. Member: Moral—don't go to Brockville.

Mr. Stanton:

> May I suggest that the station master hire a couple of men or boys to carry the passengers' baggage from the train to the station, or perhaps permission could be granted to the taximen to come beyond the west end of the station to get the luggage. Whatever is the answer, something should be done to assist the passengers before someone drops dead on that long trek from the train to the station.

It is only reasonable to expect that Brockville, with a large new industry just completed, another one under construction, and with the deep seaway a reality in the not-too-distant future, will double its present size before too long. Surely the citizens and travelling public are entitled to and should have a safer and speedier way of crossing the tracks on a highway which is used so heavily by trucks and automobiles.

I hope the minister will give this his full consideration, for surely the people of a thriving and growing city like the county town of Leeds are entitled to and should have much better accommodation than they have at the present time. He might contend that subways cost a considerable amount of money, but it is my contention that a subway in this area is long overdue and every possible effort should be made to provide one for where can we spend our money to better advantage than in trying to save the lives of our fellow Canadians.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I would like to call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. Gillis: Surely we can carry this item. It is becoming history.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the house.

Tomorrow we shall begin with the Department of External Affairs and if we conclude it we shall take national revenue and mines and technical surveys.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

First report of special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Tucker.

TIN

TABLING OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table three copies in English and in French of the international tin agreement resulting from the United Nations tin conference convened in Geneva on November 16, 1953. This agreement is open for signature from March 1 to June 30, 1954, and it has been decided to authorize the High Commissioner in London to sign the agreement on behalf of Canada. But before ratification of the agreement is deposited opportunity will be given to the House of Commons to discuss it on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

TRADE

PORTUGAL—STATEMENT ON AGREEMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday of this week my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), announced the signing in Madrid of a new trade treaty between Canada and Spain.

I now wish to inform the house that a similar trade treaty was signed today in Lisbon between Canada and Portugal. This agreement was signed on behalf of Canada by the Hon. Mr. Winters, Minister of Public Works, who is at present in Portugal, and by Hon. William F. A. Turgeon, Q.C., Canadian minister to Portugal. The agreement was signed on behalf of Portugal by Mr. Paulo Cunha, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and by Mr. Correa de Barros, director general of economic affairs of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Mr. W. F. Bull, deputy minister of trade and commerce, and other Canadian officials have recently returned from Portugal following discussions with Portuguese officials.

This is the first direct trade agreement between Canada and Portugal. It provides for the continued exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment with respect to customs duties and related matters. Both countries undertake not to impose discriminatory import or exchange restrictions, except for balance of payments reasons. When such restrictions are imposed they must not discriminate between countries having convertible currencies.

As part of the agreement, the Portuguese government has agreed to make available import licences and dollar exchange for minimum annual imports from dollar countries of 3,000 tons of dry salted codfish. This quantity is divided between 1,000 tons of small codfish and 2,000 tons of the larger sizes. This arrangement will place Canadian sales of dry salted codfish in the Portuguese market on a more stabilized and permanent basis and will provide an opportunity for increasing sales.

For the first time Canada will accord most-favoured-nation treatment to certain Portuguese colonies. As a result, coffee, which is one of the chief colonial products of Portugal, will now enter Canada at the most-favoured-nation rate rather than at the general rate as has been the case up to now. Canada has also made the following tariff concessions to Portugal: The rate on almonds is reduced from 1 cent per pound to free; the rate on corks, over $\frac{3}{4}$ inch in diameter, is reduced from $4\frac{1}{2}$ cents to 2 cents per pound, while the duty on smaller sized corks is reduced from 8 cents to 2 cents per pound.

I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the important advantages which accrue to the Newfoundland codfish industry as the combined result of the two new trade agreements with Spain and Portugal, which open up an assured annual market for 100,000 quintals of dry salted codfish, a substantial portion of which can be shipped in small sizes.

[Later:]

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question arising out of the explanation he gave of the Portuguese treaty? What countries would be especially in mind in the reference to no discrimination against countries with convertible currencies?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The meaning of that statement is that if dollars are convertible, the Portuguese government is bound not to discriminate between dollar countries. If sterling is convertible, they are bound not to discriminate between sterling countries. In other words, any currency that is convertible must receive equal treatment with other currencies that are convertible.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT RESPECTING LAYING OF INFORMATION OR COMPLAINT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 466, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (laying of information).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to clear up an uncertainty that has arisen in connection with the laying of an information, or the bringing of a prosecution, under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

As section 45 now stands, it is clear that a prosecution for an offence under the act may be brought against a trade union or against an employers' organization. However, in view of a recent court decision, it is now uncertain as to whether an information or complaint can be laid by an aggrieved trade union, or for that matter by an employers' organization. "Against" is all right; "by" is in doubt. The purpose of this bill is to amend section 45 of the act so as to clear up this uncertainty.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY COMMODORE ADAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I had written out a question for the Minister of National Defence. I had written it in French, but I shall translate it into English for the benefit of the associate minister. In a press conference given in Quebec city on Thursday, May 27, was Commodore K. F. Adams, on this occasion, expressing the policy of the government? If not, will disciplinary action be taken against this officer for making statements so absurd and ridiculous?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Associate Minister of National Defence): The hon. member did not refer to the nature of the statements alleged to have been made by the naval officer to whom he refers. I have not seen the report of the press conference to which he refers, and in any event I would not wish to comment on it without checking as to the accuracy of the report.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

CLASSIFICATION OF CANNED MIXED FRUIT AS PEACHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue?

In view of the exchequer court's rejection of the appeal against the tariff board's ruling to the effect that mixed fruit is not peaches, will provision now be made for rebate of the excess duties paid on the importation of canned mixed fruit during the period that the higher rate of duty has been charged?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his question. We have not yet received a report from our legal advisers, and until such time as we do I am not prepared to answer the hon. gentleman's question. However, notice will be taken of it.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The Deputy Chairman: We are dealing with item No. 84. For the information of hon. members the item will be found on page 13 of the estimates, and the details on page 157.

Department and missions abroad—
84. Departmental administration, $3,333,583.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Chairman, this item of my estimates gives me an opportunity, of which I am glad to avail myself, to make a report to the committee about my recent trip to Europe, during which I attended the meeting of the North Atlantic council, the early sessions, which were held in London, of the subcommittee of the disarmament committee of the United Nations, which is concerned with disarmament in general and more particularly with the limitation or abolition of weapons of mass destruction; and finally, the Geneva conference on Far Eastern affairs.

So far as the North Atlantic council meeting is concerned there is little that I can add to the communique which was issued at the time. It was a short, regular meeting of the council, with ministerial representation, at which views were exchanged on the international situation generally, and on the western European and the Atlantic situation in particular, and during which we also discussed ways and means of making the council a more effective body for consultation on foreign affairs.

In so far as the disarmament subcommittee is concerned, as hon. members know, it consists of the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, France, the U.S.S.R. and Canada. It was set up by the full committee to go into the question of disarmament, as I have said, in general, and atomic disarmament in particular, in restricted and private meetings, in the hope that by meetings of this kind progress might at least be more likely in a field of such transcendent importance as this is.

The subcommittee will eventually report back to the full committee, and I am not in a position now, as I indicated to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the other day, to report on the discussions that have taken place because of the nature of those discussions and because of the fact that they are still going on. I can say that, because of the restricted and private character of the meetings, we got to grips with this problem very quickly, and that grip has not been loosened.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can of course—and the committee would expect me to—report in greater detail on the Geneva conference on Far Eastern affairs. That conference, however, is also still proceeding, and because of that fact there is a limit to what I can appropriately say at this time, and certainly no final report is yet possible.

I have returned from Geneva myself, but the Canadian delegation remains, and is taking an active part in the work. It is a small delegation, but as I am no longer a part of it, I think possibly I can say with propriety that, in my view, it is a well-informed and efficient delegation. If the situation seems to require it, of course I can return to Geneva without delay.

The conference now has been going on for some weeks, and I think it is generally agreed that while it would be a great mistake to break it off as long as there is any, even remote, possibility of success, it should not be allowed to go on indefinitely if it becomes demonstrably clear that it is being used only for propaganda purposes.

The conference probably should not be referred to as such because in reality there are two conferences going on at the same time in Geneva. As hon. members know, the first one deals with Korea. The origin of that conference is to be found in the United Nations armistice of July, 1953, concluded in Korea. It will be remembered that in the terms of that armistice there was a provision that a political conference should follow within three months. That was not possible but the conference is now taking place and though it is not a United Nations conference in any formal sense, I think it can be regarded as fulfilling the provision of the armistice agreement which called for such a conference.

The immediate origin of the conference is to be found in the meeting of the foreign ministers at Berlin in February of this year when it was agreed by those foreign ministers to invite the United Nations governments which had forces in Korea, the republic of Korea, the communist government of Peking, and the communist government of North Korea, to take part in a conference to meet at Geneva.

The membership of this conference is in a sense two-sided. Indeed, it might be considered as three-sided. There is the United Nations side, which consists of 15 delegations, including the Canadian, there is the republic of Korea side, which is distinct to some extent from the others because they are not yet a member of the United Nations; and then there is the communist side consisting of the three communist delegations.

We anticipated before we went to Geneva a good deal of difficulty in getting this conference going because of its unique character and composition. There might indeed have been great difficulties over organization and procedure and all that sort of thing which can cause so much delay if anyone wishes to use procedure in order to cause delay. The communists very often in the past have been adept at that kind of thing.

But our fears were not realized and by conciliatory attitudes on both sides all these organizational and procedural difficulties were removed without delay and the conference got down to work at once.

In so far as it went, that was an encouraging sign, but the encouragement which we got from our agreement over procedure has not yet extended to any noticeable progress in the substance of the questions with which we were dealing.

The objective of the conference, of course, was a simple one. It was to convert the armistice which had been signed in Korea into a peace settlement which would last, and on our side, at least, to achieve that settlement by agreement in accordance with United Nations resolutions and decisions on the subject which were meant to facilitate a free, united and democratic Korea.

We must not, of course, forget that we were not in a position at Geneva or indeed elsewhere to impose that kind of settlement on a defeated enemy. And we must not forget either that we have no obligation to impose that kind of settlement on Korea by force. Therefore, it could only be done by agreement, and agreement, of course, has not been easy to obtain.

In seeking such an agreement to attain the objectives laid down by the United Nations, the United Nations and the republic of Korea delegations have worked closely together in friendly co-operation. They have not always, of course, seen eye to eye on means, but have been in agreement in regard to ends.

Such differences are, I suppose, inevitable in discussion between representatives of free governments, but I know the house will agree when I say, Mr. Chairman, that we should try to keep them to a minimum in the face of the common menace which confronts us all.

The communist delegations at the Korean conference spoke as one. They spoke in the same vein and indeed often in the same words in their accusations and attacks largely directed against the United States. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that 90 per cent of the content of their speeches consisted of propaganda and polemics. We got the same distortions of recent developments in Korea to which we have been accustomed at the United Nations, and we got the same falsification of fact and of history. It was interesting to note that the dialectics and diatribes of the new communist delegations were just about the same as that of the old hands.

The delegates on the United Nations side, though anxious to get on with the business of negotiating a Korean settlement, have not allowed these unfounded accusations to go unanswered. To reply to the slanderous attacks and abusive propaganda which form such a depressing proportion of the communist speeches at meetings of this kind is a time-consuming and unpleasant task, but when the eyes of the world are focused on a conference it is a task which I think we cannot afford to forgo lest it should be supposed in any part of the world, especially in this case in the Asian part of the world, that silence may indicate some kind of consent.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in my own intervention in the general debate on the Korean question at Geneva I attempted on May 4 to follow the course which had already been laid down by others in dealing with some of these communist charges, and particularly I ventured to point out that, contrary to the assertions of Mr. Molotov, who took it upon himself to speak for Asia, we in the west did understand, and fully accepted, the significance of what has been taking place in Asia over recent years, and that we were indeed sympathetic in the march of the peoples of Asia toward national freedom and greater human welfare.

I added, however, that the right to be free did not include the obligation to be communist, nor did "Asia for the Asians", which is a phrase Molotov and others had used, mean Asia for the cominform.

I also pointed out, Mr. Chairman, that our own national experience in Canada refuted completely the wild charges which were levelled by communist delegations to the effect that the people of the United States were either aggressive or imperialist in their outlook.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should explain in a few words what the communist peace plan for Korea was as put forward at the Geneva conference. In principle it involved the repudiation of United Nations plans on which we had previously agreed, and if it had been carried into effect it would also have necessitated the exclusion of the United Nations as a belligerent from the substance and the supervision of the peace settlement. It would have required us on our side to accept the fact of United States and republic of Korea aggression, and of the charge that the United Nations in this matter had merely acted as the victim and the tool of United States imperialism.

Obviously any proposal based on these premises was not acceptable to the United Nations delegations. There were also other details which made this plan unacceptable.

The two governments of the republic of Korea and North Korea were to be considered on the same political, legal and moral level, and acceptance of this was to be recognized in an all-Korean commission with equal representation of the north and south, though the south in population is probably five or six times greater than the north. This all-Korean commission was to work out plans for all-Korean elections, free from outside supervision except—and this has been an additional proposal of the communists since I left Geneva—by what they call a neutral commission.

We are not quite clear about this neutral commission but it is certainly to be divorced from the United Nations. Its function is to assist the all-Korean commission, and its composition would presumably exclude all

United Nations members who have participated in Korean military operations. It could, however, include such neutrals—and I use that word in a Pickwickian sense—as Poland or Czechoslovakia. Then also under this plan all foreign forces were to be withdrawn within six months. The powers directly interested in Korea—and it was made clear that they would include communist China and the U.S.S.R.—were to assist in Korean development as a democratic state. The United Nations, however, was to keep out.

Even cursory examination of a plan of this kind makes its unacceptability quite obvious. It looked to us like a snare and a delusion. Indeed we wondered whether it was really meant to be accepted, at least in that form. It is certainly unrealistic to the point of absurdity to think that two sides which fear and hate each other as much as do North Korea and South Korea, after fighting each other viciously if indecisively for years, should sit down amicably and work together through an all-Korean commission, on a fifty-fifty basis, with each side having a veto over the decisions of the commission and in that way produce a new Korea by free elections. Of course we pointed out the weakness and indeed the impracticability of this plan, but the questions which we addressed to the other side were unanswered.

Indeed it is clear that this is a scheme designed to provide for the establishment of an interim government, along the pattern of the communist proposals in Germany, in which the communist representatives would hold the power of veto. In other words, the commission would operate as the communist members wished it to operate or not at all. We all know, of course, that this is the familiar first step in the establishment of communist dictatorship through the perversion of democratic procedures.

We might have accepted the impossibility of this scheme without any further argument and, pinning the responsibility squarely where it belongs, namely on the communists who were putting forward this scheme, called the conference off on that issue. But most of the United Nations delegations—indeed, I think all of them—felt that they should put forward their own proposals and their own views as to what would constitute a good Korean settlement. For that purpose, Mr. Chairman, I should like to put on the record the Canadian views of what should be done to reach that desirable objective, or in other words the basic principles which we think should underlie any agreement for a free, democratic and united Korea. If I may just enumerate them briefly, those principles are as follows.

First, a unified Korea should preserve the state structure for Korea which has been endorsed by the United Nations, with such constitutional changes as might be necessary to establish an all-Korean government.

Second, the people of Korea should be given an opportunity to express their views as to their future government and for that purpose there should be held, with a minimum of delay, free and fair elections for a national assembly and possibly also for a president.

Third, the conditions for such elections should include equitable representation by population over the whole of Korea.

Fourth, to ensure that such elections should be fair and free, they should be supervised by an international agency agreed on, if possible, by the Geneva conference but acceptable to the United Nations. In order to ensure maximum objectivity—and that is going quite a long way to meet the views of the other side—we felt that this supervisory agency might consist of nations which do not belong to the communist bloc and which did not participate in military operations in Korea.

Fifth, arrangements should be made for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea by stages, that withdrawal to be completed in a short period, to be fixed by the conference, after the post-election all-Korean government had begun effectively to function; in other words, withdrawal might begin at once by both sides and be completed within a short time after the Korean government had begun to function.

Sixth, a reaffirmation of international responsibility under the United Nations to participate in the relief and rehabilitation of Korea through economic and material assistance. Finally, an international guarantee under the auspices of the United Nations of the territorial integrity of unified, free and democratic Korea.

It was hoped that some kind of proposal based on principles of that nature might be put forward as coming from all sixteen powers. That procedure has not yet been possible, Mr. Chairman, but we are very close in our views. Indeed, as a result of negotiations between the delegations on our side, all sixteen powers are very close together now on what constitutes the principles for a good Korean settlement.

Meanwhile, the government delegation of the republic of Korea has put forward its own proposals for a settlement. We think that these are acceptable as a basis of negotiation but we have doubts about one or two of the points included in their proposals, more particularly that which would give to South Korea a veto on the election in that part and their insistence that all Chinese troops be out of Korea before the six-months period would end. We feel now—and this is the attitude we are taking at Geneva where the matter is being debated this afternoon—that these proposals on the communist side and the proposals on our side should go to a small negotiating committee. If that suggestion is followed, we shall soon be able to find out whether progress is possible.

It would be unwise to be too optimistic on that score. We therefore ask ourselves what should be done if, at this Korean conference at Geneva, we cannot succeed in bringing about the unification of that unhappy land. I think it would be wise, under these circumstances, to suspend, not to terminate, the conference and to agree to look at the problem again some months ahead when conditions might be a little bit different. I think it would also be wise if this conference, in some form, could confirm armistice arrangements which would remain in effect until a peace settlement becomes possible.

I admit, Mr. Chairman, that we are still far short of the achievement of a peaceful solution of the Korean question. It is an intensely difficult problem and we shall need a large fund of patience if an acceptable solution is to be attained; but there is still hope that such a solution will eventually be attained. Meanwhile I feel—and it is no unimportant result if I am correct in this feeling—that after the Geneva discussions the renewal of hostilities in Korea is much less likely than it might have been before that conference opened.

I should now say something about the Indo-Chinese side of the conference, Mr. Chairman. The situation in respect of this particular conference is, as Sir Winston Churchill said the other day, "in constant flux," and of course it is impossible therefore to make any final report on what has happened or speculate with any degree of assurance on what is likely to happen. The invitation to the Indo-Chinese conference came, as hon. members know, from the Berlin meeting in February. At that meeting of the foreign ministers it was decided that the membership of the Indo-Chinese conference should consist of the four inviting powers, the Chinese People's Republic and other interested states. Therefore at Geneva the inviting powers were confronted at once with the problem of deciding, and only they could make the decision, who were the other interested states.

There were various alternatives that were canvassed. The first was that the conference would consist of the four, the Chinese communist government and the belligerents, the belligerents including the three associated states of Indo-China and the Viet Minh. Another proposal was that the conference should be widened somewhat to include also the neighbouring states and others directly and immediately concerned or who have commitments in that area.

Finally, it was suggested in some quarters that the conference might be extended even wider to include additional communist states, neutrals and others. After a good deal of discussion among the inviting powers it was decided that the limited conference of the four, the Chinese communists and the belligerent states gave the best prospect of progress and success and that was the decision which was eventually adopted.

As far as Canada's position is concerned, we felt we had no complaint in the circumstances about non-membership in this conference. We have of course in Canada a very definite interest in this problem but no special or separate responsibility for Indo-China or for southeast Asia. We have no regional or special commitments in that part of the world and no question of accepting such has arisen at Geneva. So the policy of our delegation in respect of this very limited conference, which I would point out again excluded even the neighbouring states, was to avoid on the one hand involvement in any specific commitments for which the delegation did not have a mandate and, on the other hand, to avoid any appearance or attitude of indifference to developments, the consequences of which, if they deteriorated into conflict, would certainly concern us and might involve us.

With these considerations in mind, we kept ourselves fully informed of the formal conference talks on Indo-China and participated in many useful informal discussions with delegations who were more directly concerned than we were with the problem of Indo-China and of security in southeast Asia. Our co-operation and our consultation in these discussions was especially close with the delegations of the commonwealth and of the United States. Here, if I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to pay a very sincere tribute to the work that the foreign secretary of the United Kingdom is doing at this conference. His contacts with what we may call the other side gave him, in a sense, a mediating position on occasions on those matters where mediation was possible, and he is playing that invaluable role, if I may say so, with wisdom, patience and skill.

The problem of Indo-China as we see it is twofold. There is first the short-range problem, and that might in its turn be divided into two parts. The first part is how to bring the Indo-Chinese war to an end on terms which France, which has borne the heat and the burden of the day there at great sacrifice for many years now, and the associated states of Indo-China could accept. The second point, so far as the short-range problem is concerned, is to work out international arrangements with a maximum of free Asian participation to guarantee any settlement that might be reached.

But there is also the long-range problem of how to build up a collective security system for southeast Asia, again with a maximum of free Asian participation, so that new aggression may be prevented and the peace maintained. The short-range problem was of course made more difficult by the character and developments of the war and that in turn tended to complicate, colour and at times almost give an atmosphere of crisis to the second and longer range objective. Crisis diplomacy, Mr. Chairman, is at times in these days unavoidable, but it is not always the most effective agency for the solution of long-range problems. In the search for a solution to these problems one viewpoint emphasized that we should concentrate first on the immediate problem of the war, then work out arrangements to guarantee the armistice settlement and only afterwards deal with the bigger problem of collective security and the future. It was felt by those who held this view that the exigencies of the military situation, and they certainly existed, should not push those concerned into premature or ill-considered discussion of political or defence arrangements which would not have the solid foundation of general and wide support which was essential, and which would have given the communists an excuse to say that the Geneva conference had been sabotaged.

It was felt by this school of opinion that before attempting to organize security you must be sure that you know what you are going to organize, also that all the free countries of southeast Asia should at least be invited to participate in the consideration of the problem, and finally that there should be reasonable assurance of agreement and unity at home in regard to the acceptance of the commitments which might be necessary.

That was one view, one approach to this problem. The other approach, the other viewpoint, argued that recent events had shown the necessity of not only making a just peace in Indo-China but of taking steps, even while the conference was going on, to show by readiness to consider arrangements for collective action that the pattern of communist aggression in Asia could not be repeated without meeting strong and collective resistance; that convincing evidence should be given now that any state which wanted to be free would be assisted in staying free.

It was felt by those who held this viewpoint—and there were of course shades of viewpoint between these two—that the adoption of this position and this attitude would not only make early peace in Indo-China more likely, by underlining the risks the communists would be taking if they prolonged the war, but would also act as an effective deterrent against communist aggression in the future. The United States, of course, has been reported as leaning to the latter view, and the United Kingdom to the former. Therefore alarming and often exaggerated conclusions have been drawn of Anglo-American divisions and differences. That was not unnatural in the circumstances, the circumstances being that there were at least 1,500 journalists in Geneva looking for news. Included in those 1,500 there was a small group of Canadian journalists and I should like to pay my tribute to the full, and I thought objective and careful, reports that were sent back home by that small group.

While differences, differences in emphasis and differences in approach, are I think unavoidable in a coalition of free states, especially in circumstances of this kind, it is of importance of course that they should be resolved. It is of vital importance, and I know that this is appreciated on all sides and indeed in all countries except the communist countries, that these differences should not become differences of policy and principle between our two closest friends, the United Kingdom and the United States. It would be the greatest possible tragedy if Asia were allowed to split the West. I am confident that this will not occur.

So far as the immediate problem of Indo-China is concerned, the short-range problem that I mentioned, the delegation of France put forward proposals to solve it and so did the communist delegations. The French proposal put forward by Mr. Bidault, who is playing a very difficult part in Geneva with great skill, enumerated certain points of settlement, and his points were supported by the United States, the United Kingdom and the associated states of Indo-China.

First, there should be an armistice to bring the fighting to an end, and then a political settlement based on the independence of the three states, which would be internationally supervised and guaranteed. Secondly, there should be separate consideration for the three states of Laos, Cambodia and Viet Nam. In so far as Laos and Cambodia were concerned, the Viet Minh should evacuate those countries at once. So far as Viet Nam was concerned, there should be an evacuation of the Red river delta by agreement upon a no man's land around the periphery of the delta beyond which all Viet Minh forces were to retire. In central Viet Nam, the Viet Minh troops would have to withdraw to a prearranged position, and they would have to evacuate the south.

The communist plan included proposals for an armistice in Indo-China and a political settlement to be negotiated simultaneously over the whole of Indo-China and all three states would be treated on the same basis. It also included recognition of what they called the liberating regimes, not only of the Viet Minh but also of Laos and Cambodia. We had not heard anything about those latter two regimes before we went to Geneva. It provided for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Indo-China, and for elections in all three countries without any effective international supervision.

It seemed on the face of it, though they are still negotiating these proposals and it is unwise to give final conclusions in regard to them, that this communist plan was designed to bring communist regimes to power. At times it seemed also that the communists were indulging in delaying and obstructive tactics, encouraged no doubt by the military situation in Indo-China. However, Mr. Chairman, negotiations have been continuing during the last ten days since I left Geneva. They have been concerned with these two main considerations: first, the possibility of a negotiated cease-fire and, secondly, a political settlement. These negotiations seem now to be at a critical stage. We are being kept carefully and closely informed of them by our delegation at Geneva.

I believe it is too early to predict whether a negotiated settlement can or cannot be reached on honourable terms which would bring an effective end to the hostilities, provide a basis for a workable political settlement, recognizing the interests of the indigenous peoples of the countries concerned, and which would be a wise move in the direction of creating positions of stability in the southeast Asia area. So long as negotiations are still going on, however, I think it would be unwise and indeed unnecessary for me to speculate on the result of the failure to end the war. Nevertheless whether success or failure results, the problem of general security in southeast Asia remains.

As I see it, the solution to that problem depends largely on whether the countries most immediately involved can agree on the objectives and principles that should underlie any collective arrangement to maintain and strengthen security in that area. I hope I may be pardoned, Mr. Chairman, if I put forward, on the basis of my own association with this problem in recent weeks, some considerations which in my view affect the search for security in southeast Asia.

In the first place, I think we must accept the fact that the international communist conspiracy is working for, and has made progress in, securing control of southeast Asia. We should certainly be aware of the danger to international peace and security in this development, a danger which cannot be exorcised by comforting interpretations of Asian communism as merely agrarian reform or as nationalism painted red.

It is true, I think, that the urge for national freedom and for social and economic reform, and not devotion to communism as such, is the mainspring of the greatest revolution of our time, the emergence of the masses of Asia from colonial control, feudal restrictions and western pressures. But communist imperialism, directed from Moscow or from Peking or both, has been too successful in exploiting, and in some cases in capturing these forces, even though communism as the agent of aggressive and reactionary imperialism cannot bring either freedom or progress to those it envelops. We know that, Mr. Chairman, but there are millions of destitute and despairing people in Asia who do not as yet.

In the second place we should, I think accept the fact that if this danger exists, and I think it does, there can be no objection to, indeed there should be approval of, regional collective security arrangements organized to meet those dangers in the right way, by those immediately concerned, under article 51 of the United Nations charter. We cannot support the principle of collective security in one part of the world and reject it in another. I think it is right and important that the United States of America should be reassured by its friends on this question of principle. Nevertheless, we should also recognize that in practice the type of collective security arrangements suitable for the Atlantic area might not be practical or desirable in southeast Asia.

An understanding of these needs and these differences will assist, indeed I think will be essential, in finding the right regional solution to the problem of security in that part of the world, once it is agreed that such a solution is necessary to supplement and make more binding the general application of the United Nations charter. Any such regional solution, I think, might well embody the following principles:

First, arrangements reached must be consistent with the provisions of the United Nations charter. If they could be associated in some form with the United Nations, so much the better.

Secondly, they must be divorced from anything that could be called colonialism and not designed to maintain regimes, colonial or national, that have little or no popular support.

Thirdly, it should be recognized that the problem cannot be dealt with effectively in military terms alone, and that no mere military agreement is likely to be satisfactory or enduring. Indeed military aggression of the conventional sort is not likely to be the main danger so much as communist imperialism exploiting those forces within the state—and not always unworthy forces—in order to bring about subversion, civil war and the forcible installation of communist regimes.

It should also be recognized that, as President Eisenhower said on May 12, no country can be saved from communism unless it wants to be saved.

Then, fourth, as I see it, any solution must not be, or susceptible to the interpretation as being, a purely "western" one, or one from which free Asian countries feel that they have been excluded. Surely we must recognize that, whether we agree with all their policies or not, little of a substantial or permanent character is likely to be achieved in establishing peace and security in southeast Asia, or any other part of Asia, without the advice, co-operation and assistance of the free Asian countries. I think it is most important—and I am sure the house agrees with me—that those countries should feel that, even if they are not members of it, any collective security arrangements in southeast Asia that may be worked out should be in their interest, and have taken into consideration their interests. If not enough Asian states feel that way, the foundation of any southeast Asian security organization will not be very firm.

In this connection, the commonwealth association can play and has played a valuable role. And that is one reason why, in my opinion, it was helpful and wise to keep the Asian members of the commonwealth informed, as they were kept informed, closely and continuously, of Geneva developments. It is also one reason why I regret that India, or some similar Asian state or states, was not a member of the Geneva conference.

The working out of an arrangement which would be based on the considerations I have ventured to mention will not be easy, and I think that it will take time. But there is a dilemma here, in that time may be against those who desire to build up a security system to deter aggression in southeast Asia. After all, there is a war going on there. It is not easy, in diplomacy, to reconcile considerations of defence urgency with the necessity for careful political preparation and of securing general and wholehearted agreement. There can be danger both from overtimidity and from overzealousness. There can also be trouble between friends if there is doubt about timing, about exactly what is being planned, about what we are trying to secure, and about what we are trying to prevent.

We should certainly be clear on that last point—what we are trying to prevent. Is the united action which it is desired to bring about to be against communism as such, regardless of the means, military or otherwise, which it adopts to secure its ends in any particular Asian country; or is the commitment for collective action against military aggression only? If it is to be the first, then we should realize that arrangements to achieve this end will be interpreted as a declaration of implacable and fixed hostility, with all action short of general war, and even at the risk of such war, against Asian communism.

The other concept is that which is embodied in NATO. Here the commitment for action, in contradistinction to consultation, is clear and explicit. And it comes into operation as soon as a military aggression has been committed by one state against another—but not sooner.

I do not think it will do any service to the unity of those who are working together for peace if there is not a very clear understanding on this point, and if any negotiations are not based on that understanding.

Now, if I may close by referring a little more specifically to the policy of the Canadian government in respect to the questions we have been discussing at Geneva, and which are still under discussion there.

We will continue—and I am sure there will be general agreement on this—we will continue to assist in bringing about a Korean peace settlement, consistent with United Nations principles and decisions; but we will not repudiate or betray those principles or decisions.

If the Geneva conference should not at this time achieve such a settlement, we will favour a re-examination of the problem at a future date, whether at the United Nations general assembly or by a resumption of the present conference called for that purpose.

We will oppose any move by anyone to resume hostilities in Korea.

So far as Indo-China and southeast Asia are concerned, we recognize that Canada has a very real interest in what is happening there, and what is likely to happen there. As a country with hundreds of miles of exposed coast on the Pacific, Canada is naturally concerned with problems affecting security in the Pacific and in Asia. Moreover, we know from the experience of two world wars that peace is indivisible and that a threat to peace anywhere can soon cover the whole world.

Our inevitable concern for developments in southeast Asia is increased by our close relationship to the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and the three Asian members of the commonwealth. The growing anxiety of these latter three over hostilities going on so near to their homelands can be readily appreciated, since their security would be very seriously threatened if an aggressive communist nation took control, either by internal subversion or by direct military intervention, of one after another of the countries in the area.

Added evidence of our concern for the security and well-being of the nations of south and southeast Asia is to be found in our active participation in the Colombo plan, whereby we have sought to associate ourselves with the area's economic development.

In so far as accepting special political and defence commitments is concerned, there is of course a limit to what a country of Canada's population and resources can do. We have limited strength, in both men and materials; and our commitments, Mr. Chairman, are already heavy. Existing undertakings, such as those under NATO, are such as to circumscribe what Canada can and cannot undertake, militarily and otherwise, not only in southeast Asia but elsewhere.

And therefore, while it is true that if peace is threatened by communist aggression anywhere, it is threatened everywhere, it is also true that Canada cannot be expected to accept special or regional defence commitments in every part of the world where collective arrangements may be advisable. We have of course, through membership in the United Nations, accepted the provisions of the charter. Canada has, therefore, already definite, if general, obligations in the maintenance and restoration of peace and security in all areas where these are in danger. In this connection, it should be realized that the situation in Indo-China, with all its consequences to the peace and security of southeast Asia, has not yet been brought to the United Nations, and is not before the United Nations at the present time. If or when that position should change, Canada's policy, like those of other member states, will of course depend upon the nature, the purposes and the scope of any action which might be recommended by the United Nations. Any action involving an extension of Canada's present commitments would be placed before parliament.

The responsibility for seeking recourse to the United Nations would rest with the states and governments in the areas which are most directly concerned, and any such approach would, I assume, depend upon the outcome of the direct discussions which are now going on in Geneva, and also on a clear assessment of the possibilities and limitations of effective United Nations action. It is clear—at least it seems clear to me—that the United Nations Organization possesses a fund of experience and provides available procedures for peaceful settlement which, in other circumstances, have helped in the past to put seemingly intractable problems on the road to solution, or to halt deterioration in situations threatening the peace, and I would hope that the United Nations might prove useful in this situation, too. But, Mr. Chairman, whether at the United Nations or at Geneva, or wherever the road may lead, the search for peace and security goes on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the unveiling of the speech by the Secretary of State for External Affairs I was rather disappointed in that stand as revealed by him in the early portion of his speech. Without having before me the actual words he used in the two or three concluding paragraphs of his speech, I believe the minister has gone farther in the commitment of Canada to its world responsibilities than this government has ever gone before. His concluding statement to the effect that Canada today has a responsibility in NATO, which is direct, and that Canada internationally, under the United Nations, assumes responsibility for assuring that communism should not advance anywhere in the world, regardless of any words that might dilute the statement that he made means, if literally taken, a commitment far and beyond those ever before taken by this government.

When speaking of the situation in Asia, the minister said that which many of us in other parts of the house have said on other occasions, namely, that military defences of themselves will not maintain bulwarks against communism unless the nations affected desire to be protected or to stand against communism. He referred to the Colombo plan with satisfaction in the degree to which Canada is contributing to raising the standards of people in undeveloped areas in Asia and in other parts of the world.

Through the years I have taken the stand that Canada must extend the amount of that assistance; for people who suffer from the curse of hunger cannot have their stomachs filled by promises of democracy.

The views he expressed at Geneva on May 4 regarding Korea in general represent, I think, the point of view of the Canadian people. What people want everywhere in the world is a cessation of war and the achievement of a degree of peace, which has not been present in recent years.

While the minister weighed the views of two schools of thought in Geneva on the proper course to take to oppose successfully the communist march, as revealed here in the course of his speech, he did not place Canada's position before the conference as I think he should have done. The point of view he has expressed today on southeast Asia is one that he could have expressed there regardless of whether Canada was in fact a member of that conference.

All the peoples of the world, apart from those who are dominated in communist countries, desire peace. Peace can be achieved either by negotiation or through collective action. The minister states that it is the intention of the free nations associated at Geneva to continue negotiation until such time as it will have been established that there is a possibility that negotiation may lead to settlement; but if it is demonstrably established that what is taking place is mere propaganda, that will be the time to terminate the gathering. I agree to the utmost that Canada has a responsibility to bring about the closest relationship between Great Britain and the United States of America. Any divisions that have taken place can be regarded only as difficulties and divergences of views such as happen at any time between nations, however closely allied or united in common objectives they may be.

The real trouble at Geneva was well set out in an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of May 15, which reads as follows:

> The true reason for Geneva's failure becomes starkly clear. It is that the western powers, unable to make peace, are unwilling to make war—unwilling to make even the limited war that might lead to something worse.
>
> The communists know this. They learned it when Mr. Dulles arrived at Geneva brandishing a sword only to return it to its scabbard. They learned it when they saw Britain and France turn away from Mr. Dulles. They learned it completely when the congress of Mr. Dulles' own country showed that Mr. Dulles was in fact offering something he had no power to deliver.
>
> The communists, thus enlightened, and with time on their side had but to wait.
> This is the west's tragedy.
>
> Everywhere in the allied camp there was disunity, doubt, confusion.
> Yet now, with the test come in Indo-China, with the whole western case in the balance in Asia, it is the west that falters, not the communists.

One can understand why it is they falter, for the free nations with the grim experience of two world wars realize something of the awfulness of the possibility which faces the world. It is so easy for us here to say what nations should do; it is difficult to secure that unity in the action they may take with the inherent risk of war should too drastic a course be entered upon.

The tribute the minister paid to Mr. Eden is one that I believe will be accepted everywhere among the peoples of the free nations. With dignity, with a capacity for negotiation based on experience, with a realization that only in give and take is there hope for the achievement of peace, he represented and epitomized something of what British statesmanship can achieve.

I was struck with the fact that while the minister generally dealt with the necessity for unity in southeast Asia among freedom-loving nations, he did not definitely state the views of this government regarding a pact in southeast Asia to protect, preserve and maintain freedom in southeast Asia.

He spoke of the need for collective action there; and of bringing the free nations in southeast Asia into an Asiatic pact. I think Mr. Eden, by his conciliatory course at the Geneva conference, has gone a long way to show the people of India that straightforward negotiations for peace are being met by the communists who place roadblocks in the road that leads to peace and settlement—roadblocks of evasion and postponement of final conclusions.

But there is hope. The attitude of Pakistan and of Ceylon indicate that those nations are beginning to realize this, that only in collective security is there survival. They are beginning to realize, too, that communism is something more than a philosophy. They recognize its aggressiveness and danger to their freedom and survival.

They are looking for a declaration by the free nations of the need for the establishment and the setting up in Asia of an organization similar to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization has operated in Europe, why then will not a similarly conceived organization for peace operate in Asia? It will not operate, unless it includes Asian members. I think that is a salient feature which must be realized.

Out of the travail of Geneva may well be achieved a realization by India, Burma and other Asian countries of what communism means, so there is hope for the establishment of an organization similar to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, which has achieved so much for freedom's survival in Europe. Canada being a Pacific power, what attitude will the Canadian government take with reference to becoming a member of such an organization in the Pacific? For several years the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has been advocating the formation of a Pacific pact. On occasion he has faced ridicule and sometimes indifference. The events of the last few months bear witness to the degree to which that hon. gentleman saw something of the needs in Asia in his advocacy of an organization similar to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The other day I referred to some conclusions I had formed in consequence of the visit I made to Europe a few weeks ago. In every part of Europe every opportunity and every courtesy was extended to me by members of the Canadian diplomatic corps, and every opportunity was given me to see the things I desired to see. I came back with a renewed confidence in the forcefulness and effectiveness of NATO and with the hope, almost one of assurance, that in the immediate future peace will be maintained through the instrumentality of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

What I said has been borne out since by a statement within the last few lays by Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery, Deputy Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, when he said that allied forces are capable of stopping any Soviet surprise attack on western Europe.

> Only an all-out Soviet offensive preceded by a big build-up could overwhelm present allied armies, he said, and such a build-up would give time for the west to prepare itself.

That is his considered opinion as to the effectiveness of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and I think the minister could follow no wiser course to bring Britain and the United States together even closer than in the past, than making the announcement that, in the event of the Geneva conference proving unsuccessful in settling the Indo-China problem, Canada would join with other freedom-loving nations in a pact in Asia designed to assure peace to the same degree as peace has been assured in Europe through the instrumentality of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Indo-China, and what is happening there, may be a turning point in our history. What is happening in Geneva may bring the commonwealth closer to the United States than ever before. The commonwealth has a tremendous contribution to make in the world in the preservation of peace in Asia, with its Asiatic membership joining with the western members of the family.

The future of southeast Asia is at stake. The unity of the western powers must be maintained. Communist strategy seems to be designed to divide and conquer. This debate will show that as far as Canada is concerned we will not be divided. I hope there will come in our country a fuller realization of the responsibilities of Canada in the world of today, and a determination to continue the course of peace we took in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The minister has shown that Canada has responsibilities for peace in all parts of the world, not only in the United Nations; we have to accept them in any Pacific pact that may be achieved, so that the other parts of our commonwealth—Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan and Ceylon—will know that Canada and the commonwealth will stand with the United States and thereby assure the maintenance of a solid wall against the advance of communism everywhere in the world.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, we listened this afternoon to an extremely interesting speech. I was particularly interested in the four points the minister made at the conclusion of his speech, when he said that Canada would continue at Geneva to endeavour to bring about a settlement in Korea through United Nations efforts; that, if unsuccessful, we would hope that a further examination of the situation could be made at a future date with the hope that something useful might come out of it and particularly that peace might be attained; and that we would oppose the reopening of hostilities in Korea. Then again, with regard to Indo-China, the minister made it clear—and I am glad he did so—that we share the anxieties that are felt by our commonwealth associates, particularly those in southeast Asia. Then he went on to say that Canada had already extended her defence commitments as far as he thought we were able to extend them.

I could not agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert when he said that this was a new statement involving further commitments because, as I understood the minister, he said that we had, under the United Nations charter, obligations which we were prepared at all times to fulfil. He also said that we had accepted obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which we were obliged to fulfil but that beyond that Canada should not go. I do not say that he used those words, but I think that was the inference.

This afternoon I am not going to say anything about NATO, although the minister made a short reference to it. Later on in the discussion of the estimates opportunities may arise when hon. members who wish to discuss NATO and to make inquiries concerning that organization will have the opportunity of doing so. I was pleased indeed to hear the minister say that the subcommittee of the disarmament conference, although meeting in secret, had made some progress in adopting an agenda and that the speed which had been attained in preparing for the further discussions was still being maintained.

The minister paid a tribute to the personnel of the Canadian delegation left at Geneva. From my experience at various international conferences with some of the personnel of our delegation, I am perfectly sure that Canada will be well represented even in the absence of the minister; though, of course, should events require his presence I have no doubt that he would proceed there immediately.

I do not want to go into all the points made by the minister but I want to say this. If we are to attain understanding and peace and if we are to attain the co-operation of the Asian people—which we all know is so essential, as the hon. member for Prince Albert indicated in his remarks also—I think what we have to do is to demonstrate our understanding of and sympathy for the aims and aspirations of those Asians who are seeking for independence and for freedom.

The minister said that the situation with regard to Indo-China at the conference was always in a state of flux. I think that statement is true. When we hear it said that this is a struggle between the western democracies and the communists for the control of Asia, I think we must bear in mind that the position in which we find ourselves is largely of our own making. Had we shown sufficient sympathy for the aspirations of the Asian peoples, certainly from the close of the late war, I do not think that the communists would have been able to seize the leadership of liberation movements in the Asian countries. If certain Asians are now becoming a part of a communist conspiracy or are coming under the ægis of communist imperialism, it is largely our neglect of opportunities that were presented to us in years past that has brought this condition about.

This afternoon I want to say something about the background of the present conflict in Indo-China because I think it has a bearing on the policy that Canada must pursue, particularly if things take a turn for the worse. To begin with, we should keep in mind, of course, that this conflict in Indo-China is not of recent origin. Determined efforts of the Indo-Chinese people to obtain their freedom began many years ago. When Japan entered the war in 1941 the allied troops were actually assisted by the nationalists and other groups—under whose leadership?—under the leadership of Ho Chi Minh. At that time the movement was known as Viet Minh. A proclamation was issued by this independence group. They were not communists but were a group, as Nehru said the other day in his statement —and which I may refer to in a moment—consisting of all sorts and conditions of Indo-Chinese people, including people who were by no means communists, but some of whom were socialists, some of whom were Liberals and indeed some of whom were Catholic in religion. I heard that interesting fact stated also the other day in a talk given by Mr. Andre Laurendeau, editor of Le Devoir, in a Sunday evening commentary not long ago when he recorded a conversation he had had with a young Indo-Chinese lady who was a member of the Roman Catholic church and she refused to speak French because she said until the French were out of Indo-China they were not going to use the language of France. A proclamation was issued by this group—and I quote part of it—supporting "the defence of democratic principles by the United States, U.S.S.R., Britain, and China"—as they called the war at that time—and at the same time our Indo-Chinese allies asked the great powers to make a declaration that when victory came over the Japanese forces, the Indo-Chinese people would be granted complete autonomy.

When the war ended a provisional government of fifteen members was set up, five of whom were communists but which included nationalists, some Catholics and others, to govern the country. That group elected Ho Chi Minh as president of "the democratic republic of Viet Nam". This republic was recognized in September, 1945, by the government of China which of course was at that time the government headed by Chiang Kai-shek.

In March, 1946,—to give a brief outline of these events—France signed an agreement with Ho Chi Minh recognizing the democratic republic of Viet Nam "as a free state with its own government, parliament, army and finance, and forming part of the Indo-Chinese Federation of the French Union". Unfortunately that recognition did not last. In 1947 grave differences arose between the new republic and the French republic which resulted in various acts of violence. In 1948, a year later, France signed a new agreement with Bao Dai, Emperor of Annam, and appointed him chief of Viet Nam within the French union. Similar agreements were made by France with the kingdoms of Laos and Cambodia, the two other states of Indo-China. This gave communist leadership the opportunity to further the communist conspiracy, to use the minister's own words. Then of course war began in earnest. The French used United States equipment which had been given to them to prosecute the war, and Ho Chi Minh and his associates, in what they termed their struggle against colonialism, received supplies from the new government of China, a government which simply continued the recognition of this new republic which had been accorded by the former government of Chiang Kai-shek.

I think it is with this background that our appraisal of the situation in Indo-China at the present time must be made. The struggle, as we all know, gradually assumed the more ominous aspects that have culminated in the events of the past few months, events with which we are more or less familiar from the public press. The French government has poured armies, effort and money into the war. French public opinion has been disturbed and divided and is still disturbed and divided. Daniel Mayer, as spokesman of the French socialist party, the largest party in the French chamber of deputies, referred to the background of the struggle on March 5 when speaking in the chamber of deputies, and stated that the agreements between France and Indo-China were not "mere governmental agreements but agreements which bind both peoples." He went on to say that they tie French policy with regard to all Vietnamese governments whatever their character. He referred to a statement by his late leader, Leon Blum, in 1950 when he referred to the agreement in these words:

> They are in reality concluded between the French and the Vietnamese people and proclaim and sanction, unconditionally and absolutely, the independence of Viet Nam within the French union.

M. Mayer then went on to state the problem as he saw it. In the French chamber of deputies he said:

> The problem which faces us today is not so much that of giving more power to the present Vietnamese government. It is rather that of determining whom that government really represents. A Syngman Rhee and a Chiang Kai-shek are sufficient handicaps to the reasonable policy which the west should adopt in Asia. Britain, a nation of traders and sailors, had the wisdom to give India her independence—one of the finest actions promoted by the Attlee government. If only we had followed its example then, we should not need to debate the war in Indo-China here today—there would have been peace long ago. On the 17th of January, 1949, when we socialists were in the government, the general secretary of our party wrote to the president of the council reminding him that the socialists had warned every successive government against a policy of force and against negotiating peace through men like Bao Dai and General Xuan—already then these policies had suffered shipwreck.

He went on to say:

> Today a lead has come from the most remarkable statesman of the young Indian nation, who has set an example of greatness and given us an opportunity to respond in the same spirit. France must seize every opportunity which offers itself for peace. Only thus will she remain loyal to her world mission and respond to the voices which are calling from the very depths of the French people.

I might add once more that this was said in the French chamber of deputies as recently as March 5 of this year. Since these words were spoken the Berlin conference has of course been held and at the present time, as outlined by the minister this afternoon, the representatives of the nations directly involved, together with the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet union, are meeting in Geneva. As the minister said, what the outcome will be is still very doubtful. But in my opinion the climate of this conference has been bad from the beginning.

As Mr. Nehru pointed out in his speech of April 24, great concern has been felt because of statements which have been made since the Geneva conference was called, of the possibility of attacks on the Asian mainland and massive retaliation and the use of atomic weapons, by leading members of the United States congress and some of the military personnel of our great neighbour. Proposals for a collective pact for united action in southeast Asia, without the proviso that the hon. member for Prince Albert made this afternoon, without the adherence of the Asian nations, have caused general alarm in Asia and, I may say, in other parts of the world.

It is certain, as Mr. Nehru stated, that the implications of these statements promote fear that the newly-won independence of the Asian countries may be jeopardized. If I may quote Mr. Nehru, he said:

> The maintenance of independence and sovereignty of the Asian countries as well as the end of colonial and foreign rule is essential to the prosperity of Asian peoples as well as for the peace of the world.

That is the considered opinion of the leader of the great Indian associate in our commonwealth of nations. I say that we in the commonwealth of nations have every reason to consider carefully the opinions of our largest and most populated sister nation in the commonwealth. Proposals for a southeast Asian pact should not be considered without first obtaining the co-operation and agreement of India, Burma, Pakistan and Ceylon. For the western powers to enter such a pact with Australia and New Zealand would in our opinion be fatal to the democratic cause in Asia, and fatal to the peace of the world. I think our United States friends should be told that very plainly by Canada.

Canada should oppose and refuse to associate itself with any southeast Asian alliance which does not include at least the Asian countries I have mentioned. I think, indeed, that was implicit in the statement of the minister this afternoon. This is apparently the view that is strongly held in the United Kingdom. On April 12 and 13 Mr. Dulles and Mr. Eden met to discuss the Indo-Chinese situation. They issued a joint statement which read in part as follows:

> We are ready to take part, with the other countries principally concerned, that is France, Australia, New Zealand, Siam and the Philippines, in an examination of the possibility of establishing a collective defence, within the framework of the United Nations charter, to assure the peace, security and freedom of southeast Asia and the western Pacific.

You will notice that some Asian nations were included and some were not mentioned. On April 13 Mr. Eden placed this statement before the House of Commons. Mr. Attlee, the leader of the opposition, urged that it be recognized that "in building up the strength of the free nations of Asia against aggression, it is vital that there should be a union of Asian countries as well as those of European descent, whether in Australia, here, or in America." Mr. Attlee went on to declare:

> The essential thing is that it should be a freeing of the peoples of Asia which should not in any way be misrepresented—as it may be misrepresented—as a defence of obsolete colonialism.

Therein lies the danger, that a southeast Asian pact without these new free nations would be regarded by these peoples as an attempt to inflict upon them once again an obsolete colonialism. Thus there was a debate in the British parliament and the matter was discussed by the British press and the public throughout the next few weeks. The situation was discussed, and with what result? I read quite a number of British papers, and as far as I have been able to ascertain the result was that public opinion was strongly against any declaration involving united action in southeast Asia without participation by India and the adjacent countries. I believe Mr. Churchill was impressed with public opinion, so that on April 27 he rose in the house, and in reply to a question said:

> The government are not prepared to give any undertakings about United Kingdom military action in Indo-China in advance of the results of Geneva.

It is a fact, too, that Mr. Eden at Geneva has exercised, as the hon. gentleman said this afternoon, patience, perseverance and restraint in an endeavour to bring about a cease-fire and peace by negotiation.

While this conference has been in progress France has suffered severe setbacks in Indo-China, and now finds herself in a position where she cannot win. Irrespective of what may happen in that area, her bargaining position has been effectually weakened. In the "Foreign Policy Bulletin" of May 15, 1954, Mr. William B. Dunn, a member of the United States foreign service who served from 1949 to 1953 in the troubled area, and who is regarded as a specialist on southeast Asia, points out that the Vietnamese are determined to win complete independence. He is not a communist and he has not been attacked by Senator McCarthy or any others. He was regarded, and is still regarded by the state department, as an authority on southeast Asian problems. He says this:

> It means independence from France, and no other political problem seems to them to be of much importance. Virtually all Vietnamese overflow with bitter recollections of firsthand experiences under the old colonial regime. They find it impossible to believe that France is capable of any generous act. Consequently, they are not prepared to believe their country to be independent as long as there is any special political association with France or while the military forces of the French union remain in Viet Nam. The French sponsored government of Bao Dai to them is a mere continuation of the old colonial system under a new label.

We may not think that is a fair statement so far as France is concerned, but he gives it as his opinion, and I want to place it on the record because it is the opinion of a man who is regarded as an authority on the problems of southeast Asia. I may say this also seems to be the opinion of many citizens of the United States. We are told that congress has been deluged with letters protesting against United States intervention in this struggle. Many citizens of the United States remember that until very recently United States policy has been traditionally an anti-colonial policy. Indeed, many of us who had the opportunity, before and during the war, of addressing United States audiences can remember vividly the invariable question relating to the struggle of India for independence, and what I considered from time to time the very unfair references to Canada as a part of the British Empire allegedly supporting colonial oppression in India.

