Someone will suggest that the role of the police officer is one which does not suggest a cure or a remedy for this problem. I quite agree that, on the curative or medicinal side, there can be no doubt about that. But we must not let our interest in humanity run away with the practical situation that attends us, because the greater number—and I say this advisedly—the greater number of drug addicts in this country are individuals who, before they began using drugs, were certainly individuals who came within the reach of the law officers of the crown. And the amount of trafficking that goes on among so-called innocent drug addicts is, I am sure, much greater than the house would think was the case. Therefore we have to try and appreciate what we are seeking to do in the bill now before us. We have to try by effective enforcement measures, which are not at the present time what we would like, to deal with certain situations that we want to get at, which I think with these amendments we will be able to get at in the course of the next few months.

This does not represent all that we are going to try to do. I hope that once the Stevenson survey has been completed in Vancouver and other studies in the country have been made pursuant to the activities we shall be able once again, in co-operation with the provinces, to see whether there is not something more that we can do on the curative side. I assure the house of my very deep interest in seeing that this is done. I should say also, contrary to common belief, it is not an easy thing to buy drugs in the illicit market in Canada, and the source of entry is not the city of Vancouver.

Vigorous enforcement has taught drug traffickers to be wary in their transactions. They deal only with persons known to them, and whose bona fides have been established. Hon. members will have read in the press that the police investigators who have lived with and as addicts in order to be accepted by the fraternity in their efforts to expose the traffickers have had a remarkable measure of success which we hope under these new amendments will be even greater.

I thank the house for its interest in this problem. I am sure that this general debate has been helpful. Regardless of where we sit in this house, we are all engaged in trying to arrest this problem. The amendments to the act which we are dealing with at the moment are relatively simple, but they will give us power more effectively to deal with the very serious problem of trafficking. We shall deal with the larger problem, as I say, when we have, as a result of our survey, a further opportunity of discussing this with the provincial governments. I hope that survey and that kind of co-operation will give us an opportunity of taking a forward step in this very vital matter.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Definitions.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, I find myself in complete agreement with what the minister has said about this. There has been a tendency to regard this as a problem that has been written up in the Sunday supplements and in some of the cheaper literature in a way that appeals to the morbid in our makeup. But I also find myself in agreement with my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South, regarding the question of treatment, and the ability of doctors, druggists and so forth to obtain drugs. Under this first clause I want to say a few words on this matter.

Several times in the debate the minister had to pause to mention the fact that quantities of the drugs could be prescribed by doctors and were available for so-called treatment. In this I wish to pay tribute to the narcotics branch. They have done a wonderful job; but where an addict is registered with the department—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong in this—it is possible to obtain a sufficient amount of the drug to carry him on. Some of these unfortunate people—and they are not all the type we are talking about—become addicts owing to some chronic disease, or something of that nature. This clause will appeal particularly to them.

There is a matter of argument about treatment. Personally, I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South that, in so far as treatment is concerned, it is difficult to believe these people at any time. They are moral degenerates. Again I agree that unless these people are under supervision there is no chance of treating them as ambulatory cases, so that the argument regarding total withdrawal versus this kind of treatment is a particularly difficult one. I do feel that they should be placed in an institution. To those people who are arguing against this sort of thing and the whole withdrawal of the drug, and who would like to obtain quantities of it outside, I say it is not a successful type of treatment.

I mention these facts on this first clause in order to correct some of the impressions that have been made. I also agree with the minister that this matter is not so severe in Canada. It is not such a large question, but it is a dangerous one. It is not as great as we would be led to believe by literature of the type I have mentioned. I do not believe that the young people are concerned in this matter. I also agree that those people were probably psychiatric problems before they ever became addicts of the drug. I am glad that the penalties for trafficking are so strong.

It is quite true that those people who sell drugs are making other addicts buy and pay a tremendous price for their drugs, which leads them to some other form of criminal act in order to obtain money with which to buy the drugs. But I simply want to clear up the matter with respect to this form of ambulatory treatment. The drug addict will once in a while write an article for some periodical in which he will complain bitterly that it would be far better for him if he were given a limited supply of this drug. Remember this: none of these people can be trusted. There is only one way in which to treat these people, and that is to put them in an institution, and the question of withdrawal or the cutting down of their drugs can then be considered. To treat them as ambulatory cases is just simply out of the question.

We do get the impression that this is a tremendous problem, and that the young people are faced with it. I was glad to hear the minister decry that sort of thing. I do not think it is so severe as all that, but it does exist. It can become a problem here. Any measure taken to cut down on the trafficking in the supplies of this drug is a measure well taken.

So far as heroin is concerned, there are uses for it, but we can get along very nicely without it. It is one of the most dangerous of drugs, a derivative of opium. Practically all of them come from the one source.

I am glad that every person has spoken in favour of this bill; every person is of the one mind, namely, that this is a dangerous thing; but let us get away from this Sunday supplement lurid thinking, as I suggested, and tackle this question on a common-sense basis, recognizing that in some areas it does create a problem, particularly where there are traffickers who control some of these people who are led to make money out of it. Let us look at it on that basis. I do not like any suggestion that the youth of Canada has been concerned in this matter at all. I do not believe that. Our country is small; but, as our population grows, the traffic again becomes a problem.

I said I recognized there were uses for heroin, but there are other drugs that can be used in its place. We can get along very well without it. It is the most dangerous of all the drugs that we might consider under this act. The best thing we can do is to consider this act on the same basis and try to deal with the question as the act proposes to deal with the traffickers, those who are concerned in spreading opium derivatives throughout the country and inducing other people to use them. There is a tendency on behalf of the addicts to teach others. They do like to teach other people to become addicts. The whole question so far as this bill is concerned is this. Is the legislation adequate; does it provide suitable penalties; and is there anything further we can do to cut down this traffic in illicit drugs?

The Deputy Chairman: It being one o'clock—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, shall we carry this clause?

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the desire of the committee to hear the minister on this clause?

Mr. Martin: No, Mr. Chairman, can we pass this clause?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Winch: But, Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss some of the remarks made by the previous speaker.

Mr. Martin: The hon. gentleman was really discussing the matter in a general way. Could we not pass clause 1? I think that is the general wish of the committee.

Clause agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at one o'clock we were discussing clause 2. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, at the time that we rose I expressed a desire to speak on certain statements made by the hon. member for Lanark. The minister asked if we could pass clause 1 and said that it would be all right if I could discuss what I had in mind on another clause. May I discuss now, under clause 2, the remarks that I had in mind?

Mr. Martin: What were they?

Mr. Winch: The remarks that were made by the hon. members for Lanark on clause 1.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member is referring to the doctors and so on?

Mr. Winch: Yes; and the abnormality which he mentioned.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps clause 3 is the more general one.

Mr. Martin: I would suggest that the hon. member go ahead. I should think that we should indicate now that the general discussion took place in the general debate before we went into committee. It is true that I did not intervene when the hon. member for Lanark was speaking. I refrained from doing so because he had been cooperative, as have all hon. members. However, I think we should, in so far as we can do so, try to be as specific as we can. It might be better for my hon. friend to wait until we come to the section dealing with the regulations later on.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Blair: When the house rose at one o'clock I think the minister agreed that the hon. member would have a chance to answer but was anxious to get the first clause through.

Mr. Martin: I do not think the committee would mind allowing the hon. member to go ahead, but we would not want to make this procedure the rule.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, on this clause, tying in with clause 1, I should like to say first of all that I appreciate greatly the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare at the conclusion of the debate on second reading of the bill. But on the discussion of clause 1, which now ties in with clause 2, I should like to say that the experience of the hon. member for Lanark, in my opinion, does not tie in first of all with my own personal experience, not as a medical man, but in interviewing a number of addicts in the past fifteen years in British Columbia. It also does not tie in with the findings of doctors in the United States who have made an investigation of a number of cases.

From the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark I gathered that a great majority of those who become drug addicts start from a position of being abnormal. Unfortunately there are not any studies that have been made in Canada on that phase as yet. I greatly appreciate the studies which are now being instituted by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The only record to which I can go back is the record of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. I cannot agree that, in the main, those who start on drug addiction are abnormal. If that statement is correct, according to the studies made in Great Britain it is a reflection on the professions and especially on the doctors' profession. I do not believe that the majority of the doctors' profession who unfortunately become addicts were abnormal when they started on the addiction.

I am going to quote from the report of the economic and social council of the commission on narcotic drugs issued by the United Nations and I am going to quote from the report on Great Britain and Northern Ireland. In the report that was made in 1951 by the United Nations, at that time there were reported to be 301 who were addicts receiving medical aid, of whom 75 were doctors, 1 was a dentist and I a pharmacist. I think the fact that that record exists is first of all because of professional pressure and, in the second place, because of the proximity of drugs.

In studying the report of the United Nations I find that in a majority of cases where there is a registration system, it is the professional services which are involved. I do not think they are abnormal when they start. I have had drawn to my attention only three studies of addicts made on the North American continent, and they were made in the United States. Unfortunately I have not the report of the three studies but I have with me a report made on two of the studies. Those studies were made by Dr. Lawrence Kolb of the United States public health service and Dr. Charles Schultz. May I say, sir, that they were investigating only whether persons, as they became drug addicts, were normal or abnormal. I am not going to take up the time of the committee by giving all the results. I shall give only their final conclusion, which was as follows: They admit that normal individuals not only become addicted but that once they are addicted they may have as much difficulty in quitting as does anyone else. Under their evidence it is shown that although the majority, in their estimation, are abnormal at the time they take to drugs, a high percentage are strictly normal at the time they start.

In view of the evidence in Great Britain that the highest percentage of those who take to drugs are from the professional services and from the doctors' services, I think we can take it as conclusive evidence that a great majority start as normal individuals but, because of circumstances, pressures and strains, use drugs as an escape.

I was most interested in one phase of the remarks made by the hon. member for Lanark. That ties in with the most interesting information given us by the Minister of National Health and Welfare with respect to the rights of the medical profession to take care of drug addicts under the present legislation. This is going to be my final statement on this phase of the matter. It may not sit very well with those members of the house who are of the medical profession, but I do want to make this statement because of my interest in the subject, my own experiences in British Columbia over many years and my conversations with a great many doctors in that province and some in other provinces.

I should like to tell the Minister of National Health and Welfare that there are a great many medical men in the dominion who do not realize that they have the right to treat an addict and, if necessary, issue prescriptions to him based on their diagnosis of the case. I know that for a fact because I have talked to a great many doctors. I should like to recommend to the minister that either his own department or the national association of doctors should see to it that the position of doctors under the law is made clear to all practising physicians in Canada. My personal experience is that a great many in the profession are not aware of their legal position.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. Contrary to the experience of the hon. member for Lanark, and I know he speaks from his own experience, as a layman who has discussed the problem with addicts in western Canada I have found that there are many who want to be cured. There are many who do not want to resort to criminal activities, thereby landing themselves back in jail. On more than one occasion I have tried to refer such men and women who have come to me to the medical profession and I have come up against a very serious obstacle, the reason for which I can quite understand. Under the law as it now exists doctors can take drug addicts as patients and can issue prescriptions for their requirements day by day or week by week. But I want to emphasize that because of their understanding of the law a great many medical men who are humanitarian in outlook and by nature and who would like to look after drug addicts are afraid to do so.

The reason that has been given to me by more than one British Columbia doctor is that if they started to issue prescriptions to drug addicts, even after their own diagnosis, the first thing that would happen if they issued more than a very few would be that the R.C.M.P. would come right to their offices—I agree with their doing that—and wanting to know why they were issuing that number of prescriptions and why these people required the amount of narcotics they were buying. Perhaps because of ignorance of the situation these doctors said that they might be subjected to investigation and inquiry on account of the narcotic prescriptions they had issued from the point of view of whether they were legal or illegal and whether they were issuing bona fide prescriptions or were actually, in a legal sense, peddling narcotics.

That is a serious situation to me, and I have been told that by more than one doctor in the province of British Columbia who believes that something should be done about addicts. I can understand their worry and their indecision. That is my experience as the result of my conversations with a number of doctors. I want to draw that to the attention of the minister to emphasize what I said on second reading, namely, that I believe that a more intelligent program of spreading knowledge among the profession, the general public and addicts will prove very beneficial to all concerned.

Mr. Blair: Possibly I was responsible for the use of the word "abnormal", but I was simply pointing out that people who are chronic invalids and are suffering from some chronic condition are led into the position where they do require further supplies because they find it very difficult to cut out the drug entirely. Possibly the physical condition which necessitated the drug in the first instance is still in existence. That type of patient would do very well on ambulatory treatment with a supply of narcotics given to them. That was the type of person to whom I referred. Other than that, the drug addict is abnormal only in the fact that he has terrific difficulty in exerting the will power necessary to do away with this terrible addiction.

So far as treatment is concerned, an argument may arise whether it would be better to have ambulatory or institutional treatment. I hold that institutional treatment would be better if you had the institutions capable of handling these people. One must realize that, having become addicts, they are really ill, and sometimes when they are thrown into jail and subjected to sudden withdrawal of the drug they go through the tortures of the damned. I realize that these are sick people and I feel that if institutional treatment leading towards a complete cure could be provided it would be a desirable thing. The bill has given rise to this discussion although I think it was primarily meant to deal with the traffic in illicit drugs.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Offences and penalties.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask a question or two on clause 3. I note that the penalties provided in the new subsection 1 of section 4 as it will be enacted by clause 3 of the bill have attached to them the phrase, "the court has no power to impose less than the minimum penalty prescribed in this subsection." I note also that no such provision is attached to the penalties provided under subclause 2 and subclause 3. Looking at the matter as a layman, it appears to me that the offences in subclause 2 and 3 are more serious than the offences in subclause 1. If that is the case, why should there be that difference so far as the penalty is concerned?

Mr. Martin: We are dealing in the first case with addicted people for whom we feel that a minimum sentence of six months is desired.

Mr. Blair: For the purpose of cure.

Mr. Knowles: It is clear, is it, that in the first case we are dealing with people who may be addicts?

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Whereas in the second and third cases we are dealing with people who are, in one form or another, trafficking in dope.

Mr. Martin: That is right. Our experience in the courts has a disposition to treat the addict more leniently than is otherwise the case, and that is why we are making sure we at least have a minimum of six months. Our experience has shown that often judges have a sympathetic heart, not fully appreciating the situation, and in some cases do not impose even the proposed minimum; but they generally do in the case of trafficking.

Mr. Knowles: Is it the view of the minister, that the minimum sentences imposed upon those who have become addicted should not be subject to the discretion of the judge—after all addicts are sick people—but that discretion should be allowed in the case of traffickers or peddlers? It would seem to me that the provision I have quoted should be attached to the other two classes, rather than to the first class.

Mr. Martin: Our view is just the opposite.

Mr. Philpott: I want to say a word on clause 3 with regard to penalties for trafficking. It seems to me we have had some interesting discussion here today about the necessity for institutional treatment of people who are addicts. I feel that in any enlightened society there should be every sympathy for the victims of the drug addiction habit. If anything, this bill errs on the side of leniency for the people who are guilty of trafficking in drugs.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether in any civilized society the community is justified in retaining the death penalty. But if we are justified in any respect in retaining the death penalty for murder, for treason or for assisting an enemy—not long ago we passed a bill making it an offence to assist an enemy even with whom we are not at war—in my opinion the trafficker in drugs should be liable to the extreme penalty. The same is true of the person who deliberately organizes the sale of narcotic drugs. He is not only a traitor to his country, but he is a wholesale murderer. If anything is clear it is the fact that the victims of this drug habit are destroyed in their entire personality; they are destroyed physically; they are destroyed spiritually; and they are destroyed as human beings. In my opinion, as long as we are going to retain the death penalty, we should impose the death penalty upon traffickers in drugs.

Mr. Winch: Could you inform me, Mr. Chairman, whether we are considering clause 2 or clause 3?

The Chairman: We are considering clause 3; clause 2 has been carried.

Mr. Winch: I am not quite certain as to whether this question should be asked on clause 3, which deals with possession, or clause 8, which deals with occupier. If I may, sir, I should like to ask a question on clause 3 because it deals with possession. Can the minister explain to me what is meant by possession? I have in mind a case that occurred in the city of Vancouver. A known drug addict had a room in a hotel, to which he invited certain guests. There were two women and a man who had a criminal record, but no conviction whatever in respect of drugs. The room was raided by the R.C.M.P. who found in it a small amount of drugs.

When the case came to court the two women were discharged, and the one who was the registered owner of the room and a known drug addict was found guilty. The man who was known as a criminal, but who had no convictions with regard to drugs and who said he was only a visitor, was also found guilty under the narcotics act. I am not saying a word on behalf of the criminal except to ask why a man who was a guest in a room, and who had no convictions under the narcotics act, should be charged under that act?

Mr. Martin: I do not know what the facts are. If my hon. friend will speak to me about it, I shall be glad to look into it. Of course, it is a judicial act.

Mr. Winch: Yes, I am interested now in the section on possession. Does the wording of this mean that if you happen to be in a domicile, whether it is a hotel, motel or a home, where there are drugs, you shall be charged as—

Mr. Martin: A charge could be laid under clause 8 of the bill; that would be the clause. It is what is called in law constructive possession.

Mr. Winch: That is very important. Does it mean a completely innocent person can be charged?

Mr. Martin: It is a matter of evidence. My hon. friend is putting a hypothetical case to me. Possession can be proven in many ways. There could be actual possession or what is known in law as constructive possession. If it is a matter of constructive possession and the crown wishes to base its case on the circumstances related by my hon. friend, it would be a matter for assessment and determination by a judicial officer. If it was a matter of constructive and not actual possession, it would come within the provisions of clause 8 of the bill.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Licensed person not to supply drugs.

Mr. Mitchell (Sudbury): In speaking on clause 4, Mr. Chairman, I should like to touch merely on that part of the narcotic drug act that has to do with the administration of this act and particularly the part that affects pharmacists in their everyday duties of handling narcotics and narcotic compounds. In this connection I might say that we prefer the use of the word "pharmacists" rather than the word "druggists" as set out in this bill. The word "pharmacists" is naturally the proper one inasmuch as the faculty in the University of Toronto is the faculty of pharmacy and students graduate with the degree of pharmaceutical chemist, pharmaceutical bachelor and so on. At no time does the word "druggist" enter into that particular faculty. I should like to draw to the attention of the department the fact that "pharmacists" should be used in the hope this will be corrected at some later time. I think there is a suggestion that the word "druggist" will be altered in the act and the word "pharmacist" used.

The portion of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act about which I was going to speak is the result of the fine co-operation between this department and the various pharmacist groups, particularly in the province of Ontario. I had the privilege of serving on a number of these, and the regulations that have been brought about by these co-operative meetings have been very much appreciated by the pharmacists. There were certain regulations and alleviations for which we asked. These were very thoroughly considered; and I might say that practically all the regulations have been written into this bill. In fact, the department has gone even farther and given us concessions for which we had not asked. I feel that this shows sound administration of what we believe is good legislation.

As you are probably aware, the pharmacists are the custodians of the larger stock of these drugs in their stores where they are kept under lock and key, according to regulations, for use when a prescription authorizing their use is received. When this order, or prescription, is received we are perfectly at liberty to dispense it, ascertaining, of course, that it is properly signed and dated by the prescribing physician.

Under the new regulations, which I would like to speak about particularly, some alleviation of the act is suggested which will be a great help to the public, the physician, and the pharmacist. It must be understood, of course, that the medication prescribed would be in the nature of narcotic compounds and not the straight narcotics as we know them. In other words, a written prescription is necessary for what we call the heavy narcotics such as morphine, cocaine, demerol and heroin. The act has not been changed with respect to them, and we will continue to handle them in the same way. These narcotic compounds are made up largely of codeine and in some cases heroin composition, and are used mainly in the relief of pain and coughs.

The regulations are not altered in respect to the straight narcotics which must be written by a physician and dated before being dispensed. But in the case of codeine compounds, and the like, the amendment suggests that an oral order can be acted upon and the prescription written and signed by the pharmacist receiving the order. I would draw particular attention to the word "oral". The onus, of course, is on the pharmacist to ascertain that he is talking to the licensed prescriber, in each case a doctor, before he can deliver this preparation to a patient. The advantage of this procedure can be easily illustrated and will hasten medication to a legitimate patient at all times. Suppose, after office hours, a physician is contacted at home or elsewhere by a patient for relief of a complaint for which medication containing a narcotic compound would be effective: the physician can call a pharmacy and in a very short time the patient receives the medication so prescribed. The medication, of course, must be compounded with two or more other ingredients in therapeutic doses, and cannot be for hypodermic administration.

How many of us, for example, have received a bottle of cough mixture from a physician and on returning the empty bottle to the pharmacy for a refill have been told that it cannot be done without a new prescription from your doctor. This would entail another visit to your family physician to receive a new piece of paper authorizing the pharmacist to renew this medication. Under the new amendments, the physician could be contacted by phone and, if he felt it should be repeated, the order could be given at that time, to the pharmacist. It is indeed an improvement in service to the patient and certainly less trying on the feelings of both the patient and the physician.

As for the increase in penalties for unlawful trafficking in narcotics, I will leave this to the exponents of the bill, as we pharmacists are not concerned in this phase of the act. We have our rules and regulations to live up to, and our end of the act is being carefully adhered to.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege related to the remarks made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin before the committee rose for lunch. I sent him a note about half an hour ago indicating that I was going to rise on this question of privilege. I am sorry he has not been able to return to the house.

Mr. Martin: Why not do this after the bill has been discussed—not now.

Mr. Prudham: I thought that if I were to rise now the hon. member might want to answer my remarks before this debate is concluded.

Mr. Martin: My colleague and I usually co-operate in these matters, as members of the government. I would suggest to him that the more appropriate place to raise the question of privilege would be when we come to the end of the bill, and not on this particular section. Otherwise we would have a debate covering all sorts of things which have nothing to do with the section. If my colleague does not mind I would suggest that his question of privilege be raised at that time.

Mr. Knowles: Can you not settle it out of court?

The Chairman: I understand that clauses 4, 5 and 6 have been carried.

Mr. Martin: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman; I wish to make one brief announcement concerning the implications of clause 4, because of its interest to the medical profession and to the pharmaceutical profession generally, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Sudbury.

There are many medicines commonly in use containing small amounts of narcotic drugs, and which do not involve any danger or any possibility of abuse of the requirement that there must be a written prescription by a doctor. What I say does not apply of course to codeine, opium, demerol and that type of drug. What I refer to now are compounds in which these are used. Such things as cough preparations and mild analgesics containing small quantities of narcotic medication provide an illustration of this kind of preparation.

And so it is proposed under this clause to make provision by means of regulation for the prescription requirements necessary in this regard. In this connection preparations of the kind mentioned would be dispensed from now on, after the passage of the regulations, authority for which is given under this bill, on the basis of oral prescriptions or orders by the physician or other prescribing authority.

This is a concession which has been sought by the medical as well as by the pharmaceutical profession as being one which would facilitate their heavy responsibilities, and at the same time would not give rise to any possibility of abuse, nor would it permit the diversion of drugs into illicit channels. The regulations will provide of course for safeguards. A druggist will be required to reduce a prescription at once into writing. He must take steps to verify that the person giving the oral prescription was a person authorized to do so. But we feel that this is a practice into which we might venture, and it is proposed under this clause of the bill to give powers to make regulations to cover this particular situation.

Mr. Trainor: Do the regulations concerning heroin, which the minister mentioned at the beginning of the debate, come under this particular clause?

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Martin: Not particularly, no. This clause is purely procedural.

Mr. Trainor: What clause would cover the regulations as to heroin? I would like to say a word on that subject.

Mr. Martin: Clause 3; but we have dealt with it.

Mr. Trainor: Does clause 3 mention it?

Mr. Martin: Not specifically, but it deals with the matter of drugs.

Mr. Trainor: According to the minister's remarks, at the present time, so long as the existing stocks last, it will be possible to use heroin. I have the greatest sympathy with the department in their efforts to control the use of heroin, because admittedly it is a very dangerous drug; but at the same time there are doctors, and there are occasions in medical practice when the use of heroin may be thought to be very desirable, if not an absolute necessity. I refer particularly to certain obstetrical cases, and also to cases of hopeless and incurable cancer.

Many doctors are of the opinion that heroin is the best possible drug to use in those circumstances. I wonder whether it is altogether justifiable to deprive patients, suffering from the conditions I have described, of the use of a legitimate drug for the alleviation of their suffering? Would the minister care to comment on that?

Mr. Martin: Nothing more than what I have said; there are alternatives, as my hon. friend knows. We are one of the few remaining countries in the world left to take the step of preventing the importation of heroin. We have discussed this with the Canadian Medical Association and the best medical skill that we have in the country, and that is their judgment. The decision was based upon that advice and on our obligation as a member of the United Nations.

Mr. Trainor: Did that advice come from the Canadian Medical Association?

Mr. Martin: We discussed it with the Canadian Medical Association.

Mr. Trainor: I am satisfied.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Prudham: Before the bill is reported I should like to state my question of privilege. When the hon. member for Wetaskiwin was speaking I was called out to the telephone. On my return I heard the conclusion of his remarks and hence was not able to answer him at that time. My question of privilege is that he made a very slanderous statement which casts reflection on the high school students, the high school teachers and the board of education of the city of Edmonton.

The Chairman: Order. I am afraid, from what I have heard so far, the minister is not discussing a question of privilege. He might be in order to carry on a discussion of this kind on the title, but it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Knowles: If any damage was done, this is going to make it worse.

Mr. Prudham: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was able to get a transcript of what the hon. member said leading up to the remarks that I take violent exception to. He said:

> Until a short time ago I think the main centres of trouble were in the coastal cities but I believe that the dope problem can be found now in almost every large city of Canada. The worst aspect of the whole thing is that it is affecting the youth of our country more than the older people.
> Mr. Martin: But that is not true.
> Mr. Thomas: It is coming to that. The minister says that is not true, but it is coming to that point.
> Mr. Martin: If my hon. friend knew the difficulties of enforcement he would understand why I am so concerned about such a statement being made. I assure my hon. friend that is not the fact, and when we come to certain sections of the bill I will be able to indicate that. It would not be fair to lead the world to believe that the youth of Canada are now more victimized by this depravity than the older population of our country, because that is not the situation.
> Mr. Thomas: Possibly if the minister had let me complete my statement, I would have clarified it. I did not intend to say that at the present time there are more youths than older people taking this drug, but the fact remains that the problem, so far as the youth is concerned, is getting worse. It is getting worse for the very reason that the dope peddlers are getting children started in order to obtain further outlets. In many cases these youths are started when they are quite young, they become addicted and have to have the drug. The peddler simply says, "All right, you go out and find more people to take it and sell it and we will furnish you with whatever you need." In that way the problem is becoming more and more serious so far as the youth of this country is concerned.
> As a matter of fact, I do not know how true it is but not long ago I was told that if you want to get any narcotic in Edmonton you go to one of the better-known high schools. I could give the minister the name of it in private, but I do not want to make it public. It is said to be the centre of the dope trade in the city of Edmonton.
> Mr. Martin: I can assure my hon. friend that is not the case. We know where the centre is.

That statement or implication, Mr. Chairman, is a slanderous reflection on every high school student and every high school teacher in the city of Edmonton and on the board of education, and for that matter on the police force. I believe that the hon. member should rise in his place and apologize for having made that statement. If the hon. member is aware of that condition, he should have brought it to the attention of the authorities. I wonder whether he brought it to the attention of the attorney general of Alberta. If he did so, I wonder what action, if any, has been taken or what action the attorney general of Alberta intends to take.

As a representative of the city of Edmonton, I believe it is my duty to speak out in defence of the children of our public and separate high schools. I know that the parents of those children would want me to do so. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman gave much thought to what he said before he made the statement, and I believe that in his own interest and in the interests of everyone concerned he should rise in his place and apologize.

Mr. Thomas: I do not think the minister heard the exact words I used this morning.

Mr. Prudham: I quoted from a transcript of the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Thomas: That is fine. I did not make a direct allegation. I merely told the minister that it had been told to me, and I was giving it to him for what it was worth.

Mr. Prudham: The inference could be drawn from the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Thomas: I made it perfectly clear before, and I am still not making any charge. I said:

> As a matter of fact, I do not know how true it is.

And then I went on to say:

> Not long ago I was told—

Mr. Prudham: Did the hon. member tell the attorney general?

Mr. Thomas: I have not had a chance to talk with him since.

Mr. Prudham: The telephone is handy.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Thomas: If the information is incorrect, the minister suggests that I apologize. I have no hesitation in apologizing. If the facts are not true I will apologize. I have no intention of passing any reflection whatsoever upon Edmonton or upon the schools or anything else; but I did tell the minister, for his own information, what I had been told, if he cared to act on it. I indicated that I felt he should be told that, and as I indicated before, I again said I did not know how authentic the information was. It was told to me casually and I passed it on to the minister for what it was worth.

Mr. Martin: To clear this up, the hon. gentleman says that having heard the facts are not as he stated them this morning he withdraws unreservedly. That is the case. I say that for the good name of the youth of this country and of the schools, the mounted police have investigated every rumour and every suggestion that from time to time has been made that certain schools were the centre of dope rings, and in every case investigated—and there were over 20 high schools—the mounted police found no justification whatsoever for the charges.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the minister say that, and that being the case I shall certainly apologize. If he wants the name of the school, though apparently that may not be necessary, I will gladly pass it on to him. Meantime, I am glad that the facts are not as I heard them.

Title agreed to.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, may I just say a word in answer to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who asked me about the ratification of the opium protocol. I should have observed that Canada ratified the 1953 opium protocol during the first week of May 1954, the necessary instrument of ratification having been deposited with the United Nations by our permanent delegate at New York at that time.

Bill reported, read the third time, by leave, and passed.

DISABLED PERSONS

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF ALLOWANCES—AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. 462, to provide for allowances for disabled persons.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the measure to be introduced to the house at this time is one which, I think, will be marked by a singular approach to unanimity. Few groups of disadvantaged persons in Canada today command the interest and sympathy of the general public to an extent comparable to the disabled, and any measure which seeks to aid constructively those who are permanently and totally disabled is bound to attract the support of all sections of Canadian opinion. I am sure that what I have said is true of all political groups represented in this chamber and you will therefore, Mr. Speaker, readily appreciate the feeling of personal satisfaction which it gives me at this time to be the minister responsible for introducing one more in a series of important social welfare measures by which this government has built up through the years a comprehensive program of social security in a responsible way for the people of Canada.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Fleming: Haven't you one good word to say for parliament?

Mr. Martin: I am sure that almost every hon. member present has had some personal experience within his own family circle, or within the immediate circle of his friends or acquaintances, which will point up the terrible tragedy which invalidity or disability inflicts on the stricken individual and his family. Certainly all of us who represent the people of Canada in this house have personal knowledge of families in our constituencies who have borne unflinchingly through the years the heavy burden of caring for some disabled family member. In thousands of homes across this country Canadian families continue from day to day to carry this heavy burden of responsibility. Most of them carry it without complaint. Only those who have lived in daily contact with such distressing helplessness can fully appreciate the physical, financial and mental strain it can place not only on the helpless individual himself but on all the members of the family group.

To see a young man or a young woman in the full vigour of youth stricken suddenly with some heart-rending disability is a tragedy whose burden can never be fully lifted from the shoulders of those families on whom misfortune falls. Though we, the fortunate and healthy members in society, can do so little to help relieve a tragedy of this kind, and although medical science with all its miraculous accomplishments cannot as yet unlock the secrets of these disabling conditions, we can at least by this measure agree to share some part of the financial burden of caring for the afflicted member.

If we cannot help to ease the mental strain or share the physical burden of care, we can do something to alleviate the financial distress that comes from loss of earning, and to assist in meeting the added financial costs occasioned by invalidity, to ease the pinch of poverty in the home where lack of means accentuates the burden of total and permanent disability.

The measure, Mr. Speaker, now before the house seeks to achieve some part of that objective. It will bring some financial relief to thousands of individuals, and to thousands of harassed, distraught and overburdened families, weighed down with the constant load of caring, day and night, for some helpless loved one.

More than that, through the stimulus which it will give to rehabilitation measures for those who are disabled, this program of disability allowances will bring new hope, new comfort, and new confidence to many others who can be cured but who, failing early rehabilitation, face only a future of increasing helplessness and bleak despair. By turning the spotlight of enlightened and progressive legislation on this hitherto neglected area of social need, we shall achieve increasingly from year to year our twofold purpose of successful rehabilitation to lives of greater usefulness for large numbers of disabled persons and, no less important, a measure of comfort and security for the most helpless of our fellow citizens, the totally and permanently disabled whose welfare is this present legislation's principal concern.

When I spoke briefly on the resolution stage I referred to the interest of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in this matter, and I am glad to see him in the house at this time. I would say to him that I am sure all parties will recognize that this measure is due to a large extent to his initiative. I also want to pay my tribute to hon. members on all sides of this house, notably the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand), the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who moved resolutions from year to year urging the house to give this matter the consideration which we are privileged at this time to give.

I should also mention the part that has been played by a number of provincial governments in making the early enactment of this legislation possible. Three provinces have already passed legislation to provide assistance to disabled persons. Newfoundland passed their dependents allowances act in 1949, Ontario passed their disability pensions act in 1952 and Alberta passed their disability pensions act in 1953.

In the case of Ontario and Alberta, it is perhaps fair to remind the house that when the federal government announced its intention of taking over responsibility for old age security for people of 70 and over, the premier of Ontario indicated that, as a result, that province would be able to save several millions of dollars and he hoped that his province would be able to bring in the measure which is now on the statute books of the province of Ontario.

Since the announcement of the government's intention in the speech from the throne to enact disability allowances legislation at this present session, five other provincial governments have already passed the necessary enabling legislation. Those governments are British Columbia, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan. Therefore, eight out of ten Canadian provinces are now ready to take advantage of the federal government's offer of assistance in this field. There have been no official indications as yet from the provinces of Quebec and Prince Edward Island as to their intentions, but I am confident that all the provinces will wish to take the earliest possible advantage of this offer of federal aid and make this program applicable to their respective jurisdictions. Certainly I have no reason to think from the recent dominion-provincial conference that it is not the intention of every government in this country to take advantage of the legislation the second reading of which I have the honour and privilege of introducing at this time.

This program which we are considering today is but the latest in a series of what I think are responsible, humanitarian measures introduced by the federal government during the past fifteen years to improve the social and health conditions of the people of Canada. As I indicated yesterday when I resisted a motion dealing with a proposed increase in one phase of social security, the action which I was taking then was in part predicated upon a desire to see realized other important and, I think, desirable social measures in Canada. When I refer to the progress of the last fifteen years I have in mind the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940; the Family Allowances Act of 1944; the veterans charter; the national health program of 1948 whose significance, I think—and I accept responsibility for this—has not yet made its impression on the people of this country or, I think, on parliament; the Old Age Security Act of 1951; and the old age assistance and blind persons enactments passed in the same year. Hence we can refer to this new measure as another step in an extremely important program of responsible action taken to provide our people with those social welfare measures which, within our capacity, we feel we can from time to time provide.

At this point I should like to outline briefly the main features of this bill, the purpose of which is to provide a nation-wide system of disability allowances. As the house will recall, this measure was forecast in the speech from the throne. The proposed legislation authorizes the payment of $40 a month to needy persons 18 years of age and over who are totally and permanently disabled. I may say that the measure now before us represents the common denominator of agreement which it was possible to reach at the recent dominion-provincial conference on this matter.

The costs of the payments to be provided under this legislation, like old age assistance payments, will be shared equally by the federal and provincial governments. This will require enabling legislation on the part of each of the participating provinces, and the bill makes provision for agreements to be negotiated by the federal government with each of the provinces concerned. If all of the provinces join in this program it is estimated that from 25,000 to 35,000 disabled Canadians will benefit. The total annual cost will run between $12 million and $16 million, with the federal share of this amount estimated at $6 million to $8 million annually.

In its general outlines, as many members of the house who have examined the context of this bill will recognize, the wording of the new legislation closely parallels that of the Old Age Assistance Act and the Blind Persons Act, both of which received the unanimous approval of parliament in June of 1951. In nine of the thirteen sections of the bill the wording is in fact identical with that of the Old Age Assistance Act except, of course, for the references to "disabled persons" and the use of the term "allowances" instead of "assistance" to describe the payments which will be made.

The four sections of the bill containing features differing in some respects from earlier legislation of a similar kind are sections 3, 7, 11 and 13 of the bill. Most of the points connected with those sections can best be discussed, of course, when we reach the committee stage of the bill but I might perhaps draw special attention at this stage to the following matters.

The maximum amount of the allowance is set at $40 monthly to correspond with existing provisions in Ontario's and Alberta's legislation providing for disability pensions. This amount corresponds also to the provisions of the federal Old Age Security Act, Old Age Assistance Act and Blind Persons Act. The age of eligibility is set at 18 years, the same as in the disability legislation provided for in the province of Ontario. In the province of Alberta the age of eligibility is 21. To meet the concern of certain provinces, some of whom may wish to set a slightly higher age of eligibility, we have provided in section 7 of the bill that any province may, by its own law, designate a higher minimum age if it considers it necessary to do so.

With regard to the amount of $40 I may say all of the provinces thought that was the proper amount and it represents an amount beyond which they were not prepared to go. The residence requirement is set at 10 years, the same as in Ontario's and Alberta's legislation and also in the federal Blind Persons Act.

The income ceilings provided for are the same as those in the federal Old Age Assistance Act and represent the most common wish of the provinces when they were assembled in conference with us here a few months ago. These income ceilings are generally in accordance, therefore, with the preferences expressed by the provinces when we met together.

Provision is made, as is usual in legislation of this character, for the avoidance of duplication between benefits payable under this legislation and comparable benefits paid under other enactments such as the federal Blind Persons Act, Old Age Assistance Act, Old Age Security Act, War Veterans Allowance Act and provincial mothers' allowances laws. Provision is also made, following the precedent established in provincial laws already in effect, for the avoidance of duplication between benefits payable under this legislation and care or maintenance already being provided in institutions of various kinds.

The bill provides for the definition of total and permanent disability to be prescribed by regulation. The definition of this expression "permanently and totally disabled" is, of course—as was noted the other night by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair)—a highly complicated and difficult one. In framing a definition for our purposes, we will draw heavily on the experience of other countries with similar legislation, as well as that of the provinces which presently administer such programs. But even so, the definition will be subject to change and adjustment in the light of our experience as we gain it from year to year. That is why it is proposed, just as in the definition of "blindness" in the Blind Persons Act, to prescribe in the regulations, rather than in the act itself, for "permanent and total disability" to be defined.

I may add that in our department we have done considerable preparatory work on the drafting of a suitable definition, on the basis of our consultations with representatives of the Canadian Medical Association and the senior health and welfare officers of the ten provincial governments. This matter has also been discussed during the past week at the meeting of the Dominion Council of Health, where all provincial deputies were present; and the definition there formulated will go forward for consideration and, we hope, approval by the conference with the provinces which will be called, following the passage of this legislation, for the drafting of the regulations. What we have in mind in the use of this phrase is a definition that will provide that an applicant must be permanently disabled in the sense that his disability cannot be corrected within the foreseeable future, and he must also be totally disabled in the sense that because of his disability he cannot carry out the ordinary activities of daily living and self-care.

I come now to a very important phase of this whole program, and one that is not related to benefits. That is the very important matter of rehabilitation. There are many in this country, social workers and people who are interested in social matters generally, who believe that we are a little premature in bringing in at this time a nationwide system of disability allowances because they feel that not sufficient has been done in the field of rehabilitation. However, we have given this matter our best attention and we feel that this is the appropriate moment to take the step that we are now taking.

So I come now to the matter that provides the background of this whole problem of disability. I have said that the people of Canada have always felt a special bond of sympathy for their disabled and handicapped fellow citizens. Prominent among these have been the blind, the deaf, the paraplegics, the amputees, those suffering from serious heart conditions or arthritis in seriously disabling form, and, in more recent years, the victims of multiple or disseminated sclerosis, muscular atrophy or dystrophy and other countless long-term ailments. Many of these permanent disabilities arose from illnesses for which medical science has not yet found the answer. Others result from accidents which strike with startling suddenness and in an instant maim and cripple able and healthy bodies.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) brought a case to my attention only the day before yesterday that comes within this very classification, and the fact that we will be able to give rehabilitation services for that particular case, removed thousands of miles from the locale of the particular individual, points out the importance of what I am now seeking to say by way of background of this whole measure. In Canada, as in other countries, we have acted in many ways to meet the social and economic problems faced by a good number of these various disabled groups.

Since 1944, when the province of Ontario passed the first Canadian workmen's compensation act, provision has been made for payments to the victims of industrial accident and disease. Now all ten provinces have legislation of this kind. In some of these provinces extensive programs of medical and physical rehabilitation have been developed, their purpose being to restore the injured workman to the full physical capacity and work ability which he enjoyed before his accident. If this cannot be entirely accomplished, everything possible is done to restore him to maximum capacity and to enable him to resume an active, useful life.

These rehabilitation measures in the field of industrial accidents have not been developed on a mere humanitarian basis, however justifiable that may be. Rehabilitation measures have proved to be a matter of plain dollars and cents. Successful restoration of work capacity in the case of injured workmen means a direct saving in pension or compensation payments. Experience has shown that every dollar spent on rehabilitation means a saving of several dollars in compensation awards. Out of this has developed the twofold approach to the problem of disability, with emphasis laid first of all on active treatment and rehabilitation measures, while compensation payments provide for those whose disabilities are more serious or permanent in nature.

The workmen's compensation field is not the only one to apply successfully this twofold principle of rehabilitation and compensation or pension payments. Since the end of the first world war similar provision has been made on a comprehensive scale, as we in this house all know, for our disabled ex-servicemen. Tens of thousands of disabled Canadian veterans have received treatment and rehabilitation services in veterans hospitals to restore them to the fullest possible measure of employability and usefulness in civilian life.

This program has been an outstandingly successful one. Thousands of veterans, as a result of the treatment and rehabilitation services provided through the Department of Veterans Affairs, have had their disabilities brought under control and have returned fit to their normal occupations. Thousands of others have equipped themselves, through carefully managed retraining programs, for new occupations in which they have made successful readjustment of their lives and careers as self-supporting Canadians.

The importance of this in terms of improved morale, the preservation of independence and self-respect, cannot be underestimated. No one can fail to realize the economic and social gain for our country as a whole in the restoration to useful productive employment of tens of thousands of Canadian ex-servicemen.

What we now propose to do is to apply the lessons learned in respect of industrial accidents and war service disabilities to the benefit of our fellow citizens who suffer similar physical impairments and disabilities which cannot be attributed to war services or the hazards of industrial accident. Here, too, we have another example of what can be accomplished in dealing with the problem of specialized kinds of disability through this twofold approach of rehabilitation and maintenance payments, for we have been operating this twofold program for two decades now in respect of the blind. Since 1937 we have made special provision through blindness allowances for our fellow citizens who have lost their sight. Throughout this entire period, and indeed for a decade or more before, we have had this blind pensions program supported and reinforced by one of the outstanding rehabilitation programs to be found anywhere in the world today. I refer to the program carried on under the auspices of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. This outstanding organization has earned for itself and for Canada a well-deserved reputation throughout the civilized world and has given us inspiration, leadership and experience for the measure which is now receiving second reading.

The C.N.I.B. operates a model rehabilitation program for the 20,000 to 25,000 blind citizens of Canada, a program of great variety, flexibility and versatility. It provides skilled educational and welfare services through its visiting teachers and field workers. It arranges medical care and treatment, including operative surgery for eye conditions. It operates its own blind workshops and home industries. It provides employment for many persons and finds employment for hundreds of others. In short, it provides all the constructive, preventive and therapeutic services which have come to be recognized as the necessary foundation and prerequisite for a program of disability allowances.

Not only the blind but the disabled of all kinds in Canada owe a great deal to the pathfinding services of this institute throughout these past thirty years. The other day the government of Canada was pleased to make a substantial grant toward the building of its new headquarters in Toronto and, as the house knows, annually in the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare a grant for operational services is made to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

The preparatory steps leading to the extension of this twofold program have now been taken in the course of these last few years. Six years ago last month, to strengthen and support the work being done by provincial agencies and by the voluntary groups, the federal government introduced a program of federal health grants amounting to some $35 million a year. At that time one of these grants was specifically earmarked for the development of services for crippled children. This grant has been used to assist the provinces in developing long-range programs for the prevention and correction of crippling conditions in children; to undertake more complete surveys to discover children in need of care; and to develop treatment clinics for the treatment of the cerebral palsy, hitherto one of Canada's most neglected health problems. It has been possible to take advantage of the financial assistance afforded by these grants to extend in many directions the possibilities of successful rehabilitation for thousands of disabled persons.

Other grants included in the national health program have been used, as the house knows, for the construction of hospitals for sick children, the provision of more adequate facilities for those handicapped by tuberculosis and other major diseases, and to stimulate research into these and related health problems. A substantial portion of the federal moneys available to the provinces has been used for the purchase of special therapeutic equipment used in the treatment of disability and for the training and employment of specially qualified health workers for provincial and local services.

Three years ago, in order to give added emphasis to the development of more adequate services for the rehabilitation of the disabled, a national conference on the rehabilitation of handicapped persons was jointly convened in Toronto by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and myself. This conference led to the establishment of a national advisory committee on rehabilitation, to the creation of a special division within the Department of Labour to co-ordinate rehabilitation activities in Canada, to the appointment of a national co-ordinator of rehabilitation, and finally to the inauguration of a special program of federal grants in aid to assist the provinces in meeting the costs of a well-balanced rehabilitation program.

Eight provinces have now entered into agreements with the federal government covering those aspects of the program which are of direct concern to the Department of Labour—co-ordination, vocational training, and so on. Co-ordinators of rehabilitation have been appointed in most provinces. Special provision has been made under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act for training programs for the handicapped. In respect of the health aspects of rehabilitation, a new grant for medical rehabilitation was introduced last year as part of the national health program. This grant, supplementing the crippled children's grant of $500,000 which has been made available since 1948, provided an additional $500,000 in 1953-54 for medical rehabilitation projects to be undertaken by provincial health authorities. For 1954-55, the grant is increased to $1 million annually, available on a pro rata basis to all the provinces.

I should like to give one example of what this rehabilitation means. We entered into an arrangement four years ago with certain provinces. We are now prepared to enter into an arrangement with all the provinces for rehabilitation of persons in receipt of blind pensions. Out of 120 cases of individuals who had been receiving for some period of time blindness allowances or blind pensions under the old act, we were able under this program of rehabilitation, with surgical and medical assistance, to achieve a substantial restoration of vision for 86 of those individuals. That is an indication of what this kind of program is intended to do. I may say frankly that I have felt, during the last four or five years, that I have not properly brought home to the members of this house the significance of this work. There have been criticisms, I do not say in this house but in the press, about some of the expenditures we are incurring. If it were only possible to indicate the positive results, I am sure that much of this criticism about expenditures in the field of health and welfare would be arrested, or at least there would be occasion to discipline some of the references that have from time to time been made about the Department of National Health and Welfare.

It will be seen that the groundwork has been carefully laid, during these past few years, for the establishment of those all-important preventive, treatment and restorative services which constitute the indispensable cornerstone upon which any responsible system of disability allowances must be based. Until the foundations of this complex, many-sided rehabilitation program had been laid, no program of pensions or allowances could safely be undertaken. On the solid basis provided by these rehabilitation measures, the legislation now before the house is designed to provide a measure of needed economic security to thousands of our fellow Canadians whose hopes of restoration to useful productive lives cannot be realized through these rehabilitation measures, however skilful and successful they may prove to be.

So, Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this measure, I would emphasize again that this present legislation is based, not on my authorship but on the example of others. I must say the real idea belongs to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He made this offer, as I suggested the other night, within a week of the holding of the last election. I mention that to indicate that I hope no one will say this represents an attempt to justify political promises made, because there were none made. This represents a sincere attempt, in co-operation with the provinces, to supply another important development in what we hope is a responsible system of social security in this country. I have the great honour, without hesitation, of recommending this measure to this house.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, the house will approve of the measure brought forward to deal with disabled people. This is something for which we have waited a long time. I can recall that at different times private members' resolutions were introduced advocating this type of legislation when every person in the house thought something should be done about the people who were permanently disabled. I recall speaking on this subject the last time a private member's resolution concerning it was before the house, and describing the lack of something to deal with the totally disabled as a gap in our system of social legislation.

I am glad that this bill has been introduced because from time to time over the past year I have been receiving letters from parents, possibly those who were getting along in years and who had some disabled children, wondering what would happen to those children if the parents were to leave this world or to grow too old to care for the children. I pay tribute at this time to the work that has been done by the service clubs throughout Canada in the matter of totally disabled or crippled children. I am well acquainted with that work because there is a camp supported by service clubs in this area at Merrywood on the Rideau. From time to time in the summer I visit that camp. I see the work that is being done, and it is a wonderful institution.

I know also of the work that is being done by service clubs going into areas and bringing out people who have been disabled, especially children, in order that something may be done through medical or surgical science to overcome their disabilities. On the whole I wish to pay tribute to those people for the great work they are doing. While the minister did make some mention of this point, I would have been better pleased if the bill presented to us today had given us some indication of the meaning of the expression "totally and permanently disabled".

I have before me the definition put out by the department of public welfare in Ontario. In this publication that department states the meaning of "totally and permanently disabled". I should like to quote from this publication because I believe it is the crux of the whole problem, and I am sorry that it has been left out of the bill and is to be dealt with later by order in council. The pamphlet puts this question:

Who is a permanently and totally disabled person?

And the answer is as follows:

One whose disability cannot be corrected within the foreseeable future and who is totally disabled in the sense that he cannot perform the ordinary activities of daily living without the assistance of another person.

This is going to be a most difficult matter to deal with in legislation of the kind before us. I realize the difficulty faced by those who administer the act in Ontario, because I know that on some occasions applications have been brought to me concerning the admission of certain persons for pension purposes.

I have no doubt that applications would be dealt with by a board, and that on the board there would be medical advisers. However, I do wish to bring to the attention of the house the fact that when a disabled person gets a doctor's certificate describing his illness, a most accurate description or pen picture of that illness is of great importance. The board cannot bring all these people before them to discuss their applications, and for that reason this matter becomes even more important.

In the discussion on the private member's resolution last year I quoted the definitions used in various states in the United States in describing those who are eligible for such pensions. I was amazed to find that I was able to quote twelve definitions of what constituted a totally and permanently disabled person. We must realize also that there are people who to all intents and purposes are totally disabled but who, due to rehabilitation or to the fact that they have received some training, are still able to carry on and do a useful job in society.

From time to time this bill will affect new classes of people, and the whole picture will change as years go by. There are at the moment people who will become eligible under this measure but who could have been rehabilitated years ago. These people have now grown too old to take new training. Due either to environment or to lack of educational facilities they have never had the opportunity to be trained in occupations in which possibly they could have carried on, had they received such training and education. So that as I say the picture is going to change as the years go by, and the younger people will receive the benefits derived from rehabilitation. For many years however we will have to deal with a class of people who, one might say, have never had the chance of rehabilitation so that they might have used the parts of their bodies which could be used, who have never received educational advantages, or who have suffered because of their environment. The Ontario bill might be accepted as a guide. I would hope that the experience they have had in these last two years the bill has been in force would prove beneficial in the administration of the measure now before us, and in the drafting of additional features.

The minister has referred to the veterans program already in effect in Canada, and has made mention of those who have received the benefits of rehabilitation and who, due to their disabilities, have become entitled to pensions. Then there are the blind, and various others under workmen's compensation acts who have received pensions and are having the benefits of rehabilitation and corrective procedures in order to make it possible for them again to take their places in the labouring world, so that they may earn their living.

There is one other feature in connection with this bill to which I would draw attention, and that is the matter of additional benefits beyond the $40 a month. While we are very proud to have this provision for $40 a month, may I say in passing that there will be cases of those who are totally disabled and who, under the description contained in the Ontario legislation, could not perform the ordinary activities of daily life without the assistance of some other person. For these there would have to be provision for some form of living assistance. It is particularly difficult for those people who are totally disabled and who require in their daily lives the help of someone else. It may be that in the future some provision will have to be made under this legislation, as has been done in connection with veterans, whereby they will receive extra grants by way of living assistance.

I take some pride in the fact that the province of Ontario has pioneered in this field. I note in this pamphlet that this question is asked:

Are there additional benefits?

It will be noted that the pamphlet takes the form of a questionnaire in order that it may be easily understood. This question of additional benefits is particularly important so far as the provinces are concerned, and the carrying out of their part of the bargain to make disability pensions useful. In reply to the question as to whether there are additional benefits, this answer appears in the pamphlet:

A disabled person eligible for an allowance is entitled to receive medical services and certain medicines without costs in accordance with an agreement between the Ontario Department of Public Welfare and the Ontario Medical Association.

To my mind that is a very important consideration, in the matter of additional grants, and I would hope that every province would follow along this line so that these people may receive medical treatment. We know that many of these disabled persons are chronic invalids requiring care and, as is pointed out in the pamphlet, they require certain medicines and additional treatment to an even greater extent than some others who are suffering from a chronic disability. The question of amount, therefore, becomes important. However, if medical care and certain medicines are granted by the province, they will be of marked assistance to these people.

I remember very well the representations placed before members of the House of Commons over quite a number of years. I believe we heard them on four or five occasions, and I recall listening to the representations made by members of that society of disabled persons. I am sure that any member who listened to what they said, and pictured their condition, these disabled persons who came here in wheelchairs and otherwise from all parts of Canada, will approve of this bill.

This measure, one of the more recent links in the chain of social security measures, does not come any too soon; because when I interviewed those people I felt something should be done for them immediately.

So far as this bill is concerned, there is a gap between the ages of 16 when family allowances end and 18 when disabled payments begin. This may be something for study in the future to further the interests of the disabled. During this two-year period the disabled people will receive no money. I wonder whether we can further our program by training the children by way of education. At the present time the service clubs are carrying the brunt of the cost of treatment. If these little children, who are potential invalids, could have corrective measures carried out in their early years, in many cases there would be no need for the introduction of a bill of this kind. Many of these disabilities could be stopped with early corrective measures.

However, I hail this bill as a forward step. I do know that in the program put forward in the province of Ontario—and I regard Ontario as pioneers in this field—emphasis has been laid on home care. The legislation of that province, as is the case with this bill, does not pay out the money when a particular person is confined to an institution. The disabled person at home qualifies for assistance under the legislation, and that relieves the burden on his friends. The granting of such allowances permits a disabled person to pay his own way and have a certain amount of independence. It will also help out those at home who have the burden of his care.

We shall discuss this bill clause by clause when we are in committee, and we may have something further to say on it. However, I did wish to bring to the attention of the minister—he mentioned it in his speech—the difficulty of defining a totally and permanently disabled person. I do wish that that definition had been placed before the house. I am sorry that it will be determined by order in council.

Mr. Martin: It will be determined by agreement with the provinces. We have to agree together.

Mr. Blair: I know, but later on it says that the definition for purposes of this act will be determined by the governor in council.

Mr. Martin: Quite, after agreement with the provinces on the meaning of totally and permanently disabled.

Mr. Blair: I admit it is on agreement with the provinces, but there may be some difficulty in getting all the provinces to agree to the one definition. That was so in the United States where they have at least twelve different definitions, as I showed last year when the private resolution was before the house. I am sorry that it could not be debated at this time. It is the crux of the whole situation. A great many difficulties would be overcome if we could really come to a definition of that term. One must remember also that while an agreement with the provinces is important, this House of Commons is made up of people from all provinces and this bill has been placed before us.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is an eminent member of the medical profession, and I would not want him to think that this House of Commons cannot make suggestions. We have our ideas, but my hon. friend will understand that the mechanics of the thing did not make it possible for us to place the definition in the bill that he asks for unless we wanted to wait until next session. But I would certainly welcome any suggestions from the house. If he does not wish to give them now, I would be only too happy to co-operate and collaborate with him privately at any time.

Mr. Blair: The bill is before the house. As I say, that is the crux of the whole matter, and little or no attempt has been made to give a definition. I would be perfectly content if we adopted some form of the Ontario clause. The province of Ontario has defined a disabled person as one who is not apt to have any chance of recovery in the foreseeable future. Perhaps we should have something like that, and it may be that many of the provinces will have a similar definition.

Mr. Martin: That is not the definition in the Ontario act. That is simply a characterization of the definition.

Mr. Blair: Totally and permanently disabled.

Mr. Martin: It would have to leave ways for defining.

Mr. Blair: We could determine what is meant by totally and permanently disabled. I know from people who have made application to me—and that is also true of the experience of the commonwealth of Australia where they estimated that 3 per cent of the population would come under the legislation and the figure was much larger than that—that difficulties will arise, because people who are disabled will find it difficult to understand why they are not eligible under this particular clause, especially when you take into consideration all the ailments that man is heir to. They also feel that they are unable to work.

In closing I wish to make one suggestion with respect to the ceiling on permissible earnings. That should be looked into very carefully, in view of the fact that totally disabled people require more attention, and sometimes special attention, than ordinary people do. The amount of permissible income that is stated in the bill will make it very difficult for some of these people to carry on. It is much more expensive for the people for whom this legislation is provided to live than many who have chronic ailments. I shall have some remarks to make when we discuss this bill clause by clause, but I felt that these matters should be drawn to the attention of the house.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we welcome this bill; we shall be happy to vote for it and to give it our support. As I proceed in my remarks, and when we get into committee of the whole on the bill, I shall point out that there are certain respects in which we feel it does not go far enough. Nevertheless, any criticism that we may make as to shortcomings or inadequacies in this bill are not to be taken as detracting in any way from the welcome that we extend to it.

I must say that I was a bit surprised—or was I?—at some of the statements the minister made in the earlier part of his remarks. We all know the minister quite well. We know his political interests, but I did think that this was one occasion when he would have been wiser had he restrained himself a bit. I have no objection to the tributes that he paid to members of the house, all of them on his side, whom he chose to name. But I do think, bearing in mind that on a number of occasions he has helped to talk out resolutions calling for pensions for the disabled, resolutions introduced by some of the very members to whom he paid tribute today, it would have been better for him to restrain himself and to admit that what the government is now doing is meeting a wish that has been expressed by many members on all sides of this house.

Mr. Lennard: For many years.

Mr. Knowles: I really thought, despite my understanding of the way in which the minister likes to introduce these political notes, that when he started to give the roll of those who had worked for this measure across the years that he was only starting, and that he would go on and name some of the others. There were others in his own party whom he might have named. Surely he might have named the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), not to mention others on that side of the house, for his interest in this matter for a long time. He might have mentioned my hon. friend who just spoke, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), and other members of the Progressive Conservative party. He might have mentioned the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) who have had something to say about this matter in the course of the years, and indeed down in the far corner among the independents the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) and others have given support to a measure of this kind in this house session after session.

Naturally I am not going to omit from this roll of those who have played a part in this whole question the members of my own group. Reference was made to the fact that some Liberals have had resolutions on the order paper on this question, resolutions the minister helped to talk out or asked to have withdrawn. But so has my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) had such a resolution on the order paper in years gone by, and so has my colleague the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny); indeed his resolution is on the order paper at this very session. I think too of the efforts along this line made by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), as well as by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), and others in this group. I think also of the interest in this matter held by our former colleague Scottie Bryce who used to be the member for Selkirk.

I think too, Mr. Speaker, of people and agencies outside of this house. I think in particular of the Canadian Welfare Council, and other groups who have been urging legislation of this kind for a long time. I think we must also pay tribute to the group referred to by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Lanark, namely the Canadian Association of Incurables who, at great sacrifice, great cost, and great pain, have tried across the years to make known to the people of Canada and to the government of this country their need for assistance along these lines.

Let us admit that this measure is a response to a demand from people in all parts of this house. Further I would say that in having expressed those demands we have but reflected the will and the desire of the Canadian people. I am quite satisfied that in supporting this measure the House of Commons and the parliament of Canada is carrying out the desire, the wish, and the will of the Canadian people that we give a decent break to those among our fellow citizens who are afflicted with disabilities and incurable diseases which blight their lives and make things so difficult for them.

I do think, Mr. Speaker, though I had no intention in the first instance of talking along this line, that this question as to how the idea of this legislation got started should be put in its proper perspective.

Mr. Martin: From a politically unbiased source.

Mr. Rowe: You started it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I have the answer to that, but I am going to exercise the restraint which I counselled on the minister. I will give him the answer privately later on. I have got it right here.

As I have already indicated, Mr. Speaker, this is a welcome measure, and it fills one of the gaps in our social security program. The minister himself pointed that out and referred to the fact that this is a gap which needed to be filled. But in that connection may I remind the minister and the government, and may I remind the house, that the special joint committee on old age security which met in 1950, and to which I have had occasion to refer a number of times, because I still look on it as one of the most satisfying committees I ever served on in this house, referred to this lack of pensions for disabled or incurable persons as one of the gaps in our social security program.

But may I also remind those who are interested that on page 104 of the report of that committee, where reference was made to gaps in our social security program, two gaps were named. One of them was the lack of pensions for disabled persons, and the other was the lack of a national health insurance program. I hope the moral of that reference will not be lost on the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) or on the government. The government is proud that it has now taken steps to fill to some extent one of the remaining gaps in our social security program. Let them not delay in taking steps to fill the other gap pinpointed by the committee on old age security in 1950.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the hon. member for Lanark has done well to point out that the crux of this whole bill lies in the definition of permanent and total disability. I appreciate the minister's interjection to the effect that this is something that will have to be worked out with the provinces, but I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Lanark that we should have a better understanding in the bill itself as to what the government has in mind. We have had enough experience around here with matters which are decided by regulation and order in council, after legislation has been passed by both houses of parliament and received royal assent, to know whereof we speak.

I have before me a copy of the very excellent brief on this matter which was presented to the federal government on January 15, 1954, by the Canadian Welfare Council. I am sure the minister is fully familiar with this brief and he will be aware that this whole question of the definition of permanent and total disability is a matter of major concern in the brief of the Canadian Welfare Council. That council points out that in the main there are three groups of disabled persons. First there is that group which is referred to as the hard core of disabled persons, persons who are completely and totally disabled and for whom there is no hope of any cure whatsoever. For those persons there should not be any question about the allowance that should be available to them, and it should be on as generous a basis as possible.

Then there is the second group who are defined by the Canadian Welfare Council as consisting of people who suffer a disability or a handicap of some sort but who nevertheless are able to work and make their own living to a certain extent. However, they are people who do suffer because of their disability and there is a case in many instances for some assistance to them to compensate for the disability from which they suffer.

Then, says the Canadian Welfare Council, there is a third group which lies in between the other two extremes of disabled persons. This group consists of people who are not totally and permanently disabled but who are disabled to the point that they cannot earn their living, and the fear felt by the Canadian Welfare Council is that these people may lose out completely. They are not capable of obtaining and holding employment to meet their needs. If, on the other hand, they are not totally and permanently disabled how can they qualify for allowances as defined in this legislation? The Canadian Welfare Council holds the fear that unless this matter of the definition of total and permanent disability is cleared up this legislation may induce people to deteriorate rather than encourage them to do everything they can to become rehabilitated. The Canadian Welfare Council puts the case very well, I think, when it states in its brief:

> Under such a three-fold plan the need to prove that one was incapable of rehabilitation would be greatly lessened. Maintenance would be provided when needed, by the method appropriate to the degree of handicap produced by the disability.
> To sum up: While recognizing the need for disability allowances for totally and permanently disabled persons, we are strongly of the view that such allowances must be thought of in terms of their effect upon those who are not eligible as well as upon those who are eligible for benefit from them.

If I interpret that sentence aright, I think what the Canadian Welfare Council is afraid of is that the kind of definition we now have will make some people who are in that in-between group feel that the only way in which they can get this allowance is by letting their physical condition deteriorate and their morale go down until they are totally and permanently disabled. When I express this concern I am expressing not only my own reaction and my own concern about this matter but I am quoting from the excellent brief prepared, as I say, by the Canadian Welfare Council. Let me go on and read the rest of that paragraph from which I was quoting just now. It concludes as follows:

> When this is done the need for a broader program becomes at once clearly apparent. Only if disability allowances are made part of a comprehensive plan which provides for the economic needs of all disabled persons can the dangers we have indicated and which are inherent in the single approach be overcome or avoided.

As we proceed with the discussion of this legislation, we on this side of the house will continue to press our contention that we should have a clearer understanding as to what the definition is that people must meet in order to qualify for this allowance. What we are asking for is that it be liberalized. Perhaps I might say, in the language of the Canadian Welfare Council, that we are asking that it be made more intelligent and more appropriate to the needs of these people.

I now move on to say something which the minister knows I will say.

Mr. Martin: I always know what the hon. gentleman will say.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for that compliment. I am glad to know that he has been listening to me across the years and that, as time moves on, some of the ideas that are put forward from parties on this side of the house and from outside the house do get into his head.

I suggest strongly and earnestly that the amount of this allowance should be greater than the figure of $40 a month which is proposed in this bill. I suggest that it should be not less than the same figure that I suggested yesterday in another connection, namely that the amount should be not less than $60 a month. I thought of this in particular—although it was my intention on behalf of this group to propose it—when the minister was uttering those extremely flowery and sympathetic words, in the opening part of his remarks, with regard to our concern for disabled people. I suggest that to express that sympathy and that concern with an amount of only $40 a month in this day and age is not good enough. To suggest that we cannot afford the higher amount which we propose is just an alibi. I need not go into that matter. After all, I did so yesterday with respect to my contention that old age and blind pensions should be not less than $60 a month. If we insist that we are an intelligent, modern, Christian civilization we cannot afford not to do a great deal better than to give only $40 a month to the people in our society whom we recognize as deserving pensions of this kind. I argue strongly, and I do so on behalf of this group, that the amount of this allowance should be not less than $60 a month.

I suppose that one of the arguments the minister may want to throw back in response to that suggestion—he says he knows my speech; I may say that I know his answers too—is that there has been an arrangement with the provinces. I am sure that every night when the minister goes to bed he must say "God bless the provinces"; they save him from all sorts of trouble.

Mr. Martin: I sometimes dream about the hon. gentleman and then I have a nightmare.

An hon. Member: We have the D.T.'s when we dream of you.

Mr. Martin: I had to get that comment out.

Mr. Knowles: My friend the hon. member for Lanark suggests that when he and I think of those on the opposite side at night we find ourselves counting sheep. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare thinks it is an answer to say that the provinces feel that $40 is an appropriate figure, may I point out to him that if they have expressed that view, it is because $20 a month or half of that figure is as much as they feel they can afford in view of their provincial resources.

Our view is that this matter should not be on a 50-50 basis, as is old age assistance, but rather that it should be on a 75-25 basis, 75 federal and 25 provincial, as is the case with the blindness allowance. Surely there is far more relationship between a disability pension and the blindness allowance than there is between a disability pension and old age assistance. If the house will accept our view that it should be on a 75-25 basis rather than on a 50-50 basis it will be seen right away that a $60 pension which I am now suggesting would not be objected to by the provinces because that would require them to pay only $15 out of the $60, leaving $45 to be paid by the federal government.

The minister may ask if I have worked out what that will cost. I may say that I have done so. I have the figures under my hand and when we get into committee, if he is interested, I can go into the matter and again I can relate it, as I did yesterday, to our gross national production and to what is an appropriate portion of our wealth to spend in this way.

I move on, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that after all the fight that we put up to get rid of the means test in respect of old age pensions at 70 years of age and over and after all the appropriate castigating we have done of the means test in relation to items like the war veterans allowance, we are disappointed to find that here the old so-and-so, the means test, turns up again. The government says: We are very sympathetic; we are very sorry that there are people in our midst who are disabled, who have incurable diseases they will not get over as long as they live, but our sympathy does not restrain us from imposing the means test on the allowances that we are prepared to give them.

We think there should be no means test on these allowances. If we cannot yet win that point—we will win it some day—I have another suggestion to offer. When I say that we will win it some day, I mean it. I can remember year after year standing up in this house and pleading for the removal of the means test from the old age pension and having some people in this house and outside of it say: You know, Stanley, that you are just talking; you are never going to get rid of it. However, we got rid of it. Some day we will get rid of the means test from the war veterans allowance and we will get rid of it from this allowance as well.

In the meantime I suggest that to apply the ceiling levels that are set out in the Old Age Assistance Act is a procedure that is altogether too restrictive. I know that in the case of a married couple where there is blindness on the part of one spouse or the other or in the case of a single person who is blind, the relationship is to the figures set out in the Blind Persons Act. But where blindness does not come into the picture, it is the old age assistance levels of permissible income which have been imported into this act. If the government is not prepared to go all the way at this time, I say that at least they should set a higher figure. I believe that one of the provinces suggested that the ceiling of permissible income might be something of the order of $1,000 single and $1,500 married.

Mr. Martin: Can the hon. member give me the name of that province?

Mr. Knowles: Saskatchewan.

Mr. Martin: Oh. We will deal with that.

Mr. Knowles: I also like the figures suggested by the Canadian Legion with respect to war veterans allowances. They suggest that if the means test cannot be done away with, the level of permissible income might be $1,200 single and $2,000 married. In other words, Mr. Speaker, I make the suggestion of an alternative to removal of the means test in terms which I hope even this government might be prepared to consider.

I agree with the hon. member for Lanark that something should be done about that age gap which is now left between the point at which family allowances are discontinued and that at which it will be possible to receive the allowances under this legislation now before us. That seems to me to be the "most unkindest cut of all".

Here is a government that boasts of its social security program. It has family allowances from the time of birth until the age of 16. It has old age assistance from age 65 to 69, under a means test, which we deplore. It has old age security for everyone 70 years of age and over. It is now providing for disability allowances from age 18 up to the point where one could qualify for old age assistance, but in the case of the person who may be disabled the whole of his life, the child born with an incurable condition, the government has left that little gap between the ages of 16 and 18. If there is an explanation for that I will be surprised.

Mr. Martin: Could my hon. friend tell me what Saskatchewan's view was on that very point?

Mr. Knowles: Saskatchewan and the other provinces had to deal with this matter on the basis proposed by the federal government of a 50-50 split. Saskatchewan had to consider, as did all the other provinces, all these various items in terms of what it would cost them in relation to their provincial revenues. I suggest that Saskatchewan and the other provinces would be quite glad to go further with regard to these various regulations if the government would accept the proposition we lay down, namely, that it should be on a 75-25 split rather than on a 50-50 split. The minister may offer that prayer of thanks for the provinces but he cannot blame everything on them while some of us are here to watch him.

One other criticism I offer with respect to the legislation has to do with the residence clause which requires residence in Canada for not less than ten years. On its face that may seem to be a reasonable requirement, but I ask the minister to face the fact that there will be people entering this country as immigrants who on arrival are in perfectly good health—they have to be because they have to pass the medical examination imposed by the government—and in some instances some of these people will contract incurable diseases after arrival, perchance some of the diseases the minister referred to in his remarks today, or perchance they may suffer some accident which makes them invalids for the rest of their lives before they have been here ten years. We have got to do something for them. Failure to make provision for them in legislation of this kind simply means that the burden is thrown on the provinces or on the municipalities.

The various suggestions that I have made spell out my earlier statement that this measure does not go far enough. I hope that even yet we may get improvement with respect to some of these points, particularly with regard to the amount of the allowance, the means test level, the age gap between 16 and 18 and the definition of total permanent disability. Nevertheless, as I have already said, despite my feeling that there are these shortcomings and inadequacies, we are glad to see parliament at last being given a chance to take the step to fill this gap that parliament has wanted to take for a long time. We have had private members' motions introduced frequently and, as I say, the minister played his part in helping to talk them out. But at last the house is getting a measure it has long been ready to support.

Parliament welcomes the opportunity to put legislation of this kind on the statute books. It begins to fill one of the gaps to which the old age security committee referred in 1950. I hope it will not be long until we have the opportunity to fill the other gap, that of national health insurance, so that we might move on to the achievement of an adequate over-all social security program for the people of this country the like of which we have the wealth to afford, the like of which our people, because they produce that wealth, fully deserve.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, having participated in innumerable debates when pressure was put on the government to introduce legislation providing payments for disabled persons, it is indeed refreshing to be able to stand up at this time and offer our support for the principle of the bill now before us. By offering support for the principle of the bill we do not mean of course that we agree with all the details contained therein. I had rather hoped that no sour note would be injected into the debate, but on the other hand I believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was quite justified in complaining, shall I say, about the fact that the minister had obviously overlooked—

Mr. Knowles: I did not complain; I just remarked on it.

Mr. Shaw: —the part played by members in all quarters of the house with respect to the matter. Of course I realize fully that the minister was proud of having the opportunity to introduce this legislation. I also realize that as he basked in the brilliant sunshine of self-satisfaction he probably forgot the part played by members other than those who belong to his party.

Mr. Martin: Will my hon. friend permit me to point out that when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking what I said was that I do not take the whole credit for this bill myself. I gave credit to the men in whose names the resolution stood. I paid my tribute to the provinces of Alberta and Ontario. I paid my tribute to the work of members of the house. I think on reflection my hon. friend will find that he is not doing the mover of the resolution the justice which, in the context, I think he deserves.

Mr. Shaw: The minister of course did name three or four members of the house, but I certainly think it would have been very much better to thank the whole membership of the house for the part which that membership played in the advancement of the idea of disability pensions. I do not criticize the minister for finding in this legislation a substantial measure of what I call self-satisfaction. I think the minister displays that whenever he introduces legislation adding to the general welfare program of his government, and I do not offer that comment critically at all. Maybe he is justified.

I think the minister might also have laid a bit of emphasis on the fact that with respect to most of the grants, if not all, that are made to the provinces for such things as hospital construction the provinces must bear a very heavy financial burden in matching so many of these grants dollar for dollar and in providing the personnel in so many instances.

Mr. Martin: The rehabilitation grant is a non-matching grant.

Mr. Shaw: Of course the minister did not stop at the rehabilitation grant. He went over the entire field and the general impression he conveyed was that the federal government, of which he is a member, must be given a substantial part of the credit for the accomplishments. I think it makes for better feeling and a more substantial degree of co-operation if the very important parts played by all governments at all levels are at all times mentioned.

Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Mr. Shaw: During most of the years I have been in the House of Commons I have urged the government to give favourable consideration to the question of payments to our disabled Canadians. While I felt at times that maybe our efforts were a bit futile, I never lost hope. I am a confirmed optimist, but since the spring of 1950 my hopes have been much higher than at any previous time. I had the opportunity of serving as a member of the old age security committee. I realize how frequently the various delegations that appeared before the committee made reference to this matter even though it was not actually included in our terms of reference.

I realize, too, and I believe I pointed this out last year in the course of my remarks on a private member's resolution relating to disabled persons, that our committee saw fit to refer to this matter, even though I repeat it could not under those terms of reference actually make recommendations with respect to the matter.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to page 103 of the evidence of the old age security committee, dated June 28, 1950. I note also that on page 103, under other claims to priority, it states:

> Finally, in its study of the old age security systems in effect in other countries, and in its consideration of the evidence presented by representative Canadian organizations and individuals, the committee has had to keep constantly in mind the place of old age in an over-all security program. While the terms of reference of the committee have limited its study to the specific field of old age security, it has not felt it advisable to overlook the fact that there are other areas of social need in which governments, both provincial and federal, may be called upon to take in the future a substantial measure of responsibility.

Then again on page 101 there is a brief reference to this matter under the heading of "premature ageing and invalidity." This makes specific reference, of course, to disabled persons, and I quote:

> The reverse of the problem of retaining older workers in the labour market is that presented by the prematurely aged and invalids who are obliged to retire from employment before their normal time. The committee has been deeply impressed by the evidence presented as to the position in which invalids and incurables find themselves at present. It has also received representations from organizations representing the blind, and blindness is, of course, part of the total problem of invalidity. The committee has felt, however, that the terms of reference established for it ruled out the possibility of a detailed examination of this problem as it applies to the younger age group.

I am going to make a reference to something, Mr. Speaker, that I have not mentioned during the past four years. A moment ago I stated that because of representations made to our old age security committee, and because of the feelings of the members of that committee with respect to this question of invalidity, my hopes were buoyed up. There was another reason for it. I hope the minister will not mind my mentioning this, and he will understand why I have never mentioned it during the last four years. He may recall that while our committee was sitting he crossed the floor one day and sat with me. We were discussing the work of the committee and the possible recommendations of the committee. He said something to this effect: We must not at any time forget that very important class of people, the invalids or those who are permanently disabled. He said something must be done for them. Now, these might not be the exact words, and I have never mentioned that until this day because I would consider it unfair to have done so during the discussion of any private member's resolution or anything I might have sponsored myself. However now the legislation is before us I think it is fair to mention it. I wish to compliment the minister upon having now reached that stage where the feelings which he indicated he held in the spring of 1950 have become a matter of direct action through the introduction of the bill before us.

I cannot, of course, overlook the emphasis the minister laid upon this question of rehabilitation services. I well recall that the Canadian Association of Incurables constantly repeated the following views: First, pensions or payments are definitely required because so many of our disabled persons are so handicapped they cannot earn even a single dollar. There is another thought that comes to me just at this point. I remember, too, they said so many people will not hire individuals who are physically handicapped simply because the public very often will not accept these people.

I recall one case and I believe this man was one of the delegates. He held a job as an elevator operator in a building. He said he had to sit in the wheel chair while operating the elevator, but he could do it quite satisfactorily from the mechanical point of view. One person who was in the habit of using that elevator actually served notice that unless they secured another elevator operator he was not going into that building. I am certainly underlining the fact that that is not the general feeling among Canadian people. I believe there is a responsibility upon the Canadian people today to do everything within their power to assist these persons to rehabilitate themselves. I feel there is a great field there where the government might quite properly function.

I know, too, the service clubs and other organizations have been doing a great deal in this particular field. I am extremely happy to know that while payments are to be made to the permanently disabled, this question of rehabilitation is being given the utmost consideration.

This reference to the definition of disabled persons is one which rather intrigues me. I presume that when the conference was held a reference was made to the definition of disabled persons in the Alberta act. I am not saying it is a good one, but I do want to point out a problem with which I know they were confronted in this connection. According to the bill which was assented to on March 31, 1953 in the Alberta legislature, a disabled person was defined as a person who is suffering from a chronic disability and is physically unfit for gainful employment. Then, the two words "chronic disability" are defined. They mean a disability from which a person has suffered for a period of twelve months or longer.

While I realize that this matter of the definition is not in the bill before us but will be a matter of regulation, I still suggest to the minister that if any degree of agreement has been reached thus far, and I think probably it must have been discussed with the representatives of the provinces, he might give us some information on this point. Here is a problem with which Alberta was confronted in connection with the definition. A person may be partially a mental case and partially physically disabled. The mental condition is not so serious as to warrant the placing of the individual in an institution or mental hospital. I recall one case specifically. The person in question was a female, about 30 years of age. When she was less than a year old she suffered paralysis. I guess it was the old infantile paralysis to which we used to refer. It affected her mind. It is true that today under very close and careful supervision she might be able physically to do a certain amount of work, yet there is this mental condition. I presume her mental age would be around 9 or 10.

Under the Alberta act as we knew it prior to this year, that person would almost invariably be characterized as suffering from a mental disability and therefore prohibited from security benefits under the disabled persons act. The situation became so common that finally in the last session of the provincial house the act was amended so that those mentally unfit for gainful employment, provided they were not confined to a mental hospital, could qualify under the provisions of the act. I would like to ask the minister if he would comment on that aspect of the bill that is before us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor, but it is five o'clock and the house will now proceed with the consideration of private and public bills. I would remind the house that the 50 bills Nos. 380 to 388; 395 to 417; 423 to 440 were referred to the committee in one motion. Is it agreed to do that now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, in considering these fifty bills there is no hope, of course, that we can give them consideration, because that is not the method of this House of Commons. However I should like for a moment to refer to a statement by the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia, as it is reported at page 5211 of Hansard for May 28. I am glad the hon. member is in his seat. While I do not intend to be critical of him, I do wish to point out that what he said gave the wrong impression. I am sure the impression he left was unintentional, when he described the attitude of certain of us in the miscellaneous private bills committee, which considered these bills before they were brought to the house. I find at the page indicated that the hon. member is reported to have said:

> Every member received copies of the evidence in each of these cases, and if any particular hon. member did not read that evidence then it is his own fault.

I agree with him so far. Then he continued:

> The fact is that every one of these bills came before us en bloc and they received unanimous consent of the miscellaneous private bills committee.

Technically, sir, the hon. member may be correct. Although some of us did not vote on these bills at all, I suppose it could be said that by our silence we had given consent since none of us raised his voice against them. But I submit that does not give a true picture of what we had in our minds and hearts in regard to these bills, and particularly the manner in which they are considered in that committee.

Time and again I have raised my voice in the committee on miscellaneous private bills. I see the hon. member for Parkdale in his seat, to whom I pay tribute as a conscientious and courteous chairman. I know he would back up my statement that on almost every occasion the committee met I raised my voice against the procedure followed. I see him smile, and it would seem that he has some recollection of that. I am sure he will also confirm my statement that while I did not say anything at the last meeting of the committee on miscellaneous private bills, I did make my usual protest at the committee which met the week before.

We are now faced with these fifty bills. The hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia, is of course a new member, and is new on that committee. It can be said that perhaps he does not know our attitude toward the method adopted in considering these bills, particularly the procedure of considering them en bloc, which is exactly the same the committee of the whole house is doing here today. He will understand our criticism of the fact that full consideration is not given to each bill. So much for the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia.

Let us now turn to the bills themselves. There were definite reasons for the fact that we were silent in the standing committee. First of all, it is true that the committee passed these bills. Well, what else could it do with them? I remember very well that when the Prime Minister spoke on this subject he said there was a small minority in Quebec and Newfoundland who needed relief from their marital troubles and that this was the procedure under which they obtained it.

I submit to you, sir, that these fifty people had paid their money—and the evidence has shown in the last few days that it is a considerable amount of money—and had paid it in good faith. They had submitted their evidence, either true or perjured as the case may be—and I am sure there were some of both—and they were there, generally, to obtain their divorces. Under those circumstances what else could the standing committee do, when it was set up for that particular job? What else can a member who does not believe in the whole procedure do, except protest against that procedure, as I have done on many occasions?

Those of us who object to it could, of course, have held up the procedure of the committee indefinitely, but I suggest to the hon. member for Victoria that he would not want that. We could make a nuisance of ourselves, if necessary, and as we have proved on occasions. We could keep that up indefinitely. But we had a job to do that day, and we did it. I would serve the hon. member notice that if our attitude in that regard is to be misrepresented in the house, then if necessary the struggle in the committee on miscellaneous private bills can be kept up.

I notice that the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia, agrees with me in the matter of procedure. As reported at page 5211 he said:

> I found out, as did every other hon. member, that I did not like the procedure, and I did not like the evidence I have had to read. I think there is collusion in it.

I know on Friday evening he modified that statement to some extent; but his statement is there on the record. When he was challenged for having said that there is collusion, and at the same time voting for these bills, he modified the statement, and those modifications may be found at page 5212 of Hansard. I submit however that the record stands, and I have quoted from it exactly as it was recorded in the debates. The hon. member is reported to have said:

> I did not like the evidence I have had to read. I think there is collusion in it.

Another reason we did not protest as strongly or, shall I say, as often as usual on this particular occasion is that we were informed, and I believe reliably so, that the whole matter of divorce procedure is to be looked over and considered by the procedural committee, a committee from which we have not yet had a report, but of which we still have some hopes. That did not prevent my making vigorous protests on previous occasions the committee met; but it does explain to a degree why we did not press our opposition at every meeting of the committee. As I have said, if our intentions in that regard are misunderstood, then we can make them very clear by protesting every time a bill comes up. I think, myself, that perhaps that would be an exaggerated conclusion to seek; but we do not want any question to be left as to where we stand.

Another reason for our silence in that particular committee was that the committee before which these fifty bills were placed passed them in the course of, roughly, a couple of minutes. I have often timed it with my wrist watch, although I did not on this occasion. One reason we did not block any of the bills, or did not bother particularly with that committee, was that none of these bills had been contested, whereas there were two others to come up which had been. There were four lawyers in the room, two on each case, and sitting outside were the witnesses in both cases who were waiting in case it might be decided to call them. They were sitting there waiting in case it might be the decision of the committee to have them called. Naturally, we were expecting that we would have to spend a considerable time on these two cases which were contested, and that proved to be the fact, because we had two meetings of the committee on that day, and it took most of our spare time on that day to go over these two cases. We wanted to give those cases which were contested a very close scrutiny. In those cases there was the probability of an injustice being done on one side, and if there was we wanted to know about it.

In the meantime these two particular cases have become history, as it were, and since they are not before us I cannot make definite references to them today, although I am still in doubt as to who was responsible for that one particular case being withdrawn. It is true that at that time we made a recommendation that, since the lawyer for the petitioner had withdrawn the case, it be sent back to the other place with the suggestion that they could now take whatever action they considered necessary. I do not know what the constitutional problem is in that case. It is the first case of that kind of which I have had any experience. My own idea was that the case was in the hands of this house, and whether or not a lawyer can simply get up and wash his hands of the whole thing because it has been a hoax, and simply withdraw it out of the committee and that is the end of it, I am not sure.

Mr. Hunter: Perhaps I can clear it up for my hon. friend. That bill will be reported with the preamble not carried, and the reasons will be stated. It means that the bill simply will not be carried by this house and therefore an act will not be passed. As to the other reference to the Senate, on the instructions of the committee I simply reported to the chairman of the Senate committee the possibility of perjury, and drew it to his attention. I have had a reply acknowledging that letter.

Mr. Knight: I thank the hon. member for giving that explanation to the house. He is much better qualified to do that than I am, but at any rate I shall mention those cases no more and return to these particular bills. Both cases were thrown out, of course, as is now well known.

In regard to these particular cases that are in front of us and in regard to other cases like these that may be protested in the future, I should like to serve notice that in such cases they will be seriously considered in the committee, if I remain a member of that committee and can urge that same opinion upon my colleagues. I think it is a good thing that the counsel for these people and the people themselves will know that where there is a protested case and where there is a chance of an injustice having been committed they will also have recourse to the miscellaneous private bills committee, with the assurance that their protests and their appeal, because that is actually what it is, will have serious consideration and a thorough examination in that committee.

I was glad to hear the words of the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia that I have quoted. I was glad to see that he was disturbed at the procedure and the way in which we were handling these fifty bills. I am glad to see some disturbance in the minds of some other members also. I may say that in that there is a sign of progress. In that particular disturbance there is some hope. I may say also that it was not ever thus. Some years ago, in my introduction to this committee the usual procedure was simply to push these bills through the committee en bloc, en masse, forty or fifty of them at a time. Woe betide the committee member who would dare to raise his voice in opposition. I am glad that that situation has to some extent changed. I believe it does show some change of opinion. The cry in those days was, of course, well these bills have been passed by the Senate committee, composed of men with legal and mature minds; they have heard the evidence; they cannot be wrong. Like Brutus, they are honourable men, and so our job in this committee is to simply rubber stamp their decision. Well, sir, the situation has changed and the infallibility of the Senate committee on divorce has been proved a squib which exploded with a loud bang on a recent historic occasion, because I think that occasion was historic.

These fifty bills are an embarrassment to this committee. You can feel it and hear it behind the curtains from any member to whom you wish to speak. The bills are an embarrassment to this committee and to the members of the miscellaneous private bills committee, and I believe they are an embarrassment to this government. Still, I am not going to oppose them. These fifty bills are not contested. Let us pass them and get on to the legislation which is the reason for our presence here. I know I was not elected to listen to the evidence in divorce cases. I am not competent to judge the evidence or to assail it. I want to get on with the work for which I was sent here, and I do not want to spend the rest of my life untangling divorce cases. Let us get on with it now. Let us pass the bills, but let us devise for the future a method by which that embarrassment may be removed for all time from these halls.

Mr. Nicholson: I am sorry I cannot agree with my colleague in his last remarks. At least one of these cases was contested, and I have read the evidence since we met here the last time. I would like hon. members to follow with me very briefly the sort of material which may be found in some of these cases. I am not going to mention any names, and I am not going to make any references that I could not make in the best circles of society. But there are some investigators in these cases that have appeared frequently, and I cannot understand why information given by investigators of this sort can be accepted and divorces granted. There were three male investigators and one female investigator on this case. I am referring to evidence that appears in relation to Bill No. 434 which is before us. There were two investigators who swore they went to this particular home some six months ago. The evidence starts out with getting the usual story, but this was a different type of mystery. One man went to the house and he says:

> We checked every room in the house.
> Q. Did you go into the house?A. Yes, we went into the house.
> Q. How did you proceed to get into the house?—A. We proceeded to check the electricity.
> Q. You pretended you were going there to check the electricity?—A. Yes, so we checked every room and Mrs. —— was showing us every place in the house.

It seems strange that after a man admits lying for the sake of getting into a house, suddenly everything else he says after that is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Well, this man was questioned by the lawyer for the respondent, and here are the questions and answers:

> Q. I am asking you how many bedrooms are there in that house?—A. I don't know.
> Q. How many beds are in the house?—A. Oh, I don't know.
> Q. Did you go—?A. I didn't check all the beds.
> Q. You went to check the electricity?—A. Yes.
> Q. How many switches are there in the apartment?—A. We didn't check the switches.
> Q. What were you checking exactly?—A. We checked the room.
> Q. You checked the rooms? Well, how many rooms are there, in the home, not only bedrooms, but other rooms in the house, how many rooms are there?—A. I do not remember. I checked that in my notes, the day I checked.

As I read the evidence, Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that one of the investigators did go to the house and made elaborate drawings of bedrooms and furniture. Two women who were in the house swore that there was only one man went, and two men swore that two went. In view of the evidence in the case from one of the men who apparently know so little about what he saw, it would seem to me that probably the women were telling the truth on that particular occasion.

But then there was a ladder that featured in the story. Perhaps I should take a minute to tell the committee the story of this ladder. The case really hinges on what three men saw after climbing up the ladder and looking in an upstairs window, and here is how the evidence goes:

> Q. And you mentioned that you were up first?—A. Well, it is a way of talking; I would say the first one. We were going up slowly and sometimes I was putting my foot on his and trying to take a grab of a rung and sometimes I would cross—

I will not dignify these gentlemen by placing their names in Hansard, but call them Mr. Z and so on.

. . . Mr. Z's hand.

Q. But you went up first?—A. I wouldn't say that; sometimes he was maybe a few inches higher than me and sometimes maybe I was higher than him.

Q. Are you telling me that you both went up together side by side?—A. Yes, it is a broad ladder.

Q. How wide is the ladder?—A. It is a big ladder. I don't like to say it is a very tall or long ladder but it is a very wide ladder.

Q. How wide?—A. Maybe two feet.

Q. And the two of you were climbing side by side?—A. Oh yes. We had done that before.

And then the acting chairman came into the discussion and he asked:

Q. I presume, witness, it is a ladder you have for the purpose?—A. Not exactly. We use it a lot many times but it is a handy ladder around. It is a hard ladder. It is a heavy duty ladder.

Q. Is it made of aluminum?—A. No, it is light wood but big wood, and the rungs are strung with some braces under. It is a big ladder and a strong ladder.

The hearing adjourned until 2 p.m.

But Mr. Chairman, that is not the end of the ladder story.

An hon. Member: I think it should be.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let us just have one rung at a time.

Mr. Nicholson: I think we should have the end of the ladder story because this is really where the funny part comes in. As I said, there was a lady, we will call her Miss L but I do not know what a lady would be doing out after midnight with this crowd. The evidence continues:

Q. Where was Miss L during the time of the investigation?—A. She was in my car.

Q. She did not leave the car that night?—A. No.

Now, I want to go into the question of the window. This is the evidence:

Q. On what side of the building was the window in question that you looked into?—A. On the north side.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a ladder on the north side of the house and then this lady is questioned by the defence counsel as follows:

Q. On which side?—A. On the south side.

Q. Well, we have been told by Mr. Z and the others that the bedroom in question is on the north side, what would you say as to that?—A. I don't know where the bedroom would be.

Q. So on what side was the ladder put up?—A. I can't say exactly.

Although, Mr. Chairman, the ladder was on the north side and the lady in question was on the south side she was able to see through that house in the dark of night and see three men climb up a ladder, and on the evidence of what these three men saw from that ladder a divorce was granted.

I think hon. members of this house had better start taking a look at these 400 divorces which go through each year. I think that the parliament of Canada cannot be a party to having this sort of evidence coming into the other chamber and coming on to us so that we are asked to break up homes on the type of evidence appearing in this report. As I have already said, I probably would not have spoken about the case had it not been for the fact that these particular investigators gave evidence in another case whereby a wealthy man in Montreal was relieved of the responsibility of supporting his wife and young baby, on the same sort of evidence I have quoted here. The evidence of these men was accepted in the other chamber by those who examined them and who apparently said, "These detectives give their information, it must be true". They were prepared to accept the evidence which was given as I have described it by these investigators, three of them men and one woman, and under the circumstances I have described. I would suggest that hon. members should refer this particular case back to the Senate or to our committee on miscellaneous private bills to have another look at it before the members of this chamber put their official seal on it and endorse the sort of evidence submitted in report 383.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Goode: Mr. Chairman, before you put this to the vote I think the hon. member who spoke before me should be fair. I am informed that in this particular case the Senate committee took evidence for 7½ hours and I am quite convinced, although I do not read these cases and I do not intend to read them, that there must be further evidence besides what the hon. member related to the committee. I do not like to see the other place held up to ridicule in all cases and in this one I think the hon. member has not brought out the full evidence.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I have not said anything on the question of divorce for about ten years, but I have been doing a lot of listening and I must admit that I have not heard anything yet, not even from the hon. members of the C.C.F. party, about a method of curing the curse of divorce. What is the cause? That is the question, and we should be far more concerned about that than a method of handling these bills. How many cases of divorce have we taken from the courts? I think we have robbed the courts of some. I think the hon. member for Lanark would agree with me when I say that when young couples get into difficulty through selfishness or something like that they should go to the family doctor or their spiritual adviser instead of a lawyer or the courts.

I know there are those in Canada and the United States who are finding a cure. There are groups of men in different places, lawyers, doctors, ministers, businessmen, and social workers, who have formed committees to investigate every case which looks about hopeless and they have robbed the divorce courts of many cases. I think we could spend the time of this house to far better advantage in finding a cure for divorce instead of trying to prove that the Senate has not been painstaking in its work.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I have only a very few remarks to make. The insinuation has been made that we should not be spending our time on this matter. But I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we should, because what we do when we pass these divorce cases can have very serious consequences. We not only dissolve marriages but we also relieve a goodly number of husbands of the responsibility of supporting their wives and families. Further than that, the effect of our passage of these bills means that we are branding certain people of having been guilty of committing adultery. That, in turn, has the effect in some parts of Canada of robbing these people of the rights of citizenship in a great many respects. I feel that the evidence in a great many of these cases is entirely insufficient. I have had cases called to my attention where there has been all kinds of blackmailing going on after the case had passed the Senate committee, because it was commonly assumed that once a bill had passed the Senate commitee and had been recommended by them that that was the end of the matter, and those who had given false evidence immediately began their habit of blackmailing the people who were vitally concerned.