We believe that if France declared dissociation from colonialism in Indo-China it would be more effective in weakening the anti-colonial propaganda of Moscow and Peking, which is false propaganda but which has proven so valuable to Ho Chi Minh, than the dropping of an atomic or hydrogen bomb on Indo-China or any other part of Asia. Indeed, such proposals by prominent United States leaders for direct intervention have received severe criticism in the United Kingdom press. The London Economist, which many of us read from time to time, certainly cannot be regarded as an anti-United States paper. I would say that from time to time the Economist has warmly defended United States economic and external policies. In its issue of May 8, three weeks ago, the paper had this to say:

> Even the majority leader of the Senate himself, Senator Knowland, is allowed to parade his irresponsibility daily, urging war with China and, when others hesitate to involve themselves in it, writing them off as unworthy allies. Is it surprising, with such goings on filling the press, that there should be a lack of confidence in the coherence, and even in the pacific intentions, of American diplomacy?

Then it sharply criticized the tactics of Mr. Dulles, and the Economist said this of his activities:

> Bluff plays a proper part in diplomacy, if it is not tried too often and is never called. Unfortunately, too many of Mr. Dulles's bluffs have not worked. The "liberation" bluff, the "agonizing reappraisal" bluff, the "instant and massive retaliation" bluff—all these have been discovered to mean much less than they appeared to. The result has been to frighten America's allies much more than to impress the communists.

I fear, unfortunately, those words are true. I should like to say again that I am not criticizing the people of the United States, as a people, because I have every confidence that in the main the people of the United States share the desire for peace and a settlement that most of the rest of us have in mind.

Then, too, ill feeling has been engendered by the suggestion that if it were not for British timidity the United States would have approved the French request for air help before Dien Bien Phu fell. British opinion is doubtful if congress would have approved such action, and even if congress did it is doubtful if United States public opinion would have supported the action. I am going to quote again from the comment in the Economist:

> In any case, one would have thought the merits of intervening at this precise moment of time and in a way that was much more likely to provoke Chinese counter-intervention than to save Dien Bien Phu were, to say the least, open to question.

I have devoted considerable attention to British opinion because they see, as we should do and I believe from the Prime Minister's statements earlier this session we see too, that such intervention as proposed in some United States circles would lead to an all-out Asian war and possibly to a world war. In any event, and I think this is something we always have to bear in mind in the commonwealth, in my opinion it would destroy once and for all that valuable association of India with Britain and the other countries in the commonwealth. I think we could say goodbye to India if that happened.

Articles by Hanson W. Baldwin, the well-known writer on international affairs, in the New York Times point out the dangers inherent in intervention. In various articles in the New York Times and particularly one which appeared last Sunday, May 23, he warns that the use of atomic weapons would be useless against the guerrilla forces of Ho Chi Minh, and would have the effect of consolidating much of southeast Asia psychologically, at least, against the United States. In summing up his views Mr. Baldwin wrote:

> The limited advantages and considerable disadvantages—and the risks—of any course we may take in Indo-China were therefore enough to give Washington pause.

If I interpret the remarks of the minister of external affairs this afternoon correctly, and the remarks of the Prime Minister on an earlier occasion, we did not need to pause because we had not taken steps in that direction. I know that gives some satisfaction to many in this house and in the country.

Under these circumstances and with this background, it is obvious that the organization of collective security in southeast Asia presents an entirely different problem from the kind of regional collective security brought about by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I do not want to go into that, because the minister went into it. But I think that is perfectly correct; the two ideas are not analogous. They are quite different, and we should bear that in mind.

Walter Lippmann, whose articles many of us read in the Montreal Gazette every other day, elaborated this view in that newspaper on May 14 of this year. He suggested an alternative policy to strengthen the existing governments of Burma, Thailand and Indonesia, but with this very important proviso: Only if western co-operation is invited, not if it is forced upon them.

In other words, we believe that the initiative must come from Asia if we are going to have a security pact, a regional pact, within the United Nations, and particularly from India. That is essential if any united defence policy is to be approved by Canada, and as I hope by other western countries. And as I have already indicated, we think that any such pact should be a regional pact within the orbit of the United Nations charter and requested by Asian countries.

A few days ago I read a very interesting statement issued by the non-communist socialists of Viet Nam. Let us bear in mind that these non-communist or indeed anti-communist Asian socialist parties in Burma, Indonesia and other countries are exercising a tremendous influence on the conduct of affairs. They sent a statement to the foreign ministers of the principal powers represented at the Geneva conference, and outlined some simple objectives which, they said, must be pursued if peace was to be attained. These objectives were four in number. The first was the suspension of hostilities. Second was the establishment of real independence for Viet Nam. Third was general elections under the control of neutral countries such as—and they gave as examples—India, the Philippines and Siam. Fourth was the conclusion of a treaty giving France cultural, economic, diplomatic and technical facilities similar to those which were provided in the treaty between Great Britain and India.

It seems to me that these are very moderate terms and, if accepted, might form the basis for a lasting peace. They may be idealistic; they may be unacceptable to the other side, even if they were acceptable to our side. But at least it seems to me they form a basis. And in the granting of elections I think they confirm very largely the views most of us hold with regard to the future government of Korea—that if free elections are to be held in Korea they should be supervised by those who are not involved in the war, supervised by those who are not associated with the communist group. And I would add one further proviso: They should be Asian nations associated with the United Nations, but not having participated in the late war.

There are a number of other matters I would have liked to discuss this afternoon. I had wanted to deal more particularly with the background, and with the situation as we see it in Indo-China. I am certain that if France had followed the example of Great Britain in India or, as did the Dutch a little later under pressure, in Indonesia, the situation in southeast Asia would be far different from what it is today.

But the situation is there. And not by threats of massive retaliation, not by threats of military intervention shall we be able to end the troubles in that region. I still believe that the more we can do to assist these Asian peoples in arriving at independence and freedom, and then of building up their economies so that they may improve their standard of living, the more we shall have done to meet the threat of communism. We can do more in that than in any other way.

The tragedy of it is that, so long as there is turmoil and strife in these countries, there is little or no production, little or no building up of those countries. And behind them, to the rear of them, China stands uninvaded; and within its borders, so far as we know, it is at peace, building up its economy and giving a demonstration of what these communists will tell the Asian countries communists can do.

I think that is the tragedy of our time, and I hope that the conference at Geneva will be successful. I agree with my hon. friend: Mr. Eden's part in that conference has been a very worthy one. One of the reasons he has been able to act as negotiator is, I would draw to the attention of the house, that unlike Mr. Dulles, who walked out because the United States does not recognize the fact of a new government in China, Mr. Eden could remain and talk because his government had recognized that fact. That, I think, is an argument for those who would recognize the fact of a new government in China. While we may not agree with his political views, Mr. Eden has been enabled to fulfil a function that no one else could fulfil, at least in the same way.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, before I enter upon a discussion of external affairs generally I should like to explain to the house why it was impossible for me to be here at the beginning of Mr. Pearson's address. I am sorry I had to be away for well over a half hour attending a funeral. I should have liked very much to have been in my seat to hear all he said. However, he was courteous enough to send me a copy of the notes from which he was going to speak. Since coming to the house I have had a chance to look at them, and also to follow what he had to say.

However, before dealing with the minister's statement I should like to say something about the work of the external affairs committee. Nothing has been said this afternoon to this effect, but the occasion for the launching of this debate was a report from that committee. I should like to say a word or two about two or three features of our work, as a background to what I shall discuss later in connection with our external relations.

I have been a member of that committee since it was set up in 1945. During all those years I think it has proved to be a good committee. It has justified itself by the thorough study of the estimates it has made each year and by the painstaking and careful investigation of matters that have arisen. I believe there is very little relative to our external relations that has been overlooked. I believe that the good experience in the external affairs committee might serve as a pattern for some of the other departments of government. I would not suggest all of them should follow the pattern, but certainly I should think it might be wise to try the experiment of referring the departmental estimates of three or four departments to select standing or special committees for studying. Because it seems to me that when the estimates are studied by a committee, where witnesses can be examined, conclusions drawn and recommendations made to the government in a report, a very thorough job can be done—more thorough than in the way in which we deal with estimates normally.

Of course I am not so optimistic as to think that a report sent back to the government from a committee will attain anything very startling, because the inclination on the part of the heavily weighted government committees is to avoid any recommendations or suggestions that might be slightly critical of government policy. For that reason I do not think that the reports would be of tremendous value, but certainly the study itself of the estimates would be.

In the course of our studies this year, most able and interesting witnesses came before us. We appreciated them all; and if we mention some of them particularly, it is only because their work in the field of duty is more interesting to us than were the others. We called before us Mr. Nik Cavell, who is the head of the international economic and technical co-operation division of the Department of Trade and Commerce and administrator of the Canadian participation in the Colombo plan. Mr. Cavell's evidence was not only intensely interesting, but it was most valuable to the whole committee. Through him we learned about the many valuable projects that are being carried on under the Colombo plan and the technical assistance branches in Ceylon, India and Pakistan. We learned that Canada is participating in some very worth-while projects. From the evidence which we were able to get, I would judge that up until recently, at any rate, the countries contributing to the Colombo plan were putting up just about as much money as could efficiently and readily be used by India, Pakistan and Ceylon. However, I think that we are emerging from that position now, and as more engineers and technicians are available, and as experience accumulates, and, further, as these countries that have been looked upon as underdeveloped in the past are able to build up their own productive capacities, more money for capital certainly could be used. Then, under the plans that I have mentioned, I think it is important for us now to consider increasing the amount of capital in both technical assistance and the Colombo plan. The sum of $25 million is what we have been giving each year under the Colombo plan. That will not go very far in the development of the worth-while Colombo projects in which Canada is participating at the present time.

I mention this work in particular because I thought that what the minister said this afternoon is perfectly correct. I think he affirmed his belief that the problems in Asia cannot be solved by military action alone. That is true; I believe that. The Colombo plan and the technical assistance work are two means by which we can help and supplement whatever else might have to be done. I think that these two ideas were well conceived. In my judgment, the best help we can possibly extend to any underdeveloped people or to any underdeveloped country is the kind of help that will enable them to help themselves. Those countries need power development schemes; great pumping stations for lifting waters out of the rivers and into irrigation canals so that it can be put on the land in various parts of their countries. They need improved and more efficient transportation systems that will make it possible for much more efficient productive enterprises and commerce to be carried on. They need improved fishing techniques and equipment to make available the protein foods from the sea, and with these things more cold storage plants that can properly take care of the fish when they are caught. All of these things, and perhaps many more, are the type of things that need to be developed in those countries. To a very large degree they are being done and done very commendably under the Colombo plan.

Mr. Cavell's evidence indicated that already projects which had been under development for some years in India and Pakistan especially are showing their results in increased production of foodstuffs. Last year, for example, for the first time in many years, we were told that India found it possible to provide the necessary food for her people without having to buy abroad. Of course we realize that the past season was a good crop season, but the various community projects under India's five-year plan, assisted by Colombo and the technical assistance program, have done much to increase production of food in that country.

It is reasonable to expect that within a matter of 30 years or 40 years it will be possible, with help from the western countries, to bring up the productive capacity of these three commonwealth countries to the point where those areas will be able to feed their great population on a reasonable level of good nutrition.

Indeed, Mr. Cavell, in his evidence, suggested that we would have to consider the Colombo and technical assistance plans as long-range plans. He emphasized that we cannot expect to accomplish too much overnight, and that those countries that are contributing to the scheme might very well consider that they will have to go on making capital and technical contributions over quite a considerable period of time if we are to achieve the kind of thing that we want to achieve through the operations of the scheme themselves. Even so, if we have to go on for 30 or 40 years, I think that they are very well worth while; and besides the material benefits that will accrue from them to the underdeveloped and underprivileged people of the countries I have named, eventually, there will be also tremendous psychological benefits that will be favourable to the western world. We must remember, Mr. Chairman, that Ceylon, India and Pakistan are members of our great commonwealth family, and as such they deserve our sympathetic understanding, support and help in their great struggle to improve the lot of their myriads of people.

The kind of assistance we are giving to them is the best kind. I am convinced of that. In my judgment it would never do for us to feel that by sending quantities of consumable goods year after year we could help them in a permanent way. Of course, I think we should send gifts of consumable goods, as we can out of our abundant production right here in Canada, and some other countries of the western world, gifts of food materials and other consumable goods that we can spare, to help to show these people that when we call ourselves a Christian nation that is what we really are. I believe that many of the people of the world would be impressed by such gifts, impressed with the fact that we are what we claim to be, and that out of the abundance of our blessings we are prepared to share them with less fortunate people.

I think right here that a word of commendation to Mr. Cavell and his associates for the excellent work they are doing would not be out of place. We are fortunate in being able to have a man like Mr. Cavell to head up this work for Canada.

Another outstanding feature, at least to me, of the committee's experience this year was General McNaughton's appearance before it. As hon. members know, General McNaughton is the chairman of the international joint commission. His report, and the answers he gave to the many questions that we asked, were not only interesting, but also reassuring and educational. General McNaughton is doing an outstanding job for Canada on this very important commission. His strength and his vision and his determination are the very qualities that make him the right man in the right place at the right time. Many studies are being made by the international joint commission involving matters of tremendous importance to Canada and to her future welfare. Of particular interest to me are the studies relating to the boundary waters from the St. Lawrence in eastern Canada to the Columbia river reference in western Canada. The fair division of all waters under study is vital to Canada. Back in 1909 Canada and the United States signed a treaty governing boundary or international waters. Since then Canada has meticulously—and I emphasize that—observed the provisions, every single one of them, of that treaty. However, subsequent acts of the congress of the United States have had the effect of rendering the treaty of 1909 somewhat unstable from the point of view of interpretation by United States interests, and therefore the work of the Canadian section of the international joint commission has been very complicated and exceedingly difficult at times.

It was reassuring to members of the committee to hear General McNaughton say that the Canadian section of the commission is determined to stand by the treaty of 1909 and secure Canada's fair share of the boundary waters as well as a fair share of the power developed from them. May I emphasize that Canada does not want any more than her fair share. But I am certain I am speaking for every one here when I say that we want our fair share. It seems to me that we should lose no appropriate occasion to let General McNaughton and his Canadian colleagues know that the Canadian people stand unitedly behind them in their efforts.

Moreover, our people should be brought to a calm awareness—I do not think it is necessary to arouse them to any emotional hysteria —of the facts of the situation. There are greedy interests in the United States who will spare no efforts to grab the lion's share of the water and power from the international authority. I am not speaking of the United States generally, or the United States government. But there are greedy interests in the United States who would grab the lion's share if they could get it. These interests will attempt to put heavy pressure upon the international joint commission which is charged with making decisions vis-à-vis the international waters, and references thereto.

It is for that reason, among others, that I say we are very fortunate to have as leader of the Canadian section a man of the character and stature of General McNaughton who, with his colleagues, should be made to feel the interested support of all Canada in his very difficult task.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to turn for a few moments to the world situation. I suppose in a general fashion the best way to describe it at the moment is to say it is a mess, and I suppose one could be pardoned for asking what has happened to statesmanship in the world, and for inquiring the whereabouts of our statesmen. In view of the manner in which the situation has steadily deteriorated a person could be excused for thinking they had at last chucked up the job and gone off on a fishing trip leaving the office boys to decide policy. The stenographers, I am certain, would sometimes do a better job.

We all hope, and there has been at least some reason to hope, that the Geneva conference would get down to business without delay and work out some kind of peace treaty for Korea and at least an armistice in Indo-China. We were hopeful of that and I certainly have not lost my hope yet by any means. We had hoped that France would be able to hold the communist-led Viet Minh at Dien Bien Phu, at least until the conference called a cease-fire, for that would have strengthened France's position tremendously. I was hopeful that France would have the good sense to give the people of the provinces in Indo-China some satisfactory guarantee of early independence on a political basis of which we could all be proud.

I was hopeful too that the western nations would go to the conference united on a firm policy with respect to Indo-China as well as the whole of southeast Asia. But France demonstrated, unfortunately, and I say this sadly and not with any desire to be critical, how left-wing sympathies can demoralize the people and render a country almost impotent. We have all had to pay tribute to the gallantry of the French forces who put up such a marvellous defence at Dien Bien Phu. But their gallant stand and heroism were useless while impotence and indecision governed everything back in France where direction and wherewithal had to come from. The world was disgusted and saddened at the callous refusal of left-wing members of the French parliament to stand with their countrymen in a moment of silence out of respect to the men of their own flesh and blood who had died in the defence of Dien Bien Phu. France is not the only country that has been rendered almost or completely impotent by communist paralysis. To a greater or lesser degree every country in the world has been affected by it. But thank God some countries have roused themselves to the danger and are doing their best to clean up their own houses and put them in order.

[Mr. Low.]

Unfortunately, Britain seems at this time not to be able to give the kind of leadership that is expected and required of her in a world of confusion. There is only one good reason for it that I can see, and that is the effects of the paralysis of which I have already spoken which, if not checked, get so strong as to turn statesmen from statesmanship to expediency.

As a consequence, everybody has been waiting around expecting everybody else to decide what to do in Indo-China and while they have been blundering along the communists have been progressing successfully from one objective to another until today Hanoi, and the rich rice plains of that country, are in danger of capture by the Viet Minh.

I realize some of the difficulties in the way of achieving unity amongst the western nations and of deciding on a firm policy. I know that democratic countries cannot do more than their people are prepared to allow them to do. But I am certain in my own mind that if every means available were used to inform the Canadian, United States and British people to make them aware of the dangers and the possible solutions to the problems involved at Geneva, they would be prepared—and I am speaking of all the people generally now—to do whatever is necessary to preserve their freedom and establish their security.

Let it not be forgotten for one moment that the freedom, future security, happiness and well-being of every individual in these countries is involved in what happens at Geneva. The stakes are high, and that part of the game has to be played mighty carefully. However, in our part of the world I fear that the people generally have not been made aware of the dangers and the possible solutions to the problems. Consequently they are confused and hesitant about what should be done and what they are prepared to sacrifice to bring our cause to triumph. Our people have somehow got to be made to understand, and when I say our people I mean not only the people of Canada but of all the free nations of the world, that there is a great cause and that that cause is worth struggling for.

On October 31, 1942, not very long after Britain's darkest hour of the late war, Prime Minister Churchill spoke to a group of about 3,000 mine owners and mine workers delegates at some point in England. In the course of his speech the Prime Minister is reported to have said these words:

I sometimes have a feeling of interference. I want to stress that. I have a feeling sometimes that some guiding hand has interfered. I have a feeling that we have a guardian because we've a great cause, and we shall have that guardian so long as we serve that cause faithfully. And what a cause it is!

That ends the quotation from Mr. Churchill but I should just like to say one word on what Mr. Churchill said. The Prime Minister of Britain expressed a deep faith and that faith was vindicated to the full by event after event during world war II. The people of Britain were made aware of their danger. They were made aware of the great cause for which they were struggling, of the overarching Divine Providence and protection for their cause, and the righteousness of their cause. They did not hesitate to decide what they were willing to do.

At the appropriate moment, given statesmanship and leadership, the people of the free countries in the world, I am satisfied, would not hesitate to decide the part they would play and what sacrifices they would be prepared to make if they were made aware of the dangers to their freedom and liberty, and if they could be assured that our cause was just and right.

The Deputy Chairman: We will consider clause 1 of these bills.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to ask you to go through the task of calling all the bills one by one but there are two or three of these cases on which I should like to make a brief comment. I am in your hands as to how you would like to handle them.

The Deputy Chairman: If the committee were in agreement that the bills be committed all at one time, perhaps the remarks the hon. member wishes to make on one or two of them might be made when the appropriate section is called. Is that procedure agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, this divorce case is a case that is based on evidence. I do not choose to oppose the case in any way, shape or form. However, I should like to say something on this matter of evidence. All these cases, as was this one, are based on sworn evidence—evidence taken under oath —by individuals. These people come to the committee of the other house, and if necessary, they come to a committee of this house and take an oath that they will tell the truth and nothing but the truth. Many of us are not trained in legal matters and we have a great deal of difficulty in sorting out the evidence. I feel that our people back home sent me here to legislate. I feel that they sent me here for the purpose of making laws, not to determine between different types of evidence and to decide which evidence is acceptable and which is not. I feel that I am wholly unqualified to perform that function.

The question that enters my mind is this. What happens if in this evidence perjury is apparent or is possibly even admitted? As the committee will recall, I drew the attention of the house to one of these cases on April 2 last. The case was referred back to the committee, presumably for them once again to peruse the evidence and to reconsider their decision. However, when this committee met the counsel for the petitioner appeared and asked permission to withdraw the case. He was asked for a reason and he said that his client had found that those who had given evidence on his behalf were wholly untrustworthy. To me that statement seemed to be an admission of the suspicion to which I gave vent on April 2. There was at least cause to suspect perjury there. In fact, in this particular case the man had given evidence under oath that he was an agent for a certain life insurance company. But we have an affidavit from that life insurance company to say that they had never heard of that man, so he could not possibly have been registered as one of their salesmen. There were other evidences of perjury.

What I should like to know is this. Since these cases are based on sworn evidence, if there is an admission or a suspicion of false evidence having been given, who is responsible for instituting action for perjury? Is it the committee of this house? Is it the committee of the other house? Is it the chairman of our committee or of the other committee or is it our Minister of Justice? Or is it up to the attorney general of the provincial government? If it happens in this house, is it the attorney general of the province of Ontario? We have a great many committees in this house which from year to year hear evidence taken under oath. Is it a satisfactory situation when the attorney general of a provincial government has to peruse all cases of possible perjury in committees of this house or of the other house? I should like the Minister of Justice to give me an answer as to who really is responsible.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, there is not any question at all that the constitutional responsibility for the administration of justice comes squarely under the provincial authorities under the terms of the British North America Act.

Mr. Regier: Which provincial authority?

Mr. Garson: In connection with a case of this sort, the provincial authority of the province in which the offence occurs.

Mr. Nicholson: That would be Ontario or Quebec in this case?

Mr. Garson: If perjury were committed before a Senate committee, that is in the city of Ottawa in Ontario.

There is, however, good sense in the remarks which the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam made to the effect that crown prosecutors and attorneys general of the provinces can hardly be expected in the normal course of their duties to examine the evidence which is given before Senate committees and to see whether any perjury is committed. If, therefore, it is suspected that the evidence which is given before the divorce committee of the other place indicates that perjury has been committed, and if all of the circumstances seem to warrant it I should think that the proper procedure for the responsible official of the other place would be to send the file to the crown attorney of the city of Ottawa for attention, if the offence took place here, in the same way that he would give attention to any crime or alleged crimes that were brought to his attention in the course of his duties. In that way the proper federal authorities would be acting in a manner for which they had the proper machinery and the provincial authorities in the same connection would be acting similarly. I am sure my hon. friend must realize that when we do not have the responsibility for the administration of justice we do not build up a staff of crown prosecutors and so forth to act under federal auspices,—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have lots of lawyers though.

Mr. Garson: —except in relation to customs and excise offences and so on. Even then we retain outside counsel in most cases because the volume is not sufficiently large in any one place to warrant our having salaried crown attorneys. Therefore I would think that if the circumstances of the case to which my hon. friend refers appears sufficiently heinous the file might be sent to the crown attorney.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow one question? Is there no one who takes the position of the Queen's proctor in connection with divorce actions?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend means divorce proceedings before the Senate committee?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, before the Senate committee.

Mr. Garson: I must confess I cannot answer that question offhand. I should think that probably the committee as a whole would take that position. I think that my hon. friend from Prince Albert, upon reflection, would agree that was the case. If there were any irregularity or impropriety connected with the proceedings before the committee I am sure that every member of it would feel some responsibility to see that proper action was taken in respect of it.

Mr. Regier: Before I cast a vote for this first section which is based on sworn evidence, would the minister give the house his assurance that the case to which I referred on April 2 will be carefully investigated by his department and, if necessary, the particulars called to the attention of the attorney general of the province of Ontario? I feel this is a rather important matter because we do not want our citizens to get the idea that sworn evidence before a committee of this house or of the other place is just a mockery. In my opinion it is important that Canadian citizens realize their responsibility when they are asked to appear and to take an oath.

Mr. Garson: I must say in all candour that I am not at all seized with the circumstances of the case to which my hon. friend refers, but I will be glad to discuss the matter with the chairman of the Senate divorce committee and move on from there in accordance with what seems to be the proper thing to do in the light of our discussion.

The Deputy Chairman: Before this discussion continues I think it is up to me to make this point. I am not suggesting a ruling that the evidence upon which these cases are based is not open for discussion at this time. Of course it is, but I am going to tell the commitee now that a debate as to what should be done with respect to instituting a perjury action in a case of this sort, and where the responsibility for that lies, is not, I think, within the ambit of the committee's duties at this time.

Mr. Gillis: I want to get a little information. I do not think I agree with your ruling, Mr. Chairman. The case that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has brought up is one that has already been before the house. It was sent back from the house because of the evidence. I am not going to argue it one way or the other, but I should like to get one thing clear in my mind. Incidentally, this is a good example of why we should not be handling these matters here. The Minister of Justice stated a minute ago that he thought the expenses involved in a prosecution for perjury should fall upon the province of Ontario. But this was not an Ontario divorce. This was a Quebec divorce and the crime was committed in Quebec.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am afraid I must point out that if I have followed the discussion correctly the evidence to which hon. members are now referring is evidence taken in a case concerning which there is not even a bill before the committee at the moment. I admit that the method of acquiring the evidence upon which these cases are based and the validity of such evidence are certainly open to discussion in the committee at this time, but whether or not somebody should institute a prosecution for perjury with respect to a divorce bill which has not reached this house—

Mr. Gillis: It has gone from the house; it was sent back.

The Deputy Chairman: —which is not before the committee at this time is, I am afraid, not a proper subject for discussion on clause 1 of these bills.

Mr. Gillis: I was not—

The Deputy Chairman: I think the Leader of the Opposition wanted to say something.

Mr. Gillis: I was not debating the evidence or questioning it at all. However, the Minister of Justice did state that he was going to examine the question—and we should know—of where the responsibility rests for prosecution. He indicated that in this case it would fall on Ontario. That is not fair to Ontario. If he is going to look into this particular case, which was passed by the Senate, came to this house, was sent back and thrown out, then I suggest that he should also examine that aspect of the matter. It is not fair to put Ontario to the expense of a prosecution for something that comes from Quebec.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gillis: I am through.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gillis: I am finished.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I want to make it quite clear that in so far as the question of instituting a prosecution for perjury based on a case not before us at the present time is concerned, the question of where the responsibility for that lies is not a subject for discussion on clause 1 of these bills.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I propose to bring this debate in order because I believe the Minister of Justice has raised an extremely important point. I propose to vote against the measure and to explain why I am going to vote against it. I will refer to what the Minister of Justice has just said. I must confess that I had not realized previously that the Minister of Justice accepted no responsibility in his department for considering the nature of the evidence and taking appropriate action if it should be disclosed that the evidence did not support divorce. There are many of us who for different reasons have very strong objections to the laxity in divorce proceedings in any event. There are some of us who belong to communions in which there is a definite prohibition against that proceeding.

But apart from that consideration entirely we are confronted now with the statement that the Department of Justice stands aside in respect of the evidence upon which a divorce is being granted through the special legislative action of the parliament of Canada. For some time a great deal of concern has been felt in the house about the fact that we should find ourselves in the position of having to accept a whole series of divorce bills with no real opportunity to test the evidence or to challenge it. We had one case recently where the evidence manifestly was, to put it very mildly, most unlikely, in fact, so unlikely that I understand those who had taken the responsibility for presenting the application deemed it wise to proceed no further.

The fact remains, however, that if there was perjury that perjury is in no way cured simply because the proceedings have not been pressed and the application has either been withdrawn or allowed to stand. I would have thought that the Department of Justice would have inquired into that curious case where the horn played such an important part. I have forgotten just how the horn was sounded or the particular part it had in the proceedings, but the whole thing sounded fishy. In fact, apparently it was regarded as sufficiently fishy by those who had presented the application that they decided not to proceed. If there was perjury, then perjury should be no less perjury in a case of this kind. If we are going to be called upon to deal—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Leader of the Opposition is carrying on the same discussion that I felt called upon to interrupt when another hon. member was speaking, namely the discussion of the evidence that might have been or would have been the justification for a bill being submitted to this committee. At this time that bill is not before this committee. I must say it is my ruling that discussion of a perjury action or what action is to be taken as a result of certain evidence given in this building has not any connection with any of the bills now before the committee, and is not a subject for discussion at a time when we are in committee on certain specific divorce bills.

Mr. Drew: I am not finished yet, Mr. Chairman. I have presented the illustration, and I simply say now that proposition that has been stated in relation to this particular case, that it is not the responsibility of the Department of Justice because these parliament buildings happen to be in the province of Ontario, that the responsibility rests upon the attorney general of Ontario to examine the evidence that is given here and consider whether or not a question of perjury might arise, is one that places before this house a situation that makes it very difficult for us to proceed in this very extraordinary way we have been proceeding. For that reason, and to give conformity to the procedure I have put forward, I propose to vote against this measure.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask a question, Mr. Chairman. Where was the perjury committed?

Mr. Knowles: We have before the committee, by a procedure which you have suggested, Mr. Chairman, clause 1 of fifty different divorce bills. I have indicated that there were three or four of them upon which I wish to make a brief comment, and I indicated that it was satisfactory to me if you found some other method rather than calling them one at a time. I now wonder whether we should not have followed the other practice, but at any rate may I indicate, so that you will see how thoroughly in order I am, that my remarks are directed to Bills Nos. 382, 399, 401 and 407.

I do not wish to suggest that I might not have remarks of a similar character to make with respect to the other bills included in this group of fifty, but I am speaking directly to those four bills, the number of which I have given but I have given them without indicating the names of the persons involved. In looking through the evidence concerning these four bills, I find that in every case the evidence was given by one or the other or both of two detectives. Again, I shall not advertise them by giving their names. But I point out that the committee on miscellaneous private bills, when it considered a batch of these bills the other day, not only rejected the bill to which reference has been made and which Your Honour has suggested should not be further discussed, but rejected another bill.

We will call this other bill a bill dealing with people by the name of Mr. and Mrs. A. This bill was rejected by the committee unanimously. Nobody would defend it at all. The committee was not satisfied with the evidence contained in this other case—that of Mr. and Mrs. A. Their name does not begin with A; I just picked that out of the air.

I draw the committee's attention to the fact that the two detectives who were witnesses in this case which was turned down unanimously by the committee turn up in these four cases, covered by Bills Nos. 382, 399, 401 and 407. I ask the members of this committee: What confidence can you have in the validity of bills based upon evidence from these detectives, and they are names that have been turning up in these cases through most of the years I have been in parliament. Time and time again it has been evident, on the basis of just reading the transcript, that it is evidence that cannot be trusted. On the basis of that, what confidence can we have in the validity of the cases being brought before us? I do not know. It may be that some of these cases covered by the bills to which I have referred are legitimate cases so far as the laws of the land stand at the present time. But when, as I say, one case is turned down unanimously because the members of the committee are not satisfied with the evidence that has been given, what confidence can we have when the same people bring in so-called evidence in other cases?

Hon. members know the kind of evidence they give, such as putting a matchstick at the door or putting scotch tape on the door; that sort of thing. I need not go into it. I believe that in the case that was rejected it was revealed that evidence was given concerning a certain woman who was supposed to have been in Montreal, but our committee was convinced she was not in Montreal at that time at all. Some of us have never had any confidence in this way of dealing with the matter, but what has happened recently surely must shatter the confidence of any who still had confidence in this way of dealing with the business.

My points are two. One is the matter we are not supposed to discuss, the bill that has been dropped because counsel appeared and said it should be withdrawn. The other is that we can hardly have confidence in those who passed that bill. Here is another one which went before the committee and the members of the committee said, despite the fact the Senate passed this, we have no confidence in it. They unanimously threw it out. Yet, we have these four bills before us today. I have not taken the time to read them all, and I do not know what is in all the others.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was the evidence direct evidence or circumstantial?

Mr. Knowles: Some of both, if I may answer my hon friend. A great deal of it, indeed most of it, is circumstantial.

There is no secret about what we are advocating, and we are not picking on these particular cases. I mentioned them so I could stay in order. Surely, the members of the house must be coming around to the position we have taken for a long time that parliament is not the place to deal with these cases. We ought to find some other way. I hope that will be done.

I have mentioned four of the fifty bills, Mr. Chairman, and I have done so because of these same detectives who turn up over and over again. When I see their names in the evidence and recall some of the other cases in which they had been mixed up, I certainly do not feel that it is parliament's business to be dealing with matters of that kind.

There is another one in the group that presents a strange story, and that is Bill No. 397. Again, I shall refrain from giving names. As I understand it, the man in this case some time ago applied to parliament for a divorce from his wife on the ground that she was incurably insane. Hon. members will recall that application and the considerable interest in it, because it raised the whole question of the grounds for divorce. Then, we did not hear anything about it for quite a while. In fact, most members probably wonder what happened to the case. It appears the lady came before the senators during the hearing, and they decided she was not incurably insane. I suppose senators are capable of judging sanity or insanity. Anyway, the initial case was withdrawn. But now we have a case between the same two parties before us again. This woman, who was earlier alleged by her husband to be incurably insane—

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many years ago was that?

Mr. Knowles: It was about 1939 when she first went to the hospital. Now she has come back to this parliament and applied for a divorce against her husband on the grounds that he has committed adultery. And who was the chief witness to the fact that he had committed adultery? It was the husband, himself.

I do not propose to judge that case—this is Bill 397, clause 1; I could not be more in order, could I?—I do not propose to judge as to what is right or wrong in that case. I am not competent to do so, and I doubt if any member in the House of Commons feels that he is competent—certainly not on the basis of such evidence as we have here. I do not suppose many members have read the case.

I would like to know what has gone on in the interval between the time when the first application was made, on the grounds of insanity, and this application on the grounds of adultery on the part of the other person.

Well, the divorce has been approved by the Senate, and here it is, buried in this bunch which has come along today. I do not know whether the committee on miscellaneous private bills considered this one or not, but there it is. It is one of the fifty and, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has said, his constituents did not think, when they elected him on August 10, that they were electing a person to judge on issues like this, which are judicial in character and should be dealt with by a proper court.

None of us feels that he is competent to deal with a matter of this kind. I certainly hope that the members of this House of Commons and the members of the government will consider very seriously the spot in which we are being placed with regard to this whole business, which is not the business of parliament, I suggest. If anything at all, it is the business of a court. Surely we must, as we recognize the necessity of getting rid of this business, give it in some way to an appropriate court that can deal with it properly.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, we are called upon to vote on these bills. As a member of the committee I should like to say that when they come in large groups, as they do, I think in the past members may have voted for those bills on the strength of the fact that the Senate committee had passed them and had granted the applications for divorces. However at our last meeting of the committee there were only two cases before it. As has already been pointed out, the first of these was withdrawn—and under very curious circumstances which, as had been suggested, should lead to very close examination of the case because of a possibility of perjury.

The second case passed the Senate committee, but was thrown out unanimously by the committee of this house. In other words, at one meeting of the House of Commons committee both cases passed by the Senate committee were rejected.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member please come to the bill before the committee.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, we are called upon to vote for a series of divorce bills, and there has been no opportunity for a close examination of the evidence. We are asked to vote on these bills on the strength of the evidence presented to the Senate committee. I suggest that under the circumstances, in view of the fact that at the last meeting of the committee on miscellaneous private bills two bills passed by the Senate were thrown out—and very wisely so—the circumstances have altered somewhat, and that before we should be called upon to vote on these bills we should be prepared to give a great deal more consideration than has been given in the past.

In other words, if the Senate passed two bills, as they did, which were thrown out by the House of Commons committee, then I suggest this house ought to give a great deal closer consideration to divorce bills when they come before us in the future. For that reason I say we ought to consider the whole question of the handling of these divorce cases in the House of Commons before we are asked to vote en bloc on a great many of these bills.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think that inadvertently an extremely important issue has been raised on this occasion. I believe it will be agreed that the sanction behind our ordinary judicial procedure is, in large measure, the knowledge on the part of those who give sworn evidence that if there is perjury they may and should be charged in respect of that perjury. While we would like to think that the consciences of people would prevent their making false oaths, the very fact that we include the perjury provisions in the Criminal Code indicates the extent to which this is regarded as a sanction behind our judicial procedure.

In the present instance I am not discussing the procedure, because that is a big consideration. I wish it quite clearly understood that in this respect I am not identifying myself with the particular argument that has been put forward by members of the party which first raised the question today. That is a very big subject, to be discussed on some other occasion.

However the situation in which we now find ourselves, in relation to these bills which are placed before us in bulk, and the first items of which we are now discussing, is that we are told that unless the attorney general of the province of Ontario sees fit to examine every one of these cases, then there is no sanction such as ordinarily applies in such a case.

Mr. Garson: No, no. On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman; I am sure I did not leave any such impression. What happens in the ordinary case, where A is suing B for damages following an accident, is that if perjury is committed by any witness in such a case the person chiefly concerned—very often the judge who tries the case—brings to the attention of the crown prosecutor the fact that such perjury has been committed in order that the crown prosecutor may look into the matter to see if he thinks a charge of perjury should be laid.

When the hon. member asked me this afternoon what procedure would be adopted where perjury had been committed in proceedings before the Senate committee, I thought I had given to hon. members a very clear indication that an analogous step would be taken by, possibly, the chairman of the Senate divorce committee, to bring that matter to the attention of the crown prosecutor in the same manner as a judge would do it in the case to which I referred a moment ago.

I said in that connection that the constitutional responsibility for the administration of justice was that of the province, and that to this end in every province of Canada the government has fairly elaborate machinery, consisting of the attorney general's department and a number of crown prosecutors scattered throughout the province for the purpose of carrying out that constitutional responsibility.

I did not say that the attorney general or crown prosecutor of the province would have to give the matter his personal attention and examine the evidence that was brought before the Senate committee for suspected perjury; because he could not discharge that responsibility even in connection with the ordinary lawsuits that are tried in the law courts. Cases of perjury there are brought to the attention of the crown prosecutor or the attorney general's department, and are investigated in a routine manner using machinery which is set up for that purpose. If there is an indication that there is evidence to support a charge of perjury, that charge is laid and then continues in the ordinary way.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Has there ever been a charge of perjury laid in connection with those divorce cases?

Mr. Garson: I am sure I have not the faintest idea whether there ever has been or not. The question that was addressed to me and which I have endeavoured to answer was what steps could be taken, in the event that perjury had been suspected; what procedure should be followed?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It would be contempt of parliament, would it not, and as such punishable by parliament?

Mr. Garson: I would not like to say offhand that my hon. friend was wrong in that suggestion, but I am perfectly certain that it would be perjury because—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think I must interrupt the Minister of Justice at this point because the committee will agree with me that, interesting as this discussion may be, it has nothing to do with clause 1 of the bill which we are considering. I propose to read to the committee clause 1 of the first of the 50 bills which are being considered. The clause reads:

> The said marriage between Rita Boucher and Roland Dufort, her husband, is hereby dissolved, and shall be henceforth null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

In so far as any member wishes to argue whether or not that clause 1 is based on correct or incorrect evidence I cannot rule him out of order; but assuming that perjury has been committed in connection with clause 1 of any of these 50 bills under discussion in this committee, as to whether or not clause 1 shall or shall not be adopted, the discussion as to where the responsibility for laying a charge of perjury lies is absolutely out of order. Will the members please confine themselves to a discussion of clause 1 of the bills before them?

Mr. Nicholson: Now that the question of perjury has been drawn into the discussion—

The Deputy Chairman: I hoped I had ruled the question of perjury out of the discussion.

Mr. Nicholson: It is significant that with respect to the 50 bills before us it is the hon. member for Parkdale who is the sponsor, and he is not in his place. There are 75 members here from the province of Quebec where these bills originate. As I say, there are 75 members from the province of Quebec, and yet it has not been possible to get one member from that province to sponsor these 50 bills. They have to go to Ontario, to the city of Toronto, to get the hon. member for Parkdale, who is absent, to be the sponsor. We should not be asked to accept clause 1 without having the assurance that no perjury has been committed in connection with the evidence having to do with Bill No. 380.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask the minister whether he has acted on the suggestion of hon. members and has read the evidence in connection with Bill No. 327. If he has not, will he give an undertaking that he will read the evidence over the week end and indicate whether he thinks it is fair that the province of Ontario should have to take on the responsibility of following up and incurring public expense in connection with prosecuting for perjury that really is—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I might point out to the hon. member that it will not be possible for me to permit the minister to answer that question because Bill No. 327 is not before this committee. We start with Bill No. 380. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Macdonnell: You will be very surprised to hear me raise a point of order, Mr. Chairman, but I want to ask you whether you think that this question is irrelevant, because it is very important to me so as to help me to know how I am to vote. I have always been very troubled with this procedure. I remember when I was first in this house Mr. Ilsley trying to defend it with very great uneasiness, showing how much he disliked it, but saying there did not seem to be any alternative, as did the Prime Minister once when the house became particularly restive and asked to change the procedure. But up to the present moment I had assumed that while this is a procedure that is very distasteful, it was at least carried out in an efficient manner. What has happened this afternoon makes me feel that perhaps by inadvertence the usual sanctions, to use the words of my leader, which are applicable in ordinary judicial proceedings or in any kind of a proceeding where oaths are involved, appear at least to be utterly absent here. I suggest to you a determination of this question is very important to the vote of some of us, and therefore I hope you will not rule it out of order.

Mr. Drew: I do want to refer to certain statements made in regard to this by the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice pointed out that under the British North America Act the administration of justice is under the provinces. We are not dealing now with the administration of justice in the ordinary sense. We are dealing now with a parliamentary procedure. The hon. member for Prince Albert has pointed out that probably there may be two points raised by this. There may well be the question of contempt of parliament; but in any event, as the minister said, if the evidence is false it could be perjury. The minister suggested that he did not make the statement that this would be the responsibility of the attorney general of Ontario. I would point out to him he said earlier that since this evidence is given—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would hope it will not be necessary for me to point out to the Leader of the Opposition or to the Minister of Justice that if they consider I was in error in ruling that these matters in connection with perjury are out of order they have the right to appeal to the house. I have made the ruling, and I regret I must repeat it, that the question of perjury proceedings and where the jurisdictional responsibility lies and so forth, even in connection with perjury which may have taken place on these bills, or on bills which are not before the committee, is not in order at the present time. We are not even considering the general principle of the bill. We are in committee of the whole on clause 1 of a group of bills which have come to this committee from the miscellaneous private bills committee of this house. They appear in the name of the chairman of that commitee, because it is his duty to sponsor them.

An hon. Member: He is not here.

The Deputy Chairman: I must insist that we confine our discussion to the merits or demerits of clause 1 of these individual bills, and that matters of procedure, jurisdiction and so forth, important as they may be, are not in order in the committee stage on clause 1 of these bills.

Mr. McIvor: You are right.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether I may ask a question of the Minister of Justice with regard to clause 1 of the four bills, the numbers of which I gave him before? I have tried my best, as you will confirm, Mr. Chairman, to be in order. I refer to Bills Nos. 382, 399, 401 and 407. In view of the statement that I made a few moments ago that persons who gave evidence in connection with these four cases were persons who gave evidence in connection with a case that has been thrown out, would he consider that it might be a good idea for him to look at evidence given by those persons?

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that the function of the Senate committee and of the House of Commons committee which have been set up for this purpose was to deal with this very question to which my hon. friend refers, and since they have been set up for that purpose I think the proper course for all hon. members is to leave that responsibility, at least in the first instance, with them.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a word about this. I would point out to the Minister of Justice that there is something in the neighbourhood of 400 of these bills. How can any committee of this house give the proper study to these bills and decide whether they should go through?

Mr. Fairey: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word about this matter. It seems to me we are getting far afield on this question. As a member of the miscellaneous private bills committee, and like several other hon. members who have spoken, I would like to remind the house that we are discussing these particular bills which have been before our committee and which have been recommended to this house for approval. It has been said we had no opportunity to study the evidence. That is not true. Every member received copies of the evidence in each of these cases, and if any particular hon. member did not read that evidence then it is his own fault. The fact is that every one of these bills came before us en bloc and they received unanimous consent of the miscellaneous private bills committee.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fairey: Yes.

Mr. Nicholson: Has the hon. member read all the evidence?

Mr. Fairey: Yes, that is exactly why I stand on my feet. I found out, as did every other hon. member, that I did not like the procedure, and I did not like the evidence I have had to read. I suspect there may be collusion in it. But the fact is that I have read the evidence and every member of the committee is supposed to have read the evidence, otherwise they should not have passed them unanimously in the miscellaneous private bills committee. That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman. These bills are commended by a committee of this house. I am a member of that committee, I have voted for them in committee, and I shall vote for them now.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we are so very far afield at all. We are asked to dissolve some 50 or so marriages. That is set out in clause 1 as I understand the clause, and the reason for the dissolution is the sworn evidence. I am not going back to the integrity of this sworn evidence again on which we are asked to dissolve these marriages, but if I heard the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., correctly I understood him to make the statement, "I believe there is collusion in them." That is a most amazing statement for him to make, along with the admission that he voted for them.

Mr. Fairey: Mr. Chairman, I said "I suspected from the nature of the evidence there might be collusion."

Mr. Regier: In that case that puts a slightly different light on it. However, coming back to the integrity of this evidence, I notice that of the very few cases which have been contested—I think about half a dozen cases in all this winter have been contested—three cases have not made the grade, and it makes me begin to wonder, if these men and women with whom we are at present concerned had the wherewithal and contested these cases, how many would manage to make the grade through this house and through our committee.

I asked one of these attorneys concerned how much it would cost me to get the type of divorce with which we are now dealing. "Well," he said, "I will tell you. If it is an open and shut case, and if we have no arguments anywhere down the line, my minimum fee would be $1,250." I was horrified, and he turned to me and he said: "Well, we have to pay the government so much"—I forget the exact figure, but it was about $300-odd—"and then there is this fee and that fee." I said: "That is your minimum, $1,250?" And he said "yes" and he added, "That is $250 less than what most of my fellow lawyers are charging."

Now, imagine a husband or a wife in any one of these cases being served with a notice of divorce and facing a fee like that in order to contest it. In all likelihood the marriage has broken up in any case, and who wants to spend $1,000 to defend a broken home. These circumstances throw a great shadow of suspicion on all this evidence on the basis of which we are supposed to dissolve these marriages.

I have heard a rumour, in fact it is more than a rumour for I read an item in this regard in a newspaper some time ago, to the effect that there is a possibility of the other place being given sole authority to deal with these matters. I hope the government will never seriously accept such a suggestion because what has been revealed this winter should be enough to convince the government that that is not a solution. I cannot support these measures because I have lost all faith in the type of evidence which is being given to committees of this house or of the other place.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I hope there will be a vote on this before six o'clock. I take the statement of the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., on his responsibility as a member of this house. He states that he suspects collusion. I therefore propose to vote against this, and I call for a recorded vote.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I have had some information this afternoon that I did not expect to obtain. I happen to be perhaps the only member of the house who has appeared before the Senate committee on divorce when Ontario was in a position in which some of the other provinces appear to be at the present time. I must say that my hon. friend's remarks on the charges being made lead me to think things have improved in that particular field.

Mr. Knowles: There has been a lot of inflation since then.

Mr. Harris: Yes, I suppose so, and a lot of good things have happened, at least under the Liberal government. But it does seem to me, if I may raise a point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the Leader of the Opposition and others who have spoken on the matter that you ruled out of order are perhaps suggesting something which might be considered by the house with respect to any responsibility we might have in the matter, such as suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert, namely in the role of a Queen's proctor. It is at least a thought to bear in mind for future occasions and I think it could perhaps be debated if one felt so inclined on the estimates of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Knowles: Well done.

Mr. Harris: Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The time allotted for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration at eight o'clock of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

84. Departmental administration, $3,333,583.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock when we started discussing domestic affairs, particularly the type that often lead to action in the other place, I was saying something about causes and I believe I had asked what our cause is at the present time.

In his speech this afternoon I believe the minister outlined the cause fairly well. I had drafted my own speech before I had a chance to hear it, but I can say that we are much in agreement. However, I am going to say what I think our cause is.

Certainly the immediate part of it must be to put an end to communist subversion and aggression, because these things are evil things; unless they are stopped, there can be no peace or freedom left in the world. It is true that the communists in southeastern Asia, as in some other parts of the world, have succeeded in identifying communism with nationalism. They have succeeded in identifying communism, in the minds of inexperienced and unthinking people, even with humanitarianism. But that is in the same class with loving and making a lie. It is only an ostensible coat of good-looking paint applied to a destroyer of human beings and their souls.

Communist subversion and aggression have got to be stopped some time. That is why I feel that Mr. Dulles was right at least in proposing a southeastern Asia defence pact. He has been criticized for the way in which he did that, but I will say this: Perhaps he has made mistakes in some of his methods but at least his general proposal, in my judgment, was sound. In my judgment, also, a declaration now that the free world has called a halt to communist aggression and subversion should be made, and it should be embodied in a southeast Asia defence pact. If such a declaration were made by a united western world, joined by the free Asian countries, I am sure that it would strengthen French hands at Geneva, that it would stop the aggressors just as NATO has deterred aggression in western Europe and that it would give hope and encouragement to millions of people who live constantly in fear of this marching giant, communist aggression.

We sincerely hope that France will give the Indo-Chinese people satisfactory assurances of early independence and also assurances of sympathetic help to build up their economies and to protect themselves after they have won their independence. If that were done concurrently with the announcement of a southeastern Asia defence pact, it would be of inestimable value to the whole free world, in my opinion.

Some will criticize what I am now saying by declaring that it would involve the risk of having to send men into southeastern Asia. But I want to make it abundantly clear that I believe that unless Canada, the United States, Britain, France and other free countries, including India, Ceylon and Pakistan, are willing to send men into southeastern Asia and also adequate material with which to back them up, in my judgment there is grave danger that the whole of southeastern Asia will fall before communist aggression. I am further convinced that if a southeastern Asia defence pact is announced at an early date, and men and materials are made ready to halt communist aggression and further subversion on their part, there will be little or no need for any substantial loss of life or property in anything that might occur. In fact, I am satisfied that it would be an effective deterrent to all-out aggression.

What is going on in southeastern Asia today was encouraged, in my judgment, by what happened in Korea. Through United Nations failure to take decisive action in Korea, the communist aggressors have been invited to continue their encroachments and their subversions, step by step, from country to country. They knew that United Nations policy in Korea was one of limited war. They knew that the United Nations were determined that action should be confined strictly to the country in which the aggression had taken place. They learned very quickly that the United Nations Organization was too timid to strike at their accumulation of supplies and troops if those accumulations were kept just across or beyond the borders of the country where the aggression took place. As a consequence, month by month they have grown bolder and more determined to continue their aggression. I therefore say that what happened in Korea was an invitation to the communists to do whatever they pleased in any country that could be supplied from China and Russia. As a consequence, communist aggressors are advancing from post to post, using unlimited help from China and Russia. I suppose that most of us are asking ourselves this question: Where is it all going to end? Are the free nations going to let it go on, and lose to the aggressor post after post and, with those posts, prestige and morale? What is next on the communist timetable? Is it Burma, Malaya, all of Asia? Then, fortified and strengthened with the sources of great strategic materials and unlimited men, will they then go after Europe in an all-out fashion?

It must be remembered that the communist countries are getting stronger through their aggression. That means that the remaining free world, taking it as a whole, must be getting weaker. I am convinced that Russia and China will not chance a full-scale war as long as they are growing stronger and we are growing steadily weaker. Why should they do so? I think we have come to the point where we should either get out of the countries of southeastern Asia and let the communists have them or we should put in enough strength to prevent further advances, while at the same time providing for the peoples there satisfactory assurances that their desires with respect to independence and security will be satisfied to the very best of our ability to satisfy them. I do not think it will be necessary to have an all-out war. But I think that the people of the western world and our Asian commonwealth brethren must come to realize that there is a great and pressing cause for which they must be prepared to fight if necessary, and to make secure by whatever sacrifies are necessary.

I should like to close on this note, Mr. Chairman. I want to commend the minister for his speech this afternoon. Judging by that part of it which I heard, I thought it was a good speech. I want to commend the minister for his timely and able defence at Geneva of the United States. We do not always see eye to eye with our neighbours to the south. We have had our differences. However, we have common cause with the United States. We know that, although she sometimes makes mistakes—and we must realize that we also make them—her aims and objectives are righteous. We must do everything we can to achieve unity with her and with the other nations of the western world who prize peace, security and the freedom of the peoples of all the world.

When it comes time, Mr. Chairman, I have some questions which I believe should be answered. After having given other hon. members the opportunity to make whatever contribution they wish to this debate, I should then like to have the chance to ask the minister some questions about things that have happened at Geneva.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. McIvor: I have a question to ask the minister which he may answer when he speaks. But before I ask the question I should like to say that I am proud of the minister and the way he has conducted himself, both socially and as a statesman, while away from home. As a statesman he has been a credit to Canada. I have tried to read everything I could get hold of about his actions, and everything I have read has indicated to me that he has been a first-rate representative of Canada. As the hon. member who has just sat down said, I was mighty proud that the minister was able to stand up for the United States. They may not always be right and they are not all saints but they are our neighbours. I am glad to see the minister stand up and support them when they are right.

The minister has a terrific responsibility and it is your duty and mine to help him in the best way we can. I appreciate the fact that speakers on the opposition side all appear to be fighting for the same thing. I think that is a fine thing. I was proud to hear the minister say that aggression cannot be allowed, and I think there was a little hint of the golden rule in his closing remarks. If you get too far away from that you get into difficulties. It is an oft-quoted phrase that when truth is on the scaffold and wrong upon the throne God behind the scenes keeps watch above his own. The truth upon the scaffold will win. I know how the minister thinks and his thoughts are expressed in his actions. When we have such a man representing us at the United Nations or anywhere else we can feel secure.

There is one man over yonder for whom I have great admiration, Syngman Rhee, and I want to ask a question. Hon. members may not agree with me but I think Syngman Rhee has been one of the outstanding men in the fight against communism. However, there are a lot of things I do not know about him and that is why I want to ask my question. I wonder whether the minister knows of any co-operation between him and Chiang Kai-shek and whether there is any possibility of attack on China from that quarter.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I would be very interested in hearing the minister's candid answer to that last question. If he answered it as candidly as perhaps he might I wonder whether the hon. member who has just taken his seat would still be imbued with as much pride in the minister as he had when he started. This might be one of those diplomatic times when perhaps an answer should not be given. I thought that the most important part of the minister's speech this afternoon was that in which he outlined four points of possible settlement of the future of east Asia. As he uttered the words I found myself tentatively in some agreement with him, but I should like to reserve my decision until I read the actual text. However, I would like to know whether what the minister said is an expression of policy on the part of the government or merely his own personal view at the moment.

But there was another sentence he uttered to which I found myself in strong opposition. I hope that I can quote it fairly and not too much out of context. The minister said that we have got to be clear on what we are trying to prevent. I think we have been abundantly clear through the years on what we have been trying to prevent, and because we have been trying to prevent something we have been pursuing a negative policy which in Asia is landing us in disaster. What we ought to be clear about is what we are trying to do, and what we are trying to do should be something vastly more constructive, vastly more positive, vastly more dynamic than what we are trying to prevent.

After all, what do the people of Asia want? They want freedom from the west. They want to be free nationally. They want to be their own masters so that they can create the social reforms which are so obviously needed in Asia, and if we are clear on what we are trying to do we should be supporting them and helping them in these aims and objectives. But all that we have been clear about is what we are trying to prevent. What we have been trying to prevent is communist expansion, and because we are trying to prevent it we have fought the communists on communism's own ground to our own detriment instead of fighting them on our ground, which is something positive and dynamic. If we can persuade the people of Asia that there is something worth while in our ethos and we support them by practical action then we are going to win Asia and the communists never can.

The minister also said that communist imperialism has been too successful in Asia. Of course it has been successful, and because of our own negative policies. He said too that we have got to accept the fact that the communists are working for control of southeast Asia and to some extent maintaining and achieving it, but if that is so I know of no greater indictment of western diplomacy. The western world has failed abysmally over the last few years to appreciate what was happening in Asia, and there is not one nation which is exempt from blame.

What we have refused to realize is that changes were taking place. Changes were taking place in front of our eyes but we blinded ourselves to them. After every war the status quo must change. In some places it may be destroyed thoroughly, in some others distorted, but there is going to be change and it is the better part of wisdom to face that fact. I have said in the past in the house that the power of ideas is an infinitely greater power than the power of bullets. The truth of that is seen most graphically today in Asia because there are ideas at work there. They are ideas which came from the west. They are ideas which are fermenting in the minds and brains of people and the greatest idea of all is the ideal of freedom.

Certainly the most important thing that was said during the war from the point of view of affecting the status quo was said by President Roosevelt. He gave rebirth to an idea, an idea as old as man himself, the idea that men should be free. He gave rebirth to that idea in the four freedoms. The people of the world heard him, the people of the world believed him and the world has changed but we are afraid of the change which has taken place. Colonial peoples are going to be free. We may think we can stop them, we may think we can slow them down, but they will be free and there is the end to it. The sooner we realize they are going to be free and support their aspirations the sooner shall we make friends of them.

The question is of course how far are we prepared to go in co-operation with these people to achieve the freedom which they desire and which we ourselves possess. There are those who fear revolution, but we ourselves, we in this parliament, are creatures of revolution. Whether our forefathers came from the United Kingdom, France or any other nation, we are still creatures of revolution. Perhaps there are some who prefer to forget it. Perhaps there are some who have forgotten it. But still it is a fact that our freedom today stems from the overthrow of a tyrannical monarchy and .governments which rejected democratic concepts. We are free because our ancestors fought and slew those who would have denied them freedom.

The same is true of the United States. The people of that country are also the children of revolution. Today they have as their founding father George Washington. He is the founding father of the United States because he led a successful revolution. Had he failed he would have been hanged by the neck as a traitor. Obviously, success is the difference between immortality and infamy. Now, men in other parts of the world are imbued with the same hope and wish for freedom that we have. Are we going to deny them, dare we deny them it? That is another of the questions which we have got to answer.

It could be argued, of course, that the colonial peoples are not yet ready for self-government. It may be true, yet I doubt if our ancestors were ready for self-government and freedom when they obtained them. After all we do learn to govern ourselves by governing. We learn to do by doing. If we want to learn to swim, we do not learn by placing ourselves over a kitchen chair and wildly flailing our arms and legs in the air. We learn by going into the water. If we want to learn how to govern, we learn by governing, and no other way.

There is no argument in morality why people should not have the right to do that. Yet, there are those even in this country who for their own purposes, probably quite honestly, do not want to see these colonial peoples given their freedom. They do not want that because they see Asia as a fighting ground between communists and anti-communists, and nothing else. That sort of oversimplification does our cause no good, because although we might believe it the people of Asia do not; the people of Asia know much better.

In this morning's Montreal Gazette there was an editorial entitled, "Britain makes a Hard Decision". It is a really extraordinary statement, and I am going to quote two sentences from it. The first is:

> The prospect of entering into a military pact which would primarily help the French cause in Indo-China and thus make possible a full scale-war with China, is not a pleasant one for Britons to face.

How kind of the Gazette editor to realize this. How magnanimous of him to realize that war with China would not be a pleasant thing for Britons to face. Why would it not be pleasant? Because the British people know full well if there is a war with China the chances are there will be a war with Russia. The British suspect also that perhaps in certain quarters they are considered to be expendable; that they will provide the advance airfields for other people to use. If there is going to be a war on that scale, then the United Kingdom and the rest of Europe is going to be destroyed. The people in Europe are not prepared yet for that sort of nonsense, no matter what the editor of the Gazette may desire.

There are other aspects to the matter. There is the political one which I am sure will appeal to all of us in this house, because I am quite certain any British government that decides to support the French cause and take the risk of war with China is going to find itself out of power within a matter of hours. The British people are opposed to such a policy, as I suspect most other people in Europe are. After all, what is this French cause? Rightly or wrongly, in the minds of Asians it is the cause of colonialism. In our minds, the issue might not be so clearly cut, but in Asia that is what it means. There are those who talk, as I think the leader of the Social Credit party hinted, of localized wars, regional wars. They are taking a most fantastic risk. It is possible that war can be localized, but the chances of a conflagration are far too great to assume that risk.

There is another aspect to the British situation. If they were to get into this war in Indo-China, if they were to enter into a war with China, obviously it would mean the end of the commonwealth of nations as we know it now. Of this much I am certain. Great as is his gift of irony, I cannot see Sir Winston Churchill presiding over this final irony. It is for that reason I feel the British government will not accept the invitation of the editor of the Gazette. But there is another sentence in this editorial that is a really brutal distortion of history. It says:

> It is the same kind of decision that had to be made in 1939.

I say that is a brutal distortion of history. Fortunately, we have not yet arrived at 1984, but we can see with great clarity what could happen in 1984 if men like this were running the country. After all, what was the situation in 1939? We had seen Austria engulfed, but Austria did not lose her identity because the people of Austria rose up against their own government. The Austrian people were taken over and others were content to forget it because they felt there was some sort of kinship between Austrians and Germans. After all, did they not speak the same language? Then, there was the Sudeten. The people there did not rise against their oppressors in Prague. The Sudeten people were "rescued" by an aggressive enemy power that came in and within six months went further to take Prague and all Czechoslovakia. Only a few months later, in September, 1939, the Polish people did not rise against their own government, but the German armies marched in in the most aggressive sense of the word. Where then, is there a comparison between 1939 and 1954? It is only in the superheated brain of the man who wrote these words.

I say that is an editorial which is deliberately mischievous. I only hope it is not read by people outside Canada who might believe for a moment that this is going to be Canadian policy. I am convinced that the people of Canada are not ready to go to war to rescue a colonial power from the follies it has committed; I think the people of Canada are right. Yet, there is not one of us who has not got a feeling of friendship and kinship, and today anxiety for France. We are close to that country. We wish to be close to what is after all the cultural leader of Europe. We have for France the greatest of admiration and friendship, but we are doing France no service and we are doing our own people a disservice if we refrain from saying these things which are honestly upon our minds. For once it appears that the logic of the French has misled them.

We know, and we do admire, the gallantry of those who fought at Dien Bien Phu. Yet need Dien Bien Phu have occurred at all had there been greater wisdom in French policy? And another question is on my mind. Is French concern in Indo-China completely divorced from concern for other areas much nearer continental France? Is that not one of the nubs of this whole situation? If France gets out of Indo-China, what then happens to Tunisia and Morocco? That is a situation which France must face, and face up to very shortly because the people in those areas also want their independence. They also want their freedom. They also want the right to say "we are going to govern ourselves," and France still refuses.

It is conceivable that there are people in this country, and even in the government, who see an advantage in France hanging on to these territories. After all, so long as France has Morocco and Tunisia—well, we will have air bases to use in the event of war. But if the people of these territories have decided that they are going to be free, we shall have no air bases; and, even although we subjugate them, we shall not be free to use those bases.

If we think only in terms of bases in north Africa, surely the obvious thing to do is to make friends of these people. The way for France to make friends with them is to say to them, "In a certain number of years we will give you your freedom and your independence, and during those years we would like to help you. We would like to train your civil service. We would like to train an administration so that it can take over." And then France can leave, with credit and glory; and France can leave friends behind her.

As it is, if France's policy is the same policy she pursued in Indo-China she will leave enemies behind her—and not only for France, but also for the western world. And the Arab bloc will have gained fresh allies.

But there are other aspects of the situation I would like to deal with. This afternoon my leader gave briefly some of the history of Indo-China. I want to bring the matter up to date, and particularly do I wish to refer to an idea given out this afternoon by the hon. member for Prince Albert. There is in many areas a desire to have a pact to restrain Mr. Dulles—I beg your pardon, I mean communist aggression in Asia. And apparently the hon. member for Prince Albert would like to see some sort of Asian counterpart of NATO—a southeast Asian treaty organization. He told us, of course, that it would not operate without Asian nations in it.

Obviously. But what Asian nations did he have in mind? That is a fair question to put to the hon. member. After all, it is quite possible that the Asian nations he has in mind might refer to Formosa—or it could be the Philippines, or it could be South Korea or all of them. These are Asian nations. But I do not think these are the Asian nations the hon. member for Prince Albert had in mind. Perhaps he had in mind India, and other countries of the Colombo group; at least I hope so.

But I submit this to him, that if we are going to wait for the Colombo nations to come into such a pact, we are going to wait long, long years, beyond the span of life of any member in this House of Commons. India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Indonesia, Burma—none of these will have anything to do with such a pact, and for a very good reason. The leader of the Social Credit party said we had to persuade these people to act with us in our great and pressing cause. They are not remotely interested in our great and pressing cause. For all that the people in Asia can see are great and powerful and wealthy nations—wealthy beyond avarice, nations which have something to defend, something to hang on to, something to protect.

But what does Asia have to defend? What do the Asians have to protect? They have a mortality rate whereby the expectancy of life is 27. They have poverty, illiteracy and disease. Is Asia going to fight for these things? No, Asia will fight only for a new social order; and that is the first and the most important thing in the world to Asians today. So why should they see our desire to protect our world as a great and pressing cause? The whole idea is absurd! Asia is going to improve the conditions of its own people before it considers protecting what we have, and what we have been so loath to give up in the past—no matter how noble our protestations have been.

Certainly, we have to fight against communism. But we are fighting for our goods and chattels. They too are fighting for something—for the right to live. And until they have achieved that right to live on the same basis that we have it they are not going to be interested in our power pacts in south-east Asia, or anywhere else. Asia will join us only when their circumstances are infinitely better than they are today; Asia will join us when they feel that they can trust us.

But the hon. member for Prince Albert also said that if the Geneva conference is unsuccessful Canada should join a pact in Asia to ensure peace. Well, what sort of a pact would this be? With whom would it be? I am quite sure that New Zealand and Australia would be more than chary about joining such a pact. As I said earlier, if the United States wants the Philippines and South Korea, it is welcome to them; but as an alliance it is not one which will strike terror to anybody's heart.

What would be the purpose of a treaty such as that? I think we should examine it as fairly and objectively as we can. Would its intention be to issue a stern warning? And if the situation got worse would its intention be to issue a graver warning? Well, we have had warnings issued ad nauseam almost every day recently. But would such a treaty have as its purpose direct intervention, the use of force, against Asian nations? I hope not, because then that would mean the scuttling of the United Nations.

But, if it does, what sort of intervention is needed in Indo-China today? General Leclerc of the French army has given his figure as 500,000 men. Is North America prepared to put anything like that number of men into Indo-China to try to win it back from the communists? Certainly not. And yet to recover Indo-China intervention on the most massive scale is the only thing which could be undertaken and immediately there would be retaliation which would mean intervention on a massive scale from the other side.

I agree that we and our allies should be constantly examining what is happening in Asia. But, as I said earlier, any Asian treaty is worse than hopeless without the Colombo nations in it. And while I cannot say that this is a matter of party policy, I state as strongly as I can that I would oppose such a treaty without these Asian nations in it.

I wish to ask the hon. member for Prince Albert a question, or if the leader of the Conservative party speaks tonight I would ask him if the Conservative party is prepared to enter into such an Asian pact against the express objections of the Colombo nations. And I would appreciate an answer to that question.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

By all means let there be consultation; by all means let there be discussion. We know that there may be an answer to be found; but I doubt if we can go much farther than that. And now, let me say this. The western world today is frustrated, and the western world is nervous. It is frustrated because there is no clear leadership, because by the dominant partner in the western alliance there are day to day changes in policy, and statements of leaders, and statements of pseudo-leaders, and statements of would-be leaders which leave us completely confused, and not knowing what the situation really is. There is nervousness in the west because of this conflict in policy, and because we do not know what is going on.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar read an editorial from the Economist which suggested that America's allies had more to fear as a result of American statements than had America's enemies. And that reminded me of what the Duke of Wellington said when he had a shipload of new recruits given to him during the Spanish war. He said, "Well, I don't know what effect they will have on the enemy but, by God, they terrify me". And there are times when I am in the same position with regard to American policies.

I have no idea what influence American statements will have on any potential enemy but I certainly feel nervous and confused. But of this I am completely certain, if the United States is determined to take military action in Indo-China to bolster up colonialism, then it goes it alone. The people of Canada will not accept such a policy.

The United States has told us about "massive retaliation" which ended in a monsoon in Indo-China. It has told us about its agonizing reappraisal, and perhaps, Mr. Chairman, that reappraisal has taken place. If it has, it may be a most significant one. That reappraisal has given United States two alternatives. She has to decide who are her allies. Are her allies in the world to be Chiang Kai-shek, Syngman Rhee, Bao Dai, or are her allies to be Canada, the United Kingdom and the rest of the free countries of the west? That surely should not be an agonizing reappraisal; but the Americans have to make up their minds which way they are going. I do not suggest for a moment that there is here a hopeless split; there is here no parting of the ways. I can only hope and I think that wise counsel will prevail over the interventionists; that cool minds will be listened to in preference to hot heads.

It is so difficult to see the situation clearly just now. There seems to be a lull, a quietness; but is it the lull before the storm, or is it the deathly sort of quietness which one gets within the very heart and centre of the storm, or have we ridden it out and are we now sailing into smoother waters? I do not know. The next few weeks are going to tell and I can only hope that the commonsense of the American people will show them the peril of certain ways which conceivably they might travel.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, with a great deal that has been said in the committee today I think there will be general agreement. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has placed before us the broad problems confronting the conference at Geneva in a manner which I think will be regarded as a fair appraisal of the situation as it exists today.

I was very happy to hear the tribute he paid to Mr. Anthony Eden and the remark that he made that his patience and judgment did play such an important role in keeping alive the hopes of those who are still meeting at Geneva. It seemed to me that in summing up the situation the Secretary of State for External Affairs did lay down a proposition that unquestionably carries this government farther into acceptance of responsibility than it has yet gone at any time before. The exact words he used were: "We cannot accept the principle of collective security in one part of the world and reject it in another." If one will examine these words and their implication he will see that it is a statement of immense importance to hon. members, to the parliament of Canada and to the people of Canada generally.

Shortly after he had made that statement he made a statement that I think will find general acceptance, as well as some of the comments he made about the situation in Geneva. He said that no nation can be saved from communism unless it wants to be. That I think is a statement that cannot be challenged. However, I think we can go a great deal farther than that, because I do not know any nation yet that has wanted communism. That is something we should remember. Less than 2 per cent of the people of Russia were communists at the time of the Russian revolution. I doubt whether there has been a single country in the world where communism has taken power that 10 per cent of the people have been communists. There has been no single case where communism has come to power as an expression of the will of the people. There is no communist government in the world which can be regarded as the government the people of that country want.

While not in any way challenging the statement that no nation can be saved from communism unless it wants to be, I should like to emphasize the fact that many nations which have not wanted to be communist have become communist by force, by a threat of force and by treachery. The latter weapon is the weapon most employed by communists the world over. Undoubtedly the problem of those who are seeking to stem the tide of communism is very much greater in those countries where an understanding of the danger of communism is not already in their minds. We can see the difference in some of the countries of Asia and what happened in Malaya. It was not alone the stern discipline which was exercised by that very gallant soldier, General Templer, which dealt so effectively with communism in Malaya. There also was the fact that the people of Malaya did not want communism, had some idea of the danger and were ready to be rallied by those who sought to lead them against that evil force.

I must say, however, there is one other thought we should perhaps keep in mind. We have heard a great deal about the fact that under no circumstances must we do anything to preserve colonialism. Undoubtedly the world is moving forward. Undoubtedly great strides have been taken away from the kind of dependence that we describe as colonialism. I think, however, it would be wise for those who talk so loosely in those terms to ask themselves one question. Are they prepared to insist upon an immediate end, without any period of transition, of the colonialism under western powers, and by doing so create a vacuum into which the Soviet empire will immediately move?

Mr. Nicholson: It did not happen in India.

Mr. Drew: I just heard the interjection "They have in India".

Mr. Nicholson: It did not happen in India.

Mr. Drew: Well, then, I hear it better now: "It did not happen in India." Of course it did not happen in India because the situation was in no way parallel. What happened in India was a long process of the history of this commonwealth, and there is no single incident which offers more hope to those today than the transition by which step by step India advanced to full nationhood by the voluntary action of the government of Great Britain.

Mr. Nicholson: It took a Labour government to bring it about.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, we are talking about those nations which as yet have not had the opportunity to establish a form of government under which any organized resistance of their own could become a reality. Those of us who believe in the steady movement toward freedom of nations should also bear in mind that under any impractical abandonment of such measure of organized direction as now exists, without something else being put in its place, we may well open the door to the vilest form of slavery this world has known.

An hon. Member: You said that before.

Mr. Drew: Yes, I have said that before, and may I say to my hon. friend of the C.C.F. party who just interjected, that I shall say it again on many occasions, because of all the vile forms of slavery this world has known I do not think there is anything to compare with the Godless communism which has been imposed by force upon nearly 800 million people in this world in comparatively recent years.

As I conceive it, and as I conceive the hope of those who have been discussing the problems of Asia, it is a hope that through the assistance of the democratic powers, and through the combined strength of those democratic powers, an opportunity may be offered to the countries of Asia, as to the countries of the rest of the world, to enjoy at some time, and as soon as may be possible in Divine Wisdom, that kind of freedom which has been our privilege in Canada and in every country that enjoys the same parliamentary system.

Why should any of us be reluctant to talk of collective action to preserve freedom? Was that not the whole concept of the charter of the United Nations signed at San Francisco in the spring of 1945? Every nation that signed that charter pledged itself to a common effort to assure to every nation in the world, strong or weak, the right to determine its own form of government and its own course by its own free choice. As we speak of the necessity for recognizing the right of freedom in Asia and in other parts of the world, the right which all of us certainly accept, let us never at any time talk of that right of freedom without remembering those nations now behind the iron curtain which also have the right of freedom at some time and under some plan which may become possible by the very terms of the charter of the United Nations which we all signed.

Do not let anyone suggest that Poland, the Ukraine, Roumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, or any other country, including China, now under a communist government received that form of government except by the power, or threat of power, exercised by Moscow.

No one is suggesting that any sudden change in this tragic scene of slavery can take place, but never at any time should we forget that if our signatures and the signatures of all the free nations to the charter of the United Nations means anything at all, it means that we accepted the proposition that every nation had the right to choose its own course.

While some of these other nations are being discussed, and while Russia, China, and the other satellites are making their proposals, I think that the free nations should be making the proposal that under the supervision of the United Nations a vote be taken in those countries now under Russian dominance to see what kind of government they want. Before this satellite government in China tells us what should be done in any part of the world, before we accept advice from Russia at any time, surely it is our right and our duty to go back to that charter, signed in the spring of 1945, and point out the obligation that exists under that charter for such an opportunity to express their own opinion by the nations which now have communist governments enforced upon them.

This is not an original idea. This is not a new concept. This thought was carried forward from the days after the first world war. After that struggle votes were taken under the auspices of the league of nations and the result of those votes was interpreted in the subsequent recognition of the wish of the people as expressed by the ballot.

I leave that subject there, but while we talk so much about assuring freedom in many distant lands, and no one disagrees with the reminder of the need for that freedom, let us also keep in mind those ancient lands with centuries upon centuries of culture and civilization behind them which want freedom from communism as much as any people in the world. I would hope that the day will not be long distant when those proposals will be put before gatherings attended by Russia, by the satellite nations, and by those other nations which are so generous with their advice to us.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, in speaking of those different world-wide associations which have emerged under the United Nations or in association with it, spoke of the commonwealth association. He said that it has played and can play a very valuable role. He expressed regret that India and other Asian members of the commonwealth had not been included in the conference. I think all of us will share that regret, and I think all of us would welcome the day with enthusiasm, and with great hope, when India and Pakistan, Ceylon and other territories in Asia associated with us in this great partnership, join in these deliberations.

However, they are members of the United Nations, and in that organization the opportunity presents itself to exchange opinions with them and to bring them closer and closer in harmony with our own thoughts on world affairs.

I wish to direct the remainder of my remarks to that commonwealth association. Much has been said about the United Nations and about the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We know the steps that are being taken to bring to reality the European defence community. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has spoken of the possibility of a new organization in Asia with powers and scope similar to those of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Each one of these efforts is in itself a forward step in those collective efforts which have done so much to bring closer together, in common action, the nations which desire peace and which, while desiring peace, also desire freedom for themselves and others.

As I listened to some of the comments about statements made in the United States, I could not help noticing how critical some people in this chamber are ready to be about statements made in the United States, and yet how little I have heard by way of criticism from the same source about things that are being said by Russia and by China at this time. Does any hon. member in this chamber suggest for one moment that the position of the United States and that of Russia are comparable in this world picture with which we are confronted today? There is not one thoughtful member of this committee who would even for a moment tolerate such a suggestion. We know the people of the United States too well—there are too many blood ties as well as an understanding of the broadest kind—for us to believe at any time that, with whatever power they might possess, the United States have any hope but that of peace.

It would be well for us to remember that if the United States ceases to be the central core of our great organization for defence, the main hope of achieving continuing peace in the world today will have disappeared. I do not believe for one moment we shall reach any such time. However, I do not think that anyone contributes to the advancement of the hope of peace by suggesting that anyone in the United States—whether we approve of their particular words or not—has any aspiration other than for the same kind of peace that we want here in Canada.

Some of those who are so free in their criticism of statements made in the United States might well subject their own statements to examination before they suggest that we should be too ready to have our position at any time tested by their words. Not one of these nations is perfect. No single nation in this western fellowship is without its faults, but at least we can say this: The people of the United States, to our knowledge, are just as anxious as we are to have peace. If at any time there is any discussion of the strength of their weapons and of how, in any dreadful circumstances, those weapons might be employed, it is only because we have come to learn that in this world we may be a long time waiting for a second chance if we are unprepared to defend ourselves against the declared aggressive plans of Russia and the satellite governments associated with Moscow.

We have spoken of these wider associations. Each one of them offers its hope. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no single association in the world that offers us greater hope for the years ahead than does the commonwealth of nations, expressing a common loyalty to a similar parliamentary system and the rule of law. This is no mere sentimental expression of an ancient fellowship. Either this commonwealth is a reality or it is not. Either we believe in this commonwealth or we have abandoned our faith in an organization that has done more for the advancement of society in this world than has any other group of people in the long history of the human race.

We are inclined to boast about the thin and intangible ties that hold this commonwealth together. I suggest that we should not let those ties become too thin and too intangible. We are also inclined to speak about the fact that this relationship is undefinable. I think it would be well that we define it, not in rigid terms but in terms that we can understand. Whatever other definition there may be, I think we at least can say that this commonwealth represents the greatest experiment in international friendship that has yet been worked out by the genius of man. We have been advised that it is well to keep friendships in repair. I think it is wise to keep this particular form of international friendship in good repair at all times.

I thought that a former prime minister of New Zealand answered the questions that sometimes seem to creep into some people's minds, as well as it could be done. There are those who seem to feel that a definite acceptance of a real association within the commonwealth in some way suggests a limitation of our field of sovereign independence as a nation. To that suggestion Peter Fraser, while he was prime minister of New Zealand, used these memorable words:

> Membership of the commonwealth is not independence with something taken away: it is independence with something added.

I do not believe the thought could be better expressed. As a completely sovereign nation, in no way subordinate in any manner to any other nation, nevertheless within this fellowship, by the very association we establish, we add something to the strength of our own freedom by this fellowship of people who respect the same institutions, the same traditions and the same concept of the right of the individual under well-stated and well-defined laws.

There are of course those who seem to think that in these wider associations, such as the United Nations, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and other organizations of that kind, we have in effect thrown off something of this older fellowship We speak of it as though it was some mysterious entity that has no more substance than a Cheshire cat with nothing but the smile remaining. Let us examine it and see what it really means. Certainly no one who was in the great hall of Westminster almost a year ago now, at the time that more than a thousand representatives of fifty-five nations and other political bodies within the commonwealth met there in the presence of their Queen, will ever forget that memorable scene when in that ancient hall that enormous group of nations expressed their loyalty to the Queen and at the same time heard from that Queen her declaration of service to her people.

Fifty-five nations with one concept of freedom, fifty-five nations expressing common ideals, and then only a few days later in the coronation service the heads of those states walked into the abbey and saw the young Queen dedicate herself in that solemn service to the great cause of which we are all a part. Was that only pageantry? Was that merely something that attracted a great crowd to London a year ago or was that something real and lasting, something of great meaning to us and to the rest of mankind? I prefer to believe that this was the beginning of a new hope which may be fulfilled if we recognize all the opportunities presented by what was symbolized on that occasion. I say "hope" advisedly because we should not yet assume that we have achieved the things for which so many of us have been hoping and dreaming for so many years.

We are inclined to speak of the second Elizabethan era as though the mere fact that her name is Elizabeth would of necessity give to our Queen the same role in revivifying and revitalizing this great fellowship as fell to the lot of an earlier Elizabeth. I think it would be well for us to remember that when the first Elizabeth came to the throne it was in a time of poverty, of diminishing resources and of an economic blockade which threatened even starvation itself in the British Isles. It was not the mere arrival on the throne of a young queen that changed all that. It was the spirit of a people dedicated to a great cause.

The reason that from its early plight Britain assumed a new role and laid the foundations for this commonwealth within the reign of that first Elizabeth was that men and women of vision, boldness and daring were prepared to make decisions which resulted in the wider concept of freedom that has come down to us at this time. We will only know the full freedom of a second Elizabethan era if we are prepared to make bold decisions today and, with the same vision, the same broad prospects for the future, are prepared to go forward together with the possibilities of our own prosperity clearly before our eyes and at the same time the knowledge of what that can mean to all the rest of the world.

This is no simple task that we are called upon to undertake if in fact we do undertake it in the way we should. What a challenge it is to the spirit of every one of us. Just let us visualize the broad picture of what this means. We have heard of the millions in Asia. We have spoken of the hundreds of millions brought under communist domination. I think it is well for us to remember that in this commonwealth today, in this commonwealth represented by those who were in London a year ago, there are at this time 620 million people. That in itself gives some idea of the immense and almost limitless possibilities that are before us if we keep this partnership as a real adventure in friendship between nations with common traditions and common understanding of their past.

Let us look at the numbers embraced in that figure. India has 367 million people, Pakistan 80 million, the United Kingdom 51 million, Canada 15 million, the Union of South Africa 13,153,000, Australia 8,829,000, Ceylon 7,941,000, New Zealand 2,047,000, and in the other territories within this great fellowship there are 75 million people.

I do not think anyone will challenge the statement made earlier that in this great task before us nothing can be more important in the hope of stability in Asia than that we should gain the confidence and support of the government and people of India. When the Prime Minister left on his tour some time ago I expressed the warm support of the members of this party, as did members of the other parties on this side of the house, for the purpose and concept of that trip. I believe that the Prime Minister performed a great service in India in expressing the friendship of Canada to that great nation associated with us in its new status, and I also believe that he accepted, in a manner that may have very far-reaching consequences, the opportunity to indicate our confidence in the people of the United States. Expressions such as he has placed before the government and people of India at that time can greatly help in broadening the basis of this wide understanding that we have.

Throughout the years, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have all emerged as fully sovereign states. This evolution has at no time demanded the force of arms to attain the status we now hold. In the same steady process of evolution, India, Pakistan and Ceylon have now emerged with similar sovereign status, under the guidance of Westminster, with the blessing of Westminster and with assistance in drafting their constitutions and other details of that kind from those who have for so long been in the civil service at a time when the status of those nations was entirely different.

If there has seemed to be caution and delay on the part of the government of Great Britain about the steps it has been taking, we certainly must remember that never at any time is there absent from their mind the thought that has been expressed here today, that as we merge into the future it is of vital importance if it is within the realm of wisdom and human judgment to bring along that same body of Asiatic nations that have carried into Asia our parliamentary system and our concept of individual freedom. Every great human venture, Mr. Chairman, demands a conviction on the part of those who seek to make it a reality. It is not only in the spiritual field, but in the temporal field as well that there is at all times a deep longing in every human to be able to say with conviction, I believe.

In the temporal field in this great experiment in human advancement it is important that we be able to say with deep conviction: I believe in the advantages of this association; I believe in the future of the commonwealth for our own benefit and for the benefit of free people everywhere. This is not something in which we alone have a deep concern. Let us be quite certain that if by neglect this commonwealth of ours should fall asunder, then we would be talking in terms of meaningless hope if we declared our expectations that other nations could retain throughout the years ahead any effective association of some other kind. If these nations with their common concept of freedom, if these nations with their common traditions are unable to work together, then what hope can there be for an effective association of nations with no such common background behind them?

I would hope that as this loosely associated partnership of nations moves forward into the future—speaking not of five years ahead but of 50, 100 and 200 years ahead—we will also bear in mind that if our course is wise and if we do demonstrate the great advantage of this system, then we have every reason to expect there may be new additions to this fellowship. It is not long ago since Burma became a separate republic outside of the commonwealth. Still I say that in the years not too far distant, by the example we may set, Burma might seek re-entry into that commonwealth. Is it utterly beyond possibility that the example of effective co-operation of so many races, creeds, tongues and nationalities, might offer such an example that nations not at any time in the past associated with this fellowship might seek association in this historic partnership?

I would hope that it is not impossible that at some time in the future, because of the example given through this great association, southern Ireland or Eire, call it what you will, might re-enter this partnership with which it was once associated. Most certainly on our part, as I am sure on the part of every other section of the commonwealth, that re-entry would be welcomed with great warmth and enthusiasm. Then let us think of this great partnership in practical terms. We speak of stability in Asia. Where could we have greater hope of stability in Asia than in a powerful India, associated with us, associated with Pakistan, with Ceylon, with Australia, New Zealand and the other nations in that part of the world.

There are many of us here who have reason to know the great fighting qualities of Indian soldiers. There are men in this house tonight who have seen Indian troops in action, and who will never forget those magnificent men and the bravery they displayed. I am not mentioning that in warlike terms by any manner of means. Unfortunately, in this world in which we live we are called upon to think in terms of strength which will provide the opportunity for peace and freedom. As India gains increasing national strength, as India gains increasing prosperity with our help and with the help of other nations in the western world, we may hope that Indian strength will be the great bulwark of democracy in Asia; that Pakistan and Ceylon, side by side, will stand for that kind of freedom, and that all those differences which today have emerged will be forgotten as other differences have been forgotten in the past.

Mr. Chairman, I have mentioned these things because I believe that this is a time for a great affirmation of faith in the future of the commonwealth on the part of those of us here in this house and in Canada, and throughout the commonwealth generally—a great affirmation of faith in a basic organization which itself can give strength to the efforts of the United States, to the United Nations, and to all those other organizations with which we are associated.

We all remember the ancient injunction: For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who then shall prepare himself to the battle? Let us leave no uncertainty about our convictions in this respect. And let us plan with the broad vision of our own advancing prosperity, with all the human and material resources we possess within this commonwealth; and at the same time let us think of what that will mean to other nations as well. But, above all, let any plans of that kind be great and embracing plans. Small, limited plans have nothing in them to stir the heart and soul of red-blooded men and women. Let us place before our people, with greater opportunities than were ever known in those earlier days, confident statements of our own faith and hope, such as stirred the spirit of the people in that first Elizabethan age.

And as I close these remarks, may I recall the words spoken by our Queen when she herself defined so simply the change that has taken place in this great fellowship, this loosely defined fellowship of sovereign nations of which we form a part. These were her words:

> The commonwealth bears no resemblance to the empire of the past. It is an entirely new conception—built on the highest qualities of the spirit of man: friendship, loyalty, and the desire of freedom and peace. To that new conception of an equal partnership of nations and races I shall give myself heart and soul every day of my life.

As we think of all that young Queen has done to fulfil that pledge within recent months, is it too much to suggest that each one of us will pledge himself to build on the highest qualities of the spirit of man: friendship, loyalty and the desire of freedom and peace; and that we, too, shall give ourselves, heart and soul, to that high ideal every day of our lives.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry? Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs wish to speak at this time?

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, before this item carries it probably would be expected of me that I should deal with one or two of the points that have been raised in the general discussion following the statement I made this afternoon.

I should like first of all to refer to an observation made by the hon. member for Prince Albert, and repeated a few moments ago by the Leader of the Opposition, that in my statement this afternoon—and I quote from the words of the hon. member for Prince Albert—I went further in the commitment of Canada in its world responsibilities than this government had ever gone before.

At the time I heard those words I was somewhat at a loss to find that interpretation in anything I had said. But the Leader of the Opposition made the matter clearer for me when he related the statement of my hon. friend to the sentence I had used earlier as follows: "We cannot accept"—and I did use these words—"the principle of collective security in one part of the world, and reject it in another".

Well, Mr. Chairman, I would not like it to be thought that in using those words I have added any commitment of any kind to anything that this government has previously undertaken. And I do not, myself, see how any such commitment can be read into those words or, indeed, into any other words I used this afternoon. I am talking about specific commitments on the part of this government for action.

What I had in mind in that sentence, of course, was the point that we cannot accept the principle of collective security in relation to the Atlantic area, and then deny its validity in respect of some other part of the world. But, as I see it, that of course is not remotely the same thing as saying that, having accepted specific commitments in NATO, we should accept similar commitments ourselves in respect of other parts of the world.

I think that if this principle works well for us in the Atlantic area, then if it is carried out in the right way on the initiative of the Asian people themselves, and those most directly concerned with the area, it might work well in that other part of the world. But of course that is a very different thing from saying that we as a government, having accepted commitments in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, should accept similar commitments in a southeast Asian treaty organization. And I would not like those words of mine to be interpreted in any other sense.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, in the latter part of my observations I did give utterance to some cautionary observations in regard to the extension of Canada's commitments, her specific commitments, apart from our general commitments in the United Nations, which we recognize as extending to all the world. But I did express cautionary observations with regard to the extension of additional specific commitments to other areas. As I understood him, the hon. member for Prince Albert, however, made an interesting and, indeed, an important statement in regard to his view as to the desirability of the government's accepting additional commitments. He made this statement this afternoon:

—on behalf of the people of Canada he—

That is, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

—should give notice that, in the event of the Geneva conference proving unsuccessful in settling the Indo-China problem Canada would join with other freedom-loving nations in a pact in Asia designed to assure peace to the same degree as peace has been assured in Europe through the instrumentality of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

And later on he came back to that point when he said:

The minister has shown that Canada has responsibilities for peace in all parts of the world, not only in the United Nations; we have to accept them in any Pacific pact that may be achieved, so that the other parts of our commonwealth—Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan and Ceylon —will know that Canada and the commonwealth will stand with the United States and thereby assure the maintenance of a solid wall against the advance of communism everywhere in the world.

Well, all I would say in regard to that, Mr. Chairman—and I was asked by the hon. member to state my view in regard to it—is that this government is not ready to take any such far-reaching additional specific commitment in respect of collective security at this time. But we remain ready to carry out our obligations of collective security under the United Nations charter in any part of the world at any time, along with the other members of the United Nations, and we accept and confirm the specific obligations that we already have under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. As I said earlier this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, we would have to be, in our opinion, very careful, in view of our resources and our other commitments, in the extension of specific commitments beyond those which we have already undertaken. On that very point, Mr. Chairman, the advice which was given to the government in this house on May 20 by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich is very much to the point, when he said—and I quote from Hansard at page 4916:

In closing, I repeat that we on this side of the house appreciate the difficulties confronting the minister—

That is the Minister of National Defence. I continue:

—and his department in these very uncertain times. We urge caution in accepting new commitments; we stress the importance of continued emphasis on the defence of the home front, the North American continent; we urge care in all expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, that, in so far as commitments are concerned, expresses the viewpoint to which I tried to give expression this afternoon. We urge caution in respect of the undertaking of new special commitments in any other area of the world than that of the north Atlantic area, to which we are already committed.

That, Mr. Chairman, as I have already said, is not the same as saying that we cannot accept the principle of collective security in one part of the world and reject it in another. I would be glad to stand by that statement, because if the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is working well in the defence of the Atlantic area against aggression, and if it has worked well as a deterrent against aggression, a southeast Asia security organization, which would include, as pointed out by more than one speaker, the Asian countries themselves and those other countries who have special commitments and special responsibilities for Asian territories, might well contribute, not only to the security but to the progress and indeed to the freedom of that part of the world.

I do not think that there were any other specific questions that were addressed to me this afternoon except possibly by the hon. member for Fort William. If he were in his seat I would like to thank him for the kind words he said about me, and I hope that my reply to his question will not interfere with our friendship because I do not think it is going to be the kind of answer that he might welcome. He asked me whether Mr. Syngman Rhee and Mr. Chiang Kai-shek were in close co-operation, and whether there was any chance of an attack on China from that co-operative source. Well, all I can say to the hon. member is that I know very little about the co-operation between Mr. Syngman Rhee and General Chiang Kai-shek, but I do understand there does exist such co-operation. I express my own view in saying that I hope that the co-operation will not result in an attack by those two governments on the mainland of China. I say that, not because I have any high regard for the government on the mainland of China but because I think that that would be a rash and ill-advised action, even for the sake of overthrowing that government, if that were itself a desirable objective.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North did bring up a lot of interesting points and interesting questions in his speech. He was inclined to be critical about something I said this afternoon, in that I was negative and not positive enough; that while I emphasized that we must be clear, Mr. Chairman, on what we are trying to prevent, I said very little about what we are trying to do. If he will recall the context of those remarks when I talked about the desirability of clarity in respect of what we were trying to prevent, he will see I was thinking about the defence security, military security organizations, and not about the prevention of communism as a doctrine, as a social and economic doctrine. On more than one occasion in this house, and I did mention it in passing this afternoon, I have emphasized that it is far more important for the prevention of communism itself—I am not now referring merely to military aggression—to have a positive policy than merely a negative one. If he took anything from my remarks this afternoon indicating I had departed from that view I assure him that he was mistaken.

That, Mr. Chairman, is all I have to say at this time. No doubt other matters will come up in the consideration of other items of the estimates, and I shall be glad to do my best to deal with those questions as they arise.

Item agreed to.

87. Representation abroad—construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, land, new equipment and furnishings, and to the extent that blocked funds are available for these expenditures to provide for payment from these foreign currencies owned by Canada and provided only for governmental or other limited purposes, $1,945,480.

Mr. Green: This item deals with construction, acquisition and improvement of buildings, works, lands and so on, abroad. There is a recommendation of the standing committee on external affairs which reads as follows:

> Your committee approves of the exploratory negotiations being carried on between the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Public Works concerning the liaison to be established between these departments as to the purchase of properties, the erection and maintenance of buildings occupied by the department.

That was discussed in the committee at the time the minister was abroad. It would be helpful if we could have his comments on the recommendation. As he knows, the present situation is that his own department, which is in no sense a building department, is carrying on most of this work; whereas in our governmental structure we have a Department of Public Works, which is now supposed to be much more efficient than it was before and thoroughly capable of handling all public construction. It does seem to me that this is one case where it could be called in.

We have had examples of tremendous sums of money being used for construction of buildings abroad. We have the situation in Rome where about $186,000 has been spent on a site in one of the most expensive portions of the city, and there are potential plans of the minister's department for the erection of an embassy to house one ambassador and his family costing $325,000, and equipment, furniture and so on for that same embassy to cost $75,000, making a total of about $600,000 for this one embassy.

I believe if the Department of Public Works were called in to do work of this kind the result might be a big saving for the taxpayers of Canada. The embassy in Rome is only one of several which are costing this country a great deal, and just in the last few days we have had a proposal made by one of the minister's representatives abroad, the consul general in New York, that private Canadians subscribe $100,000 apiece to build a Canada House in New York for a total cost of about $10 million, and that the hope is that the government will take that over and there is an assurance that it will not lose money.

There we have a plan which would mean that the Canadian government would be going into the office building business in a foreign country to the extent of $10 million and be subject to all the changes and economic conditions in that area. In the committee of external affairs the acting deputy minister, I think it was, intimated that they knew nothing about such a plan and in any event the government was not committed to it.

But we have suggestions being made and these construction projects always seem to be costing millions of dollars. We have another big building going up in Washington to house the Department of National Defence and defence construction and to accommodate 150 people. That office building is to cost $2 million when it is erected in a swank part of that city.

I would like to have the minister's comments on the policy of his department, particularly with regard to turning these construction jobs over to the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in reply to what the hon. gentleman has just said I would like to assure him and the house that

I welcome the discussions which are going on between the Department of External Affairs and Department of Public Works in regard to this matter, and I hope that as a result of these discussions the Department of Public Works will be able to take from our shoulders a greater share of the responsibility for the construction and maintenance of building projects.

That will depend, of course, on a good many considerations and whether it is desirable to do so in all cases. It may well be desirable and I hope it will be considered by the Department of Public Works to be desirable to do that in cities such as London, Paris, Rome, New York and Washington. It may not be equally desirable or feasible in some of the more remote capitals. Indeed I doubt whether the Department of Public Works would like to take on the responsibility for furnishing and maintaining some of our buildings in some of the Asian countries which are pretty far removed from Ottawa and where they have no knowledge of conditions on the spot.

I would assure the hon. member that we are pursuing these discussions and I would like to express my own hope that the Department of Public Works will be able to take a greater share of responsibility in this matter.

My hon. friend mentioned the building in Rome, but I would point out to him, and I have no doubt it has been pointed out in committee, that the amount of money invested in the property in Rome, which amounted to nearly $200,000 at one time, was earmarked for the construction not only of an embassy residence but also for the building of Canadian offices in Rome. That money was invested in the property a few years ago at a time when it was in our possession in the form of blocked lira and it seemed to us then, and still seems to us, to have been good business that, instead of keeping the money in the bank—we could not convert it into dollars—we should put it in land which is a better hedge against inflation than banks. I think our judgment has been vindicated in that respect because we have had a valuation of that property made recently and we have been assured that its value is now more than twice what it was when we bought it a few years ago.

Mr. Green: Then why not sell it?

Mr. Pearson: We may sell it, but it is good property on which to build and I am not sure whether it would be more economic to sell it and build at some other spot. However, I can assure my hon. friend that in whatever decision we may make in this regard we will have considerations of efficiency and economy in mind.

The hon. member also mentioned the situation in New York which is not, I think, exactly as he described it, because the government is not getting into the real estate business in New York in the manner in which I think he indicated. This was on the initiative of the consul general in New York and I think it was a very imaginative and useful suggestion for a co-operative building project in New York for what has been already termed a Canada House in which the government would rent space, as well as other Canadian businesses. In short, one building would cover all the Canadian offices and certain Canadian banks and agencies. That I think would be conducive to efficiency, not only as regards government offices but in relation to Canadian agencies as well. But the government itself is not responsible for that building. It is a co-operative venture in which the government may rent space. But on the hon. member's first point, I echo his hope that the Department of Public Works will be able to play a bigger part in the construction and maintenance program.

Mr. Green: First of all, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the proposed embassy in Rome, I think the situation is that the government bought this property for nearly $200,000 planning apparently to build an embassy and a chancellery, and then found that it was against the law to build a chancellery on that property. Therefore, it certainly did not show very good business judgment, and as far as the funds being in blocked lira is concerned, these funds could be used to enable Canadian students to study in Italy, and indeed I think some of them have been spent for that purpose. But it is not a very good excuse for lavish expenditure of government funds to say that because the money happens to be there in another currency it should therefore be used extravagantly to build such places.

As regards the building in New York, the minister said the government is co-operating, but apparently the government is involved in this plan, and I would like to know whether this co-operation consists merely of renting accommodation in buildings to be built by individuals, or whether the government is going to take over that building at $10 million, or whatever it will cost, in which event Canada will become a landlord of office accommodation in a city in a foreign country. If it is a nice thing to have a Canada House in New York I suppose it can be said that the same thing should be built in Chicago, or Seattle—

Mr. Abbott: They have one in London now.

Mr. Green: Yes, but I believe the Canada House in London was not erected for the purpose of renting out accommodation to business people. I would like to know to what extent the department is co-operating in this program.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I think the Hon. Mr. Lawson spoke to me rather than to any other member of the government about this matter and I told him I could give him no commitment whatsoever, but that if there was a building well located, in which accommodation was available at an economic figure, I had no doubt that on such premises the government would be prepared to give consideration to making leases. But I told him I could make no commitment, and I was not going to ask my colleagues to make any commitments whatsoever. I was very guarded in all my conversations and in the two or three letters I exchanged with Mr. Lawson, because I do not feel that any prime minister, or any government, should make that kind of commitments at this time. I told him that if he had friends who thought that was a good thing to do then that would be all right, but I asked him not to say that they had offered options to the government in any statement he made, but merely to say they would be prepared to offer options to the government. I asked him to be particularly careful not to hold out any inducement whatsoever that this was a government-sponsored scheme. Personally, I thought that if he and like-minded Canadians felt that it was something they could undertake, that was all right.

As it was described to me it was something about which they did not expect to make any profit themselves but they did expect that profits would be realized and that those profits would be used to retire the senior securities. There was no suggestion that there would be any thought that the government would want to exercise an option until, as he said in the notes he showed me of the speech he intended to make, it could be turned over practically without cost. Here the scheme was for amortization over a period of several decades during which time it was suggested that the senior securities could be retired.

I was extremely careful, because I did not think that any government could make any commitment to a scheme of that kind in these days. If it turns out all right and there comes a time when most of the senior securities have been retired and those who have the junior securities have given a long-term option that is still in existence to take it over at what would have to be much less than its original cost, it might then be considered. But I do not think that a government in office can attempt to bind future generations as to what those future generations will do when it becomes their turn to have the responsibility of making decisions.

Mr. Green: As I understand it, it is a fundamental part of the plan that the government would take over this building. As I read it in the press, the plan is that while it will be put up in the meantime by individuals, eventually it is to be turned over to the government. The statement made I think indicated that the building would pay and that therefore the government would not lose any money. That is an entirely different thing from the government renting accommodation in a building of that type, a procedure with which nobody could quarrel. What I should like to know is whether the government is planning to enter into a scheme of this kind, either by way of accepting an option or in any other way which will lead eventually to the country paying for the building and becoming a landlord in New York.

Mr. St. Laurent: I told Mr. Lawson that I would not even put it before my colleagues. I told him that I could not give any undertaking or any commitment whatsoever and that I would not put it before my colleagues to make any commitment even as to what space they would take; that the promoters would have to take the risk of having desirable space and then offering it when it was available, and that if it was desirable and was competitive with respect to rent I felt that the government at that time, whoever might be in office, would be glad to consider entering into leases.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the scheme? Can the Prime Minister say what the scheme was? What did Mr. Lawson offer to the Prime Minister?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Lawson told me that there were individuals who were prepared to take the risk of putting up a building. First of all he suggested that the government might be one of those who would promote a building there. I told him that I would not even recommend that to my colleagues. I said: If you have friends who think that a building would be a good thing and would not involve them in any loss, they will have to do it on their own without there being any kind of a commitment by the Canadian government.

I know that we have rented space in many different parts and that it would be more convenient to be housed under one roof. But I could not give him any undertaking that there would be leases but could only say that there might be leases if at the time the premises were available, space was available at prices that seemed to be attractive to whoever happened to be in office at that time. I even told him that I would not even discuss the matter with my colleagues because we did not want in any way to become involved in the project. We cannot prevent them from saying, if they choose, that they are prepared to have a long-term outstanding option in favour of the government to purchase. But I was shown the notes of what he intended to say, and I asked him to make a change where he intended to say that options had been offered to the government. I said: No, you have not offered anything to the government. I am not the government and there has been no proposal submitted to the government. You can say, if you like, that your friends are prepared to offer an option to the government but I would ask you not to say that you have offered one because, in talking to me, you are not talking to the government.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the item carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there was not an offer made by Mr. Lawson but what were the negotiations that he placed before the Prime Minister? What was the ultimate price to be? What basis of negotiation was placed before the Prime Minister, whether he was the government or not? Mr. Lawson wrote certain letters, apparently, and in them must have embodied something of his plan.

Mr. St. Laurent: I will show my hon. friend the letters and my answers. There were no negotiations. I did not want to go into any details at all. I did not want to go into the figures or to have any responsibility whatsoever for the project. I shall be glad to let my hon. friend see the file.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the minister what plans, if any, he or the department has for the opening up of other embassies. Is there any such plan in mind in any country other than those in which embassies have now been established or in which there are ministries?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. As indicated to the committee on external affairs, plans and appropriations are being voted, I hope, for the opening up of new missions this year. I am not in a position to mention some of the countries because we are in the middle of negotiations with them now. I should be glad to tell my hon. friend in confidence but until we get those negotiations cleared I am not in a position to make public all of the countries in which we are going to open this year. We are converting a trade office in the Dominican republic into a branch office, if you like to call it that, of the embassy in Cuba; and in Haiti there will be a branch office of the embassy in Mexico. That is all I am in a position to announce at this time but there will be two or three more later in the year.

Mr. Knowles: Just on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I ask this question. I wonder whether we could not get along for the rest of the evening without the services of the page boys?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

90. Canadian representation at international conferences, $175,000.

Mr. Low: I want to refer to an article which appeared on the front page of the Ensign, a newspaper which enjoys quite a wide circulation in some parts of Canada. This article purports to be a dispatch from Geneva under the hand of a writer by the name of Bertrand. I have sent a copy of the article to the minister, and along with it I have sent a copy of some questions which I think it would be wise to have answered at this time in the committee.

I think perhaps we might ask the minister if he would be prepared to comment on the article using the ten questions I have sent him as a basis for his reply. I do not mean to say that he should be confined to these questions if he wishes to go beyond them or that he should answer them exactly as they are written or in that order. Since I formulated these questions for the purpose of bringing out the truth and no other purpose, I have decided that perhaps No. 5 might not be a proper question, and I will be perfectly satisfied if the minister chooses to disregard that one or to comment on it in some other fashion than answering it directly. If the minister will comment on the article with these questions in mind and put on the record the truth of the situation, I am quite sure that he can set at rest a good many minds that may be somewhat disturbed on reading the article for the first time.