I have one case in mind where one of the witnesses has had to leave Canada and is now in Mexico. Unfortunately the case was not proceeded with to its final conclusion. My aim was to have this man fetched from Mexico in order to appear before our miscellaneous private bills committee. If we had been able to do as we desired, I think this House of Commons would have received a good illustration of the effect of our passing these divorce cases as if they were just so much unimportant and minor legislation.

Mr. Enfield: Before you put the question again, Mr. Chairman, there are one or two points I should like to make about this matter. I do not want to go into the merits or the moral aspects of divorce. However, as was mentioned by my friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, I would not want the impression to be left that the Senate committee who handle these divorces are not doing what I think is an excellent job. As to the case mentioned by the hon. member on the opposite side who first spoke, I happen to know, as has already been mentioned, that that divorce committee presided over by the chairman who has had some 42 years' experience in legal and judicial matters and composed of four other senators who are tried and true in this type of work, spent 7½ hours examining the witnesses whom they had there before them. I do not know whether hon. members know the old court of appeal maxim or not. The court of appeal says that a trial judge who has the witnesses before him is in a much better position than is any court of appeal to decide on the question of perjury; and the general rule is that they will, in almost all cases, take the opinion of the trial judge in that respect. Here we have exactly the same situation. We have the divorce committee that spent 7½ hours looking at the witnesses. After the case they went into a two hours' conference with regard to it—the five of them—and after careful deliberation they decided there was sufficient ground for divorce. Then the private bills committee of the House of Commons meets. We have no formal courtroom in which to meet. We have no formal method by which we call witnesses. Questions can be put by anybody at any time to any witness. We have witnesses called into the room indiscriminately. On the whole the procedure is carried on very informally. Generally speaking, I do not think hon. members read the evidence thoroughly and go through all the evidence.

Mr. Knight: May I ask my hon. friend one simple question? Was any witness in connection with any of these fifty cases with which we are dealing today called before the miscellaneous private bills committee?

Mr. Enfield: Yes; there were some witnesses called before the committee. I did not say that, with due respect to the hon. member. I did not mean to create that impression. We have called witnesses before the committee, of course.

Mr. Knight: I doubt that the hon. member understood or heard my question. I am asking this straight question. Were any witnesses called before the private bills committee in connection with any of the fifty cases with which we are dealing today?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Enfield: No. Of course there were not, as there was apparently no dispute raised with regard to the fifty cases that have been mentioned. I am merely trying to point out that we should not lightly disregard the work of the Senate in this matter and hold it up to ridicule, as I think has been done by hon. members opposite in this chamber today.

An hon. Member: It is part of their program to abolish the Senate.

Mr. Enfield: I wanted to say this so that that impression would definitely not be left. I know that the divorce cases handled by the Senate are just as efficiently handled as elsewhere. Indeed I think they are better handled than they are by the crowded courts in the supreme court of Ontario. You get a better hearing by the Senate committee because there is more time involved; you get a more convenient time for your hearing and you get a hearing with more dispatch. I think we should put the facts down as they are with regard to this divorce situation. I know that it is an awkward one. I know that some members do not like having to handle this work. Perhaps we should not be doing it. However, I have yet to hear a suitable alternative offered by anyone, in my short experience in the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York-Scarborough is free to come to the defence of the Senate if he wishes to do so. I do not think it is correct to say that we are trying to use this matter in order to hold the Senate up to ridicule at all. However, I suggest that the hon. member for York-Scarborough is holding the House of Commons up to ridicule if he suggests that we should pass these bills without our considering them. Even if the best case in the world is made out for a proper and satisfactory job being done in the other place, that fact does not absolve us from doing our job here; and the plain fact of the matter is that we are not doing it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member made no such suggestion.

An hon. Member: He implied it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think he implied it at all.

Mr. Argue: The great interpreter!

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for York-Scarborough suggests, as do other hon. members around the place, that we should have confidence in the Senate and that we should take it on faith that they have done a satisfactory job.

Mr. Pickersgill: He did not say any such thing.

Mr. Enfield: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact, some of us do not have that faith.

Mr. Enfield: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but I do not think I said that we should merely take the Senate decisions and trust them and do nothing about them. What I say is that we should have in the Senate committee the confidence that it justly deserves and that I did not like—

Mr. Knowles: What does the hon. member mean by that?

Mr. Croll: More confidence than you have in it, that is what he means.

Mr. Knowles: That is not very much.

An hon. Member: That does not prove a thing.

Mr. Enfield: I merely wanted to prevent there being left the impression that the Senate committee were completely incompetent, as I think other hon. members in my hon. friend's group were trying to do. That is the impression I got from their remarks.

Mr. Knowles: I am trying to figure out, from what the hon. member has said, what he means that is any different from what I said he meant. He said we should have confidence in the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Many members around here have confidence in the Senate. I can understand that. They hope to go over there. But so far as handling these cases is concerned, I must say to him that confidence in Their Honours individually and respect for them though we may have, our confidence in their capacity to deal with divorce is shattered by what happened in respect of two cases which the hon. member for Parkdale says will be reported to the House of Commons with the preamble not proven. In view of that experience, even though they spent 7½ hours on this case having to do with Bill No. 434, I submit we are not absolved from looking into it before we pass it. I have not read it in its entirety. I have read some of the sections having to do with the ladder story that my colleague the hon. member for Mackenzie reported to the committee. Incidentally I know that there was sworn evidence given by one person in that house that certain people were around there that night but without any ladder at all. My hon. friend reminds me that three different people swore that these people were around there without a ladder. Yet these people say they were there with a ladder, which was a 2-foot ladder, up and down which three men were going.

An hon. Member: Two by two?

Mr. Knowles: The two-by-two game; yes. I suggest that the hon. member for York-Scarborough is defeating his own purpose. If he wants to boost the Senate and to boost our confidence in it, let him not relate it to this particular case. This case has all the earmarks of a ridiculous situation. If the committee is not prepared to do something else which others might be willing to do, I suggest that the least we should do is to agree that at some stage this Bill No. 434 should be referred back to the committee on miscellaneous private bills. Perhaps in respect of this bill the same formula could be followed as that which was followed on the motion of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in respect of another case that was referred back some weeks ago.

I realize that the evidence in most of these fifty bills is contained in thin little pamphlets of only five, six or seven pages.

An hon. Member: Not worth while reading it.

Mr. Knowles: I am referring to the ones that are before us. Their Honours have become so used to this routine that they can make a quick decision, but in this particular one the evidence runs to sixty-eight pages and apparently it went through our committee along with the other forty-nine without any consideration being given to it. I take it that although the case was contested in the other place the chairman of the miscellaneous private bills committee of this house did not advise the committee whether the people who contested it wished to continue that procedure before our committee.

But I think we have a responsibility, particularly now that doubts have been cast on the integrity of some of these detectives who have come here as witnesses, and now that doubts have been raised in our own minds as to the capacity of the senators to get to the heart of these cases. I think that the least that should happen in respect of Bill 434 is that it should go back to our committee. The hon. member for York-Scarborough made the statement that during the time he has been here he has not heard of an alternative. That suggestion used to be made to us fairly often a few years ago, but I should like to say to him that it is only from the members of this group that an alternative has been proposed. I refer to a bill of mine, which is not on the order paper just now, suggesting that the handling of these cases should be referred to the Exchequer Court of Canada. If something is not done about this matter, it may soon be there again. If I do introduce it again I think I should give it a new subtitle. It might well be called "an act for the relief of parliament".

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the desire of the committee that Bill No. 434 be considered separately?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: It takes unanimous consent to consider all fifty together. I am prepared to give unanimous consent to considering the other forty-nine together.

The Deputy Chairman: I am of the opinion that the committee is pretty well the master of its own procedure, but only by unanimous consent. Therefore we will consider these bills which have been referred to the committee with the exception of Bill No. 434. Is it understood that all these bills except Bill No. 434 are agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Then we are now on Bill No. 434.

JOSEPH DELPHIS GUILLAUME DELORME

The house in committee on Bill No. 434, for the relief of Joseph Delphis Guillaume Delorme—Mr. Hunter—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration—or both of them—a question, which I put forward in good faith. If they are prepared, when this bill is reported for third reading, to have it referred back to the standing committee I would have no objection to that procedure. If they are not prepared to do so, we will have to vote against it or make our own decision as to what course to follow.

Mr. Hunter: I would very definitely take exception to that procedure. The bill came before the committee, it was not contested and we passed it. Apparently the bill was contested before the Senate committee. They heard the evidence; they heard the witnesses. To refer it back to our committee means that we are going to have to have a retrial because until we hear the witnesses and hear them examined by their counsel before us we are in no position to judge what has been judged by the Senate. In my opinion it would be a redundant procedure and would amount to a retrial. If this bill were referred back I would not feel that by simply reading the evidence—I am sure many members of the committee would agree with me—I would be in a position to judge it. In order to form a proper impression I am sure we would have to have the witnesses recalled and rehear the case. After the Senate has spent the time it has on this bill I do not feel that we would gain anything by retrying the case. We are not a court of appeal. It would be a second trial, and for these reasons I would not agree to that unless the house rules otherwise.

Mr. Knowles: I agree with the hon. member for Parkdale that we are not an appeal court or a court of retrial. We are still a parliament of two houses, and we are supposed to make up our own minds as the result of our own study of the measures that come before us. I am not impressed with the argument that this matter has been gone into thoroughly by Their Honours in the other place. If parliament is not prepared to get this business of divorce out of parliament, if parliament insists on the job being done here, surely we should do it. I think the least we should do with Bill 434 is to refer it back to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills so that they can study the evidence, call witnesses or do as they wish on our behalf.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond rose to his feet in defence of this bill.

Mr. Goode: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I did not defend the bill.

Mr. Nicholson: He implied that there must have been good cause for passing it inasmuch as the evidence took seven hours before the Senate committee. I do not want to impose on the committee by quoting at any greater length. The hon. member for Parkdale who is sponsoring the bill is here today, but I think it is significant that of the seventy-five members from Quebec not one of them is prepared to sponsor these bills. In view of the evidence I have quoted at some length I think the sponsor of the bill should explain where I was wrong or give other information than appears in the evidence to indicate that the committee should treat this bill in the same way as the other forty-nine have been treated.

Mr. Goode: May I ask a question of the chairman of the committee on miscellaneous private bills? In the meeting of that committee was this bill protested by any member of the C.C.F. party?

Mr. Hunter: The answer is no.

Mr. Nicholson: I understood the hon. member for Saskatoon to say that none of these fifty bills were contested. According to the evidence before us this case was contested, and the evidence is there.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bills reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that these bills be read the third time now?

Mr. Knowles: Would you separate Bill No. 434 from the other forty-nine?

Bills Nos. 380 to 388; Nos. 395 to 417; Nos. 423 to 433; Nos. 435 to 440 read the third time and passed.

Mr. Hunter moved the third reading of Bill No. 434.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, for the reasons which I gave when we were in committee of the whole I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight):

That Bill No. 434 be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

I believe that is in precisely the same form as a similar motion made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) a few weeks ago.

And the Clerk proceeding to announce the result of the vote:

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the result of the vote is announced I have noticed, as I am sure all other hon. members noticed, that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) voted with the—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have noticed that the hon. member voted with the yeas, while perhaps it might have been her intention to vote with the nays. Now, hon. members may recall that there are precedents with respect to the correction of votes given by inadvertence. There was a precedent in the case of the Hon. Mr. Bracken who, on one occasion, had his vote deleted because he had voted by inadvertence. That ruling was given by Mr. Speaker Fauteux. See Debates, May 22, 1946, page 1774, and also May 23, 1946, pages 1793 and 1794. I am dealing with this point of order at this time, because on this occasion it concerns the taking of the division, and it must be settled before the result of the vote is announced. I think we ought to give the hon. member for Timiskaming an opportunity, if she so desires, to register her vote according to her true intention. If she does that, then I shall order that the Clerk delete her vote from the list of yeas.

Mrs. Shipley: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: There shall be no debate. If the hon. member rises in her place, then it is an indication that she wishes to vote with the nays.

Mrs. Shipley: I was about to say that I intended to vote with the nays.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore I direct that the division list be corrected accordingly.

Whereupon the Clerk announced the result of the vote as follows: Yeas, 66; nays, 63.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry; I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Goode: I was paired with the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I think I might as well get back to my senses, here. Having still in mind the intricacies of the point I have just dealt with, having to do with the division, I had completely forgotten that the result of the vote as announced by the Clerk was favourable to the yeas instead of the nays. Now I am informed that that is so. Therefore I declare the amendment carried.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DISABLED PERSONS

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF ALLOWANCES—AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Martin for the second reading of Bill No. 462, to provide for allowances for disabled persons.

Mr. Shaw: When at five o'clock the house detoured into that unpleasant field of divorce I was dealing with the definition of the expression "totally and permanently disabled" and also with the definition of a similar term used in the Ontario act and in the Alberta act. It was indicated by me that Alberta, within the first year of the operation of its act to provide for pensions for certain disabled persons, encountered certain difficulties which made it necessary to amend their act within the period of twelve months.

The particular problem which confronted the government of Alberta in their act was in relation to those who may be mentally and physically disabled, but not so mentally disabled that they required hospitalization. I know that in the administration of their act it usually resulted in a decision that where mental and physical disability existed the deficiency was called "mental" and the person not pensionable.

We feel that when it comes to the definition of totally and permanently disabled persons probably the federal Department of National Health and Welfare, in consultation with the representatives of the provinces, will take that matter into consideration. It might seem that since Alberta has in its act defined disabled persons and also has a definition of chronic disability, we might urge that that definition of totally and permanently disabled persons be included in the bill which is before us at the present time; but we are not going to take that position. We believe that whatever definition is determined will result from negotiations between the federal department and the representatives of the respective departments of the provinces and that a properly negotiated definition of the term will emerge.

It may be that the same experience will be encountered that was encountered in my own province of Alberta within a period of a very few months after the act becomes law. It would then become necessary to amend the regulations or the act. We believe that if the definition is in the act it could not be amended without a statutory provision. If it were defined by regulation, then it is conceivable that it could be changed in the same way and rather quickly. For that reason we would prefer the definition to be established by regulation. However, we would say to the minister that if any change is to be made at any time after the first agreement is reached, such change should result only after proper negotiations with the provinces. We would hope that the federal Department of National Health and Welfare would not presume to take it upon itself arbitrarily to declare a change in the definition without consultation. We would not want that to happen under any circumstances. We feel that in every case there should be a truly negotiated change.

I would add to that, certainly I do not consider myself qualified to define the expression "totally and permanently disabled". In this case, as I mentioned on other occasions, we must count upon those who have had some experience and who are in a better position to ascertain what might be a more generally acceptable definition. I think it goes without saying that whatever definition is determined would be applicable to all provinces; that there will not be any variation among the provinces.

It is to be noted that in Bill No. 462 the age of 18 is set as the qualifying age. It was indicated by the minister that that conforms with the Ontario act. My own province set the age at 21. I have not been so directed by the government of Alberta, nor have I any indication of what they intend doing, but I would hope—and I am also confident—that Alberta would see its way clear to accept the age of 18 as the qualifying age. After all, during the past year they have been assuming the full financial responsibility under their act which provides pensions for certain disabled persons. Now with the federal government assuming the responsibility of one-half of the cost, Alberta should be prepared to lower its age from 21 to 18. As I say, I hope and I am confident that they will do that, although I have no right to say so officially.

With respect to the proposed pension, we realize fully as a group here that one can argue that $40 is hopelessly inadequate to provide enough security for those people, but we are not going to press that at this time. We realize it is a new step. This legislation is being introduced and we assume it will be passed by parliament and will become law. That is the first step. But if we do not make an issue of $40 at this time, let it not be assumed or concluded that during the next session, or during subsequent sessions, we may not propose that it be increased.

The one thought that does go through my mind is this. Under the old age security and old age assistance acts the basic payment is $40 a month, and I presume the minister might to a degree anyway be justified in saying: We do not want this to be different from the payments under these acts. We realize fully of course that in many instances the earnings of the disabled will be nil, or at least considerably less than that of persons who qualify for old age assistance and old age security. However, that is a debatable question, if one bears in mind the fact that many of the older people, although they may be physically able to perform some work are not just acceptable generally to those who employ people. Therefore it is a highly debatable question. We see this bill as certainly a step in the right direction. Those people who have received nothing to date in the way of direct payments will receive $40 a month, and it will look like a fortune to many of them.

Let it not be assumed, as I said before, that if we do not labour that issue we feel it is a satisfactory amount, if one is looking on it as providing security. The minister will argue that it is not designed to provide security. We can see that argument, too.

The bill provides for a 10-year residential qualification. As a member of the old age security committee, I know we had to give very serious consideration to the matter of residence. We realized how easy it would be for people outside of our borders to suddenly rush into the country to qualify. For persons, let us say, in the United States, that would not be too difficult. They would not find too much difficulty in coming into our country. In this case they do not have to be subject to Canadian citizenship. Therefore we found it necessary to recommend that in the Old Age Assistance Act they had to reside in the country for 15 years and under the Old Age Security Act for 20 years. We have no particular objection to the provision that there should be a residence qualification. Even under the Alberta act they found it necessary to insert a residence qualification of 10 years because if a province had a provision to pay a pension to disabled persons and did not have a provision covering a residence qualification there would be an almost immediate influx of people from provinces all over the country. It became necessary, therefore, for the province of Alberta to have that residence qualification.

Earlier in this session, Mr. Speaker, in fact during the debate on the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) referred to the Alberta act and indicated—he did not use the word "discriminatory"—that with that provision it would have a bad effect upon unity in Canada. Of course he did say that it was maybe necessary to have that provision. Well, I feel it certainly was necessary to have it, and it is just as necessary in an act of this kind to have residential qualifications. There may be a situation developed in Canada where one or more provinces may take advantage of this act. Then, of course, you would have the position of the 10 years' residential qualification running into a rather unusual situation where a person may move from one province, where they pay no disability pension, to another province where they do make that payment. I do not know what would happen under that situation because they might well have been residents in Canada for the 10-year period.

Probably this was discussed when the minister held a conference with the representatives of the province. All these matters are important. As the bill progresses through its various stages we may well have questions to ask on such matters.

In his early remarks the minister indicated that the situation as it existed with regard to disabled persons constitutes a real burden upon their relatives and friends. Well, most of us know that, and I certainly know from my own personal experience in view of the cases with which I have had to deal. It is a real tragedy for many people. In fact, I know of one couple who have reached the old age security stage and they have a daughter who is approximately 30 years of age. She is unable to provide for herself and her parents want to keep her at home. Her condition is a combination of mental and physical and they feel she is their responsibility. But they have to live upon old age security payments and it is quite a struggle for them. Of course what disturbs them more than anything else is what will happen to their dependent when they pass away.

In this bill we have at least provided a partial answer to that problem. In another particular case I think I found one of the most tragic experiences I have ever had as a member of parliament. This concerned a man who was 60 years of age who came to me for advice. He had resided within this country for a period of 40 years and he had been successful as a farmer but he developed arthritis and over a period of years it had taken practically everything he had been able to acquire in order to try and secure some relief for his disability. He, like so many other people, followed up every suggestion good or bad in order to find relief until in the end he was without means. His wife was compelled to scrub floors in order that the two of them might be able to get along. He communicated with me and he did not fit in anywhere. I thought it was a terrible tragedy for me as a representative of this country and a member of parliament in this great nation to have to tell him that his only hope was municipal relief. I cannot recall anything which hurt me more than that particular case.

This is the type of case which will be covered under the bill which is now before us and one need not go beyond that particular case to appreciate the value of the general principle contained in this bill.

The minister said, though he may not have used these exact words, that we would share the burdens these people have to bear. I agree with that absolutely. Certainly those of us who are more fortunate from a physical point of view have no cause to complain about sharing the burden which these people have had visited upon them through no choice of their own, and for any nation like this to be able to fill that gap is certainly a step forward.

In the early course of my observations I may have been somewhat critical. In fact, the minister by his interjection has remarked to that effect. I was critical but he will appreciate that we see in this bill a real step forward and something which we have no hesitation in supporting at all in principle, and if I know this House of Commons, as I have known other houses in the past, then I would suggest that there will be few and probably no dissenting voices in this parliament. But once again, however, I do not want a statement of that kind to be construed as meaning that we accept it in every detail.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would be the easiest thing in the world to go on discussing this measure and occupy the entire 40 minutes at my disposal. But I do not intend to do that. To the extent that I have already spoken I have probably held up the passage of this measure. If that be true then possibly I should apologize. We in this group certainly support the bill before the house at the present time.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I know I have no more right to speak on this bill than any other hon. member in this house, but I have some right and I wish now to express my gratitude to the minister for introducing this measure. When I came here in 1935 this was one of the things about which I spoke. I have continued to do so every year since because I felt then as I have felt ever since that those who could not earn a dollar were forgotten people, but that they were not forgotten people after that.

I am not going to speak very long tonight because I have spoken loud and long in the past on this subject and I must say that I received first class support from all around me, especially after the session was over when the minister supported me in my views. I am not forgotting the former minister of national health and welfare, the late Senator Ian Mackenzie. When I had spoken on this matter on about the fourth occasion he said: "Dan, stick to it. You are right."

The Christian program is, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the sick, and help those who cannot help themselves. Very plain and simple. But, of course, we sometimes feel the government should do more and we are not always willing to put our hand in our own pocket and help those who cannot help themselves. But personally I think hon. members of this house even in that way take second place to no other group of men in Canada.

I admit I received considerable support from the trades and labour council of Fort William, and Jim Walsh, who was then president, gave me a complete list of disabled persons. I was alarmed because I did not realize there were so many but of course the trades and labour council were in possession of that information because they were always interested.

I paid my tribute three years ago to the present Minister of Labour, the V.C. on this side of the house who has a good heart in him too, and who gave me any information he had on the subject. He told me that his department and the Department of Veterans Affairs and the department of national health were co-operating with the provinces all over Canada in trying to help disabled persons.

Two years ago, before the election, when we debated this question in a full and complete manner, I will not forget, and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will not forget either, that I thanked the minister when he promised consideration for this problem. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said I had more confidence in the minister than he had. If he looks up Hansard he will find that. Indeed, the hon. member has now agreed with me and while my first name is the name of a prophet I think my prognostication was a little more accurate than his at that time. A little more than a year ago I commended the province of Ontario for leading the band. No matter what party is in power we expect the province of Ontario to lead the way because we are the crack province of Canada. They led the way in bringing in this pension for disabled persons.

Mr. Speaker, I have been in the homes of some of those disabled persons who have received the pension. May I say that it would do anyone's heart good to hear them express their gratitude for the $40 a month. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) says that it is not enough. May I say too with him that $40 more than nothing is a great deal of money to people who previously had not had a dollar of their own. Just to feel that stiff cheque in his hand for the first time gives such a person a great thrill.

I know there will be difficulties in administering this bill. As to the definition, I would be well satisfied to take the definition upon which the province of Ontario grants their pension. It will be fairly close to what is right. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that the federal government should pay 75 per cent of the cost and the province should pay 25 per cent. I do not see much sense in that proposition. I speak for the province of Ontario now. If the province of Ontario is paying the whole thing, why should we discredit the province of Ontario by offering them 75 per cent of the whole 100 per cent they are now paying? Why should we offer the 75-25 per cent basis to a province like Alberta? I was going to say that that is a province which has more money than it knows how to handle, but I will not say that. Would we offer the basis of 75-25 per cent to British Columbia? Would we offer the basis of 75-25 per cent to Quebec? They would tell you, "We will pay for our own pension". It may be that there are some provinces which will find difficulty in this matter. I am sure that the dominion government will not be lacking in their willingness to co-operate.

The only thing I want to say is this: While there are those in the opposition who have tried to pull this bill to pieces and—they did not say it was almost bad but they would not say it was almost good—to show the weaknesses of the bill, but I just take this opportunity, in my own humble way, of thanking the minister for his co-operation. He never gave me anything else. Three years ago we let the resolution go by and did not debate it. He said: You will get co-operation just as soon as the government is ready. Now the minister does not take credit for this bill; he gives the government credit. He knows that he is not the government. However, he is an extremely important part of it as far as this bill is concerned.

I am not afraid of what the future may hold for this bill. There may be considerable difficulty, but it will be a great help to those who have not had a dollar coming in. I have had letters from all over Canada, from Cape Breton to Victoria. One little girl wrote me from Cape Breton the other day to this effect: We hope it will come; I have never earned a dollar and unless Providence does something for me, I never shall earn a dollar. To any cabinet minister or any member of this house who can be a partner in giving a girl like that a pension it must give a feeling of happiness to be alive and to be a member of this house.

I just conclude by saying "Thank you, Mr. Minister; may you keep on going because in every department in which you have worked or which you have headed up you have done something that made Canada sit up and take notice". Just think of it. As to those of us who were not born in Canada but who were born some place else and are still living here, whether we were Scots, Irish, English, Italian, Russian or something else, we are not that any more. I am not an Irishman any more; I am a Canadian. I was born in the land that I left in order to choose what I thought was a better country to come to, and I am loyal to my native land. I just thank the minister and say this to him: Keep on and may Providence be with you.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, since I am one of those who have been requesting for the past few years in the house the enactment of legislation to provide help for our disabled citizens, I feel justified in participating in the present debate, even if I speak for only two or three minutes.

May I first congratulate the government on this truly social legislation. If I were one of those whose duty it is to criticize I would say that it comes a little late, but I believe I can disregard that fact and congratulate the government for finally agreeing to introduce this social legislation.

However, I must qualify my statement by making a suggestion to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) through you, Mr. Speaker. In my humble opinion, the age at which the disabled person will be entitled to receive a pension—provided the other conditions have been satisfactorily met—is a little too high, since in certain cases, at the age of 18, the anatomic lesion or functional trouble has become permanent and cannot be cured no matter what treatment is applied at that time.

Therefore, we should get the assurance that rehabilitation treatments will be given in due time, when they have the most chances of succeeding. I know that the lowering of the age of eligibility to 15, to 10, and even to the time of birth, would greatly upset the provisions of the bill now before us.

However, if it were impossible to lower the age limit provided in the bill in an absolute way, I would be tempted to make to the government, in order to remedy this situation, the following suggestion: in my opinion, this bill should provide for payments from the time of birth in certain cases, or later, in the specific cases where these children or these young people undergo medical treatment for rehabilitation, and this as long as the invalidity lasted and treatments were given. In addition to the moral support to which I referred a moment ago and which I shall not discuss further, this procedure would facilitate rehabilitation, which, I can well imagine, is the ultimate dream of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In any event, this suggestion would bring about savings of public funds since a relatively large number of these people who would have undergone treatment from an early age would have become normal men or women who would no longer fall within the category of those assisted by the bill under consideration at this time. And what is more important still, a number of them would have become quite normal by the time they would be coming into contact with society. They would therefore have a far better chance of normal rehabilitation.

When I say that by promoting the early rehabilitation of a large number of these invalids, the government would save money, I will not be contradicted, I am sure, by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If I have understood his remarks properly, this afternoon, he mentioned that a number of veterans, for instance, have been put in a position where they are now once more able to lead a fairly normal life after undergoing rehabilitation. As a matter of fact, the same is true of assisted and rehabilitated blind people.

It is, in fact, that part of the minister's remarks, added to my modest medical knowledge, which have prompted me to say the few words I have just said and which I now immediately bring to a close, submitting them most sincerely to the attention of the house.

(Text):

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I expected this to be a very happy day because it seemed to me that all parties in the house would hail with real satisfaction the introduction of this bill which marks such a great forward step in the setting up of the welfare state in Canada. However, I was astonished to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I think that never before in my life, and I admit I am getting on in years now, have I heard an hon. gentleman find so much cause for gloom in something that is so obviously good. I should have thought that of all the political parties in the house that hail the bill with satisfaction the hon. members who sit opposite me would have hailed it with the most satisfaction, knowing as they do that the Liberals have some common ground with them on the question of social welfare and differ from them only with respect to that kind of socialism that has to do with the social ownership of certain public utilities.

I should have thought they would have been overjoyed at the fact that the Liberals had introduced this new and large measure of the welfare state in Canada. But what do we find? We find that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre sees nothing but cause for unmitigated gloom in the bill that has been introduced in the house today.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: Did the hon. member hear my speech?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Philpott: I heard every word of the hon. member's speech.

An hon. Member: What with?

Mr. Philpott: I have also heard every word of the thousand and seven hundred and sixty-six speeches he has made this year.

Mr. Knowles: Then you should have profited by doing so.

Mr. Philpott: So far as some of the speeches the hon. member has made are concerned, I have agreed entirely and I have not hesitated to vote with him even against the majority on this side of the house when I thought he had said something sensible. But when he talks such sheer unmitigated poppycock as he talks today then I find that I cannot go along with him. I must say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre reminds me of a certain character in "Pilgrim's Progress". We have so many ex-clergymen in the house that maybe they will be able to remind me of which one it is, but it is a character in "Pilgrim's Progress" who, no matter how good things were, always found something wrong with them. I think if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre went to a wonderful wedding and got a great big slice of wedding cake he would go home and complain that he hurt a tooth on a pebble in one corner of the cake. I am very much afraid that on the day after he gets past St. Peter and is admitted within the pearly gates he will be complaining that although the streets are paved with gold there should also be diamonds in the gold-paved streets. Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I think that every intelligent person—

An hon. Member: That counts you out.

Mr. Philpott: —in the Dominion of Canada will know perfectly well that what we have done today is to pass a great milestone in the social welfare set-up of the Dominion of Canada. I think if we have any great weakness it is perhaps partly due to the hon. gentlemen opposite who are such experts at crying blue ruin even about the social welfare advances that we do make. However, in my opinion every intelligent citizen in Canada will know perfectly well that we have passed a great milestone in our social welfare system. I think that the Canadian people have some weaknesses and one of them is that we do not think highly enough of our own achievements.

One of the great advantages of travelling in all the different countries of the world is that you find out that, regardless of the political persuasion of the people you meet, Canada's prestige stands high with all the nations of the world. You will find that while you may get an argument about some things you will not get an argument about the statement that Canada has the finest welfare state system of any country in the western hemisphere and is even miles ahead of our great and rich neighbour to the south, the United States. As an example of that I have in my hand a copy of The Reporter, a very reputable magazine published in the United States. It is the issue of April 27, 1954 and it contains an article by state senator Richard L. Neuberger of Portland, Oregon, on Canada's social security system for children. He gives the origin of our welfare state system in Canada dating it from the report of Professor Leonard Marsh of my own home town of Vancouver. He has this to say:

> The last time millions of Americans were out of work their craving for assurance against want produced unemployment compensation, old age assistance, and our entire system of social security benefits. If such economic hardships occur again, a new phrase is likely to be heard in the land: "family allowances."

Then he goes on at great length to show how family allowances, the great reform enacted by the Liberal government headed by the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, have been such a great advantage to this country, how we have set the pace for all the other countries of the western hemisphere and how far ahead of those countries we are.

I want to touch briefly on an extremely important point made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) with respect to the health grants of 1948. I think that the people of Canada have not yet realized how tremendously important those health grants are. I happen to have had experience of that from the receiving end because not so much by my own decision but more or less because pressure was put on me to take the job I became the first British Columbia president of the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society, a society which achieved a marvellous expansion right across the country. Whereas it started in the first instance only a few years ago with no facilities, no technicians and no treatment facilities we all know that now the facilities stretch pretty well across the country.

British Columbia has set an example for the whole of Canada. We set out only a few years ago without a single dollar of funds but with the realization of a great need. We happened to have in that province a very fine woman who was the sparkplug of the whole thing. She more or less stampeded me into the job. I must say that we had great co-operation from the Department of National Health and Welfare from the very beginning. When we first started out we were almost embarrassed by the amount of help we got from the department in the way of actual facilities. That great work would never have been able to spread across the country in the way it has if that help had not been available from the very beginning to give us the physical equipment needed to carry out that particular job. As I say, if you go right down the list I think hon. members know perfectly well, I suppose, that everyone in this house, or for that matter and out of it, says silly things at times or things that we do not mean seriously—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Philpott: —and I will be the first to admit that I have done my share. But let us never forget this. Whatever else we fight about, let us not belittle the great social welfare—

Mr. MacInnis: Take your own advice.

Mr. Philpott: —system which we have set up in this Dominion of Canada. We have a very fine system here, of which every patriotic Canadian should well be proud.

I know quite well that this bill is not perfect. I know quite well that the social welfare system of Canada is not perfect. I am reminded of the time when the great evangelist Dwight L. Moodie remarked during one of his sermons that he had never met any perfect people. After the sermon one of the congregation came up to complain. He said that he was a perfect man, whereupon Mr. Moodie remarked "are you married?" The gentleman said, "yes". He said, "I should like to have a word with your wife". Now, there may be completely perfect people in the group opposite; there may be completely perfect social welfare measures in the group opposite. However, I feel we have not done too badly in our social welfare state system in this Dominion of Canada. I, for one, am glad to see that so far as we can possibly discover up to now there is no one in this house who is willing to stand up and say he is opposed to this system.

The great advance in our time was when family allowances were introduced into Canada. As we all know, a prominent leader, whose name I shall not mention at this time, took a very prominent position contrary to family allowances. In this analysis written by state senator Richard Neuberger, in the magazine The Reporter, he attributes one of the successes of the Liberal party over many years, and one of the causes of the non-success of a certain other party that I shall not name now, to the fact that in the early days they took such a strong position on family allowances. I, for one, have never been the slightest bit taken aback by the gibes we hear from some hon. members opposite concerning silk-hatted socialists. I have never been taken aback when we were accused of setting up a welfare state. Now, I find even some Conservatives in some other countries are not the slightest bit backward about taking responsibility for setting up the welfare state.

I had the great privilege during the last general election campaign in Great Britain of being sent over in a professional capacity to write about the political campaigns. I heard six of the seven speeches made by that great leader of the Conservative party, the then Right Hon. Mr. Winston Churchill. I may say it was a wonderful experience for me to hear that grand old war horse, and to see him winning an election by making only seven speeches. Six of those speeches were just a half hour long, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, I intend to follow his example and stay within my half hour. I shall never forget being at his nomination meeting, which they call an adoption meeting, and he was anwering questions from the floor. Someone asked him, "Is it true that the Labourites inaugurated the welfare state?" The grand old Conservative gentleman rose and said, "The welfare state, I invented it". That is the leader of the Conservative party speaking. Then he went on to give the reasons for saying that it was under his government, during wartime, that he laid the foundation for the welfare state.

However we may argue about small things that do not matter—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Philpott: —let us not belittle the really great social advances that we are making. Let the hon. gentlemen opposite who find it so difficult to give credit where credit is due acknowledge at least that the Liberal government has made a great forward step in this system of the welfare state. The other day the young Liberals of Canada presented to the great Prime Minister of this country, and the leader of this Liberal party, a very fine bronze bust. The real memorial to the Prime Minister of this country will not be found in anything made of bronze, but it will be found in the regard of the people of Canada for the great statesman who set up the great system and made the great forward step in the welfare state, which keeps this Canada ahead of the whole western hemisphere.

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): The remarks of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), Mr. Speaker, cannot have failed to add to the self-satisfaction already so adequately expressed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) on his own account. In support of, and as a basis for, this self-satisfaction the minister told at some considerable length of the work that had been done and the results that had been achieved by other people. It is true that he did mention some few grants the government had given to these organizations, but he carefully refrained from speaking of the percentage those grants represented of the total that had been expended on these projects.

The proposal embodied in this bill is meritorious. I do not believe any hon. member could have serious objection to the principle involved. If we are going to pay pensions to individuals solely because they have reached the age of 70 years, irrespective of their earning capacity, then the payment of pensions to those permanently barred from earning a livelihood either through injury or disease should logically apply with even greater force. However, there is a consideration applicable to this latter group of which the bill as drafted takes no cognizance. It is important, of course, to see that the totally disabled person possesses sufficient financial resources to provide the ordinary necessities of life, food, clothing and shelter. But it is of even greater importance to retrain the individual to live within the limits of his possibilities and to the hilt of his capabilities.

I cannot believe that the minister is so indifferent to the opportunities presented to him at this time as to ignore the prospect of establishing modern facilities throughout the country for the retraining and rehabilitation of the totally disabled. What sort of answer to the pitiful plea of the supposedly hopeless cripple is it to say, "We will provide you with a pittance sufficient to enable you to live in your misery for the period of your life expectancy, but we can offer you no hope of an improvement in your condition." This attitude might be justified, if there was really no hope of re-establishing those seemingly hopeless cripples.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member has asked me a question. I certainly spent a good deal of time pointing out what we were prepared to do in the field of rehabilitation, which is associated with this measure.

Mr. Trainor: I wish the minister would indicate to what extent, and how much money.

Mr. Martin: I did. I guess my hon. friend was not in the house at the time, or he would not be saying this.

Mr. Trainor: This, however, is by no means the case, as the minister is no doubt aware. Several agencies in this country and in the United States are doing excellent work in this connection. Among those that might be mentioned is the Ontario compensation board at Malton, which is achieving remarkable results in the rehabilitation of victims of industrial accidents.

Mr. White (Waterloo South): We heard all that from the minister today.

Mr. Trainor: But it is not the minister's department that is doing it, you will notice. The Department of Veterans Affairs, which incidentally happens to be a department of government—and I will give them full credit for this—is engaged in the treatment and retraining of paraplegics at several centres. They could do a lot more. Perhaps the best known work of this nature on this continent is being carried out at New York University, Bellevue Medical Centre, at the Institute of Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation.

Dr. Howard A. Rusk of New York city, reporting in the Journal of the American Medical Association in the issue of November 1, 1952, surveys the results achieved in 208 cases discharged from this institution, taken consecutively. This report emphasizes the really remarkable results that can be achieved by a comprehensive program of retraining among a group of helpless and hopeless cripples. For instance, 97 per cent received some benefit from their rehabilitation experience. The number confined to wheelchairs and beds decreased from 67·8 per cent to 32·2 per cent of the total, and the number of bedfast included, decreased from 36·1 per cent to 11·1 per cent. The number able to do some kind of work increased from 18·3 per cent to 59·6 per cent, and the number incapable of even minimum self-care decreased from 63 per cent to 18·3 per cent. This latter figure is a true index of the economic value of the program.

From the point of view of direct measurable gain in dollars and cents—the cost of rehabilitating 49 of the patients to a stage where they were able to engage in gainful employment was $140,000 and the annual earnings of this same group after rehabilitation totalled $94,000—not a bad return on investment. From the point of view of overall significance to the community of this type of program, I quote the conclusions of Dr. Rusk in the article referred to:

> 1. Rehabilitation pays dividends in dollars as well as in social returns. 2. Rehabilitation of severely disabled persons who may be potentially unemployable is no less valuable economically than rehabilitation of the less severely disabled who are potentially employable. 3. There is need for improvement and expansion of the administrative types of social service focused on development and use of resources in the environment. The hopeful finding of this study is that, with physical rehabilitation and adequate social support, the disabled person can "learn to live and work with what he has left".

Surely the government can require no more convincing evidence of the value of an organized program of rehabilitation for the disabled, both from the viewpoint of straight economic return on this investment, and from the aspect of freeing this hitherto neglected group of citizens from the shackles of enforced immobility.

I would suggest that the minister should enter into discussions with the provinces with the object of establishing at least one completely equipped and staffed institute of physical medicine and rehabilitation in each province, the cost to be distributed according to the respective financial capabilities of provincial and federal governments respectively.

In support of my contention that pensions alone are no solution to the problems of the totally disabled, may I quote a personal communication from Dr. Leona Baumgartner, commissioner of health of New York city, who has had a wealth of experience with this subject and who states:

> In regard to the question about the relative advantage of allocation of funds for rehabilitation purposes, rather than pensions and custodial facilities, there is no question that diagnostic treatment and rehabilitation services when carried on by well trained personnel can do much to change the outlook and potentiality of some custodial or public assistance patients to the point of helping them become independent, useful, self-supporting and productive members of society. It is undoubtedly true that such intensive measures will not be equally effective for all patients. However, until our scientific knowledge develops more, some custodial facilities and pensions will still be required, but perhaps less so than are now used as more and better rehabilitation services are developed.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the minister may plead that this is a provincial responsibility, which is undoubtedly true, but the minister has in the past shown himself as not without aptitude in circumventing such constitutional restrictions. Let him make use of his old device of matching grants in aid.

Mr. Speaker, there is no question of the existence of this problem in Canada, and likewise no question of the inadequacy of present machinery to deal with it effectively. In my opinion, the minister would be recreant to his responsibilities did he not seize the opportunity presented by this proposed legislation to see to it that a really comprehensive program of rehabilitation is made available on a nation-wide basis for our totally disabled citizens. It would be a simple matter to make suitable provision to this end in the proposed legislation. The minister indicates that he has already made it in other legislation, with which I am not familiar. I hope that that is a fact. The challenge is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will he meet it?

If I thought there was any virtue in repetition and reiteration, I would probably weary the house with appeals to the government and the minister to widen the scope of this legislation in order to provide Canada with thoroughly modern, comprehensive rehabilitation facilities.

A rapidly increasing accumulation of experience in the United States proves that rehabilitation is economically feasible, but equally important that it is an economic necessity, and it gets worse and worse as our population gets older and older. The federal government of the United States recognizes this fact and gives active financial support to state and municipal governments towards the provision of facilities. Contrast this enlightened recognition of reality with the meagre, almost infinitesimal assistance provided to the provinces and municipalities by our federal government.

In case any hon. member is not impressed by the very substantial economic value to the nation of the program which I am advocating, I would like to put on the record some figures from the American experience which I would hope might impress the minister, and which I am certain are bound to impress his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I shall do this by quoting from an article entitled "The Economic Values of Rehabilitation" by McCoy, Rusk and Koch in the January 1954 number of the New York State Journal of Medicine:

> To sharpen our focus on these values, let us examine the figures for the year 1952. The 88 state divisions of vocational rehabilitation and agencies for the blind in that year gave some kind of rehabilitation service to more than 228,000 disabled individuals. In the same period they rehabilitated successfully 63,632 men and women. The entire cost of operation of the state-federal program was about $32 million. It is estimated that the annual earnings of the 63,632 men and women successfully rehabilitated will be in excess of $115,420,000. It is further estimated that in the first year after their rehabilitation they will pay in federal income tax from their earnings approximately $10,378,000 and that during their remaining working life they will pay about $270 million in federal income taxes! At this rate we are receiving from the successfully rehabilitated people $12 in federal income tax for each $1 of federal money spent.

In the light of evidence such as this I submit that the question is not whether or not Canada can afford a program of rehabilitation, but rather whether Canada can afford not to embark on such a program.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate. I believe that in debates of this kind, particularly at this time of the session, the situation would be fairly met by one speaker from each party speaking for his party in regard to the bill; and then in committee anyone who had anything further to say could say it there. But I cannot understand the kind of speech that we heard here this evening from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). Surely his many friends in Vancouver will feel terribly disappointed with that speech. It was not even a correct speech.

I was not able to be in the house all the time when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke, but I had occasion to leave the committee where I was to come into the house while he was speaking. As he began to speak his first words were: "We welcome this measure." He went further and said that when the bill went into committee we might have some criticism to make, but he said: "Do not let anyone think that because of that criticism we are not welcoming this bill." I do not understand why the hon. member for Vancouver South is particularly anxious to attack this party whenever he rises to his feet. Has he forgotten that when in the early days the party was on the up and up he himself became a member of it, and was nominated as one of its candidates? But realizing that in that way lay a lot of hard work and not very much in the way of anything else, he decided to leave it. Since that time until he came here he has run the whole gamut, advocating the election of every creed from communists to Conservatives. As a matter of fact, he advocated my own election on one occasion and he ran against a candidate of the Liberal party in 1949 as an independent. I do not know what sort of independent he might be, but I do know what sort of member he is now, and I do say that he must be a great disappointment to the many people who believed that here they had something different.

Mr. Bennett: It is too bad you do not have more like him over there.

Mr. MacInnis: Thank God we have not! Many faults are to be found with members on this side of the house, as there are with members on that side, but we mostly know whether we are standing on our feet or on our heads, but the hon. gentleman does not.

Yesterday we were discussing another matter relating to old age pensions, and when the hon. gentleman noticed that a vote was in the offing he left the house in great haste.

Mr. Knowles: Shame!

Mr. MacInnis: That is not what the people of Vancouver expect of him. I do not wish to say anything more along that line. I could and may if I am tempted, but I shall leave it at that.

With respect to the matter of bringing politics into this debate, the minister did that very early in the game. He had not gone far in his speech when he brought politics into the discussion by drawing attention to those who had helped to bring this measure to its present stage. They were all on that side of the house. Surely the minister knows better than that. Surely he knows there are some over here. Surely he knows the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) has advocated these things in the house. As a matter of fact, he should remember that I myself brought in resolutions in regard to matters of this kind; I think it was in the second session of 1949 that I proposed a resolution.

He will remember this one after I tell him a little incident about it. My resolution was to inaugurate in Canada, with the assistance of the provinces, a system of social welfare that would take care of every individual who needed care through no fault of his own. The minister pointed out to me at that time that this sort of thing might happen. He said it was dangerous to do things of that kind because people might mutilate themselves in order to take advantage of social benefits. He said that a man might cut off both his hands in order to get benefits under the legislation that my hon. friend is advocating, and surely this parliament would not condone legislation of that kind. Well, this is legislation for the totally disabled, and perhaps somebody may be so keen to come under it that he may cut off both his hands.

An hon. Member: For $40 a month?

Mr. MacInnis: The fact of the matter is that if anyone should do that we would look after him even without this legislation. Let it be noted that in our legislation and in our workmen's compensation laws the individual's own negligence in contributing to an accident is not considered a bar to his receiving compensation. But that is the kind of nonsense we hear. I am accustomed to hearing ministers on the other side of the house, when they are introducing bills, giving credit to those who have helped to bring the measure about, forgetting others. I remember one bill a few years ago dealing with the matter of discrimination. They went over the whole field. I thought I had done a little bit along that line myself; I was forgotten. However, I can stand that sort of thing, if they can.

In regard to this measure, let me put myself on record early. I welcome this bill. Not only that, but I wrote an article for a couple of papers in my riding this morning and I referred to the bill that is now before us as another link in the chain of our many social services. Just to say that I welcome this bill is not to say that it is perfect. Even the hon. member for Vancouver South admitted that it was not perfect; but I suppose he has a dispensation to say that sort of thing which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not. Possibly we can find some way of getting that sort of dispensation for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Not from over there, please.

Mr. MacInnis: It is time we stopped playing with these things.

Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis: They are too important. The minister says "Hear, hear". But I hope he will remember the next time when he is thinking of those who helped create the atmosphere in which these things can be done he will not forget the people whose politics differ from his own. That is not Christian, and my hon. friend would like to be called Christian.

Mr. Martin: I fully agree.

Mr. MacInnis: It is not ethical either, and my hon. friend would like to act in an ethical manner. As I said, I did not intend to take up the time of the house at this stage in the session to speak on this bill, but I shall watch it if I have the opportunity as it goes through the committee, and if there are any suggestions I can make to improve it, or any criticisms I feel should be made, I shall make them.

My hon. friend, the member for Vancouver South, referred to Sir Winston Churchill. I am reminded of an observation made by another great Churchill, Sir Winston's father.

He said that if an opposition member ever had a good word to say for the government he should say it with a kick instead of a pat.

Now, I would not go that far. As a matter of fact, the praise which members of the government receive from this side of the house becomes a little embarrassing at times, and probably I have engaged in it myself. But then there were persons on the ministerial benches of whom I thought very highly, and because I thought very highly of them I did not want to stint a word of praise just because they sat on the opposite side to me and because their politics differed from mine. "A man's a man for a' that."

Mr. F. T. Fairey (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I hope that what I shall have to say will to some extent pour oil on troubled waters, and having had an experience once today I shall be very careful that I say nothing which can be misinterpreted. Something has been said in criticism of the minister for taking unto this government, to himself, and some hon. members on this side of the house, a certain amount of credit for introducing the bill now under discussion. I think it is true to say that at the same time the minister did give credit to other hon. members situated in other parts of the house. No one would ever contend that the measures we introduce do not sometimes have their inspiration from hon. members on the opposite side of the house. In fact, it would be a tragedy if that were not so.

Still, Mr. Speaker, I do rise with a good deal of satisfaction to support the measure which is going to provide allowances for disabled persons. This measure, completing, as I think it does, a broad pattern of social legislation, is one which all hon. members of this house, and indeed all the people of Canada whom we represent, will approve and applaud. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is to be congratulated I think, as the responsible minister of this government, on the completion of the over-all plan. It must give him and his officials great satisfaction to realize that all classes of our people who have a legitimate claim upon the heart and purse of this country are now taken care of.

It is not without value to note that this government, chiefly through this department and the Department of Veterans Affairs, provides for assistance to the young through family allowances, and the old through old age security and old age assistance, leaving the middle group, the young and the vigorous, to fend for themselves and, in addition, to help bear the burdens of those in other groups.

The blind and the war veterans, being special groups, are treated as such, leaving only those who suffer a disability not attributable either to blindness, war service, or industrial accident. It is well to note the similarity in the measure of assistance to be given. For the most part, the allowances are the same in amount, and all require some form of means test. In my opinion, this is as it should be. Note also that allowances are to be paid for total and permanent disability. Herein lies the chief difficulty. Mention has already been made by other speakers of this problem and I will not develop it further, as I intended to do, because I have confidence in the skill and sympathetic attitude of the minister and his very competent officials to arrive at a satisfactory and reasonable interpretation of what this parliament means by "permanent disability".

Here, Mr. Speaker, I leave the field of administration and finance to venture into the field of the theory of social welfare. Is this a good measure? What is the chief aim of measures of this kind? Is it to rid ourselves of the uncomfortable feeling that others of our people suffer, chiefly through no fault of their own? Do we achieve this by the payment of a sum of money which will assist them to exist?

I have sufficient knowledge and faith in the sense of responsibility of our people and this parliament to reject this as a complete answer, and to make the claim that our ultimate aim is to build up the physical and emotional state of each of these unfortunate people so that they can become able and willing contributors to the society of which they are members.

It would be wrong simply to pension people off. All the measures sponsored by this government in this field are measures of assistance. None are intended to be more than that. To deprive a person of the incentive to strive for himself is morally wrong and does not achieve the purpose which is set before us. For one thing, the amount of assistance is never enough. The more nearly the amount of assistance is to a subsistence level the more dependent does the recipient become and the less likely is he or she to put forth that effort which contributes to healthful living.

While I approve, Mr. Speaker, a reasonable and even a generous measure of assistance to those who cannot under any circumstances fend for themselves, I do emphasize the wisdom of keeping ever before us the possibility of rehabilitation. There are degrees of disability. No person is without some form of disability and, indeed, there are some inspiring stories which may be told of men and women under a disability, which most of us would consider total and permanent, rising to great heights of achievement and making a lasting contribution to society.

As a matter of fact, I have just completed reading a book recounting the adventures of Wing Commander Douglas Bader. Hon. members will recall that this young officer lost both legs in a flying accident. Because of his indomitable spirit and contempt for defeat he insisted on remaining in the Royal Air Force where he became one of the great fighter pilots of the second world war. I need not mention that wonderful woman, Helen Keller, to emphasize the point I am trying to make that most of these people who suffer disabilities can, with the proper kind of training and assistance, be helped to a better life.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that this act should be considered in relation to an act we passed a few days ago called the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act. When I spoke to the committee concerning the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act on March 3 of this year I stated that in my opinion it was one of the most forward-looking pieces of legislation to come before the house at this session. I did so because the only really important section of that amending act was the introduction of the idea of a training program for the physically handicapped. It is to be known as schedule R. This too is a measure to be undertaken in co-operation with the provinces.

I would remind hon. members, Mr. Speaker, that training for physically disabled persons has been going on for about four years under a scheme sponsored by the Department of Labour with the blessing of the Department of National Health and Welfare. During this time under a different schedule—schedule M it was called—approximately 500 persons suffering various disabilities have been trained and have been found suitable and adequate employment. I am informed that over 80 per cent of those trained in that special group are satisfactorily rehabilitated.

From this small sampling our minds turn to the possibilities in a scheme of this kind. Not only will the public purse be saved tremendous sums which would otherwise be spent without apparent results, but there is reason to hope that thousands of our citizens can, by a combination of these two measures, be restored to participation and partnership in the business of developing this great country of ours.

This is a measure, Mr. Speaker, which I am sure—because it appeals to the best in our nature—will meet with approval in all sections of the country and in all parts of this house. It will demand on our part sympathetic understanding of the difficulties of those who are called upon to administer it. From their early efforts we shall learn much. I have no doubt that from time to time improvements will suggest themselves and that these will then receive the approval of this house.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) presented the considered opinion of this group with regard to this particular bill. Notwithstanding the tirade levelled against us by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott), we are still of the opinion that the improvements we suggested would make this bill a better one, and one which would be more acceptable and of greater assistance to the 25,000 or 30,000 people who will receive benefits from it.

As already indicated, we feel that it is much more logical to pattern this bill after the Blind Persons Act and to divide the cost on a 75-25 per cent basis instead of on a 50-50 basis than to pattern it after the Old Age Assistance Act. An additional $3 or $4 million would enable the federal government to pay 75 per cent of the cost of these benefits. I greatly doubt whether the minister would have had any difficulty whatever in getting the provinces to agree to that division. With that agreement other benefits could have been added to the act.

We regret the limitation on income. We have opposed the means test as it applies to the Blind Persons Act and to the Old Age Assistance Act and we oppose it as it applies to this particular act. I am not sure that the 25,000 or 30,000 people in this country who will be directly affected by this bill will find so much occasion to praise it as did the hon. member for Vancouver South.

It is to be regretted that politics should have been brought into the debate on a measure of this kind as was done during this evening's debate. Knowing the minister as I do and knowing him to be a great humanitarian I feel that he did himself an injustice by injecting into his introduction of this bill so much emphasis on the political aspect of it and by underestimating the humanitarian side of this particular issue. Notwithstanding that criticism I personally should like to congratulate the minister on having been able to sell even this package of goods to the treasury board. I know, as I think do other hon. members in this house, that if the minister had had his way this measure would have been introduced long ago and that this measure would be an even better one than it is now.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, may I just indicate for the record, as I have already indicated or as I have tried to indicate today, that I am not the one in the government who should have the praise which my hon. friend is now extending to me. There was no need for pressing the treasury. The government as a whole, on the suggestion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), readily adopted the proposal which he made.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister's modesty simply overwhelms me.

Mr. Fulton: And it is most unusual.

Mr. Noseworthy: I want to comment on the reference made by the minister to the work which his department has initiated for the rehabilitation of these crippled and disabled people. I should like to pay a special compliment to the work of the Department of Veterans Affairs at Sunnybrook hospital. I have had the opportunity of being in close touch with the work of that department as it applies to many veterans. They have certainly done a marvellous job. I am confident that there is as yet no comparable work being done in the way of rehabilitation by any other department. Anything that the Department of National Health and Welfare or any other department of government can learn from the good work which has been done by the Department of Veterans Affairs in the matter of rehabilitation will be all to the good. I sincerely trust that the minister will seek—as I know he will—to secure as liberal a definition as possible of "totally and permanently disabled".

In this chamber this afternoon reference was made to the Ontario act and to the definition used in that act. I have had considerable experience with that act. I have known a number of people, either permanently or totally disabled, who were unable to secure any benefits from that legislation. Even though doctors certified that they were incurable, that their disease was permanent, as long as they were not dependent upon someone else for the ordinary daily routine of life they were unable to get benefits. I certainly hope that under this act we can secure a definition of totally and permanently disabled that is more liberal than the one used in the Ontario legislation at the present time.

As I say, we shall support the bill. There are 25,000 or 30,000 people across Canada who have been waiting a long time for something of this nature. They will hail it with a great deal of delight. Even though there is a limitation on the income they may earn in addition to their $40, even though the $40 will provide them with a very bare subsistence, even though there is a gap between the 16-year-olds and the 18-year-olds, 25,000 to 30,000 people will be grateful that parliament is passing this measure. That same 25,000 or 30,000 people will look forward to the day when the Liberal government or some other government will bring about the improvements in the legislation that we in this group have suggested.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a brief contribution to the discussion this evening largely arising out of certain remarks that have been made during the past hour or so. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) made an excellent contribution to the debate this evening in helping to bring it back into focus again. It more or less got off the track to a certain extent following the contribution of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott).

In listening to various comments earlier in the discussion with respect to the introduction of disability pensions for the totally disabled, it seemed to me that there was general approval on all sides of the house. The sentiment was also expressed in all quarters of the house that the measure was long overdue. Since I became a member of the House of Commons one of the social welfare topics that has been discussed most frequently in various debates has been the pressing need to consider the special problem of our totally and permanently disabled citizens. At the time these discussions took place I wondered why the federal government had not taken action earlier.

As has already been indicated, this area has been pioneered by municipalities, provincial governments and voluntary groups such as the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. So far as I can see, what is happening now with the introduction of this measure is that the federal government is at long last acknowledging some financial responsibility. This is only as it should be. We know that the central government has tended to reserve to itself the more lucrative tax fields. Such being the case, it is only right that the dominion government should at this time accept some financial responsibility and come to the aid of the municipalities, the provincial governments and the voluntary groups who have had to cope with the challenge of this special social welfare problem. Somebody has been looking after these people. It goes without saying that the totally disabled have not been neglected completely. I know from personal experience that where no other means of financial support have been available it has fallen upon municipal governments to provide from their inadequate tax resources a bare minimum of existence for these unfortunate people.

As the result of federal action in co-operation with the provincial governments the whole matter will now be co-ordinated and placed on a much sounder basis. I was interested in the interpretation that the hon. member for Vancouver South placed upon this measure. He regarded it as another milestone along the road to the welfare state. I am inclined to suggest that his social philosophy is somewhat out of date because, while it is true that during the early thirties it was accepted somewhat uncritically that the state should meet basic welfare needs, in more recent years there has been a considerable change in that viewpoint. Serious thinkers in the field have now come to the conclusion that the state cannot meet the demands of social welfare.

The state is a cold, remote governing body that certainly cannot get down to the intimate levels necessary to provide in the nation an adequate atmosphere of social welfare and social security. Therefore I do not regard the measure as another step forward to the mythical social welfare state. I regard it as merely a common-sense approach to a problem that has been with us from time immemorial, a problem that those with inadequate financial resources have attempted to cope with as best they could. All that the federal government is doing is opening its bountiful treasury and providing some financial assistance to meet a situation of real distress.

As I see it, that is all that the federal government can do with respect to meeting the demands of social welfare in the country. In the final analysis social welfare is the concern of the basic social institutions. The government is helpless if the family, the school and the church are not performing their functions. It is on that level that the real social needs are met, and modern social science is recognizing that principle. If this legislation is going to achieve the desired result in meeting the pressing demands of the totally disabled in an adequate way, it will depend upon the co-operation of the families.

The families still have responsibilities for the totally disabled. True enough, they will receive some financial assistance. As has been pointed out by every speaker, it would also depend upon the full co-operation of our technical schools, our vocational training schools, who are moving forward to embrace more adequate vocational rehabilitation programs. As has been pointed out, if we are going to really meet the situation the two must go hand in hand, the financial provision must work very closely with adequate rehabilitation services.

Every rehabilitation case has to be measured on its own merits, has to be thoroughly evaluated by rehabilitation counsellors. If you try the shotgun approach to the problem and spread certain moneys over a large area without any attempt to meet the individual need then, of course, the second state is worse than the first. If we are really going to meet the basic social welfare need, it will depend upon successful operation and functioning of these basic social institutions. Included in the group, of course, are the local community groups or neighbourhood groups. No one can feel he is surrounded by an atmosphere of social security unless he is living in a situation that provides this intimate person-to-person relationship, and that cannot be provided from a remote set-up but by the intimate, warm and personal contact of your local neighbourhood groups.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that this measure will assist to a considerable extent in making it possible for these basic social institutions, these local groups, to deal with the problem with which they have already been trying to cope—with inadequate financial resources. Now that they have this assistance we should see a real improvement in meeting this problem.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): In rising to support this bill, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who late last summer announced a decision to help these unfortunate Canadians who are totally and permanently disabled. This decision on the part of the Prime Minister indicates to me his great humanitarianism. I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) for bringing forward this legislation at this time. In spite of what the opposition has said about the bill he should get a great deal of satisfaction from bringing forward this further measure of social security. The fact remains that no matter who tries to take credit for this bill, he introduced it.

I may say that I have had many representations from the totally and permanently disabled. I have seen a number of them in my practice. It is sad to see these people dependent on other people for a livelihood. From now on they will get some help, will have some income and will not be so dependent upon relatives, agencies or people in the neighbourhood. Many of us heard an excellent lecture a week ago on anterior poliomyelitis, commonly known as infantile paralysis, as one of the causes of permanent disability. It is not as frequent as some other causes. In fact the total number of cases of permanent disability is a very small percentage of the total number of cases. It is true that many have residual paralysis, and they may have it for a long time or may have it for a lifetime. They get some relief through improvement and some relief from mechanical means.

The minister, I believe, mentioned some of the diseases causing permanent and total disability. He mentioned disseminated sclerosis, progressive muscular atrophy, rheumatoid arthritis. We have also different congenital anomalies and one very common cause of which we are getting a number of cases in recent years is the result of highway accidents. Many victims receive severe brain and spinal cord injuries that are irreparable. We think it is up to the provinces to cut down accidents on the highways, and some of the provinces are doing a great deal in this respect. Many of these people are in hospitals for months, even years. Some of them are an expense to the municipalities and the provinces concerned.

These pensions are being awarded on a matching basis between the federal government and the provinces. I feel it is well that is so because the question of permanent disability is linked with rehabilitation, which is a joint responsibility of the federal and provincial governments. I agree with the minister and the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) that it will be difficult to get a proper definition for permanent and total disability. With the modern advances in therapy and in rehabilitation, a person who ten years ago might have been considered totally and permanently disabled might not be considered so today. I would hope that in the interpretation of this act generous consideration will be given so that all deserving cases will get a pension.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I had not intended to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, but as a British Columbian I feel I have to do so after having listened to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). I have observed with considerable interest, in fact great interest, ever since I came here last November, the unrelieved relish that the hon. member displays for the taste of the polish on the shoes of the Liberal ministry. But today, I think he exceeded himself. If the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin)—I was going to say displayed but of course that would not be displaying—had even simulated a certain modest diffidence, none of this would have occurred. Naturally, when he strides before the house as the harbinger of all good things to the people of Canada, when he takes all the credit for this very mediocre piece of legislation, when he denies credit to those who were advocating it while he was opposing it, then naturally he is going to get a kick-back. Naturally, those who feel that this is a great piece of unfairness are going to be rather savage in their return.

Then, of course, that brings us to the position of that great champion of the Liberal party, the hon. member for Vancouver South. I am not going to recite, as I could do, all the various turns and changes of this political chameleon. I remember, however, an occasion when in his column he defended the election of a very well known communist in British Columbia, the leader of the Labour-Progressive party, Nigel Morgan. The hon. member in his column advocated that this gentleman should be elected to the legislature.

I also recall that there was a time when he was going to be barred from the radio because of his subversive utterances. And who was it who came to his rescue? Well, curiously enough—and most misguidedly now, it appears—it was the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) who insisted that the hon. gentleman who is now the representative in this House of Commons for Vancouver South should be accorded freedom of speech, and even after today I am sure that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and all those who sit with him, would still demand that the hon. member for Vancouver South should have complete freedom of speech—even though he uses that freedom in such a strange way.

An hon. Member: But look what he does for us.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes, definitely, he does a lot for us. But when we are told that we should greet today as a day of great joy because, after incessant prodding by people outside the Liberal party, and after incessant prodding from organizations all over Canada, the government finally and reluctantly brings in a most inadequate measure to deal with the present social problem; I say that when the hon. member for Vancouver South suggests that we should greet this even with loud hosannas in this day and age, then I begin to wonder about this freedom of speech, and whether it should not be coupled with a certain measure of intelligence. I have heard the hon. gentleman reach a number of milestones on the way to the new Jerusalem since I came here to the House of Commons. Sometimes I think it is another kind of milestone, one we are told in the Scriptures which paved the road to other places.

This measure has been introduced, and the party to which I belong is prepared to support it. However it is not prepared to turn handsprings of delight. It is not prepared to pretend that this is an adequate measure. It is not prepared to pretend that it is an indication of public-spiritedness on the part of the government; because it is very obvious that all that has happened here today is what has happened time and again since this very party assumed power in Canada; when pressure becomes irresistible, then finally they move. When they move they demand tremendous credit and accolades for having moved in the face of irresistible pressure. I suppose we are always going to have that sort of thing here, because we have in the party across the way a curious heterogeneous mixture. In fact, when I was listening to the hon. member for Vancouver South I was reminded of the story of the chameleon that was placed on a piece of tartan, and that blew up and bust. Certainly the Liberal party today represents a strange hodge-podge. It has at least a checkerboard effect that may well result in that unhappy end for the hon. member for Vancouver South.

We have here a bill about which we know very little. All we have before us is an outline of a bill. We do not know the most important aspect of this legislation. We do not know what is going to be the interpretation of the term "totally disabled", because that will be decided by regulation. Presumably it will be decided by that great and good cabinet, possibly speaking through the mouth of an inspired Minister of National Health and Welfare.

We do not know yet who in Canada will be covered by this legislation. All we know is that whoever they are they will be covered inadequately, after a long period of waiting, in which organizations and people throughout Canada have been appealing in the past to this government to take some action.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I shall not speak at length on this measure for the very good reason that I have already expressed my opinion on several occasions in the House of Commons as to the necessity for having pensions for disabled persons. Secondly, I do not think at this stage of the session we should have long debates. I believe they should be avoided if possible.

However I cannot let this opportunity pass to hail this great forward step in our program of social security. I was listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) a little while ago when he said that he sat on the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate which looked into this matter of social security in the year 1950. I sat with the hon. member on that committee, and at that time we worked in harmony. Therefore I am surprised by the lack of harmony in this debate.

I was sure our friends on the other side of the house, particularly hon. members in the C.C.F., would congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) upon the legislation he has introduced, and would support it unstintingly. But there is not even harmony among members of the C.C.F. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, "We welcome this legislation." That was the first speech for that party made in this debate. But the reaction of that party to this legislation has been deteriorating throughout the debate, to the point where we now hear the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) describing the legislation as very inadequate and very mediocre.

I suggest that those in the opposition who reproach members on this side of the house for injecting politics into the debate should look to their own side before throwing reproaches like that at this side. Because when I hear members in the opposition describing this legislation as very mediocre, then they are certainly playing politics in a very important matter, a matter which is very important to the people of Canada, and a matter with which no one should play politics.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he say that this legislation is adequate?

Mr. Cannon: I would say that it is certainly adequate under the circumstances—and that is the next point I will come to. I agree with the opposition that it will be important to define clearly what is meant by total disability. I realize there will be certain difficulty raised for members of parliament who will have to cope with constituents who claim that they are totally disabled when, in fact, they may not be completely covered by the definition which will be given.

But I do say in all sincerity that under the circumstances, when we consider the very heavy burden our country has to carry in taxes for national defence, and when we consider the fact that we have had to support the Korean war, and that nearly half our budget is turned over for national defence, we must be convinced that this is adequate legislation, indeed. And we should be very proud of it. Sincere congratulations are due the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare for having introduced this legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Do I understand the hon. member is prepared to move the adjournment of the debate, or has he completed his speech?

Mr. Cannon: I had practically finished.

Mr. Speaker: Would hon. members consent to his carrying on for a minute or so?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Knowles: One minute.

Mr. Cannon: One minute—and I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for giving me a minute. It is very generous of him, and I shall try to finish my remarks in that time. Let me, in concluding, congratulate the minister and tell him that all fair-minded members in the House of Commons will support his legislation wholeheartedly.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Martin: Could we not have second reading tonight? I do not think there are more speakers.

Mr. Fulton: I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Fulton the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Green: May we have the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: If I may be permitted to speak from this side of the house, tomorrow we shall begin with the amendments to the Bank of Canada Act, amendments to the act with respect to the savings banks of the province of Quebec; second reading of the bill with respect to the superannuation of government employees transferred to crown corporations; an act with respect to war service grants and second reading of Bill No. 393, to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act and second reading of Bill No. 460, to amend the International Rapids Power Development Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND NON-OPERATING UNIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition, may I say that there is no legislation whereby the Minister of Labour may impose arbitration upon the two parties involved in the railway dispute to which he referred.

[Later:]

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question to the answer given by the Minister of Labour, may I ask him if the answer he has given means that the government has no intention of appointing any board or commission under any available legislation for the purpose of conducting inquiries which would have the effect of providing a basis for examination of the wage structure?

Mr. Gregg: In response to that question, Mr. Speaker, I beg to tell the Leader of the Opposition that I do not propose to try to anticipate what decision will be reached by the employees of the railways in the vote on a strike which they are to take and which is coming off this summer.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Does the minister not recognize that I was asking a question directed to action of the government and whether it is the intention of the government, under existing legislation such as the Inquiries Act, for instance, to appoint any board or commission which would inquire into this subject for the purpose of examining the wage structure, recognizing the problem with which we are now confronted?

Mr. Gregg: If the Leader of the Opposition refers to the situation as it exists today, the answer is no.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—REPORTED DESTRUCTION OF FISH BELOW POWER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): In the absence of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage), Mr. Speaker, I should like to state this question. Then he can be prepared to answer it the next day he comes into the house. About two weeks ago I asked the minister a question concerning the destruction of fish in the channel below the Calgary power turbine plant at Anthracite. At that time the minister stated that he was investigating that case and would make a report later. I wonder whether he would look into the matter again and make a report concerning it?

TRADE

CONVERTIBILITY OF STERLING—REQUEST FOR FURTHER STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance of which I have given him notice. In view of the apparent unlikelihood of the United States making substantial progress toward liberalizing the terms of trade this year, does the minister feel disposed to alter the somewhat optimistic statement he made on his return from Australia as to the approach of convertibility of sterling.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I can only answer my hon. friend's question by saying that the fears which were expressed in that question are not sufficient to dampen the customary optimism of the Minister of Finance.

TURKEYS—IMPORTATIONS FROM THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, some days ago the hon. member for New Westminster asked a question concerning the importation of turkeys into Canada and asked whether representations had been received concerning these importations. I told him I had received representations from Senator Reid and a number of others and promised to look into the matter and give him an answer later.

As I indicated at that time, I have received a number of representations on behalf of British Columbia producers and others. They asked that the tariff on dressed turkeys be raised against imports from the United States. During the last Christmas season, when imports of dressed turkeys from the United States were heavy, the 12½ per cent most-favoured-nation tariff under tariff item 9 resulted in a duty of approximately 6½ cents per pound. The corresponding American tariff is 10 cents per pound as applied to dressed turkeys and 2 cents per pound applied to live turkeys. The Canadian tariff on live turkeys is approximately 5 cents per pound or more than twice as high as the corresponding American tariff.

To meet the requests of turkey breeders to withdraw the concession under tariff item 9, by which the rate was lowered from 17½ per cent to 12½ per cent under the general agreement on tariffs and trade, might result in a demand by American turkey producers for an increase in the American tariff on live turkeys. Since the end of the war the American market for live turkeys has been most important to Canadian turkey breeders. Although it is true that in the last few years our exports of turkeys have declined, I would think it unwise to jeopardize our potential share of this market by raising our tariff. However, the representations we have received about the tariff on turkey imports will be thoroughly considered when all our tariff concessions are being studied prior to the review session of GATT.

[Later:]

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in connection with a statement he made concerning the importation of turkeys into Canada. Is the minister aware of the fact that the United States turkeys imported into Canada during the last Christmas season, and which were being sold for 80 cents a pound in Canada, could be purchased by the retail trade in the United States for 65 cents?

Mr. Abbott: I was not aware of that.

GRANTING OF EXPORT PERMITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding export permits. When an export permit is granted is the price per unit at which the commodity is to be sold abroad set out in the permit?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer is no.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY COMMODORE ADAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence if he is ready to give me an answer to the question I asked last Friday with regard to a statement made by Commodore K. F. Adams?

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Translation):

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) asked two questions. The first is as follows:

In a press conference given in Quebec city on Thursday, May 27, was Commodore K. F. Adams, on this occasion, expressing the policy of the government?

The answer to that question is that only members of the government express the policy of the government.

The second question was:

If not, will disciplinary action be taken against this officer for making statements so absurd and ridiculous?

It is recognized by all that the speed of modern warfare and the absolute necessity of immediate communications make it essential that in the case of a sea or air battle orders between major formations be given in one language only. By virtue of an agreement among the NATO countries the language in which orders are given is the English language. It is in the light of these facts that we must consider the interview granted by Commodore Adams in answer to questions asked by some newspapermen. In answer to my request for information, his superiors stated that he did not intend to add anything else, but, even though wrong answers were not reproduced literally in the press, they have, in a certain way, left a wrong impression. Consequently, I have given instructions to have this fact brought to the attention of the officer concerned.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the minister?

Does the hon. minister mean, in the answer he just gave to my second question, that he fully endorses the remarks made by Commodore Adams at this press conference of May 27 last?

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, I have had reports of these interviews from four newspapers; they are all different, and I think that if the hon. member will refer to the one published in the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph, he will find a rather accurate report of what this officer said.

WATER POLLUTION

DISCHARGE OF OIL BY VESSELS OPERATING ON LAKE ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister any information regarding the alleged discharge by vessels in lake Ontario of oil, causing extensive oil slicks along the waterfront adjoining Toronto, which seriously interferes with beach rights and otherwise causes substantial property damage and annoyance to the owners? Further, have any representations or discussions taken place between the Canadian and United States authorities in regard to the controlling of such discharges and minimizing the damage?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for having sent me notice of his question. There is no recent information on the pollution of waters in or near Toronto so far as the Department of Transport is concerned. I must add, however, that there have been a number of serious complaints in the past, and I think my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has also received such complaints, as a result of which the Canadian government jointly with the United States government referred the matter of pollution of the waters of lakes Superior, Erie and Huron, I believe, to the international joint commission for study. An interim report has been received from the commission but it did not cover lake Ontario as far east as Toronto. I am informed that the reference has now been amended to include lake Ontario.

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question also has to do with the matter of pollution. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not he has received representations from one or other of the premiers of the provinces asking for the convening of a gathering of federal authorities and provincial ministers with a view to discussing the serious problem of pollution, particularly in interprovincial rivers and lakes, for the purpose of arriving at some co-operative policy to meet conditions such as prevailed recently on the North Saskatchewan river?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there was a letter from the premier of Saskatchewan to which I replied. Having had no notice of the hon. member's question, I have not got the letter and the reply before me at the moment. As I remember it, the premier seemed to be impressed with the desirability of arrangements being made whereby the kind of situation that, unfortunately, now exists in certain parts of the eastern provinces will not be reproduced in the western provinces in the process of their industrial development. There was a suggestion that the federal government should invite representatives of the governments of the prairie provinces to meet with it to discuss the matter.

I replied expressing the view that I thought, initially at least, it would be preferable if the premier of Saskatchewan would himself approach the premiers of Alberta and Manitoba to ascertain their views as to the desirability of that kind of meeting. I said that the federal authorities would be glad to sit in, but I felt that we should be very careful not to do anything that might carry the implication that we felt we had some sort of controlling authority over them in the determination of matters which were of provincial concern. I pointed out that at the present time we were not considering federal legislation with respect to river pollution because it would have to be legislation that would apply to the whole of Canada generally. I pointed out that what might be regarded as sufficient protection, something that would prevent the discharge of waste in running streams, would create an almost chaotic situation in the east where that was being done, as he knew, in a great many places, and that if something were to be arranged along the lines of the body that advises on the conservation of water on the eastern slope of the Rockies that was something that would be of joint provincial concern. I thought it would be preferable to approach it in a spirit of attempting to secure the kind of co-operation that would be of benefit to the whole region rather than have, at the request of one premier, something that might appear to be a summons from the federal authority to come down and discuss the manner in which they should attempt to provide against future embarrassments in that connection.

I do not remember having received any further letter from the premier of Saskatchewan since I wrote to him along those lines.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to thank the Prime Minister, and ask him this question. In view of the fact this pollution problem affects rivers and lakes in all parts of our country, does he not feel that some sort of conference with all the provinces, and at least convened by the dominion, would do something to meet a situation that is becoming more serious year by year?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think my views coincide rather closely with those of the hon. gentleman but the most difficult problem that exists between the federal authority and the provincial authorities is to find some, if not permanent, attempt at a long time solution of fiscal policies. Desirable as co-operation might be in respect of the other matter, I am afraid it would be difficult to get genuine co-operation in these other matters until we have been able to arrive at something that will remove the present feelings in some parts of Canada about satisfactory fiscal arrangements between federal and provincial authorities.

HOUSING

OIL BURNING EQUIPMENT—POLICY OF CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Public Works? I sent him information concerning the background of the question. Is there any provision in the National Housing Act, either by regulation or by directive, that compels those building under the act to instal oil burning systems?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. The answer is as follows: The suggestion that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation gives oil burning equipment preferred treatment over coal burning equipment under the National Housing Act is not correct. The function of the corporation under the new act is to determine the value for lending purposes of a proposed house. In determining the value the corporation takes into account not only the land and structure but as well the equipment that is to be placed in the house. The equipment is selected by the borrower and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation determines the loan value on the basis of the value or cost of the equipment without discrimination as to the type of fuel to be used.

GRAIN

ALLOCATION OF FREIGHT CARS—INQUIRY AS TO QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce ask the wheat board and the transport controller to take a careful look at the grain transport situation in the Peace river country, with a view to supplying the area with a fair share of available shipping space. I am advised that there are points in the country from which not one single car has been shipped in well over a month.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The purpose of the wheat board and of the transport controller is to make sure that every producer has a delivery quota equal to every other producer's. I shall call the attention of the transport controller to the situation in the Peace river area, but the explanation may be that certain areas there have shipped out their full quota and are not entitled to more cars until such time as the quota is raised.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question? Is the minister aware there are points on the prairies where the farmers have not been able to deliver their five-bushel quota? I drew the attention of the transport controller to this situation and I expect it will receive his usual prompt attention.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I doubt if that situation will obtain beyond the end of this week. There is a very heavy movement from the country at the present time, and it is expected that a heavy movement of grain will continue throughout the month. We expect to take delivery of the full five-bushel quota; we expect that very shortly most points on the prairies will have their quotas increased if they have not already been allotted an increase beyond the five bushels.

PORK

INQUIRY AS TO EXPORT TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): In view of the uncertainty that still exists, despite the answers given by the different departments, about the export of pork products, can the Prime Minister give me any information as to conditions under which pork was sold to the Russian government for less than it was sold to the Canadian public?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not know of any sale of pork to the Russian government. I am not in a position to supply any additional information.

Mr. Rowe: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Were there any special conditions in the tenders that were given out by the government as to whether the pork had to be exported outside the North American continent?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The transaction referred to was not a transaction between the government of Canada and the Russian government. It was a transaction between the private trade and the Russian government. I understand that the conditions of sale to the private trade, which were arranged some time ago, were that the particular product would be sold outside Canada and therefore the trade were privileged to sell it to the Russian government or anyone else.

Mr. Rowe: In any such export do the exporters not have to get a permit to export to Russia?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, an area permit was given. Meat is not on the strategic list of commodities and therefore a permit was granted without question.

Mr. Rowe: Might I ask the minister if they did get a permit?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They did, of course.

Mr. Rowe: Does the minister not think that is a subsidization of the Russian government when the sale was made at less than the price in Canada?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I suggest that the trade were free to sell the pork at that price or any price they liked to any government. It was their pork.

Mr. Rowe: I just have one more question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: I know my hon. friends do not like the question. In view of the fact that the pork is now all sold, can the minister tell the house how much money the Canadian government lost in that pork deal?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I announced that when I brought down my budget.

Mr. Rowe: It was not all sold at that time, Mr. Speaker. I submit, in fairness, the pork was not sold at that time.

Mr. Abbott: It is all in my budget speech.

ST. CHARLES AND LAIRET RIVERS—INTERVIEW BY QUEBEC AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister be kind enough to tell me if he received, recently, from the municipal authorities of Quebec city and more particularly from the mayor of Quebec a request for an interview for the purpose of dealing with the question, ever important for Quebec, of the St. Charles and the Lairet rivers. If so, would he tell me if that interview will take place soon?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall having received such a request and there is no intention, at the present time, of having an interview to discuss the question of the St. Charles and Lairet rivers, with regard to which I have expressed, on many occasions, the opinion that it was not a federal responsibility.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MANAGEMENT, EXCHANGE, TO PERMIT SHORT TERM LOANS ON INSURED MORTGAGES, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 297, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: This bill was considered and reported by the committee on banking and commerce.

On clause 1—Definitions.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister make some general comment?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should say a word, although there is not much I can add to the statement I made in the debate on second reading. This is the first time the Bank of Canada Act has been revised for some years. A number of technical, routine and drafting changes were made. The principal changes in policy, which I indicated in my speech on second reading, were a provision enabling the Bank of Canada to vary cash reserves of the commercial banks between 8 per cent and 12 per cent, on the conditions set out in the act. Then, there were certain changes with respect to the investment powers of the bank, and certain changes with respect to its pension fund; such provisions as an increase in the maximum remuneration to be paid to the directors, because of the fact that we now have ten provinces instead of nine, as there were when the act was brought into force. Other than that, I do not think there are any substantial proposals.

The measure was carefully studied in the committee on banking and commerce, and I must repeat what I said in connection with the Bank Act, that I appreciate warmly the careful attention given to this matter by all members in the committee in connection with both the provisions of this bill and those of the Bank Act.

Mr. Macdonnell: As the minister has said, this bill received careful attention in committee. There were before the committee the minister himself, the deputy minister, the governor of the Bank of Canada and the inspector general of the chartered banks. So far as I am concerned, I feel the matter has been very carefully gone into, and any comments I shall have to make will be reserved until we reach the appropriate sections.

Mr. Low: I would like to say only a word, Mr. Chairman, although it is not my intention on this first clause to make any extended speech or criticism.

We attended very carefully to the discussion on this bill as it went through the committee. I believe we gave it a most careful study, certainly the most careful of which we were capable. We did have some suggestions for amendments to one of the sections, but we will reserve our comment on the bill until we reach the section concerned.

I would add only this, that I think every aspect of the Bank of Canada Act was carefully scrutinized by the committee, and if anything has been overlooked it certainly would be something of very little consequence. I believe the act, as we now have it before us, is a good one. And, with the exception of the one small matter to which I have referred, I do believe there is very little that could be improved in it.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—Reserve.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, clause 10 now reads:

> The bank shall maintain a reserve against its outstanding notes and deposit liabilities consisting of its holdings of gold coin and bullion and foreign exchange, and the amount of the reserve held in the form of gold coin and bullion shall always be not less than twenty-five per cent of the outstanding notes and deposit liabilities of the bank.

Perhaps I should have pointed out that what I have been reading is section 23 of the original act as it is dealt with in clause 10 of the amending bill.

I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this reference to the gold coverage is entirely negatived in section 25 of the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act, which reads as follows:

> 25. (1) Notwithstanding section 23 of the Bank of Canada Act, the Bank of Canada is not, unless the governor in council otherwise prescribes, required to maintain a minimum or fixed reserve ratio of gold or foreign exchange to its liabilities.

I suggest that, purely as a matter of draftsmanship, it is not sound to have that definite statement made in the Bank of Canada Act while, in another act, it is rendered practically nugatory. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox:

That clause 10 of Bill 297 be amended by inserting at the end of line 5 on page 9 a comma and the words "subject to section 25 of the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act and subsection (3) of this section."

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend moved a somewhat similar amendment in the committee on banking and commerce, and I was reluctant to accept it at that time because, without any notice of the hon. member's intention to offer the amendment, I was uncertain what the exact effect of it would be on this and other acts.

However, following the meetings of the committee on banking and commerce I have had an opportunity to consider it, and I can see no objection to the amendment now offered. I shall be very happy, therefore, to accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: No, I have another amendment. While I assure the minister it is just as worthy of his concurrence as the one I have just moved, I am not equally sure that it will receive his concurrence.

We have just passed an amendment dealing with the gold reserve clause, which means that the gold reserve clause is practically as if it did not exist. It is somewhat of a puzzle to me why it was left in there at all, in view of the changes in our thinking on money questions which have taken place since the passage of the Bank of Canada Act. It is left in I think as a concession to the past. For a long time, of course, it was regarded as essential. In a way it seems to me that to leave it in there is like a concession to one's grandmother: One does not smoke, perhaps, when she is around. I can explain it only as a kind of concession to good financing manners of the past. I want to make some comments because I do regard it as a matter of very considerable importance, and I hope that I may be fortunate enough, even if this amendment is not carried this morning, to interest people in it and to convince them that it is a matter of great importance.

We are all aware of course that it is only a short time since gold was considered an absolutely necessary backing to currency. I should like to read briefly from our own legislation, the Dominion Notes Act, chapter 41 of the statutes of 1927, which I believe was effective until 1933. This is what it says:

5. The Minister of Finance shall always hold as security for the redemption of dominion notes up to and including fifty million dollars, issued and outstanding at any one time, an amount equal to not less than twenty-five per centum of the amount of such notes in gold.

Subsection 2 reads:

As security for the redemption of dominion notes issued in excess of fifty million dollars, the minister shall hold an amount in gold equal to such excess.

And again from the Bank Act, which is chapter 12 of the Revised Statutes of 1927, section 136 reads:

Every bank which at any time holds in dominion notes less than forty per cent of the cash reserves which it has in Canada shall incur a penalty of five hundred dollars for each such offence.

Therefore we had a situation where the banks were forced to keep a large percentage of dominion notes in their hands, and where dominion notes were heavily backed in gold.

It is hard to believe that so short a time ago paper money was regarded with suspicion. We know that originally, when notes were issued, they were issued against a large percentage of actual commodities held by banks, and if a bank issued notes beyond their capacity to redeem them in commodities they did so at their peril; at any moment they might be called on to redeem the notes in a valuable commodity, usually gold. Though we seem to have passed beyond that, and many people regard that as almost prehistoric thinking, there are competent people, and by "competent people" I mean people with just as good brains as ours, who study the matter carefully, and who not only believe strongly in the gold standard, but believe that we are in great peril since we abandoned it.

I remember reading a symposium not long ago where distinguished advocates of both views were present. I was in great difficulty because when I read the views that were in favour of gold I was absolutely convinced by them, and when I read those that were against gold I was absolutely convinced by them. At the end I felt I had a kind of split personality. In any event, we have abandoned gold, and I am not standing up today to suggest that there should be any return to that at all. I am accepting the fact that we have managed money, but I am saying that managed money still leaves certain questions, and that it is very important now to inquire into the method of the management. I hope to show the committee that by the progress of events of the last twenty years, the intentions of the founders of the Bank of Canada have been entirely frustrated, and that what we have now is an entirely undemocratic and arbitrary manner of managing our currency. It is wholly in the hands of the government. I want to emphasize that. I do not think I fully realized myself the extent to which it was true until the meetings of the banking and commerce committee. It is wholly in the hands of the government.

I shall quote answers given by the governor of the Bank of Canada and by the minister himself, which I hope will satisfy the committee that that is so, and if the committee is satisfied it is so, then I suggest that they should not brush this question aside as merely academic. Parliament at this time has no power. What I mean by that is, there is no occasion which arises, short of some crisis which will upset everything, whereby parliament has any occasion to consider the matter or to express an opinion.

It is interesting to observe that that means we have come full circle to the point when the sovereign has the full prerogative to issue money. Of course, coining was the royal prerogative for years, and it included the right of debasing the coin. In those days they did it by the open practice of clipping the coin; it was done so that you could see it. But in these days the printing press goes at it in a more refined and much less obvious way of clipping coins or debasing the currency, if we wish to do so.

It is rather interesting to find clear evidence of coin-clipping in Shakespeare. If you look at Henry IV you will find that Hotspur speaks of cracked coins being made current: in other words, bad money by legislation being made good. Many people, of course, including the advocates of gold in the symposium to which I referred, think that that is our situation today; that we have paper money with nothing behind it except the ukase of the government. I am not going to take the time of the committee to talk about the classic inflations that we all know about. But I am going to remind the committee just for a moment of the inflation in Germany in 1924 and again in the war just past. I will mention one incident which amused me, and which perhaps may amuse the committee, showing the ironies of the inflation just after the first war in Germany. This caught my eye, because it had been regarded by no less a person than Lloyd George as a very good illustration of the little ironies of life. A man in Austria left a patrimony to two sons, each of whom got an equal amount. One of them, a very sober, respectable individual, invested his share in high-grade securities. The other invested it all in wine. He drank all the wine but kept the bottles. Later on he was able to sell the bottles for more than the value of the gilt-edged securities which his pious and respectable brother had bought. That seemed to tickle Mr. Lloyd George, and it is a delightful instance of being able to eat your cake, or rather drink your wine, and have it still. I mention, just as one further illustration, what has happened to the French franc. In 1913 the United States dollar was equal to 5·16 French francs. In 1954 it is equal to 350 French francs; in other words 70 times as much.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that what I seek to do this morning is not to argue in favour of gold. I regard it at the present time as politically unreal. Whether it will ever come back I make no predictions. But I seek to interest the committee in the present method of management of our money, to indicate it has completely subverted the intention of those who set up the Bank of Canada, to underline the fact that it has come to be the prerogative of the crown, just as it was hundreds of years ago.

It is just twenty years since the Bank of Canada was set up. The preamble to the Bank of Canada Act says that the bank is to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economy and the life of the nation.

And so on. Section 7 says that the governor of the bank has the direction and control of the business of the bank. I think I shall be able to satisfy the committee from answers which I shall subsequently quote, given by the governor of the bank and the Minister of Finance, that that is a thing of the past, and that in section 7, instead of saying that the governor of the bank has the direction and the control of the bank, we should say that the Minister of Finance has the direction and control of the bank. I hope that I shall be able to satisfy the committee that that is so.

The Macmillan commission, composed, as we all remember, of two competent English men, Lord Macmillan and Sir Charles Addis, of the Bank of England, Mr. Brownlee, a former premier of Alberta, Sir Thomas White and Mr. Leman, recommended two things among others in their report, which was the basis of the setting up of the bank. One was that the bank should be privately controlled and the other was that there should be a gold reserve. That was emphasized in 1934 when the bank was formed. As I said a moment ago, that has been changed. It was changed in 1936. In 1936 the bank was nationalized. I make no complaint about that whatever. I am inclined to think that private ownership of the bank, in imitation of the status of the Bank of England, which was privately owned for so many years, though of course that has been changed now, the Bank of England is now nationalized—I am inclined to think that private ownership of the bank was not a very natural thing. I make no complaint whatever about its being nationalized. What I complain about is that the results which flowed from nationalization were not in the least necessary. Let me say again that the actual result, and I will come back to it later and try to establish it step by step, is that the minister can increase the money supply at his will. It is done within the four corners of the finance department. There is no occasion for public notification. It is only people who are close students of finance who have the slightest idea of what is going on.

As I have said, parliament has no say in the matter whatever. Parliament, as distinct from the government, has no more control over money increase than if parliament sat in the moon.

I am not going to take up the time of the committee to ask them to reflect on the enormous power this gives government for good or evil, a power which goes to the very basis of our lives.

Nor am I going to take up the time of the committee to dwell on inflation as it is today. We know that many people have suffered from it. I remember an occasion when a minister in this house, when high prices were criticized, said, "Well, yes, prices are high, but wages are higher." Now, that is not universally true and we all know how many people have suffered from inflation in this country. I think it was Lenin who said that the way to bring down the capitalist economy was to debauch the currency.

But despite that we have this complacency. We say it could not happen here. But in my opinion we must not think we have any kind of Divine immunity. What I want to say is that it can happen here or anywhere and we should be on our guard against it in every possible way.

Now, how has this situation come about? There are two parties concerned. First of all, there is the government. Well, I shall not repeat what we have said so often as to the increase in government power. The government has gone on taking more and more power for it is convenient and, in their view, it is businesslike to do so with as many things as possible, without coming to parliament.

We are now familiar with the phrase, "Who is to stop us?" and other things have been said in this house which I shall not repeat. I would say this though, Mr. Chairman: I think that yesterday morning we had a new high in the disregard of this house by members of the government when serious arguments were made on an important question, to wit, the reform of the Senate, and when the government did not deign to say one word in reply.

We have sunk pretty low when an opposition apparently need not be answered. Indeed, the only answer was an aside which came from the other side of the house and I do not even know if it is in Hansard, to the effect that the government's answer will be given by action.

Well, there has been a long time without action and just in passing I would point out that in my opinion the fact that we were treated yesterday as people whose words were not worthy of answering registered a new low in the regard which this government has for this House of Commons to which they are responsible.

The Chairman: Order. I notice the hon. member for Greenwood stated he was making these remarks in passing. I hope that that is correct and that he will now proceed to discuss clause 10 of this bill, which deals with an amendment to a clause dealing with the reserve of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am glad to be able to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I have just passed. Now, I come to the voters. Why are they so acquiescent? I must admit that I have found most people uninterested, and when people tell me that they are not interested in politics I say to them, "Yes you are interested in politics—you may not know it, but you are."

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is just in passing too, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member misunderstood me. We are discussing a clause of this bill and I must ask the hon. member to confine himself to the clause under discussion.

Mr. Macdonnell: Well, Mr. Chairman, I submit, with deference, that I have to lay a foundation if I am going to have a chance of persuading the minister. After all, he is not an easy man to persuade and I have got to—

Mr. Abbott: You have to have a good case.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have got to make, as he says, a good case, and I am trying to make him realize why the voters are not interested in this, and to indicate to him why one day they may be interested, because a realization of these facts may influence him.

At any rate, Mr. Chairman, my feeling is that the voters have slipped into a situation where they are interested only in the quantity of money, the quantity they have in their own pockets, and they have lost track of the quality of money. My aim this morning is to try to convince this committee that the quality of money is a most important matter. When my socialist friends talk about money for this and that I feel I would like to interest them in the idea of the quality of money, because if you give a man twice as many dollars which are worth less than half, then you have not done very much for him. I am through with that too, Mr. Chairman.

At the present time, as I have said, this all-important question is left to the judgment of a few men. We have respect for these men but they are not infallible and in my opinion they are not the only people who should have, on occasion, the right to express an opinion as to the soundness and validity of our currency. As it is now there is no occasion when all the other experts, and there are other experts, can express an opinion, and there is no need to call them in at all.

Let us be realistic about this. Do any of us believe that politics could never enter into the situation? Let us imagine a government not as responsible as this government considers itself to be, and let us admit that this supposed irresponsible government we are now talking about is coming on to an election. Is it very farfetched to assume that that could affect their attitude. In this connection a thoughtful comment was made to me that the prospect of the long-run value of money being determined by short-run considerations is frankly terrifying. That, I think, is a fair statement.