Mr. Pearson: I have the article before me. My hon. friend was good enough to tell me that he was going to raise this matter. Indeed, he was good enough to send me a copy of the article and a copy of his ten questions which I now reduce to nine. The article is from the issue of the Ensign of May 29. It is headed, "Ronning appointment viewed with interest." I have read the article. I read it before the hon. member was good enough to send it to me. I can assure him that the facts are not as stated in the article and that the deductions from those facts are both unfair and unwarranted. The first question the hon. member asked me is as follows:

Why was Chester Ronning selected as temporary leader to replace the hon. minister of external affairs when he was to be absent from the conference?

The reason is a very obvious one. Mr. Ronning was the senior member of the delegation and would automatically take my place when I left as acting leader. He was the senior member of the delegation because he is a senior official in our department with great knowledge and experience of Far Eastern affairs, and this was a conference dealing with Far Eastern affairs. The second question read:

Is it true that "one of Mr. Ronning's first acts was to seek out Chou En-lai, leader of the red Chinese delegation at Geneva?"

The answer to that question is no, it is not true. Therefore I do not need to deal with questions 3 and 4. The sixth question reads as follows:

Is there any truth to the Canadian Press report from London that "it is possible that there is some connection between the release of the last two Canadian missionaries and the conversations which took place between the Canadian delegation and the red Chinese delegation in Geneva"?

The answer to that question is that an informal discussion did take place in Geneva between a member of our delegation, Mr. Ronning, and a secretary of the Chinese delegation after we had first taken up the matter with the United Kingdom chargé d'affaires at Peking in the hope that by bringing to the attention of this particular Chinese communist official the plight of these Canadian missionaries who were still detained something might be done to bring about their release. It will be recalled that before I went to Geneva I was asked by more than one member of the house, including the Leader of the Opposition, if I would take advantage of any opportunity that might present itself to bring to the attention of the Chinese communist government that there were Canadians under detention and do what I could to secure their release.

It was in view of that advice, which was good advice, and I hope I would have undertaken it in any event, that we got in touch with a member of the Chinese communist delegation after ascertaining first through the representative of a state which had recognized the government of which this particular person was an official and not a delegate that this particular official would talk to our representative. It may be that the result of those talks is one of the reasons why certain releases of Canadian missionaries in China have taken place in the last few days.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask the minister a question on that point? Does the article, which I have not seen, conclude that it was wrong for the—

Mr. Pearson: I will come to that point because one of the subsequent questions deals with it. The seventh question reads as follows:

Did the minister of external affairs speak to Mr. Trevelyan of the British foreign office last month about this matter?

Mr. Trevelyan is the United Kingdom chargé d'affaires in Peking, and no doubt the reason that question has been asked is that a Canadian Press dispatch which was quoted in the Ensign article is said to suggest that Canadian recognition of red China was under discussion and that for that reason I may have spoken to Mr. Trevelyan and tried to link the two things. I can assure my hon. friend I did speak to Mr. Trevelyan, the United Kingdom chargé d'affaires. I was very happy indeed to meet and discuss conditions in China with him and to thank him for all that he has done as United Kingdom chargé d'affaires to protect the interests of Canadians in China during these difficult months because it was through him and only through him at that time that we had access to the Chinese authorities after we withdrew our own representatives.

But it is quite untrue to suggest that I was using Mr. Trevelyan as a liaison officer or in any such capacity to bring up the possibility of even discussing the recognition of red China. I talked to him solely about what he had done for Canadians and expressed the hope that possibly at Geneva we might be able to get in touch through him with some Chinese official in the hope that we might secure the release of the remaining six Canadians who are under detention in China. I should like to think that possibly we have had some success in that matter. The eighth question is as follows:

Is it true that the two Canadian missionaries, Reverend Beauregard and Reverend Venadam, had already been freed by orders issued many weeks ago, and arrived at Hong Kong in the middle of May?

I am not sure of that. It may well have been, and I am not suggesting that because we did have these talks with a Chinese official through one of our officials that that could have in any way been responsible for the release of Canadian missionaries who arrived in Hong Kong before the conference opened. The ninth question also deals with two missionaries whose fate I am not sure of at the moment. The tenth question is as follows:

Is there any truth whatsoever to this part of the Ensign article?

The answer, Mr. Chairman, is no.

Item agreed to.

General—

95. To provide for the Canadian government's contribution to the United Nations expanded program for technical assistance to underdeveloped countries in an amount of $872,354 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of January, 1954, which is, $850,000.

Mr. Knowles: Item 95 is one of two or three items of the main estimates, together with an item or two in the supplementary estimates, that come under the general heading of economic aid. If I may say so, I feel that some of the most thrilling hours of the time we spent in the committee on external affairs were when we had Mr. Nik Cavell before us telling us the story of what is being done under the Colombo plan in the countries in southeast Asia which are participants in that plan. It does seem to me that it would be well worth while for members generally to read the evidence of the committee reporting Mr. Cavell's statement to us. As hon. members are aware, the committee not only recommended to the house the items in the estimates covering technical assistance under the Colombo plan and economic aid generally but also included in its report a paragraph on this general subject which reads as follows:

Your committee was impressed with the valuable work being done under the Colombo plan and is of the view that this aid is of considerable importance to help the growth of democracy and it also approves of the increase in the Canadian contribution to the United Nations program for technical assistance to underdeveloped countries.

It is obvious from the vein in which I have been speaking and it is well known from what all of us in this group have said on many occasions that we support wholeheartedly these programs of economic aid to underdeveloped countries. We support them because we think it is the right thing to do for the people of these countries. We also support these programs because we believe that it is a way of giving real and tangible aid to those who are trying to build democracy in other parts of the world. This is indeed a part of what my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North was speaking about earlier this evening when he urged that we be concerned as to what we are striving for in this world as well as what we are striving against.

Now, Mr. Chairman, because we are in full support of these amounts for economic aid I will not take the time of the committee to spell out that support. There is just this I should like to say. It seems to me that the impression has been created over the past year or two—and if I may say so with respect I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs has helped to create that impression—that we are doing all we can. The impression has been created that even if we were to vote more money the arrangements have not been set up to make use of that money; even if we were prepared to give more these other countries could not use it and are not ready to absorb such help as we might be prepared to give. If I have gathered the wrong impression I would be delighted to have it corrected. I think it is fair to say that impression has been created.

As a matter of fact it had been created to such an extent that some of the questions put to Mr. Cavell in the committee were based on that premise. The questions of some members of the committee started from the idea that we were doing all we could within the capacity of those countries to accept and make use of our aid. I noticed, however, that in response to some of the questions we put to Mr. Cavell he made it clear that the requests those countries make to us are made in the light of their knowledge of the amount of money we are prepared to put into these various plans. He told us also that the amount of help that could be used by way of capital aid in these countries was almost unlimited. I am sure that we in the committee all agreed with the basic principle he laid down, that was the principle that we must help them get on their own feet. We must provide training and capital assistance rather than relief and rather than relying on the notion that we, by ourselves, could rehabilitate that whole area.

Perhaps the reason I have risen to say these few words, Mr. Chairman, is in the hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs may see fit to dispel that impression which I think has been created. If the fact is that the government feels we cannot yet appropriate more money, let it be said squarely that that is the case. But believing as I do that one of the things that can contribute most to the saving of the world from communism is the effort to build it up in terms of strong and indigenous democracy, I think that every dollar we can spend in this way is very well spent. The money that we spend on economic aid is a drop in the bucket compared to what we are called upon to spend for military preparations. I know the arguments that are thrown back when we make these comparisons, but it does seem to me that for the good of these people, for the peace of the world and for our own good we could do a lot more yet in the way of technical assistance and economic aid generally.

The minister knows he has our wholehearted support in everything that is being done along this line. I hope he will agree with me that there is room yet for a great deal more that we could do, and that he will join with us in an appeal to our people generally to give support to all possible aid of this kind. Before I conclude, I may say that I was interested in the response the Secretary of State made to a question of mine which was on the order paper a few days ago. I asked for certain correspondence regarding Canadian aid to Korean relief. I thought there might be a dozen letters or a few more than that that would meet the terms of my motion. The minister said there were so many it would be a heavy task to copy them all. I thought that was quite significant, if there were that many groups and organizations in this country writing to the government urging that something be done by way of aid to Korean relief with Canadian wheat and other products. This suggests to me that the will of the Canadian people is clearly on the right side. They believe that along with whatever else we are doing we can make a real contribution to the peace of the world and to the benefit of mankind by doing all we can in this field of economic aid.

Mr. Nicholson: Before the item carries, I have one suggestion to make. I have just been reading the New York Times for Monday, May 24. There are two interesting pages telling about the sharing of technical knowledge in transforming the older sectors of the world. We have the figures showing what the United States expenditures are as compared with the United Nations expenditures. I would suggest that the minister use his good offices to try to get the United States to channel more of their expenditures through the United Nations. The comparable figures are as follows:

Area	Contributions in Millions U.N.	United States
Asian Pacific	12	120
Middle East	8	77
Africa	1	6
Latin America	9	45
Europe	3	20

In view of the fact that the United Nations is a new organization, I believe it is important that its good name should be protected throughout the various parts of the world. I am sure that the minister, in the light of the post he has held, could use his influence to try to get our neighbour to the south to increase their contributions to the United Nations so the United Nations specialized agencies might do more effective work.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wonder whether the minister would give his considered opinion concerning assistance in the nature of surplus wheat and the like being granted to the Colombo plan. We hear it said so frequently, and I am in general agreement with it, that assistance of this kind is a bulwark against communism and that the main weapon of communism in Asia today is hunger. We have also read on one occasion where Mr. Hoffman said that if $400 million or $500 million in economic assistance had been given to China during the years 1944, 1945 and 1946, China might well not have fallen victim to aggressive communism. I should like the minister to clarify that situation.

One hears it argued that assistance of this kind by way of grants of surplus wheat and the like to make up the $25 million or a portion of it would not be acceptable to the eastern nations. Will the minister elucidate this, because I think it is the cause of a great deal of misunderstanding, and clarification would go a long way to meeting the requests of people in general.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in the first place I would like to echo what has already been said by the last three members who have spoken about the value of economic and material assistance, and encouragement as well as support for the Asian countries in the struggle they are making for a better life, and in the struggle against communism about which we talk so much. And that is the positive side of this effort to which reference was made earlier in the discussion.

In replying to what my hon. friend from Prince Albert has said, I think we ought to view with some hesitation the giving of wheat and consumer products of that kind to these countries, except in cases of need, starvation and famine. It might be of far greater importance to them, and certainly it would cause less interference in the normal conduct of international trade, if when we were giving assistance of that kind we were to give it to them in the form of financial assistance, and let them spend it where they desire.

But in so far as the sending of wheat is concerned—and that is the commodity which was mentioned by the hon. member—the Colombo plan is a co-operative device for capital and technical assistance. It was understood when the plan was drawn up, and it is still understood, that only in exceptional circumstances will other forms of assistance be given under that plan.

It is true that we have made grants of wheat under the Colombo plan in India and, I think, possibly in one or two other countries—at the moment I am not quite sure which ones—but those were special circumstances. The wheat was requested by the governments concerned, and it was given under conditions which required the setting up of counterpart funds, so that the money which would be realized from the sale of the wheat—because it was sold to the countries in question—would be used for the purchase of materials and commodities which, in their turn, could be used in the capital assistance program.

So, in principle and in general, I think it would be well to confine our assistance under the Colombo plan to capital and technical assistance. That, indeed, is what the countries on the receiving end have asked.

Then, so far as the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are concerned, of course we can always do more in any good cause. And that applies to the Colombo plan as it does to United Nations technical assistance and other forms of contributions to what I might call the international community chest.

But the Colombo plan is a continuing plan. At the present time it is a five-year plan to which we have pledged ourselves a contribution of $125 million, and some few millions for technical assistance. And I think that having regard to all the circumstances that was a reasonable amount for Canada to contribute for those five years. And I still think that if we had pledged five years ago a greater amount we would have had some difficulty in expending it efficiently, economically and productively. But the Colombo plan is a continuing program, as I say, and I hope that Canada will continue to play a very important part in the years ahead in carrying out that project.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is there any problem as to the method of rendering technical assistance? It has been suggested to me that sometimes the sending in of people from the outside does not work entirely smoothly. Would the minister say a word as to whether the trend now is to educate the people of the beneficiary country, or whether we send in technical people, or both.

Mr. Pearson: The answer is both. As my hon. friend has pointed out, the sending of technicians from western countries to Asian countries has not in all cases worked out successfully. Not only do the technicians have to be good ones, but they have to know how to get along with the people in the countries concerned. And occasionally in the early stages of these co-operative international assistance programs people were sent, not only from this country but from other countries, who might have been good technicians but perhaps were not always best qualified to co-operate with those at the other end.

But those difficulties were bound to occur, and most of them have been surmounted. The greater difficulty in that regard is the finding of technicians in countries like Canada and the United States—qualified technicians and scientists—who are available for assistance in those countries. Because they are the people who are most in demand in North America. Another important part of the technical assistance program has been to bring students from those countries to Canada and the United States to teach them the skills and techniques so that they can go back and do this work for themselves. One of the great difficulties in carrying out these co-operative programs is the absence of qualified nationals on the spot. And it will take some time to overcome that difficulty.

Mr. Macdonnell: From the huge sums that we know the United States is contributing in various ways, can the minister tell us roughly how much of those contributions go into similar work, and to what extent the problem in a country like India—where it must be huge—is being grappled with. Or is it just a small beginning in a problem which continues to be overwhelming?

Mr. Pearson: I am not quite sure if I understood my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Macdonnell: My question is as to what relative amounts are being used by the United States for similar purposes under the Colombo plan.

Mr. Pearson: I have not the figures available. But perhaps my hon. friend from Ottawa West, who has been directly connected with some of these programs, might be able to give information as to the relative amounts expended under the Colombo plan in a country like India. It will probably be found that the United States has spent more in the last four or five years in countries like India or Pakistan. But I believe it has already been indicated that the great proportion of the money spent by the United States was under their Point Four program, and not under schemes of United Nations technical assistance or co-operative schemes. I would guess that the amount of United States money spent in India would be in excess of that which came from the Colombo plan. Indeed I am informed it is very much in excess.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has mentioned the difficulties in connection with sending agricultural products as part of the contribution under the Colombo plan. Is it his considered opinion that the suggestions made by various farm organizations that assistance in this form—not by way of gifts, but actually by way of contributions under our allotment, or under the amount we intend to spend—would not be practicable? Would it be acceptable to India and other Asiatic countries?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to say much at this late hour on the subject. But I must say at once that I did appreciate the stand taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in supporting the Colombo plan and its work, and the similar activities under other auspices.

It seems to me there is danger of two misconceptions in the minds of Canadians on this subject. One is the view that the mere addition of money would improve the situation. It is not as simple as that. What is required is, first of all, an appreciation of the problems, a sympathetic understanding of them and then help in such projects as require it.

When one considers the three Asiatic countries in the commonwealth who are in the Colombo plan it is rather extraordinary just how similar their problems are to some of the problems this country has come through in its history. It is not simply a matter of providing more money to each country and doing what is required; it is rather a problem of working out with them what particular phase of development work is required and then helping them to go forward with the development they are undertaking. It is a question of helping them with those projects that are designed to develop their own economy, and making a positive contribution to their own capacity to produce more for their people.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the hon. member give us an illustration?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. A good illustration is that in some parts of those countries the problem arises, curiously enough, from the same rivers causing flood damage and then drought occurring in the immediate area. That seems rather strange in North America, but that is the way it is. What is required there is assistance to them in constructing the dams to control the flooding and then taking electric power off, if that is feasible, and at the same time developing the irrigation works so that the land will be made productive. Incidentally, I hope some of our western friends will not misunderstand me if I say that it is just possible that some of our people could learn a little about irrigation from the East.

Mr. Knowles: Are you speaking to the members of the cabinet?

Mr. McIlraith: That is the type of problem that arises. It is a matter of assisting those projects.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You should whisper that to the Prime Minister and teach him something about irrigation. That would be a good place to start.

Mr. McIlraith: I am speaking of those projects about which the hon. member for Greenwood inquired. When the authorities there feel that they are able to undertake projects it is a matter of assisting them in the development of those projects.

There is a very good project going on in West Pakistan. The problem there in irrigation is that you must not put too much water in the soil, because if you raise the water table, curiously enough, you destroy the productivity of the land, because there is salt in the sub-soil and you bring the salt to the surface and nothing will grow. Therefore the irrigation must be done as a surface proposition rather than by raising the water table. Not only that, but when you construct the irrigation canals they must be lined; otherwise the water simply disappears in the canal and the whole flow of the river would disappear very quickly. Not only would it disappear and the water be lost but you would destroy the land by raising the salt when you raise the water table.

What we have done there is to create a cement plant in that area to provide cement for the construction of the dams for the control of the flooding and creation of electric power, to line the beds of the irrigation canals, and for the construction of houses in the land settlement scheme on the land that is made productive by reason of the irrigation.

Hon. members will see that for that particular project what was required was the cement facility. A different form of help is required in the different countries and for the different projects brought forward. I merely mentioned this one project by way of illustration because I thought it was a good one. A much smaller thing in Ceylon is the experimental work being done in the fishing industry. By the way, anyone interested in technical assistance in that country might be pleased to know that we had an outstanding Canadian on that work. The west coast members can be very proud of him indeed. Incidentally, in Ceylon some very good work was being done for agriculture under the FAO organization. I had occasion to meet the representatives of that organization who were working in Ceylon.

In India there are of course many other projects. Perhaps it is not useful for me to illustrate them further. In picking out these individual projects I want to make it clear that I merely picked them out by way of illustration and not in an attempt to assess the importance of one over another.

There is another problem running all through this. We must remember that these countries have their new-found independence that has created some problems for them. For instance, Pakistan was created seven years ago this summer. You must remember that there was no civil service there. When you start a government afresh with no civil service, no government machinery or anything, there are very great difficulties in internal organization of the governmental machinery that tend to make it difficult for such countries to develop projects for assistance. Then you must remember that there are other difficulties such as the appalling shortage of engineers and mechanics. It varies from country to country, but it is being corrected.

It is just a week or two since the representative who is responsible for the Colombo plan administration in Ceylon was here. These men are here from time to time. The Colombo plan is now an effectively working piece of machinery to provide economic aid and technical assistance. I for one am particularly pleased that this year the Colombo plan meeting will be held in Canada. That is most fortunate. Most of the time it has been held in the countries that are receiving assistance.

I hope that as the years go on and as the Colombo plan proves itself and the technical assistance machinery generally improves there will be such increases in aid given by Canada as are required.

I must also say there is another facet of this whole subject. These so-called underdeveloped countries have something real to contribute to us under this Colombo plan. I will not go into that feature of the subject tonight, but from their great culture and background there is much for us to learn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What we have just listened to was a very interesting recital, and one that I am sure the hon. member can speak about with an authority that few in the committee possess. I was most interested in his development of the technological side of the question but, Mr. Chairman, it did not answer the simple question that I asked. It covered a wide sphere of discussion which was most interesting and most revealing, but it did not answer the question I posed to the minister. A number of western farm organizations, and I think some eastern ones, have been impressing upon the government the fact that in the expenditure of this $25 million on the Colombo relief scheme the contribution should be made in the form of agricultural products, which could then be sold by the recipient countries and purchases of technological requirements made. What has the minister to say as to the practicality of the resolutions that these farm organizations have advanced as to means whereby part of our surpluses would not be given away as a gift, but would in fact provide a saleable opportunity in those countries of Asia and at the same time provide for the disposal of surpluses?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the answer to that question is that the Colombo plan provides for capital and technical assistance and not for consumer assistance, and the articles of the Colombo plan would have to be changed to take care of the question raised by my hon. friend. It is true, as I have said before, that wheat has been transferred to India under the Colombo plan. But that was to meet an emergency and at the request of the Indian government. Normally the receiving governments would not welcome assistance of that kind under the Colombo plan, even if the agreement signed to bring that plan into effect contained such a provision.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: It seems to me we have been discussing item 101 as much as item 95. Shall item 101 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Item agreed to.

96. Contribution to the United Nations children's fund, $500,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, on this item 96 I would like to have the minister's comments in regard to the children's fund.

Mr. Pearson: I can only say that this is, I think, one of the most useful and successful of the United Nations humanitarian projects.

It is a very effective one and it operates in a great many countries. We have continued to support it from its establishment.

Item agreed to.

North Atlantic Treaty Organization—

97. To provide, subject to the approval of the governor general in council and notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, for special administrative expenses, including payment of remuneration in connection with the assignment by the Canadian government of Canadians to the international staff of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (part recoverable from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization), $51,000.

Mr. Regier: I noticed the other day that this house established an annuity for, I believe, a leading agriculturist. Would it not be possible and more businesslike if we had a certain lump sum at one time and only at one time for each individual which would purchase an annuity? As I see it this appears to come up each year in the estimates. Is that correct?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, that is correct, Mr. Chairman, and that indeed may be a better method of dealing with the matter. This particular annuity was voted in 1949 to one of our representatives abroad who served for 20 or 30 years and in that way the matter has been handled each year. Certainly I think it will be much better in future if we could handle it in a lump sum manner as the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Regier: The reason I raised this, Mr. Chairman, is that we are all looking for methods of speeding up the business of the house and I think that would be one way of doing so. There are lots of similar annuities in the different departments of government and I think they might well be handled in the fashion I have suggested.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: As that completes the estimates for the Department of External Affairs, shall I report the resolutions and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Questions

SALE OF CANNED PORK

Mrs. Fairclough:

1. Who was the successful tenderer with respect to tenders called for government-owned canned pork, January 27, 1954?
2. At what price?
3. What quantity was thus disposed of?
4. What was the date of receipt of the successful tender?
5. What other tenders were received?
6. In accordance with the terms of tender, did the successful tenderer place a deposit of 5 per cent of the bid with the Bank of Montreal prior to 5:00 p.m., Monday, January 25?
7. Has the purchaser taken delivery and paid for the canned luncheon pork in full?
8. Has it been exported?
9. If so, (a) when; (b) to what country; (c) in what quantity?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. Canada Packers Limited, Toronto.

2. 16.65c. per pound, F.A.S. eastern Canadian shipping point.

3. 8,837,222 pounds.

4. January 25, 1954.

5. Tenders, accompanied by deposits, were received from Colossal Lines Ltd., Montreal, Joseph B. Schechter, Jr., Vancouver, Frank Blum & Sons, Pittsburgh.

6. Notification of the deposit was received verbally from the Bank of Montreal on the morning of January 26, prior to the consideration of tenders.

7. Final transfer of title of stocks is now being completed.

8. It was a condition of the tender that sales by the buyer were to be made off the North American continent. Beyond ensuring compliance with that provision, the government is not a party to sales made by the buyer and, therefore, is not in a position to give information with respect to such sales.

9. See answer to No. 8.

"CANADIAN ESKIMO ART"

Mr. Thatcher:

1. What was the total cost to the government of printing the publication "Canadian Eskimo Art"?
2. What was the purpose served by this publication?
3. How many copies have been sold at the specific price of 25 cents per copy?

Mr. Lesage:

1. The final cost of printing "Canadian Eskimo Art" has not been computed as publication has not yet been entirely completed. The cost estimated by the queen's printer is $1,202.15 for 10,000 copies.

2. This publication was primarily designed to bring to the attention of the public, both in Canada and abroad, the art of Canadian Eskimos. Canadian Eskimo art is receiving steadily greater national and international recognition and its sale is becoming an increasingly important part of the Eskimo economy; this publication was intended, in part, to assist in the program of marketing Eskimo art. Income earned by the Eskimos through the sale of their art will reduce the amount of financial assistance that might otherwise have to be given to them from public funds.

3. Printing of this publication has not been entirely completed and the queen's printer has not yet received stocks for sale. Already, however, orders totalling about 2,500 copies have been received. These will be sold at a price of 25 cents per copy, with the usual discount for quantity orders.

[Mr. McCubbin.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TELEVISION APPLICATION, HULL, QUE.

Mr. Gagnon:

RESERVE ARMY—RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of the report on and recommendations for improvements and changes in the Canadian reserve army made by a committee of senior officers to the Department of National Defence, between the months of November, 1953 and February, 1954.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, the report referred to in the hon. member's motion is a report made by three senior officers with respect to the Canadian reserve army. The three officers constituted a board appointed by the chief of the general staff with the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). The report was prepared following extensive studies and was made to the chief of the general staff in confidence to assist the department and the government in consideration of defence policy. I submit, and I think most hon. members will agree, that in such circumstances the document is not subject to production but is privileged. I might mention that the Minister of National Defence referred to this matter on May 21, when the estimates of our department were under consideration; and what he then indicated, I now only wish to confirm, namely that the government must oppose this motion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I may speak to the motion, I suggest that this is not a motion for something that is privileged.

The attitude taken by the minister is to impose arbitrarily a blackout on information to which the house is entitled.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow debate on this motion. If a notice of motion for the production of papers is considered as not being allowable by the minister on the ground of public interest, or of being privileged because the documents referred to are confidential, no debate is allowed. See standing order 51.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was negatived on the following division:

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1954 not exceeding $209,168,695 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1955; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that, except as expressly provided, the aggregate principal amount of securities outstanding at any time shall not exceed $234,623,695; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $234,623,695 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT—PROPOSED UNITED STATES TARIFF CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister and to ask him if he can amplify the information which has been given to the press and is contained in a statement in a Canadian Press dispatch that federal officials said today that if the curbs receive presidential approval Canada will have to consider some form of economic readjustment, possibly a withdrawal of tariff concessions equivalent in physical and psychological value to the United States restrictions imposed.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I know of no such information given by Canadian officials to the press. All I would care to say at this time is that the Canadian government is aware of the latest developments in Washington relating to commodities of interest to Canada. We are, of course, very much concerned about the possibility, although I would not say the probability, of any action being taken against our exports and I may say that the United States government is fully aware of our views. We have kept almost continuously in touch with the U.S. administration on these matters generally and have emphasized our attitude in cases directly involving our trade. I am confident that in arriving at his decisions the president will take into account the wider considerations involved, including the repercussions on friendly countries. I am sure that he will be anxious to avoid actions which would seriously affect the trade of Canada and other allied countries.

FERRY SERVICE

STEVESTON-GULF ISLANDS—CONTINUATION OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, May 27, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) requested information regarding dock facilities at Steveston for Coast Ferries Limited operating between gulf islands and Steveston.

As my hon. friend is aware, this service followed the discontinuance of C.P.R. service which used a dock at Vancouver. Coast Ferries Limited without any permission whatever from the Department of Public Works took over the use of this dock which was constructed for the exclusive use of dredging operations in the lower Fraser river. The dock in question was constructed for that purpose alone and not for public use. Dredging equipment which will use this wharf includes two dredges, two tugs, pontoon lines and fuel barges. There can be no doubt that if the important dredging program in the lower Fraser river is to be carried out this dock must be reserved completely as a base for dredging operations and maintenance, the purpose for which it was intended.

For reasons given above, instructions have been issued that Coast Ferries must discontinue the use of this wharf with effect from midnight, June 25. This will provide the company with adequate time to review alternatives. In this connection it has been suggested that the manager of the company might like to come to Ottawa and discuss with the department various alternatives which might be utilized after the 25th of June.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? There is a second government dock at Steveston, I believe. Could permission be granted to the company to use that other dock?

Mr. Bourget: According to the information I have, investigations are being made at the moment to see whether the facilities of this dock can be used by the ferry company.

[Later:]

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask the parliamentary assistant. I have written many dozens of letters to the department with regard to this ferry at Steveston. Why has not the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond been told that the ferry can continue to use that wharf only until June 25? This is the first I have heard about it.

Mr. Knowles: Well, well!

GRAIN

UNITED STATES SELLING POLICY—ACTION BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a further question to ask the Prime Minister arising out of the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). Has the government made a strong protest against the attitude taken by the United States government in making provision for the sale of oats and barley at from 10 cents to 15 cents below the domestic price in the United States? If so, what has been the reaction of the United States government to any protest?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter to which my hon. friend refers has been the subject of discussions between officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the representatives of the United States government. In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on other official duties today, I would not care to go beyond saying that. I prefer to leave it to him to say what can be said at this moment about those discussions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GENEVA CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR FURTHER REPORT ON PROGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether it would be possible, before the session closes, for him, or his parliamentary assistant or some other member of the government, to make another report on the progress made at Geneva?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if there is an opportunity and if any progress has been made at Geneva since my last statement, I am sure I shall be glad to report to the house on it.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

SENATE REFORM

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I confess that I could not hear whether or not the motion has been put. I rise to follow the customary practice of availing myself at this time of the opportunity to deal with a subject which has been before this house on many earlier occasions.

I propose to move an amendment, and may I say that it is in a form which will not be open to the objection that it proposes the setting up of a committee which could not complete its task before the house rises. It is also not open to the objection that we seek to tie the hands of the government with regard to procedure in relation to something which the party from which it is formed has been advocating for a great many years. I refer to the subject of Senate reform.

This is a subject that has been discussed on so many occasions that there is little need to argue for the purpose of convincing hon. members of this house that action is long overdue. I would point out, however, that for some time—in fact, for a long time—before this present government came to power, it was the declared intention of the party to which the members of this government and its supporters adhere to bring about a reform of the other house which would make it an effective part of our bicameral parliamentary system. When our parliamentary system was established the purpose of the Senate at that time was well defined. I need not repeat the various arguments that were presented on that occasion. They are before the members of this house. Obviously I need not argue to convince the members of the government or the supporters of the government that Senate reform is needed, because members of the government have for years been arguing in support of that proposition.

The predecessor of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as leader of the party to which he belonged had pledged on many occasions that Senate reform would be one of the important acts which he would undertake. An indication of the fact that this was constantly before the minds of the government, both during the time that it was headed by the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King as well as when headed by the Prime Minister, is to be found in the pages of Hansard and in a tremendous number of speeches outside the house. In fact there was a time when Senate reform seemed to be the main plank in the platform of the party which was then led by Mr. King. As an example of the various aspects of this problem which have come before the house, I refer to Hansard for 1926-27, volume 1, page 355. There I find the following under the heading "Senate reform":

> Mr. Evans:
> 1. What is the form or wording of the pledge, if any, taken from those who have been appointed senators during the last two years with a view to Senate reform?
> 2. How many have been thus pledged?
> Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King:
> 1. An assurance of support of such measure of Senate reform, in conformity with the requirements of the constitution, as may be introduced by the Liberal administration.
> 2. This assurance has been given by all who have accepted appointment to the Senate within the time mentioned.

By this question and answer it will be seen that so important was the subject in the mind of Mr. King that he followed the very unusual practice of asking for a pledge in advance as to what course members to be appointed to the Senate would follow in relation to the subject of Senate reform. That very unusual practice, which in the ordinary course of events would certainly be open to challenge on the ground that it denied freedom of opinion as well as freedom of speech to the members of the Senate, surely emphasizes the tremendous importance attached to this subject by Mr. King and presumably by those who supported him at that time.

Then there is a very illuminating question and answer to be found in Hansard for 1940 at page 2322, volume III. It reads as follows:

Mr. Coldwell: I would ask the Prime Minister in view of the difficulty that has arisen, whether he will consider his long-promised reform of the Senate at the next session of parliament.

Mr. Mackenzie King: That is something I have been considering all my life.

That illuminating answer, Mr. Speaker, which is now part of the history of parliament, does suggest that perhaps the party to which Mr. King belonged should seek to fulfil his life-long dream. It would seem appropriate that the pledge so often made should be undertaken. Obviously this matter cannot be dealt with in the present session. For that reason it is not my purpose to move, as I have on earlier occasions, for the setting up of a constitutional convention, nor is it my purpose on this occasion to propose the setting up of a joint committee of the two houses as I have on other occasions. I do so only because of the fact that I recognize that it must be the responsibility of the government to decide which course it will follow.

On different occasions when we have made these proposals the government has evaded the issue on the ground that this is a responsibility they must accept, and of course they have given other grounds as well. The matter has come up at different times so I recognize that on some occasions it has been opposed for other reasons. I hope that no one will feel that there is any other reason for not supporting the motion at this time and in this case fulfilling the life-long dream of a former prime minister of Canada.

I specifically propose that this should not be regarded as a want of confidence motion. I specifically propose that this motion should be accepted by the government, as other motions have been, as an expression of opinion of the house that whatever steps the government deems advisable should now be taken to start the preliminary steps towards the fulfilment of this pledge which has been before us for so many years. I am sure that it is in the interests of all Canadians at this time that we should do everything we can to establish a feeling of confidence in the minds of the people of Canada that their parliamentary system is effective, is sound and is operating to the best advantage of the people of Canada.

After all, we have been told so often that the best answer to any propaganda on behalf of any other system is the efficiency of our own system. There may be some question about the efficiency of proceedings in this house. That, however, is something we are perfectly free to deal with and can deal with on other occasions as we have in the past. I doubt if there is an hon. member of the house, and I would hope there is not an hon. member of the other house, who will assert that the Senate as now constituted is capable of performing the functions for which it was originally intended. I hope that the members of this house have noticed that only within the past few days hon. members of the Senate have asked that they be given a greater opportunity to perform their responsibilities.

That indicates quite clearly that members of the other house are as concerned as we should be about the effectiveness of the parliamentary system which embraces both the House of Commons and the other house that is within these parliament buildings of Canada. I suggest that we should not disregard the fact that, amongst other considerations, questions arise as to the method of appointment, as to the tenure of office and as to the proportion of representation which will most effectively assure the original purpose.

Without quoting at any length the thoughts that were in the minds of those who brought about the system, I should like to quote certain words from a speech by Sir John Macdonald in the legislature in 1865, two years before confederation. It is to be found on page 35 of the reports of those deliberations. He said:

In order to protect local interests, and to prevent sectional jealousies, it was found requisite that the three great divisions into which British North America is separated should be represented in the upper house on the principle of equality.

There are three great sections, having different interests, in this proposed confederation. We have western Canada, an agricultural country far away from the sea, and having the largest population who have agricultural interests principally to guard. We have lower Canada, with other and separate interests, and especially with institutions and laws which she jealously guards against absorption by any larger, more numerous, or stronger power. And we have the maritime provinces, having also different sectional interests of their own, having, from their position, classes and interests which we do not know in western Canada. Accordingly, in the upper house—the controlling and regulating, but not the initiating, branch (for we know that here as in England, to the lower house will practically belong the initiation of matters of great public interest), in the house which has the sober second thought in legislation—it is provided that each of those great sections shall be represented equally.

It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that those were considerations that were in the minds of those who were charged with the problem of drafting our constitution at that time. It was to be a house of sober second thought on legislation. One might wonder how much second thought has been evident in some legislation that has been before us. May I say without any reservation and with admiration for those who have done it, that there have been a few members of the other house who have demonstrated what that other house could do by their clear and critical analysis given to some of the legislation that has gone forward from this house. But even in the face of such able representations as have been made, may I say particularly by the Hon. T. A. Crerar in regard to the fundamental principles of the supremacy of parliament and the rule of law, the brevity of the debates that have taken place on these very important issues, following the presentation of clear and wise comment on legislation already dealt with, does raise the question as to how completely the other house is able, as at present constituted, to fulfil the extremely important tasks which were to be assigned to it.

Since the days when Sir John A. Macdonald made the remarks I have quoted, immense changes have taken place. There is a difference in the presentation, and there is a tremendous difference in the character of the country. No longer is it possible to speak of western Canada simply as an agricultural area; that is particularly true of British Columbia with its immense industrial development, as well as the other prairie provinces with their new resources. Nevertheless the principle he asserted is one which has been in the minds of those who have discussed this subject over the years, and most certainly the principle that it shall be a place for a sober re-examination of the legislation adopted in this house.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, unless the other house is to be a second chamber of review and reconsideration with a detachment that possibly might not be so easy in this house, for many reasons, then I suggest that we are paying a great deal for the form without having the reality. The mere fact that many men and women for whom all of us have the highest personal regard now occupy the seats in the other house is no answer to the demand that is being made in every part of Canada for the reform of the second house if it is to be an effective part of our parliamentary system. I, of course, feel sure we need make no argument on this side to support the lifelong dream of Mr. Mackenzie King and the pledge which has been the pledge of the party to which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his government belong.

I shall read the resolution I propose to move, but before I do so, I repeat that it leaves to the government the responsibility for initiating whatever steps should be taken to start the proceedings so that at the beginning of the next session we may not have vague generalities about Senate reform, such as there have been in times gone by, but we may have some concrete proposals as to how we are going to tackle this subject. May I point out also before I move this resolution that I am not prepared, nor do I believe the members of this party or hon. members of the house generally are prepared, to consider abolition of the second chamber until we have had an opportunity to examine the possibility of real reform. I do say, however, that unless there is some step taken towards reform, the demand from the people of Canada will bring about the abolition of the Senate because the people of Canada find it very difficult to understand why it is necessary to pay the amount of money that is now being paid for the maintenance of the second chamber under conditions as they now exist.

This house saw fit to increase the amount of money received by the members of the Senate at the same time as the step was taken in this house over the opposition of many hon. members in regard to that move—

Mr. Nicholson: No opposition in the other place.

Mr. Drew: It is for us to speak about the house in which we sit. So far as this house was concerned, there was plenty of opposition, and vigorous opposition, to the step that was taken. There was also opposition to this being done in the case of the other house, particularly at a time when no steps had been taken to reform the other house to make it an effective part of our parliamentary system under our federal constitution.

I therefore move:

That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"the government should give consideration to initiating the necessary consultation and inquiry respecting reform of the Senate so that all appropriate steps may be taken, including such matters as the method by which the members of the Senate should be chosen and their tenure of office so that the Senate may more effectively discharge the constitutional function it was intended to serve as an integral part of our parliamentary system."

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should point out to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) that there is on the order paper a bill moved by the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell), Bill No. 354, an act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to tenure of place in the Senate. This bill would simply involve that part of the amendment which says, "and their tenure of office." There is still a chance to debate that bill now on the order paper. In any event, I am not making an issue of it. I am just informing the mover of this amendment that there is such a bill with respect to tenure of office on the order paper.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say something about this rather important amendment. I noted the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said that it was introduced at this rather late date in the session in order that consideration could be given to it, and possibly a similar motion might be moved at the next session, at which time the house could consider it at length, and probably come to some understanding as to what steps would be taken by the government to bring about a reform of the other place.

Mr. Drew: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but as a courtesy I would point out that what I said was that I expressed the hope that the government would be ready to come back and recommend to us the course we should follow.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, I accept that suggestion —although the other may be what will have to be done.

As is well known, the group for whom I speak today believes that reform of the Senate should be much more drastic than the Leader of the Opposition has in mind, and that the reform should include the abolition of the Senate, taking into consideration the steps that have to be taken and the negotiations that have to be undertaken in order to bring this about.

And may I say that such reform is not unknown in our democratic parliaments across the world. In our own country we used to have second chambers in the provinces, but in all but one they have been abolished.

I hold in my hand the constitution of the Kingdom of Norway. When this matter has been up before I have often referred to this constitution. I was unaware that the matter was going to be brought up at this session; but it so happens that about six or eight months ago I obtained a couple of copies of the constitution of Norway.

There they have a single chamber; and I submit that we could study the constitution of that country with a view to adapting the provisions of that constitution regarding review and reconsideration which the Leader of the Opposition has said is the main function of the other place. The example given us in the constitution of Norway is one which is worthy of consideration.

This constitution, after indicating how the Storting shall be elected and set up, says this:

> The Storting shall nominate from among its members one-fourth to constitute the Lagting; the remaining three-fourths shall constitute the Odelsting. This nomination shall take place at the first ordinary Storting that assembles after a new general election, and thereafter the Lagting shall remain unchanged at all Stortings that meet after the same election, except in so far as any vacancy which may occur among its members has to be filled by special nomination.

That is, one-quarter of the newly elected parliament, as constituted by the Storting, forms itself into what amounts to a reviewing section or portion of the parliament of that country. Then it continues:

> Each Ting shall hold its meetings separately and nominate its own president and secretary. Neither of the Tings may hold a meeting unless at least one-half of its members are present. Bills concerning amendments of the constitution may not be dealt with unless at least two-thirds of the members of the Storting are present.

That is the machinery. Then let us take a look at what happens to bills introduced into the Norwegian parliament. It says:

> Every bill shall first be introduced in the Odelsting, either by one of its own members, or by the government through a member of the Council of State . . .

That is somewhat analogous to our governor in council.

The legislation then is introduced into the equivalent of our House of Commons, the lower house. It continues:

> If the bill is passed, it is sent to the Lagting, which either approves or rejects it, and in the latter case sends it back with comments appended. These are taken into consideration by the Odelsting, which either lets the bill fall or again sends it to the Lagting, with or without alteration.

That follows very closely the present situation in Great Britain, where the House of Lords once had complete veto of legislation passed by the House of Commons. But since 1911, when the parliament bill was introduced in that country by Mr. Asquith, the powers of the House of Lords have been limited, so that a bill passed twice by the House of Commons, on the third occasion on which it goes to the House of Lords, must be automatically adopted. Here, at least in theory, the Senate has a complete veto. If the other chamber wishes, it can reject any legislation, except money bills, forwarded to it from this House of Commons.

I submit that is not democratic procedure. There is no direct responsibility to the people by members in the other place. And to have that power, one which 43 years ago was taken away from the House of Lords in the mother of parliaments, means that we have a situation in this country which is archaic and entirely out of line with our democratic conceptions.

Then, may I proceed by reading further from the constitution of Norway, where it deals with procedure in connection with bills. It says:

When a bill from the Odelsting has twice been laid before the Lagting and has been a second time rejected by it, the whole Storting shall meet in joint session, and the bill is then disposed of by a majority of two-thirds of the votes.

Between each of these deliberations there shall be an interval of at least three days.

While that may appear to be a very short interval, it is sufficient because they meet in common session to come to a conclusion regarding it. To continue:

When a bill passed by the Odelsting has been approved by the Lagting or by the Storting in joint session, it shall be sent to the King, with a request that it may receive the King's assent.

And automatically that assent is given, as is shown by an earlier reading of the Norwegian constitution.

Here we have a modern democracy with one elected chamber divided into two parts, the second part doing the review and reconsideration which the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon was the main function of the Senate of Canada.

And may I remind the house, and the Leader of the Opposition, that reform of the other place was, I believe, in the Liberal program adopted in the year 1919. Certainly it can be found in other programs of that party. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, from time to time members in the House of Commons have asked the government representing the Liberal party in power when this reform of the Senate was to be proceeded with. We have always had the same kind of reply.

I remember one occasion in 1925, 1926 or 1927—some time in the twenties—when the late Miss Agnes Macphail asked Mr. King when he was going to begin Senate reform, and Mr. King gave a reply which in some respects was not dissimilar to the one quoted this morning by the Leader of the Opposition. On that occasion, expressing some surprise, he said, "Well, I am reforming the Senate. As the Tory senators die I am appointing good Liberals in their places." We have now got to the stage where we have almost a single-party chamber in the other place. I believe there are today seven members of the official opposition in the other chamber. I do not say this with any disrespect to these gentlemen, but they are all well on in years now and two of them I am told are in very poor health indeed. I am told that one or two of them may be taken from us at any time. Well, the situation is bad in every respect, because whenever there is a vacancy in the Senate there is a hopeful expression on some faces on the opposite side of the house, and they wonder who will be appointed to take the place of the deceased member of the other place.

Only the other day the voluntary health committee of parliament had an address from Dr. Segal, Montreal, on longevity. Someone suggested that longevity for members of parliament would be quite readily secured if they were appointed to the Senate. That seems to have been somewhat confirmed when you look over the gentlemen who sit there. I am not saying anything disrespectful to hon. members of the Senate. There are very able and very good people in the other chamber, and I want that clearly understood. But in these days, when we speak of democracy, when we speak of our democratic institutions and when we speak of responsibility to the people of Canada, how can we continue to approve of a chamber unrepresentative as far as elections are concerned, but equally unrepresentative of the various schools of thought in this country. Please bear in mind I am not making a plea for the appointment of any C.C.F. members to the other place. I say that because we believe that the Senate should be abolished. I want to make that perfectly clear; but it is quite unrepresentative of the various trends of thought politically in this country, and as such it is, it seems to me, entirely out of line with all our democratic institutions.

Someone asked, what could we do about divorce if it were not for the Senate? Well, I think that will have to be tackled apart from what we may do regarding the other place because of some of the cases that have been before the Senate committee and have slipped through this house lately. This is a reflection both on the other place, on this House of Commons and on parliament generally, so that should be no argument for continuing the present unrepresentative other house.

I should like to move an amendment, Mr. Speaker. I had only just a moment to look it over, but I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the word "respecting" and by substituting therefor the following words:

"the steps to be taken to secure the abolition of the Senate."

Suggested Senate Reform

The amendment, as amended, would read:

The government should give consideration to initiating the necessary consultation and inquiry respecting the steps to be taken to secure the abolition of the Senate.

I think I have said about all I want to say on the matter; but let no one say that there are no alternatives to our bicameral system. There is in the Kingdom of Norway an elective single chamber, which is divided, as it were, into a bicameral system. It is working well there, and anyone who is familiar with the Scandinavian countries knows that there are no more democratic and progressive peoples than the peoples of the Scandinavian countries. In this constitution of Norway the Norwegians give us an indication of how a reviewing and reconsidering chamber can be set up which will do all that the Senate of Canada does and be directly responsible to the people.

I am not going into the question of saving the country a great deal of money, but that is a factor that should be reconsidered. Unquestionably, the time has come when a drastic review of the Senate, in my opinion, can only be carried out thoroughly by the abolition of the Senate of Canada, and the study of reconsideration and review of legislation somewhat along similar lines adopted by the very democratic and progressive Kingdom of Norway.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, there is not a great deal that one can say at a time like this without some rather intensive preparation, and I must say that I did not have the opportunity to do that. However, there are a few comments I should like to make, especially since the C.C.F. have introduced an amendment to the amendment which was moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

There is no doubt at all that the Senate has declined in popularity in Canada over the years. In the minds of the people they do not occupy the same position that they held years ago when this country was new and when our federal form of government was first introduced. The question of what has caused the decline should occupy our attention. Some hold that the Senate needs reforming because the Senate itself has gone bad. Other people have different views. I have given considerable thought to the question. In my mind the question is this: Is reform of the Senate the important necessity, or is reform of the government's attitude toward the Senate what is necessary? I am not so sure that the Senate itself is in need of such reform as that the government needs to change its views with regard to the work that should be given the Senate today. At least that is one of the big considerations in this whole matter.

When Canada first adopted the bicameral system it was thought that the Senate would fit into the federal constitution, particularly as the champion of provincial rights, and for a time the Senate did fill that function, and filled it well. It filled the function of a brake on hasty legislation so long as the complexion of the Senate was somewhat different from the complexion of the House of Commons. In these latter years of course the complexion of the Senate has become exactly that of the House of Commons, and it has remained so for quite a number of years. As a consequence, many people feel that the Senate cannot fulfil a real and useful function.

Well, let us look at this question of the use which is made of it. The Senate is prepared to undertake whatever work it can do. It has already been said we have accumulated in that house a great deal of experience, men of real stature, broad experience and good minds—and women of course. Now, why accumulate that experience and that ability in a second chamber if it is not being used properly? I hope I am not attempting to cast any reflection on the senators, indeed that is not my intention; but if we look at this thing realistically we will see that as long as the senators are given menial political tasks to do they are going to continue to decline in popularity and in the support of the people.

For example, it is far beneath the dignity of a senator, and far beneath what he should be given to do, to have him go through a constituency of this country doing the footwork of a political page boy, rounding up political support to unseat a member of this house simply because that member does not belong to the party which supports the government.

I am speaking from experience. One of them did that in my own constituency. But I do not care about that. From my own point of view, if he had stayed longer I would simply have had a bigger majority. But the point is that he was there, a member of the Senate, evidently sent by the party to whom he felt he owed allegiance, to do the menial political tasks which should be done by someone completely detached from the Senate.

As long as that sort of thing is the kind of work the government gives to senators they will continue to decline in popularity until the people of this country will demand that the Senate be abolished.

I personally believe there is a very useful function which the Senate can fill in a federal state. The leader of the C.C.F. has mentioned what is taking place in Norway. But Norway is a unitary state and there is not the problem of protecting provincial rights.

Mr. Coldwell: But the revisal committee could represent and protect the provinces in the same way.

Mr. Low: I suppose that could be done, but at least until we have built up something like a different political concept in its application to the federal system by the safeguarding of provincial rights I think the Senate can continue to perform a very useful function, in addition to being a check on hasty legislation. But that certainly cannot be as long as our present attitude continues toward it, and I am going to ask again why the government does not give the Senate royal commission work to do.

They are perfectly fitted to do that type of work. We in parliament decide to set up commissions and we get judges and others to go about the country carrying on investigations and making reports. "Well," someone might say, "but they are not political." But I would point out that the judges are all appointed by the government in exactly the same way as the senators, and I think senators can be just as detached from political considerations as judges, provided the commissions composed of senators are set up in the proper way and given the proper work to do.

There is a lot of royal commission and investigatory work which could be carried on by the Senate if the government would give it the work to do.

I could not support the subamendment to abolish the Senate. I think it is a wise precaution to have a second chamber in our country and I would like to see it continue. But I would certainly like to see a change in the government's attitude to it; and further I must say I support the idea, as called for in the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), to institute the necessary consultation and inquiry respecting the reform of the Senate to see what can be done, though I do not think the emphasis requires to be placed so much on reforming the Senate as on reforming the government's attitude toward the Senate.

I believe that if we do it the right way we can raise the second chamber in the estimation of the people by giving it useful work to do, so that it may prove itself a useful body.

Suggested Senate Reform

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief comments. I am sure there are many people like myself who feel disturbed to hear the constant slighting and even contemptuous remarks about the Senate. Very often people speak as though the only useful thing to be done with it is to abolish it.

I notice the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that, and I am entirely in disagreement with him. I did not realize until this morning that the word "reform" was capable of the meaning which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar ascribed to it, but I am learning something because, knowing the hon. member to be a scholastic man, I was cautious enough to consult the dictionary and I found that the word "reform" does include among other meanings 'abolish'.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am very much interested in that point and I wonder if he has the same dictionary as I, because according to my dictionary the word "reform" does not include "abolish". If you want to reform the church then you need not necessarily abolish the church, and I was going to say, perhaps later on, that abolishing the Senate and reforming the Senate are two different subjects.

Mr. Macdonnell: Well, Mr. Speaker, I will read to you what I found in this dictionary.

Mr. Knowles: Drastic reform.

Mr. Macdonnell: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I read it carelessly but I will now read it out loud. The definition is as follows:

To become better by the removal or abandonment of imperfections; to abolish; cure (abuse or malpractice).

I hope I am interpreting it correctly, Mr. Speaker, and that I have not been guilty of misinforming you.

Mr. Speaker: I am inclined to disagree with the hon. member. I do not take the same conclusion as he does from what he has read. I will now quote from the Concise Oxford Dictionary, which is on the table. It states:

Make (person, institution, procedure, conduct, oneself) . . .

Well, the Senate is an institution, so let us make an institution or body of persons become better, for the definition continues:

. . . or (of person or body of persons) become better by removal or abandonment of imperfections, faults, or errors.

Mr. Macdonnell: Please read on, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Later on it states:

. . . abolish, cure, (abuse, malpractice).

Suggested Senate Reform

To abolish an abuse or cure a malpractice is reforming, but if we were talking about a church, for example, we would not talk of reforming the church by abolishing it.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, you are making a finer distinction than I proposed doing. I confess when I read the words "abolish, cure", though it is true they refer to malpractice and abuses, it struck me the word "reform" meant what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested, though I was not at all sure whether the hon. member would include the Senate in one of the above categories from the way he spoke.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I accept your correction if you are indeed correcting me. I was a little afraid myself, because although I am very ready indeed to be reformed I hoped it would not have to be fatal. That was the thought that struck me when I read this definition of the word used by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I have learned something and perhaps you have too.

On that point I would just like to make one more comment because it seems to me that what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested by reform, namely to abolish, should be entirely out of our contemplation, because it appears to me it would be a gross breach of faith and it would certainly be quite different from an ordinary amendment to the constitution. In order to support that, I wish to read very briefly what Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to say on this point, as reported in column 2301 of Hansard for 1906:

> But one consideration which, to my mind, is absolutely conclusive and paramount, is that under our system of government, a second chamber is an absolutely needed safeguard for the smaller provinces against a possible invasion of their rights by the larger provinces.

This is really the same point which the Leader of the Opposition brought out in his quotation from Sir John Macdonald.