As a matter of fact, if I were prepared to trust this power to any group of men it would not be to the cabinet exclusively. If it were possible to entrust that power to any group of men I would rather have a group consisting of, let us say, general economists, labour economists, railway economists, farm economists, businessmen, bankers, and—

Mr. Abbott: Include lawyers in that.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, I would include lawyers. I thank the minister for helping me, for it makes me feel as though I am getting his sympathy.

Of course, I do not suggest that that can happen. It could not happen for, of course, the government has to take the responsibility in the end; but I am utterly opposed to the present situation, which is that parliament has no part but that the government has the exclusive power. That power is exercised in private and without notice.

It is rather interesting to point out that in Australia they have dealt with this situation. In Canada if there is a knock-down and drag-out difference of opinion between the governor of the central bank, which was set up to regulate credit and currency, and the Minister of Finance the only recourse of the governor, as appears from the evidence before the banking and commerce committee, is to resign. Though it was not mentioned I suppose there is another course; I suppose it is possible that the governor may say, "I will not resign. I will defy you." But that is asking quite a lot.

On the other hand, in Australia in 1951, and I found this very interesting, the Central Bank Act recognized the possibility of a difference of opinion between the governor of the bank and the treasury, the institution which corresponds to our finance department, and they provided that in such an event the two views should be laid on the table of parliament so that the matter might become public and the opinion of the governor was before the people. They then had a chance of knowing what the difference was and weighing it. At the present time we in Canada may never know that there are any objections at all.

The Chairman: Order. I must confess that I am in some considerable doubt as to the relevancy of the remarks now being made by the hon. member. He seems to be talking about the influence of personnel on certain aspects of this question and clause 10, which we are now discussing, would appear to bear no relationship to that. I think I should ask the hon. member to limit himself to that discussion.

Mr. Macdonnell: Perhaps at this point, Mr. Chairman, I should read my amendment and I hope that may satisfy you. I myself feel strongly that the argument I am making requires the making of these particular points to be set out. I will therefore read my amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox:

> That section 10 be amended by adding as subsection thereof the following:
> "The total of notes and deposit liabilities of the bank shall at no time exceed the total amount of such notes and deposit liabilities outstanding on the day that the bill receives royal assent plus 10 per cent thereof.

You will see, Mr. Chairman, that the point of that amendment is to create a situation where at a certain point parliament needs to be consulted—and that is the point—where the 10 per cent is being reached and where the authority of the executive will run out.

The Chairman: Order. I will put the amendment. The hon. member for Greenwood moves:

That section 10 be amended by adding as subsection—

I have a blank here. What subsection will it be?

Mr. Abbott: Subsection 4.

Mr. Croll: Subsection 3.

Mr. Abbott: It will be subsection 4, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Greenwood moves:

That section 10 be amended by adding as subsection 4 thereof the following:

"The total of notes and deposit liabilities of the bank shall at no time exceed the total amount of such notes and deposit liabilities outstanding on the day that the bill receives royal assent plus 10 per cent thereof".

May I add that the reading of the amendment does not convince me that the previous remarks of the hon. member are strictly relevant to the clause under discussion.

Mr. Macdonnell: I seem to be extremely unfortunate, Mr. Chairman. I hope that perhaps what I say from now on will seem to you to be more relevant. If I am not getting on any better with anyone else in the committee than I am with you, my hopes of carrying this amendment are beginning to recede.

I now come to some of the questions and answers in the committee itself and I hope these will be considered to be relevant. If these are not relevant, I am going to have to confess that I shall have to go and try to relearn the meaning of relevance all over again. I am making the point, Mr. Chairman, that I believe it is extremely unwise that the finance department should have uncontrolled power to increase our money supply. I think you will agree that it is relevant to my amendment, which seeks to put a ceiling on the money supply. I now propose to read some of the answers I obtained in the banking and commerce committee. I asked Mr. Towers with regard to the abandonment of the gold clause in the original act. As reported at page 763 of the committee's proceedings, his reply was as follows:

It was never in effect, because it was always suspended as I recall it.

Later I asked him whether the bank now has unlimited power to create money. His answer was "yes". In answer to a later question from me as to whether there was any check on the power to issue money, as reported at page 764 Mr. Towers said this:

I referred the other day to a red light which might flash in such circumstances for instance if the governor of the central bank resigned.

I want to stress that answer. I think it is extremely important. We have now reached a point where the situation is utterly contrary to the intention of the report of the Macmillan commission and those who founded the bank, where the governor has been reduced to the position of being merely an adviser of the Department of Finance and where his answer, when asked if there is any way of controlling the issue of money, is to say, "Well, I might resign". Later on, as I shall bring to the attention of the committee, the minister fully agreed with him. He said that if the governor of the bank did not agree—I think those were his words; I shall read them later—he thought it was his duty to resign.

In answer to a later question from me as to whether there was any check on the power to issue money Mr. Towers said:

I referred the other day to a red light which might flash . . .

Incidentally I told the governor that I thought it was a great pity if that was to be the result. I said I did not want the governor to resign. I value the governor highly, and I do not think he should be put in that position. I have already pointed out to the committee that that situation has been remedied in Australia.

As reported on the same page 764 I asked further of the governor:

In your opinion would it not be a good thing to have some kind of legislative hurdle that has to be taken before the barriers are opened beyond a certain point?

Mr. Towers replied:

I do not know of any practical way of doing it short of being on the gold standard and having provision for a minimum gold reserve.

But then he added this, Mr. Chairman, and I draw your attention particularly to it. I hope you will consider that this is relevant. He said:

The only other way in which I could think of it being accomplished would be to write into a statute that the sum total of the note and deposit liabilities of the Bank of Canada should be no greater than a sum named—an absolute amount.

Precisely my suggestion, Mr. Chairman, is put forward. I must say he did not put it forward with enthusiasm but it is put forward by the governor of the bank with this caution, which I shall now read. The governor then added:

As they are today, $2,300 million, I have forgotten the exact figure—that they should be no greater than some other amount somewhat above that, but I should think that it would be necessary to leave sufficient leeway—because parliament is not always in session—so that the damage could be done in any event, that is the damage which you fear.

I think there is a misprint there. But it is perfectly clear that the governor was saying that if there was to be any fixed limit to be put on, regard must be had for flexibility; and I would agree with that suggestion. In the committee I said to the minister that I was not wedded to 10 per cent and if he suggested, say 11 per cent, I would settle with him at once. However, I am sorry to say that he did not suggest 11 per cent.

Finally the governor of the bank said this, and I could not disagree with him. He said that I was getting into matters of policy and that the answer would have to be given by the minister. I felt that I could not quarrel with that statement. However, I also could not help feeling that the status of the governor of the bank was sadly altered from what it was in the minds of those who set up the Bank of Canada. They said that he was to be in control—with his directors, of course—of its management.

I stress what Mr. Towers said as to the possibility of just such a measure as that which I am proposing, though with the caution of flexibility which I accept. After all, the crisis is not going to come on us like an atomic bomb. If there is a money crisis there will be days, perhaps weeks and possibly months when the situation is developing. As we all know from our experience of four years ago, parliament can be called together in two or three days, or inside a week anyway.

I now come to the evidence of Mr. Abbott. As reported at page 1347 of the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee I recounted to him what I had asked Mr. Towers and in reply he said:

> I suppose, Mr. Macdonnell, what you are asking me to comment upon is whether there should be some definite limitations in the Bank of Canada Act or the Currency Act or both on the powers of the central bank with respect to the issue of currency; as I take it you are not suggesting we should now return to a full-fledged gold standard?
> Mr. Macdonnell: No, not at all.
> Hon. Mr. Abbott: And your reason for making that suggestion is we might some day have an irresponsible government which would do things we would not like done. I can only answer you by saying that the issue of money, in the final analysis, is the responsibility of the government of the day, whether it is an irresponsible government or not. There are some things which can only be cured by the ballot box and I do not think—I do not know—of any limitation which could be put in the Bank of Canada Act which, by law, would prevent an irresponsible government from doing irresponsible things with respect to the credit and currency of the country. I would prefer to allow the matter—and this is only my personal view—to remain as it is at the present time because I do not know of any better alternative.

Again I asked this question:

> But would you not agree that with our so-called irresponsible government it might be useful to have a situation arise where the public is put on notice?

To that question Mr. Abbott replied as reported at page 1348 of the proceedings:

> I agree with Mr. Towers; I must say if the Minister of Finance and thereby the government of the day suggested a policy which the central bank could not go along with I think the governor of the central bank should give the warning signal by resigning. I think it would be his duty to do it, but I do not believe it is either desirable, or feasible perhaps, to spell that out by legislation. That is really the only way I can answer your question.

I asked again. I was very persistent, although I do not think I was irrelevant. I said:

> . . . are you satisfied with the wide-open situation where there is no limit of any kind on the power to increase the money supply.

The minister replied:

> I know of no other way. Yes, I am satisfied with the present situation.

The minister was frank and forthright, as he always is. He did not even tell me he would give the matter his consideration, as he sometimes does. He says: Leave it to parliament and to the people. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is not an answer which the minister's biographer will put in the forefront of his biography.

Mr. Abbott: I should hope he would.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think it is a very unrealistic answer. We are told that we control the C.B.C. because we get a report from them once a year, and we all know how effective that is. I felt that the minister's answer was vague and unsatisfactory. He said there might be circumstances which would make this unwise. But the only circumstance that he mentioned, as far as I recall, was the possibility of hoarding. I do not think that has ever been a very great danger in this country, but I am ready to admit, and I have said all along, that I do not regard my ideas on this matter as necessarily the only way out. I say that parliament should somehow or other be introduced into the picture, and if my suggestion is not the best then let us have a better way. I say again that the minister, without any notice to the public, can go ahead and increase the money supply.

I have already put it to the committee that the original Bank Act contemplated private ownership and reserves and that both of these were changed. I am making no comment on the change but I am drawing the attention of the committee to the frank expression given by Mr. Dunning in 1936 when the change was made which points out ever so clearly what was contemplated and makes it clear that what was contemplated was a complete reversal, I submit, of what was indicated when the central bank act had been passed two years before. I quote from what Mr. Dunning said on June 1, 1936, as found at page 3260 of Hansard:

> The matter of public ownership is in my opinion much less important than that of government control. If we study the constitution of central banks from this aspect, we shall find ample precedent for the attempt which we are making to give the government adequate control over the Bank of Canada.

In 1934 Mr. King had also used somewhat similar words, though he spoke of the public opinion of the nation. I will read his words:

> There are times when it is necessary and vital that every institution in the land should be subject to the public opinion of the nation—

Could I have a better endorsement of what I am arguing? All I am arguing is that there are times when public opinion should express itself. Mr. King continued:

> —and this is always the case when it is expressed in a constitutional way in parliament.

I submit again that it is this parliamentary control that I am seeking to have re-established. My proposal is not very dramatic or drastic. If it were, perhaps it might have more chance. However, it is not unprecedented. There is a measure of control at any rate in the United Kingdom over the fiduciary note issue. There is a measure of control, as I pointed out in the committee, in the United States and, what is also important, there is the frankest public discussion between the federal reserve bank and the treasury of the United States on matters of policy.

There is nothing of the kind here. The governor of the bank expresses his views in the four corners of the Department of Finance and then he is through. What would be the effect of my amendment? Merely that when we get to a certain point the people of Canada would be entitled to have a look at the position of their currency. That is all I am advocating. There is no disrespect to the finance department in saying that they are not infallible. The minister would be the first one to admit it. The minister says that he does not believe we can by legislation protect either ourselves or our descendants against our follies. I would agree with that of course, but that seems to be no answer to the suggestion that the people should be allowed at a certain point to have a look at their own affairs.

Mr. Abbott: Doesn't my hon. friend ever read the weekly statements of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Macdonnell: Oh yes, I do.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Abbott: Good.

Mr. Macdonnell: That does not affect my argument in the least, not in the least. The people who read them are few and far between and even then it needs a wise man to understand exactly what is happening. My final point is: What is the danger in this suggestion? A financial crisis does not come on us like an atom bomb. I submit that what I am suggesting is obvious, that there should be no question about it, and that the only argument you can make about it is that the people of Canada are not of age and are not competent to discuss their own affairs.

My point is not of course that the ordinary man in the street is going to have a view about this which he will regard as of much value; but when the matter comes up for discussion there are all kinds of people whose views are worth while and who will be brought into the discussion. Thereby we will have the collective experience and wisdom of the citizenry of Canada and not merely the views of two or three people. As the hon. member for Eglinton said in the committee, after the minister had stated that he could not accept my amendment:

> I do hope the committee will realize the effect of what the minister is saying, because he is saying in effect that if conditions should arise where it is thought that an increase beyond 10 per cent should be allowed that it should not be necessary to share that situation with parliament or to seek parliament's approval.

In one breath we have the minister saying that he thinks the matter should be left in the hands of parliament and the people and in the next breath he refuses a measure the whole purpose of which is that the people and parliament shall have a chance to express their views. At the present time the governor of the Bank of Canada is practically a captive, and what I am saying to the minister is that we should set up a stop, look and listen sign so that we may have the advice of the governor of the bank and others. At the present time when we urge certain views the governor of the bank has to say that he cannot go any further, that he cannot help us. I suggest that those who vote against this amendment are voting for the perpetuation of the power narrowly held which I have described, and they are turning down a proposal to give the people of Canada some control over the vital matter of currency, something which I predict the people will some day demand.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I suppose members of all political parties who have been members of the banking and commerce committee have met the fate that I and my colleagues in this group who were members of that committee have met of late, that whenever we mention the more recondite details of banking we are just not allowed to discuss them. So you will have to forgive the hon. member for Greenwood and myself if we have this last final scamper over the peaks of high finance. I am grateful to the hon. member for Greenwood for giving us this opportunity but I must add that I cannot agree with the case that he has put before us. His case is that there should be some legal limit to the expansion of our total money supply. On the face of it that seems reasonable until we come to examine the mechanics by which our total money supply is increased or decreased. When we do that I do not see how we can escape the conclusion that this proposal is in the first place impractical and, in the second place, if it were practical, it is quite unnecessary.

So far as its impracticality is concerned, I would suggest that it is almost impossible for anyone to make an estimate, even within the fair latitude that the hon. member for Greenwood has suggested, of the necessities for any one particular period. I went to the trouble of getting figures for the total money supply in every year from 1945 until March of this year which I think will illustrate the point fairly well. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Greenwood pointed out that we went through quite a serious inflationary period in that period of years, and he suggested that if we had had this control we might perhaps have avoided some of the more unpleasant features of that inflationary period.

Mr. Macdonnell: I suggest that is an inference the hon. member is drawing. I do not think I used those words.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am sorry if I am imputing something to him, but I gathered that was the idea, that we had a warning in this post-war period of the dangers of not having control over our total money supply. In 1945 our total monetary supply was $5,905 million. The following year it was $6,852 million, an increase of about 17 per cent; that is in the immediate post-war year.

Now, here is the significant part. From that time forward our increase each year has been very much less than that. The following year it was some 3 per cent; between 1947-48, it was about a 10 per cent increase. Then it dropped between 1948-49 to a 5 per cent increase; 1949-50 it became about a 15 per cent increase. The following year there was only a fraction of 1 per cent increase, and the following year again it jumped to an 8 per cent increase, and then the following year it was down to almost nil, practically no difference. In 1952 it was $9,302 million and in 1953, $9,345 million. Up to March of this year it has increased slightly over 1 per cent over the corresponding period last year.

I suggest, therefore, even if we wished to do so it would be very difficult indeed to place any really effective limit to which we could point. I would suggest this. For instance, who could tell—certainly not the Minister of Finance although he might perhaps have warnings before some of us—whether or not we were going to have a vast increase in investment in Canada from abroad? If we did, it would immediately necessitate a vast increase in our total monetary supply. In fact, one could relate many of these increases to just that factor. I suggest it is, in the first place, an impractical suggestion.

Then, I come to the next point, and that is as to whether or not it is necessary to do so. On the face of it, as I say, it does seem rather frightening, shall we say, when we look across the aisle to realize that at any moment the Minister of Finance may be replaced by some fallible creature. Then, where shall we be? I believe that we are giving the Minister of Finance or his office credit for rather more power than it actually possesses.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I have an idea there is far more automatism, shall I say, in this process than we readily understand or are prepared to admit. I wish I had the exact words of Mr. Towers on this point in the banking and commerce committee, but perhaps those who were there will agree that I am recalling them correctly. When we were engaged in a discussion of this point, I asked him if he would agree that from a certain point of view it would be correct to say that our total money supply was nothing more than a reflection of our economic activity at any particular period. Mr. Towers agreed that that was a point of view that could be sustained. I think it is the actual fact of the situation. I believe the money supply of the country will depend, in the final analysis, on the level of investment, either internally by government action or from abroad by foreign action, and that in order to cope with that situation the Bank of Canada will almost automatically have to increase our total money supply.

I would suggest too that there is probably nothing better calculated to undermine public confidence in our monetary system than to periodically have parliament summoned into a special session to increase the total money supply, or even every session to have the Minister of Finance come to us, perhaps with some urgency, and tell us that before the current week or month were out we had to take steps to increase the total money supply. This would bring to the minds of people not accustomed to dealing with these ideas some very disquieting thoughts. Many of them would hark back to the old days of inflation of currency by the printing press or even perhaps back farther to the methods described by the hon. member for Greenwood, the debasement of actual currency. I am very much afraid we would have many people stuffing currency into mattresses and into socks, and that would not have a very desirable effect upon the economy.

I would conclude, Mr. Chairman, by suggesting to the hon. member for Greenwood that even the most lighthearted government or even the most responsible government would have the greatest difficulty in actually inflating our total money supply beyond the level of our real economic activity no matter how much they might want to do it. Let us consider how they might go about it. We will suppose the present Minister of Finance, through some tragic accident, had suddenly gone mad and decided he was going to inflate the monetary supply. He was going to flood us with dollar bills and $10 bills. He issues an order to the Bank of Canada to do that. They pile them up, wherever the Bank of Canada does pile them up, or wherever it is they have them stacked up, knee high. Then, the problem arises, how are we going to infuse these bills into our economic system, because they will not inflate the monetary supply sitting there. These bills can only be infused into the economy by means of economic activity that is engaged in actual production of goods and services. So long as it is limited in that way, then I feel the danger of runaway inflation is something we do not need to seriously consider.

Mr. Low: I am quite sure an occasion like this does call for some consideration of the things that the hon. member for Greenwood set before us in outlining his amendment. At the outset I should like to say that I listened very carefully to all the things he did say and I hope that I got from his speech not only exactly what he was driving at but all the implications of it. I found it very difficult as I listened to him, and as I listened to him in the committee as a matter of fact, to find out exactly what it is that he and his colleagues have been driving at. It seems to me that they have been talking all the way around the idea of returning to the gold standard, but they have not had the courage to come out and say that is what they want.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo).]

In every single instance when this matter of gold reserves has come up, the Conservatives have taken that position of skirting around the edge, but afraid to say the nasty words, "gold standard".

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I would point out that the minister asked me if I had that in mind. I said emphatically no, and I will be disappointed in the hon. member if he thinks when I say no, I mean yes or even half yes.

Mr. Low: If that is the case, then I think it is incumbent upon the hon. member for Greenwood to tell us exactly what it is he does mean. It is certain that what he has been trying to introduce into our money policy is some mechanism that will seriously restrict the amount of money that is going to be in use in the Dominion of Canada; that is the very purpose of the amendment which he introduced today. It is a modified gold standard, if he does not call it that.

In the questioning that took place in the committee, I noticed my hon. friend and his colleagues, whenever it was possible, did question very closely about the necessity of having some sort of reserve that would afford automatic control of the money supply. Well, of course, that is nothing more or less than perhaps a modification of the straight and rigid gold standard. Let me just say this, that the gold standard could not work in Canada today without forcing the government to abandon all those things they have introduced into the economy for the purpose of stabilizing it. They would have to throw unemployment insurance, family allowances and all that sort of thing away, because a gold standard simply cannot work unless there is considerable fluctuation in internal price levels, as compared with external price levels, so that it would encourage the movement into or out of the country, as the case might be, of quantities of gold. It is just impossible.

The only alternative is a managed money system, which this country has adopted and which, I think, is infinitely superior to a gold standard in its effects upon the economy and welfare of the people generally. And so, anything that even approximately approaches a gold standard I must oppose at once.

Now, in his talk the hon. member for Greenwood—and I give him credit for being honest in his convictions, of course; I am prepared to take what he says as being exactly what he feels and thinks—the hon. member for Greenwood complains about inflation, and he cited the situation that has developed in Canada.

Well, I notice that he very carefully avoided saying anything about deflation—not one single word did he say. But I point out to members of the House of Commons that deflation can be and often is more devastating to the country as a whole, and to the welfare of the people, than inflation. I have heard nothing from him or from his colleagues in the committee to suggest that they have the means whereby they can prevent devastating deflation. As a matter of fact, it seems to me the only things they have advocated are those things which would encourage a deflationary trend and, so far as I am concerned, I do not like that sort of thing. On the one hand, I do not want inflation; but, equally, I do not want deflation. I think we ought to be trying to find some mechanism which will prevent any undue inflation or deflation, either of which militates against the best interests of the people of the country.

What I am trying to discover, as we sail through these uncharted seas, is a means whereby we can accomplish this double purpose. The thing I think we should be trying to do is to adopt that type of government policy which will reduce to an irreducible minimum inflationary forces on the one hand and deflationary forces on the other, because both of them are devastating.

In the course of his address the hon. member for Greenwood suggested that perhaps it is unwise to leave the determination of the amount of money in the country to the Minister of Finance and his colleagues. He suggested that perhaps it would be wise to have a group of people representing economists in agriculture, economists in business and economists in law—and all that sort of thing.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am sure the hon. member wishes to be fair. I hope he will say I made it clear that I regarded such a proposal as utterly impossible. I raised it only as a straw man, and I think I fully knocked it down.

Mr. Low: Well, perhaps so. But let me suggest to the hon. member for Greenwood that we have pretty much that sort of thing now, in the set-up of the Bank of Canada. They have a great number of very capable economists, businessmen and financiers with whom they collaborate in determining what the policy shall be at any given time, and to meet such circumstances as might arise. I am sure their advice and counsel is taken very seriously.

So far as I can see, the set-up is almost essentially what the hon. member has suggested. In the course of the years we have made a suggestion at various times for the setting up of a permanent monetary commission composed of representatives of the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks, the Department of Finance, agriculture, labour, and business generally throughout the country. Perhaps it might be an expansion of the board of the Bank of Canada, which would meet regularly to consider all of these questions with regard to the financial and monetary policy of the country. Such a permanent monetary commission in our view should be made responsible directly to the representatives of the people in the House of Commons much as the Auditor General is today, so that periodically they could be called before a committee of the House of Commons and hon. members could be kept informed.

It seems to me that a permanent monetary commission of that sort might be the answer to this whole dilemma. I can understand the concern of the hon. member for Greenwood about having the parliament of Canada consulted frequently about the monetary policy of the country, and the results of policies which have been in effect. As I say, I can understand his concern in that regard; and I think perhaps the best way of meeting it would be to have the type of permanent monetary commission I have suggested, a body which would be responsible to the House of Commons, just as the Auditor General is responsible. We could get from that commission independent reports, and periodically it could give evidence before us. In that way we could keep our finger on this matter.

The commission could be charged with the overseership of policy drafted and set up by the House of Commons; and the overseership and management by that commission could include this very important point, which I think is of such tremendous importance to the people of Canada.

There are two sets of figures available. There is the set of figures representing the production of the country available to be moved and used. There is also the set of figures available showing us month after month the total money supply. Well, most certainly it seems to me that the duties of a monetary commission might be to gear the two sets of figures together, and by so doing it would be possible for them to determine, with more or less accuracy, what the financial and monetary policy of the country is doing. Perhaps they could advise the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance about what ought to be done to meet the situation developing in the country in months ahead.

Now, that sort of thing is practicable, I believe. I am not at any time suggesting that it is possible for a small group of men to decide how much money this country needs. I think the only way that can be done is to leave it to the vast number of entrepreneurs, the producers, the business people and the like, who go to the chartered banks in the regular course of business and arrange for loans for production purposes and by the means now used determine pretty closely the money supply.

But there is another feature of it which I think has to be considered, and that is this, that there are times in this country, as there are in every other country which operates under a financial system such as ours, where, especially in peacetime, surpluses of goods and services do accumulate, and cannot be moved.

Now, if we are to leave the problem of the distribution of those unsaleable surpluses so that it will regulate itself—well, I say we just never would have them distributed, and we may go into a devastating recession or depression.

Our suggestion in those circumstances has been and still remains that the government should provide itself with a mechanism under which purchasing power can be obtained from the only source of new purchasing power, the Bank of Canada, in limited quantity. Limit it to that amount of goods and services which need to be distributed in a country—goods and services which are clearly there and which can be seen and determined quite simply. And simply see to it that that purchasing power is obtained interest free from the Bank of Canada and be used by injecting it directly into the hands of the ultimate consumers so they can thrust it quickly into effective demand to buy the goods off the market and thus themselves set the wheels of industry in motion and help to keep the plants going. That is the proposition that has been made. My hon. friend's amendment would not take care of that at all. My hon. friend's amendment would do the opposite. It would limit severely the amount of money that could be in use at any given time. It is not unreasonable to gear the money supply to the productive capacity of our country. Let the capacity demand decide what the money supply shall be.

If we have in a given period of time an increase of 10 per cent in our production in the country, is it not reasonable to suppose that we are going to need a considerable increase, perhaps up to a maximum of 10 per cent, in the money supply so as to be able to distribute the goods? If there is a 3 per cent increase in productive capacity in our country at any given period, is it unreasonable to suppose that we shall need perhaps a maximum of 3 per cent increase in the money supply? Why, certainly any reasonable person would say, that is what we need. But if we tie ourselves to an amendment of this kind, we are not in a position at any time to increase the money supply sufficient to meet the needs of an increased productive capacity.

I think it is high time that we began to take a look at the irresponsibles. My hon. friend has talked a whole lot about irresponsible governments. I noticed that on the various occasions he looked right straight across at the Social Credit members of the committee. I would rather he would get up and say, what I am trying to provide against is the irresponsible Social Credit bunch getting in and debasing our currency. Instead of that he skirts around and talks in a sort of whisper about irresponsible governments. I like my hon. friend; I am not angry with him at all; but I should like to point out that Social Crediters have been responsible in their administration of affairs. If he can find a better administration of financial affairs than we get in Alberta where we have dominated for 20 years, then I should like him to show us.

Mr. Byrne: Don't talk nonsense.

Mr. Low: Of course, my hon. friend who is sitting over there is one of the great agitators in the house. He keeps on sniping at us, but he dare not stand on his feet and debate the question. I would suggest that he get on his feet and debate it in an intelligent manner instead of sitting back and sniping the way he does day after day.

Mr. Byrne: Pure nonsense.

Mr. Low: The hon. member for Kootenay East is good at that. I just point this out. Which is the irresponsible attitude? That attitude that says you have got to limit the money supply in this country by some arbitrary means inconsistent with the needs of the country, or that attitude that says, let us see to it that we adopt a policy, that we gear the money supply to the production of the country. When you have done that you cannot have either inflation or deflation. That is the position we take, and for that reason—and there are others I could mention—we simply could not support this amendment.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, this has been a most interesting debate this morning, and I am very greatly indebted to all hon. members who have taken part in it. It has been raised by the hon. member for Greenwood proposing the amendment which he did in the banking and commerce committee and which in effect of course is to insert a statutory limitation on the power of the Bank of Canada to expand currency and credit. He is suggesting that that be inserted in section 23 of the Bank of Canada Act. In substance he is substituting for the old limitation that the note and deposit liabilities of the Bank of Canada should not exceed four times the amount of its gold reserves, another limitation that they should not exceed the amount at which they stand when the bill receives royal assent plus 10 per cent. I indicated to the banking and commerce committee that I could not accept such an amendment.

Since September of 1939 we have had of course what is commonly known as a managed currency.

Mr. Macdonnell: Did it begin only then?

Mr. Abbott: That is my recollection; it may have been before that but certainly since September, 1939, we have had what is commonly known as a managed currency, and I think that the provisions of this section of the Bank of Canada Act have been suspended since that time.

It is a matter of opinion whether we should have an automatic limitation on the expansion of currency and credit, such as existed in the Bank of Canada Act before the war, by reason of the gold provision or such as is suggested by my hon. friend in his amendment today.

I am indebted to the hon. member for Nanaimo for the very concise exposition which he gave to the committee of the way in which a managed currency operates so far as the expansion of currency and credit is concerned. I must confess that I am in large measure in agreement with the views which he expressed as to both the impracticability and the undesirability of the amendment which has been suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood. I personally believe that it would be extremely unwise to insert this element of rigidity into the Bank of Canada Act. My friend has given me credit and has given the government credit for a great deal more power than we possess in this respect. He has suggested that the governor of the Bank of Canada, or the management of the Bank of Canada—I think he said the governor of the Bank of Canada—is a captive. If I may paraphrase Winston Churchill's statement, all I can say is he is some captive. The governor and the management of the Bank of Canada have certain clearly defined responsibilities and certain clearly defined rights under the Bank of Canada Act. It is open of course to parliament at any time to change those rights and responsibilities but with the exception of this amendment, my hon. friend has suggested no change in that respect. The government as such, the Minister of Finance as such, has no control over the note issue of the Bank of Canada. That is exclusively within the control of the bank itself. So far as the expansion of credit of the bank is concerned, it is true, as I indicated to the banking and commerce committee, that if the government indulged over a period of time in deficit financing and issued securities, either short or long term, which were purchased by the Bank of Canada, it would constitute a substantial expansion of credit. But I would remind my hon. friend that the government cannot borrow at all on short or long term except in virtue of authorization by this house. That should always be remembered. Therefore there is in fact a very real measure of parliamentary control, a complete measure of parliamentary control over the final result.

He has made the point that the public should know, the people of Canada should know, what is going on. I entirely agree with him, but I must confess that when you look at the weekly statements of the Bank of Canada, which are very concise statements, they indicate exactly the extent and character of the deposit and other liabilities of the Bank of Canada and the assets which the bank has. These are published in the press of this country each week, and they are compared with the figures of the week before. Now, anybody who has learned to read can look at those figures and understand what they mean. When I say "understand what they mean", it may be that people who have not taken too much interest in these matters may not appreciate their full significance; but certainly the business community, certainly the financial community, and certainly anyone who takes any interest in these things at all—and that includes members of parliament—have available to them every week exactly the extent of the expansion or contraction of the liabilities of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: There is no place in which parliament has any exact right to intervene.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend knows that every year parliament is required to approve the financial program of the government. At any session it is open to any member to introduce a resolution of non-confidence in the government and base it upon any matter of public policy. Therefore I say it really is not accurate to say that parliament has relinquished control of this very important matter. The whole question, in my view, included in the amendment of my hon. friend, is whether parliament should now impose this statutory limitation upon the expansion of currency and credit by the Bank of Canada, and I am opposed to it.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, before this amendment is put to a vote I should like to give a little attention to the matter of responsibility, as it applies particularly to the Conservative party.

We all understand that there were conditions imposed upon the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett which under the circumstances were probably impossible for him to control. But let us just find out whether Mr. Bennett and the Conservatives in power in 1930 were able to do anything at all to prevent vast sums of money from being taken out of circulation in Canada with the resulting destruction of industry and the prosperity of the nation.

The Hon. C. H. Cahan, speaking on November 13, 1933, and I am speaking entirely here from memory, said that over $900 million had been withdrawn from circulation in Canada since the beginning of the depression.

Now, following up what the hon. member for Peace River said, I would like to hear the hon. member for Greenwood tell us what he would have done to keep that $900 million from being taken out of circulation, or to put it back into circulation once it had been taken out.

There you have a real job and I will warrant that the hon. member for Greenwood would not be able to say now what he would do except perhaps that he would talk to us beautifully as he so often does.

Let me turn to another matter. The hon. member spoke about inflation. No doubt he had in mind the tremendous increase in prices which has resulted in this country since 1946. That so-called inflation, which it really was not, was a deliberate rise in price which came about as the result of the Conservatives in 1945-46 demanding that controls be removed before the production of this country had reached a level which would justify the removal of controls. The government, which had held the price structure in Canada at an astonishingly stable level, with Donald Gordon in charge, was obliged by pressure from the Conservatives to remove these controls and so the price structure went skyrocketing, even although we were living in peacetime.

Mr. Rowe: That is a very fine compliment to the power of the Conservative party.

Mr. Blackmore: It is not nearly as much of a compliment as my hon. friend thinks it is. Hon. members will recall that the first move in this price rise, which so many people mistakenly called inflation, was that the steel companies of Canada, with the consent of the government, advanced their price for steel by $5 per ton.

Perhaps the hon. member for Greenwood can tell me whether that is or is not a fact. Now, just as soon as that increase of $5 per ton in steel was granted, then the steel workers demanded at once that they be given a share of the money which the steel companies made as a result of that advance in price. The result was that they struck for 82 days and finally obtained that concession.

Now, what did these two moves bring about in the Canadian economy? The price of steel, as everyone knows—

The Chairman: Order. I presume the hon. member is laying a groundwork for his argument, but I would remind him that we are discussing an amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood which deals with a limitation on the total of notes and deposit liabilities of the bank, and I think the hon. member should confine himself to that subject.

Mr. Blackmore: I think so too, Mr. Chairman, and that is exactly what I propose to do. The hon. member was talking about responsibility and I was just going to point out that that increase in the price of steel resulted in an increase in the cost of production in respect of practically everything else throughout the nation's industry. The increase in the steel workers' pay resulted finally in an increase in the charge structure in every industry in the nation, and the two together jacked up prices point after point to the extent where they are still rising at the present time. In addition to that, taxation was being increased at the same time. If you want irresponsibility you have it personified in the men of the Conservative party who rose and demanded the removal of price controls. For them to stand up now, despite the havoc which resulted in the Canadian economy by reason of their imprudent demand for the removal of price control, and call the resultant price rise inflation is for them to provide abundant evidence that they just do not know what they are talking about any time they speak.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have dealt with the general aspects of the matter and I would now like to say a word or two more about responsibility. There is plenty more to be said along this line. The hon. member for Peace River referred to the government of Alberta as an instance of responsible government. Therein the Social Credit government, never mind how they did it, which, granted it had to operate in accordance with methods of orthodox finance—and look how magnificently they did it—took a debt of $167 million, which looked impossible to deal with, and completely liquidated it. Perhaps they have not actually liquidated it completely, but at least they now have the money with which to deal with it. They now have in addition a vast amount of money saved up—and that has never been done before in the history of the Dominion of Canada.

An hon. Member: What about the oil?

Mr. Blackmore: We will grant the oil, but let me point out that if some hon. members who have so much to say about these oil wells had been in charge of the province of Alberta they would probably have given these great treasures away as political plums to their friends, so that instead of the government being able—

[Inaudible interruption.]

Mr. Blackmore: If my hon. friend knew about one-tenth of what he thinks he knows he would be well worth listening to. The main thing we have to bear in mind is that it was by supremely good management of the oil resources of the province now being exercised by the government that this laudable result has been achieved. The government, by offering to sell drilling rights on certain lands they called crown reserves, and allowing those who desired to drill to bid the prices up, enabled the province to acquire many millions of dollars as a result of selling these drilling leases, leases which a less provident government would probably have given to their friends or divided among themselves.

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: There is plenty of time for the hon. member to get up and talk.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member completed his remarks?

Mr. Blackmore: No, I will be back here later, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at one o'clock we were discussing clause 10 and the amendment thereto moved by the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, when I closed there was a whole collection of members across the way on the Liberal side who were clamouring for me to let them ask questions. I told them that I would be quite happy to stay here until midnight to answer their questions if they brought them along; but they have not come forth; so I presume we might as well treat their questions as being all answered.

I was dealing briefly with the question of responsibility in government. I have no desire to spend any great amount of time on it, but there were cries from various parts of the house to the effect that it was Alberta's oil which had done wonders in reforming conditions in Alberta not Alberta's Social Credit government. I just wish to give one set of figures and then I propose to go on with another aspect of the argument of the hon. member for Greenwood. Official figures indicate that on March 31, 1936, Alberta's net funded debt and guarantees amounted to $148,613,000 and that on March 31, 1948, the amount was only $121,504,000. In other words $27,109,000 had been paid by Alberta before oil in considerable amount began to come in. The real revenue from oil began to come in with the discovery of the great Leduc field in 1947. We will now leave that matter. Any time my good friends want to ask questions about Alberta, let them just come around and if they let me know beforehand we will have a good time.

The hon. member for Greenwood, in his argument in support of his position, referred to Germany as a horrible example of what starts in case the gold standard is not rigidly adhered to. Inasmuch as this is a new parliament I think we might as well have a sort of showdown on this German question. It is well to remember a thing which men like the hon. member for Greenwood apparently never take the trouble to find out, namely that Germany, previous to her famous inflation, had fought a long and exhausting war for four years and that Germany was defeated. That means that she was left at the mercy of those who had won. Any government that tries to keep its money somewhere near stable under conditions like that will experience plenty of trouble. I think the Minister of Finance will be the first man to testify to that truth. He knows how careful he has to be to keep matters under control with a very strong government, a very strong country and a very strong people in Canada.

At the close of that war there was owed by the German government a debt of 147 billion gold marks. May I draw the attention of the hon. member for Greenwood to the fact that they were gold marks, not paper marks? Of this debt, 58 billion was floating debt and 89 billion was funded debt. The interest on that money had to be paid every year. The total taxation which the government could raise in Germany amounted to just enough to take care of one-tenth of the floating debt alone. Let me ask the hon. member for Greenwood this question. After his careful studies of finance, of which I hope he makes a great many, just what would he have done if he had been in charge of the German government in those years? Would he have permitted default on the debt and the interest on the debt? If he was going to get the moneys to pay the debt, where would he have got the money? It might be said that he would float a loan amongst German people. But the German people had no money. Let him face that problem. I hope he does so.

What happened to Germany was much worse than what I have already pictured. The London conference forced Germany to pay one billion gold marks in August, 1921, 362 million gold marks in March, 1922 and 254 million gold marks in August, 1922. For a country that had been on a strict gold standard—so strict a gold standard that they had 60 per cent as much gold as they had notes in circulation at the opening of the war—that export of gold would have been enough to destroy utterly the confidence of the people both within the country and outside of it.

In order to meet the situation the government borrowed from the Reichsbank money to pay on the debt. Let it be remembered that this was not government-issued money. It was good bank money issued by the German Reichsbank to pay on the debt. Hon. members who wish to check any of these figures may do so by asking for a fine book which is to be found in our library, or it used to be before the fire—called "The Story of Money" by Sir Norman Angell, published in 1929. In it they will find a chapter on German inflation which will be very enlightening and will support everything I am saying here now.

Terrible losses were sustained by Germany. In the first place her colonies were swept away. In the next place her merchant marine was swept away. In the next place much of her trade was swept away. In the next place the extremely rich Ruhr-Lorraine-Luxembourg industrial unit in Germany was taken away or disrupted.

The Chairman: Order. May I express the hope that the hon. member will soon relate these remarks, which are apparently directed to conditions in Germany, to the amendment which is now before us and deals with notes and deposit liabilities of the Bank of Canada.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I can understand your uneasiness in respect of this matter. I am nearly finished. I believe Your Honour will agree that, when one is discussing the validity of gold as the backing of money in the Bank of Canada—which is the very thing which the hon. member for Greenwood was endeavouring to establish, or a demand for it—there is not anything one could bring into the picture with greater appropriateness or propriety than the illustration of Germany. Consequently if you will bear with me for another minute, I will go on; in fact, I will stop and let somebody else talk. I am just endeavouring to show the absolute weakness of the hon. member's position. His arguments are just not valid at all. He had a hodge-podge of sayings that are commonly accepted as true coin but they have no meaning at all when one examines into them.

I was going on with the German situation, Mr. Chairman. The treaty of peace disrupted the valuable Ruhr-Lorraine-Luxembourg industrial unit in Germany which meant that it destroyed between 11 per cent and 15 per cent of Germany's productive capacity. The hon. member for Greenwood made a revealing remark at one time. He said that inflation was having too many dollars chasing too few goods. In Germany you will notice that all the things I have mentioned up to the present time would affect Germany's ability to produce goods, at the same time leaving money out in circulation. Thus the stage was set for serious inflation. The treaty of peace did worse than that or it did more. It forced Germany to deliver immense amounts of railway cars, locomotives, chemicals, dyes, coke, coal and agricultural products, just the very things that Germany needed as goods to support her money.

Those things being considered, I think everyone will grant that for the hon. member to bring in the German inflation situation, in order to illustrate his case or to fortify it, was not for him to manifest the best of judgment.

I thank you for your courtesy, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Macdonnell: Of course what the minister had to say about the reports that come out monthly from the Bank of Canada—

Mr. Abbott: Week by week.

Mr. Macdonnell: —giving information does not affect my position, which is that there should be a time at which parliament should, of necessity, enter into the situation.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should read the amendment since it was proposed before the luncheon recess. The hon. member for Greenwood moves:

That section 10 be amended by adding as subsection 4 thereof the following:

"The total of notes and deposit liabilities of the bank shall at no time exceed the total amount of such notes and deposit liabilities outstanding on the day that the bill receives royal assent plus 10 per cent thereof."

The question is on the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment will kindly rise. Those opposed to the amendment will kindly rise.

Amendment (Mr. Macdonnell) negatived: Yeas, 16; nays, 74.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 10 as previously amended carry?

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

REVISION TO CONFORM WITH DECENNIAL REVISION OF BANK ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 419, respecting savings banks in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: May I point out to the committee that this bill has been considered and reported on by the banking and commerce committee.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I should say a word before we consider the bill clause by clause. As you have indicated, Mr. Chairman, this bill, as well as the other two, was considered in the banking and commerce committee. There is not a great deal I can add to what I said when the bill was given second reading. The bill relates to the two savings institutions which have operated in the province of Quebec since before confederation. The principal changes of policy in the bill relate to authorizing these banks to invest in insured mortgages under the National Housing Act, some expansion in the investment powers of the banks and, as I stated on second reading, the bill also provides for a complete revision of the act for the first time since 1913.

A great many of the sections are identical in terms with the sections of the Bank Act, and whenever it is appropriate the provisions of the bill are either identical with or very similar to the sections of the act with respect to the commercial banks. The bill, in so far as any changes in substance are concerned, was carefully discussed in the banking and commerce committee, and I think that the revision job that has been done here, as was the case with the Bank Act itself, has considerably improved the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell: There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister. Before the revision, were these banks in the same position as the chartered banks with respect to being prohibited from any mortgage lending?

Mr. Abbott: No, they had mortgage investment powers in what are referred to as conventional mortgages. They have had for a good many years the power to invest a proportion of their assets in mortgages because they are, as their names indicate, savings institutions. On the other hand, their investment powers in other fields are very much more limited than those of the commercial banks.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is there any provision whereby others than the two existing banks can get powers under the act?

Mr. Abbott: No. These two institutions are, as I have said, pre-confederation institutions. They existed before Canada became a nation in 1867. They have been continued under federal direction of course since that time because of the power with respect to banks and banking contained in section 91 of the British North America Act. At each decennial revision of the Bank Act the charters of these two institutions have been extended in the same way.

Mr. Macdonnell: Are they under the jurisdiction of the inspector general of banks?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: To what extent do they do commercial banking, particularly under a section corresponding to section 88 of the Bank Act?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, they have no such powers. They do not do commercial banking at all. Their investments are largely in securities, mortgages and that sort of thing.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6—Duration of authority to carry on business.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think it is in clause 6 that there is a reference to 20 per cent of their liabilities in total and 60 per cent of the property value—

Mr. Abbott: Which clause is this?

The Chairman: Clause 6.

Mr. Abbott: Clause 6 relates to duration of authority to carry on business. I believe there has been a renumbering in the reprint since the bill was before the banking and commerce committee. There has been no change in clause 6.

Mr. Macdonnell: Perhaps the inspector general could refer the minister to the clause dealing with the limits of lending on conventional mortgages.

Mr. Abbott: That does not come until clause 64.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 13—Election of directors.

Mr. Macdonnell: Are there the same restrictions on directors in this bill as in Bill No. 338?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, with the exception of the age limit which was inserted in the banking and commerce committee with respect to commercial banks.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 14 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 26—Offer of shares of capital stock.

Mr. Macdonnell: With regard to clauses 26, 27, 28 and 29, I have a general question. These provisions deal with the offering of shares of capital stock. Do they conform substantially or perhaps exactly with provisions in the Bank Act?

Mr. Abbott: My understanding is that the amendments are identical with the amendments that were made in the Bank Act.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 27 to 51 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 52—Report to Minister of National Revenue of excess reserves for bad debts, etc.

Mr. Macdonnell: Clause 52 has to do with contingency reserves. Is that also similar to or identical with the provisions in the Bank Act?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: It is identical in terms with the corresponding section of the Bank Act, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 53 to 57 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 58—Investments.

Mr. Macdonnell: Clauses 58, 59 and 60 deal with investments. Is there any other change with regard to investments except the one necessitated by the housing act?

Mr. Abbott: There have been certain other changes, but that is the principal one. There is also a provision which authorizes these particular savings banks to invest in the first preferred shares of Canadian corporations and the shares of chartered banks, where those corporations and banks have a satisfactory earnings record. These provisions are new and are an enlargement on the former powers of investment.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 59 to 69 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 70—Acquisition of real property.

Mr. Macdonnell: With regard to the acquisition and holding of real property, is there any change?

Mr. Abbott: None. This has been the same for a good many years, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 71—Interest exceeding 6 per cent shall not be charged.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Clause 71 states the interest rate must not exceed 6 per cent. Will these banks be allowed to do as one banker in the committee said they were doing, to charge a service charge on their loans? I do not want to mention the name of the bank, but the charge reached 10·46 per cent.

Mr. Abbott: This provision is identical with the provisions in the Bank Act with respect to interest charged. It limits the maximum interest that a bank may make to 6 per cent. These two banks would be subject to the same limitation as any other bank in Canada in the setting of charges.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): There was a doubt as to whether the one bank that was charging the service charges was doing it legally. Can the minister say whether it was right or wrong?

Mr. Abbott: Well, I am always leery about giving free legal opinions. I would not care to express an opinion. It would be a matter for either the banks' or customers' lawyers or the courts in the final analysis to decide whether the bank was or was not complying with the provisions of this section.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I do not agree with the minister. I feel it would be up to the inspector general of banks to step in there and say whether or not it was legal.

Mr. Abbott: That may be. I understand the inspector general gave some evidence in the committee on that matter.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Not too much.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1954 not exceeding $209,168,695 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1955; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that, except as expressly provided, the aggregate principal amount of securities outstanding at any time shall not exceed $234,623,695; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $234,623,695 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, this is the annual resolution that precedes the introduction of the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act. Hon. members will recall that in 1952 the form of this resolution was changed so as to include the financing of all capital expenditures, whether authorized in that act or in earlier financing and guarantee acts. This procedure has been followed again this year.

The bill to be founded on this resolution is divided into three specific parts. The first part is to authorize the Canadian National Railways to incur capital expenditures up to $234,623,695. The second part authorizes the railway company to make capital expenditures prior to July 1, 1955, to discharge obligations incurred under this act which become due and payable after January 1, 1955, in the amount of $45 million. The third part authorizes the railway company to enter into contracts for the new equipment and for general additions and betterments in the amount of $36,555,931.

To summarize, parliament is being asked to approve financing either by way of the issue of new securities guaranteed by the government or by way of direct loan, in the amount of $234,623,695. For the convenience of hon. members, the table giving the details of this amount is as follows:

Additions and betterments (excluding new equipment)	$44,700,000
Branch line construction	6,200,000
New equipment	147,032,195
Acquisition of securities	11,236,500
Capital expenditures, January 1, 1955 to June 30, 1955, incurred prior to January 1, 1955	45,000,000
	$254,168,695
Less amount available from depreciation reserves	$19,545,000
	$234,623,695

The usual authority is provided for the making of temporary loans to the railway company and Trans-Canada Air Lines to meet operating deficits to June 30, 1955. While the budget of the railway company contemplates a surplus of $500,000 for the calendar year 1954, deficits usually occur in the early months of the year.

Loans made by the government to the railway company under previous financing and guarantee acts were outstanding on April 30, 1954, as follows:

1953 act—account of 1954 deficit	$ 17,500,000.00

We have made somewhat unexpectedly rapid progress this afternoon. I had not contemplated we would reach this resolution as early as we have. However, I shall endeavour to give hon. members any information I can, after they have had an opportunity of studying the table placed on Hansard. Perhaps that information could be given in the committee stage of the bill. That would certainly be more convenient for me, because I would then have the assistance of officials who would be helpful in interpreting those figures.

Mr. Knowles: Does the table indicate the nature of the items of additions and betterments for which this money is to be spent?

Mr. Abbott: It does not indicate the details of those improvements and betterments. But in committee on the bill any substantial information required can be made available. I understand the capital program was discussed in some detail before the standing committee, although I was not there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does it include any amount set aside to provide for an extension of or increase in the basic pension for Canadian National Railways employees?

Mr. Abbott: This is only the capital program. I would think that would be included in the operating budget.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to draw attention to two or three things that could be considered at the bill stage. The minister referred to a figure of $234 million. I have here the breakdown of that figure, which I shall not read in detail, but which makes up that amount. There is, however, one item in the capital budget as presented to the committee that I wish the minister would look at and which I think would require some explanation. Because, after totalling up the capital figures based on the $234 million, which appear in the minister's statement, there is a deduction item which says, "less $72 million" for which financing authority exists under the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act of 1953. I should add that that is deducted. My understanding is that the $72 million referred to is an amount authorized last year but not expended, and that the intention of the finance department is to have each year a new statement of the amounts actually required for the year. I think that that requires some explanation.

Secondly, when we look at the bill I would like to have on the record a full explanation of what I believe to be the fact, that the capital amount required, new equipment, $147 million, is virtually or almost wholly self-liquidating, because there is a large amount charged to operating expenditures for the retirement of that each year. I should like also to have a statement as to depreciation outside that special item for equipment. I understand that, apart from that, most of the amount spent on upkeep is regarded as virtually in lieu of depreciation, and I think an explanation should be given at some length.

Mr. Abbott: I shall see that the information for which the hon. member for Greenwood has asked is made available when we get into committee on the bill.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 469, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1954, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

AMENDMENTS TO CERTAIN ACTS TO PRESCRIBE PENSION PROVISIONS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 461, respecting the superannuation of government employees transferred to crown corporations.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I stated the other day when the resolution on this bill was being considered, it is designed to prescribe the pension provisions for, and the manner in which those pension provisions are to apply to, persons transferring their employment from the public service to a number of crown corporations. The same provisions will affect the employees of boards, commissions and other corporations who contribute under the Public Service Superannuation Act should they become employees of those crown corporations to which this bill applies.

Hitherto in accordance with the provisions of the Government Companies Operation Act, as well as of a number of other acts establishing crown companies, a civil servant who had been contributing to the superannuation account under the Civil Service Superannuation Act could continue to be a contributor and enjoy all the benefits of the superannuation act, if he left his employment in the civil service, and became an employee of one of these crown companies. It is believed that this policy was introduced to encourage the transfer of key personnel from the civil service at the time of the establishment of a crown company. As a rule it would be some time before the company would have a pension plan of its own and so these civil servants, many with several years to their credit under the superannuation act, would otherwise be transferring from an employment with a first-class pension plan to one with none at all.

While such a provision was recognized as essential at a time when a company was set up, the need for it gradually disappears when a company becomes well established and has a good pension plan of its own. Up to the present those civil servants who have benefited in this way on becoming employees of crown companies would at least have been permanent civil servants and would normally have several years of service to their credit. Thus the retention of this right to remain under the Civil Service Superannuation Act would not be regarded as providing very many undeserved benefits up until now.

With the coming into force of the Public Service Superannuation Act on January 1 of this year, the circumstances just described are quite different. If these provisions were to be retained in these other acts it would then be possible for a person with just over a year's employment in a temporary position to transfer to a crown company and carry with him full rights under the superannuation act because he had become a contributor to the superannuation account after this one year of employment. Since an employee who transferred to one of these crown companies would transfer because it was to his advantage to do so, it is unreasonable that he should carry with him the generally greater benefits of the public service pension plan. In addition he would have the other advantages of his new position and be relatively better off than both his former and new fellow employees.

I mentioned at the resolution stage the crown corporations with pension plans of their own to which this act will apply. These are the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, Canadian Arsenals Limited, Polymer Corporation Limited and Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, under whose pension plan employees of Eldorado Aviation Limited and of Northern Transportation Company Limited come. As I pointed out earlier, the acts relating to the pension plans of these crown companies contain provisions regarding the continuation of transferred employees as contributors to the superannuation account.

Mr. Macdonnell: Of the crown companies?

Mr. Benidickson: The acts that are now being amended have hitherto contained a provision under which a person could continue under the superannuation act. Because of its close relation with the Public Service Superannuation Act it is intended that this new act will have effect from January 1 of this year because that is the day on which that act came into force. It will not affect those civil servants who became employees of crown companies before that date and continued to be contributors under the superannuation act. They will continue on as before.

Hon. members will recall that the new Public Service Superannuation Act provides for reciprocal transfer agreements between the government and any of these crown companies where, on the transfer of both employer and employee contributions as well as of interest on these contributions from one pension fund to the other, the employee's full service credit under his former pension plan will be transferred to his new pension plan. This would be done only if the employee agrees and where a reciprocal transfer agreement has been concluded. Some discussion has already taken place with certain of the crown corporations with a view to entering into these agreements as provided in that act.

Thus a contributor under the superannuation act who, before the age of 60, transfers his employment to one of these crown companies which is not under that act will have the choice of at least a return of his contributions or a deferred annuity related to his service up to that time and commencing at the age of 60. If there is a reciprocal transfer agreement with this crown company, that employee would have the third choice open to him of having his pensionable service transferred to his credit under the pension plan of his new employer.

In addition to the acts relating to these corporations, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act is also amended in this bill so far as the pension provisions are concerned. As hon. members are aware, the St. Lawrence seaway authority has not yet been established and it is not known, therefore, what type of pension plan it will have. This bill makes it possible for the authority to be added to schedule "A" of the Public Service Superannuation Act whereby its employees would be contributors under that act. As an alternative, should it be decided to set up a pension plan of its own, this bill provides that persons who are contributors under the Public Service Superannuation Act and who become employees of the authority will continue to be contributors under that act until the authority's own pension plan is established. At that time provisions similar to those described above for these other crown companies covered by this bill will apply to those contributors.

Mr. Macdonnell: There are two or three questions I should like to ask. In the first place, when the bill was at the resolution stage I asked the parliamentary assistant whether there were cases which were not covered by this legislation because there was no superannuation plan in effect in the crown corporations themselves, and I think his answer was yes, but that he believed there were special circumstances there. I should like, if possible, to have that cleared up now.

Mr. Benidickson: It was my idea to answer my hon. friend in committee.

Mr. Macdonnell: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when we were on the resolution stage with respect to this legislation I indicated our wholehearted support of the principle with which this legislation deals. As I understand it, the government's desire is that as between the public service and crown corporations there should be transferability of pension rights. From what the parliamentary assistant said just now I understand that the government does not wish it to go too far; it does not wish it to go to the extent of an employee getting a double advantage in terms of pension rights because he transfers from one type of government employment to another. Obviously one can have no quarrel with that aspect of the legislation.

I do wish to say once again that we support wholeheartedly the underlying principle of this legislation, namely, that when employees transfer from one type of government employment to another it should be possible for them to carry with them the pensionable service or the pension rights which they have earned.

As I indicated the other day, and therefore I shall only refer to it in passing now, we think this is a principle that should be extended even wider. The parliamentary assistant has indicated that at one stage, in order to induce people to leave the public service for employment in crown corporations, it was necessary to do something about the pension situation. That feature applies not only as between public service and crown corporation employment, but it applies as well to a great many people at all levels of employment.

As I said the other day, there are people who are frozen to their jobs because they cannot carry their pension rights with them. There are others who are effectively denied entry into certain types of employment because their age is such they cannot become participants in a particular pension plan. If such persons were able to carry with them the pension rights that they had built up in the past that problem could be solved. I rise, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to express the hope that the government, as a matter of public policy, will give further study to this whole question and will try to draft legislation that will extend this principle on a broader basis, so that our people generally will be able to take their pension rights with them when they transfer not only from public service to crown corporations but when they transfer from private industry to public service or vice versa, or even when they transfer from one private industry to another. As I indicated the other day, this is something that is sorely needed in respect of pension plans throughout the country generally, and I hope that we will yet see an extension of the basic principle underlying this legislation until it includes all our people.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Canadian Broadcasting Act.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I have some questions to ask on this but if the parliamentary assistant wishes to make a statement I shall reserve my questions.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to make a statement but I was going to answer a question my hon. friend raised a few moments ago, and which he raised some time ago as reported at page 5030 of Hansard. There he asked whether there were some crown corporations who have not a pension plan and if by reason of the absence of such a plan some expensive retroactive action might be necessary in the future.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, as regards the shareholders.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, and I said it was possible that not all crown corporations had a pension plan. I have since made inquiries and I have found that the only crown corporation which has not a pension plan is the Park Steamships. There are special reasons for that, namely that it is no longer functioning as a crown corporation. There are other reasons but that is the principal one.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have one or two other questions, Mr. Chairman. First of all, let me say I agree fully with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that there ought to be transferability in these cases. That seems eminent common sense, for they are all employed by the same employer. Would it be true to say that the pension plans in crown corporations are virtually the same, or is there a great variety?

Mr. Benidickson: That question was raised when we were on the resolution stage by the hon. member for Perth and I was proposing to answer that question too. I find that there is not exactly a consistent pattern with respect to these pension plans, but generally speaking most features are similar, such as the rate of contribution. The rate of contribution varies somewhat sometimes between males and females, and sometimes between one corporation and another because the corporations themselves, having different functions, find that their employees want variations in the same fashion as in private business. That rate of employee contribution thus varies from between five to six per cent of salary. Then when the maximum amount of pension is to be determined there is a slight variation there also, but I find that the range runs between one and three-quarters per cent to two per cent of salary multiplied by the number of years service. Under the superannuation act the maximum number of years service that can be taken into account to determine the maximum pension is 35 years, and in the case of the Public Service Superannuation Act the rate is two per cent. Therefore, the maximum pension would be 35 years times two per cent of the salary which would be 70 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell: Are the terms of retirement the same?

Mr. Benidickson: Generally yes; but, as I say, there is some variation in the maximum number of years, and the percentage calculation runs between one and three-quarters per cent and two per cent, so it is fairly close.

Mr. Macdonnell: The parliamentary assistant used the phrase, "in cases where there is an agreement between the crown corporation and the government." That leads me to ask a question in regard to this bill before us, subject to my not having read every word with great care. We do have special crown corporations and I shall like to know why it is not possible to deal with the matter in general. Are there special features in each case which have to be dealt with? Are we running into a situation where a civil servant may transfer to one crown corporation and he may then wish to transfer back and be unable to do so? Is there any possibility of transferring to and fro?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes; there is a possibility as provided under the superannuation act. Under this new act which came into effect on January 1 there is provision for reciprocal agreements to be made to widen these opportunities. The functions of the crown companies vary considerably and for that reason you will find that there are separate schedules in the Financial Administration Act and also schedules in the superannuation act setting out the crown companies according to functions. For example, some corporations are defined as departmental corporations, and others are considered to be agency corporations. There are others of a proprietary type such as the C.B.C. and so on, and their relationship to a unified pension plan would vary somewhat in each case. In each company the employees perhaps have differing requirements.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, generally speaking there are small variations between the schemes in some crown corporations and in the Public Service Superannuation Act. Does the parliamentary assistant feel that this act covers the whole situation and makes a transfer from one to the other, either from public service to crown corporation, or from one crown corporation to another, quite equitable?

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. This act does not make that possible but the Public Service Superannuation Act contains the provision under which these reciprocal agreements can be arrived at and the transfer made.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the parliamentary assistant mean the transfer from the public service to a crown corporation and from one crown corporation to another?

Mr. Benidickson: I meant an agreement to transfer the contribution, both employee's and employer's, as laid down in the superannuation act.

Mr. Macdonnell: Who manages the pension funds? In each of the crown corporations do they manage their own?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is there any government responsibility in the event of loss?

Mr. Benidickson: I think in each case the pension plan is suggested by the board of directors, but I think under each act the approval of the governor general or the treasury board is required.

Mr. Macdonnell: Well, I suppose we can take it that the terms of investment are restricted to the highest securities?

Mr. Benidickson: I believe, except in one case, their plans involve insurance companies —annuity schemes with insurance companies.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation Act.

Mr. Ferguson: Could the parliamentary assistant tell me whether that means reinsuring the risks with insurance companies, in other words, private enterprise? If that is so, it is most gratifying.

Crown Corporations

Mr. Benidickson: I had in mind, of course, group Canadian government annuity policies as well.

Mr. Ferguson: That is good news.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Government Companies Operation Act.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I have some questions I would like to ask on this clause and since I am on my feet immediately after my good friend the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) I would like to extend to him my best wishes for a very happy birthday. In view of what happened the other day, that will show that we are still good friends.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is what they do in the insurance business also.

Mr. Knowles: Under this clause may I ask whether any other companies are involved in these reciprocal arrangements or reciprocal agreements or whether it is possible to have them with other companies? The parliamentary assistant referred to Canadian Arsenals, the Polymer Corporation, Eldorado and its subsidiaries. What is the situation with respect to the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Benidickson: The companies which would have an opportunity of making a reciprocal arrangement as provided in the superannuation act are not restricted to those referred to in the Government Companies Operation Act. Conceivably the C.N.R. would be a type of crown company which could enter into a reciprocal agreement with the superannuation act management. My hon. friend will also know that the act provides that we could enter into reciprocal arrangements with other public bodies such as governments in the provinces and municipalities.

Mr. Knowles: Under that act is it possible for the government or a crown corporation to enter into a reciprocal arrangement with any private industries?

Mr. Benidickson: We have not gone that far in the act; no.

Mr. Knowles: Keep thinking about it.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: Shall this bill, by leave, be read a third time now?

[Mr. Ferguson.]

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

Bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISCUSSION AS TO ORDER OF PRECEDENCE

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 393, an act to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act.—The Minister of Defence Production.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if you do not mind would you call first the order of business having to do with the War Service Grants Act?

On the order:

House in committee of the whole on Bill No. 82, an act to amend the War Service Grants Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on this bill?

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Speaker, is it wise to have this matter discussed now while most of those interested are sitting in the veterans affairs committee?

Mr. Bennett: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything contentious about this act. It was passed with one amendment unanimously in the veterans affairs committee.

Mr. Lennard: Very well.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that I do now leave the chair—

Mr. Macdonnell: Surely, Mr. Speaker, the point raised by the hon. member for Wentworth is a valid one. It is all very well to say that it is not a contentious matter. That may be our view. But surely the people who have devoted the most attention to it have the right to be here.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I believe that what the parliamentary assistant has said is in accordance with the facts and that the bill was approved in the committee unanimously. But at the same time, in order to accommodate hon. members, we will go on with the bill with regard to Atomic Energy Control.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

AMENDMENTS CONSOLIDATING ACTIVITIES OF GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 393, to amend the Atomic Energy Control Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the proposed amendments to the Atomic Energy Control Act of 1946 is to establish administrative machinery and procedures which will better meet the requirements of the present and future program in atomic energy. The program has passed through two stages, and is now entering upon a third.

The first stage began in 1942 with Canada's decision to join with the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom in the effort to produce an atomic bomb. Canada's contribution was twofold. First, we supplied uranium—the raw material of the bomb—from the deposits at Port Radium in the Northwest Territories. This mining operation, initially under the direction of a private company, was transferred to a crown company, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, in January, 1944. Second, we made available the facilities of the national research council, and in particular the services of a group of brilliant scientists on its staff. These men in association with British and European scientists undertook to find a method of producing plutonium, the fissionable material which is one of the prime ingredients of the atomic bomb. As a result of this research it became possible to design and construct a reactor at Chalk River using heavy water as the moderator and natural uranium as the fuel. This project was under the direction of the national research council. While the reactor was primarily a research tool, much of the information obtained in its design and operation has been of great value to the military program. This first stage in the atomic energy program came to a close with the end of the war.

There was a period between the end of the war and late 1946 when some hope existed that a way might be found of eliminating, or at least controlling, the use of atomic weapons. In this connection the house will recall Canada's participation in the international conference on atomic energy which was held under the auspices of the United Nations. It was not thought desirable during the period of these discussions that any change should be made in the Canadian program in either the research or the raw materials fields. When it became apparent that an international agreement could not be reached consideration had to be given to the future direction of the two phases of the Canadian program, and to the best method of administering that program. This was the beginning of the second stage.

In the raw materials field the way was clear. It was decided that Canada should continue to supply uranium for the production of atomic bombs from existing sources of supply and, moreover, that we should seek to increase the sources of supply. Similar policies were adopted by the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom. This involved, in the first instance, an expansion of the production capacity at the Port Radium mine, and an expansion of Eldorado's exploration activity. It also involved the participation of the prospector and the mining industry. The house will recall that in March, 1948 I announced that a price schedule had been established for uranium ores and concentrates which was guaranteed until March 31, 1955. I also announced that Eldorado had been designated as the procurement agent for all uranium ores and concentrates produced in Canada. I have made further announcements from time to time relating to changes in the price schedule and the duration of the guarantee. The current price schedule has been guaranteed until March 31, 1962.

In considering the post-war objectives of the Chalk River project the government was influenced largely by the fact that the NRX reactor had proved to be the most efficient reactor of its type in the world and as such offered a unique opportunity for exploring the peacetime application of atomic energy, and especially its use as an energy source for electric power. It was decided, therefore, that the program of research and development at Chalk River should be continued and expanded. In 1951 the decision was made to construct a second reactor which would have a dual purpose—production and research. This new reactor, called the NRU reactor, is of a similar type to the NRX reactor but much more advanced in design and of much higher power.

These decisions affecting the post-war program in atomic energy were reflected in the Atomic Energy Control Act of 1946. The intent and purpose of the act were set out in its preamble as follows:

> It is essential in the national interest to make provision for the control and supervision of the development, application and use of atomic energy, and to enable Canada to participate effectively in measures of international control of atomic energy which may hereafter be agreed upon . . .

The act provided for the establishment of an atomic energy control board which would be responsible for the over-all direction of the program and for administering the various types of security regulation which were required in the program. However, it seemed unwise to disturb the existing arrangement whereby Eldorado had direct responsibility for the raw materials program.

and the national research council had direct responsibility for the research and development program. There was no great difficulty in the case of Eldorado, since its board of directors had reported to a minister during the war years. This arrangement was continued in the post-war years. The president of Eldorado was appointed a member of the atomic energy control board, in order that the board might be fully informed as to developments in the raw materials field. In practice, therefore, the authority of the atomic energy control board in relation to the raw materials program has been confined largely to the administering of security regulations affecting the disclosure of information.

The position with respect to the Chalk River project was somewhat more complicated. It seemed desirable that the atomic energy control board should deal with questions of policy, but at the same time that operating responsibility should be retained by the national research council. The atomic energy control board entered into an agreement with the national research council whereby it delegated to the national research council responsibility for operating the Chalk River project subject to direction by the board in matters of policy including the approval of the operating and research budgets. The president of the national research council was appointed to the atomic energy control board in 1946, and became its president in 1948. This arrangement prevailed until April 1, 1952, when the Chalk River project was incorporated. The new company, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, was incorporated under the powers of the atomic energy control board, and its board of directors reported to the atomic energy control board. The company was to have operating responsibility for the Chalk River project, but the atomic energy control board was to retain responsibility at the policy level and for the approval of operating and research budgets. The president of the atomic energy control board was appointed as president of the new company.

When these several and somewhat complicated administrative arrangements were made, it was recognized that changes might be necessary as the program developed. The administrative organization of the two phases of the program, which I have just described, was an attempt to provide adequate but flexible control during the period of transition from the wartime program with its short-term objectives to the peacetime program with its long-term objectives.

We are now passing from this transitional or second stage of the program to a third stage. The present amendments to the Atomic Energy Control Act are intended to provide for administrative machinery which will meet the demands of this third stage of the program.

Before I discuss the proposed amendments I should like to comment briefly on the significant developments in the program with particular reference to its long-term objectives.

The work at Chalk River has reached the point where we now believe that it should be possible to produce atomic power within a range of cost which will be economic. To be more specific, we now see the possibility of producing atomic power at a cost which will be comparable to the cost of power generated from a steam plant using coal at $8 per ton. This has important implications for both the raw materials and the research programs, implications which suggest that the time has come when the two programs should be more closely integrated.

I have mentioned previously that the two reactors at Chalk River were designed to use heavy water as the moderator and natural uranium as the fuel. The atomic power feasibility study which is now being carried out at Chalk River in co-operation with the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario is aimed at the development of an outline specification for a power reactor which will also use natural uranium as the fuel. It will be obvious, therefore, that the availability of a continuing supply of uranium is an important factor in the feasibility study and the developments which must follow from that study. Fortunately, our efforts to increase the production of uranium have been successful. Eldorado has expanded its production at Port Radium and last June brought into production a new mine at Beaverlodge, Saskatchewan. At the present time the production of uranium is three times as great as it was at the end of the war. The prospector and the mining industry are also making a major contribution to the raw materials program. A discovery in the Beaverlodge area by a private company late in 1952 gives every promise of being a large producer. It is expected that this property will be in production late in 1955. Other discoveries have been made in the Blind River and Haliburton areas of Ontario, several of which will also be producers. We can now estimate that the production of uranium in 1956 will be roughly eight times as great as it was at the close of the war. While, as I have indicated, the immediate objective of the raw materials program is to produce uranium for military use, it is reasonable to expect that in striving for this objective we will obtain a knowledge of our uranium resources which would not otherwise be available. The program, therefore, has a long-term as well as a short-term objective. Since it is not possible at this time to estimate the amount of uranium which will be needed for a large-scale civilian application of atomic energy we are fortunate in having a guaranteed market which will provide a stimulus to production pending the day when we will be able to establish the level of civilian demand.

The importance of atomic fuel as a source of power will depend on the cost of producing it translated into cost per kilowatt hour of electric energy generated. In one sense the problem might be said to be economic rather than technical, since it has now been demonstrated that it is possible to design and operate a reactor which produces heat. In fact the technical and economic factors are inseparable. All of the reactors now in existence were costly to build and are expensive to operate. Most of them were designed to produce plutonium for the military program. If there were to be a continuing market for plutonium it would be possible to treat the heat as a by-product and thus produce low-cost power. There are two objections to this approach. First, a reactor designed primarily for the production of plutonium would not have the most desirable characteristics as a producer of heat for the generation of power. Second, it would be unwise to assume that the military demand for plutonium will continue at the present level for an indefinite period. A cut-back in demand, or a cessation of demand, would throw the full cost of the reactor and its operation against the production of heat, with a resulting cost per kilowatt hour which would be prohibitive. Therefore, we must find a way of designing a reactor which can be made self-sustaining—economically speaking—as a producer of heat. This is the main objective of the research program at Chalk River. It is a job which requires great genius in fundamental research, and great skill in design and engineering. The organization of the Chalk River project reflects this twofold need. It consists of two divisions: a division of research and development, and a division of industrial operations. The first is engaged in fundamental and applied research in nuclear physics, chemistry and allied fields. The second operates the reactors and the other services associated with them. The activities of the two divisions are very closely related and highly interdependent.

Measured strictly in terms of dollars a research program of this breadth and magnitude must be costly. In assessing the need for the large expenditure required we must keep in mind the ultimate benefits, which it will bring to the Canadian economy.

Already we are beginning to reap some of those benefits. Radioisotopes produced in the NRX reactor for use in medical treatment and research, and industrial processes, are now available and their number and quantity will increase. The commercial products division of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is responsible for marketing these isotopes and for developing new uses for them. This division will shortly move to a new building in Ottawa which is fully equipped with all the facilities needed for carrying out its program. It has been the policy to work closely with the medical profession and industry in the development of uses for radioisotopes. This policy will be continued and expanded.

The second benefit we hope to derive from the Chalk River project is atomic power. We can only assess the importance of this contribution in terms of the probable future power demand and the resources which will be available to meet that demand. If the current rate of annual increase in power demand, which is approximately 6 per cent, continues we shall require something like an installed capacity of 40,000,000 kilowatts by 1979, as compared with the present installed capacity of 10,000,000 kilowatts. Our total estimated hydro potential of 50,000,000 kilowatts, of which we are now using approximately 20 per cent, will certainly not all be available for use in existing industrial areas since many of the hydro sites are located in remote districts. It would appear that of the total estimated hydro potential of 50,000,000 kilowatts, some 30,000,000 kilowatts might be in use by 1979, leaving a deficiency of 10,000,000 kilowatts to be met from thermal sources. If conventional fuel-burning plants were used to supply this deficiency these plants would have to provide generating capacity equivalent to 100 per cent of our present generating capacity. This would mean an eightfold increase in our present steam plant capacity.

Any assessment of the cost of existing thermal sources in terms of the Canadian power picture as a whole is complicated by the fact that in some regions coal or oil, or natural gas, or all three, are available in substantial quantities and at low costs; whereas in other regions there are no indigenous thermal fuels. In the latter areas thermal fuels must be imported or brought from great distances within Canada. It is in these areas that atomic power should fill the gap, and it so happens that certain of them have experienced the largest increase in power requirements, a condition which is likely to continue.

While the figures I have used in this rough forecast of power requirements may be subject to future correction, the conclusion is inescapable that as our economy expands we must expect a continuing rise in power consumption. The availability of power will be a condition of our growth in the future as it has been a condition of our growth in the past, and it is within this context that the expenditures on the development of atomic power must be considered.

It is evident that if atomic energy is to make a major contribution to our power resources we must be self-sufficient at each stage in the process. We do not now enjoy this self-sufficiency. Eldorado's final product is an uranium oxide; whereas the fuel needed for the Chalk River reactors is uranium metal. At the present time the conversion of oxide to metal is carried out in the United States. That this should be so is simply a matter of economics. The volume of raw material production in Canada until recently did not warrant the production of uranium metal. With the increased production to which I have referred we think it may be possible to produce uranium metal in Canada at a satisfactory cost. As a first step in this direction Eldorado is installing a new and improved process in the Port Hope refinery. With this process it will be possible to refine a product which can be entered to a metal processing circuit without further purification. The alterations to the plant and the equipment required will cost $2,500,000. The work will begin immediately. The research and development division of Eldorado is also studying the technique of uranium metal production.

The Canadian program of atomic power development has not had the same publicity as similar programs in the United Kingdom and the United States. It should not be assumed from this that we are lagging behind in this new and important field. The quality of our effort is recognized by our British and American associates as being equal to that in the United Kingdom and in the United States. Possibly we have been overly cautious in our publicity policy. This seemed the better course until such time as the results of the research and development program could be expressed in reasonable concrete terms. We believe that time has now come. As a first step towards providing more information on the program, a power symposium was held at Chalk River last September. Certain of the papers presented at the symposium have now been published. As a second step it has been decided to set up an advisory committee on atomic power consisting of the senior executive officers of all the power commissions and power corporations in Canada. The purpose of this committee is to inform those responsible for producing power in Canada of the nature and scope of the program at Chalk River. We would also hope that the committee would assist in evaluating the possible economic importance of atomic power in the various regions of the country.

Under the provisions of the present Atomic Energy Control Act, the atomic energy control board has two main functions. First, it has the power, either directly or through other agencies reporting to it, to conduct research and production operations in connection with atomic energy. Second, the board has the power to make regulations. The proposed amendments to the act provide that the first of these responsibilities shall be transferred to the minister who is the chairman of the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research. The minister may cause activities in the research and production field to be carried out by a company or companies.

It is proposed that Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited will continue to have responsibility for production and procurement in the raw materials field, and that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited will continue to have responsibility for the operation of the Chalk River project. However, the name of the latter company will be changed to Nuclear Research Limited, a name more properly descriptive of the activities at Chalk River.

In order that the program in the two fields may be more closely integrated it is proposed to incorporate a holding company which will hold the stock of Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, and Nuclear Research Limited. This company will be called Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. The company will be responsible for the over-all direction of the program including the approval of operating and capital budgets. It will report to a minister—the chairman of the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research—who will hold the stock in trust for Her Majesty.

By this means the raw materials and research programs will be under the general direction of a single agency as is now the case in the United States and in the United Kingdom.

The atomic energy control board will retain its present responsibility for establishing and administering regulations subject to the approval of the governor in council. The board will also continue to report to the minister who is the chairman of the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research. I hope that the day is not too far distant when many of the regulations now in effect can be removed. The existing regulations affecting the disclosure of information on atomic energy are similar to those now in effect in the United States and in the United Kingdom. The declassification of information in the three countries is dealt with by a committee of which the three countries are the members. This committee has already recommended the declassification of much technical information. So long as the need for regulation exists, it is believed that the atomic energy control board as presently constituted is the best agency for dealing with the problem.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that as time has gone by in recent months I have become more and more anxious about Canada's position, as related to the United States and the United Kingdom, in the field of atomic research and development. This anxiety grew, I suppose, from reading the numerous and considerable reports of various achievements in both the United States and the United Kingdom in this field. After reading recent debates in the British House of Commons on the same subject one could not help wondering if Canada was maintaining its position relative to these other countries in this very important and highly competitive field, and if we were holding the very high position we had established during the last war.

I am pleased now to have some of this anxiety relieved by the statement of the minister. I must admit I was not counting on the characteristic he has just demonstrated, that of having hidden his light under a bushel for quite some time. However, I think the time has now come when as much publicity as possible should be given to the potentialities and possibilities of this new and great discovery, the use of atomic power for industrial purposes.

In that connection I should like to quote briefly from a news report resulting from an interview with Dr. C. J. Mackenzie, chairman of the atomic energy control board, and former president of the national research council who, in an interview with the Southam news services, made the following interesting statement:

> 1. The time has now been reached when there is real danger of the people of the western world slowing down atomic research by the enforcement of too-rigid security measures.
> 2. From here on, the less secrecy and the more people involved, the faster Canada and the world at large will be able to derive peacetime benefits from the atom.

I think those are very wise observations, because if we shut ourselves up in an air-tight chamber of security we may not realize the progress which is being made in other parts of the world, and we may fall into the error of tending to rest on our laurels or become complacent.

It is not my intention, even if it were in order, to attempt to review the whole field —and a very important field it is—of the activities of Canada in this matter of atomic research. However, there is one point upon which I should like to base my remarks for the next few minutes. I refer of course to the use of atomic energy for industrial purposes. I am delighted that the minister has now stated that we in Canada have reached a third stage of development in the atomic field, and that already a power committee has been set up for one purpose, among others, of making known to the main organizations in this country concerned with producing cheap electric power for industrial and civilian purposes a knowledge of the progress which has been made in relation to the use of atomic energy for those purposes.

Apparently in the United States for quite some time these possibilities have been vividly recognized, and the possibilities of the use of atomic power for industrial purposes has been greatly advanced by the high priority research done there in connection with the atomic powering of submarines. Recently in the United States they have launched a submarine which will have the capacity of sailing completely around the world without refuelling. Although I have no definite knowledge on this point, I should imagine that the power plant in a submarine of that type could be easily converted for civilian uses, provided it is economically feasible to do so.

Recently I read a news report setting out the opinion of an American expert in the power field. While, admittedly, this is only an opinion, it would be interesting to see what he said. This was his view:

> Power plants using atomic energy may be competing favourably in the next ten years with those burning oil, a widely known petroleum executive predicts.

I do not want to take up the time of the house by making extensive quotations to illustrate that point; but I think it would be of interest to bring to the attention of the house the progress being made in the United Kingdom in the field of atomic power as applied to industrial uses. Sir David Eccles, speaking in the House of Commons in the United Kingdom on March 1, had this to say:

> We are looking ahead beyond the race to pile up atomic weapons. Of course, at the moment the production of weapons must remain the major task of the program, but such progress has been made on the civilian side, here and abroad—and no one wants Britain to fall behind—that no time should now be lost in preparing for the day when the civilian uses of atomic energy are as important to our economy as the weapons now are to our defence.

And he goes on to say further:

Now a change is taking place, and there is no need to develop the peaceful uses of fissile materials in the dark. Parliament and industry ought now to know what is going on.

I hope that that is an opinion which is shared by the minister, because I feel it is important that parliament and the country generally should be kept as well posted as possible in the possibilities of the uses of atomic energy for peaceful purposes in the years ahead. Because I believe if we are well posted it will prevent, on the one hand, a supposition that atomic power perhaps will make obsolete all other methods of producing power. On the other hand, it would ensure against the danger of the opportunities in the atomic field being passed by, by those who are concerned with the production of atomic power and in the use of atomic radioactive products in many fields of research and in other ways as well. Sir David Eccles went on to say further:

The government believe that there is plenty of room for international collaboration on the peaceful development of atomic energy. Here is the seed of great things to come. A generation from now, we may hope, there will be power stations all over the world operated by men trained in Britain.

In connection with international co-operation in this field, it is interesting to note that the United Kingdom is now a member of an organization which has been set up in Europe, called the European organization for nuclear research, the purpose of which is to co-operate in basic research into the question of atomic power.

I was glad to hear the minister say that there is close continuing co-operation between Canada, the United States and Great Britain in this field; but I would not like to think that the possibilities of even wider co-operation on an international scale might be forgotten. There is another quotation from the same speech in the British House of Commons which I found enlightening, in which Sir David Eccles recited briefly the development which had been made with regard to research into the application of atomic energy for the production of electric power. He said:

It looks as though the most important use will be for the generation of electricity, and the house may wish to know how we see the electricity program taking shape. At present, we are building the first atomic power station in this country at Calder Hall, in Cumberland. When this prototype has demonstrated the soundness of the design, the electricity authorities—the B.E.A. and the Scottish electricity boards—will be free to place orders for other reactors of this or improved types.

I am glad the minister has indicated that something parallel to this is anticipated in this country and will be, I hope, carried on in the near future, because certain areas of this country, especially the maritime provinces, which have been economically depressed for some time, might be put in a position to compete more favourably with the more highly industrialized areas of this country if it were possible to supply them with cheap electric power. The key to that problem might eventually, in the relatively near future, be found in the use of atomic energy for the production of power, because in the cost of this fuel transportation is not a problem. It would be possible to locate generators in areas where other types of fuel are not readily available in the immediate vicinity. Sir David Eccles went on to say with regard to another program:

But I now have to tell the house that our people are ready to go ahead with the far more powerful and dramatic project. It has been decided to build a big, fast reactor, of the "breeder" type, to which the minister of supply referred in the house on 26th January and 16th November of last year. This plant will be constructed at Dounreay, in Caithness. An enterprise of this kind requires a very large site—at least some hundreds of acres—in open country, but it must be within reach of a labour supply and the amenities of community life. It must be on the coast, both for the discharge of the effluent and to provide sea water for cooling. It also requires a very large supply of fresh water.

Dounreay meets all these requirements better than any other site. It has the further advantage that development there should make a very big contribution to the revival of the highlands.

Therefore in the United Kingdom they are already anticipating the taking of steps to correct the very conditions that exist not only in the highlands of Scotland but in certain areas of this country. I refer to the maritime provinces, and it is particularly applicable to the province from which I come.

I refer of course to the importance of international co-operation in the field of atomic research and in the sharing of knowledge in this field. The minister may say—and perhaps rightly so—that is more a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson); but nevertheless I think a great obligation rests with the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) to see that every facility is made available on an international scale which will forward the interests of the peaceful use of atomic energy without endangering in any way our defence program in that connection.

I was interested to read in the debates of the British House of Commons a paragraph of a speech made by Mr. Eden in a debate on foreign affairs in connection with this very problem. This is what he said:

So far as Her Majesty's government are concerned—and who can doubt that it is the position of the Canadian government, too?—we shall do everything—

I hope Mr. Eden is right in having no doubt that it is also the position of the Canadian government. I continue:

—we shall do everything that lies in our power by contribution, direct or indirect, to bring about the success of these discussions on atomic issues. I can tell the house that we felt—I know that I did and I think my right hon. friend did also—the impact of this topic so tremendous on the whole of our thought and discussion that some of the things we have discussed—foreign office problems of detail—important though they are, seemed puny pawns in comparison with the great danger that these master chessmen present to the future of the world. I wanted to say that to the right hon. gentleman because I think it is our biggest issue in international relations.

Mr. Eden was referring to the possibility of international co-operation in the field of atomic research. I cannot express how strongly I feel, Mr. Speaker, that man's discovery of the release of atomic energy is by far the greatest step in a scientific way that civilization has made in this century. It is opening up a new era, and I hope that the government has a lively awareness of the implication which atomic energy holds both from the point of view of destruction and from the point of view of progress which can be achieved from the wise and co-operative use of atomic power in industry and in other ways. These possibilities are magnificently expressed by Sir Winston Churchill, in a speech he made in the British House of Commons not so long ago. If the house will bear with me I would like to quote from his speech because he expresses his views on the situation much better than I could. He states:

There is no doubt that if the human race are to have their dearest wish and be free from the dread of mass destruction, they could have, as an alternative, what many of them might prefer, namely, the swiftest expansion of material well-being that has ever been within their reach, or even within their dream.

By material well-being I mean not only abundance but a degree of leisure for the masses such as has never before been possible in our mortal struggle for life. These majestic possibilities ought to gleam, and be made to gleam, before the eyes of the toilers in every land, and they ought to inspire the actions of all who bear responsibility for their guidance. We, and all nations, stand, at this hour in human history, before the portals of supreme catastrophe and of measureless reward. My faith is that in God's mercy we shall choose aright.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the minister this afternoon has introduced a bill which indicates that the government is proceeding toward what he termed the third stage of Canada's atomic development. This follows quite logically from the steps that the house, the country, and the government have taken in the years which have passed.

This is an amendment to the Atomic Energy Control Act which I think is in line with the conception that the house had when the minister introduced the Atomic Energy Control Act several years ago, in I believe 1946. I think probably one of the most interesting parts of the statement he made this afternoon, outside the mechanics of the bill itself expanding the power and looking for methods of co-ordination and control in the development of this great source of energy, was the fact that already at the Chalk River plant atomic power production is in sight, and that it is in sight in an economic way so that ere long we may have the production of atomic power produced electricity based in cost on the equivalent of coal at $8 per ton.

That, it seems to me, is a very interesting announcement, and marks a very important achievement for our plant at Chalk River. Having visited that plant on two or three occasions, and having met the people who are in charge of it I have been deeply impressed by the ability and by the energy of the scientific officers who are directing the work there, and also by the enthusiasm of those young scientists who are occupied in the actual development of the project itself.

I believe that had it not been for the fact that the world discovered atomic energy in the closing days of the war, or perhaps it is more accurate to say during the war, then greater progress might have been made in the industrial use of atomic power. Unfortunately, most nations who discovered or developed atomic energy have been engaged in a race to produce atomic weapons of war, while Canada has not been engaged directly in that race. Consequently, the efficiency of our reactors, and the fact that we have now proceeded along the way to the point where the economic production of atomic energy for electrical purposes is in sight, is, I think, something of which we may be proud, and for which we may feel grateful.

I share the view that what we are going to experience in the next few years is something in the way of a new and more profound industrial revolution. Those of us who know the history of our present industrial system know that when coking coal was discovered in the early part of the eighteenth century combined with the discovery of the power of steam a little later by Thomas Watt, the results brought about an industrial revolution, and then when we had electricity and the development of electric power from coal, and subsequently from hydroelectric power, we once again saw a great forward movement of industrial production and expansion.

I think we can all agree with the closing words by Sir Winston Churchill quoted by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) to the effect that what mankind will see in the next generation will dwarf anything that mankind has seen in any similar generation in our history. That is, of course, if we are wise enough to maintain the peace of the world, and if we are wise enough to co-operate with other nations in exchanging scientific views and the results of research among the nations.

I think one of the limiting factors over the last few years has been the fact that there has not been this free exchange of scientific information. We have had only limited exchange between Britain, Canada and the United States owing to the fact that so much of the information was classified and on the secret list. Thus we have not been able to make the exchange of information that would perhaps have been beneficial to us all.

This possibility of an industrial revolution, not only in our own country and countries like ours, but all across the world is, I think, self-evident.

As was pointed out this afternoon, the transportation of fuel for atomic energy will not require the hundreds of railway cars such as are now required in the transportation of coal, because quite small quantities of fissionable material can be transported to the ends of the world. Not only will that perhaps help areas such as the maritime provinces in Canada, and I hope that will materialize, but it will assist in many of the backward areas of the world where there is no hydroelectric power, where there is perhaps no coal, or if there is coal it is not yet developed, or its development would be very costly in terms of money and labour. Also where there is no oil or natural gas atomic energy may solve the problem of producing power required for the industrialization of what we sometimes term the backward areas, or which might better be described as the undeveloped areas of the world.

This bill which is introduced today is one to which I think we should give our support. It does, of course, give the minister even wider powers than he has today, but in the development of atomic energy I think that is quite justified.

I also wish to say that I think the idea of now centralizing the various phases of atomic power research and development is a wise one, and the setting up of a holding company to centralize this control is also wise. The bill gives the minister power to set up subsidiary organizations as they become necessary, and I am glad to note, and I think it is the only way that atomic energy development can be undertaken, that the original conception of carrying out at least the main features of atomic development are to be kept carefully under public control. That is the situation in Great Britain.

As we move along I am sure that we shall find it economic and useful to preserve the control within the orbit of government, responsible to this parliament or to the provincial legislatures. That does not mean to say that certain results of this control and of development should not be made available to industry. I am not arguing that way at all. What I am arguing is that atomic power, as such, is too important to be allowed to pass away from the complete control of the public authority. I have been here long enough to have heard even outstanding Conservatives as well as others express regret that in former days some of the great resources of the country were allowed to slip from the public domain.

This bill carries forward the original idea which the minister and the government presented to the house in 1946. I was impressed also by what the minister said about the possibility of the demand for electric energy in the next few years. I think he said that by 1979 we would require 40 million kilowatts. That is a tremendous increase in electric power. As he said, while we have in this country a potential of hydro power which is much greater than that, nevertheless much of that potential is so far removed from the centres of population that it may not be economically feasible or desirable to use that hydro power. Consequently, if we have this alternative source requiring less in the way of heavy equipment and certainly less in the way of mining coal and transporting coal from one part of the country to another, we have an asset that may be of inestimable benefit to this expanding country. I am saying now that I share the view of the minister—and I believe it is that of most members of the house—that this country is going to expand and is going to become greater than we have yet known it.

I sometimes look back over my nearly 45 years in the country, particularly in western Canada, and remember that some 30 years ago I shared the view of a good many people, on the prairies at least, who thought that we had passed through the pioneer stage of the country and were approaching, as it were, the zenith of our production. How wrong was that opinion of 30 years ago! In the last 10 or 15 years we have been able to see that we are only on the verge of the great expansion this country will see, with its remarkable resources.

As the minister pointed out this afternoon we are extremely fortunate indeed to have discovered, in recent years, rich deposits of uranium. Apparently they are more widespread than we thought they were. In the northern parts of the prairie provinces, and particularly in my own province of Saskatchewan, valuable finds have been made and valuable developments are taking place in the production of this source of atomic power. But at Blind River and elsewhere in Ontario and probably, from some indications, in the maritime provinces other sources may be found.

Then of course we are not limited to uranium. We now know that there are other sources which may be available to us and which may be mined in this country in the future. While at the moment we know less about those sources than we know of uranium, nevertheless they may yet be sources of great power. This country is so highly mineralized and so richly endowed by Providence, or by nature, as you will, with these valuable minerals and resources that it seems to me that Canada has a great future based upon energy derived, in part at least, from atomic power. Consequently it is important that this house should support the minister and the government in legislation of this description which preserves to the people of Canada, through the parliamentary institution, the direction and control of what, it seems to me, is in the future to be the greatest source of power bringing about an industrial revolution which the mind of man yet perhaps can scarcely conceive.

My hon. friend spoke of the blessings that this development might bring to the peoples of the world—if we can maintain peace, if we can exchange information and so on—in terms of improved standards of living, in terms of increased production and in terms of leisure. After all, if we have the means for the right use of leisure and if we educate our people to the right use of leisure and provide them, of course, as I said a moment ago, with the means to enjoy that leisure—I refer to the cultural means—the world can look forward to something better and greater than it has ever known. I believe that atomic energy will be one of the vehicles to bring about a great industrial and social revolution. As we speak of the industrial revolution of 200 years ago, so shall future generations speak of the industrial revolution in the second half of the twentieth century. In the generations that come after us I believe the great source of power that we are now developing in Canada and that has been developed in other parts of the world—if, as I say, we can only come to international agreements on the use of these resources—will give to the world an opportunity for a better life than we can even faintly visualize at the present time.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in support of the principle of the bill. As I understand it, the minister is asking the house to grant the government the right to set up a holding company in order to co-ordinate the research and development aspects of nuclear energy in this holding company. I think that it is a natural and logical development for what the minister said was the third phase of this type of work into which we are now entering. I believe it is wise to have this holding company reporting directly to the minister so that he can keep his finger on it constantly, because we are indeed entering into an extremely important phase of this nuclear development and research.

I was keenly interested in what the minister had to say this afternoon. From his speech it is evident that Canada retains her preeminence in the field of atomic research and development. At various times and places I believe the feeling has been expressed that maybe we were losing out somewhat, but I doubt that greatly. I have been on that committee of the house which has concerned itself with investigating our Chalk River plant and all phases of atomic energy. At Chalk River I have seen a top-flight crew of scientists and technicians.

From my conversations with all those with whom I have had a chance to talk who know anything about this field—and I am not speaking now of the scientists and technicians at Chalk River but elsewhere—I think it is admitted by all who know anything about such things that in many aspects of the development of nuclear energy Canada leads both Britain and the United States. It is because I think that is so that I believe it is important, both from the point of view of the short and long-term objectives, that we keep ourselves right up in the front line. Because I believe that the very large expenditures spoken of by the minister this afternoon that we are now making and propose to make in the future are in my view completely justified. I think we should not hesitate to spend what money is required to keep Canada in the forefront of those nations that are developing nuclear energy.

The minister said this afternoon that we are not now self-sufficient in uranium metal.

We are producing very largely uranium oxide which has to be converted into metal in the United States. I was pleased to learn from his speech that Eldorado is now contemplating the development of a plant and up-to-date machinery, at Port Hope I believe, for the purpose of converting the oxide into the metal. I think that is also a very wise phase of our development. Certainly there is no good reason why we should send the oxide to the United States and then bring back the metal if in a competitive way and at prices that are reasonable we can convert the oxide into the metal.