I would like to quote from the same speech by Sir Wilfrid Laurier where a little later on he states:

> This principle having been adopted admittedly for the protection of the smaller provinces, every one will admit at once that if we were to remove that safeguard, there would be a natural discontent in the smaller provinces, so that I contend that we cannot seriously entertain, even for a moment, the idea of ever abolishing our Senate.

To come back to what I said at the outset, I think it is a bad situation when we have one branch of our government—and that a branch which in the past has been extremely useful at times—almost brought into contempt with a large number of people. As a matter of fact, many people who seem to give practically no consideration to other aspects of our constitution are quite ready to sound off in no uncertain way about the Senate. Why has that situation come about? It seems to me it has come about because the Senate has fared very ill at the hands of Mr. King, and I very much regret to say that it has fared just as ill at the hands of our present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

I want to read just a word or two or rather a statement made by Mr. King in 1926, as reported at page 4030 of Hansard of June 4, 1926. In reply to Mr. Meighen Mr. King said:

> I might say to my right hon. friend that the government would not like to prolong the session unduly by introducing the subject of Senate reform at this stage. My right hon. friend may be sure it will come up in due course.

One does not know what "in due course" is. I suppose, with a man of Mr. King's beliefs, it might be going on even yet. At any rate, I raise that point. I think anyone looking at the Senate under the hands of our present Prime Minister would feel that it is "the mixture as before", or the same procedure which personally I deeply regret. I regret most of all what the Prime Minister said on February 1 in this house, because it seemed to me that he had set aside reform of the Senate as something which, at any rate, was not going to be practical in his day. If I understood correctly what he said to the young Liberals the day before yesterday—although it was not about Senate reform; at least I think not—he seemed again to be putting off things there also in a way which I think was unfortunate. I want to read what the Prime Minister said because, as I heard it, I remember feeling "That is a minor disaster to our system of government". As reported in Hansard of February 1, 1954, page 1639, the Prime Minister said:

> Since I have been in Ottawa I have found that there were plenty of problems that it was realistic to study and consider because I might have some responsibility in connection with forming some opinions as to the solutions they should receive. I must confess I have never felt I was going to have in my day the responsibility of having to come to a conclusion about substantial modification as to the character of our constitution.
> I have heard certain modifications suggested about the way in which appointments or summonses to the other house might be made. But quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I have never heard one that did not seem to me to bristle with more obstacles than promises of advantage to the Canadian public.

I am not proposing to make suggestions as to how the constitution is reformed. I might make the obvious comment that there is one thing that the Prime Minister could have done, although I must admit that it would have been contrary to the general practice followed by those before him. What he might have done is to disregard what I am afraid has been the inflexible rule that appointments to the Senate were limited to certain select people whose quality, judged by one standard, was impeccable. As time has gone on, I feel that the necessity for a change has become more obvious. Whether there has ever before been such a great disparity with regard to numbers in the Senate, or anything approaching it, I do not know.

We have only to look back twenty years to a time when the Senate was a most useful body. When Mr. Meighen was leader and when Senator Dandurand, another distinguished figure, was on the opposite side, I believe that for five years the Senate did most excellent work. It was not of the same political complexion during all those years, as I understand it. At the beginning, I believe there was a Liberal majority and at the end I believe there was a Conservative majority. But to the everlasting credit of Lord Bennett, he left the Senate to do its own work. As I say, in it there were a number of distinguished men. People who were in Ottawa in those days tell me that it was the Senate debates and not the debates in this house that were most frequently attended. In the Senate there were a great many men of experience and distinction both in political and business life.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has set out one inescapable reason for continuing the Senate. I think there is another equally good one. It should be continued not only to protect the rights of the smaller provinces but also to provide a place where experience of various kinds can be rendered available for the public service.

As we all know, there are a great many people who could be useful in the public service but who are not prepared to face the rigours of an election. It seems to me that there is a great deal to be said for bringing to the service of their country in this way people of distinction and experience. If you look back just twenty years I think you will find that at that time the Senate was highly regarded by people who came here to Ottawa. The Senate committees were doing good work. Even yet they do good work. Let us be fair about the matter. In spite of the difficulties of keeping democratic party life alive in the Senate, we should not overlook the fact that much good work has been done through the Senate committees.

I think I have nothing more to add, Mr. Speaker. We have had this situation before us for many years. I think the Senate has fared ill at the hands of Mr. King. I never could understand how a man with so much belief in the parliamentary system could disregard and degrade one of the arms of parliament. As I say, I have been disappointed with the present Prime Minister, who seemed to me to be perhaps in an especially good position, with his strong majority, to give a lead in a different direction. I was deeply disappointed when I read those words of his which seemed to me not only to say that he did not propose to do anything in the matter but even went to the extent of saying that he felt no responsibility. I find that to be an extraordinary position, Mr. Speaker. Here we have, admittedly I believe, one arm of government which has been grievously weakened; at any rate, it has been grievously weakened in the public mind. For the Prime Minister not merely to say, as I read what he said here, that he was not going to do anything about it, but to go further and really say that he felt no responsibility in the matter, is something that disturbs me greatly.

This amendment, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has stated, is phrased in such a way as not to be interpreted to be a vote of confidence. I therefore hope that it may perhaps be accepted.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words in support of the amendment to the amendment proposed by my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). As he said, we are in favour of reform of the Senate provided it is that drastic reform which was suggested in our subamendment, namely its abolition.

I listened with interest to the remarks made just now by my friend the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). If I may say so, he has strengthened my belief that the time has come to abolish the Senate. He argued that there are men of distinction whose wisdom it is good to have in our legislative councils but who do not wish or do not feel able to face the rigours of an election. Mr. Speaker, it is exactly that attitude to which we are opposed. We believe that anyone who plays any part in the legislative process should be directly responsible to the people. In my view the statement made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) reflects the attitude that prevailed when the Canadian parliament was established in 1867. The men of that day believed in democracy. Democracy was to be trusted, but not all the way. There was the notion that somehow or other there had to be people apart from those who were elected who were in a position to check on the elected representatives of the people. In our view democracy has grown up. In our view democracy is to be trusted. In our view the day has come when all those who play a part in making the laws of this country should be responsible to the people and therefore should be elected by the people. To use the language of the hon. member for Greenwood, they should all have to face the rigours of elections.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I support wholeheartedly the type of reform proposed in my leader's subamendment, drastic reform, abolition of the other place. Since the word "reform" is being thrown about today, I should like to make the comment that it is quite evident that at the present time the government is not actively interested in reform of the Senate. Your Honour has already pointed out, in commenting on the language of the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), that there is on the order paper a bill in the name of the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell) which would amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952, with respect to tenure of place in the Senate.

As hon. members know, that bill would provide that senators appointed after the passing of the bill would have to retire at the age of seventy-five. It does not make any provision with respect to those who are members of the other house at the present time. Certainly that is about as mild a touch of reform as could be proposed. Yet that bill has been on the order paper since March 8 and has not been proceeded with, and it is interesting to recall—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should deal with the merits of calling or not calling a bill because, as he knows, sometimes bills are not called for several weeks, and then one day they are called and voted on. We have had instances of that kind recently.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, we had instances of that kind a few days ago.

Mr. Speaker: Let us discuss Senate reform. As a matter of fact I may tell the hon. member that the part of the amendment referring to tenure of place should not be considered in this debate. Those words should be removed from the amendment because there is a bill on the order paper, and I think hon. members will agree that we should not anticipate discussion of the bill already on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: All right, Mr. Speaker, I will obey your injunction not to discuss either that bill or the portion of the amendment which refers to that question. The only point I was trying to make was that the lack of interest in proceeding with that bill shows a lack of interest on the part of the present government in even the mildest touch of Senate reform.

[Mr. Knowles.]

I have one other comment I should like to make. I have before me, because I have been collecting these things throughout the years, like other hon. members, quite a number of quotations on the general question of Senate reform or Senate abolition. I have indeed many of those from Mr. King which have already been quoted by other speakers. I also have a very interesting one by another late friend of ours, Humphrey Mitchell, whom we will all remember for the very kindly way in which he dealt with matters and with members in the House of Commons. On January 29, 1935, the question of the Senate was being discussed in the house, and as found at page 102 of Hansard of that year Mr. Mitchell had this to say:

> The time has long since passed when the Senate should be used as unemployment insurance for many of those in political life. I am of the opinion that anybody charged with preparing legislation should be responsible to our people.

As Humphrey Mitchell often did, he got two very good ideas into two sentences. He objected to the idea of the Senate being unemployment insurance for worn-out or retiring politicians. He also objected to legislation being prepared by anyone not responsible to the people. I have already indicated my opposition to any part of parliament not being responsible to our people, but may I say a word about the other criticism Mr. Mitchell made, namely, that the Senate was a form of unemployment insurance for politicians.

In the meantime the Unemployment Insurance Act has come into force. We have that for other people, and it is also true that there is now a members of parliament pension plan which is supposed to keep defeated or ex-members of parliament off the streets. Therefore the Senate is no longer needed for purposes of that kind. Yet I find that a rather interesting situation obtains at the present time. The Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) will recall that earlier this session I had some questions on the order paper about members of the other place. He made a very interesting answer which more or less said that I should do my own research, and of course when one gets a suggestion like that from the Secretary of State one has to carry it out. I have checked and I find that in the other place at the present time there are, unless there have been any changes within the last couple of days, 40 members who are former members of the House of Commons. There are 14 who are former members of legislative assemblies, and in addition to those 54, some of whom—

Mr. Pickersgill: Is there not some duplication there?

Mr. Knowles: No, not with respect to those two categories.

Mr. Abbott: All men of legislative experience in any case.

Mr. Knowles: I may say further that I have eliminated duplication with respect to the next category, and that is just what I was about to explain. In addition to those 54, some of whom after having been M.P.'s or M.L.A.'s ran again and were defeated, there are 7 others over there who never got elected to anything. Their only qualification was that they ran and were defeated. That adds up to 61, more than two-thirds of the present membership of the other house, who meet the qualification which Humphrey Mitchell thought was not a good one, namely, that it is simply a form of unemployment insurance for people in political life.

Everyone knows the understanding of our people generally that the Senate is being used for that purpose, rather than filling any vital, effective or important role in legislating the laws of this country. We offer no reflection on any of those now in the Senate, but it seems to us that the time has come for reform of some kind and, as we have already indicated, we think the kind of reform that would really be effective would be the abolition of the other place.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I would not have intervened in this debate had it not been for the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I am not sure whether you raised a point of order or suggested that there was a possible point of order. I think that there is one involved in the subamendment. I hate to differ with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). Certainly when it comes to being a student of dictionaries, I will accept his judgment regardless of the dictionary; but subject to that I must say that I was under the impression—and I am sure there are many decisions to this effect—that the right of abolition is not legally included in the word "amend" or any such word.

I can recall, as I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) can, cases under the marketing act which have arisen in the past where there were powers by way of regulation to control, alter or amend, and certain authorities took it upon themselves to abolish. I know that in the supreme court of Nova Scotia, during a case the citation of which I cannot remember, the lawyer had ample citations from the Supreme Court of Canada arising out of the Crystal Springs marketing case and some others in which the courts held that the right to alter, amend or control did not include the right to repeal or abolish. I suggest, therefore, that the amendment that you have before you, the one relating to reform, does not include the word "abolish". At least, I understand that is so because I have not seen either the amendment or the subamendment. I understand the word "abolish" is included in the subamendment. If Your Honour did raise a point of order on that, I suggest with respect it is one that could very well be raised.

Be that as it may, the reason I rose to speak at this time is that if it is in order I want to put myself on record as absolutely opposed to the subamendment. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) gave us a little lecture a few minutes ago about trusting democracy and believing in democracy. We all do that, Mr. Speaker. I do not think he has any monopoly on that at all. I would point out to him that one reason we have a Senate in this country today is the fact that the part of this nation which first established democracy here, which first established responsible government at a time when the Indians were still in Ontario and Quebec, the province of Nova Scotia, insisted on the Senate before it would enter confederation. As you know, sir, we did establish responsible government there, the "family compact" was broken, and all the other things were done. I do not think it lies in the mouth of anyone to lecture those of us who support the Senate and to say we are the foes of democracy. I think the historical record is entirely the reverse.

My comments on this subject are rather disjointed because I did not know this matter was coming up this morning. Referring again to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I may say that I listened to his references about the unemployed and unemployment insurance. We can all indulge in that sort of criticism. I think it is rather glib. As a matter of fact, merely because a person may serve in this house or elsewhere and afterwards go to the other place, it does not necessarily mean he is unemployed. It may sometimes. I am sure there is someone within the sound of my voice at the moment who has served ably in this house and who now serves in the other place, but he certainly could not in any way be construed as unemployed because he has a place in the business world of this country which would require all his time if he were not spending part of it here in public service.

I feel it is unfortunate we do get these references to the gentlemen serving in the other place. We all indulge in them. Possibly I have done so myself at certain times when indulging in some glib criticism. As against that, we have to recognize the fact that the other place has rendered great service. I am thinking for example of the shipping act that was referred to the other place some two or three years ago. This matter was under study for months, and they spent a great deal of time in doing work which otherwise would have had to be done here. I feel that a lot of this criticism is unwarranted. I agree with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) that it is not so much a matter of reform of the Senate as it is a matter of reform of the attitude of this government towards the Senate.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) spoke directly to the Prime Minister on this matter, and I think he was justified in so doing. I realize this is a big problem, and that it has political implications. I know the leader of any political party would be faced with questions and with criticism from his supporters if he were to go outside party ranks to fill vacancies. On the other hand, the Prime Minister is also the leader of the government of this country, and a man whom we all respect although we may disagree with him on many of the policies that he advocates from time to time. As the leader of the government of this country he has the direct responsibility for changing the situation whereby one arm of this parliament is now rapidly falling into disrepute, if not contempt. It is a situation, sir, that cannot be allowed to continue. Certainly the time has come when something definite must be done.

As the hon. member for Peace River also pointed out, I think perhaps the disrespect that has fallen upon the Senate has changed their own political attitude towards things. The hon. member for Greenwood referred to a man who was at one time the leader of the government and who was in the Senate, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. I recall that when I happened to be president of the provincial political association in Nova Scotia we had a provincial convention coming along to select a leader. I asked Arthur Meighen if he would come down and address the meeting. He said that when he went into the Senate he felt he should divorce himself from all political work, and he refused to come to that meeting. He said also that no other Conservative senator could come. That is the attitude that was taken, and I am not citing it because it was taken by a Conservative. It was the attitude taken, and it should be the attitude taken by all senators.

I, too, have had the experience of senators passing over my trail during the election. I did not object to it. It did not do us any harm, but it certainly did not do the Senate any good. It should be stopped. There should be reform of the Senate, and there should be a change in the attitude of the government towards the Senate, because to get into a situation where there are only seven members of the opposition in the Senate is not good. It is not good for government, and it is not good for that government sitting over there because it brings upon them criticism and it brings into disrespect the matters for which they are responsible.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do say the government has a responsibility. I have spoken on this matter in various places but I am not going to inflict upon the house a recital of the ways in which I believe reform could be accomplished. There might be a change in the basis of appointment, that is, if various political groups are going to continue. I noticed that on Saturday night the Prime Minister was speaking somewhere else in reference to provincial-dominion relations and the necessity for working out a firm solution of that problem. Possibly if a change were made in the basis of appointment whereby the provinces could appoint a certain proportion of the representatives in the Senate coming from the different provinces, and it was made a condition of amendment of the constitution that a two-thirds vote of both houses were necessary, something could be worked out along that line. It is only a tentative thought but it is something that may go a long way towards a settlement of the constitutional problem with which we are confronted.

Coming to the subamendment particularly, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this. As I suggested earlier, the Senate was brought into being as constitutionally necessary for this vast country with varying regions, varying economic claims and also varying peoples. It was necessary then, and I say it is justified today. When you reach a situation where you see the premier of Ontario, for instance, suggesting that possibly the population of this province might be something like 12 million by 1965, when you see the disparity in population far greater today than it was in 1867, then my friend can talk about faith in democracy, but we do not want to see democracy centralized in one place. I, too, have faith in democracy. However I believe we all realize there are such things as pressure groups; we all realize or remember that we have a history and that a popular group somewhere might influence our judgment temporarily. It is a very good thing, therefore, to have a little check, a little review, particularly when under our constitution there are certain fields that are reserved entirely for this house. Therefore, I say that from a constitutional standpoint it is justified.

And although it is true today that the Senate does not occupy the position in public esteem which it deserves, if it is going to function properly the responsibility must rest with the government. It is not the fault of the Senate.

Constitutionally we need it. I speak as one who comes from one province which has insisted upon it. As a result of our insistence, and the insistence of others, the Senate was created. I think a very happy formula was worked out in those days, back prior to 1867, when this machinery evolved. And it has worked down through the years, and would also work very well today if there was proper co-operation from the government.

Speaking as one member in this House of Commons, I certainly cannot support the subamendment. But I do urge upon the government the necessity of bringing back that branch of parliament to its proper place. Today we hear a great deal of talk about communism and the dangers of it, but here in Canada one part of parliament is brought into disrepute and criticism. I say there is a real responsibility upon the government, not only to provide armed forces for Korea or western Germany so that we may fight externally; there is also a necessity that we maintain our own system; and that is not being done with the attitude being taken today.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment. There is one point in the debate this morning that strikes me rather forcibly. I am very definitely in favour of the abolition of the Senate; but failing that, I think I can go along with the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

I am wondering, however, if instead of discussing reform of the Senate we might not be better employed by discussing reform of the House of Commons. In other words, should we not be putting our own house in order, before telling the other place what they should do?

We have had a committee on procedure sitting for some length of time.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Thatcher: I would hope that that committee would do something.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not suppose I have to use many words to convince the hon. member that his remarks should be related to the amendment and the subamendment.

Mr. Thatcher: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The house, I am sure, will realize the point I would like to make, or that I was trying to make.

Suggested Senate Reform

There has been some comment as to the way the Senate has fallen into disrepute—I think that was the word used—in the minds of people throughout Canada. There is a very real danger that the House of Commons may fall into the same category, if we do not do something to make our procedure more efficient.

I shall sit down now.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I think it was on Thursday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) if there was any more legislation to be brought down. I find that today the Prime Minister has asked us to meet in the morning so as to hurry up the passage of the legislation on the order paper. But I do not see anything on the order paper about reform of the Senate. So I think the whole debate is out of order. I am not going to say it is a waste of time, but it is out of order.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I shall discuss the amendment and the subamendment. It is rather interesting to note that, on the part of the official opposition, this debate has developed into one in opposition to the subamendment rather than one in support of their own amendment. It has become quite evident during the debate that the official opposition is much more concerned with defeating the amendment to the amendment than in supporting their own amendment.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I state simply for the record that because a subamendment is moved it is appropriate for us to direct our remarks to that subamendment.

Mr. Noseworthy: I can understand the concern of the Leader of the Opposition over the Senate as it is at present constituted. But I just wonder how much different the Senate would be today if, by chance, Conservatives had been in power for the last twenty-five years.

Mr. Knowles: It is Tory enough now.

Mr. Noseworthy: We would then have the Senate full of Conservatives instead of Liberals. Just how much better that would be is not for me to say.

The amendment calls for the reform of the Senate, but the Leader of the Opposition and his supporters are very vague as to the nature of the reform they desire. Possibly if, when the Liberals are in power, the Leader of the Opposition had the constitutional right to appoint senators, that might meet the type of reform the official opposition has in mind. At least if that were the case we would not have a Liberal government in power and a Senate with an overwhelming Liberal majority. But just what responsibility in a democracy can be given to a politically appointed upper house that would warrant the expense it costs the country? That is a question the official opposition should answer when they are asking for a modified reform.

The Leader of the Social Credit party has said that we should use the Senate to act as royal commissioners on royal commissions. The country just would not stand for politically appointed senators being placed in positions where they were supposed to be carrying out disinterested investigations. And why should we have to maintain a Senate in order to provide royal commissioners for investigations?

The existence of the Senate today has grown out of tradition, and not out of any basic necessity for a second chamber. That tradition grew up in Great Britain. It grew out of the days when the upper chamber had the most authority. Over the years, as the House of Commons has come to acquire more and more authority, there has been diminishing authority in the upper chamber, and that applies throughout the entire democratic world.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps this would be a place where the hon. member might break his speech. As it is now one o'clock, I must leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Speaker, when we rose at one o'clock I was indicating that the origin of the Senate or upper chamber has grown out of tradition rather than out of any basic necessity for their existence. We in this country have been simply following the traditions established in older countries. I wonder, if by any chance the day of miracles returned and a Conservative government were elected at the next federal election, whether the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) would want to find a Liberal Senate interfering in any way with the legislation introduced by his government, even to the extent of re-examining and revising that legislation. I doubt very much whether the Leader of the Opposition would want to stand for that procedure.

Those who maintain that the Senate is still necessary as a safeguard and a check on the House of Commons are simply voicing their lack of confidence in the elected chamber and in the people who elect members to this House of Commons. That appears to be the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition not only now but in former years. For instance, I hold in my hand a report of his debate in May 1950, as carried in the Globe and Mail of that date. In that he has this to say:

> Now that the Supreme Court of Canada is to become the final court of appeal, and steps are also being taken to establish a procedure for amending our own constitution in Canada, this particular responsibility of the Senate assumes even greater importance than it had during the pre-confederation debates.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What page in Hansard?

Mr. Noseworthy: In other words the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What page in Hansard?

Mr. Noseworthy: The date of this is May 24, 1950, as reported in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What page in Hansard is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. Noseworthy: Apparently the Leader of the Opposition is not prepared to trust the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, and, in spite of what he has said about the authority of the House of Commons, he is not prepared to trust the judgment of the House of Commons. He insists—

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, what the hon. member has just read is a quotation from an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press that I read on that occasion.

Mr. Noseworthy: I am not at all familiar with the source of the hon. member's information. It is simply given here as a quotation from the hon. member himself. I have no doubt—

Mr. Drew: That shows the advantage of relying on Hansard.

Mr. Noseworthy: —he expressed confidence in that theory and gave it his support. Again, he is quoted as saying:

> Not only should it become an effective legislative body which the senators themselves desire, but it should also assure constitutional safeguards which will prevent any tampering in the future with those fundamental principles which are the very bedrock of our national unity.

There again apparently he prefers to rely on an appointed Senate, a group of men who are not elected, who have no call to go back and to answer for their actions to the electorate. He prefers to rely on their judgment rather than that of the House of Commons. And speaking of fundamental principles, which are the very bedrock of our national unity, I would think that one of the fundamental principles of our entire democratic system is the right of the Canadian people to elect their own parliament and the right of that elected parliament to speak for the people. Unless the Leader of the Opposition and his supporters are prepared to show us just what authority they wish to give the Senate over the House of Commons, over the Supreme Court of Canada, we cannot support his amendment. It would certainly seem to me that the only effective reform of the Senate is its abolition. Today that chamber is costing the Canadian people well over $1 million a year in indemnities alone, and the Canadian people are far from satisfied that they are getting any return or value equivalent to the expense that is entailed by maintaining an upper chamber. I shall support the amendment to the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I would have thought that something would have been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) regarding this very important matter. I rise for the purpose of asking him to make a statement; for after all, just a few months ago, I think it was in the month of November, he advised a labour delegation that he was thinking very seriously at that time, to quote his words, about methods of filling the Senate vacancies. At that time he indicated that serious consideration was being given by the government to assuring that the Senate should be able efficiently to discharge its constitutional responsibilities; and indeed he left the impression that a one-party Senate would not be in the interests of Canada.

Several months have now gone by. I cannot refer to what was said by the Prime Minister on February 1 last, but I do feel that since the Prime Minister is in the position of custodian of the rights of parliament by reason of his position, in his interest in maintaining the highest traditions of parliament he should give some indication of the attitude the government takes to this very important matter. The government is strangely silent, Mr. Speaker. If the former prime minister of Canada were able to communicate his views on this occasion what would he say regarding the policy that was utilized in two elections, in one most effectively, on the need and the promise of the reform of the Senate? Surely, he would expect that his successor would have views on this subject.

Some of my hon. friends say that the solution is abolition. Those are my C.C.F. friends. That is their view. Well, I saw something of reform in New Zealand in 1950. New Zealand had a second chamber, the legislative council. It remained in effect during the period of the socialist administration of that country. As I recall it, during the general election of 1949, Mr. Holland, the leader of the opposition and his party, came out in favour of abolition of the legislative council. The attitude taken by the socialist party in New Zealand was that a second chamber was necessary; reforms might be necessary but that abolition was not the solution. It was something that was unspeakable under the constitutional system of that country. However, the people spoke in favour of abolition, and I was present in the gallery on the occasion of the last sitting of that legislative council of New Zealand, and my information is that today in that country active consideration is being given to the question as to how a second chamber with responsible constitutional powers should be re-established in order to maintain something of a semblance of the British system of government.

Surely the Prime Minister has something to say on this. Or, if he has not, what about the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill)? After all, the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker, joined with the former prime minister as a kind of stepfather to family allowances. He also had views in regard to the reform of the Senate. They were expressed by him on occasion, and after all, Mr. Speaker, the constitutional viewpoint of the government should be expressed here in this House of Commons.

Mr. St. Laurent: They will be expressed by action.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, Mr. Speaker, the views of the Prime Minister will be expressed by action. Well, if it is to be the type of action, in the matter of the reform of the Senate, which has been taking place since the right hon. gentleman became Prime Minister of this country, then there is little hope for the maintenance of the type of Senate that the fathers of confederation had in mind.

From time to time we receive reports of learned extramural discussions on constitutional development by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State, and I think it is only fair to ask that the house and the country be made acquainted with their viewpoint. The Prime Minister says that decisions will be manifested or reflected by action. Well, there are a large number of vacancies in the Senate today. The Senate is rapidly becoming a one-party institution. That is not a good condition, and that is one of the serious situations in our country today, not only in the Senate but in the House of Commons. My hon. friend the Secretary of State laughs. But I read the other day that, outside of this chamber, he gave the house a lecture on how much information an opposition should get under his idea of constitutional development, and it amounted to exactly nothing.

Mr. Abbott: Not too many red herrings now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, Mr. Speaker, we are at last getting a reaction from a minister in the government, and I only hope that the Prime Minister, as the successor to Mr. King, whose life was devoted to the hope of achieving changes in the Senate, will tell us the degree to which he regards himself as a testamentary successor charged with the responsibility of carrying out the promises which were so successful in one or more elections.

This problem, Mr. Speaker, is not one that can be decided in one or even a succession of debates in this house. What the Leader of the Opposition has endeavoured to secure in the amendment is consideration of this problem of raising the standard of this parliament to give parliament something of the position which it will not long occupy unless action is taken, not only within this house, in order to improve the procedure, but also in the other chamber, to the end that each of them will discharge their responsibilities and thereby secure the highest degree of democratic conclusion of which our system is capable.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, in a matter as important as this the Prime Minister is not going to sit silent, his cabinet is not going to sit silent, and in particular the Secretary of State, who more than anyone else speaks with authority extramurally on subjects such as this, will not deny this chamber the benefit of his views.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may ask the hon. gentleman a question. If I understood him correctly, he said I had expressed some opinion outside of this house on the reform of the Senate. I am not conscious of ever having expressed an opinion in public on the subject in my life and perhaps the hon. member can refresh my memory.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just recast your memory.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): No, Mr. Speaker. I had hoped that there would be some statement in regard to this subject. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) remarked that this was not on the order paper. That is quite true, but it should have been on the order paper. It should have been in the speech from the throne if there was any consistency in the attitude of this government in regard to matters about which so many positive opinions have been expressed in the past.

However, the procedure now before us does afford the opportunity to introduce this matter at this time. This is in fact, under the present rules of the house, the only way in which we can introduce it with any hope of having a vote on the subject.

I feel I should deal with one or two points which have been raised in connection with the subamendment which has been moved as an amendment to the amendment I presented. Most certainly we will not support the subamendment, which calls for the abolition of the Senate.

In this regard I feel it might be appropriate to place on record a statement made on an earlier occasion by the late Sir Clifford Sifton, another very distinguished member of the party opposite, who had this to say some 35 years ago:

> No nation should be under unchecked single-chamber government. According to my experience, the will of the people is very often better expressed after a check, and after a period of searching and critical discussion which generally arises from such a check, than it is in the first instance. Under our system, the power of the cabinet tends to grow at the expense of the House of Commons.

This statement, I may interject, was made 35 years ago. It continues:

> The Senate is not so much a check on the House of Commons as it is upon the cabinet, and its influence in this respect undoubtedly is salutary.

Mr. Speaker, I commend these words of Sir Clifford Sifton to the government, because they express a further opinion as to why a need for reform is here, and also the need to retain a second body under some plan which will give it an effective part within the framework of parliament.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) has asked if I would be prepared to accept the restraint of the Senate if I should be charged with the responsibility of being the head of a government in this house. I may say without any reservation that I would. I will say more, namely, that I would have no choice. For under our constitution it is not for this or any other government to say that it will not be restrained by the Senate appointed under our constitution as it exists today.

That is one reason why we believe the Senate should be an effective body, that it should have the power to supervise, and that it should be able to carry out the very purpose for which it was created.

The subamendment, which calls for the abolition of the Senate instead of reform, is undoubtedly a rather drastic method of reform. It is a little like curing a sick patient by shooting him. If there is need for reform—

Mr. Knowles: Is that not a reflection on the members of the Senate?

Mr. Drew: No. The subamendment provides exactly that cure.

Mr. Fulton: It shows that they are not very good doctors.

Mr. Drew: The fact is that a doctor who carried out that kind of practice would not be permitted for long to carry on his professional activities.

We are proposing that the Senate be reformed. In answer to any possible suggestion that we are trying to dictate to the government what course they should follow —and that has been one objection on occasion—we say to the government that we are simply seeking an expression of opinion from this house that we now should proceed with whatever preliminary steps are necessary so that when we meet, at the beginning of the next session, this government may be ready to take that kind of action which was so long promised by this and other governments.

I wish that the government would carry their minds back to the emphasis placed upon this subject. I think it is worth while to place on the record in Hansard a quotation from the Toronto Globe of September 7, 1925, in reference to a speech by the prime minister of that day, Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. This is the quotation from the Globe:

> No declaration by the Prime Minister throughout the whole of his address was more enthusiastically received by the North York electors than that in which he declared for Senate reform. Loud "hear, hear" and applause which lasted nearly two minutes greeted his declaration: "We believe one of the great necessities of the time is Senate reform."

That was in 1925, Mr. Speaker. Yet we are told today by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), his successor, that this government will declare its position in action. What we are seeking is simply a declaration by this house—and I have expressly stated that it is not a want of confidence motion—that in the opinion of the members of this house it is time to begin on that particular important reform referred to by Mr. King in 1925 as being one of the necessities of the time, and that the members of this house should leave it to the government to follow the course they deem to be advisable to carry out the necessary discussions, consultation and investigation, so that when we meet they may place before us some positive proposals either as to a committee of both houses, a committee of this house or such other procedure as will carry this matter to the next stage of legislative action by these two houses after appropriate consultation with those who are directly interested in this subject just as much as are the members of this house.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Before I put the question I should like to declare the subamendment out of order on the ground that it is not relevant to the amendment and furthermore that it is the subject matter of a motion which should be moved as an amendment after this amendment has been disposed of; that is, it should be the subject matter of a different motion.

Mr. Knowles: On some other occasion?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is quite right when he says "on some other occasion".

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, Your Honour. We will take your suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: I would refer hon. members to citations 344 and 364. With these I think we have disposed of the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment itself is objectionable in form. I have followed the practice established by Mr. Speaker Lemieux in his ruling of April 25, 1924; see Journals 1924, page 186. After consulting with the mover I proposed that the motion be modified so as to read in the following manner:

> The government should give consideration to initiating the necessary consultation and inquiry respecting reform of the Senate including such matters as the method by which the members of the Senate should be chosen and their tenure of office so that all appropriate steps may be taken in order that the Senate may more effectively discharge the constitutional function it was intended to serve as an integral part of our parliamentary system.

If hon. members will look at citation 330 of Beauchesne's third edition, and the ruling of Mr. Speaker Lemieux that I have just mentioned, they will see that the Speaker, as Mr. Speaker Lemieux says, has the unquestioned authority to modify motions with respect to form.

I now want to deal with a few words in the amendment itself, namely "and their tenure of office". I have already informed hon. members that there is on the order paper a bill of which the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell) is the mover, and which has to do with tenure of place in the Senate and which deals specifically with this subject matter of tenure of office. At this moment I should like to make a comment on it because of future reference which may be made to this present ruling. As hon. members may see by reference to the last part of citation 330:

> Any irregularity of any portion of a motion shall render the whole motion irregular.

I should like to say that although this rule would perhaps apply on other occasions, I will not apply it in this instance because these two matters, namely, the one having to do with the selection of the members of the Senate and the one respecting their tenure of office, are not essential as far as the amendment is concerned. These words could disappear altogether and the motion would still stand up by itself. I just mention this citation and these points in passing so that it will not be held that in this instance I disregarded the rule which states that if part of a motion is irregular, the whole motion might be considered to be irregular. However, the words "and their tenure of office" should be deleted.

The question is on the following motion: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), moved:

> "That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "the government should give consideration to initiating the necessary consultation and inquiry respecting reform of the Senate including such matters as the method by which the members of the Senate should be chosen so that all appropriate steps may be taken in order that the Senate may more effectively discharge the constitutional function it was intended to serve as an integral part of our parliamentary system."

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Drew) which was negatived on the following division:

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN OLD AGE AND BLIND PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before Your Honour leaves the chair there is a matter I wish to raise, availing myself of the right that is accorded to us to raise matters of grievance on the motion to go into committee of ways and means as well as on the motion to go into committee of supply. I hasten to assure you that it is not my intention to raise the question that you invited me to raise ten or fifteen minutes ago. I feel we have spent enough time for today discussing Their Honours in the other place.

I wish to raise a question which I feel is much more important. My question relates to the older people of Canada generally, and not just to the older ones in the other place. It is a matter of real regret to all of us in this group, as I am sure it is to many members of the house, and it is in the nature of a very real grievance, that as yet nothing has been done in this session of parliament with regard to our older people who are still, in many instances, required to get along on $40 per month. Not only has nothing been done about this matter in this session of parliament, but nothing has been done about the amount of the old age pension or the amount of the blind pension since 1949. In that year, just before the 1949 federal election, the amount of those two pensions as provided under federal statute was increased from $30 to $40 per month.

There have been other very important changes since that time. I refer in particular to the legislation enacted by the last parliament under which the means test was removed with respect to all of those 70 years of age and over, so that at that age the old age pension in Canada is universal. I refer also to the fact that at the same time legislation was enacted providing for a pension, although on a means test basis, for those between the ages of 65 and 69. Those steps were all to the good. Those of us who had the privilege of serving on the special committee on old age security that worked out the general plan now in effect will remember that experience as one of the most satisfying we have had during the time we have been in parliament.

However, I feel it is a blot on parliament that the government has still done nothing about the amount of the pension. As I say, $40 a month is the figure that was set in 1949. This is 1954, and five years have gone by. During that time the cost of living has increased tremendously. During that time the productive capacity of this country has likewise increased tremendously. Indeed, as hon. members are aware, our gross national product today is 50 per cent greater than it was in 1949. I might indicate, to spell out that statement, that in 1949 the gross national product of this country was $16 billion, and last year it was $24·3 billion. In his budget speech for this year, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) predicted that the gross national product for 1954 would be as great as it was in 1953, if not slightly larger. In any case, speaking in round figures, our gross national product in 1949 was $16 billion and it is now something more than $24 billion.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, in the five years since the figure of $40 a month was set for old age and blind pensions, there has been an increase in the productive wealth of this country by something over 50 per cent. The proposition that we make to this house is a very simple one. We feel there is no answer to it. We feel that the very least Canada should do is to pass on to our older people an increase in the amount of the pension that we pay them proportionate to the increase in our gross national production.

In other words, we feel that the amount of the old age and the blind pension at the present time should be not less than $60 a month. I recognize there are those who will accept our basic contention that because there is this increase in our gross national product it should be passed on, but who will come back with the usual answers to the effect that this means increases in taxation. And, despite the facts we have established, they will ask the question: Where will this money come from?

From this section of the house we have made it clear time and again that money does not come out of the air. It does not grow on trees, in spite of a very interesting movie I saw to that effect once upon a time. Wealth has to be created. It is created by the labour and toil of our people in the factories, on the farms, in the mines, in forestry, in fishing and in all the other activities in which they are engaged.

The facts of history are these, that when we have set ourselves to meeting some new and great expenditure, we have met it, not out of our poverty and not by reducing some other expenditure, but by increasing our production of wealth.

I made a comparison a moment ago between the gross national product of 1949 and that of 1954. If one were to make the same comparison between 1950 and the present time he would discover that we have increased the production of wealth in this country, since the time the Korean war began, to an extent greater than our total governmental expenditures in Canada at the present time. In other words, when we were faced with the need of increased expenditures on national defence we did not say, "That means we have to cut down on this and that." We did not say, "That means that we have to reduce other expenditures." No; people were put to work, thus greatly increasing our gross national product; and the extra costs of defence, both in respect of the Korean war and in respect of our NATO commitments, have been met out of that increased production.

In fact, as I have already indicated, the increase in our gross national product since 1950 alone is greater than the total amount of the federal budget at the present time. There have been references during the course of this session—and I note them only in passing, as part of my argument—to the unemployment situation. At the moment I am not trying to revive the debate we have had on unemployment. There are arguments of course as to what the figures are; but, just taking a minimum figure, a conservative figure, let us assume that there are still 300,000 unemployed people in Canada.

If there were a greater military commitment that had to be met, everyone knows what would happen. Those people would be put to work. Let us assume that each of them can produce as much as $2,000 worth of wealth per year in addition to what is now being produced. So, with 300,000 involved, there would be an increase in the production of wealth to the extent of $600 million.

We contend that the need to provide adequate old age security and adequate pensions for our senior citizens and our blind is the kind of project we should throw ourselves into with the same degree of determination that we display when we have been met with a need for increased expenditures for purposes of defence.

I have mentioned a figure of $600 million a year in increased production that could be had by putting our unemployed people to work, so that I might relate it to the cost of the proposal I am laying before the house. I have suggested that our old age and blind pensions should be increased to not less than $60 a month. That calls for an increase of 50 per cent in our present expenditures on these items. Without bothering to take the time to give all the details, I find that what we are now spending both federally and provincially on old age security and old age assistance as well as on pensions to the blind adds up to something just over $400 million.

In other words, to increase those payments by 50 per cent would call for another $200 million. Well, I have suggested one way in which there could be an increase in the wealth of this country to the extent of $600 million a year, simply by putting the unemployed to work. In other words, there is available as an increase in our annual wealth from that source alone enough to pay for the increase in old age and blind pensions which I have advocated, and also to pay for the additional cost required to establish a national health insurance plan in this country.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member knows, of course, that the fact that no one intervenes is not by any means to be taken as an acceptance of this most amazing algebraic tussle my hon. friend has gone through.

Mr. Harris: "Hassle" is the word.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend can give his own speech later, if he wishes to tussle with the job of trying to justify the inaction of his government on this question of old age pensions. He knows the reason I was making that reference just now. If he replies, as I have no doubt he will, one of the things he will say—and I know his speech from beginning to end—

Mr. Martin: And I know yours.

Mr. Knowles: He probably knows mine. If we know each other's speeches, then should we not agree that instead of making speeches the government might bring in the necessary legislation to increase these old age pensions, and to do the other thing to which I refer?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a speech, but I would like to ask a question. Does my hon. friend know of any government in this country that has done more for old age pensioners than this government has?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I realize that I am getting some grey hairs; but I am not old enough to remember many years during which we have had any government other than the one under which we have suffered all these years.

Mr. Pickersgill: And old age pensions legislation is one of the reasons.

Mr. Knowles: If the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) wants to make reference to old age pensions, I wonder if he wants me to take the time of the house to tell the whole story of how old age pensions were introduced in this country.

However, despite all these interesting questions and interjections, I refuse to forget the point I was trying to make, and that is that if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) gets into this debate he will probably say that by advocating an increase in old age pensions I am blocking something else in which he and I are both keenly interested, namely the introduction of national health insurance.

Incidentally, I should like to note here that the young Liberals are reported as favouring national health insurance. I hope we do not have to wait until they have had 34 or 35 years' experience with resolutions of that kind, as have hon. gentlemen across the way. But my point, Mr. Speaker—and you would be right in ruling me out of order in discussing national health insurance, because there was a debate on our amendment on that matter earlier in the session—my point is that the minister need not say that the cost of an increase in old age pensions would block the introduction of national health insurance, because I have suggested a way in which the national wealth of this country can be increased by $600 million a year, which is enough to cover both of them.

I would also point out that, during the course of the debate on the national defence estimates, we have suggested that a good deal of money could be saved there. And no less a military expert than the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) has suggested that $200 million might be lopped off those estimates. I say that if that amount of money could be lopped off there, one of the places that amount or even more could be used to make our country stronger would be to spend it on these social services, such as an increase in old age pensions, and on health insurance, which I can tell from Your Honour's eye I really should not discuss at this time. I merely mention it because I do not want the Minister of National Health and Welfare to put health insurance up as an obstacle to an increase in old age pensions.

I need not tell the house that I could go on discussing this matter for some considerable time. I do not need to. Anyone who thinks about it a moment realizes how strong is our case. During these years the cost of living has gone up; during these years salaries and wages of a great many people have gone up. Reference has already been made here to the fact that there has been an increase this year in the indemnities paid to Their Honours in the other place, and an increase in the amounts paid to us in this house, despite the objection of many of us on this side. There are rumours that the judges are going to get an increase. There have been increases all along the line, but this group of deserving senior citizens, our people 70 years of age and over, not to mention those who require the pension when they are 65, are still left at a figure that was fixed five years ago, in 1949. That figure of $40 a month is no longer defensible. The time has come to increase it.

There is one other argument that will probably be thrown about if this debate gets going, namely, that these matters should be left to the provinces. I commend those provinces that have been able to add some supplement of varying amounts to the old age pensions; but I want to say that in my view this is a responsibility that should not rest upon the provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are the supplements that are paid?

Mr. Martin: The sum of $15 a month in British Columbia and $2.50 in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knowles: And $15 in Alberta. If the minister wants to tell the story, let him tell the whole story. Nothing is paid in Manitoba, nothing in Ontario and nothing in any of the provinces from there east.

An hon. Member: They have not got oil.

Mr. Knowles: The whole point of what I am now saying is that the Minister of National Health and Welfare need not think that it embarrasses us to mention these supplements. My contention is that the responsibility for old age security is a federal one, and we should be taking care of that matter here so that the provinces could do other things for our older people, so that the provinces could do something about health services for our older people, and something by way of building homes for them and meeting their other needs. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it is our contention that we should see in our older people not just citizens of one province or another, but citizens of Canada from coast to coast, deserving the same fair and generous treatment from one end of Canada to the other.

My views, indeed the views of this group, are quite definite, Mr. Speaker. There are a great many things that we feel could be included in any motion on the general subject of old age pensions, but I know what happens in this house when a motion of this kind is made. Some hon. members will say: Well, I agree with part A but I do not agree with part B; I agree with the principle but I do not agree with the amount that was suggested. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to draft an amendment that will simply state the principle clearly so that hon. members can express themselves with regard to that principle, having in their own minds what their own ideas may be. Our idea is that the amount of the old age and the blind pension should be increased to not less than $60 a month. We feel, too, that the means test should be taken off the old age pension at age 65; we feel, too, that the means test should be taken off the blind pension completely. My amendment, however, simply calls for something that no one can deny: it refers to the need for the immediate consideration of an increase in the amount of the old age and the blind pension. Therefore, in order to lay this matter before parliament, in order to give this House of Commons an opportunity to express its views on this important question and to make its mind known to the government and to the people of Canada, I have pleasure in moving, seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis):

That all the words after the word "That" to the end of the question be struck out and the following words be substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that consideration should be given to increasing the amount paid to our old age and blind pensioners under the Old Age Assistance Act, the Old Age Security Act and the Blind Persons Act."

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very long to indicate to the house exactly where we stand in regard to this amendment. As indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the house is merely asked to express its opinion with respect to increasing the amounts paid to our old age pensioners under the Old Age Assistance Act, the Old Age Security Act and the Blind Persons Act. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I am quite justified in taking a position in support of the motion, inasmuch as it is my privilege to be an Albertan. The government of my province has made provision for $15 supplementary payment, and is also providing medical, dental, optical and hospital services for many of those pensioners. Thus I feel I am quite justified in rising in my place and saying to the government that they should take the responsibility of initiating a move under which the pioneer citizens of Canada and our blind pensioners can secure more adequate incomes.

A moment ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare interjected, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking, and asked what government has done more for old age pensioners than this government, meaning the government of Canada, the Liberal government. I am going to suggest to the minister that if all the facts are taken into consideration the government of Alberta is doing more for the old age pensioners than is the government of Canada.

It is true that the federal government is paying the total cost of old age security. If the minister would give us the total amount and then indicate to the house how much they recover under the Income Tax Act and under the sales tax act, then I would indicate to him that the picture might be considerably different from that which he sees in his own mind at the present time. Under the Old Age Assistance Act the federal government does pay 50 per cent of the basic $40, which is $20 a month where a person is receiving the maximum pension. As I indicated, my own province is paying its share of $20 a month plus $15 a month, plus the cost of medical, dental, optical and hospital services for those pensioners. As I say, if a proper analysis is made, the Minister of National Health and Welfare will find that in Alberta the people and the government of that province are assuming a greater responsibility on behalf of the pioneer citizens than is the government of Canada. I could not help but say that, because obviously the minister was quite convinced in his own mind that his own government had done more than any other government.

When we stop to consider the cost of living today and the particularly heavy cost facing those pioneer citizen pensioners who are residing in the urban centres, when we stop to realize the extent to which we have recognized the needs of other groups of people within our country, then I think we are completely justified in requesting at this time that immediate consideration be given to an increase in the amounts paid to those pioneer citizens of our country. I do not think it is necessary for one to go beyond that. We support this motion wholeheartedly, and we certainly trust that the house may find it possible to support it also.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think that what we have before us is a motion that must be examined in relation to the exact wording.

It is perfectly obvious, without any comment, that certain of the views expressed by the members of the party to which the mover of this motion belongs are not consistent with those which are held by members of this party in regard to financial matters and details of that kind. Whatever may be said in regard to any other aspects, or any references outside the wording of this motion, we are called upon in this case to deal with a motion which is not affected by anything that has been said. In some cases the views put forward must be taken as part of the motion, and in this case the mover himself has divested the motion of anything other than the exact wording put before us.

I would point out that this motion calls for a consideration of the increase of the amount paid to our old age and blind pensioners under the Old Age Assistance Act, the Old Age Security Act, and the Blind Persons Act.

It seems to me there can be no question about that consideration being required. As has already been pointed out, some provinces have supplemented these payments already. I think it would be unfortunate if the impression were left that the casual interjections which have been made in regard to additional amounts paid in any way disclose the clear picture of what is done in different provinces in regard to this matter.

One province may provide one type of old age assistance, and another province may provide something different; but the fact remains that every province in some way is doing something in connection with this matter, although it may not appear to be adequate.

Most certainly there are reasons why we in this country should seek a substantial measure of agreement in regard to matters of this kind. It would be obvious that if we had a wide disparity between the amount paid in one province and that paid in another, problems might arise simply because of that fact alone, both for the governments of those provinces and for those handling the services devoted to the care of these people.

This motion calls for consideration of that problem, and it calls for consideration of a situation in which in a number of provinces more than the amount now provided is already being paid. This is something that must be dealt with by the federal government and by the provinces and it is something that should be discussed between them no matter what difficulties may be suggested in regard to other matters.

I am not aware that any great difficulty has been encountered at any time in discussions of this nature. I must say that I do not think the other difficulties put forward here are real difficulties. I think they can be overcome very readily and a conference in fact on all our broad problems could take place in regard to this subject.

I think the time is overdue for an examination of this subject, and that consideration should be given to a plan which will provide for increased payments not only for those provinces which are now providing it, but for the senior citizens of this country generally, and for that reason I propose to support the amendment.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in support of this amendment. The minister has brought up the matter of what the other governments in Canada are doing for our senior citizens and he did so in a rather flowery manner. But I would like to draw to his attention a fact he seems to have forgotten, namely that the pension rate is set at $40 per month and that that is the limit of income for a great many hundreds of people in Canada who are too old to earn anything for themselves.

Another thing he apparently seems to have forgotten is the fact that the cost of living has gone up and his government is responsible for that. That cost of living has gone up by 20 per cent and 20 per cent, and then another 20 per cent and with each succeeding increase the value of the $40 pension has gone down until today those who are dependent on that $40 pension, whether they be old age pensioners or blind people, find that the amount of food, clothing and shelter they can purchase for that amount has steadily decreased, and the purchasing power of their pension has suffered grievously.

That $40 pension is no longer worth $40 and it does not buy anything like $40 worth of goods. If the minister went out among the people of this country, as a good many of us do, and examined how these people try to meet today's cost of living with $40, and how their rental, clothing and food costs have gone up, he would realize that many of these people are in dire straits.

I did not like the minister's reference to what other governments have done in this field. He mentioned the action taken by the governments of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba; but I would like to point out to him that since we in Saskatchewan got rid of the Liberal government there we have established a social welfare service in each part of the province on a regional basis which gives effective and immediate attention to those in need. To those in receipt of the old age pension the provincial government has guaranteed full medical and hospital services paid for by the government, complete dental treatment, and eye, ear, nose and throat treatment. In addition, any medicine they may require from a druggist is paid for with the exception I believe of about 25 per cent.

This amendment merely asks the government to do something about increasing the pension for these old age pensioners. It does not mention any amount, and if this government wishes to do something which would be of value to those old age pensioners and prevent them from suffering under the rapidly rising cost of living, it can quite easily arrange to gear that pension to the cost of living.

If the pension were geared to the cost of living, there would be some standard upon which these old age pensioners could be certain of receiving their minimum necessities.

Consideration of this matter is required now. Those who are in receipt of the old age pension of $40 are receiving no more than $20 would have bought them 10 or 12 years ago. That is not a good thing for the senior citizens of Canada. We are throwing out a suggestion to the government that they gear the pension with the cost of living so that some kind of standard can be guaranteed to these people.

I hope this amendment will be brought to a vote in this house and that every member from every part of Canada will show by his vote where he stands with regard to an increase to these people, many thousands of whom are in need because of the present circumstances and in view of the declining purchasing power of their $40 pension.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment embodies not only the view of the pensioners covered by it, namely the old age and blind pensioners, but also in general the view of the people of Canada. The amendment does not specify any amount but simply asks the government to give consideration to increasing the old age and blind pension which is something I believe the people as a whole are asking parliament to do.

For the life of me I cannot understand how any member in this house who has any realization of the difficulties of the old age pensioners today can oppose this motion. It has been said that the cost of living has gone up materially since the establishment of the present rate. That is quite true. I could go on at length and deal with this matter but I do not intend to do so. I simply mean to say this. This amendment is something which represents the soul, the feeling, and the wishes of the people of Canada and I hope that members in all parts of the house will support it, for support it deserves.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, there are two good reasons why this motion should be carried. First of all, there are the reasons given by my colleagues in showing the need for an increase in the pension itself. It is not necessary for me to repeat them. I think it should be well known that if the recipients of old age security or old age assistance were having a difficult time of it in 1949, then you have only to judge the value of the dollar today as compared with that of the dollar in 1949 and its purchasing power to realize how much more difficult their position must be. The other reason is the fact that, as I believe, it is one of the finest ways in which we can keep the necessary amount of money in circulation in the form of purchasing power. We are having what is described as a recession. One of the reasons for it, as it has been in the past, is the fact that the purchasing power of the public seems to be easing off. I am not going to go into the reasons for that situation because if I did so I would be out of order in this debate. The fact remains, however, that it is necessary at all times to have as much as possible of effective purchasing power circulating in the hands of the people who need it most and who will spend it most readily. I do not know of any people in the world who would make greater immediate use of that money than would that class of people to whom we have been referring.

I want also to make a brief reference to the interjection made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) when he sought more or less to sidetrack the issue by intimating that this government has done more than has any other government in that field. I wish to submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the question. If we get into a competition here as to who has done what, we shall be missing the real issue. After all, when you boil the matter down, no government has done anything for anyone in this country. Those who are doing it are the people who produce the goods and services and who through their elected representatives decide how they shall distribute them in the best interests of the country. I think it is unwise and, if I may say so, arrogant on the part of a government to say that they have done more than has someone else. They have been using the production of the country as represented by the taxpayer's dollar and have been distributing it in the way that this parliament decides.

My appeal today is not to the government and certainly not to the minister himself but to the members of this house. After all, I think it is time that once in a while we came back to realize that the government is here only at the pleasure of this house. The government was not elected by the people of Canada. The members of parliament were elected. If the government enjoys the support of the members of this house, it remains as the government. If it does not, some other government will replace it. My appeal therefore is to the private members of this house, particularly those who support the present administration, to use their own good judgment in supporting or rejecting this motion, as they see fit, not because of what the Minister of National Health and Welfare says or of what any other member of the government says. Let us for once exercise our rights as individual, free-thinking members of this house. This is not a motion which would oblige the government to resign if it were carried. It would be an expression of opinion from this house.

I wish to say only one more thing while I am on my feet. It has nothing to do directly with this motion but I believe it should be taken into consideration in conjunction with it. I believe that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has had requests and correspondence in connection with the residence requirements under the Old Age Security Act as well as, of course, under the Old Age Assistance Act. At the present time that requirement is 20 years' residence in Canada.

In the interests of saving time, I am not going to go into the details now, but I think there is a good case for the government or for this house to consider reducing that requirement quite substantially because, in practice, what happens is this. People come into Canada as immigrants at various times. They pass through the immigration authorities at the federal level. The government or the minister accepts them in good faith. They are in good health when they arrive and so on, but in a period of time—say in five or ten years—they may find themselves in a position where they have the age requirement of 65, for example, under the Old Age Assistance Act or they may even be 70 and be able to qualify under the Old Age Security Act but for the fact that they have not lived in Canada for 20 years. It is not any fault of theirs that they find themselves in that position. I submit that it certainly is not a responsibility which should be placed on the local authorities, and that is where it finds itself today. When such people find that they are not eligible for the pension, owing to not having the 20 years' residence requirement, it is usually the local municipality that is burdened with the assistance they require. I think it is time that a change were made in that particular part of the act. If the minister speaks in this debate I hope he will give us the benefit of his opinion on that question.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I intend to say only a word in order to give some indication of how the government feels about the motion in the form in which it is now presented to the house. No one, of course, will seriously argue that there is any member of this house who would not be anxious to provide increases in old age security benefits or any other social benefits. Thus no one would be justified in arguing that, in opposing this motion, the members on this side of the house or any other member of the house, exercising his sense of what he would regard as a responsible course in the context of things, should be looked upon as opposing an increase in old age pensions. Certainly that would be true of those of us on this side for, along with other members in this house, it was a government of this political party that, as we all know, introduced old age pensions in 1925 and 1926.

Mr. Castleden: Why?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend asks "why?" They were introduced because at that time we thought the people of this country needed that kind of assistance.

I think we must keep a perspective in this matter. We set up an old age security committee two years ago. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was one of the active members of that committee. The existing Old Age Security Act was predicated on the conclusions and the recommendations of that committee. That committee recommended that we should establish, on the basis of a constitutional amendment in so far as was possible consistent with universal coverage, a system of contributory old age security. Of course our scheme is not fully contributory. The reason that it is not fully contributory is that we, unlike any other jurisdiction in the world, have provided for universal coverage. To deal with this particular matter in the way that is now proposed would be a violation of the recommendation of that committee; and it was a unanimous recommendation made by the members of every political party in this house.

Mr. Knowles: That is not a fair statement.

Mr. Martin: At that time we stated that hereafter, in our effort to build up as practically as we could a contributory system, we would try to relate the principle of contribution to the principle of benefit. I for one believe that to be a sound principle. If ever I am asked to do so or if the opportunity presents itself of bringing in increased benefits for this group of people, I would do so consistent with the recommendation, in so far as the principle of contribution is concerned, made by that all-party committee in a unanimous way.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question just in exchange for the one he asked me?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Is he not aware of the fact that it is on the record that when we agreed to that report we agreed to its principle but made it clear that as soon as it was adopted we would start fighting for an increase in the amount?

Mr. Martin: I remember my hon. friend making a statement after I pointed out just what I have now indicated, that the committee generally and unanimously, without a single exception, recommended a basic pension of $40 on a contributory basis.

Mr. Knowles: To start with.

Mr. Martin: I think it is doing the cause of social welfare in Canada a great injustice to depart from that principle. It is the only social security measure we have, apart from unemployment insurance, based on the contributory principle, and I think that we are not giving our social welfare program as a whole the kind of support that I know all of us want to give it if we follow such a course as is now suggested. There are other considerations. It is all very well to suggest that this scheme will only cost $200 million. I am afraid that when my hon. friend examines it he will see that he has really underestimated the total cost of the proposal which he talked about today but which is not embodied in the amendment.

I have in mind that during the course of this session the same hon. member put forward a proposal in respect of old age security that would have added another $900 million to the expenditures of this country. I pointed out at that time that, commendable in theory as that was, it was an impractical suggestion and one that could not be entertained seriously by anyone at this time.

I would say the same is true of the proposal now made. The federal government took 100 per cent responsibility for old age security for those 70 years and over. In this fiscal year that program is costing us about $370 million. My hon. friend said that the total cost of old age security, old age assistance and blindness allowance payments would be something in the neighbourhood of $400 million. Our total old age security payments, before the present old age security plan came into being, came to about $100 million. Now we have increased old age security payments for the group 70 years of age and over from about $65 million to something like $375 million. No one would suggest seriously that that does not represent a particular social welfare project of the first order. There is no country in any part of the world that has anything to compare with it.

Mr. Castleden: You will admit that the cost of living has gone up too.

Mr. Martin: No, I will not. The cost of living has gone down since this measure was introduced.

Mr. Castleden: But not since the adoption in the first instance of the $40 contributory payment.

Mr. Martin: Since this measure came into being the cost of living has gone down, not very significantly, but it has gone down. My hon. friend may complain but those are the facts.

Mr. Knowles: It has gone up tremendously since the committee made its report in 1950.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend can examine my statement. We have gone into this very carefully, and he will find that I am stating what is really the correct situation.

Mr. Knowles: How would you like to live on it?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says he would not like to live on it. I want to say this to him. I have great admiration for him, and he and I are good friends, but I have told him privately and I say publicly that, in spite of his commendable zeal, that kind of remark does more to hurt the development of social security and social welfare in this country than anything else he could say in the house.

Mr. Knowles: Keep your face straight while you are saying that.

Mr. Castleden: That is not the view of the people who have to live on it.

Mr. Martin: I did not interrupt my hon. friend except with his permission. The implication behind that remark is that his group alone is interested in this measure. The result is that divisions are created in the country, and it is suggested that some are trying to hold back progress in this field. I suggest that is not the way to deal with this matter. At the outset of my remarks

I gave everyone credit. I recognized that everyone was sincere with respect to this measure. Certainly in view of the social measures that the government has introduced the government cannot be accused of insincerity in this regard, although those measures may not fully satisfy the hon. gentleman. We know that for many people $40 is not enough. We know that. There is no social benefit that provides full maintenance. All that a social security payment can do is provide a grant towards maintenance. This is significant and helpful assistance.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) pointed out something the other day. I do not want to refer exactly to what he said because I think I would be taking an unfair advantage in view of the context in which his remarks were made. Nonetheless he referred to the Old Age Security Act as a measure of very great assistance, and there can be no question about that. We are now paying old age assistance and blindness allowances in co-operation with the provinces. We have just had a conference with the provinces on the matter of regulations having to do with old age assistance, blindness allowances and disability pensions with respect to which we hope to see the legislation introduced in the house tomorrow.

An hon. Member: Tonight.

Mr. Martin: Or perhaps tonight, as my hon. friend says. This amendment overlooks the role of the provinces. I would not recommend increases in old age assistance or blindness allowances to my colleagues without first of all discussing the matter with the provinces. They are paying a portion of the cost of these projects, and I know from my discussions with them that some of them are not in a position to meet the supplementary payments that are being provided by the two furthest western provinces. Therefore, apart altogether from anything else, the amendment as worded could not be supported because it calls for action in respect of old age assistance and blindness allowances which can only be taken in co-operation with the provincial governments. For that reason among others the amendment is not valid and cannot and should not be supported.

Furthermore, this is a want of confidence motion. My hon. friend may say that he has put his amendment in the simplest terms, terms that can be accepted by any hon. member. Of course that is true in so far as the way it is worded suggests. The hon. member asks that consideration should be given to this matter. The government is giving consideration to these matters all the time, but if we adopted this motion we would be indicating something which I do not think we can do at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why not have a free vote?

Mr. Martin: We would be indicating our intention to bring in legislation to provide for an increase, and since we do not presently have that intention I think it would be the wrong course to seek to mislead our people by adopting something which we all know as this time we cannot do. For these reasons, because this is a want of confidence motion, because it is one that does not take into consideration all that has been done in this field to date, because it fails to take into consideration the position of the provinces who are paying a portion of the cost of two of these measures, and not because we are opposed to old age pensions or old age security, I suggest that this amendment cannot be accepted in this form at this time.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in view of the attitude taken by the minister I suppose there is nothing much more to be said. He says that this is a want of confidence motion. He would not have his followers in the Liberal party indicate any lack of confidence in the government no matter how much the old people of this country need further help. He indicated that he expects that the supporters of the government would rather have things as they are than that the government should do something for the old people of this country. He referred to some remark which I made here the other day. What I said was that the old age security pension was a godsend to people who had some other income. Everyone knows that. I meet perhaps as many old people in difficult circumstances as any member of this house. I know what the situation was before the old age security scheme was put into effect. People who had worked hard all their lives, had worked to educate their family and made small savings, would not apply for the old age pension because they would not go through the indignities of the means test. They lived in poverty and in misery just because of that. Today people who have their own little home and $100, more or less, coming in every month, and either one or both of them is over 70 years of age are sitting pretty, as I said before.

It is not a lavish standard of living, but it is a standard of living that enables them to maintain their self respect and take their part in the community, living as citizens should live. There are hundreds of thousands who have not got anything but the old age pension; that is true of those who are 70 and over and also of those in the 65-69 age bracket. The development of our economic system adds every year to that number who cannot save anything for their old age. Our system of large scale production has separated the people from the tools and the property by which once they made a livelihood. It has not only separated them from their tools and property but it has really separated them from their skills. The machine has taken away their skill. Today when people reach the age of 45 or 50, in most cases they are no longer considered efficient in industry and they have nothing upon which they can fall back because they have not been able, in 95—perhaps 99—cases out of a hundred, to put away anything substantial that will help them to maintain a decent old age.

I am really surprised at the attitude the minister takes that the government is the little white father. He speaks of how much this beneficent government has done for the people. As it was so very well put by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny), this government has not done anything for the people. The people have provided the means by which this government has paid out anything that has been paid out. There is no reason in the world why the people of this country should come hat in hand to this government or any other government to say, let us have a better division of the great wealth we have produced and are increasingly producing.

If this were a measure affecting the members of this house, what a different attitude there would be. Could they get along on $40 per month? Could they get along on ten times $40 per month? Of course not. They were in a dreadful plight. Indeed, hard-hearted as I am I could not help but feel sorry for them myself, and keep from urging that something should be done for them. But the old people are not here. The old people are out of sight. We do not even have to meet them in an election campaign for a few years, consequently we can say we cannot do anything for you. It means a lack of confidence in this government. We cannot do anything because it would cost so much money. We never think of what money costs when we are doing something for ourselves. We are entitled to a standard of living that will put us beyond the temptations of life. Well, surely if that applies to us, it will apply in a few days to another class of people when a bill for increasing salaries will come before us. They have to have a decent standard of living to make sure they act decently. If that applies to us, and if it applies to those in the other category I mentioned, surely it applies to everybody. This alibi of a want of confidence motion, this alibi that it would violate an understanding we have with the provinces is just "hooey". There is nothing in it. Let us have a vote of the members of this house. I see that some of the old progressive Liberals have left.

Mr. Knowles: One by one like the Arabs they have silently stolen away.

Mr. MacInnis: They have gone away, silently or otherwise. It is just as well that people know where they stand. Let us remember that hundreds of thousands of old people in this rich country today do not know where tomorrow's food is coming from. Let us remember that if we want to do anything to remedy that situation it is within our power to do it. There is no alibi that can make up for that fact.

Mr. Drew: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In view of certain statements made by the minister, I want to point out that the motion before us contains no specific figure. The hon. member who moved it indicated it was not intended to relate to any figure when he made certain observations about his own opinions. I made it quite clear that was one of the reasons I was supporting this motion.

Mr. Speaker: The remarks the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has just made should not have been made on a question of privilege. Now that they are made, they are made, but I hope in the future advantage will not be taken of a point of privilege to make such remarks.

INCOME TAX ACT

The Chairman: We are now resuming consideration of the resolution with respect to the Income Tax Act. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Knowles: Is the parliamentary assistant going to say anything further with regard to the paragraph in this resolution which we were discussing when we were last in committee of ways and means, which was on May 18? Mr. Chairman, although we have not yet disputed the decision that the resolution has to be voted on as one resolution, nevertheless, for convenience of discussion I believe we did agree to discuss it paragraph by paragraph. I think it is fair to say we were on paragraph No. 5.

The Chairman: Order. I understand that that has been the understanding, and that the committee has discussed paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 4, and is now engaged in a discussion of paragraph 5.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, when we were discussing this paragraph last time some of us were anxious to get out of the parliamentary assistant a more detailed explanation, if not a more satisfactory one, as to why this amount was being raised. Perhaps I should indicate, so that it will be on the record, that the paragraph has to do with the amount per year that a taxpayer can deduct from his taxable income in respect of moneys paid into a pension plan. At the present time this figure is $900. It is being raised to $1,500. I did some figuring on my own, and suggest that anybody who can pay into a fund on the current basis of $900 a year is probably buying a pension or is paying on the basis of a salary of $15,000 a year; whereas, if the ceiling is raised it means that a person can pay 6 per cent of a salary as high as $25,000 a year and get deductibility at that level. It does not seem really a satisfactory explanation for the parliamentary assistant merely to say that there has been inflation since that time. That same inflation did not help very much with respect to the matter we had up just a few moments ago.

Mr. Benidickson: Before we adjourned on May 18 I had pretty well concluded the explanation that I intended to give in connection with this item. The only additional thing that I might have done would have been to refer at some greater length to a very full indication of the policy on this subject that was given by the Minister of Finance last session. It is contained in Hansard of April 10, 1953, at pages 2702 and 2703. I am sure hon. members would prefer the opportunity of looking up that debate rather than for me to repeat now some of the explanation given there.

I did indicate that the minister had reconsidered the policy this year in a general way and had not felt that he could deviate from the policy with respect to the self-employed. I indicated the other night that in so far as the increase in ceiling was concerned, it is basically due to the fact that the increase is comparable to the increase in salaries and wages that has taken place since 1946; I reminded the committee that in 1946 this feature of our Income Tax Act was introduced and received wholehearted support from all hon. members. The ceiling of that time is comparable with what is now proposed.

Mr. Knowles: I regret to say that I still am not satisfied that this is a necessary change. Indeed, it may result in some unfairness to the public generally. As I indicated when I was on my feet a moment ago, if one can take 6 per cent, which is a normal or average rate which people pay on their salaries or wages with respect to pension plans, it means that the present ceiling of $900 per year provides for a person to get income tax deductibility of 6 per cent on a $15,000 annual salary. The proposal to raise the ceiling from $900 to $1,500 means that a person can get income tax deductibility for a 6 per cent contribution to a pension plan, that 6 per cent being related to an annual salary of $25,000.

It would depend upon what tables one uses, one's age at the time of starting to pay for a pension, what kind of pension one would buy, whether a government annuity or otherwise—you could not buy government annuities up in this bracket anyway—as to what amount of pension one would get for those payments, but I think my figures stand up fairly well, namely, that the previous arrangement provided income tax deductibility for those buying pensions up to $4,000 and $5,000 a year. The new arrangement provides income tax deductibility for those who will be purchasing pensions up to $8,000 or $9,000 a year.

I need not make the point that we in this group are very keen on pension rights for the Canadian people. That point has been demonstrated within the last few minutes, but this is a different kettle of fish we are talking about here. If it were just a case of letting people do this for themselves, one might say, why not let them do it? But the fact of the matter is that people up in these brackets, when they get income tax deductibility, really get something.

If a person is up in a pretty high income bracket that extra $600 deductibility would result in a tax saving of $300 or $400 depending on that person's particular bracket. In other words, these items which appear to concern an individual can mean rather substantial losses to the treasury and if the treasury loses money in this way then I can hear the government say, "When matters are proposed that may result in losses to the treasury that money has got to be made up in some other way." I must say I do not think the parliamentary assistant has yet made out a case for the fairness of this when it would result in a loss to the treasury, and provide for income tax deductibility for those who are in these higher brackets and who can purchase much higher pensions than most people can even dream about.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, since this matter was before the house last I have made a few calculations, as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I used the Department of Labour annuity tables. I assumed that the employer would be contributing the same as the employee, and if a person at the age of 25 had the good fortune to be able to put aside $900 a year and his employer put aside $900 a year, then on the basis of the annuity tables and applying them to an individual who could pay $1,800 a year from 25 to 65 he would have an income of $12,800 a year for life at the age of 65.

When you change a person's contribution to $1,500 and add the employer's contribution of $1,500 and that is put into a government annuity that person would receive a return of $21,200 a year for life at the age of 65.

If that person waited until he was 30 before he went into this sort of plan he would have $10,000 a year under the old plan per year, and $16,800 for life at the age of 65 under the new plan. If we take the age of 35 then the amount naturally goes down and you only have $7,770 at the age of 65, though with the $1,500 you would have $13,000 a year. At the age of 40 under the old plan you would receive $5,890 a year, and under the new plan $9,830. At 45 it would mean $4,280 under the old plan and $7,130 under the new. At 50 the respective amounts would be $2,770 and $4,870.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested, I think this proposed change is going to benefit a group in our society who do not really need this sort of encouragement. I think the parliamentary assistant should give us some indication as to what this is going to cost the treasury. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, when you are in these higher income brackets this sort of assistance cuts down your income tax. I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would indicate what this proposed change is going to cost the treasury in loss of revenue.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the figures are not available, and statistics have not been kept in the past in that regard. This has been determined largely on the ground of principle and it is in line with the 1946 legislation.

Mr. Nicholson: But surely there is some estimate. I cannot imagine a proposal of this sort going before the treasury board without some indication as to what the cost might be. I imagine the parliamentary assistant could give us some indication as to how many millions it will cost per year.

Mr. Benidickson: No, I am afraid I cannot help my hon. friend in that respect. He must remember, of course, that while there is some foregoing of tax at this time the income is taxable again when it is received as a pension.

Mr. Quelch: Could the parliamentary assistant say from where this proposal originated, and if it was the result of a suggestion made by any organized body?

Mr. Benidickson: The suggestion came largely from a number of firms who are in the business of advising companies on the organization and establishment of pension funds.

Mr. Knowles: Can the parliamentary assistant indicate any firms which make possible the purchase of pensions or the earning of pensions at these amounts? The hon. member for Mackenzie gave a few more figures than I did, but we have both given figures based on the same tables, and the examples I gave correspond in fact to the examples given by the hon. member for Mackenzie. I was using the example of a person at the age of 40 or 45 years purchasing a pension over a 20 or 25 year period. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us of any firms which are providing pensions of $8,000, $10,000 or $15,000 a year on a contributory basis?

Mr. Benidickson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I can best refer to the government. The government is in that category, as my hon. friend knows, and some of our top salaries have increased since 1946 and that would make them applicable.

Mr. Knowles: But the figures I gave are not salary figures but pension figures. Is the government paying a pension of $15,000 a year on a contributory basis? Judges receive good pensions but they are not on a contributory basis.

Mr. Benidickson: The maximum pension paid by the government, as I recall it, would be for a maximum length of service of 35 years multiplied by two per cent. This would make 70 per cent the maximum pension payable by the government, and I think the average is based on the best 10 years over the salary period.

Mr. Knowles: How many civil servants are there who are paying into the public service superannuation fund an amount in excess of $900 a year?

Mr. Benidickson: It is not practical to do so under the existing law.

Mr. Knowles: How many civil servants will be able to pay into the public service superannuation fund, after this is passed, if it is passed, an amount in excess of $900 a year?

Mr. Benidickson: That I do not know offhand and it is, of course, a proper subject my hon. friend could inquire into as an order for return which could be brought down.

Mr. Knowles: But Mr. Chairman, is it not pretty obvious that we are being asked to pass something here without being given any indication as to who wants it, why it is wanted, and how many people want it. I think the parliamentary assistant should not ask us to be satisfied with a reference to something in Hansard a year or so ago. I think that reference to which he drew our attention in last year's Hansard dealt with self-employed people. Is that not so?

Mr. Benidickson: I was not referring to this point in particular. What I said to my hon. friend was that he, and as far as I know all members of the house, approved of the ceiling set in 1946, and I now say that the new ceiling is not inconsistent with the ceiling which was approved in 1946.

Mr. Knowles: But, Mr. Chairman, I submit the ceiling we approved in 1946 was plenty high enough for conditions in 1946 and plenty high enough for today's conditions as well, so far as these very high rates of pensions are concerned. No case has been made out for this at all, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Does that complete the discussion on paragraph 5? Is so, we will proceed to discuss paragraph 6. May I point out to hon. members that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has moved that the Income Tax Act be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

> 7. For the exemption from taxation for the 1954 and subsequent taxation years of insurers, not less than 50 per cent of whose gross premium income was in respect of the insurance of farm property, property used in fishing or residences of farmers or fishermen.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to ask a question as to the interpretation of the wording in this amendment. It reads:

> For the exemption from taxation for the 1954 and subsequent taxation years of insurers—

I did not search the Income Tax Act thoroughly but I did not find the definition of that word. Can the parliamentary assistant give us the definition of that word?

Mr. Benidickson: I think my hon. friend will find that will be defined in the bill that will be brought down subsequently.

Mr. Macdonnell: Speaking to the merits of this amendment, may we understand exactly what this resolution means with respect to the farm mutuals that were previously referred to? My understanding is that it exempts all but a small number. I should be glad if the parliamentary assistant would give us the exact statement for the record.

Mr. Benidickson: My understanding, Mr. Chairman, after a general investigation, is that there are probably something in excess of 400 mutual fire and casualty insurance companies whose business is primarily that of insuring farmers. My hon. friend will note that we have added fishermen's mutuals. I have not all the statistics with respect to the fishermen's mutuals but they are not numerous. I am informed that there are very few mutuals indeed who would find that they would be taxable under this proposal.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the parliamentary assistant make that statement more exact?

Mr. Benidickson: Roughly half a dozen.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not asking for the names, I am only asking the number.

Mr. Benidickson: My hesitation was owing to the fact that, as he can appreciate, I should not indicate the names because the matter has some relationship, shall we say, to the effective rate of taxation on those particular companies. It is certainly less than a score.

Mr. Macdonnell: Can the parliamentary assistant give us an idea as to the size so that we shall then be reassured that none of these smaller companies in which we are interested could be included.

Mr. Benidickson: It would be difficult to do that too pointedly. My hon. friend knows that we have two rates of taxation on corporations. The lower rate of 20 per cent applies to those whose profit is something less than $20,000. I do not think that any in that group would be taxable, even if they had been retaining some of this premium income.

Mr. Knowles: Did I understand the parliamentary assistant to say that the number of these mutual companies not now exempted following the adoption of this amendment would be something less than a score? Would it not be something less than half a dozen? Why not go the whole way and exempt them all?

Mr. Benidickson: I said a score. I do not think it would probably be ten. Here is a point that should be considered. Our whole law as proposed will apply equally to a private stock company as well as to a mutual company. We are treating all alike, just as the law with respect to income tax in 1946 treated all companies alike.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Dinsdale: On this point of the number of companies affected, I am wondering whether the amendment to the resolution as put forward by the Minister of Finance covers the four western mutual companies? I am interested in this subject because the western mutuals, particularly the Portage Mutual, the Wawanesa Mutual and the Co-operative mutual, as I believe they call it in Saskatchewan, are larger companies than those that have been referred to as operating in Ontario, Quebec, etc. Indeed I believe that the Portage Mutual and the Wawanesa Mutual, between them, handle about 75 per cent of the fire and casualty business in the western part of Canada. Because of their size as compared with that of the smaller mutuals which have been discussed in this chamber, it occurs to me that they might not be exempt or that they might not come under the amendment that has been put forward in connection with this budget resolution No. 6.

I want to say a word with regard to the principle involved in budget resolution No. 6. It has been a long-established principle that underwriting gains of mutuals have been untaxable. That principle was supported by the supreme court in the now well-known Stanley case a few years ago.

Mr. Benidickson: Last year.

Mr. Dinsdale: On the other hand, what is known as investment income has been regarded as a quite legitimate area for income taxation purposes. No doubt most hon. members are familiar with the principle involved. Underwriting gains fluctuate from year to year and they belong to all the members of the mutual. One year there might be a surplus if the claims were limited, and in another year a deficit might occur if the claims were larger than had been anticipated. With regard to fire and casualty insurance I understand that it is difficult to set up actuarial tables that will hold for any lengthy period of time. As to the possibility of these underwriting gains becoming unduly large or excessive, may I say that I think there is close enough supervision by government insurance inspectors and by the government insurance department to make certain that there would be no abuse in this regard.

I think it was the hon. member for Oxford, speaking some weeks ago on this matter, who referred to budget resolution No. 6 in its original form as spite legislation, or an attempt to get around the supreme court ruling. In its original form budget resolution 6 defines these underwriting gains as profit for income tax purposes. I will just read what the original resolution states:

> For the taxation of a resident mutual insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, as though the surplus arising from its insurance activities on and after January 1, 1954 were a profit from a business, and declaring that a non-resident mutual insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, shall be deemed to be and always to have been subject to taxation on that basis.

That is definitely getting around the long-established principle that you cannot make a profit dealing with yourself. This principle is the basis of exemption of underwriting gains from income tax for mutual fire and casualty insurance companies as well as, of course, for mutual life insurance companies. It is significant that the latter will not be affected by the original resolution or its amended form.

I make these remarks because even though there has been no indication as to the position of the four large western mutuals, it seems to me that they might not be exempt on the basis of this principle as the result of the amendment introduced by the Minister of Finance. The Wawanesa Mutual and the Portage Mutual have moved into urban business. I am not familiar with their statistics, but I imagine that a good percentage of the business of both the Wawanesa and the Portage, which are the two Manitoba mutuals, is represented by urban business. That still does not get around the principle basic to mutuals that underwriting gains are not taxable and you cannot make a profit dealing with yourself. I think this is the point that should be emphasized as we concentrate on this particular problem.

So far as the basic and fundamental purposes of mutuals are concerned, I know from personal knowledge that the Wawanesa Mutual has tried to keep as closely in touch as possible with its original intention. It has retained its headquarters in a small town with a population of 447. The head office is still located there. I feel it is an excellent example of the social advantages that accrue when a progressive and expanding company resists the pressures to move its headquarters to the more lucrative and populous urban areas and remains close to the local rural situation which it was first formed to serve.

There are 75 people out of a population of 447 who are directly employed in the headquarters of the Wawanesa Mutual. You will find among them the village bandmaster, a Sunday school superintendent, a scoutmaster and so forth, all making their effective contribution to the life of the local community. This is an excellent example of the beneficial social and community effects of decentralization of business and industry.

Finally, I should like to say that if we adhere to the fundamental principle of mutuals involved, namely, that you cannot make a profit in dealing with yourself, the large Manitoba mutuals to which I have referred, Wawanesa and Portage, definitely come within that category. In every respect, except for the fact that they have expanded into urban business, they adhere to the principles of a pure mutual. The fact that they have 75 per cent of the fire and casualty business in the west would indicate that they retain the respect and loyalty of the bulk of the prairie farmers. They not only have their headquarters in small communities, Portage la Prairie and Wawanesa, but they are run by people who are basically farmers. From the managing director down all the directors have their roots in the local community, and so far as the Wawanesa Mutual is concerned the company is owned on a mutual basis by its 400,000 policyholders. No one in the Wawanesa Mutual has made a personal fortune. All the directors and managerial staff are receiving quite modest salaries.

Referring again to the supreme court decision, in the Stanley case I think it is basic in supporting and protecting the mutual idea in fire and casualty insurance as well as in life insurance. If we circumvent that decision now for the sake of financial expediency I suspect it is going to place the western mutuals in a rather disadvantageous position in the Canadian insurance market and will also place them in an unfavourable competitive position particularly with non-resident insurance companies.

I merely point out that all of our Canadian mutuals control only 16·78 per cent of the fire and casualty insurance business of this country. The rest is controlled by insurance interests from the United States and the United Kingdom. I should like to suggest that if our western mutuals are not excluded by the amendment from income tax payments on underwriting gains it represents definite discrimination against these fire and casualty insurance companies. In the long run any additional taxation will have to be met through increased premiums to the prairie farmers. If we are going to tax underwriting gains, it will only mean that the increased costs will be passed along to the prairie farmers in the form of higher premium rates for fire and casualty insurance. I suggest that the farmers are already carrying their share of the load in the present tightened economic circumstances. Particularly does that apply in the west which is faced with the problem of marketing its surplus grains.

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to ask a question about the wording of paragraph 6. It reads as follows:

For the taxation of a resident mutual insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, as though the surplus arising from its insurance activities on and after January 1, 1954, were a profit from a business—

That part has been amended. Then it goes on:

—and declaring that a non-resident mutual insurance corporation, other than a life insurance corporation, shall be deemed to be and always to have been subject to taxation on that basis.

Does that stand?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: When you say "shall be deemed to be and always to have been" does that mean in effect retroactive operation?

Mr. Benidickson: In so far as non-resident companies are concerned, yes. My hon. friend will recognize that the non-resident companies, even under the Stanley Mutual case of last year, would not be subject to taxation with respect to their investment income.

Mr. Macdonnell: How far back will this retroactive feature go in some cases? What will be the greatest period?

Mr. Benidickson: I think the original appeals were submitted in 1951. My hon. friend knows that the legislation, the parliamentary intent, was made known in 1946 to be effective from the 1947 taxation year.

Mr. Trainor: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant if mutual insurance companies are given the same tax exemption as other co-operatives, because they really are co-operatives and, if not, why not?

Mr. Benidickson: It is rather difficult to compare the two exactly, although there are many points of similarity. In so far as co-operatives are concerned, our present law resulted from a commission known as the McDougall commission that was asked to advise on this rather intricate problem. As a result of the report of that commission the income tax legislation with respect, not only to co-operatives but also to mutual insurance companies was altered and became effective for the 1947 year.

There is, for instance, an item of differentiation in the case of co-operatives as compared with mutual insurance companies in the matter of the three-year tax exemption for co-operatives. There are some other differences but basically the point is that either a co-operative or a mutual insurance company, if it turns back to its patrons any patronage dividends which is surplus income, that income will not be considered as profit.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Mr. Trainor: Would that regulation apply to those companies that do not come under the amendment now? Would the same arrangements that apply to other co-operatives apply to them?

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris suggested there may be some mutual companies who might not benefit by this proposed legislation. This might be true, of course, and I have not particular information on any individual company. Certainly if any of them return as patronage dividends their surplus of premium income over losses and expenses they will thus avoid paying income tax.

Mr. Macdonnell: In thinking over what the parliamentary assistant said about the retroactive feature of this legislation, I may say that we have tried to keep ourselves clear of retroactive legislation. It seems to me particularly unfortunate that this retroactive feature will apply, as I understand it now, to foreign corporations. Is that correct?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: That seems to me doubly unfortunate. Have we got some special reason for doing so?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, I think there is. Probably I could give that explanation to my hon. friend. It was thought that the law made taxable non-resident mutual companies.

Mr. Fleming: Thought by whom?

Mr. Benidickson: It was thought by the administration. In fact I refer my hon. friend to the debates of 1946, and in so far as parliamentary intention is concerned I do not think there is any doubt about the intention. The supreme court felt it was done in a way that was not effective. It was felt that non-resident mutual insurance companies, other than life insurance companies, who carried on business in Canada would become taxable. Those companies were thought to be taxable on the portion of the underwriting profits attributable to operations in Canada, the underwriting profit being the excess of their retained premium income over claims and operating expenses.

The decision of the courts in the Stanley Mutual case was that the present law does not carry out this parliamentary intention. The proposed amendment is intended to put in the law that which was thought to be already there, and in the case of non-resident companies it is to be made retroactive. I will give the reason for making this amendment retroactive to non-resident companies. It does not have the result of changing taxation policy at all to those corporations or of increasing their tax retroactively. They will pay what they thought they had to pay, and what was intended they should pay. Unlike the resident companies, there is no alternative method of taxation based on investment income.

The effect of the Stanley Mutual decision was that non-resident companies carrying on business in Canada, which also had investment income, would be completely exempt from tax. Taxation of this investment income falls under the general provisions relating to the taxation of income going to a non-resident.

Mr. Macdonnell: If I have understood correctly, when the parliamentary assistant says that they will not pay anything extra, surely what he means is that they will not pay anything more than they would have paid if what the administration had thought was the effect of the legislation had been supported by the courts. Surely another and more practical way of putting it is that having been relieved by the court in the Stanley case we now come along and in the case of our own companies change the law in such a way as to make it clear they are exempt, and at the same time we are not content with leaving the United States companies in the place they would have been or changing the laws so that it is now clear that they get no more effect from the Stanley case and must pay from now on, but we do worse than that—we go back and say that they are to pay from 1946. It seems to me if I have stated it correctly it is just playing on words to say we are not charging them any more.

Mr. Benidickson: As my hon. friend knows, in the Stanley Mutual case it was held that Canadian companies which did not refund all excess premium income would escape taxation in so far as that surplus was concerned. However, it is presumed that they would be liable for tax on their investment income. In the case of a non-resident company, there would be no taxation whatsoever on investment income and that would appear to put domestic companies in a worse position than non-resident companies.

Mr. Fleming: It seems to me there is a very important principle involved in this proposal. One of the golden rules of every parliament that draws its source and inspiration from the mother of parliaments is that parliament shall not pass retroactive legislation except for remedial purposes, and that in almost every case for the benefit of the subject. If there is one case above all others where parliament should not attempt to legislate retroactively it is with respect to taxation and the impositions on the subject.

Now, what is the explanation given for the attempt in this resolution to impose taxation and make it retroactive, retroactive over a period of years to a time when a certain amendment was introduced? The explanation given is that it was intended that these particular insurers should have been taxable at that time and since. Intended to be taxed by whom? We are told it was the administration that thought that was the effect of the legislation.

Mr. Benidickson: Parliament.

Mr. Fleming: No, parliament did not. That is the whole point. What parliament intended is to be taken only from what parliament said, and parliament speaks only in terms of legislation. What is said in debate in this house is said only by individuals; it is not said by parliament. The foundation of our system of law-making is that parliament speaks only in legislative terms, and its intent is what, in effect, the courts of this land say is the meaning of the legislation enacted by parliament. We are told today that parliament should now legislate retroactively to make the law for these recent years to have been what parliament a few years ago did not say it was, as now interpreted by the court, but what the administration apparently intended at that time parliament should say; whereas the courts have said parliament did not say that.

It is a monstrous thing, it seems to me, for the government to come along now and, simply because parliament did not legislate in the way in which the government hoped it would legislate at that time—in other words, the legislation that parliament adopted at that time did not have the effect the government thought the legislation was going to have—and after the courts have put their interpretation upon that legislation, say, "We are going to date the legislation we are passing today back to the origin of this period under discussion". It seems to me that there is involved here a principle of far-reaching importance. I do hope that parliament is not going to take a step here which could prove not only very unfair in these circumstances, but could prove for the future a precedent having very damaging and far-reaching effects.

What is so important about the proposal the government is making now, that parliament must act retroactively? We have not yet heard from the parliamentary assistant any adequate statement to justify legislation of a most exceptional nature, trespassing as it does upon things that are basic in our whole parliamentary system. He has given as his excuse this, and this only, that it was thought at the time the present legislation was enacted in partial implementation of the recommendations of the McDougall commission, that it would have the effect of making these companies taxable in this manner.

The courts have said that the legislation of parliament did not have that effect. And so far as the courts are concerned, and so far as the law of this land is concerned, it does not matter what is said in the House of Commons during the course of a debate. It does not matter what was said by the minister as to the government's intention. It does not matter what hon. members who spoke in the debate have said. It does not matter what was said by any members who spoke in that debate, so far as their contributions to the debate are concerned.

What does matter is what parliament said in the language of the law that was enacted. And the language of the law enacted has now been interpreted by the courts as not having the effect of making these companies taxable in this way. If there has been any omission, then it has been an omission on the part of parliament. The government does not have the right to interpret the intention of parliament. The courts are always right in insisting that parliament shall speak through only one voice, and that voice is to be found in the language of the legislation passed, not in the language of debate preceding the enactment of the legislation.

I urge the government before this goes one step farther to abandon a proposal that I think will have very damaging effects on something that is basic and fundamental in our whole parliamentary system. I urge that the retroactive features of this legislation be abandoned. Whatever is necessary in the way of legislation to take effect from the time of its enactment, or from the time of the introduction of the budget, we are here quite prepared to consider on its merits. But let us not have legislation which is going to impose retroactively a tax burden on companies going back over these recent years when the law had not yet placed that burden upon them. What right have we, sitting as legislators today in 1954, to go back and say to these companies that they shall not only be liable from 1954 on but that they shall be liable for the tax of 1953 that parliament did not apply in 1953, and that they shall be liable for the tax of 1952 that parliament did not apply in 1952, and that they should be liable for the tax in 1951 that parliament did not apply in 1951, and so on.

This is a vicious type of legislation, and I hope the House of Commons will have none of it.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I wish to add a word to what my hon. friend has said. First of all I would point out that it seems to me this is an especially unfortunate time to pass any legislation which could have the effect of raising objections in the United States, even though it is not of major importance. It seems to me that this might do us harm quite beyond the amount involved.

There is one other thing I wish to say which, it seems to me, goes along with what was said by the hon. member for Eglinton. If one looks carefully at the wording of paragraph 6 he will see that it is most extraordinary. What it says, in effect, is that what is not a profit is in fact a profit. Let me read the words which have been used to get away from the plain effect of the Stanley case. It says:

> For the taxation of a resident mutual insurance corporation other than a life insurance corporation, as though the surplus arising from its insurance activities on and after January 1, 1954 were a profit from a business.

I submit that that in itself betrays the weakness in the whole situation. The legislature really comes in and says that something the courts have considered is not a profit shall be turned into a profit, through the language used here in the words, "as though the surplus arising from its insurance activities . . . were a profit". That, it seems to me, underlies and strengthens what the hon. member for Eglinton has said. The circumstances are such that it seems to me to be one of the worst cases of applying a principle which is contrary to our whole legislative background.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, this matter is of sufficient importance that I suggest the parliamentary assistant should give us some assurance that the matter about which hon. members have been speaking is either not as it has been portrayed, or that he will take a further look at it.

If what the hon. member for Eglinton has said is true—and I have no reason to doubt it—it does seem that this would be a bad principle to have applied in other matters and to other people. For instance, if the courts in this country under legislation of this kind should find in favour of some person, then the government through action of the kind involved in this section could make it absolutely impossible for the judgment of the court to be effective.

I do not think that is right at all, and I would like to hear what justification for it the parliamentary assistant may have to offer.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be well to place on record, particularly for the hon. member for Peace River who has just spoken, the very clear indication of what was involved in the proposal for taxation of these mutual companies and co-operatives in 1946. What the minister said is to be found at page 4094 of the 1946 Hansard. While this is in no way a contradiction of what my hon. friend has said, I think it is most desirable that there be placed on the record what was said at that time by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming: That is still only what one minister said; it is not what parliament said.

Mr. Benidickson: It is the explanation given by the minister who was piloting the legislation in 1946. At that time the Minister of Finance said:

> The main proposals with respect to co-operatives are, as the committee knows, the repeal of the exempting section 4(p) and allowance of deduction for patronage dividends.

And then I shall leave out a sentence or two which, I assure hon. members, are not pertinent at the moment. Then he went on to say:

> That is to say, resolution 14 repeals the present provision exempting mutual insurance companies, while resolution 15 allows these companies a deduction from income on patronage dividends; that is to say, amounts returned to the policy holders. In effect, the companies will pay tax on the amount of profits retained by the company and transferred to general reserve which is free from the individual claims of policy holders.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is that what the act says now?

Mr. Benidickson: No, but since that time taxation has been paid on that basis.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): But the act does not say that?

Mr. Zaplitny: I think the parliamentary assistant has left something out. In the particular act to which he refers an exemption was not provided for the total amount of participation dividends paid out. There was a residue, I believe, of 3 per cent which was considered to be part of the reserve, regardless of the action of the co-operative itself. Therefore there is still a portion of that which is taxable under the act.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend is referring to co-operatives. I indicated there was some slight difference between mutual insurance companies and co-operatives.

Mr. Dinsdale: With regard to the point I raised a few moments ago, I believe that the four large western mutuals to which I referred, the Saskatchewan Co-operative, the Saskatchewan Mutual and the Portage and Wawanesa mutuals are taxed under the Excise Tax Act 2 per cent of their premium income, and they are the only four mutuals in the field who pay that special 2 per cent on their premium income, mainly because they do not come within the category of having more than 50 per cent of their business with farmers and the rural part of the population. If that is so, in the case of the tax on 2 per cent of the premium income, it would seem that they are not going to be covered by this amendment. When I spoke before I emphasized the principle that you cannot tax the underwriting gains of a mutual.

Like the hon. member for Eglinton, I think that this is a rather unfortunate, even if not a vicious, attempt to get around this principle. The eastern mutuals and similar mutuals operating in eastern Canada are already exempt from the 2 per cent premium excise tax. However, the four western mutuals are not. Is it because of their size? It is obvious, of course that the situation on the prairies, the situation in geography, and population, is somewhat different. Because of our scattered population and of great distances it was almost inevitable that prairie mutuals, the mutual type of fire and casualty company, would expand to include a larger number of members for each mutual firm. It is for that reason that I should like to know whether it is true that the companies not covered by the amendment would be the four western mutuals.

Mr. Benidickson: Of several hundred ostensible mutual companies, I cannot indicate which ones would come under this formula, but my hon. friend refers to a principle, and that of course is fundamental to this proposal. The location of the company does not matter, whether west or east. The principle, and it is an important one, is whether or not more than 50 per cent of the business is carried on with respect to farm properties, property used in fishing, or residences of farmers or fishermen. There is no discrimination either on grounds of size or of geography.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is one principle, a principle that was enunciated by the McDougall report, and which, incidentally, was ignored up until this amendment was introduced; but I think the basic principle for mutuals is that you cannot make a profit dealing with yourself. If you start taxing underwriting gains then you are invading that field. Such was the conclusion of the supreme court in the Stanley case.

Mr. Knowles: That is a very plausible statement that the parliamentary assistant made a moment ago when he said that it laid down a principle. You could lay down a principle that all members of parliament wearing bow ties would have to pay double taxation. The trouble is you might have looked around first to see who was wearing bow ties.

Mr. Low: Don't say that.

Mr. Knowles: I see we have another one now. Similarly, in this case, it is pretty generally known to all who are interested in this matter that the principle that has been enunciated in the amendment moved by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration does have a certain effect. If we are going to talk about principles, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has enunciated a more fundamental principle than the question as to where one draws the line. Drawing the line is comparable to the ridiculous principle I suggested about members who wear bow ties.

It does seem to me, even though I am not too familiar with the circumstances of the companies involved, that the hon. member for Eglinton has drawn attention to something that is being done here which could be rather vicious and far-reaching. The very language of the latter part of paragraph 6 of this resolution suggests the terrible things that the government might do if it wished to. I will put these words of the resolution on the record again:

—shall be deemed to be and always to have been subject to taxation on that basis.

My little suggestion a moment ago about bow ties was not ridiculous at all in the light of that kind of language. I recognize that this is the language of the resolution rather than the language of the bill, but I would hope that before the bill comes in very serious consideration would be given to this point, and we will not lay down as a precedent that we can decide that any company or taxpayer or person can now be regarded as always to have been taxed on a certain basis. That might call for taxing people long since dead.

Mr. Fleming: This resolution should not be allowed to pass in its present form. Unless the parliamentary assistant is prepared to drop the vicious words the committee should have the opportunity of saying whether it is prepared to give approval to the resolution which on the face of it proposes to apply taxation retroactively. The only thing we have heard from the parliamentary assistant to excuse or give extenuation to a vicious use of parliamentary power of this kind is that the Minister of Finance in a certain debate in 1946 said something as to the intended effect of the legislation that he was then introducing. The Minister of Finance is one person in this house. His statement as to the effect of any legislation under consideration is still not the law. Even though the law is enacted in the form in which the government introduces it, the meaning of it is still, in so far as the law is concerned, not what the government declares it to be; it is what the courts declare it to be. Here the courts have said, notwithstanding what was said by the Minister of Finance in 1946, or anyone else in that debate, or at any other time, that the legislation enacted by parliament in 1946 does not, and did not at any time, make these insurers taxable. And yet, in 1954, this house is being asked by the government to say, not simply that these companies are to be taxable from this point on in 1954 but that they are to be taxable as though this legislation had been passed in 1946, to make them taxable now where they were not up until now taxable in respect of their operations in 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950, 1951, 1952 and 1953.

Where is the justice, where is the equity in legislation of that kind? I ask hon. members opposite to weigh very carefully just what it is they are being asked to do here. They are being asked to say in terms of a legislative enactment in 1954 that what was not the law, what was not taxable at any time up until now, shall not merely be taxable from this point on, but shall be taxable for those years, 1946 to 1953, inclusive. Mr. Chairman, this is absolutely vicious, and I do urge that before this goes one stage further the government should not press it but reconsider the matter. It may be there is a matter of revenue involved here which the government hopes to have, but hopes are not enough, and it is not enough that the Minister of Finance said what the hopes were in 1946.

All that matters is what parliament said in that legislation. We have had an interpretation by the highest court in this land as to the meaning of what parliament said in legislative terms. Are we now going to change that retroactively to make taxable what is not taxable at the present time, and apply it to these seven intervening years? I hope that the government, Mr. Chairman, will not press this. I hope the parliamentary assistant will say that he is prepared either to stand this over for further consideration, or to abandon the retroactive features of the legislation.

I hope that this will not be passed even as a resolution, because I suggest that if it remains on the record of parliament as a resolution approved by the House of Commons then we will have a stain there which will disfigure the record of this parliament and which will constitute a dangerous precedent for the future.

I will ask the parliamentary assistant if he is prepared to allow this matter to stand for consideration. Otherwise I shall be obliged to move that these obnoxious words be stricken out. Is he in a position to give such an undertaking?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I am not always impressed by the many dangers the hon. member for Eglinton can see in legislation, but I believe that on this occasion he is perfectly right. I think it is preposterous that a resolution of this kind, after there has been a decision of the court deciding as it did decide, and regardless of what the court has said, is now submitted. Surely that is going beyond all reason. If we can do it with a resolution of this kind is there anything we cannot do and say regardless of what any court may have said hitherto in regard to any law? Are we to say that from now on this is the law?

It is ridiculous that these people should put language of that kind in a proposal of this kind. It makes a monkey of our courts of law and of their decisions. I suggest the parliamentary assistant should at least allow this matter to stand over until after the dinner recess and then perhaps the members of the government can talk it over and see if they have any change to propose.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, probably we can stand this over in view of the suggestions which have been made, and we can in the meantime deal with the resolution on customs.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the resolution with regard to income tax shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: We shall now deal with the resolution on the Customs Tariff.

Resolution stands.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. That schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by deleting therefrom the following enumeration of goods and rate of additional duty of customs: "Ale, beer, porter and stout, 40 cents per gallon." and by substituting therefor the following enumeration of goods and rate of additional duty of customs: "Ale, beer, porter and stout, 38 cents per gallon."

2. That schedule A to the Customs Tariff be further amended by striking out tariff items 187, 189, 263b, 290, 343, 345a, 352a, 353(a), (b), (c) (d), (e), (f), (g), (h) and (i), 402, 409c (1), 409e (1), 409f, 409m (1), 410f (1), 410o (i), 418, 426, 431h, 437, 440i, 442, 443b, 443d (1) and (2), 445r, 446k, 451, 453a, 476a, 480a, 499a, 535e, 561, 569d, 618b, (1) and (2), 660a, 696 (1), 696a, 703 (c), 704, 705a and 848 (2), the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this resolution with particular regard to the government failure to take into consideration the request for the need for relief to the farmers of this country. I wish to refer to one item in particular. It has been pretty difficult for me to understand why the Department of Finance has refused year after year to put farm wagons on the free list. As I understand it, farm wagons now come into Canada free under the British preferential tariff, but under the most-favoured-nation tariff, as for example from the United States, a duty of 15 per cent is assessed against them. The item in question is 439c which reads as follows:

Farm wagons, including four-wheeled wagons equipped to be tractor-drawn; farm sleds; logging wagons; logging sleds; and complete parts of all the foregoing.

I am advised that year after year the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has made representations to the Minister of Finance to have farm wagons put on the free list, but each time the request has been turned down. In the memorandum of suggested amendments to the Customs Tariff and Excise Tax Act presented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to the Minister of Finance on March 9 of this year, the federation made a submission with regard to farm wagons, trailers and sleds, and I would like to quote briefly from what they have to say as a background to my remarks. The memorandum stated:

In the general tariff reduction of August, 1944, when farm machinery and implements were freed from all customs duties no change was made in the duty on farm wagons and sleds.

That is item 439c.

The most-favoured-nation duty remained at 15 per cent ad valorem although at the same time the drawback on certain materials used in the manufacture of these items was raised from 80 to 99 per cent. The only change in tariff item 439(c) since 1946 was the amendment of June, 1948, which changed the item to include four-wheel farm wagons equipped to be tractor drawn.

In 1946 all materials and articles entering into the manufacture of farm wagons and sleds were placed on the free list.

That is under tariff item 442.

Farmers are making increasing use of two-wheel trailers drawn by tractors and motor cars for the purpose of transporting farm produce and supplies. At the present time these vehicles are dutiable under tariff item 439(b) at 10 per cent under British preference and 22½ per cent under GATT. In addition they are subject to the sales tax.

There are probably no farm implements more universally used by farmers than wagons, trailers and sleds. In view of the fact that the Canadian manufacturer can import free of duty all the materials necessary for the manufacture of wagons and sleds and some types of trailers, we cannot see any reason why they should be treated differently with respect to the tariff than all other farm machinery and implements.

And they continue:

We therefore request that tariff item 409(f) should be amended to include the following: "Farm wagons, including four-wheeled farm wagons equipped to be tractor drawn; farm sleds; two-wheel wagon trailers for farm use only;" Complementary to the foregoing amendment to tariff item 409(f) tariff item 439(c) would need to be amended to strike out the opening words as follows: "Farm wagons, including four-wheeled farm wagons equipped to be tractor drawn."

That is the end of the quotation from the submission made to the minister by the federation. Now the Department of Finance, I understand, has received the unqualified undertaking of at least one United States manufacturer of farm wagons that the Canadian farmer's price of its wagon would be immediately reduced by the amount of duty now paid if farm wagons were placed on the free list. Consequently a move of the kind that I have suggested would undoubtedly reduce the prices of all wagons all over Canada by the amount of the duty that is now being paid. I point out to the parliamentary assistant to the minister that there are not any more than two or three manufacturers of farm wagons of any importance in all of Canada. It is therefore difficult to escape the conclusion that the duty on the American import is for straight protection purposes.

The amount of the duty on a farm wagon brought in from the United States is about $20. The elimination of the duty which would be immediately reflected, as I have said, in the purchase price to the farmer, would represent a substantial saving to the farm purchaser. On the other hand, of course, if the matter is looked at from the standpoint of protection to the Canadian manufacturer, it is impossible for me at any rate to believe that the elimination of the duty and the consequent compulsory reduction in the Canadian price would force any of our Canadian manufacturers into bankruptcy or even into trouble.

In bringing down the budget in 1944 the minister of finance of that day, Mr. Ilsley, said this as reported at page 4184 of Hansard of that year:

With the same end in view, the government believes it appropriate to provide at once and without waiting for the completion of reciprocal arrangements with other countries for the removal of all customs duties on agricultural implements.

I draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant to those last words "the removal of all customs duties on agricultural implements". The policy declared by Mr. Ilsley in 1944 I think has been faithfully carried out by the government in most lines. That fact makes it all the more difficult to understand why this one remaining piece of farm machinery—the farm wagon—has remained dutiable. I think it could be safely said that it is the only important piece of farm machinery that is still required to pay duty.

It is sometimes difficult to say, of course, whether certain capital equipment used by the farmers can be classified as machines or implements. However, it seems clear to me, at any rate, that what Mr. Ilsley intended by his reference in the budget speech of 1944 was that all implements or instruments used by the farmers in the process of farm production should be duty free. I should therefore like to ask the minister to add the word "apparatus" to item 409f so as to make it read:

—and all other agricultural implements, apparatus or agricultural machinery n.o.p. and complete parts of all the foregoing . . . Free.