I also found what the minister had to say about atomic power development in Canada intriguing. Like the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) and the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), if I let my imagination go I could have a great time conjuring up pictures of what can happen in the future. I suppose that even now we cannot imagine the things that can be developed as a consequence of the peacetime use of nuclear energy. We think that perhaps some of the things we imagine at the moment are wild pictures, but I doubt it. I think that the possibilities are almost unlimited, and as time goes on and if we can, as has already been so well said, put our whole energy into the peacetime development of nuclear energy and apply it to our own economy and the economies of the world through the free interchange of materials and information, mankind can be the great beneficiary of things of which he little dreams today.

But there is this to be said as we go along and develop our nuclear energy and apply it to the development of power and to production purposes in this and other countries in the world. It seems to me that concurrently we will have to develop to a finer point of efficiency our distribution machinery because it certainly is not beyond the bounds of possibility that with the application of nuclear power to industry we can multiply our total production several times while at the same time reducing the amount of human power and energy required. That in itself would be a great subject for some considerable research.

It seems to me we will have to do some work along the line of perfecting our distribution machinery because if we cannot distribute what we now produce how in the name of common sense can we hope to distribute the great bulk of materials we can produce through the use of nuclear energy and power? I was glad to hear the minister say that it was his intention to set up an advisory committee on atomic power. I think that opens up very interesting possibilities. Surely those men and agencies throughout the country concerned today with the production of power in any way will be able to contribute much to the discussions that will take place and will doubtless be of great help in developing the policy that will apply in the future to the kind of thing that we are now talking about, power development through the application of nuclear energy.

I think the minister's idea is good. I do not want to prolong the discussion today but I do want to say that I think the minister is perfectly justified in asking for this legislation. I do not think the bill gives him undue power at all. I believe it makes it possible for him to keep his hand a little more firmly on the development that will take place, and I am quite in agreement with those who say that we will have to retain control of both research and development in the field of nuclear energy for some time to come. But I believe at the same time that every effort should be made to achieve the widest possible exchange of information within the necessary restrictions that are placed upon us because of security reasons. I think I can go along with the minister and I certainly support the principle of the bill.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, the Atomic Energy Control Act will give the atomic energy control board the power to conduct research and production operations with respect to atomic energy in Canada. It has become apparent that it would be desirable to place these operations under a board under the jurisdiction of one minister, with the board reporting to the minister. I am sure that we know that rapid strides have taken place in the last decade in connection with atomic energy. We were not aware until the statement of the minister today of the great potential that exists for Canadians. Much credit for this great development must go to Canada's able scientists under the dynamic leadership of the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe). However, I feel that the words "atomic energy" will, whenever used, conjure up in the minds of most Canadians a picture of horror, total destruction and the very annihilation of life itself.

We have heard of the lethal qualities of atomic energy, of the destructive capacity of the A-bomb and the even greater volume and gigantic destructive capacity of the H-bomb. I think members of the house and people generally have expressed concern with regard to this destructive quality. In the house on April 14 last hon. members expressed their opinions on this subject and questioned the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). On that occasion he stated, as found at page 4073 of Hansard:

> The United Nations general assembly, by resolution of November 28 last year, suggested that the disarmament commission—

On which Canada is represented.

> —would seek by agreement to work out arrangements for the elimination of all major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, and for effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only.

Subsequently, on April 29, 1954, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), acting as Secretary of State for External Affairs, reported to the house that a subcommittee of the United Nations on disarmament had been formed and that Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs would be Canada's representative on that commission. This should result in substantial progress being made in the finding of a solution to the problem of the destructive features of atomic energy. All members of this House of Commons, and citizens of Canada, will utter a prayer and express a fervent hope that atomic energy may never be used anywhere in the world for these purposes. I fear that we have placed far too great an emphasis on the wartime efficiency of this great discovery, and we have not looked to the peacetime uses of atomic energy which could bring great advantages and benefits to our people.

Today we welcome the words of the Minister of Defence Production, who has dealt practically entirely in his remarks with what might be done in the way of peacetime advantages of this great force. If the use of atomic energy could be directed along proper channels, much happiness and consolement may come to suffering humans. I gather that great efficiency can be made available to the great industrial machines of this country and the other countries of the world.

As I am not a scientist I shall not attempt to explain the chemical reaction that goes on to produce the breaking up of nuclear fission. I shall content myself with bringing to the mind of the members, Mr. Speaker, the one principal objective of the peacetime use of atomic energy, namely the production and use of radioisotopes which have been referred to by the minister this afternoon for medical, industrial and research purposes. While the use of isotopes is international, it seems best to me to discuss particularly the Canadian program. We are all proud in Canada of the atomic reactor that has been developed at Chalk River, and also of the diligence which has been applied to the production and distribution of isotopes which come from it.

What is a radioisotope? It has been defined as an ordinary element which has had its atomic masses increased by the capture of the neutron. Its chemical and physical properties remain the same except it decays giving off radiation.

What are the practical applications of radioisotopes? In the field of chemistry, atomic energy has a wide use in tracer studies and the separation and discovery of various elements in chemical analysis. The isotope can be used in industrial development to study foundation movements and the porosity of soil. The amount of moisture in soil can be definitely ascertained by making assays to determine the content. With regard to soil movements and disturbing equilibrium conditions, economic savings are probably to be found in preventive measures. A good knowledge of soil moisture content can simplify construction and reduce maintenance costs.

Static electricity causes time loss and fire hazard in a number of industrial operations. The use of radioactive static eliminators, developed and sold by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, has become widespread. In the case of the ordinary printing press, these static eliminators, I am told, by providing machine-jogging for presses rather than hand-jogging will save in one day $200 or $300 a bar, the cost of the static eliminator. The cost of the bar, therefore, would be saved in the first day's operation. It is desirable to eliminate static from rotogravure operations in printing, as there is a great fire hazard because sparks from static electricity may commence a fire in the inflammable ink. Today the newspapers of Canada are now employing these bars which are also sold by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

Another example of the use of the portable neutron is the logging of petroleum boreholds. I am informed that they have been found very useful in western Canada. There is, of course, the possibility of atomic energy being used in the development of electricity, and that has been dealt with fully today by the minister. It seemed fantastic that within a period of three to five years we should be able to provide for industry in this country great sources of electric energy that are urgently needed. It was reported in the newspapers the other day that the chairman of the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission had stated that they would be able to develop power within the course of five years. From the lips of the minister today, it would seem that this is not beyond the realm of possibility.

I come now to what seems to me to have been the greatest development in atomic energy, the discovery of a form of treatment for mankind. A notable milestone in Canada's cancer program was the development by Canadian government scientists of the cobalt 60 beam therapy unit. This apparatus, which provides a new and potent weapon to combat cancer, has received world-wide recognition and places Canada among the leaders in the fight against cancer. The demand for these units, both here and abroad, is greater than can be met by the crown company, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, which is still the world's only producer of this equipment.

It is just about three years ago since the first cancer patient underwent treatment of this kind in London's Victoria hospital. While the government scientists have been working on the development of cobalt 60 apparatus, similar equipment was developed by Dr. A. E. Johns independently in Saskatoon. Shortly after, government-built units were installed in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg. Only about a month or five weeks ago a new unit was installed in the city of Hamilton. The installation of Hamilton's unit brought to six the total number of units now in use in Canada. Canadian-built equipment has been provided for hospitals in the United States at New York, Chicago and Minneapolis. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has provided units for hospitals in London, England, and for a medical centre in Italy. Plans are now being worked out, in co-operation with provincial authorities and professional men in the cancer field, for the development of a program which will provide these units across the country. I might say that the Department of National Health and Welfare has had a great part in the distribution of these units to the various medical centres throughout Canada. It is the hope of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited that cobalt 60 units may be provided in every province, and particularly in those centres which have university students and university laboratories. The university centres may expect great progress in this field.

At the present time, as we have been told by the minister, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is building a new and more powerful reactor which will increase the supply of cobalt available for the purpose, and it is expected that by December of this year it will be possible to step up the production of therapy units to two each month.

In my own province of Ontario there are already three units in operation. I understand that two additional ones are to be built in the new Ontario cancer institute in Toronto. It is hoped that additional units will be provided in Windsor, Ottawa, Kingston and Port Arthur.

Only a short time ago I read in the newspapers that Mr. J. W. McConnell, an outstanding and philanthropic citizen of Montreal, had contributed one of these therapy units to the Royal Victoria hospital in that city at a cost of $80,000. I am sure that for those who are interested in the welfare of mankind, and who have the means to do it, may well contribute to this most worth-while charity. I commend Mr. McConnell for his most humanitarian act.

Great care must be exercised in the transportation of the cobalt bomb. The bomb consists of a small box about an inch and a half square filled with small pellets of cobalt that have been rendered radioactive by a year's cooking in the atomic reactor at Chalk River. It is encased in a huge lead box, about four feet long and two feet in diameter, in order that no danger will come to those who come in contact with this substance.

The treatment room is square and roomy. The operator works from a room adjacent, and is enabled to see what is going on by looking through a glass. The bomb sits in the centre of the room and the technician operates the machine from a radio-like box. Cobalt 60 radiations do not offer a positive cure for all forms of cancer. However, its rays do provide a means of treating certain cancerous conditions more effectively than with either radium or X-ray. Moreover the new cobalt 60 units provide cancer treatments at a much lesser cost than was previously possible.

One cobalt 60 beam therapy unit costs in the neighbourhood of $60,000 to $80,000. It produces more radiation, I am advised, than medically-used radium worth millions of dollars. In contrast to the X-ray, the cobalt unit can do the work of a two-million-volt X-ray machine, which would cost about four times as much to build.

The development of the cobalt 60 beam therapy unit has brought treatment within the reach of millions of people in our community to whom otherwise this treatment would be denied. The development of this unit by the Canadian government is an achievement not only by the administrators of the plan, and the scientists of Canada, but also by the people of this country.

Today it has been my purpose to bring to the attention of hon. members, and to Canadians generally, the peacetime uses of this great force. I suppose that in a humble way we are doing something in the house today to encourage further development, and to see that it is kept within the control of responsible authorities, in order that, in the future, people may have the benefit of these discoveries. It is in this spirit that we are endeavouring to expand and to promote the activities of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, under the direction of one of Canada's outstanding ministers, the Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver- Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) has spoken for the official opposition on this bill. He presented the case very well, and I have no intention of trying to paint the lily.

However, there are four or five questions I would ask the minister to answer when he closes the dabate. In the first place the bill does give him a great deal more power than he has under the present act. I would ask him to explain in somewhat more detail than he did when opening his remarks the difference between control in Canada and that in the United States and the United Kingdom.

When the Atomic Energy Control Act was passed in 1946 the position was that the minister of supply in the United Kingdom had very wide powers. However I believe those powers were reduced somewhat recently, and that the trend now in the United Kingdom is in the other direction. Then we know that from the beginning they have had in the United States an atomic energy commission with very wide powers. I would ask the minister to tell us whether any member of the cabinet in the United States has powers as extensive as those which will be in the hands of the minister in Canada who will be designated by our cabinet, once this bill becomes law.

My second question has to do with the position in which the elected representatives of the people will be placed. In the United States they have a committee composed of members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. That committee was set up in the beginning. It sits each year and, of course, has very wide powers.

In Canada we have followed the system of having a special parliamentary committee, and such a committee has been appointed twice in the last eight years. I would ask the minister to explain what he has in mind along that line for the future. Is it the intention that a special committee shall be appointed occasionally, or does he think Canada has now reached the stage in its atomic development where there should be a standing committee of the House of Commons? It may be that he has some other suggestion for keeping the membership of the house informed of what is going on in this new field. I realize of course that this is difficult. It is not as easy to work out a plan for keeping the house posted as one might think. However I would ask the minister to tell us what he has in mind in that connection.

In his remarks he said the government now plans to produce uranium metal in Canada. I think he said that we had been producing uranium oxide, but that has been sent to the United States for the final refining processes, and we bought back the finished metal uranium. Apparently the plan now is to instal such new equipment in the refinery at Port Hope that we shall be able to do the whole processing in Canada. I agree with that proposal. It is very much worth while, and I always like to see as much of this manufacturing as possible carried out in our own country. But last year the position with regard to the uranium ore was that there was not one privately-owned mine actually in production. There had been a great deal of prospecting and a great deal of publicity about uranium finds, but I was surprised to hear in the special committee on atomic energy that no privately-owned mine was actually in production at that time. The minister said today that there would be one mine producing in 1955.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is one mine producing. Rix-Athabasca is producing at the present time.

Mr. Green: When the minister closes the debate I hope he will give us some further details about that situation. Is the reason that there are no more producing mines at the moment the fact that there is too tight a control on the uranium ore? Is that why we have only one producing mine at the present time, apart from the mines which are being operated by an agency of the government?

Then the minister mentioned that he has set up or is going to set up an advisory committee on power. That is a very wise move; but the last time we were informed on this question the advisers were nearly all from Ontario and Quebec. There was a very small representation of power men from the maritimes, and from the prairie provinces, but none at all from British Columbia. I do believe that this atomic energy power could be sent to the areas in Canada which are short of hydro power. That has been dealt with by two or three of the members who have spoken earlier in the debate. The hon. member for Queens mentioned the maritime provinces. Saskatchewan, too, is in great need of power.

There will have to be some definite policy adopted by the government to place this power in those areas in the country where there is a shortage. I do not believe that will ever result from an advisory committee on power which has a majority of men who are associated with the Ontario hydro or with the Quebec hydro or with the power corporations which are in the power business right here in central Canada. That is only natural, since more power is developed here and bigger corporations are here. I can quite understand that representatives from this part of the country should predominate on the advisory committee, but I am afraid that will not solve the problem of diversifying production in Canada. In some way we must adopt a policy of putting this atomic energy to use primarily in the maritimes and in Saskatchewan where they are short of hydro power. I would ask the minister to deal with that also when he closes the debate.

One other thing that should be explained is the effect on this program of international control of atomic energy. Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is the one who should answer that. I am not sure which minister should deal with it. Canada throughout as a nation has favoured international control of atomic weapons in any event, and quite properly so. That reflects the wishes of practically everybody in this country, and I hope it will not be long before some effective type of international control will be in effect. What will that do to our own plans here for the development and use of atomic energy? Will the international control affect only atomic weapons? Of course we are not producing them. Will it just affect the production of uranium? To what extent will it enter into the use of atomic energy for peacetime purposes? These are the five questions I would ask the minister to deal with when he closes the debate.

In conclusion I would say that we can all be justly very proud of Canada's position in the atomic energy field. I give great credit to the minister and to Dr. C. J. Mackenzie who has done a marvellous job in this field, and to Dr. Keys of Chalk River, and to the other men working with the ones I have mentioned who have done such a good job and have done it in such a wonderful spirit. I have never encountered a finer spirit, except perhaps in the Canadian corps in the first war, than I found up at Chalk River when we visited there on two occasions. These young Canadian scientists are doing a grand job. They are very proud of the work they are doing and they are rendering a wonderful service to Canada.

We are in this fortunate position because during the course of the war we became associated with the United States and the United Kingdom in the production of atomic energy, and also of course because we have large supplies of uranium. I think Canada is the third largest producer. That was the position a year ago. Perhaps we have moved up to second in the intervening period. We got in on the ground floor in this particular field, and I am very glad to see that the minister's plans are to keep Canada in that favoured position.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Before the bill receives second reading there are one or two words I wish to say about it. I was concerned when I heard the minister say that power could be produced from atomic sources which would equal the power produced from coal at about $8 a ton. I would not for a moment suggest that we should curtail the progress made in atomic energy, and particularly as it will apply to our industrial output. I think it is a sign of progress, just as much a sign of progress as is the development of our coal and gas; but it does raise a problem which is exceedingly important to this country, namely, what is going to happen to our coal mines? We have a great deal of trouble now in maintaining even a semblance of a coal industry. I read in the papers yesterday that the coal mines in Alberta are going to be reduced again this year by over 1,000 miners.

Two years ago they were reduced to the extent of about 2,000 miners. That is a considerable decrease in the number of miners who are employed in the coal mining industry. If we have the St. Lawrence project developed as expected we are going to produce another abundance of electric power for central Ontario which means that that too will enter into competition with coal from western Canada and eastern Canada as well. We have this new atomic energy program which is going to compete directly with coal as an energy producing product, and, indeed, the minister has even gone so far as to say that those in charge of these new atomic sources calculate that it will compete with the energy produced from coal at $8 a ton.

We out in western Canada certainly cannot place coal down here at $8 per ton, nor can they do so from Nova Scotia, or the provinces of Quebec or Ontario at that price. I am not suggesting to the government at this time what method they should adopt to keep the coal industry alive in view of the fact that we have this new form of energy entering into competition with the products of that industry, but it seems to me the government is going to have to assume the responsibility in some way or other for continuing to maintain our coal industry, at least at that level where we can call upon it in the event of an emergency.

The coal industry is rapidly dying out and if we were to call upon it immediately I am sure it could not even begin to meet the demand. In view of the development of atomic fuel it may be necessary to take some very drastic action in the form of subsidizing the coal industry, or we may have to curtail some of the imports of coal from the United States. It may well be that we will have to devise some method involving both these prospects. But it does seem to me, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) in regard to the production of power from atomic energy, that something must be done to maintain the coal industry in both western and eastern Canada. This danger faces us now and unless something is done to help out that great industry we will not have it available when it may be required in order to defend our country.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) raised what could be a very serious problem and what in any event is a very impressive point. What he has done is to bring quite vividly before the attention of the house the cost of technological advance. I am sure there have been groups throughout all history who have been badly hurt by technological advance, but perhaps when we are in the stage of civilization such as we have reached today one can expect the government to come to the aid of those who have been so hurt.

But I do not think the hurt is going to be quite so immediate as perhaps the hon. member for Bow River fears. While it is possible that the pilot plant we have at Chalk River can produce electricity on the same basis as a company could produce with coal at $8 per ton, nevertheless I do not think this sort of production is going to be attained throughout Canada for some years to come.

I was interested in the suggestion by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that there should be a committee of this house considering the matter of atomic energy. I think a committee of the house to examine the situation would be desirable; for example, it could look into the various aspects of the production and operation at Chalk River. However, I doubt very much whether it would be of great assistance apart from that.

In his speech the minister stated that perhaps the government had been overly cautious in publicity. That is the first time I have heard a cabinet minister get away with a statement like that for a long time without hoots of derision. It is true that the government has been overly cautious in publicity with the result that the people of Canada do not know what is going on. If I can speak for myself, I think members of parliament do not know what is going on. It is highly advisable that we should know and perhaps we can pick up an example from the United Kingdom.

In the United Kingdom they have a parliamentary and scientific committee. It is an entirely voluntary committee, not set up by the government; it is created by the members themselves. It is open to all members of parliament from all parties, from the House of Lords, and also to nominated representatives of certain scientific and technological organizations. This committee is its own master and it has nothing to do with the house except that its membership is restricted, as I have said, to members of the House of Commons and the House of Lords. The aims of the committee are these, and perhaps I should read them.

1. To provide members of parliament with authoritative scientific information from time to time in connection with debates.
2. To bring to the notice of members of parliament and government departments the results of scientific research and technical development which bear upon questions of current public interest.
3. To arrange for suitable action through parliamentary channels whenever necessary to ensure that proper regard is had for the scientific point of view.
4. To examine all legislation likely to affect the above and take such action as may be suitable.
5. To watch the financing of scientific research.
6. To provide its members and other approved subscribers with a regular summary of scientific matters dealt with in parliament.

I for one would find such a committee most useful but it is up to members of parliament themselves to set up such a committee, and perhaps those of us who are interested might get together next session with that end in view.

The sort of matters which were discussed before this committee were, for example, when Sir John Cockcroft came before it to describe the progress of atomic energy development in Great Britain, and when Professor Zuckerman described what science and technology can contribute towards overcoming shortages of essential raw materials. Then Dr. James Conant was invited to address the committee on Anglo-American scientific relations. These are all matters in which we ourselves are interested and I am convinced such a committee would be of great value to members of parliament, though we have to do that job ourselves rather than ask the government to do it for us.

There is one point I would like to make in connection with the minister's speech. I have never in my life accused the hon. gentleman of being a pessimist, for I think he is the most outrageously optimistic member of the cabinet. Yet the figures of production of electricity he gave us, although startling, are pessimistic. He said that the current installed capacity of electric power is about ten million kilowatts, and 25 years from now it was estimated that it would be about 40 million kilowatts. Fantastic as that figure is I suggest it is quite conceivable that it could be much more. The right hon. gentleman said the rate of increase in consumption of power is about six per cent per annum. I think that rate of increase will increase still further as the years go by and within 25 years we are going to find ourselves, not only in Canada but in other countries, crying out loudly for power.

I am sure the minister knows as well as I do about the researches carried out into the matter of available materials for the creation of energy which exists in the world just now. An American has created a unit known as "Q". This unit is the equivalent of one billion billion British thermal units.

The figures are so vast that I can hardly conceive them, but he has made certain inquiries into the situation and his belief at the moment is that our present world consumption of energy is at the rate of some 20 Q's per century. By the time we come to the year 2,000 he estimates that consumption will be 100 Q's per century, or 100 billion billion b.t.u.'s.

Again, according to this gentleman, the known reserves of fossil energy—that is coal, oil, gas and so on—amount to about 80 Q's. Within a predictable number of years—within 75 years perhaps—we shall have used up all the known fossil reserves of energy in the world. It is therefore highly essential that we start now and examine much more carefully into the possible uses we can make of nuclear energy.

The minister said that it is expensive. I do not for a moment deny that it is. But I do not think we have been spending enough money on this aspect of governmental operations. For instance, two or three years ago there was an accident with regard to the NRX reactor and I believe—and here I am subject to correction—that the expense involved in bringing the NRX reactor back into working trim was taken out of the current budget. If that was so, did it not have an adverse effect upon the research which should have been carried on during these months and years? I think more money ought to be spent in this sort of basic research because it is vitally necessary.

I do not believe that nuclear power is going to be the last word in energy either, because surely it is merely a transition from fossil energy to solar energy of some type or other. Very shortly our whole attention will have to be concentrated upon solar energy because there is only a known quantity of uranium in the world which can be built up, unless we manage to succeed in creating breeder plants, something which has been done in some measure in the United States but which has not yet been done in Canada, apparently, according to what the minister said. I would imagine the next step is to concentrate our efforts on creating a breeder plant. When we do that we shall then be in a position where we can approach those provinces which are especially in need of power and, with the help of the federal government and through public ownership in the provinces concerned, build breeder plants in those provinces in order to give them the power which they need.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I intervene in this discussion merely to deal with one question which has been raised by my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), namely what provision has been made for and what is being discussed in relation to international control of atomic energy.

As the house knows,—indeed it was referred to this afternoon—a proposal was made by President Eisenhower last December by which there would be international co-operation through the United Nations in the peaceful use of and the peaceful progress that might be achieved through atomic energy. That proposal, which visualized a central international agency to which the contributing countries would make available raw material, which might itself construct a reactor for scientific purposes or which might help other countries to build reactors, has been initially discussed between the United States and the U.S.S.R. on a bilateral basis. The other countries chiefly concerned, including Canada, have been informed of the results of those discussions.

At the Geneva conference there was a meeting between the secretary of state of the United States and the foreign minister of the U.S.S.R. at which the reply of the U.S.S.R. was given to the approach made by the United States on this subject. That reply was discouraging in so far as the participation of the Soviet union in this international endeavour was concerned. The question now for consideration is whether those countries who wish to participate in such an international enterprise should go ahead without the U.S.S.R.

This project, however, has nothing to do with the international control of atomic energy for destructive purposes. As my hon. friend knows and as the house knows, that subject has been under discussion for a good many years, beginning back in 1946 when the United States, which then had sole possession of the atomic bomb, made certain proposals which would have brought the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes under international control. Those proposals and others have been discussed from time to time at the United Nations but, as the house knows, no agreement has been possible in respect of them.

As I mentioned in the house last week, at the present time a subcommittee of the disarmament committee of the United Nations is pursuing these discussions in London in private and in restricted session, in the hope that in that way—in view of the developments that have occurred since we first began to consult on this problem; tragic developments indeed if they are used for wrong purposes—this might make possible the kind of progress that we had not yet achieved. As I indicated last week, these discussions are still going on.

I noticed in the press the other day one optimistic statement as to the progress that has been made in London. From my contact with these discussions—and I attended some of the meetings—and from the reports which I have since received, I have not been able to arrive at any such optimistic conclusion. The difficulties have been clarified, but up to the present time at least the gap between the two positions with respect to the international control of atomic energy has not been closed.

All I can say is that while one cannot, I think, be too optimistic, the talks are still going on. If these talks were successful and if an international agreement for the control of atomic energy could be concluded—and we must all hope that it can one day be concluded—any agreement that we have been considering up to the present would not, I think—unless it included provision for international ownership of materials and processes —interfere with national development in this field for constructive purposes. It would merely deal with the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes. But even if you did not have international ownership, such control would require some form of international inspection and control inside national territory in order to make sure that atomic energy was being used for constructive purposes only and that the provisions of the agreement were being carried out. But that kind of inspection and control, and if international ownership were not included in any agreement which we might make, should not interfere with national progress in this field.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If the Minister of Trade and Commerce speaks now, he will close the debate.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank those who have taken part in this debate for their constructive approach to the subject that we have been discussing. It is a subject in which we all take great interest and is one that it is hard to break down into language that is familiar to those who have not been in close contact with the work on atomic energy.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) has raised a few points that I shall try to cover. In the first place I may say that there is no doubt that the amendments we are proposing to the Atomic Energy Control Act diminish the powers and authority of the control board. That is an evolution that I think is logical. Back in 1946 when we passed the act now under discussion control loomed large. We were quite conscious of the fact that plutonium is the substance used for peaceful applications of atomic energy, but it is also the substance used for the manufacture of A-bombs.

At that time knowledge of the production of plutonium was believed to be held in the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, so that control of information, and particularly control of the raw materials from which plutonium is made, seemed very important. At that time it seemed wise to put the experimental work on atomic energy and the production of plutonium at Chalk River under the atomic energy control board. Therefore when we incorporated the operation at Chalk River we placed the stock of the corporation with the atomic energy control board.

The present situation seems to require a different form of organization, a form of organization where all the atomic energy operations, apart from the control functions, are concentrated in a single corporate body. We are still retaining the control functions, and only the control functions, in the atomic energy control board, and it is my thought that in a year or two or three those control functions may no longer be necessary. The basic information about atomic energy is widely disseminated now. Controls that were important three or four years ago are not so important today. However, there are certain controls over the distribution of raw materials and over certain information associated with the production of atomic energy which have not been declassified as yet. Therefore the control functions remain with the control board but the other operations are being assigned to a corporation which will be known as Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

Under Atomic Energy of Canada Limited there will be two divisions, one the raw materials division, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited. Its functions will not be changed, and the only change in the functions of the productive and experimental side will be that the name will be changed to—

Mr. Green: Nuclear Research Limited.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): —Nuclear Research Limited. In the proposed form of organization we are following exactly the pattern of organization in the United States. In the United States all functions associated with atomic energy are centred in the atomic energy commission which is appointed by the President and reports directly to the President. In the United Kingdom there has been a change in the same direction. Recently a corporation has been formed—I am not sure of the name—which will assume full responsibility for experimental and productive functions in the field of atomic energy and will report to a member of the government. I think it will be the president of the privy council of the United Kingdom.

Therefore we are adopting a form which has been found satisfactory to both the United States and Britain, and I think it will be a more workable form than the one we have used over the past seven or eight years. My hon. friend asked whether any United States cabinet minister has powers as extensive as those contemplated under this bill. The exact situation is that the functions have been and are being carried out by the President of the United States without the intervention of a cabinet minister. It is difficult to compare the situation in the United States with the situation in Canada due to the completely different forms of government. In the United States the legislative functions are completely separate from the executive functions. While the President has direct control of the field of atomic energy, he depends on congress to pass the legislation required in that field, and the legislators in their wisdom have established a commission on atomic energy which used to be headed by Senator McMahon. I am not sure who is the chairman now. I think it is Senator Hickenlooper.

That committee reviews the work on atomic energy from time to time and amends the existing legislation as it may decide after receiving the recommendations of the President. I think my hon. friend will know that I have never resisted any desire of the House of Commons to have a committee on atomic energy. My hon. friend and I discussed earlier this session whether we should have a committee this year. I pointed out that the principal reactor at Chalk River was under repair—I am happy to say it is now back in operation—and I suggested that perhaps we might defer the committee until the next session of parliament. If a number of members indicate sufficient interest in the subject to warrant a committee on atomic energy or on research in general, as the committee may decide, at the next session, I would be very happy to agree. I think the committees have been useful in the past, and I think next year will be a very interesting one and one that will warrant the committee's study.

Then the hon. member asked why there are not more producing mines. Mining is a field that requires time for development. The only reason I know that there are not more producing mines is that development has not proceeded in any mine, except Rix-Athabasca, to the point where commercial deliveries can be made. Rix-Athabasca happens to be adjacent to the Eldorado mine in the Yellowknife field.

Mr. Green: Is that Yellowknife?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The Beaverlodge field. It happens to be adjacent to the Eldorado mine at Beaverlodge and is delivering concentrates to the Eldorado mill there. There are others in the same area that in time can do likewise. But if a mine must build its own mill it is confronted with a very expensive and complicated problem of construction. The time element is the only delaying factor that I know of so far as getting into production is concerned. The fact that Eldorado is purchasing ore or concentrates is helpful in that each mine can make a contract with Eldorado for a considerable period, a period certainly sufficient to amortize the cost of getting into production, and has the help of Eldorado in working out technical processes and can obtain such advice as Eldorado can give from its own experience.

My colleague has discussed the other subject raised, the effect of international regulation, and I think that point is cleared up.

Mr. Green: I mentioned the question of the placing of atomic power in the power-short areas of Canada.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. Every effort is being made to interest power authorities and power companies in all parts of Canada in joining in the work at Chalk River. We have been able to induce a number of power companies and commissions to delegate one of their technical men who has joined the staff at Chalk River, and we would welcome more assistance of that kind. We need specialists in a number of fields and we would like to draw them from power companies who themselves can benefit from the knowledge obtained by their experts working at Chalk River.

The purpose of the advisory committee is to include operating men from every power company or commission in Canada. Last fall we had a symposium and invited men from all parts of Canada to attend. I believe those who did attend found it a very interesting session. The purpose of the advisory committee would be to inaugurate nuclear symposiums, and we would assemble the representatives at Chalk River from time to time to take them over the work. The scientists there would explain to them the progress in evaluating the power situation, and keep them posted on the progress being made in that field. Through that advisory committee we will give an opportunity to all parts of Canada to participate in the work.

It is true that the directors of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited were drawn from the two central provinces, although one or two of the directors have interests in other provinces. For instance, Mr. Gaherty is president of the Calgary power company and a director of power companies in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. We chose men that we felt could make an immediate contribution to the work of the commission. If others wish to become interested and demonstrate the fact that they have something to contribute, we would be glad to enlarge the number to make it more representative geographically.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Company.

Mr. MacLean: I notice this clause has the effect of deleting a subparagraph in the present act and substituting a new one that will make the atomic energy control board responsible to the minister, whereas it is now responsible to the privy council committee on research.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps I could clear up that point. The present control board is responsible to the chairman of the privy council committee on research who happens to be at the moment the Minister of Defence Production. There is therefore, no change there.

Mr. MacLean: I realize that there is no change in effect, but I wondered why it was considered wise to use this terminology in defining the minister as the chairman of the privy council committee on scientific research. Would it not be more suitable if that were stated to be the Minister of Trade and Commerce? As I understand it, there is no guarantee that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will remain the chairman of the committee. My point is that in most bills parliament determines what minister will administer the act. This provision has the effect of leaving that to the governor in council when the chairman of the committee on research is appointed.

A situation may arise where the Minister of Fisheries or some other minister who is a member of that committee might be made chairman, and that might require a change in this act. It might be considered more desirable that the Minister of Trade and Commerce remain the minister responsible for this measure. Perhaps I am reading into this some confusion that does not really exist.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, it is the intention to have the chairman of the scientific committee of the privy council to be the minister responsible for this project. We might delegate the job to another minister for a certain period. In any case, if the Prime Minister finds the chairman is not suitable, he can delegate any minister he wishes to handle the situation. The chairmanship of the committee on research does not rotate very quickly. I believe I have been chairman of that committee since the beginning of the war, and perhaps they will let me carry on for a year or two.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Powers of the minister.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Clause 4, paragraph (c) relates to the power to acquire, lease, requisition, and so on, any mines, deposits or claims. Will the minister say just what is being done in the Haliburton district about the prospects there? I ask that because Haliburton adjoins my riding, and in my section miles and miles of property have been staked.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. Of course, that is a purely private enterprise venture. I daresay someone on the staff of atomic energy has some knowledge of the claims, but personally I doubt if sufficient work has been done on the development of claims to really know what they have there. They have good geiger-counter results, but how much development has been done, I do not know. I think it is not very much.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The government will help them as much as possible?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Just the same as any other project.

Mr. Green: Is the policy of the government to acquire mines when they have been proven or to encourage private development?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The purpose is to encourage private development. The government has taken the lead in exploration. It was the government that found Beaverlodge and staked part of it. It is my own view, and I think the view of my associates in atomic energy, that the government will not extend its efforts further in that direction. It prefers to see the work done by private enterprise, and to assist private enterprise in carrying out that work.

Mr. MacLean: I have a question on the previous section. Why has the number of times the board shall meet been reduced from four to three? I suppose it is for the same reason that the change was made in the Research Council Act?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We found it rather difficult to bring the members together. There is really not enough business to warrant four meetings a year. As I said, the duties of the control board are diminishing and it is felt three times a year will be sufficient.

Mr. MacLean: I notice in paragraph (c) of clause 3 the provision is not the same as in the Research Council Act, with regard to new positions. It reads:

> with the approval of the minister, fix the tenure of appointment, the duties and, subject to the approval of the treasury board, the remuneration, of officers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Certain duties of the governor in council have more recently been concentrated with the treasury board, and today matters affecting salaries are dealt with by the treasury board. A reference to the governor in council in connection with salaries means a reference to the treasury board.

Clauses 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): When shall this bill be read a third time? Now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Fraser (Peterborough).]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL RAPIDS POWER DEVELOPMENT ACT

AMENDMENT TO DELETE REFERENCE TO POWER COMMISSION ACT OF ONTARIO

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 460, to amend the International Rapids Power Development Act.

Mr. Green: Would the minister explain this bill?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. On December 12, 1951 the house approved the International Rapids Power Development Act. By section 4 (b) thereof it was provided that for the purpose of constructing, operating and maintaining the works to be undertaken in accordance with the schedule attached to the act—and those were works mentioned and named at that time as 238-242 single stage control scheme St. Lawrence development—the expropriation thereof and compensation arising therefrom would be handled in accordance with the provision of the power commission act of the province of Ontario.

Later an application was made by Ontario to the international joint commission. During the sitting of that commission in Cornwall, at which I was present, some objection was taken by counsel appearing for the various municipalities, and by others, to the legislation as it applied to expropriations in Ontario; whereupon counsel for Ontario undertook to look into the matter and make a statement at the next sitting of the international joint commission. The next sitting of the commission took place at Montreal on July 25, 1952, at which time counsel for the province of Ontario made this statement:

> Although it is a fact that the present legislation has worked satisfactorily in practice to provide just compensation to persons whose property has been taken, used or damaged by the construction, maintenance and operation of power works in Ontario; and although access to the court of appeal from awards for the taking of land has not been challenged, the review mentioned contemplates that it is undesirable, for the purposes of the international joint commission, that several acts requiring interpretation by reference and construction, in relation to these principles, should be before the commission.
> Therefore the legislative review in question is with a view to enacting an entirely new act which will contain these important principles within a single statute.

In effect what counsel said was that the present legislation is contained in several statutes, and must be interpreted by reference. In view of this particular objection it has been decided to enact another statute. That is the statute which is known as the St. Lawrence Development Act, 1952 (No. 2). This is a simple bill, in that all it does is to substitute the words "St. Lawrence Development Act, 1952 (No. 2)" for the words "The Power Commission Act of the Province of Ontario".

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Green: Is there any significance in the changing of the wording of this clause. In the bill it reads:

The provisions of the St. Lawrence Development Act, 1952 (No. 2) of the province of Ontario respecting the expropriation or taking of lands or property for the works have effect as if enacted in this act.

In the statute the clause reads:

The provisions of the Power Commission Act of the province of Ontario with respect to the expropriation or taking of lands or property apply mutatis mutandis to the expropriation or taking of lands or properties for the works, and have effect as if enacted in this act in relation thereto.

It seems to me to mean the same thing, and I am wondering why the form has been changed.

Mr. Chevrier: I inquired from the Department of Justice as to why it was changed, and they said that this is much clearer and more appropriate in the circumstances.

Mr. Knowles: And it is said in fewer words.

Mr. Chevrier: That is so.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Chevrier moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WAR SERVICE GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING TIME LIMIT ON RE-ESTABLISHMENT CREDITS, EXTENDING BENEFITS, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 82, to amend the War Service Grants Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Other persons to whom credit may be made available.

Mr. Green: I believe there were some amendments made to this bill in the special committee on veterans affairs. Would the parliamentary assistant explain what those amendments were?

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Chairman, the only amendment was to section 3 of the bill. The date was changed from January 1, 1957 to January 1, 1960. The amended date brings it in line with the date within which a veteran can apply for and use his re-establishment credit. It was considered by the committee that 1960 was a more appropriate date than 1957. That was the only amendment made in committee.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Time limit for making of adjustments.

Mr. Green: Does the amendment have to be put now?

Mr. Harris: The bill is reported as amended.

Mr. Bennett: I understand the committee reported the bill as amended and, as the amendment does not involve the expenditure of money, that is the correct way of doing it.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITIES

PROVISION FOR EXTENSION TO COMMONWEALTH REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 373, to extend diplomatic immunities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister going to say something in regard to this bill?

Mr. Roch Pinard (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the house will be interested in a brief explanatory statement of the background and purposes of this bill. I shall make reference to the circumstances which led to the government's decision to propose the measure and say something about the legal necessity for enacting such legislation?

It has become apparent in recent years, as a result of constitutional developments within the commonwealth, that an anomaly existed in respect of the status of the diplomatic representatives exchanged between the various countries of the commonwealth. Before 1948 commonwealth high commissioners were generally considered to rank below foreign ambassadors in the diplomatic lists maintained by commonwealth governments. There was some doubt whether high commissioners were entitled to diplomatic privileges. High commissioners, as representatives of the different governments in the commonwealth, were not in reality representatives of foreign sovereigns and consequently, in law if not in practice, were not entitled to the customary immunities which the law accords to the diplomatic agents of foreign states. The commonwealth countries were thus placed in the curious position of affording, at least in law, greater rights to the representatives of foreign countries than to those of commonwealth countries. It seemed, therefore, that as a result of the association in the commonwealth the representatives of commonwealth countries must suffer disadvantages which, however intangible, are not compatible with the close ties of friendship between the governments of the commonwealth.

Since 1948, when at the commonwealth prime ministers' conference it was agreed that the status of high commissioners should be made to conform to that of foreign ambassadors, the various governments have been taking steps in that direction. Diplomatic privileges, such as tax and cusoms exemptions, had before 1948 been accorded to commonwealth representatives. The high commissioner has since then come to be recognized as equal in rank to the ambassador in matters of protocol. High commissioners have been permitted when eligible to assume the position of dean of the diplomatic corps in the various commonwealth countries. By an exchange of telegrams late in 1949 between the various prime ministers concerned it was agreed in principle that legislation should be enacted in each of the commonwealth countries to accord, on a reciprocal basis, diplomatic immunity to commonwealth representatives, thus placing them in the same position under the law in respect of immunities as the diplomatic representatives of foreign states. Such legislation has already been enacted in most of the countries of the commonwealth with the exception of Ceylon and Pakistan where similar legislation is being considered. Because of the reciprocal feature in such legislation and because of the desirability of its aims, the government considers it appropriate to enact a corresponding law in Canada.

I should like to emphasize that this legislation is in no way concerned with the customary diplomatic privileges, such as tax and customs exemptions, which are already enjoyed by ambassadors and high commissioners, alike. It relates solely to immunity from legal process in Canada. It is intended to protect the valid interests of commonwealth governments and to permit their representatives to carry out their proper functions as members of diplomatic and consular missions in Canada.

However, it is important to remember that immunity is not accorded for the benefit of the individual in question, but of the state in whose service he is in order that he may fulfil his official duties with the necessary independence. A person entitled to diplomatic immunity is only immune from legal process and is still expected to comply with the law of the land, criminal and civil. As a matter of practice the conduct of the members of diplomatic missions should be exemplary and the immunity should exist only to preserve the independent function of the missions and to protect them from frivolous proceedings.

The bill before the house provides that commonwealth high commissioners, their official and domestic staffs and their families, and the families of their official staffs, shall be entitled to like immunity from suit and legal process as is accorded to foreign ambassadors, their official suite and family. The bill stipulates, however, that a member of the official or domestic staff who is a citizen of Canada is excluded from immunity except in respect of things done or omitted to be done in the course of the performance of his official duties, and the members of his family are entirely excluded. The bill also provides for the like inviolability of the residence, official permises and official archives of the high commissioner as is enjoyed by foreign ambassadors in this country.

The bill also contemplates the extension of consular immunity to commonwealth officials in Canada who perform duties substantially corresponding to those of foreign consuls. Consular immunity implies immunity from criminal and civil process but only with regard to the performance of official duties; it includes inviolability of official archives. Since it was not possible to foresee all the categories of commonwealth representatives which might be involved in this extension of consular immunity, it was considered preferable to make provision for such extension by proclamation. It is envisaged that such immunity will be extended to commonwealth officials serving in Canada but outside Ottawa, as, for instance, trade commissioners, in which circumstances they might not be considered members of the official staff of their high commissioner in Canada.

No effort has been made in the bill, which is similar to the legislation already in force in Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, to define the diplomatic and consular immunities. All that is said is that the commonwealth representatives are entitled to the like immunities as are accorded to a foreign envoy, or to the members of his official and domestic staff and the families concerned. It would be for the Canadian courts to decide in each case what these "like immunities" should be. The court would probably decide these matters by referring to the customary rules of international law as applied in Canada.

The bill makes provision for reciprocity as between Canada and the other countries of the commonwealth. The Canadian high commissioners and their staffs in most of the commonwealth countries are already accorded the immunities provided for in this bill. Legislation in these countries calls for reciprocal treatment. The remaining commonwealth countries contemplate legislation along similar lines. It is therefore considered desirable, in view of the principle of reciprocity, that parliament should take action now to ensure that commonwealth high commissioners in this country shall be accorded the same treatment which Canadian representatives receive in other commonwealth countries. It is the hope of the minister that the provisions of this bill will commend themselves to all hon. members, for he considers that this measure is non-controversial and this necessary step in the orderly development of relations between members of the commonwealth can be taken with the full and warm approval of all parties.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has reviewed in some degree the situation with regard to the diplomatic and consular immunities that have prevailed for generations as between foreign countries with their representatives in other countries. It is of interest to note he has stated that in 1948 the prime ministers of the various commonwealth countries agreed upon the necessity for this legislation. Similar legislation has been introduced in certain other commonwealth countries. If it were otherwise one might conclude that this was a step in a policy of attrition to remove and diminish commonwealth bonds. However, the agreement among the prime ministers that this legislation or something similar is necessary indicates another step in the gradual and unplanned development of the commonwealth and empire which began with Lord Durham's report and had its culmination in the Statute of Westminster.

It removes a rather anomalous situation, namely that the representatives of the commonwealth did not enjoy this immunity while representatives to other parts of the commonwealth such as would be enjoyed by representatives of foreign countries. It has its statutory background, in so far as foreign countries are concerned, in a statute passed in the reign of Queen Anne when the Russian ambassador at that time was arrested for owing some civil debt and was imprisoned. The result was that ill-feeling sprang up between England and Russia and legislation was passed in order to prevent a situation such as that again arising.

Since the beginning of the first war, and it is interesting to watch this trend, there has been a change in commonwealth relations, gradual, certain, and in some cases profound. Many have felt that these changes would weaken the commonwealth. But in point of fact while the commonwealth has no charter, constitution, or constitutional machinery, these steps which apparently constitute in themselves a weakening of the relationship actually have made for a strengthening in the purpose and unity of the commonwealth.

I agree with the hon. gentleman that this legislation is non-controversial. It is simply the implementation of an agreement among the prime ministers to remove what, on the face of it, was a paradoxical situation for commonwealth representatives. It places commonwealth representatives in an analogous position in so far as freedom from civil or criminal process is concerned as that now applicable to representatives from foreign countries.

While there are a few questions that will be asked when the bill goes into committee, generally speaking I think there will be agreement that this legislation is but one step forward in unifying the commonwealth and in actually bringing together in closer relationship the various parts of the commonwealth while maintaining their freedom under the Statute of Westminster.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all of us in the house are glad to concur in the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman who introduced the bill, when he expressed the hope it would have the warm approval of all groups represented here.

As has been pointed out by the parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pinard), and by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the technical result of this bill is to remove an anomalous or paradoxical situation that has existed with regard to the high commissioners and other representatives among the various member nations that make up our commonwealth. Likewise, as has been pointed out by those who have already spoken, this is another piece of legislation which points to the interesting and unique nature of the commonwealth to which we belong.

It seems to me that the fact that the high commissioners from other commonwealth countries will have the same status as ambassadors from other countries, and the fact that our high commissioners will enjoy that same status in other commonwealth countries, serves to emphasize the independence and autonomy of this nation under the crown now worn by Elizabeth II. It also draws attention to the fact that though we are independent, autonomous nations in every way, we are voluntarily associated together in a commonwealth which is now bound closer together because of its voluntary nature than would be the case if it were on a compulsory basis. We are indeed pleased to give our support to this bill. It is a very simple one, but it is significant; it suggests the march of history, and it gives us the opportunity to express once again our pride in the independence and autonomy of our nation, and also our pride in being a member of the commonwealth of nations, with its many peoples in all parts of the world.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a word or two in respect of this measure. When I first read of it and when it was brought down I noticed the title of the bill and I was rather pleased with it. We in this group have always desired to aid any measure whatsoever which would assist in bringing closer the ties of all the countries of the British commonwealth, and I think the bill does just that.

Now, I must say this, however, and simply to clear my own conscience, although this bill is not on a par altogether with previous measures which have been taken with respect to diplomatic immunity for those travelling to and from Canada. I recall that a few years ago the subject of diplomatic immunity came up with regard to members of the United Nations. We did not oppose that measure or that principle, but I must confess that my conscience was not altogether clear with respect to that matter. As I have said before, I know this measure is not on a par with previous actions taken in regard to diplomatic immunity.

I cannot help feeling a deep responsibility, even though I am only a member of parliament, when we discover that there is growing up in our relationship with other nations, diplomatic representation by embassies and so forth which in reality have become, in some respects, nothing but hotbeds of spies. That is the truth.

I am not saying that such a thing is happening with respect to our own commonwealth countries. We are happy indeed that there is this gentlemanly and brotherly type of relationship between all nations of the commonwealth. These are brotherly ties. Even though some of these nations have been granted their independence in the last few years, nevertheless there is a strange and significant loyalty among all the countries of the commonwealth.

I must once again emphasize the fact that I believe that we can sometimes lean over backwards and go too far in this matter of diplomatic immunity. I know that what I am about to say does not come within the direct purview of this bill, but nevertheless I simply use it as an illustration. Not so long age we read of the happenings in Australia —which were similar to happenings which took place in Canada a few years ago— where one man of the Russian embassy, a high-ranking official, bolted and revealed tremendous truths concerning the operation of that spy ring within Australia, one of our commonwealth countries. You cannot read the first report of that commission which was set up in Australia to study the matter without having your hair almost stand on end when discovering the intrigue and what was happening in diplomatic circles in that country. When we offer these countries all the privileges that diplomats and embassies have, it is indeed shocking to discover that they are being used as centres from which radiate various intricate, clever and powerful rings of spies.