I think that would meet the situation perfectly satisfactorily, and it would make quite a difference to the farmers throughout western Canada particularly who buy so many of these wagons.

It might be argued that it is necessary to retain the 15 per cent tariff under the most-favoured-nation treatment in order to protect our Canadian producers. I should just like to draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant to two interesting publications. They are both put out by the dominion bureau of statistics and the Department of Trade and Commerce. I refer first to this one entitled "The Agricultural Implement Industry, 1952". On page B.5 there is a table showing the total production of various agricultural implements in Canada for the years 1951 and 1952. Those are the latest figures that I can get.

From the table I notice that for 1952 the production in Canada of farm wagon gears —that is standard ones—numbered 993 with a value of $142,324. That is all that we produced in Canada in that year. Going on to farm trucks, low-wheel type, steel or wood, we find that we did not produce any in Canada. Yet we sold that year in Canada 442 at a value of $54,852. When we come to the type called rubber-tired gears or trailers, which have become so important now to farmers fairly well all over Canada, here is what we find: Production in Canada in the year 1952 was 6,608 with a total value of $905,733. But the sales in Canada, I point out, amounted to 12,760 with a total value of $2,122.175. From those figures, Mr. Chairman, I point out that we could not possibly be doing the Canadian industry much if any harm by allowing these wagons and gears to come in from the United States duty free. If that were done it would be of tremendous help to the farmers of the country. I appeal to the minister to give the matter his earnest consideration.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder what your plans are as to discussing the detailed items in the schedule that is attached to this resolution? There are half a dozen of them about which I want to ask questions.

Mr. Benidickson: I think we might do as we did in connection with the income tax resolution. If there are some general observations to be made, I think the chairman might welcome them at this time, and then probably call the individual items in the customs schedule, one by one.

Mr. Knowles: Or page by page might be good enough.

The Chairman: I think perhaps it might be preferable to call the items page by page. So that there will be no misunderstanding, I may say that is merely for discussion purposes, not for the purpose of actually passing the items. Is that procedure agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Trainor: Mr. Chairman, may we call it six o'clock?

Mr. Fleming: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Chairman, may I ask if it is the intention of the parliamentary assistant to continue with the discussion of the Customs Tariff resolution at eight o'clock and to complete it before coming back to the income tax resolution?

Mr. Benidickson: I think that procedure would be preferable now that we are into customs matters.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were discussing the resolution on the Customs Tariff. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Knowles: Not yet, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I am sorry, but I understand the hon. member for Winnipeg South had the floor at six o'clock.

Mr. Trainor: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I wish to call the attention of the committee and the parliamentary assistant to what I consider to be an unfair imposition in the Customs Tariff against a class of handicapped individuals. I refer to the question of the customs duty on orthopedic shoes for children with club feet. I have already called this matter to the attention of the parliamentary assistant and the minister. The situation is approximately as follows: Children with club feet are treated by orthopedic surgeons by changing their shoes very frequently. If the shoes are custom-made they are duty free but if they are not custom-made they are subject to a duty.

In actual practice what happens is that the surgeon treating the child makes a tracing of the child's foot and sends that tracing to a firm of shoemakers in the United States who pick the appropriate shoe off the shelf and send it to the patient. That shoe is dutiable and it costs the parents of the child approximately $5 per shoe. You can imagine that these shoes have to be changed rather frequently, every two or three months, because the child's foot is growing rather rapidly. This, I submit, is really an imposition on the handicapped. It is not for the purpose of protecting the Canadian shoe industry because no shoe manufacturer in Canada is prepared to provide this type of shoe.

I submit that this is very unfair to a group of children who are physically handicapped and particularly to their parents. I would suggest that if the Minister of Finance is so desperately hard up for revenue that he must impose his taxes on the lame, the halt and the blind perhaps hon. members might suggest other sources to him that he may have overlooked. Maybe we could start off by suggesting that he impose a customs tariff on white canes for the blind. I suggest that it would be a very gracious and appreciated gesture on the part of the government if they would forgo this tariff on the physically handicapped. It is purely a tariff for revenue and not for the protection of Canadian industry.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, as I indicated earlier, the remarks I intended to make were to be related to specific items, and it was my intention to deal with them as we came to them page by page. However, in view of the appeal which the hon. member for Winnipeg South has made, and which I am very happy to support, perhaps I might now refer to one of the items I had in mind because it is in the same category. I refer to item 480a which deals with invalid chairs. The item is spelled out in the schedule. It is a lengthy one with certain details into which I need not go at this time. It does seem to me that the government, having gone some distance in relieving invalid chairs from customs duties, should go the whole way. I need not go into it further because the arguments the hon. member for Winnipeg South has made with respect to orthopedic shoes and to other items that are needed by invalids and cripples apply in this case as well. I hope that even yet invalid chairs may be made free of customs duty as well as these other items.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if he is going to make a reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg South on the question raised by him? It does seem to me prima facie a very strong case and the amount involved must surely be trivial.

Mr. Benidickson: I think that the amounts involved are probably trivial. The hon. member for Winnipeg South is referring to an item that he and I discussed and which appealed to me as something that should be looked into. I did so, and I found it required a fair amount of additional inquiry. The hon. member for Winnipeg South submitted a customs invoice to me, and I believe the pair of shoes involved was priced at $11.50. In these days that does not indicate a particularly high priced custom-made product. However, in view of the fact that these things are sometimes ordered by medical practitioners like my hon. friend, I assured him I shall continue to look into the matter.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Knowles: Are we now going on with the details?

The Chairman: Do I understand that we have completed the general discussion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Then I will call page 2. Are there any comments on page 2? I am sorry. Perhaps I should call it in this way. On my page 2 I have tariff items 12b to 402.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, your pagination is a little different from mine. With respect to item 402, I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant would make a comment? I ask him to bear in mind that this kind of wire fencing is largely a farm item, and I wonder whether the provision could not be extended to make it free of duty where it is for use on farms?

Mr. Benidickson: This is a reducing item. Due to the fact that in another tariff item there was the phrase "coated or not" there was some doubt whether materials of this category should be admitted under this item. We are just making it certain that where the word "coated" was in the wire will be admitted.

Mr. Knowles: That is, they will be admitted free under the British preferential tariff.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Benidickson: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: What about the most-favoured-nation tariff?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend is looking at the schedule and he will find a comparison between the proposed rate and the former rate.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps at this point the parliamentary assistant would explain something which would apply not only to this item but to other items as well. In the existing rates there are listed two figures, 12½ per cent and 20 per cent. Under the proposed rate there is just listed 12½ per cent. Perhaps he could explain that.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, hon. members will find that the Customs Tariff is not always all-embracing, and very frequently you will find the phrase "not otherwise provided." In the righthand side of the proposed changes in the budget resolution, you will sometimes find the alternative. Usually you will find that we are going from the "not otherwise provided" to a lower tariff rate. Some of these woven or welded wire fencings may have been assessed at 20 per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff rate and will henceforth pay on the basis of 12½ per cent.

Mr. Harkness: This was an item that caught my attention, and the parliamentary assistant has not answered a question that was asked as to why this wire, which is almost entirely used for agricultural purposes, should not be on the free list along with some other items of agricultural equipment. There may be some of this welded wire which is used for protecting factories or something of that sort. If that is the case, I would think it is quite possible to break this item down into two items, one the ordinary type or what is generally called Page wire, from the original manufacturers, I assume, which is almost entirely used for farm purposes, and this other wire that is used to protect factory yards and things of that sort.

Mr. Benidickson: I recall my hon. friend's participation in the debate last year, particularly on the general item 409 in the Customs Tariff. It was explained that there are a number of items that can be used equally well in agriculture as in other fields. Generally, we try to spell these things out specifically.

Mr. Harkness: Apparently there is no effort to spell them out in this case, and that is my complaint. Why could not the items which are really agricultural items be separated from the ones relating to factory protection?

Mr. Benidickson: I think from reading the item my hon. friend will find that generally, in so far as the products are concerned that are subject to this change, they would not be used on the farms.

The Chairman: Does that complete the discussion on page 9? We shall proceed to page 10, comprising items 409c, e, f, and m.

Mr. Zaplitny: I find that my pages do not correspond to the ones from which you are reading because I am looking at Hansard.

The Chairman: I am now reading the items as they appear in the pamphlet copy of the ways and means resolutions.

Mr. Zaplitny: I should like to refer back to the question raised by the hon. member for Peace River in connection with agricultural apparatus. He specifically mentioned farm wagons. He suggested an amendment which I believe would meet the situation if the word "apparatus" were inserted, and in my opinion it would be better inserted after the word "agriculture" in the second last line of that item.

Mr. Benidickson: You are referring to item 409f?

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes. So, it would read, "and for all other agricultural apparatus and implements or agricultural machinery." I believe that would take care of a number of other smaller items along with such implements as farm wagons and farm sleds, about which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture made representations. I think that is the intention of parliament anyway, to place those things on the free list. I believe this would be the easiest way to do it, if that meets with the approval of the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend knows that all these matters are very intricate and involve our treaty arrangements with other countries. Prior to the summer of 1955 we will probably have a new agreement amongst a great number of our trading countries. In so far as the representations that were made by the hon. member for Peace River are concerned, I considered those over the dinner recess. I was informed that representations in this regard had come fairly late this year from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, I think some time in March. The reply given to the brief submitted by that federation was to the effect that these things would be considered and reported upon between now and the time it is necessary to consider our position in relation to the commonly called GATT agreement which comes up for review next autumn.

Mr. Zaplitny: Do I understand that there is something in this agreement that would prevent Canada from making this change in this particular item? I am afraid the reply was slightly vague on that point. Is there something specific in the agreement that would interfere with or be contrary to placing this item on the free list?

Mr. Benidickson: These are general things, Mr. Chairman, and I believe the hon. member for Peace River referred to wagons. He mentioned there was a reference to them in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture brief. The hon. member will understand that all these things have a general relationship to the total value of trade between one country and another. I can assure him that this will be considered in the next few months.

The Chairman: Shall we now pass on to the discussion of page 11, comprising items 410f, 410o, 418, 418a, 426, 427k, 428i?

Mr. Knowles: Under item 426, could the parliamentary assistant explain the difference between ozone generators and ozone airifiers?

Mr. Benidickson: The word "ozone", Mr. Chairman, is now inserted before the word "airifiers" in order to facilitate the administration in carrying out the original intention of the item. Various types of humidifiers and air conditioners were being claimed as entitled to entry as airifiers.

The Chairman: If we have completed discussion of the items on page 11, we will turn to page 12, and consider items 431h, 437, 437a, 437b, 440i, 441g, 442, 443b. The last of these deals with oven thermostats, automatic oven lighters and dual valves, for use in the manufacture of apparatus designed for cooking with gas.

Mr. Harkness: With respect to this last item which deals with oven thermostats and automatic oven lighters I would point out that this, and the next item, deal with a matter discussed two or three years ago. At that time it was my contention that people who used gas for cooking were being discriminated against, so far as the tariffs charged for gas oven thermostats, controls and that sort of thing were concerned. I notice that in the next item a number of things have been added, and that there are now on the free and the 5 per cent list a number of items which were not on it before. I am glad to see that.

My only comment would be that it has come about three years too late. However I am glad it is now being done. Referring particularly to item 443b, may I say that I cannot understand why it appears here at all, because the rates are exactly the same as under the old item. These rates are free, 10 per cent and 30 per cent. What is the purpose of having this item in the schedule?

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps hon. members would consider item 443b and 443d at the same time. I propose to ask the Minister of National Revenue to move an amendment to the proposals in 443d (1) and 443d (2).

I recall that last year the hon. member for Calgary North referred to this item. I think he will find an expansion in the description of gas-operated apparatus that can be included in this category. If the committee is considering both items at the same time I would remind hon. member that there is a wider application in that this time we are considering apparatus for heating water or for refrigeration or in the gas line between apparatus of this kind and the consumer's gas storage device.

Mr. Harkness: I was glad to see that these other devices, the inclusion of which had been asked for in previous years, have now been included. But I still do not understand why item 443b is in at all. What is the change made to bring about its inclusion?

Mr. Benidickson: There is no change. Item 443b is in the budget resolutions because we are deleting the phrase "gas pressure regulators" which from now on will be in 443d.

Mr. Harkness: What does the parliamentary assistant mean when he refers to a gas pressure regulator? Probably it is another name for something with which we are familiar.

Mr. Benidickson: Some of the previous wording in 443b has been deleted. The hon. member will recall the debate last year with reference to thermostats.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I was coming to that.

Mr. Benidickson: They will be brought into this section. I would ask the Minister of National Revenue to move this amendment.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That schedule A to the Customs Tariff be further amended by striking out tariff item 443d and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Item 443d (1) Gas control devices, n.o.p., of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use on, or for the manufacture or repair of, or for conversion to, gas-fired apparatus for cooking, or for heating buildings, or for heating water, or for refrigeration; including such devices when for use in the gas line between such apparatus and the meter, or in the gas line between such apparatus and the consumer's gas storage device; parts of the foregoing; British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

443d(2)—Gas pressure regulators for use on, or for the manufacture or repair of, or for the conversion to, gas-fired apparatus for cooking, or for heating buildings, or for heating water, or for refrigeration; including such devices when for use in the gas line between such apparatus and the meter, or in the gas line between such apparatus and the consumer's gas storage device; and parts thereof;

(a) When of a class or kind not made in Canada; British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

(b) When of a class or kind made in Canada; British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent."

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps I should make an explanation on this item because it is an amendment to the original budget resolutions. As a result of representations by Canadian manufacturers since the budget was brought down it is now proposed by this amendment not to lower the duty on gas-control devices of a class or kind made in Canada. I can assure the committee however that no tariff increase is involved in this amendment as compared with former rates.

Mr. Harkness: Would the parliamentary assistant explain the difference between the devices mentioned in 443d (1) and 443d (2). One of these refers to "gas control devices", and the other to "gas pressure regulators". They are both for the repair of or the conversion to gas-fired apparatus for cooking, or for heating buildings, or heating water. In one instance the duty will be 7½ per cent under the most-favoured-nation rate, while in the other, if made in Canada, it will be 10 per cent, and 5 per cent if not made in Canada. What is the distinction between these two types of devices?

Mr. Benidickson: The first item includes valves, gauges, thermostats and the like.

Mr. Harkness: What would the second item be, then, if one is gas control devices for use on cooking apparatus—

Mr. Benidickson: If they are not made in Canada.

Mr. Harkness: No. I do not think that is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: The second one is a form of automatic safety device which has a control.

Mr. Harkness: Does the parliamentary assistant mean by that that these are also a form of thermostat, or are they not thermostats? Are they some other type of thing altogether?

Mr. Benidickson: I understand they are not a form of thermostat.

Mrs. Fairclough: Do I understand that valves, gauges and thermostats are not made in Canada? There is no company in Canada making these devices?

Mr. Benidickson: Would my hon. friend repeat the question?

Mrs. Fairclough: Do I understand that the items covered by 443d (1), which the parliamentary assistant has described as valves, gauges and thermostats, are not made in Canada by any company; that no company in Canada is making these devices?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes; that is one of the reasons why we have slightly amended the original budget proposal.

Mrs. Fairclough: There is no company making them?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes; that is why we have added paragraphs (a) and (b) to make a difference in the tariff rate between the products made in Canada and those not made in Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes; 443d (1) does not change the tariff rate at all from that contained in the resolution; it is only the description that is changed.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, but the important words are: "of a class or kind not made in Canada."

Mrs. Fairclough: In the first part?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, in 443d (1).

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: Of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: But in 443d, in the original resolution, there are two different classifications as follows: "When of a class or kind not made in Canada" and "when of a class or kind made in Canada."

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, but this is a proposal to amend it.

Mr. Harkness: As I understand it then, 443d (1) is intended to keep in effect the tariff rates which have been in effect rather than reducing them to 5 per cent of the most-favoured-nation tariff from the 7½ per cent, as was done in the original 443d?

Mr. Benidickson: In so far as the products are concerned that are made in Canada, yes.

Mr. Harkness: Well, no, "of a class or kind not made in Canada" is the way in which the thing is headed right at the top. It applies only to a class or kind not made in Canada, and the 7½ per cent, which was in effect right through is being maintained; whereas in the budget resolutions as we originally got them they were going to be reduced to 5 per cent from 7½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: In the budget resolutions the hon. member will find that we have proposed to lower the duty on some of these devices, including those made in Canada. The purpose of this amendment is to differentiate and spell out the difference between those made in Canada and those not made in Canada.

Mr. Harkness: It would seem to me that this is a return to the sort of thing that we objected to last year and in previous years. In other words, these items in 443d (1) are the thermostats of various kinds that are used on ovens for cooking and furnaces to heat houses and hot water heaters and things of that sort. In other words, they are devices in common use in large numbers by the general population who make use of gas for cooking and heating. The proposal was to reduce the most-favoured-nation tariff from 7½ per cent to 5 per cent, but now that is being deleted and it is going to be left at the 7½ per cent after this change is made. In other words, it is moving backwards instead of forwards, in my view.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not entirely agree with my hon. friend on this point. I told him there was no increase in duty, and I pointed out to him—

Mr. Knowles: It depends on where you start from.

Mr. Benidickson: Last year's shall we say.

Mr. Knowles: Starting from the moment before the amendment was introduced tonight by the Minister of National Revenue, there is an increase.

Mr. Benidickson: There is a difference there, yes, but starting from last year—and I recall my hon. friend's participation in that debate—I want to assure him that there is a widening here for a greater number of devices that are used in the ordinary sense on domestic usage.

Mr. Harkness: I agree with the parliamentary assistant that there is no increase in duty as from last year, but the thing that I have been complaining about right along is that the decrease in duty which was originally proposed in this budget resolution is being forgotten, and the duty, instead of coming down, is going to remain what it was last year.

Mr. McCann: The item is broken down and on part of it the duty remains the same.

Mr. Harkness: The point I was making is that the very item on which the duty should come down, and which we have been urging for two or three years it should come down, namely, the thermostats which are used in large numbers by the housewife, consumers of this country, on ovens, furnaces, and water heaters, is the very one which is not coming down. On those regulators, which I presume would be mostly used by gas companies and people of that sort so far as getting the gas from the main into the consumer's house is concerned, the duty is coming down; but the ones that the ordinary taxpayers are interested in are the very ones on which the duty is not coming down; it has been left the way it was.

Mr. Benidickson: Certainly, gas pressure regulators not made in Canada are being reduced by this budget.

Mr. Harkness: It is not gas pressure regulators I am talking about; it is the thermostats that are put down here as gas control devices under 443d (1).

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether I am correct in assuming that the first half of the original 443d is covered in 443d (2), because some of these items are made in Canada, and some not; whereas the second half of 443d is now 443d (1), because none of these items are made in Canada? Is that correct?

Mr. Benidickson: I can simply say that on these items in both sections that are not made in Canada the duty is not being reduced.

Mrs. Fairclough: It looks like that now that I have had the opportunity of looking it over. It looks as though you have split the resolution in two. The second half of the original resolution is now covered in 443d (1) and the first half in 443d. The items covered by 443d (1) are not manufactured in Canada. Therefore the second rate does not apply.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether the items referred to in 443d (1) as set out in the amendment have been coming in from the United States at 5 per cent since April 6?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, if they have been ruled as not made in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, as compared with the rate from April 6 down to today an increase is now being proposed?

Mr. Harkness: In connection with this first item again, these gas control devices, thermostats for household use, if they are not made in Canada this applies only to them. Why is there any duty on them at all? Why not let them in free and thereby save the householder a certain amount of money?

Mr. Benidickson: They are free of course under the British preferential tariff.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: The point is that most of them do not come from Britain; most of them come from the United States or from other areas and they are charged a duty.

Mr. Knowles: The Liberals are putting up the tariffs, and the Tories are objecting!

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Harkness: No, I am waiting for an answer to the same question. Under 443d there is an item which says: "when of a class or kind not made in Canada". Why revise the most-favoured-nation tariff from 7½ per cent to 5 per cent if it is not made in the country? This is an item which is used almost exclusively in domestic cooking and house heating on the consumer level. Then, why raise the tariff?

Mr. Benidickson: Well, my hon. friend will recognize that these are all matters that are subject to review in the new negotiations we will have under way.

Mrs. Fairclough: But why the negotiations? These articles are not competing with any Canadian manufactured articles. My word, the government has been very reluctant to give any protection to Canadian industry when they did not really have to protect Canadian industry. Why not lower the tariff?

Mr. Benidickson: The seven and a half per cent is not a high rate of duty and my hon. friend is one of those who thinks that is a small level of protection.

Mrs. Fairclough: The parliamentary assistant does not have to tell me what I think.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, as I see it there is no question at all of protection on these particular articles. They are articles which are not made in Canada, nor in Great Britain, and I do not think they are made in any other country, because they do not use gas heating, and therefore the only effect of retaining this duty at 7½ per cent in this case, instead of reducing it to 5 per cent as was originally intended, is to cause the householder to pay more than he would otherwise for the installation of these devices. There cannot be any question of protection involved because it is only in the case of the devices not made in Canada that this applies. The only purpose I can see for retaining it would be for revenue purposes. If that is the government's answer then well and good, but the question of protection which has been raised by the parliamentary assistant has no bearing on this matter and it is the householder who is being penalized.

Mr. Benidickson: I think hon. members are overlooking the intent of this sub-item which is to reduce the effective tariff from 7½ per cent to 5 per cent on the items in this category which are not made in Canada.

Mr. Harkness: But, Mr. Chairman, that is the very point we have been over time and time again. It is not reducing but leaving the 7½ per cent as it is. The only thing which is being reduced is the tariff on such items as gas pressure regulators which, as far as I understand from what the parliamentary assistant said, are really installed by the gas company to ensure that when the gas reaches the house it remains at a constant pressure, but thermostats and things like that for which the householder has to pay are not being reduced.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, Mr. Chairman. Apparently the government first of all decided that they would reduce the tariff on these items from 7½ to 5 per cent and now they have changed their minds and decided to put it back to 7½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Just on part of them.

Mrs. Fairclough: But why? That is just the part I am talking about.

Mr. McCann: To induce people to make them in Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: But they are not being made here.

Mr. Benidickson: But we are doing this to induce people to make them in Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: But I would like an answer to this, Mr. Chairman. First of all the parliamentary assistant said this item was not being made in Canada and now he says the tariff is being increased to induce people to make them in Canada. I would like to know what the position is.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, Mr. Chairman, let us have an answer.

Mr. Knowles: While we are waiting for an answer I would like to make a brief comment on this, but first of all I cannot help wondering who are the protectionists in this house.

Mr. Harkness: There is no question of protection involved.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the parliamentary assistant who asked the government to raise the tariff on these gas control devices when they are imported from the United States from the figure of 5 per cent, which has been in effect since April 6, to the figure of 7½ per cent now proposed.

Mr. Benidickson: There is no increase in the rate here, Mr. Chairman, compared with last year.

Mr. Knowles: I recognize that but there is an increase in the rate compared with what has been in effect from April 6 down to the present time. Despite the fact that this is a rather complicated piece of paper to put in front of us we know what is going on. In 443d as proposed by the Minister of Finance on April 6 there were certain reductions made, generally speaking, in respect of two groups of devices, namely gas control devices and the gas pressure regulators. Now an amendment separates these two groups into two separate tariff items. The group under the general heading of gas pressure regulators stays as it was established by the Minister of Finance in his resolution of April 6. The other group, gas control devices, has been put back to what it was prior to April 6. In that case, where they are imported from the United States, the tariff, which was 7½ per cent prior to April 6, has been 5 per cent from April 6 down to today and is now being raised to 7½ per cent. My question is, who has asked for this increase from 5 per cent, as it has been since April 6, to 7½ per cent from now on?

Mr. Benidickson: We are now back to the rate of last year, Mr. Chairman.

Mrs. Fairclough: But why?

Mr. Knowles: I know, but why? I think I have described the matter as effectively as the parliamentary assistant but I am asking the question, who asked for it?

Mr. Philpott: He is making it as clear as mud.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Vancouver South is perfectly correct. He is making it as clear as mud.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, if the article is not made in Canada then hon. members by reading item 443d, paragraph 1, will realize that it is not of material consequence in this argument.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I disagree. I think the hon. member for Calgary North is right. It is of consequence to the people who use these devices if you are going to slap on another 2½ per cent, which is what the government is now doing. First of all the government decided they were going to reduce it from 7½ to 5 per cent. There is no competition with Canadian manufactured articles. Now for no reason that the parliamentary assistant has so far put forth it is being put back from the original 5 per cent to 7½ per cent. What we want to know is why. Give us a reason.

Mr. Benidickson: I find these pretty involved matters. There are some 900-odd items as hon. members know in this Customs Tariff schedule and they are usually divided into subheadings (a) (b) (c) (d) and so on, and I am informed that the point raised is not going to change the general effect of what is proposed. I would agree to the change to 5 per cent.

Mrs. Fairclough: In other words, you will put this back to 5 per cent again?

Mr. Benidickson: In so far as these things that are not made in Canada are concerned; yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: In any event, item 443d will now read "most-favoured-nation tariff, 5 per cent". Is that the case?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: We go along with that.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the Minister of National Revenue recommend that?

An hon. Member: Now you have it; now you don't.

The Chairman: Order. Do I understand that, by leave, the amendment proposed by the Minister of National Revenue in respect of item 443d(1) shall now read in part: "British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent"? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, could we carry the amendment as amended?

The Chairman: Is it the understanding that the amendment shall read in that way? Shall the amendment carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I am quite in agreement but do you realize what we have done? We have gone right back to the way it was originally.

Mr. Benidickson: No; because there is a division in the recitation of the description.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mrs. Fairclough: It means the same thing, does it not?

Mr. Benidickson: No; not so far as products are concerned that are not made in Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to try to argue on an item which was just handed to me and which is of a highly complicated nature. With this amendment taking the tariff back to 5 per cent I am quite satisfied.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Zaplitny: Before the amendment carries, may I say this. The question raised by the hon. member for Calgary North is an important one. It refers not only to this item but to all the other items with respect to which there is a tariff on goods of a class or kind not made in Canada. His question was this: If no element of protection is involved, what is the reason for the tariff at all on goods of a class or kind not made in Canada? If it is a matter for raising revenue, then of course it is an additional tax and we should be so informed. So far that question has not been answered. What is the purpose of the tariff on a class or kind of goods not made in Canada?

Mr. Benidickson: The answer is that it has some revenue value and also might encourage industry to produce this product in Canada.

Mr. Zaplitny: An additional tax.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we now proceed to a discussion of the items on page 14 consisting of—

Mr. Knowles: Before you leave that page I should like to ask a question.

The Chairman: On page 13?

Mr. Knowles: Yes. I should like to ask a question about item 440i. I notice that by this item the government proposes to make duty free, when they are used for the purposes of the government, flanged and dished steel boiler plate heads over five feet in diameter. I have no objection to these things being made free, but if the parliamentary assistant will refer to item 380c of the tariff schedule he will note that plates of iron or steel, hot or cold rolled, flanged, dished or curved, not otherwise provided, are dutiable at rates of 5 per cent, 22 per cent and 32 per cent. My question is this—

Mr. McCann: What number is that?

Mr. Knowles: Item 380c. I am comparing what is being provided under 440i in the resolution before us with what is in item 380c which is not before us.

Mr. McCann: In the tariff?

Mr. Knowles: That is right. My question is this. If these items are being made free of duty when they are imported for use by the government, why should not comparable items be made free of duty generally?

Mr. Benidickson: The proposed change here is because the articles in question are for government purposes for navigation.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Chairman, if we are going to have discussion on several items and are going to reconsider certain items, may I say that I have an item that I should like to have considered. It is in connection with item 446 but it is not item 446k which is mentioned here. Rather it is item 446a which is not in the budget resolutions that are being considered at the present time. This item has to do with—

The Chairman: Order. I do not believe we have reached that page yet.

Mr. Weir: I thought you were proceeding from items 443d right down the line.

The Chairman: Do I understand that discussion on page 13 has terminated?

Mr. Knowles: No. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa, but having regard to that page I must say that I do not think the parliamentary assistant answered my question. He just stated it over again. I recognize that these things are being made duty free when they are brought in for government use. All right. If they can be made free for government use, why could they not be made free for private use?

Mr. Benidickson: Free entry is for very restricted purposes for government purposes.

The Chairman: Have we completed our discussion on page 13?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall we then pass on to page 14 comprising items 443d, 445r, 446k, 451 and 453a?

Mr. Weir: Mr. Chairman, my reference is to item 446. It really has to do with item 446a which of course is not mentioned here but I think perhaps the point I have to make is applicable. It has to do with what they call an eviscerating machine for the purpose of assisting in the dressing of poultry. It is a new development largely completed in the United States and is dutiable in this country at 22½ per cent. Our poultry trade are conscious of a likely large production of poultry this year. They find that the poultry plucked and dressed with this new equipment from the United States is coming in, in competition with them in Canada. They feel that they should be entitled to whatever assistance can be given them by having this particular tariff item reduced so that they can get it, as the case would be, at 7½ per cent. I know there are some people who contend that the equipment is manufactured in Canada. May I say that it is a highly specialized type of equipment and has to do with all this fancy dressed poultry that we see on the market at the present time. While it is manufactured in Canada to a limited extent, my information is that it is not manufactured nearly to the extent that it is required at the present time, and that it is not as well made in Canada as it is in the United States. In other words, it is made for certain specialized classes of poultry but not for general use. That being the case, the trade feel that the Canadian manufacturer is not in a position to make this equipment in the quantities or of the efficiency that is required in the trade in order to compete with what is being done in the United States at the present time.

I confess that I have had long discussions with officers of the department as well as with the parliamentary assistant over this item and I am urging this request on him. I had hoped that something could be done this year in the budget resolutions with respect to the matter. I certainly think this is an item as to which we are justified in having a reduction made in the tariff. I hope the parliamentary assistant will keep that matter in mind and if it is possible to work anything in to bring about this added assistance, I hope what is requested will be done.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend brought this matter to the attention of the department but I think he will be the first to acknowledge that the industry itself was rather late, in so far as budget arrangements are concerned, in drawing this matter to our attention.

The Chairman: Have we completed discussion on page 14? If so we shall pass on to page 15, comprising items—

Mr. Lennard: No. What is the number of the item that has just been discussed? Is it item 446k?

Mr. Weir: The item I had in mind was 446a.

Mr. McCann: It is not in there at all.

Mr. Benidickson: It is not there.

The Chairman: I understood the hon. member was discussing 446k. Is there any further discussion on page 14?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, the last item, 561. This is another case where there appears to be no change whatever between the old tariff and the proposed tariff. It is exactly the same but there is a little note underneath which reads "woven fabrics containing 5 per cent or less, by weight, of synthetic textile fibres", and the word "fibres" is in a different kind of type. Therefore I presume that has been inserted and that is the only reason why this item is there. Would the parliamentary assistant tell us what the significance of the addition of the word "fibres" is?

Mr. Benidickson: I am informed that it is advisable that there be a substitution of the word "fibres" for the word "yarn" simply as a matter of trade practice.

Mr. Harkness: The word "fibres" instead of "yarn"?

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct.

Mr. Harkness: That is the only reason for this item being here?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: With respect to item 480a, may I ask the parliamentary assistant to comment on the few words I said with regard to this item when we were at the general discussion stage. I note by comparing the figures on the righthand side of the page with those in the middle that there has been a move in the direction of reducing the tariff on invalid chairs. Would this not be a good item to make free right across the board?

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think my hon. friend expects me to comment on the latter part of his remarks, but I do want to explain to him that due to the change it is now possible to bring in certain accessories of these chairs, and certain other parts thereof are made in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Am I correct in reading this as meaning that there has been some reduction? In other words, it formerly read "British preferential tariff, free", and then 15 per cent which is now free, and that that is a reduction right across the board?

Mr. Benidickson: A reduction across with respect to the items in italics.

Mr. Knowles: And the same answer the parliamentary assistant has just given applies to the 10 per cent and 25 per cent in the middle column which comes down to 10 per cent?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, that is right.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Knowles: And the same with respect to the general tariff. If I cannot get a comment out of the parliamentary assistant I will certainly make my own. It does seem to me that invalid chairs should not be subject to duty. It is a crying shame that we have as many taxes as this government has imposed on the cost of being ill or being an invalid or a cripple or handicapped in any way. It does seem to me it is a duty that ought to be removed.

Mr. Trainor: This item seems to be related to the one I raised some time ago. I must say that the parliamentary assistant has not yet given me a satisfactory answer as to just why the government proposes to tax crippled children with respect to orthopedic shoes, and I should like to know why. It must be solely the question of revenue. Consequently it is a tax. Would the parliamentary assistant be good enough to give me an answer to that question?

Mr. Benidickson: Both the former item referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg South and this item are free if purchased in Great Britain, but it is true that there are certain low levels of tariff for revenue purposes.

Mr. Trainor: Does the parliamentary assistant know that these shoes are available in Britain? I do not know that they are available under the same easy circumstances, so far as the doctor is concerned, as they are from the United States. It is a very simple matter to bring them in from the United States. They are freely available there in every conceivable size. If this is purely for revenue then it is a tax on crippled children, and I wonder whether the government is prepared to concede as a principle that they will tax crippled children. It is just as plain as that.

Mr. Benidickson: I think my hon. friend is stretching the language a little bit because he knows that I indicated an interest in this particular item and drew it to the attention of the Minister of Finance, although rather late so far as the budget discussions are concerned. I assured him that it would have continued interest.

Mr. Trainor: That is why it is inconceivable to me that in these circumstances consideration should not have been given to this before now.

The Chairman: Shall we now pass on to page 16 which includes items 569d, 579, 618b and 660a?

Mr. Benidickson: I should like to propose an amendment with respect to item 579.

Mr. Knowles: Which way, up or down?

Mr. Benidickson: I think that the Minister of National Revenue will propose this amendment.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That the words "the component of chief value being wool" be deleted from subitem (2) of item 579, and that the following words be inserted in lieu thereof:

the component of chief value being woven wool fabric weighing over twenty-five ounces per square yard."

Mr. Knowles: Could we be informed as to the effect of this amendment?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend asked whether it is up or down. This is in effect a lowering of the tariff.

Mr. Knowles: Would the parliamentary assistant explain it? Obviously there is no change in the rates, but since the rates under 579 (2) are a little lower than the rates under 579 (1) that means that we are interested in the definition of 579 (2). Item 579 (2) provides lower rates and therefore I should like to know whether this change in definition brings more articles under 579 (2) or limits the number of articles that come under 579 (2).

Mr. Benidickson: I think it brings fewer articles under it. The real point of this item is that it is one of those cases where the attachments or parts that go into the machines were assessed at the rate of the primary machine.

Mr. Knowles: Taking the parliamentary assistant's own words, if this brings fewer articles under the definition to which is attached the lower rates, where are the other articles? They must be under some other definition to which is attached a higher rate. This is typical of the way these tariff items work.

Mr. Benidickson: This is an item connected with wool fabric used for special buffing purposes, and it is required in an industry where buffing is required, I think it is the steel cutlery industry. This is a concession to that industry to enable them to bring in this specific type of woollen fabric at a lower rate of duty than heretofore.

Mr. Macdonnell: Just as a piece of education in tariff making, could the parliamentary assistant tell us why there is a difference between the 25 per cent in item 579 (1) and the 10 per cent in 579 (2)?

Mr. Benidickson: Based on the question of whether or not it is a fabric that is made in Canada or not made in Canada.

Mr. Harkness: Referring to item 569 (1) and (2)—

The Chairman: I wonder if I perhaps should complete item 579 before the hon. member proceeds to another item? Shall the amendment proposed by the Minister of National Revenue to item 579 carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Harkness: This item 569d (1) and (2) refers to materials for making men's hats, particularly the bands which go around the outside of the hat and to some extent the ribbon that is used around the outside edge of the hat to give it a bound edge. The effect of the two items is to put all this material on the free list, no matter from where it comes. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether any of this ribbon is manufactured in Canada?

Mr. Benidickson: I am not aware that there is, and the only difference in this item, as I recall it, is the question of the measurement of the band. I believe there is a change in the stipulation from two inches to three inches.

Mr. Harkness: Well, it is more than that, Mr. Chairman, because under the old tariff the rate of duty varied from 3 to 22·5 per cent under the British preferential rate and from 3 to 25 per cent under the most-favoured-nation rate, and from 3 to 35 per cent under the general tariff. Now, it is all free. I raise the question particularly in view of a previous item we were discussing where there was nobody to be protected, and still the duty was not removed. I am wondering whether in this case there were people to be protected, and the duty had been removed and the material put on the free list.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, but as I indicated under the former provision we had free entry if the hat band was two inches in width. If it were greater then the second line in the schedule to which my hon. friend referred would have applied. Now, they will be all on the free list.

Mr. Harkness: The width has been increased from two inches to three inches and the 22·5 per cent, the 25 per cent and the 35 per cent duties have been removed, so far as I can see. I still come back to my first question, as to whether any of this ribbon is manufactured in Canada?

Mr. Benidickson: No.

Mr. McCann: There is only $10,000 worth imported in a year.

Mr. Harkness: On this same page there is item 618b, tires and tubes, wholly or in part of rubber. Paragraph 1 of that item relates to the various types of agricultural equipment. Do all these various tariff items which were mentioned concerning agricultural implements take in all the agricultural implements that have rubber tires?

Mr. Benidickson: I believe the only change of significance in this item, Mr. Chairman, is that the word "equipment" is being substituted for the word "replacement". The change is made in order to facilitate administration. Hon. members will recognize that the word "replacement" was rather restricted and we are widening it to "equipment" generally.

Mr. Harkness: I am correct, am I not, in understanding that the item relates to any tires and tubes imported into the country for use on agricultural machinery, and that they come in duty free?

Mr. Benidickson: In a general way so far as this item is concerned. I assure my hon. friend that this is a widening for the agricultural community.

Mr. Harkness: I would hope it might be a widening. I wondered whether these various items mentioned, 409b, 409c, 409d, and so on covered all the agricultural equipment that normally runs on rubber tires?

Mr. Benidickson: Generally speaking, yes.

Mr. Harkness: Then we come down to paragraph 2 of this item, n.o.p.; does that relate to tires and tubes other than for use on agricultural machinery, that is for automobiles and so on?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

The Chairman: Shall we now pass on to page 17 comprising items 696, 696a and 703?

Mr. Knowles: May I comment on item 696a? Obviously, there is no change in the rate of duty here because it is free across the board. The change is in the wording of the description of the item. The first part of it reads:

> Moving picture films, sound or silent, separate sound film track, slides and slide films, positive or negative; sound discs, records and transcriptions; models, static and moving; wall charts, maps and posters; when certified by a recognized representative authority of the government of Canada—

Those last words are the words that have been added. Can the parliamentary assistant say who is or who will be the recognized representative authority of the government of Canada for purposes of passing on these items?

Mr. Benidickson: This provides an alternative certification in so far as Canada is concerned, in the absence of certification on the part of the exporting country. Until this legislation is passed there is no one, but I would imagine it would be the national film board.

Mr. Macdonnell: What is the significance of the word "certified"? Certified to be what?

Mr. McCann: They used to have to be certified by the United States but they have discontinued that.

Mr. Benidickson: The United States has shown some reluctance to perform this function, and therefore the importing country should probably have something of its own.

Mr. Knowles: Whenever the necessity arises the agency likely to speak for the government of Canada in this connection will be the national film board?

Mr. Benidickson: It is likely.

The Chairman: Shall we pass on to page 18?

Mr. Macdonnell: I may be dense, but I still do not quite understand what it is that is certified. Certified to be what?

Mr. Benidickson: Certified for a lower rate of duty.

The Chairman: We shall turn to page 18, items 704 and 705a.

Mr. Harkness: Item 705a relates to settlers' effects. Is it restrictive or is it a broadening in setting the value of $2,500 on a car for which duty does not have to be paid? If the automobile is valued at more than that, the duty has to be paid.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a broadening, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Harkness: What was it before?

Mr. Benidickson: It was $1,500.

The Chairman: On page 19, we find items 708b and 848.

Mr. Pearkes: Under item 708b do the goods to be exchanged have to be from the same country? If goods are sent to us, we will say from France, do the goods coming back have to be from France?

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend, I know, is interested in defence matters. In recent years, under NATO and other arrangements, there have been certain exchanges of goods. Some of those have been gifts. Some have been subject to certain accounting. Sometimes the recipient country is loath to see added the value of the goods sales taxes or import duties. This is a forsaking of that principle.

Mr. Pearkes: In other words it would have to be a direct exchange between country and country—not a three-way exchange?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

The Chairman: Then, have we completed the discussion of page 19?

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of National Revenue has an amendment to move to item 710 (b).

Mr. Knowles: It is not included in the schedule.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That schedule A to the Customs Tariff be further amended by adding the following paragraph to item 710(b):

"If, in the case of sales of like goods by the exporter in the ordinary course of trade in the country of export, the value of the usual coverings is included in the invoice value of the goods they contain, then for the purposes of this item the value of the usual coverings shall be added to and be deemed to be included in the invoice value of the goods they contain and be deemed not to be charged separately on the invoice;"

That refers to the packaging.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps I should make an explanation. Item 710(b) is being changed to make clear that when goods are normally sold in the country of export as a package, the coverings of these goods are dutiable under 710(c). The House of Commons will recall that sales and excise tax laws were changed by us last week to require the payment of taxes on the packaging of goods subject to these taxes, whether the goods are imported or manufactured in Canada. This is a corresponding change in the tariff.

Recently some exporters abroad have been invoicing such goods as, for instance, chocolate confectionery, canned soups, lubricating oils and perfumes in small bottles, with the value of the containers shown separately from the value of the goods, thus taking advantage of the low rate on containers under item 710(b).

This is considered an abuse which was not foreseen when item 710(b) was drafted. The amendment will make it clear that tin cans, for instance, containing soup, and other such containers, are clearly dutiable at the same rate as the goods they contain, as provided under item 710 (c), if that is the prevailing practice in the country of export.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the actual material placed around the tin cans or the bottles still taxable?

Mr. Benidickson: If shown separately, hitherto it has been taxed at 7½ per cent.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of procedure does this not have to be treated as a new item to be inserted in the resolution before us? The schedule does not contain any reference to item 710.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend is correct; but he knows a decision has been in operation for some years to the effect that this is a resolution, as a whole. I do not want to remind him of any specific instance, but this is not new. Last year his leader made inquiry about a certain item, and an amendment similar to this was made.

Mr. Knowles: I think the parliamentary assistant misunderstood me. I am not objecting to the item, but I do say that there should be an amendment to the schedule, not an amendment to item 710(b), because that item is not before us.

Mr. Benidickson: I suggest we are considering the schedule as a whole. The proposal advanced by the Minister of National Revenue is a specific amendment to the schedule, namely a change in item 710(b).

Mr. Macdonnell: The point the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is making is that so far as we are concerned item 710(b) is not before us. Would it not be sensible to have a substantive motion putting it in the schedule? We cannot deal with something that is not there.

Mr. Benidickson: Did not my hon. friend receive the usual written notice that is given to hon. members?

Mr. Knowles: What is before us is not the whole schedule to the Customs Tariff. What is before us is the schedule the Minister of Finance put on Hansard on April 6. All I suggest is that the item the Minister of National Revenue wants to have inserted as 710(b) should be put in this schedule between two items we have in it, namely item 708b and 848.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member will recall that we had a discussion on this very point before any of these resolutions were discussed, and we decided as a result of the precedent established in 1951 that we were dealing in these matters with, shall we say, a resolution in chief.

Mr. Knowles: All right; how do we amend the resolution in chief?

The Chairman: May I point out that the resolution provides for the striking out of certain tariff items and the insertion of others in their place. While this discussion has been taking place I notice that item 579 is to be inserted in the schedule but that it does not appear in the resolution. I was wondering if the parliamentary assistant considers it should be added, and if he has considered the proper course to take with regard to the amendment now offered by the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I would read what I have described as the resolution in chief, which is now before the committee. It reads, in part:

> Resolved, that schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by deleting therefrom the following enumeration of goods and rate of additional duty of customs—

And so on. I submit that this is not an unusual amendment. I do of course refer to the fact that last year the same thing was done, and I believe a record of it will be found at page 3092 of Hansard for March 19, 1953. The item in which my hon. friend's leader was interested at that time was 409(f).

Mrs. Fairclough: I must admit there is something to be said for changing the wording of this resolution. Inasmuch as there is no 710 (b) in schedule A it seems to me you can scarcely amend it by adding to an item that is not there. Therefore, it would seem to me it would be sensible if the resolution read that schedule A of the items be further amended by inserting the following paragraph between 708 (b) and 848. It is really an addition to schedule A; it is not a case of amending a paragraph that is already there.

Mr. Benidickson: I think my hon. friend would like some illustration of what is involved in this proposal. We have received certain representations from the Canadian Horticultural Council. For instance, they pointed out that as a result of a recent decision by the tariff board, I think prior to Christmas of last year—

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Benidickson: I will come to my hon. friend's point. They pointed out that as a result of a recent decision by the tariff board, an item like lettuce, shall we say, is normally sold in the United States in crates, and the exporter proposes that by taking advantage of tariff item 710 (b) they might invoice the lettuce and the crates separately. There is a difference in rates. I think the rate in the case of the produce will be 10 per cent, and the rate in the case of the packaging will be 7½ per cent. There are other illustrations. I do not think any hon. member would think that we would want to have in our schedules a wording that would provide, let us say, an import rate on canned soup that was considerably less for the can than for the soup, particularly if tin cans brought in separately had a high rate of duty. That is the purpose of the amendment. I think generally I answered my hon. friend's question when I pointed out that this was not an unusual amendment to a schedule in the Customs Tariff.

[The Chairman.]

Mrs. Fairclough: No one is arguing that the content of the amendment is not all right; we all agree with it. After all, I suppose we might as well save our breath because it is the parliamentary assistant's worry whether the thing is worded properly. I am merely pointing out that it seems foolish to amend a paragraph that is not in the schedule to begin with. It is merely the wording of the preamble.

Mr. Benidickson: We are amending an item that is referred to in the schedule.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister says he is amending by adding the following paragraph to item 710 (b). Item 710 (b) is not in schedule A.

Mr. McCann: It is in the Customs Tariff.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is not in these resolutions.

Mr. McIlraith: It is in the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Macdonnell: We are not dealing with the Customs Tariff.

Mr. McIlraith: We are amending a resolution which amends the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Benidickson: The first words of the Minister of National Revenue were:

> I move that schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Let us amend the Post Office Act while we are at it. It is not before us either.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: What page are you on now, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: We are on page 20 comprising items 1044 and 1052.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute; I want to go back to something before we deal with this. I want to go back to item 848 (3) and ask the parliamentary assistant what is a seamless, lapwelded and electric welded iron or steel casing, tube and drill pipe, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and what is a seamless, lapwelded and electric welded iron or steel casing, tubing and drill pipe, of a class or kind made in Canada?

Mr. Benidickson: Before we come to the answer to that question may I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he will move an amendment to item 848 (2)?

Mr. McCann: I move:

That the words "machinery and apparatus and parts thereof (including motive power)" be deleted from sub-item (2) of item 848, and the following words be inserted in lieu thereof:

"Machinery and apparatus and parts thereof (including motive power) of a class or kind not made in Canada."

Mr. Benidickson: It has been found that some sizes are made in Canada, but generally this is a lowering of duty from prevailing rates. There are no increases.

Mr. Knowles: Do I understand from what the parliamentary assistant says that the distinction between class or kind made in Canada and class or kind not made in Canada is on the basis of size?

Mr. Benidickson: To a degree, basically determined upon whether or not it is made in Canada. We found it possible to define the item after knowledge of what is made in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: But you are introducing size as a basis of distinction. Even with the qualification that the parliamentary assistant spells out now, is that not a departure from the usual practice of the department?

Mr. Benidickson: This is no change in principle. It is generally an attempt to define things in such a way that we can decide between one and the other.

Mr. Knowles: But this is definition in terms of size. That will prove very interesting to the tariff board.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does this mean that for machinery and so on made in Canada the old rates will apply?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: We shall now turn to page 20 and deal with items 1044 and 1052.

Mr. Benidickson: There is another new item not numerically mentioned in the schedule. I would again ask the Minister of National Revenue to indicate the change.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That item 908 of schedule A to the Customs Tariff, at present providing for "manufactures of synthetic resins, n.o.p." be amended to read:

908. Manufactures of synthetic resins including floor and wall tile containing synthetic resin, n.o.p.

British Preferential Tariff	Most Favoured-Nation Tariff	General Tariff
15 p.c.	20 p.c.	30 p.c.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I think hon. members would appreciate something on the record with respect to this proposed change. The Minister of National Revenue moved an amendment to item 908. That item provides for the manufactures of synthetic resins not otherwise provided at rates of 15 per cent under the British preferential tariff, and 20 per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff. This item is now being worded to clearly indicate that floor and wall tiles are properly dutiable under this item. Until last November floor and wall tiles containing a plastic binder of synthetic resin were classified under item 711 at a most-favoured-nation rate of 20 per cent. In November the Department of National Revenue reclassified these tiles under various items covering plastics. These items have been set up by the budget as a result of a report of the tariff board. The change in item 908 will restore the rate of duty which applied before last November.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the general tariff of 30 per cent is the same as before?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Page 20, items 1044 and 1052. Shall these resolutions as amended carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on item 1044 I would again ask the Minister of National Revenue to move an amendment.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, on item 1044 I move that the word "basic" be deleted therefrom.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall these resolutions as amended carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry but I have a great amount of detail here and I am a little behind. With respect to drawback item 1052 I would again ask the Minister of National Revenue if he would move an amendment.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, item 1052 deals with automobiles and machinery. I move:

That schedule B to the Customs Tariff be further amended by striking out from drawback item 1052 the following words:

Machinery and precision instruments and apparatus for heat treating, welding, sorting, testing, inspecting or correcting; control panels for use with the aforementioned machinery; precision instruments and apparatus; all the foregoing, either new or used, of a class or kind not made in Canada and all parts thereof, not including consumable tools.

And by inserting in lieu thereof the following words:

Machinery, precision instruments and apparatus for heat treating, welding, sorting, testing, inspecting or correcting; all of the foregoing, either new or used, of a class or kind not made in Canada; accessories and attachments, including control panels, for use with the aforementioned machinery and precision instruments and apparatus; parts of all the foregoing, not including consumable tools.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this is only a broadening of the item.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall these resolutions as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT

The Chairman: Shall we now revert to the resolution on the Income Tax Act? We were discussing paragraph 6 and the new paragraph 7.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the parliamentary assistant going to make any comment on the request made of him?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I propose to say this. The income tax resolution we discussed this afternoon was allowed to stand following the objection raised by the hon. member for Eglinton, and some other hon. members referring to what was described as retroactive features in paragraph 6 of the resolution dealing with mutual insurance companies, other than life insurance companies.

In the case of resident companies the proposed amendment applies, as is customary, to the beginning of the current year. For non-resident companies the amendment will apply to previous years as well. This policy was questioned this afternoon and I should now like to repeat and to some extent amplify the explanation I gave this afternoon for this difference in treatment.

The difference arises out of the different way in which residents and non-residents have been taxed in the past and will be taxed in the future. Domestic companies have been and will be taxed on possibly both underwriting profits and investment income. Foreign non-residents have been taxable only on underwriting profit in Canada and not on investment income which has been regarded as earned by head office outside Canada. The effect of the Stanley Mutual decision was that underwriting profit was not taxable. It did not decide that investment income was exempt.

The result is, therefore, that while the non-residents who are taxed only on underwriting profits would escape Canadian tax completely, the domestic companies still remain taxable during the period 1951 to 1953 on their investment income. In some cases this tax will be greater than it would have been in the absence of the Stanley Mutual decision where they had an operating loss.

It seemed scarcely fair, therefore, that domestic companies should remain liable for tax during the 1951-53 period, while non-residents, through being taxed on a different basis, should escape tax completely. Accordingly, the new amendment was made to apply so that no company should escape tax completely in the past years.

Non-resident companies operating generally, I believe, in the large industrial centres have accepted the Canadian tax regime and in the past have paid our taxes without question. The Stanley Mutual case arose in an entirely different milieu. It was a small local company and other groups were interested and they all wanted to test the features. So far as I know, non-resident companies, whose main interests are not directly competitive with farm mutuals, were on the sidelines. In view of this fact and the fact just mentioned, that but for the resolution in its present form they would escape tax completely while the farm mutuals and other domestic companies would still be taxable, it was decided that the new legislation should not disturb the situation under which such companies were assumed both by them and by the administration to be taxable.

Mr. Macdonnell: To refer to the wording of the amendment I take it that the amendment would apply to non-resident mutuals if, in fact, they came under its terms. There is nothing in this amendment to exclude them. Perhaps the question may not be practical. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant knows that they would not qualify under the 50 per cent rule. However, what I am asking is this: From my reading of the amendment I assume that this amendment as is is not limited to domestic companies. It is limited to this "50 per cent of whose gross premium income", and so on.

Mr. Benidickson: Resident or non-resident.

Mr. Macdonnell: So they are on the same basis there?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: In the second place the parliamentary assistant has given reasons for not making the change. As I understand him, what he has pointed out is this. If the situation is left without this retroactive feature, he suggests that actually it is going to work an injury to the Canadian companies by reason of the different method of taxing which has prevailed between the two. He also suggested that the non-resident companies—and here is where I did not quite follow him—expected to be taxed in respect of their investment reserve. However that may be, it does not seem to me that it changes the substance of the situation. Unless the parliamentary assistant can satisfy us on the point I am just going to make or unless he can satisfy us that these people are not objecting and that they feel that the matter is fair, —if he were able to do that it might alter the whole thing—it seems to me that we are in the position of going to people and asking them to reopen their accounts for seven years, with consequences that might quite conceivably be extremely serious. Again I am going on the basis of what I understood to be the facts this afternoon. If that is so, we may be causing not only serious inconvenience but perhaps even worse to these companies.

Again I suggest it is through no fault of their own that they are in this position. It is through no fault of any kind on their part. We now find that, as was settled by the Stanley case, they were not liable for the tax which it is now proposed to make retroactive for all these years. Again assuming that I have stated the facts correctly and that there is no acquiescence on their part, it seems to me that what we are doing is not showing the same principle of fair dealing and decency as between government and individual as that which we would expect as between individual and individual. Again, as I say, if my understanding of the facts is correct, when we are trying to get the Americans to behave more sensibly, for instance, with regard to administration of their own customs tariff, it seems to me to be a particularly unfavourable time for us to be giving cause for offence of this kind. I am subject to being corrected as to some of the facts but as I understood the parliamentary assistant, nothing that he said seemed to me to alter the argument made this afternoon by the hon. member for Eglinton and myself.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend referred to going back seven or more years into tax statements. I think he must remember that, in accordance with the understanding they had of the taxing law, these people have paid their taxes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not understand. All these years they have paid taxes which you are now proposing to impose on them?

Mr. Benidickson: Generally speaking, that is correct.

Mr. Fleming: Yes; but the result of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada is that these companies have paid a tax on the assumption that they were liable. The assumption has now been proved to be invalid and it has been found that they were not taxable. What parliament is now being asked to do is to impose a tax which the Supreme Court of Canada has said has not been in existence up to the present time. No matter how we may talk around the point, the hard fact remains that parliament is now being asked to impose a tax which the Supreme Court of Canada had just finished saying had not been in existence.

Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood:

That paragraph 6 of the resolution be amended by striking out the words "and always to have been".

The effect of the amendment, if adopted, will be to eliminate this retroactive feature of the resolution. As to any need to change the present law, I indicated this afternoon that we are prepared to consider proposals on their merits as of the present time. But surely there is no justification whatever for going back and trying to impose a tax retroactively. That is the worst kind of legislation imaginable. Not only will it have an unfair effect here but it will create a damaging precedent for all time.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 44.

The Chairman: Have we completed our discussion on paragraphs 6 and 7?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report these resolutions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions reported.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that these resolutions be now read the second time and concurred in?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: What about the amendments?

Mr. Speaker: That was the question I asked a moment ago, but I am told that resolutions are never reported with amendments.

Mr. Knowles: I take it, Mr. Speaker, that you are as surprised about that as I am.

Mr. Speaker: Furthermore, I am told that there is a citation with regard to the matter. There is no reason why we should be surprised. What is the number of the citation? I do not have it before me at the moment. I think the point is now being looked into by the Clerk.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I am trying to recall situations where resolutions were reported with amendments. I remember that when I was chairman of committees there were occasions when amendments were made in the committee but they were not reported. There is no use in reporting a resolution with amendments because the resolution is in fact an order for leave to introduce a bill. The resolution is studied in committee of the whole and what is done in committee of the whole is to examine how the order for leave to introduce the bill is going to be drafted. Resolutions are reported from the committee of the whole as being the product of the committee of the whole. It is not the same as in the case of a bill which is sent to committee of the whole for examination with a view to possibly being amended. A resolution is not sent there for that purpose; it is sent there to determine if it contains sufficient cause to grant leave to introduce a bill based on the resolution.

It may be that by this time some specific reference in the book has been found, but in any event I am satisfied that is the situation. In the case of amendments to bills we do ask that the amendments be read the first time and concurred in. In this case we ask that the resolutions in their original form or amended be approved by the house. I think that will cover the point if amendments were made to the resolutions.

Resolutions read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: By this time we have found the citation. It is citation 491 of Beauchesne, third edition. I think once more we will all applaud the efficiency of the Clerk of the House. The citation reads as follows:

If a resolution is amended in the committees of the whole, supply or ways and means, the chairman does not report it "with amendments", because it had not been discussed in the house, when the Speaker was in the chair, prior to being referred to the committee. The resolution is not considered by the house in the same way as a bill which, under standing order 75, is read twice before committal. The terms of the resolution are submitted for the consideration of the house for the first time when the resolution is reported from committee. As the house up to that moment has not considered the merits of the resolution, the committee's amendments do not change anything that has been done by the house and no matter how much the resolution has been altered by the committee, it is reported with all its alterations, but without the mention of amendments.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, we call them alterations but not amendments.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 467, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 468, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take the amendment to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, allowances for disabled persons, the Atomic Energy Control Act, the War Service Grants Act, diplomatic and consular immunities, and the Canadian Citizenship Act amendments.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister if he has any idea when the government will be ready to proceed with the forecast amendment to the Judges Act?

Mr. Harris: No, I am not in a position to to say at this moment.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 1, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Eighth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou).

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND NON-OPERATING UNIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, through you I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it a fact that the government has appointed a board of arbitrators to mediate in the dispute in connection with railway wages which is attracting so much concern in this house and outside?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of Labour might answer that question. No appointment has been made by order in council, and I do not know if there has been any departmental action.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker; no action has been taken by the department.

Mr. Drew: From the answers given it would appear that action is not contemplated. Can the minister inform us what the situation is? —because naturally we are all very much concerned with the solution which may be found for this problem.

Mr. Gregg: I shall take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—ECONOMIC FEASIBILITY SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has there been any recent development in connection with the proposed survey of the Passamaquoddy tidal project?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the question, but my recollection is that there have been no recent developments. The matter of United States participation in the survey is still before congress and has not yet been acted on.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY AS TO BRITISH TENDERS

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of a report by the president of the British board of trade, will the government give consideration to British tenders in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway project as a way of providing Britain with the dollars it needs to buy Canadian goods?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the St. Lawrence seaway authority has not yet been set up, but the hon. gentleman knows that it is the policy of this government to encourage to the greatest possible extent the importation of goods from Britain so as to provide them with the dollars which I know they are anxious to acquire for the purpose of increasing their purchases of Canadian products.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TABLING OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay on the table of the house a report of the civil service commission respecting the organization of the staff of the House of Commons.

TELEVISION

GOVERNMENT POLICY IN GRANTING LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue what consideration the government is giving to expressions of opinion at the national meeting of young Liberals last Saturday concerning the licensing of television stations in areas where otherwise there is a monopoly at the present time?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the best answer I can give the hon. gentleman is that the estimates of the Department of National Revenue and the C.B.C. will likely be up this week and he will have the opportunity of asking all the questions and expressing all the comments he thinks necessary.

GRAIN

UNITED STATES SELLING POLICY—ACTION BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in regard to the fact that the United States was shipping barley and oats for foreign export at 10 or 15 cents per bushel less than the domestic price, and I asked what the government was doing with reference to this and whether a protest had been made to the United States. At this time I would like to ask the minister whether there is any hope of a favourable outcome to the meeting now taking place in Washington so that there will be a discontinuance of this type of practice by the United States.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the United States is selling oats and barley at 15 cents below the domestic price. It is my information that the United States has very little surplus of either oats or barley. I think it is hardly in order for Canada to protest to the United States about the price at which the United States sells its products, and while the subject matter has been discussed, nothing in the form of a protest has been entered by Canada.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Are Canada and the United States co-operating in a sales policy so that one nation does not undercut the other? I think that is the important thing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Canada has a sales policy and the United States has a policy made in that country. I hardly think that the idea of forming a combine against the world would be popular in either country. I am sure it would not be popular outside of those two countries.

[Later:]

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question supplementary to that which has just been asked. It is whether consideration of the price of wheat and other grain was not on the agenda at the recent conference at Washington.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely clear as to what conference my hon. friend refers to. People from the United States come to Canada from time to time to discuss a variety of problems, and Canadians go to the United States for the same purpose. I know of no formal meeting on wheat. I have not been informed of it.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, it is true that there seem to have been a great many conferences. Maybe that is not the right term for me to use. According to press reports there was supposed to have been a meeting in Washington recently and naturally the grain growers of Canada were quite interested because of the persistent reports that consideration would be given to that issue. It was that meeting to which I referred.

Some hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: Not a speech.

Mr. Rowe: However, if we are not supposed to know anything about it, all right.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED TELEVISION BROADCAST OF MAY DAY PARADE, VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of National Revenue has indicated that we shall later this week be discussing the estimates of his department, may I ask him whether any representations have been made to him with regard to the television broadcasting of certain prominent communists at a meeting in Vancouver early this month?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. Representations are made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which is a self-operating corporation.

Mr. Drew: In view of the detachment indicated by the minister, may I ask him if he will inquire from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation if the C.B.C. television station CBUT at Vancouver televised a May day parade in which were Harvey Murphy, A. A. MacLeod, Bill Stewart, Homer Stevens and other prominent communists who were holding a meeting at that time?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I shall make that inquiry.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

INQUIRY AS TO RECONVENING OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): In the light of the speech made by the Prime Minister last Saturday night concerning amendment of the British North America Act, may I ask him whether it is the intention of the government to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference with a view to arriving at an agreed method of amending the British North America Act in Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No; not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF MORE THAN ONE DEPUTY COMMISSIONER, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 464, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Appointment of deputy commissioners, etc.

Mr. Fulton: This is the clause which provides for the appointment of one or more deputy commissioners. I do not think there should be any objection to the regularizing by statute of what has been done recently by order in council, as the minister himself pointed out in his remarks on the resolution stage on May 25. However, there is something which appears in clause 1 of the bill which, to my mind, is not quite consistent with what the minister indicated on May 25 would be done in this respect. I refer to his remarks as reported at page 5072 of Hansard where he said as follows:

This position—

Referring to the position of deputy commissioner.

—was established on the first of April, 1932 and since that time, as is obvious to all of us, the responsibilities and the strength of the force have increased greatly. The senior assistant commissioner, under the authority of an order in council dated March 26, 1953, now receives the same rate of pay as that authorized for the deputy commissioner and is performing duties of equal responsibility. We consider that it is desirable to regularize this situation by providing in the establishment for two deputy commissioners and by cancelling the establishment and salary provision of the senior assistant commissioner. There are, therefore, as is obvious, no financial implications involved.

Under clause 1 of this bill they are establishing the position of one or more deputy commissioners but we are still left with one or more assistant commissioners. It seems to me that it would be obvious that one of those assistant commissioners, if more than one, would be senior assistant commissioner. It is not quite the same as what the minister indicated in his remarks or at least according to the impression that I drew from the minister's remarks on May 25. I should like to ask him if he would elaborate a little bit on what it is proposed to do and what will be the effect of this bill.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the meaning which I think is clearly indicated in the remarks I made on May 25 is that with the growth in the strength and responsibilities of the force it became necessary for there being two men who would carry out the responsibilities of deputy commissioner. At present we have a deputy commissioner and also another officer who carries out responsibilities equal to those of the deputy commissioner and who is designated as a senior assistant commissioner. As I indicated in my remarks on May 25, we desire to regularize that situation by providing for two deputy commissioners. Then we shall also have one or more assistant commissioners, but no one of them will be designated as a senior assistant commissioner.

Mr. Fulton: Now I understand the situation. Therefore it will be necessary, will it, to repeal that order in council?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: And I take it that will be done as soon as this bill is proclaimed?

Mr. Garson: We have to pass this bill first.

Mr. Fulton: Yes; but that would be the intention, would it?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: As a matter of interest, while we have been discussing this matter I have been looking up the estimates and I cannot find the provision for these two commissioners, let alone the deputy commissioner or the assistant commissioner, in the details for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Where do we find provision for those positions?

Mr. Garson: I suggest that when we get to the justice estimates, when we have the estimates before us, the hon. member can raise that point and it will be cleared up.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to know now so that I can understand what will be the effect of this provision being made whereby we are going to provide an additional establishment for a deputy commissioner and cancel the order in council authorizing the appointment and the payment of a senior assistant commissioner. I can find no provision for such appointment or payment in the book of estimates. If the minister does not have the information readily available, I will not hold up the bill now.

Mr. Garson: My difficulty is that I do not have the estimates with me at the moment. However, I think that I covered the point that my hon. friend has now raised in language just as clear as it can possibly be when I said, as found at page 5072 of Hansard:

> We consider that it is desirable to regularize this situation by providing in the establishment for two deputy commissioners and by cancelling the establishment and salary provision of the senior assistant commissioner.

That is a categorical statement, and a statement of what we intend to do.

Mr. Fulton: I am asking how you are going to do it.

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend would find, if he examined the estimates at greater length than he has done, that there is provision there for the two officers to whom he refers. I do not have the estimates with me, but this is a point which can be very easily raised by the hon. member for Kamloops when the justice department estimates are before the committee.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Pension upon retirement for inefficiency.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister explain clause 3?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I will be glad to do so, and I think I should do so because I wish to correct an inaccuracy in my previous explanation at the resolution stage. As I correctly pointed out then the purpose of the bill is to put all members of the force who, having served with the force for ten years or upwards, have been discharged for misconduct or inefficiency, in the same position of entitlement to a reduced pension whether they are retired under parts II and III of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act on the one hand or are retired under part V of the act on the other.

In explaining this purpose I inadvertently transposed the numbers of these parts and as a result said that the part V pension scheme did not provide for such a pension in the event of a member being discharged for inefficiency or misconduct and that the pension schemes under parts II and III did provide for such a pension to members so discharged. The facts are the reverse, namely that part V now makes provision for this type of reduced pension for those who have served for ten years and are retired for misconduct or inefficiency whereas parts II and III do not provide for such reduced pension where the member has been discharged for these reasons.

The purpose of the bill therefore is to amend parts II and III to provide such reduced pension and thus equalize in this respect the position of Royal Canadian Mounted Police pensioners under parts II and III with the position of pensioners under part V. This purpose is accomplished by clause 3 of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Shall this bill, by leave, be read the third time now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Garson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LICENCES, REGULATIONS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, May 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Martin for the second reading of Bill No. 422, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

Mr. Blair: Is the minister not going to explain the bill?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): This bill mainly seeks to do three things. It seeks to redefine the present offence of trafficking and also endeavours to create a new offence of trafficking based on the illegal possession of drugs. It also provides for extending the powers of the governor in council to make certain regulations for the more effective enforcement of the measure.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I think every person in the house is in agreement that this bill is necessary, because the regulations cannot be made too strong with respect to people who traffic in drugs. To destroy a person physically and mentally by the use of drugs is a crime that should carry a very heavy penalty. So far as the bill is concerned, the rights of those who are entitled to use narcotic drugs, veterinarians, doctors and druggists, seem to be protected.

The question then remains to put in legal terms what can be done to stop the horrible traffic in drugs.

I do not believe that the traffic in drugs in Canada has reached the height that it has in some countries, but we are a young and growing nation and as our population increases there is no doubt that we will be faced with greater difficulty in this regard. In central Canada the situation possibly is not as bad as in areas such as Vancouver and Victoria with seaports facing the Orient. The difficulty would seem to be greater there, and at those places there is the greatest possible chance of such drugs being illegally brought into the country. I am in complete agreement that the penalties should be made very severe. Possibly it can be argued that making penalties severe may bring about more evasion, but in my opinion the penalties cannot be too severe.

We make regulations in the Criminal Code with regard to manslaughter, murder and crimes of that type. Here we are dealing with something that causes the total destruction of people mentally and physically. Worst of all, we are led to believe that the people who illegally traffic in drugs try to induce young people to become addicts. Having that in mind, we should go over very carefully the clauses of the bill having to do with penalties. I am absolutely in favour of making the penalties as severe as possible in order that this traffic may be curbed. Possibly one of the worst of all the drugs in which these people traffic is heroin, and it is very easy for a person to become addicted to heroin. Therefore every possible channel should be explored of curbing this trade. I am in full agreement with the bill.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to say a word in support of the bill. I was very glad to hear the remarks that have just been made by a medical man who is in close contact with the problem in a professional way. It seems to me he is quite right in stating that the penalties for trafficking in drugs cannot be too severe. Traffickers must be penalized to the greatest possible extent, but I think that something more must be done than merely to punish them. In years past we have had the league of nations trying to deal with this problem internationally. We have the United Nations commission on narcotic drugs, and various agreements and protocols have been signed for the purpose of limiting the production and export of narcotic drugs. I believe that a protocol on the production of opium was agreed upon last June by the United Nations Organization and that it is to come into effect when some twenty-five nations have signed. I was going to ask the minister if Canada is one of the signatories to this protocol? She was not at the time the report of the Department of External Affairs was published.

Mr. Martin: She will be.

Mr. Coldwell: But she is not yet?

Mr. Martin: No.

Mr. Coldwell: However, I am very glad to know we are signing that protocol. In 1946 I had the opportunity of representing Canada on the committee of the economic and social council which dealt with narcotics. I have a very vivid recollection of the discussion that occurred there, and the terrible effects of this drug on those who become addicted to it. I believe that is fairly well known. I agree with the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) when he says one of the real dangers is that young people may become addicted to this very destructive habit, and that this is encouraged by people who are criminals and who should be treated as criminals.

What I really wanted to say was that I do not think this is enough. While we should imprison and penalize the trafficker to the fullest extent possible, what we need is some institution, not a prison, in which those who have become addicted can be treated. I do not think placing an addict in jail is the proper manner in which to treat him. What we need is a proper institution in which those people who have become addicted can be placed and can be looked after until they are weaned of the habit, whether that takes six months, a year or five years. This is a problem with which every country in the world is faced. We are no exception to it. I believe we have a very fine organization endeavouring to locate these traffickers in drugs.

It is so easy to bring these drugs into the country. I mean to conceal them, I do not mean it is easy in the sense in which that term might apply, but the quantities are so small there are various ways of bringing them into the country. I feel we should congratulate the narcotics enforcement branch on the excellent work that is done in this regard. What I feel is needed is not only a bill of this description, with the right of the governor general in council to make regulations that will help stamp out this traffic; we should try to do something further in the way of rehabilitation of the people who have become victimized. I do not think this bill perhaps does all that is required to be done, but I think the house should give its warm support and approval to the increase in the penalty for trafficking in drugs, and so we support the bill.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to indicate our support for the measure that is now before us. While I am doing so, I should like to underline what was said by the leader of the C.C.F. party as to the need for some institution where addicts in this country can receive the kind of treatment they require. I do not look upon those unfortunate individuals who have become addicts as criminals at all. They are driven by extreme necessity when they form the habit; that is, people will do anything to get the required doses of the drug in order to satisfy their craving. They are driven by that necessity to procure the necessary drugs. They are driven to go amongst young people who may be completely innocent of the designs upon them.

There must be some place where these people can get what they require for the time being, no matter how long it may be, until such time as they are either weaned of the habit or become so confirmed in the habitual use of the drugs that they have to be confined. Something will have to be done along that line, otherwise we cannot hope to protect our young people. I am told that in some of the high schools in our country certain young people have been circulating amongst the students urging them to try the drugs for the first time. For each new one that they secure, the criminal who is behind the whole business will give the student the satisfaction of a cut dose of the drug itself; that sort of thing is going on in some of the schools in this country.

Mr. Martin: This is too important a subject to exaggerate. The teen-age problem has been greatly exaggerated, and I am sure my hon. friend would not want to give the impression that it is greater than it is.

Mr. Low: No, not for one second. As a matter of fact, it is bad enough if it only happens to two or three. It is so easy to make these students complete slaves to the use of the drugs that if there are only one or two that is bad enough. It is just as bad as murder, and in some respects it is worse. It is for that reason I am pleased to see a stiffening of the penalties attached to those who would extend the drug traffic.

I merely wanted to say that there is the necessity for some place, I do not know what you would call it, an institution of some kind where habitual users could get whatever supplies they required without having to go out and procure or earn the supplies. Whether or not that could be done, or whether it is practical, I do not know. Certainly everything that could be done by the government to put a stop to the extension of the traffic ought to be done, and we will support them because it is a good thing. We like the bill as it now stands, since it imposes heavier penalties and we want to give the maximum backing to the enforcement officers in every way possible to control this drug traffic.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): This is a problem that has been given very intensive study in my own city by a very competent committee under the chairmanship of Dr. Wallace Wilson. As you know, Dr. Wilson is the western medical supervisor for the Department of Veterans Affairs, and an outstanding man in his field. Gathered with him on that committee he had prosecuting attorneys, attorneys who specialized in defence, and men of outstanding calibre from the university who specialized in drugs, as well as a number of experienced business and professional men. This committee made a thorough study of this problem of drugs and drug addiction.

Unfortunately the last report issued by the committee is now some two years old. However, the poignant points of that committee report still stand. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister—no doubt he is aware of it—and to the attention of the house that, without exception, this crime of trafficking in drugs is the most heinous of which we could possibly conceive in our modern civilization.

I could not agree more than I do with the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) when they say that this is a problem of great magnitude and one that, in essence, requires considerable watching at all times, and additional increases in penalties for offenders.

There are some sections of the report to which I have referred that I do not think we could adopt in this country at the present time; but there are points in it that should be read. For instance, we all know that where you find perversions of various kinds, somewhere along the line drugs enter into the picture. Additionally, invariably the first offenders, who might be termed exhibitionists, and who have no criminal desires to murder or to destroy, eventually, with the continued use of drugs, with all their nefarious effects, not only become exhibitionists but also become more intense in their addiction to drugs. Consequently, as a result thereof, they are a greater menace and danger to the society we represent in Canada.

There have appeared in the press some objections to statements made respecting the degree of criminality existing in Vancouver. Unfortunately I must admit that the city of Vancouver leads the parade in the number of known drug addicts in Canada. It is followed by the city of Montreal, with Toronto in third place and Winnipeg in fourth.

It is easy to imagine why we have that condition in Vancouver. We are a seaport city, a great port to the Orient. With no desire to muddy the waters of good relations between the Occident and the Orient, I believe it is only fair to assume that in the past considerable quantities of drugs have come into Canada from outside sources. At the moment those sources shall remain unnamed.

However, of the 14,000 known drug addicts, the number given about a year and a half ago, we had in Vancouver about 4,000.

Mr. Martin: Did the hon. member use the figure of 14,000?

Mr. MacDougall: Yes, 14,000.

Mr. Martin: Oh no.

Mr. MacDougall: What would the minister say?

Mr. Martin: Slightly more than 3,000 drug addicts in the whole of the country.

Mr. MacDougall: Then I stand corrected, and would use the figure of 4,000 instead of 14,000. And of that approximate number of 4,000, in Vancouver we have more than our share. Under the circumstances, that is quite understandable.

If we are going to deal adequately with this situation, it seems we should have increased penalties applying to the trafficker. In the past and in the present the trafficker has been and is the one who acts behind the scenes, who pulls the levers, and in the vernacular might be called the big operator. He is the man who invariably is not found on the street, and is not an addict. But his whole mission in connection with drugs is to get stooges to operate in their younger years. These stooges will become known addicts, and this adds to his income because he has an opportunity through these young people to add to the sale of his drugs.

The Wilson report did state in many instances in this drug business in Vancouver the big operator was not convicted, though they had a great amount of suspicion, and that in all probability the operator would have been convicted had they been able to arrest him. They felt—and they had evidence to prove it—that the trafficker carried around under his tongue phials of heroin plastically sealed. In the event of meeting police officers he would immediately swallow the phials. Consequently, upon arrest there was no evidence upon which to convict him. The evidence was then in his stomach. But, if he were taken to a hospital, through the use of an emetic the evidence would definitely prove that the man was a trafficker.

The question that arises in such circumstances is one to which the law officers of the crown would have to give due consideration. Perhaps the step required to be taken, under our liberal democracy, would be considered drastic. However, the fact remains that we must not overlook the terrific damage being done to the younger population in Canada, in those places I have mentioned in particular, because of the more or less free run of the big operators in conducting their campaign.

I could not agree more with the statement that the maximum punishment is, in fact, minimal, so far as this offence is concerned. It should be the constant vigilance of parliament and the enforcement officers under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act to see to it that on all occasions, if humanly possible, the guilty person is brought before the courts of the land. There is nothing in our whole national set-up more deserving of a maximum penalty than the operations of the trafficker who sells for profit and who, at the same time, is endeavouring through his villainous traffic to procure the younger generation of this country as potential addicts.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much interest to all that has been said by the previous speakers. I certainly agree with them that this bill brings to the attention of the house a very serious problem in Canada and one which is most serious in the coastal areas. I am certain that all hon. members will be in agreement in their support of the intent behind the bill, especially as it deals with the increasing of penalties imposed against those who traffic illegally in drugs in this country.

The bill is comprehensive in that it covers the sections of the statute that deal with trafficking, licensing and possession. Therefore the amendments before us open up the possibility of a comprehensive study of the narcotics situation, and the kind of law we should have not only to deal with the traffic in drugs, but also with those who are in possession of them. I want to add my words to those of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that perhaps under the amending sections there should be more accent on the curative instead of the punitive.

As was pointed out by the previous speaker, there is undoubtedly a very serious situation on the Pacific coast. The hon. member said there were 14,000 known addicts in Canada, and he was corrected by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) who, I believe, said there were approximately 3,000. However, Mr. Speaker, I was going to use the figure of 5,000, on the basis that that was the report which Canada made to the United Nations committee which is studying this matter.

This matter of narcotics very forcibly came to my attention about 15 years ago in the city of Vancouver when a friend of mine became a drug addict. As he progressed it cost more and more for his needs and he resorted to robbery, and he landed in jail. He landed back in jail upon more than one occasion because he was not cured. He got married, and unfortunately his wife also became an addict. Today, his wife is in a mental institution, as she has been for several years past, and she will never come out. I know from my own personal knowledge of the man that he resorted to robbery only because of his illness and he did not have the money to supply his needs. It can be easily recognized—when it is understood that when you have an addict who actually requires, because of his illness, several capsules a day and he has none, and on the illegal market in Vancouver it costs around $5.50 and $6 a capsule—why he resorts to robbery. That was this man's history for a while. He is no longer in jail. I think I can safely say that he has been a good, respectable and responsible member of society in Canada for a number of years. He still requires a minimum dosage of a narcotic, and he gets it. But because he does get it, as I said, he is a good member of society.

That experience, which started some 15 years ago, interested me in this subject, and over a number of years now I have interviewed a great many drug addicts in and out of jail, I have interviewed authorities, policemen and doctors on this matter. As a result, a special study was made in Vancouver by the member of the legislature for Burnaby, my father, and upon two occasions he got in contact with every doctor in the province of British Columbia on this matter. The reply in the main stated that we would never remove this curse of drug addiction and the problems it gives rise to unless it was handled in a different way. A great many doctors express the view that the law of Canada should be changed to allow them to treat addicts as sick persons, and under medical supervision to supply their medical requirements at cost.

Mr. Martin: Just so that we clearly understand this matter, there is nothing in the law now that prevents any doctor from treating a patient in the use of drugs along the lines that my hon. friend is suggesting.

Mr. Winch: And of carrying him at all times with his requirements.

Mr. Martin: If a responsible doctor says that a patient needs an unstated amount of drugs, there is nothing in the law to prevent that being done. All that the department does is to make sure the doctor acts responsibly, honourably and honestly.

Mr. Winch: That is correct, Mr. Speaker, but it is not generally known to the people of Canada; nor has there ever been, to my knowledge, an educational program to try to get the addict to go to a doctor and to take the care that a doctor can give, and to receive the minimum narcotic requirements. This study has been made, I know, in a great many countries of the world. It is rather remarkable to note the incidence of drug addiction in a great many other countries of the world compared with our own Dominion of Canada. I have noted especially from the reports that are issued annually by the economic and social council, as a commission on narcotic drugs under the authority of United Nations, that in the countries where there have been educational campaigns and where drug addicts do go to doctors and they get their prescriptions filled at cost, the countries know of their drug addiction and they know who the people are. They keep track of them and because—and this is important—of the registration of drug addicts and their care and treatment at cost price, it has taken the profit out of the illegal trade. When you take the profit out of the illegal trade you strike a body blow at the illicit traffic, because the peddlers are not interested in selling the dope unless they can make a profit, and they are certainly not interested in getting new addicts if they cannot get a profit out of them. I am certain from my study that where there is a concentrated program, as there is in a great many countries of the world, you not only reduce the number of addicts but you almost wipe out the illegal trade itself.

The illegal trade is of very serious proportions in Canada. The most recent figure that I saw was a statement by an R.C.M.P. officer in Vancouver who estimated that somewhere between $5 million and $7 million worth of illegal narcotics are entering Canada through the port of Vancouver. In my estimation, that should make all of us here with responsibility for policy and law give perhaps more consideration than we have in the past to this problem. When I say that we should give more consideration, I am basing that opinion on the 1952 report of the economic and social council. In that section dealing with Canada —and I presume the report is sent in by Canada—we find on page 14:

> It was estimated that there were approximately 5,000 addicts of whom roughly 70 per cent are males. Furthermore, it was reasonable to assume that addiction may be slightly on the increase, in view of the large supplies of heroin entering the country illicitly as evidenced by seizures of this drug and the steady prices maintained in the illicit traffic.

This is important. It goes on:

> No definite program of treatment has been formulated.

I think we are negligent, Mr. Speaker—I say "we"—in our responsibility when in the 1952 report we find the statement by Canada that no definite program of treatment has been formulated, while at the same time we admit there are 5,000 addicts in Canada, and that the number is slightly on the increase. The hon. member who spoke just before me mentioned a committee which met in Vancouver over a period of years. I want to make reference to another committee in Vancouver composed of doctors which met under the auspices of the community chest. Under the chairmanship of Dr. Foulks they have been making a study over a period of three years of methods of curing drug addicts, and the other day when it was announced that the Senate had under consideration the appointment of a committee to study the narcotic problem Dr. Foulks, on behalf of this committee, made a statement, and I would like to quote a short paragraph from the press report of his statement. He said:

> We have never agreed entirely with the law's approach to drug addiction. Medical men agree that changes are needed in the Drug Act to allow for treatment on a medical basis instead of on a punitive basis.

Now, that is the view of that special committee in Vancouver and, sir, it is in line, I think I can say, with the authoritative views of those who have made a study of this problem on the North American continent.

I would now like to quote, but not extensively, from a man in the United States who is recognized as an outstanding authority. He is Alfred R. Lindesmith, associate professor of sociology, Indiana University. In his book "Opiate Addiction", which I am told is considered almost as a bible on this subject, he has this to say:

> The most important basic change which is needed in this country is legislation or the interpretation of existing legislation so that the prescription of drugs to an addict by a physician is defined as being within the field of medicine.
> This would mean that a physician could legally prescribe drugs to an addict and it would give addicts a legitimate low-cost source of supply. This is the way in which English drug laws are interpreted.
>
> At first glance it might seem that such a plan would make opiates more available than they are now and lead to a spread of the habit. However, consideration reveals that the opposite would be the case. In England, where, as has been indicated, doctors do prescribe for addicts, there is much less addiction than in the United States and there is scarcely any smuggling problem.
> At present the new addict in this country usually obtains his drugs from illicit sources. Under the proposed plan he would have to obtain his supplies from a doctor registered under the act. Certainly one would expect medical men to exert more of a restraining influence on the spread of addiction than the underworld peddler does. The reduction or the elimination of illegal dealings in opiates would unquestionably remove the greatest source to new addicts now in existence.
> The first step in any plan to alleviate this dreadful affliction should be the establishment of control and dispensation at cost of habit forming drugs. With the profit motive gone no effort would be made to encourage its use by private dispensers of narcotics and the drug peddler would of necessity disappear. New addicts would be speedily discovered and through early treatment some of these unfortunate victims might be saved from becoming hopelessly incurable.
> Drug addiction like prostitution and like liquor is not a police problem. It never has been and never can be solved by policemen. It is first and last a medical problem, and if there is a solution it will be discovered not by policemen, but by scientific and competently trained medical experts whose sole objective will be the reduction and possible eradication of this devastating appetite.

That is the end of the quotation, Mr. Speaker, and the only other quotations I wish to make are I think a substantiation of my statement that when this terrible problem is treated in a serious educational and registerial way there is conclusive evidence that these methods have a beneficial effect. Just briefly, therefore, I would like to quote from the economic and social council report of the United Nations for 1952, and I will deal with a few countries briefly. The report states:

> IRELAND: There was no evidence of addiction. One case was discovered in which the accused obtained morphine under false pretenses; the case was dealt with by the courts.
> ITALY: During the year, 68 cases of drug addiction (40 women and 28 men) were reported to the office of the high commissioner for hygiene and public health by the provincial health officers. They generally concerned persons using narcotic drugs in order to obtain relief from serious and incurable diseases.
> Drug addicts reported by physicians are compulsorily cared for in hospitals or private clinics or, if they are treated at home, they are kept under the supervision of the local health authority until they are cured.

NORWAY: The number of registered drug addicts was estimated to be 200 to 300. Practically all of these were receiving drugs on prescriptions. Only in rare cases have drugs been obtained on counterfeit prescriptions. The registered drug addicts were all adults, evenly distributed in respect of age groups, sex and professions.

RUMANIA: Stringent measures have been taken by the government to prevent drug addiction. According to the annual report, the problem of drug addiction can be said to have been practically eliminated in the country.

A few years ago, Mr. Speaker, we wrote to Great Britain from British Columbia and asked them if they would tell us about their drug addiction problems. We were amazed to receive a reply to the effect, "We do not have any drug problem." That was the answer to the letter, so I was very interested—

Mr. Martin: I can assure my hon. friend without giving my source that this is true of no country in the world.

Mr. Winch: Well, that was the British government's reply and that is why I am interested in this report which I take as authoritative.

Mr. Martin: These are individual reports from certain countries.

Mr. Winch: But I am giving the names of the countries and the exact wording of the report. For example, here is what it states on Great Britain:

GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND: The number of addicts receiving drugs from medical sources during the year was 297. There is no evidence to suggest that addicts to manufactured drugs regularly obtain their supplies from illicit sources, although as in previous years several addicts were known to have supplemented legitimate supplies by unlawful means. These are included in the foregoing estimates.

I have already mentioned Canada so I will not repeat it, but there are one or two more.

ISRAEL: Eighteen addicts, whose ages ranged from 26 to 28 years, were apprehended during the year. Of these, five were physicians, two nurses, one a student in medicine and 10 persons with miscellaneous occupations.

I think, sir, that is sufficient to at least bring up the point I have in mind to the effect that there is a difference in the way in which this problem is being approached in other countries compared with Canada. Perhaps we can learn from them and I am certain that the matter is so serious that we have to try and find a new approach. I am speaking personally from my own studies and knowledge of the subject and from the very great help given to me in this by one on whom I rely for his study on this matter, and that is my father, an M.L.A. of British Columbia, who has made a very great study of it. However, I think I am safe in saying, at least as far as British Columbia is concerned, that the majority of physicians, of authorities and of the people have reached a point where they are prepared to accept a change in outlook and to say: let us be as hard as we can on the peddler but let us tackle the addict himself or herself as a medical problem; let us find ways and means of trying to get them registered, to get them treated and, where no cure is possible, to enable them to receive their requirements in a minimum dosage at a minimum price. I am convinced that if we could get that idea over—I know there are obstacles but I am sure they can be worked out—we would not have, as was shown in the last report on prisoners, 60 drug stores broken into in a twelve-month period. In the majority of cases, when they go after a drug store, they are after narcotics. If we tackle this matter seriously and do something like what I have mentioned I feel strongly that without a doubt it would go a long way toward taking the profit out of the illicit traffic and in that way would go a long way toward wiping out the illegal entry of dope into Canada.

I realize what the problem is, Mr. Speaker. If my memory serves me correctly, in the United States there were either two or three states which endeavoured to give a try-out to establishing centres where an addict could get his requirements. The experiment failed. I know that at least one state has closed up the experiment. However, there is a good reason for that result, namely that addicts from all the surrounding states poured in, thus creating a terrific problem. That is something that should have been expected, Mr. Speaker, because there are no customs or immigration lines between the various states of the United States; and naturally a person who required the narcotic and who did not have the money with which to buy it on the illegal market went into the state where, by registering as an addict, he could get his requirements.

I would be the last one to suggest that anything in the way of a new approach be made in only one province in Canada because that attempt would be just as much doomed to failure as it was in the United States. Action will have to be taken on a national basis, with the procedure the same all across the Dominion of Canada. I know it might be said that we shall have addicts coming up from the United States. That might perhaps be so to some extent, Mr. Speaker, but not to a major extent, in my opinion. Although we have no immigration or customs barriers between our provinces, we do have an international boundary between our country and the United States. Hence it would be far more difficult for any invasion into Canada of drug addicts from the United States. Be that as it may, the problem is a most serious one. I think we must tackle it with renewed vigour and understanding, and recognize that it should be treated as a medical problem and not one involving punitive measures. Therefore, although I most certainly support the endeavours of the government to strengthen the existing act and to make it tougher on the peddlers, I sincerely hope that the minister can see his way clear in the near future really to tackle this problem on a scientific and intelligent basis.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words to the remarks of the members who spoke before me to indicate that I wholeheartedly support the bill before us, because I think it would help to solve the problem of the illegal traffic in drugs.

I also take advantage of this opportunity to say that it is not enough to prosecute the drug traffickers and treat the addicts, even if the proposed means are excellent. I think that an intensive educational campaign should be undertaken all across this country, and especially among our youth.

There is something that amazes everybody in this country, and it is the ease with which those drug traffickers come into contact with young people in some parts of this country. According to the press, one finds that quite often, in a number of places, in Vancouver, for instance, young girls and boys attending school are contacted by drug traffickers who eventually succeed in convincing them to try that marvellous drug that can bring them the greatest possible degree of happiness on earth. I cannot understand how such a situation can come about and how it is that young people are willing to take the risk of convincing themselves that the use of such drugs can be an excellent thing? It is true that morbid curiosity, which is practically natural in young people, may explain such a state of affairs. It is for that reason that we should undertake an educational campaign to inform our youth of the ill effects of drug addiction, that would make them understand the woes that will befall them if they become incurable drug addicts. I believe that a preventive campaign would greatly help the enforcement of this excellent legislation now proposed by the government to solve that problem.

In my opinion, in this field as well as in that of alcoholism and other addictions, prevention is much more important than cure and more particularly the suppression of the vice.

Those are the remarks I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker. I put much stress on the importance of prevention and I believe that the minister, who is very well disposed I know, could perhaps add, to the numerous and laudable steps he has taken in this field, a preventive campaign designed to bring home to our youth the danger of taking steps from which there could be no retreat once they accept the proposals of infamous people wishing to benefit from the sale of narcotics.

(Text):

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about this problem. In the first place, I do not think there is any easy solution for it. If it is to be solved, it will require a comprehensive and co-ordinated attack from many angles. Not the least is the aspect raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall), the question of the countries of origin of illicit drugs. He refrained from naming those countries. I do not think he should have refrained. They are well known. It is not difficult to spot the source of illicit drugs, and there is a rather shrewd suspicion that in the main the great proportion of them originates in communist countries. There is also a suspicion that there may be a certain amount of deliberation in this illicit supply. I should like the minister to comment on this particular point.

With respect to the question of treatment, the suggestion has been made that doctors be allowed to prescribe freely for drug addicts. I do not think that is any solution because—

Mr. Martin: Let us clearly understand that there is nothing in the law that prevents a doctor from treating any patient in the matter of drugs as he does any other patient.

Mr. Trainor: I understand that.

Mr. Martin: We insist that he be honourable, responsible and honest in the matter. Those are the only limitations.

Mr. Trainor: I understand that thoroughly. I should merely like to point out the reason why a good many doctors do not take advantage of that privilege. It is chiefly because they realize that the drug addict who honestly and sincerely wants to be cured is rare indeed, and actually all they would be providing would be a convenient source of supply.

Another point on which I think most authorities agree is that addicts cannot be adequately treated unless they are under constant control and supervision. That means confinement to an institution. There is no point in trying to treat addicts on an ambulant basis where they are not under adequate control at all times. The United States has instituted adequate control probably more than any other country, and they have found that their percentage of cures is rather small considering the enormous expenditure required.

Therefore I say that there is no simple solution to this problem. It requires a co-ordinated effort on all fronts. In the first place I think there should be more control of manufacture on the international level. We know of course that in various oriental countries and also in some European countries there are large factories devoted to the illicit manufacture of drugs for export. We also know that this is done with the full knowledge and consent of the governments of these countries. Unless something can be done on the international level it is futile for us to try to tackle the problem in Canada. The supply is coming into the country and the profits are huge. Therefore there is no really good chance of controlling the problem in that way unless we can eliminate illicit manufacture.

In the second place, I think it is quite true that the police are not the proper agency to handle addiction. I think there should be at least one institution or possibly a wing or portion of an institution in every province devoted to the curing of addicts, and if we do these things I think there is a reasonable chance that we can at least lessen, if not eliminate, the problem of addiction.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the minister speaks now he will conclude the debate.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, there is one phase of the problem to which I wish to refer. The question of rehabilitation has been dealt with particularly by the medical men in the house, and I want to deal with the penalty sections and to secure from the minister an explanation with regard thereto. I think it is generally agreed, and it needs no repetition, that trafficking in narcotics is one of the most terrible offences that can be committed. Indeed, it has been described as murder by instalments. In many ways it is a more serious offence than homicide although not regarded as such in our law.

I agree with putting teeth into the law. I think that what has been done represents a very considerable step forward in assisting the authorities to enforce the law and to secure a conviction where a crime has been committed. The record for the years 1951 to 1953 inclusive indicates that there have been 1,062 convictions of which 990 were convictions for illegal possession and 72 were for trafficking. Having regard to the tremendous returns available to the trafficker, I suggest to the minister that the penalties provided are not in keeping with the enormity of the offence.

Mr. Martin: My friend means that they are not severe enough?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Martin: If the hon. member is only going to deal with penalties, does he not think that he could do so when we come to the sections? I am interested in what he is saying.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate that. I was going to ask the minister to make a general statement on the subject. I believe that the penalties are inadequate. They are no deterrent to a wrongdoer who can make a fortune out of the operation of trafficking. The records show that a narcotic worth $10 or $12 often brings $5,000 to $8,000 when ultimately sold to the individual users. I do not know whether we have any Lucky Lucianos in Canada—

Mr. Martin: We have got one of them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says that we have. My opinion is that the penalty, even though now being increased, is not in keeping with the seriousness of the offence. I think the provisions made for enforcement go a long way toward plugging many of the loopholes available today to those who engage in this despicable traffic. I believe that while we are at it we should make the mandatory penalty a good deal more than a minimum of six months.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I will not delay the minister long but I do want to add my congratulations to those already offered with respect to the introduction of this legislation. In my opinion the dope or narcotic problem in Canada is becoming more and more serious all the time. Until a short time ago I think the main centres of trouble were in the coastal cities but I believe that the dope problem can be found now in almost every large city of Canada. The worst aspect of the whole thing is that it is affecting the youth of our country more than the older people.

Mr. Martin: But that is not true.

Mr. Thomas: It is coming to that. The minister says that is not true, but it is coming to that point.

Mr. Martin: If my hon. friend knew the difficulties of enforcement he would understand why I am so concerned about such a statement being made. I assure my hon. friend that is not the fact, and when we come to certain sections of the bill I will be able to indicate that. It would not be fair to lead the world to believe that the youth of Canada are now more victimized by this depravity than the older population of our country, because that is not the situation.

Mr. Thomas: Possibly if the minister had let me complete my statement, I would have clarified it. I did not intend to say that at the present time there are more youths than older people taking this drug, but the fact remains that the problem, so far as the youth is concerned, is getting worse. It is getting worse for the very reason that the dope peddlers are getting children started in order to obtain further outlets. In many cases these youths are started when they are quite young, they become addicted and have to have the drug. The peddler simply says, "All right, you go out and find more people to take it and sell it and we will furnish you with whatever you need." In that way, the problem is becoming more and more serious so far as the youth of this country is concerned.

As a matter of fact, I do not know how true it is but not long ago I was told that if you want to get any narcotic in Edmonton you go to one of the better-known high schools. I could give the minister the name of it in private, but I do not want to make it public. It is said to be the centre of the dope trade in the city of Edmonton.

Mr. Martin: I can assure my hon. friend that is not the case. We know where the centre is.

Mr. Thomas: I am glad the minister assures me of that. As I said a moment ago, I am not sure of the reliability of the source of my information, but that was told to me and I pass it on to the minister in case he wants to take another look at it.

I shall go along with the member who spoke last when he said that he believes the penalty should be more severe. So far as I am concerned I think it should be more severe. I feel that the maximum of fourteen years should be made a minimum of fourteen years. In any event, if anyone is caught peddling dope to a minor in this country, I think he should be sentenced to life imprisonment, because he is killing that youth as surely as if he took a knife to him, and in a whole lot dirtier way. Such a young person will be condemned to a sort of living death for many years. As previous speakers have done, I should like to urge the minister to consider consultation with the provinces in the setting up of clinics across the country. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg South said he did not agree that was a solution. It is not a solution because you cannot reform an addict if he does not want to be reformed.

The last speaker said that these drugs are being cut down until they reach the point where ten cents' worth is sold for about $10, or about 100 to 1 profit. If the people who used the drugs felt that whenever they had to have them they could go and get a minimum shot at some supervised clinic, then they would not have to go to these illegal peddlers and pay such enormous prices. It is not the use of the drug itself that causes the crime, it is the need for it; that is what drives the addict to commit robbery and so on. Many of these addicts could be a credit to society. They could lead useful lives if they could be kept on a minimum dosage. Such a scheme has been tried, as was pointed out earlier, in many European countries. These European clinics also offer medical and psychiatric treatment, and in some cases perform cures. However, if they cannot cure the addict they can at least help him to lead a normal life.

I do not think I can usefully add anything more. I do not want the minister to think I am condemning the youth of Canada for using drugs. I do not want to overemphasize the situation so far as the youth of Canada is concerned, but I would remind the minister that the most fertile ground the dope peddler can find is amongst the youth of this country. I would urge that the death penalty or life imprisonment be imposed upon anyone caught peddling drugs to minors.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I thank the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) for his words of tribute to the law officers who are responsible for the enforcement of this very important measure.

First of all, I should like to take this opportunity of announcing that Canada will, as of January 1 next year, prohibit the legal importation of heroin into this country. This decision is in accordance with the terms of the resolution unanimously adopted by the world health organization in May, 1953, which provided that the manufacture and use of heroin for any purpose be abolished. Canada, of course, supported this resolution which was unanimously approved at the meeting of the narcotics commission of the United Nations a month ago. The implementation of this resolution will not work any hardship or inconvenience on medical practitioners, since other less dangerous drugs with equally effective properties are available in substitution for heroin.

The prohibition of the importation of heroin will not, of course, affect the legitimate use of such stocks of heroin as are at present in this country. It will mean, however, that no further importations of this drug will be permitted, and as heroin is not manufactured in Canada there will be no further supplies available once the stock as of January 1 is exhausted by legitimate agents. While no immediate effect on the incidence of addiction can be expected from the prohibition on the importation of heroin, an eventual reduction in world supplies of this drug will undoubtedly substantially help in reaching a solution of this portion of the problem.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the chief source, the legitimate source, of this drug?

Mr. Martin: There are several legitimate sources. I do not think it is desirable that I should name the areas at this time. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South said, in at least one instance the drug is supplied with the knowledge of the government of that nation.

It is impossible to say exactly how many persons in Canada are addicted to the use of narcotic drugs. The number is not likely much more than 3,000. The geographical distribution is confined mainly to the larger cities, with the majority being located in Vancouver and the substantial remainder in the cities of Toronto, Montreal, Hamilton, Windsor, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Calgary. In the discussion that we have had thus far, I think the house has indicated that there is a keen interest and a strong desire to cope as effectively as possible with this unfortunate human problem. I cannot agree that there is any country much worse than another. I think that the enforcement agencies on the continent of North America are more effective, however—and are recognized as such—than in any other countries of the world. As the United Nations itself has indicated, the statistics of some countries do not really represent the situation in those countries, whose reporting quite obviously is inadequate. To suggest, as is said officially, that there are only 300 addicts in one country when I happen to know, on the admission of the minister responsible, that there are many thousands, is not to give any indication of what the real situation is.

And so this is a human problem, and the solution is by no means an easy one. It is one for which mankind has been striving for a long time. I might say to the house that there has been no other problem in my department that has given me more concern, and about which I have spent as much personal time, as this one. It is a very difficult problem and, so far as I am concerned, it is my desire to make as great a contribution to its solution as I can.

Valuable as it has been, the discussion this morning has revealed that there is a great deal of confusion and misunderstanding with respect to the kind of people who are addicted, their motivations, and what we can do to help them. Nothing was said this morning about the decision taken by the government a year ago, which I announced in the house, in our efforts to try to do something not only on the punitive but on the curative side. It will be recognized that under our constitution the punitive aspect is clearly the responsibility of the federal government. Constitutionally, the curative is the responsibility of the provincial governments who, alone, have the primary responsibility for health policy.

Recognizing however that the problem is national, I announced a plan of action a year ago in the house in an effort to try, in cooperation with the provinces, to cope with this matter. As a result we now have operating in British Columbia a committee headed by one of the most distinguished mental health authorities in the country, Dr. George Stevenson, formerly head of the London mental hospital, who is engaged in a most vigorous study of this problem in British Columbia at the present time.

The decision to set up such a committee was arrived at as the result of agreement with the government of British Columbia. The full cost of the committee's operations is being borne by the federal government. The aim is to see whether, from a careful study of the individuals in that province and elsewhere who use drugs, and from a consideration of other situations connected with this problem, we can learn what has not been learned in other jurisdictions in other parts of the world. And just as quickly as that group has made its findings, and they have been submitted, I have told all the provincial governments in Canada that we will be prepared, under the national health program, to consider proposals—which, basically and constitutionally, mind you, are provincial—in an effort to deal with this problem on the curative side.

What the results will be, I do not know, but I do know that the committee will be interested in doing what I, myself, did a year and a half ago when, in company with officers of my department, I visited two institutions in the United States where an effort is being made to deal with this problem on a curative basis. I told the house about this a year ago. However, this morning's discussion revealed that apparently on that occasion I did not stress sufficiently what I had said.

The effort made in those two institutions was to get drug addicts under their control—control of the doctor, control of the psychiatrist, control of the social psychiatric worker, and the like—to see what could be done. I think I should say that the results have not been very satisfying in those two institutions—the only institutions of their kind in the world.

However, the achievements or the results of this kind of control and treatment are being considered carefully for study here at home. We are also studying the experience of clinics established in a certain number of states in the United States. I am thinking particularly of clinics in Los Angeles where a drug addict could go and, under the supervision of a doctor, receive treatment in given quantity. I can say that those who have given this matter study are wholly convinced that that certainly is no solution. To give unlimited quantities of drugs to addicts is not to help them, and certainly it is not going to result in any successful mitigation of or reduction in the incidence of crime or the amount of addiction. Those clinics were closed because the bitter experience was that they increased the drug addiction habit.

And so, while it may look easy to suggest that one way to control this problem is to give an addict all he needs, until he is satisfied, in the absence of a place where he can be controlled and continuously supervised that solution is one which does not commend itself to us at this time.

In the two institutions to which I referred there is an abridged form of the unlimited-use procedure. But there the results, likewise, have not been, as I indicated a moment ago, as successful as we had hoped they might be. And so we are faced with this very human problem, this very difficult human problem, that has taken hold of other countries as well as our own.

We are fortunate that our situation is by no means among the worst. I think it is sufficient here to reiterate what I said before, that in spite of the publicity that from time to time has been given to an occasional—I will not say "indiscretion" because the word is not strong enough—to an occasional action on the part of some minors in our country, they do not represent the youth of this land.

In Vancouver, the city where the number of addicts is greatest, in the last two and a half years the number of minors under the age of 21 using drugs was much less than 25. I do not want to give the exact number, for a reason that may sound odd, but which is in fact a very good reason, and has to do with a particular case that is now current. But this does not in any way reflect some of the newspaper accounts that have been given—newspaper accounts that have gone outside this country, which I could show to hon. members and which, as they do not really reflect the true situation in this country, do not do our country much good.