In that first report that was given on the recent Australian revelation it was stated that such things as code messages from Moscow had come in undeveloped films delivered to the embassy in Canberra in the diplomatic pouch. Here is what is meant by diplomatic immunity in the broad sense. These films had come in the diplomatic pouch which was not subject to search. These were films which any agent or official, if he wished, could destroy in an instant by exposing them to the light. That is only one little incident that we glean from that one report. This whole thing emanated from the Russian embassy in Australia.

That sort of thing makes one rather wary concerning going too far in respect of this matter of diplomatic immunity. My own personal view is that when anything of that kind happens, action should be taken such as that which the Australian government took and that diplomatic relations should be broken off with any country that will abuse those privileges. As I said before, I know that that is not going to apply to our commonwealth countries. Nevertheless I use that as an illustration of a vital principle that is involved in matters of diplomatic immunity. Let us be most careful not to lean overboard or to go wild in respect of this matter of diplomatic immunity. As far as this bill is concerned, we are in favour of the measure.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, in order to lay a foundation for the general question of diplomatic and consular immunities, will the parliamentary assistant say what laws now on the statute books provide for immunities of foreign representatives? What is the law in this country with respect to foreign representatives, and particularly what is the statutory law in that respect?

Mr. Pinard: In answer to the hon. gentleman's question I would say that, apart from the legislation which he has himself cited which today forms part of our law, there is no special legislation which will define the immunity privileges which are accorded to foreign envoys. The purpose of this bill is not to create and define the immunity privileges. Such powers as are in existence are under the rules of international law and they are in fact applied by the Canadian courts when a case arises where such an immunity privilege is being claimed by a representative of a foreign nation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it then correct to say that the privileges and inviolability of consular and foreign representatives are fixed under the English statute of Anne's reign and also by international custom?

Mr. Pinard: As I said before, it is by the application of the rules of international law mostly and also, as the hon. gentleman mentioned, it is based on this statute of Queen Anne which was passed, if I remember correctly, in 1708 and which has been considered as part of our legislation here in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the parliamentary assistant say which countries in the commonwealth asked for the adoption of legislation similar to this? Which of the prime ministers asked for this and under what circumstances?

Mr. Pinard: As I have already mentioned, it was the result of negotiations and discussion among the various prime ministers at the commonwealth conference in 1948. I would not say that any one prime minister more than another took the initiative. Rather it was done as a result of the negotiations of the prime ministers together. As I have already said in the statement I made, the only two commonwealth nations that do not have similar legislation but which are contemplating it are Ceylon and Pakistan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When did the United Kingdom government pass analogous legislation?

Mr. Pinard: I am afraid I cannot give that information except to say that it was passed after 1949.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have there been any civil cases in which civil process has been taken against any representative of the commonwealth in the last few years in our own country?

Mr. Pinard: I am informed that there has been no case that has in fact gone before the courts for adjudication. There might have been immunity privileges requested but in fact there was no actual litigation in which such privileges were applied.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Application of act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Subsection 2 of this clause reads as follows:

> The governor general in council may by proclamation designate any commonwealth country . . . as a country in respect of which this act applies.

Is that designed to cover further commonwealths that may be established?

Mr. Pinard: Definitely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Within the commonwealth.

Mr. Pinard: That is the purpose of the section.

Mr. Hansell: I notice that subsection 3 reads as follows:

> Where it appears to the governor in council that a country in respect of which this act applies has, in relation to Canada, failed to accord immunities similar to those provided for by this act, the governor in council may, by proclamation,

(a) declare that this act does not apply in respect of that country—

What would happen if a country now coming within this legislation should abuse its privileges and immunities? What would happen then? I do not want to be an alarmist. I do not want to bring up things that may never happen, but we are dealing now with legislation that will become the law forever and a day as long as it is not repealed. I may be permitting my imagination to run riot but suppose, for instance, one of our commonwealth countries should, in the process of time, be discovered to have a communist regime. Suppose that their diplomats came here and abused their privileges. What would happen in a case like that?

Mr. Pinard: If I understood the hon. member's question correctly, he first referred to abuses being committed by the nation itself and then later in his remarks referred to a particular individual of the mission concerned committing abuses of these privileges. I would qualify my answer by stating that if the abuses were committed by the nation itself in the form mentioned by my hon. friend, in other words, in that they would have a mission in Canada that had been sent here by a communist government which would have been established in that nation, that would become a problem for the government to decide whether or not the regime would be recognized. In so far as the abuse of privileges on the part of an individual is concerned, there is always the recourse of this government asking for the recall of that particular individual from Canada. Such recall is generally sought through the ambassador or, as in this case, through the high commissioner. Of course if a high commissioner is himself involved the recall is brought about by the government of Canada making a formal demand to the nation concerned.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Chief representative.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With respect to the immunities and the inviolability, mention was made by the parliamentary assistant of the question of taxation. What is the position of representatives so far as local taxation is concerned?

Mr. Pinard: I think I have said already that we are not dealing at this time with the tax exemptions or special privileges which are given to representatives of foreign nations by orders in council based on the appropriate legislation under which they are claimed. We are dealing with immunity privileges. In other words, this is an entirely different matter. The tax exemptions have already been accorded under the rules of international law and they are made applicable by order in council under the appropriate legislation under which similar privileges are being requested by representatives of foreign countries. I am trying to make myself clear and to distinguish between exemption from taxation and immunity privileges. It is an altogether different matter. In this case we are simply concerned with immunity from legal process.

We are also concerned of course with the right of the representatives of a mission not to be forced to give evidence in a court of law and also, as I mentioned before, with the inviolability of archives and premises. The tax exemptions to which my hon. friend refers are granted under international law in a different way. It is a totally different matter. In this case we are not concerned with tax exemptions which are granted, as I mentioned before, under international law

Mr. Diefenbaker: Much as I should like to accept my hon. friend's interpretation, it is not in accord with the interpretation given in Ridges' "Constitutional Law of England". At page 301 it sets forth certain privileges and immunities in these words:

Certain privileges and immunities are generally conceded to a diplomatic agent by the foreign state to which he is accredited, and . . . are as follows:

(1) Immunity for himself, his family, and suite from criminal jurisdiction and arrest . . .

(2) Exemption for himself, his family, and suite within certain limits from civil jurisdiction . . .

(3) The diplomatic agent is regarded as being in an ex-territorial position, and therefore his house is free from the territorial jurisdiction, at least in so far as to prevent any interference with the performance of his duties . . .

(4) Diplomatic agents and their property are exempt from taxation . . .

Then it goes on to say:

By courtesy, also, goods intended for their use are exempt from customs duty.

The minister says that the words "like inviolability of residence" do not include taxation. Under the constitutional meaning of that term, as interpreted by the work to which I have made reference, it does include taxation. I again ask the parliamentary assistant this question. Are representatives from the commonwealth entitled to tax exemption in this country? That is a simple question. What is the situation with regard to taxation? To what degree are they in any different position in the matter of taxation from what they would be if they were representatives of foreign countries?

Mr. Pinard: First of all I wish to make a distinction in answer to that question. Section 4 reads as follows:

> A chief representative is entitled to the like immunities from suit and legal process and the like inviolability of residence, official premises and official archives as are accorded to an envoy.

In other words, whatever immunities we are concerned with are those that are mentioned in section 4. It is true also that the word immunities can cover other privileges than those to which we are referring in this bill. I am not trying to be legalistic. I am simply trying to explain to the house, in answer to the hon. gentleman's question, that we are simply concerned solely with the privileges mentioned in this clause 4, that is immunity from suit and legal process. We are not concerned with these other privileges which are derived from the rules of international law and which exempt the representative of a foreign nation, for instance, from taxation on his property.

In this connection I might mention that if a property is owned by a mission, that is by the nation concerned, it is tax exempt. But if the envoy is the personal owner of his property, there is no tax exemption. In other words, the principle applied is that the tax exemption is awarded to the nation the individual represents, and not to the individual himself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do I summarize the position correctly then by saying that a commonwealth representative, in so far as taxation is concerned, will be entitled to the same exemption as if he was an envoy from a foreign state?

Mr. Pinard: Under this bill we are not concerned with these taxation privileges. I cannot possibly give an answer to this question, except to the extent I have mentioned the subject. I think I would be out of order in doing so, just as I think my hon. friend was in asking the question whether or not similar privileges concerning taxation were accorded to envoys in a case such as the one I mentioned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The inviolability of residence includes the inviolability from taxation according to international law. I have simply asked—I do not know why I cannot get a simple answer—if the commonwealth representatives are now accorded equality with foreign representatives in so far as personal rights are concerned? Are they going to receive equal treatment in the matter of taxation?

Mr. Pinard: I just want to add that the immunities that are accorded to the high commissioners under this legislation are none other than those that are accorded already to ambassadors from foreign nations. When my hon. friend says that inviolability of residence includes exemption from taxation, I have a doubt as to whether or not he is right. I would believe it would be difficult for someone having the privilege of inviolability of residence to say, in view of that fact, he is also entitled to exemption from taxation. I do not think it would go as far as that. I do not want to challenge my hon. friend's citation but I would not go as far as that in my interpretation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I am asking is whether representatives from the commonwealth receive the same consideration as foreign representatives receive?

Mr. Pinard: They do.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is why I asked, and I have never seen so many words used in order to say no, if that was the intention.

Mr. Pinard: I have said so.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL THE DECLARATION OF INTENTION

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. 445, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

He said: This bill requires only a very brief explanation, Mr. Speaker. The purpose of it is to do away with the present practice of asking an applicant for citizenship to file a declaration of intention at least one year prior to his application for citizenship. The declaration of intention has been a part of the citizenship procedure since the act was passed in the house in 1946. As a matter of fact, it dates back to a period during the war when, for certain purposes, a declaration was used for the first time.

In our experience it no longer contributes to the procedure in any way and only impedes it, as a matter of fact, to the extent that some candidate for citizenship, having waited five years and having fulfilled the residence requirements, suddenly discovers he has omitted to file a declaration of intention and then must wait a further year before his application can be processed. There is a further matter of cost, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the filing of this declaration by the applicant; it costs the department some money to print these forms, and it costs a staff to maintain them. We have examined the need for the declaration over the past twelve months, and have come to the conclusion it serves no useful purpose. All the inquiries we feel should be made can be made without it.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): The minister's explanation which elaborates somewhat on the explanatory note accompanying the bill seems to provide an adequate justification for the legislative proposal now before us. I cannot really believe that there would be any objection to the proposal to eliminate the necessity of filing a declaration of intention, although I believe we should ask the minister, when we come to the stage when questions may be asked, just what provision the government intends to make for ensuring that the information which might be elicited at the time of filing of the declaration will be adequately elicited later, and to ensure that sufficient precautions will be taken to establish that the applicant is indeed a qualified and suitable applicant. However those are matters of detail and as I say there seems to be no real reason why this proposal should not be adopted.

At this stage I want to point out something which I imagine has occurred to the minister, and that is that the indirect effect of abolishing this requirement of filing a declaration of intention is to remove the only surviving privilege now in existence with respect to those who are British subjects and wish to become Canadian citizens, that is subjects of Her Majesty from other parts of the commonwealth who come to Canada and wish to become Canadian citizens.

Under the present arrangement, everyone who comes to Canada and is a lawfully landed immigrant and wishes to become a Canadian citizen has to wait five years; and this includes British subjects from other parts of the commonwealth. But a British subject does not have to file a declaration of intention. That is the only differentiation made between a British subject who wishes to become a Canadian citizen, and a non-British subject.

When the Canadian Citizenship Act was passed in 1946 we in the official opposition pointed out that in our opinion it did not give due recognition to the one effective approach that exists in the world today to a common or international citizenship brotherhood—the concept of being a subject of Her Majesty in whatever part of the commonwealth one might live. We urged then that persons coming from other parts of the commonwealth should not be specially privileged Canadian citizens, once they had become citizens. And I wish to make that clear, now, that at no time did we urge that we wanted any differentiation between citizens, no matter what their prior citizenship may have been. There should be no difference between Canadian citizens.

But we do think it proper to urge that recognition be given to those coming here from other parts of the commonwealth that enjoy a common loyalty with us, a common way of life and a common concept of democracy and loyalty to Her Majesty. We urged that some extra facility be granted to them by way of a somewhat less formal procedure, if you like, or some diminution of the obstacles placed in the way of their becoming Canadian citizens.

As I have said, the only thing that was done in that regard was in connection with the filing of a declaration of intention. There was that differentiation, in that British subjects were not required to file it. However, now that it is being abolished altogether there will be no mark of recognition whatsoever of the fact that an applicant for Canadian citizenship is already a British subject.

Therefore, while I cannot think of any amendment that would be in order at this stage, and would embody our thoughts so as to put them formally before the house by way of a resolution requiring a vote, I do strongly urge that the minister consider again what was urged in the past, that perhaps the time has now arrived—we think it is long past—when the waiting period for a British subject who is otherwise qualified might be shortened, as compared with the waiting period imposed upon those who do not share that common loyalty, that common concept of citizenship and, in short, do not share with us that family relationship that we like to think all subjects of Her Majesty in other parts of the commonwealth have. Now that this differentiation is being removed, I think it would be highly opportune to bring in concurrent legislation to shorten the waiting period by at least one year, and I see no reason why in connection with British subjects it should not be shortened to a greater extent.

It is perhaps significant that this bill is being considered in the house immediately after a bill to provide diplomatic immunity for representatives from commonwealth countries, on which occasion we have been reminded of that common loyalty we share. In these days when international relationships are increasingly uneasy, anything we can do in this country to remind ourselves and people throughout the world that the British commonwealth of nations is a living and real concept, and that international brotherhood can and does exist, thus making a real contribution toward international good will and good faith, is worth doing. Not only that, but it would demonstrate in a real and practical way that we in Canada, the senior dominion of the commonwealth, are determined that so far as we are concerned this concept of a family relationship between countries of the commonwealth will be preserved and, indeed, strengthened.

It would be but a small gesture if we were to shorten the waiting period with respect to British subjects, and thus demonstrate our real loyalty to that concept. It would not do anything to make a differentiation between citizens, once they became citizens. That is not the idea at all. There would be no distinction between Canadian citizens, whatever their origin. But it would be a gesture which would mean something more than gestures usually mean, particularly in the light of the contribution that the commonwealth could make to international relations. If we were to take a firm stand it would mean that at least we in Canada are going to stand by that commonwealth and see that it means something in fact as well as in theory.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, at this time I should like to ask a question which perhaps the minister would answer later. Has any consideration been given to attaching a photograph to a citizenship certificate?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Shaw: Does a person domiciled in Canada who is Canadian-born and desires to secure his Canadian citizenship certificate have to complete one type of application, while a British subject, who has come from the British Isles and has resided in Canada for five years, has to complete another type of application? Is there a difference in the amount of fee paid in each case? If so, why?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, replying to the last question, there is a difference in the form, but I understand the fee is the same in each case. The form of course in the first instance, where birth is in Canada, is accompanied by a birth certificate; the other recites birth in the British commonwealth.

Then, dealing with the question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough, I would say that the problem of identifying an alien who has become naturalized is dealt with in many different ways in many countries. As my hon. friend knows, we have been granting a certificate which is relatively large, thinking that it would be used only at home as part of a person's papers. From time to time, however, it is suggested that we ought to issue a smaller identification card which would certify that the holder has been granted citizenship. This would be convenient to carry around, especially in this country when one goes across the United States border. In that connection it is also suggested that we ought to have a picture of the naturalized person.

We have been examining the question of a smaller card for, I think, about three years. There are certain difficulties with which I need not trouble the committee; but it will fulfil the need I know in some cases, and if we find that we can do it without excessive cost I think we would. Under those conditions it would be desirable that there should be some identity attached to the card.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): It was suggested by a United States immigration officer that even if the picture were on the back of a small card and the government stamp pushed through so that it could not be taken off it would be sufficient, and it would help them a great deal. They have those large certificates. If it were in a card form so that they would have a much easier time and less questioning of the Canadian citizen it would be an advantage. I might say that the citizenship branch here in Ottawa is certainly very co-operative and I feel they are doing a good job.

Mr. Harris: Thank you.

Mr. Fulton: What investigation is made now at the time of the filing of the declaration of intention? If any substantial investigations as to the qualifications and suitability of the applicant are carried out, what steps will be taken to ensure that the line of prior warning, as it were, will not prejudice the investigation which is normally made?

Mr. Harris: As the committee knows, there is the usual examination by the county judge, but in addition to that, other inquiries are made. We found that those inquiries could be made in the three-month period between the date of the application, during the posting up of the application and the hearing. That, as a matter of fact, is one of the very reasons why we feel justified in abolishing the declaration, because we do not need the time involved in the one-year period. Those inquiries are made locally and in other places, and are usually very thorough and can be relied upon to produce the evidence that is needed to determine whether an applicant should be granted the favour that he asks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister say what was the reason in the first place that the declaration of intention was embodied in the statute? What was the reason that the institution of that requirement was made an obligatory course to be followed?

Mr. Harris: Initially, the declaration of intention followed the pattern of the United States system of having what is known as first papers, which would provide one with a certain status which would give him a claim upon the government of the country in which he lived. As I think hon. members know, in other days anyway if not lately, the taking out of first papers in the United States was considered something that one might very well do almost immediately. This would give him access to opportunities. That I think was the thought behind it, and we carried it forward in the original act with that in mind. We found that that was not necessary in Canada in a larger sense; but by way of explanation I should say that the regulations still provide for the filing of the declaration of intention, and will continue to do so despite the passage of this particular bill. So that if anyone feels that he would like to show anyone in Canada that he has already indicated by affidavit his desire to become a Canadian citizen, that opportunity will be open to him and the department will permit that to be done, believing that if it is in the interest of the applicant it might be granted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What rights, if any, flow from the signing of a declaration of intention? Does it found any right to the protection of Canada in the way of a passport or anything of that kind?

Mr. Harris: The rights and privileges which flow after a declaration and which have flowed in the past few years have been particularly that of being admitted to learned societies and professional agencies so that one might compete in that particular field. Those organizations have indicated that they will accept the immigrant's application for membership if it were shown that he had filed a declaration of intention, and in that way he would not have to wait until he had received full citizenship. As I say, we are protecting that right under the regulations so that there is a direct benefit to certain persons in filing a declaration.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister also answer the rest of the question? Does the signing of the declaration of intention give any rights to passport protection?

Mr. Harris: No. Until they become citizens they travel on the passports of their own home country.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister mind saying whether he sees any objection to the proposal that the waiting period with respect to British subjects might be somewhat reduced? I understand that Australia, for instance, insists on the full five years. I, however, would not accept that as an argument that we should do it because they do it. It might be a good thing if we were to set the pattern in this regard.

Mr. Harris: I have not studied the question lately, but it has been before us regularly since the citizenship act was passed. The reasons for not making a distinction, other than that mentioned by the hon. member earlier, were explained fully by the then secretary of state when he introduced the bill. I think on balance it is not desirable to have among those applying for citizenship any group that would have preferred treatment in the obtaining of it. While undoubtedly British subjects find it easier to qualify, nevertheless it would seem unusual if in a citizenship act you initially set up a class who would be preferred above others. After all, citizenship surely must be equal to all without distinction.

Mr. Churchill: With regard to what the minister has just said I wonder whether he might not reconsider this matter. The hon. member for Kamloops has presented the situation in his usual able manner and has covered the ground very thoroughly, but it is a matter of considerable importance.

I have always wondered why the British subject should have to undergo the same waiting period as anyone else coming to this country. I do not think that we want to make any distinction among immigrants, but the deferring of citizenship rights to a British subject is making a distinction unnecessarily in the wrong quarter. There is, as the hon. member for Kamloops pointed out, the common background, the family background in the commonwealth of nations for those immigrants who come to us in large numbers from the United Kingdom and who are so welcomed.

There is the entire tradition of the British race behind them; there is the common language. The institutions are the same, and they fit so quickly and so readily into the Canadian life that it has always seemed to me to be an unnecessary restriction to impose that limitation of five years. I grant that there may be something said along that other angle that you are setting up a preference in favour of one group of immigrants rather than another, but more serious consideration should be given to this problem.

Our link with the United Kingdom and with members of the commonwealth is so strong that immigrants coming from the commonwealth should surely be received more quickly into Canadian citizenship than is set out according to the technical terms of this act. I think the act has floundered into a technicality and places unnecessary emphasis on this particular feature, and it has put our friends from the United Kingdom in a position in which they should not be placed.

After all, in view of what has been going on in this country over so many years, a country founded by two great races, but certainly receiving a great impetus from those who came from the United Kingdom, and in view of the fact that we did not impose any restrictions or restraint for generations, then I can see no reason why at this particular time, and during the past few years, we should have found means of making a distinction which was not observed in the past with regard to those who came to us from commonwealth countries, and particularly from the United Kingdom.

I think there is a great feeling on the part of the people of Canada that another look should be taken at this particular clause in the act and that it should be revised so that the immigrant coming to us from the British Isles is accepted much more readily and more quickly than is the case at the present time.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Peterborough to the effect that a small card showing Canadian citizenship and identification similar to the birth certificate issued by the province of Ontario should be issued to Canadian citizens so that it could be used for identification purposes any place in the world.

I would also like to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kamloops and the previous speaker to the effect that another look should be taken at the requirements of those coming from commonwealth countries whose tradition of democracy, common language and customs, should not be put in the same category as those who come from countries that are probably not used to our democratic way of life or schooled in our institutions. I think the minister should give the two suggestions very serious consideration.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I certainly support the previous speaker, but I think they should go further in speaking of giving preferential treatment to citizens from other parts of the commonwealth. I think we should probably first concern ourselves with giving even equal treatment to citizens from different parts of the commonwealth.

In this connection I wonder if the minister is in a position to tell us what consideration has been given to a brief recently presented to him on behalf of coloured immigrants from the West Indies. These people often find it impossible to get into Canada much less become citizens when they do arrive here. Is the minister in a position to tell us anything about that situation?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to engage in any discussion on immigration at this point. I am sure the hon. member is incorrect when he states that when they get in they cannot become citizens. Anyone who enters Canada can become a citizen after five years' residence here if he meets the qualifications, and that applies to everyone, including the persons to whom the hon. member referred.

I will, as suggested, give consideration to the representation which has been made. I hope that what I am about to say will not start another debate. I merely want to say to the committee that I was in error when I answered the hon. member for Red Deer. The filing fee for an affidavit or application by a Canadian-born citizen is $1 and $5 for a British subject.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

443. Departmental administration, $1,456,640.

The Deputy Chairman: Resolution No. 443. Hon. members will recall that this resolution can be found at page 59 of the blue book and details on page 509. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I find I have an explanation to make to the committee and an apology as well to certain hon. members. Yesterday there was delivered to me by the chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners the original report on the railway grade crossing fund which matter had been under study by that board for some time. The chief commissioner of the board indicated to me that on May 17 the secretary of the board had delivered to my office a copy of that report, and I am sorry to have to say that I was not aware of this, although I should have been and I must take full responsibility for it. A copy of the report was sent to the translators by my officers and is being stencilled at the moment. During the discussion on my estimates the other day I rose when this matter was under discussion to say that the board had the railway grade crossing fund under study, and because of that I interrupted a number of hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Danforth. However, I think not too much harm followed because the hon. member and many other hon. members succeeded in getting onto Hansard what they intended to say. In any event, if they did not there is a particular item here in the estimates whereon they can discuss it at a later date. Meantime I want to apologize to the hon. member for Danforth and any other hon. members who were inconvenienced by reason of my stating that the grade crossing problem was under discussion and study by the board. At that time it was not under study by the board and I should have known so. I accept the full responsibility for that error.

I would like to add though that the report is a voluminous one, as hon. members can see. I have not had an opportunity to read it and neither have my colleagues, but I propose to ask their permission, when it is translated and stencilled, to table it and circulate copies to members before the end of the session. I do not think it will be possible to act on it at this late date.

Mr. Pallett: I rise at this point to deal with certain matters in my own riding of Peel. Since the minister has mentioned the fact that we have leave to discuss the matter of the grade crossing fund in its general aspect, I should like to avail myself of that opportunity at the present time to deal generally with that fund. It is statutory, and it is proper to deal with it at this time.

With respect to the first matter, I refer to the Malton airport. The minister will perhaps take satisfaction in hearing that we consider it to be one of the finest in the dominion. That is, of course, only proper since Peel is the finest county in the dominion. There is one matter that has arisen fairly recently that I should like to draw to the minister's attention, namely the proposed enlargement of the airport which has resulted in certain filings in the registry office of notices of expropriation and the like. These notices have caused considerable concern to land owners. The concern has been caused not so much by the actual filing of the notices as by the subsequent action resulting therefrom.

I am advised that after the notices were filed some negotiations took place and that subsequently some of the notices were withdrawn and the land use returned to the owners, with certain inconvenience to those owners. I would draw to the minister's attention the fact that that area is a fast developing one and that to turn back to the owners large tracts of land may well result in a rapid residential expansion which may well create a situation similar to that which was created recently around Downsview airport where representations were made by the residents with regard to nuisance and danger to their property and to themselves.

Another aspect of the expropriations is that which has arisen with respect to the owners of small holdings under the Veterans Land Act. There are a number of these owners. I am told that negotiations are going on and I suggest to the minister that he consider the advisability of expediting these negotiations so that the owners of these small holdings may know their immediate position rather quickly in order that they not be asked to expend further sums of money in completing their homes and then perhaps not receive the valuation which they themselves feel their holdings have. I would urge on the minister that this matter be completed rather quickly so that the people will not be left in a state of indecision, as are many of them at the present time.

With respect to the grade crossing fund, may I say that its history is perhaps of interest. I believe it was initiated about 1909, at which time 20 per cent of the total cost of construction was advanced by the government for the elimination of grade crossings. Subsequently, in 1919, this advance was increased to 40 per cent, with no more than $25,000 to be expended on one work. In 1928 the government saw fit to increase the maximum for one work to $100,000. Then in 1950 an amendment provided for increasing the amount to $150,000.

In the county of Peel there are many grade crossings, some of which are active. When I say "active", I mean there are many trains crossing over them, as well as many automobiles and motor trucks. One in particular that has closely paralleled the amendments to the grade crossing fund—and when I say "paralleled" I mean the applications for some relief were made about the time of the amendments.

It is of interest to note the estimated cost of correcting the grade crossing in this one particular instance which is on the Canadian National Railways line from Toronto to Hamilton. It is perhaps one of the busiest stretches of railroad in the Dominion of Canada. In 1910 an application was first made and the estimated cost at that time was $21,000. In 1920 the matter was again reviewed and the estimated cost had risen to $73,000. Applications were again made in 1935, 1948 and 1952. At each of these latter applications, one of the objections raised was the increase in cost. A strong representation was made by the Canadian National Railways that while they did not object to the alleviation of the situation, they thought they should not be asked to pay any of the cost of this particular grade crossing.

The population in that area has increased in the few years since the war; it has doubled. According to the Canadian National Railways the rail travel is supposed to have decreased to some extent since about 1948. However, I would say that at the present time there would be in the neighbourhood of 125 trains travelling easterly along that track each day, and about the same number travelling westerly. In addition, there is a third track or a switching track. I would suggest to the minister that there would be in the neighbourhood of 100 switchings a day. Approximately 7,500 automobiles go over the crossing in a 24-hour period. The problem is a very real one.

The safety feature seems to have been taken care of there by the installation of signals and a gate and a watchman. Consider the time that is lost by travellers in motor cars making over 250 stops per day at that crossing in order to allow the watchman to lower the gates and to raise them. As to the delay, if you take a minute for each crossing —which would be the minimum time, I would suggest—you would have a loss of time to a large number of motorists of over four hours in the 24 hours. I suggest to the minister that in such a busy area that is a considerable loss of time and therefore of money to those people.

There are other grade crossings in the south Peel area. There is one in particular which the Department of National Defence has perhaps assisted in making more dangerous. I refer to the one that is at the junction where the same Canadian National Railways line passes the road known as the first line or Cawthra road. It has taken the name "Cawthra" from a very old family that took the lands in that area by crown grant. The Department of National Defence have purchased part of those lands for a large ordnance warehouse.

This particular grade crossing is not level, as one would normally expect grade crossings to be, but rather has a very sharp incline of the road on the north rising at an angle of about 45 degrees and then a decline at the other side at about the same angle. There is an automatic signal at the crossing which I am told has been known not to work sometimes. I suggest that that is reasonable because on occasion automatic signals do not perform properly. Since the ordnance depot has been constructed there has been a considerable increase in the vehicular traffic over the crossing. It is a narrow crossing that is dangerous to pedestrians, and I suggest that its elimination really deserves the consideration of the government, particularly in view of the fact that the increased hazard has been created by another department of the government.

With respect to the grade crossing fund itself and the elimination of grade crossings generally, having in mind the report that the minister has in his hands, I suggest that some initiative should be taken by the government rather than the municipalities being put in the position of having to make an application each time and of being met with the constant opposition of a railway such as the Canadian National to expending money for the elimination of grade crossings which are dangerous and costly in that they result in a serious loss of time to people in built-up areas.

If the minister should have the pleasure some time of visiting our wonderful county I would invite him to inspect the crossings on Hurontario street. At any time of the day he will see long lines of vehicles waiting to cross this main line of the Canadian National Railways. In many instances I have seen a line of waiting vehicles a mile long. Much time is lost there by people who are busy and the dollars represented by time lost by Canadian citizens would eventually pay for the elimination of that level crossing.

Having regard to the history of applications to have the level crossing eliminated, I suggest to the minister that other steps must be taken in these cases to bring about the elimination of such problems. When people have applied over a period of some forty-two years for the elimination of this crossing their application must have some merit. It is not a case of someone suddenly getting the idea of applying for the elimination of a crossing. There is a history of applications for the elimination of this crossing over a period of forty-two years, but in all instances the board has not granted the request because of the resistance of the railway involved to paying its proper share. I suggest to the minister that consideration might well be given, where it is in the interests of commerce and the travelling public as a whole, to taking the initiative in eliminating such crossings rather than leaving it to the municipalities involved to make application.

There is one further point I should like to make with respect to this line of the Canadian National Railways. A commuter service is provided, and while in the past it may have been adequate I suggest with the increased population in the area and the large number of commuters who live there and work in the city of Toronto serious consideration should be given to improving the service offered both with respect to the number of trains and the type of equipment. I suggest to the minister that having regard to the size of the city of Toronto and the population in the immediate area through which the commuter trains travel the service provided does not compare with that provided for any other city on the North American continent. It seems to be an area that has been forgotten so far as commuter service is concerned. I draw that matter to the minister's attention because I know that having been brought to his attention he will see to it that, in the best interests of the people concerned, some action is taken.

Mr. Hahn: I wish to refer to railway crossings in the city of White Rock. White Rock has British Columbia's safest beach in many respects, and it certainly is one of the finest. Practically every Sunday between 20,000 and 30,000 people go there. However, between Washington avenue in the city itself and the beach there is the Great Northern Railway line. Prior to 1951 there were two crossings from the main street in the city over the railroad to the beach. In 1951 the Great Northern Railway saw fit to change the track and close the crossings. As you can well imagine there was an immediate effect upon the tourist traffic to such a notable area as this beach. The people concerned have made requests on more than one occasion that the railroad crossings be placed there again so that traffic can get to the beach, thus facilitating use of the beach. The Minister of Transport was sent a letter on January 16 of this year embodying that request, and I was wondering whether or not he would like to answer it at this time.

Mr. Montgomery: I am not going to take very long, but I think this is the proper place to bring up this matter. It has to do with the Railway Act, and I believe that the only way that the situation can be rectified is to amend the act. I bring this matter to the minister's attention because it is not so long ago that, rightly or wrongly, I headed off a bunch of petitions that were going to be sent to him with respect to overpasses and underpasses. Under section 265 of the Railway Act I understand that the board of transport commissioners does not consider that these are railway crossings towards which a contribution may be made for the elimination of danger when applications are made by municipal authorities for elimination or widening of underpasses or overpasses.

There is a serious situation in my constituency, and I call it an underpass because the highway goes under the railroad. It was built in the days when there was nothing on the road but the horse and wagon, and it was quite safe then. Now, the highway has been widened on both sides of the railroad, and the underpass is at an angle of, I would say, nearly 45 degrees to the highway. This means that any traffic coming up from the south towards the underpass cannot see the traffic approaching on the other side. I believe the act should be changed so that a portion of the money allotted for the improvement of crossings should be applicable to underpasses. Since there is no authority to do that, there is not much use saying any more.

I believe there are two other dangerous crossings in the province of New Brunswick, and I believe they are underpasses, at which several people have been killed in the past few years. I know the one in the county of Victoria is very dangerous, and we would like to have the minister consider this matter to see whether next year there might be some amendment introduced to the act.

Mr. Chevrier: May I tell the hon. member that the report to which I referred earlier contains a reference to that which I think would meet the hon. member's position.

In answer to the hon. member's earlier question as to the grade crossing in his constituency the position is that, as is done in all of these cases, I referred it to the board for their attention. However, there is nothing the board of transport commissioners can do unless and until there is an application which comes squarely before it. Unless that application has been made either by the municipality or some other public body concerned the board cannot deal with it. Whether or not the application has been made, I do not know, but I can say that I did pass on the representations of the hon. member to the board.

Mr. Quelch: On May 27 the minister stated that he might be able to put something on the record concerning the rates on the movement of grain moving through the Crowsnest pass. Could he do that now?

Mr. Chevrier: Could I put them on at a later date when we come to the discussion of an item concerned with those? It is rather lengthy and I would prefer to do it later if I may.

Mr. MacLean: On April 28, and again on May 4 there was a question asked on the orders of the day concerning the findings of inquiries into the unfortunate air accident that took place at Moose Jaw. On May 5 the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement which is recorded in Hansard on page 4419, and which reads in part as follows:

—an interim report on the Moose Jaw aircraft disaster has now been received by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). Interim reports have also been received by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and by myself as minister responsible for Trans-Canada Air Lines.

At another point the minister stated:

Standing instructions of both the R.C.A.F. and T.C.A. emphasized the necessity for care arising out of the proximity of the airways and the Moose Jaw training establishment.

He also stated:

Nevertheless, a special examination of existing regulations, both civil and military, has been undertaken on a joint basis to ascertain whether changes, particularly in those sections having a bearing on this accident, are required.

I wonder whether the minister is in a position to make a statement as to whether or not final reports of the investigations by the various authorities into this accident are now complete and available? Secondly, what action has been already taken or is contemplated towards making the recurrence of such an accident unlikely? If the minister is not in a position to give an answer now, he could do so later.

Mr. Chevrier: I can give an interim answer now but it would not add, I am sorry to say, a great deal more to what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce earlier. The interim report, as the hon. member knows, has been handed in but the final report is not in our hands. I cannot speak for the R.C.A.F. I do not know what the position is with reference to them. I do know, however, the matter is still under consideration. Until I have a final report, it would be difficult for me to answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. McBain: I should like to take a moment or two to express my appreciation to the minister, and through him to the board of transport commissioners, for the expeditious manner in which the request for a hearing on the Canadian National St. George street railway crossing was dealt with last January. May I also express my appreciation to the hon. member for Middlesex East, who so capably looked after the interests of the constituents of Elgin in this matter.

The railway crossing to which I have referred is on the outskirts of the city of St. Thomas and is located on the brow of a very steep hill. The grade is as high as 16 per cent. I refer specifically to this crossing as one of the many crossings in the county of Elgin. It was in the interests of the travelling public that prior to his sudden death the late C. D. Coyle, who was for many years a member of this house, endeavoured to secure added protection and had made the appointment for the hearing by the board of transport commissioners to which I made reference a few moments ago.

As you drive along the highways of rural Canada you find many crossings with practically no protection except the crossing sign. In fact, in Canada there are 25,000 of these crossings. Only 6·2 per cent of rural crossings in Canada have protective devices, and where those are to be found the most usual type of automatic signal is the flashing lights or bells. Subways and bridges offer complete protection, but there are not many of them. There are subways at only 2 per cent of all rural crossings, and bridges at 1·4 per cent. A few crossings have manually operated gates and a very few have a watchman. This type of protection is scarce because of the high cost of labour.

In the towns and cities nearly 30 per cent of the railway crossings are protected, and the devices used are usually the same as those in the rural areas. Actually, the number of protected crossings, both rural and urban, has kept pace with the increased number of crossings. In the last 30 years some 5,000 new crossings have been added to the total. The main reason why there is not complete protection at every crossing is financial.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I hear some hon. members calling ten o'clock. I am sure that if the hon. member has only a few remarks to make hon. members will bear with him for a few minutes.

Mr. McBain: I shall be very brief.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McBain: While there are now over 32,000 crossings in Canada, the number injured and killed was three times greater in 1950 than in 1920. Since 1920 more deaths and injuries have occurred at rural crossings than urban crossings, and the reverse was the case before 1920. The rapid increase in the number of automobiles has been mainly responsible for this situation. There are over six times as many automobiles on the roads now as there were in 1921. In addition, the greater speed of highway traffic and the increase in the amount of traffic offer extra hazards. As I stated before, only 6·2 per cent of the rural crossings have any protective devices.

In 1950 the number of people killed at rural crossings was 87, and there were 224 injured. There has however been a decrease in the number of accidents in rural areas since 1947, when there were 101 deaths and 306 injured. This may indicate the effectiveness of some of the improvements made at level crossings.

The matter of solving the level crossing problem is not as simple as one might think. It involves the matter of finance, how to divide the cost and how to spend the available money. What kind of protection is needed at railway crossings to prevent accidents? The only sure protection is a bridge or subway. By separating the highway from the railway an overhead bridge or subway does away with level crossings and eliminates the danger of a crash.

[Mr. McBain.]

Then, how effective are the flashing lights, bells and other automatic devices? I understand the board of transport commissioners made a survey of over 1,000 crossings as a check on the kinds of protection and the number of accidents. The results were as follows: Subways and overhead bridges; no accidents. Manually operated gates; some accidents at city and town streets, and provincial highways. Automatic signals, many accidents at city and town streets, some on provincial highways and a few on rural roads. Unprotected; the greatest number of accidents on all kinds of roads, whether urban, rural or provincial highways.

Thus the evidence indicates that automatic signals offer a fair measure of protection on rural roads. On city streets, however, it appears that the traffic is so heavy as to limit the effectiveness of lights and bells. On provincial highways they are also less effective than on secondary country roads. Many of the new provincial highways have no railway crossings at all, as overhead bridge or subways were built as part of the highway scheme.

I do not propose taking up further time, but I would say to the minister that progress is being made on the St. George street crossing to which I referred. I hope we will have the continued support of the minister on that project.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: No. I have something to say.

Mr. Harris: I believe it would be the desire of the committee that this item be carried. If the hon. member is the only other member wishing to speak, perhaps he would do so and then we could adjourn as soon as the item is carried.

Mr. Rowe: Better adjourn now.

The Deputy Chairman: I am entirely in the hands of the committee. Is it the desire of the committee that the hon. member have leave to proceed?

Mr. Hansell: I shall cut my message short, and would not be more than four or five minutes. I do trust I am not out of order in speaking on this particular item. I refer to a certain phase of the crash which took place at Moose Jaw a few weeks ago. After looking through the estimates, this is the only item which seemed to me to offer an opportunity to discuss that subject.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the hon. member? There are at least three other places where he could discuss the subject, particularly that dealing with civil aviation.

Mr. Knowles: Item 480.

Mr. Chevrier: It is item 480, I am told.

Mr. Hansell: All right, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow and Friday we shall take the estimates. I have been doing my best to ascertain the wishes of hon. members opposite, and also to get in some matters for the convenience of the ministers. It does seem, therefore, that first thing tomorrow morning we might take the supplementary estimates of the Secretary of State. Then we would pass on to justice, national revenue, fisheries, the Secretary of State, trade and commerce, legislation, and privy council, in that order. This procedure is subject only to the understanding that to meet the convenience of hon. members opposite national revenue will not be called earlier than Friday morning.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following item was passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

443. Departmental administration, $1,456,640.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 3, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern) presented the second report of the special committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Speaker: I am told that it is not the intention to move concurrence in this report, which is a rather lengthy one. Shall the deputy clerk dispense with the reading of the report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

AERIAL CAMERAS—INADEQUACY OF ANSWER

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, yesterday a question of mine dealing with aerial cameras was answered. The second part of the question reads as follows:

How many aerial cameras were contracted for during the period from January 1, to April 30, 1954, and what was the total value?

The answer given was "nil". In the Financial Post of April 24, 1954 appears a list of contracts awarded by the Department of Defence Production for the first half of March. In that list there appears over $1,500,000 worth of aerial camera contracts awarded to Ernst Leitz (Canada) Limited, Midland. It is very evident that either the officers of the department do not know what they are buying or the answer given to me is misleading. I should like this question to be put back on the order paper.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): If I may give the explanation, either the hon. member or the Financial Post is wrong about the description of the camera contracts placed with Ernst Leitz (Canada) Limited. They are what are known as gun cameras. They operate from the ground or from the air but they are not known as aerial cameras. We go by the definition of the article that we believe to be correct.

[Later:]

Mr. Lennard: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether or not the gun cameras mentioned are the gun cameras on planes for aerial photography and so on?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That may be so; I am not an expert on gun cameras. If my hon. friend would phrase his question so as to ask how many cameras were ordered and ask us to specify the types, we will be glad to give him the information.

QUESTIONS

LONG BRANCH RIFLE RANGE, TORONTO

Mr. Pallett:

1. How many acres are there in what is known as the Long Branch rifle range in the township of Toronto?
2. What buildings, if any, are situated on the ranges?
3. What percentage of the area of land is in fact used for military purposes?
4. Did any active army personnel use the ranges last year?
5. How many reserve army personnel used the ranges during 1953?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. 303 acres of land.

2. A workshop, a magazine, a hose reel shed, a range warden's house, a general mess hall, seven range buildings owned by individual units of the Toronto garrison, two wartime buildings used as emergency married quarters by the army and a number of other wartime buildings used by the city of Toronto as emergency shelters.

3. Approximately 90 per cent. The remainder is occupied by the emergency married quarters and emergency shelter buildings.

4. Yes.

5. Twenty eight different reserve force units used the range during 1953. In addition twenty-five military rifle associations and personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Ontario provincial police and Royal Canadian Army Cadets also frequently used the facilities of the range. Details of numbers of individuals using these ranges are not available.

VETERANS LAND ACT—SMALL HOLDINGS

Mrs. Fairclough:

1. How many veteran small holding establishments are there in Canada, under the Veterans' Land Act, established on parcels of land in excess of one-half acre?
2. What is the total acreage of the said establishments?
3. How many of the total acres of the said establishments were under cultivation and producing crops in 1953?

Mr. Bennett:

1, 2 and 3. Departmental records are not maintained on the basis of the questions asked. However, veterans have been established as small holders under the Veterans Land Act as follows: Under 1 acre, 8,793; including 1 acre up to 2 acres, 4,344; including 2 acres and up to 5 acres, 9,347; including 5 acres up to 25 acres, 3,663; including 25 acres and up, 1,594.

The average size of a small holding is 6.2 acres.

No record of number of acres developed is maintained, but reports on a sample of about half the small holdings show that on nearly 55 per cent of them summer vegetables and fruit are grown and an income sufficient to meet V.L.A. payments is made from the land; while good progress towards similar production is being made on another 35 per cent of holdings.

ISRAEL HALPERIN

Mr. Lennard:

Is the Dr. Israel Halperin who was awarded a fellowship by the Royal Society of Canada, of $4,000, payable out of Canadian government funds, the same Israel Halperin who was charged during the communist spy trials of 1946?

Mr. Pinard:

Yes. Dr. Halperin was acquitted by the court of the charges against him.

The fellowship in question was one of a number awarded annually by the Royal Society of Canada from blocked funds made available to the government of Canada by certain foreign governments in settlement of debts. Portions of these blocked funds have been set aside for scholarships and fellowships, by agreement with the governments concerned. The selection of scholars and fellows is made by and on the sole responsibility of the Royal Society of Canada, which is of course independent of the government.

ROSEHALL NURSERIES LIMITED

Mr. McWilliam:

1. Did Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have any contracts with Rosehall Nurseries Limited, of Brantford, Ontario, prior to June 27, 1949?
2. If so, how many?
3. Where were the contracts performed?
4. What amount of money was involved?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Yes.

2. Ten.

3. Amherst, Arnprior, New Glasgow, Orillia, Ottawa, Stellarton (2 projects), Trenton, N.S., Halifax, Renfrew.

4. $164,494.22.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

D-DAY

TENTH ANNIVERSARY—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO VETERANS VISITING NORMANDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. What steps is the government taking to recognize the tenth anniversary of D-day next Sunday?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs as such and the department as such have not undertaken any steps. It is not customary for the department to undertake steps to commemorate any particular event. This is not the function of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Hees: May I ask the Secretary of State what steps the government is taking to recognize this very important day?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): So far as I am aware, sir, none.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask another question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, of which I have given him notice. What financial assistance, if any, is the government willing to give to the 150 ex-service personnel who are revisiting Normandy on D-day to honour their comrades who died in that campaign?

Mr. Lapointe: As in the past, the Department of Veterans Affairs is not giving any financial assistance in such circumstances. Similar pilgrimages have taken place in the past, and they have always been done on a private basis and have been sponsored by veterans organizations or regimental organizations. The 150 veterans to whom my hon. friend has referred are only a part of the 9,000 or 10,000 Canadians who took part in the Normandy invasion on D-day, and I think my hon. friend will agree that it would be quite impossible for the Department of Veterans Affairs to give financial assistance to every one of those veterans who wished to return on the occasion of the anniversary of the invasion of Normandy. Similarly it would be impossible to give financial assistance to every veteran who wished to visit battlefields on which he has served in the past.

NUMBER OF C.B.C. COMMENTATORS TO COVER ANNIVERSARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. How many C.B.C. commentators are being sent to Europe to cover the tenth anniversary of D-day?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I have not that information, but I can get it.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—REPORTED DESTRUCTION OF FISH BELOW POWER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): May I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources? About a week ago I asked a question concerning the destruction of fish in Banff national park. Is the minister now prepared to give an answer to that question to which I made reference again yesterday?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): We have received a preliminary report from the field, and there are certain aspects of the situation which must still be investigated. I might say, however, that the relatively small number of fish which were destroyed as a result of their passage through the power plant turbines were not game fish and their loss will have no effect on sport fishing in the park.

However, our field officers are presently examining various solutions with the company officials. If any practical means is found of preventing the recurrence of fish losses at the plant, the hon. member may rest assured that we will have the necessary corrective measures carried out.

WATER POLLUTION

DISCHARGE OF OIL BY VESSELS OPERATING ON LAKE ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I should like to make a correction, Mr. Speaker, in an answer I gave yesterday to a question by the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron), having to do with the alleged pollution of lake Ontario waters by oil. I indicated that a reference made to the international joint commission had been extended to cover pollution of certain of the great lakes, including lake Ontario. I find I was in error. The reference to the international joint commission as it now stands covers only certain connecting waters of the great lakes, that is to say St. Mary river from lake Superior to lake Huron, the St. Clair river, lake St. Clair, and Detroit river between lakes Huron and Erie, and the Niagara river between lakes Erie and Ontario.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT—REQUEST FOR FURTHER STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in regard to the South Saskatchewan dam. In view of the offer of the Saskatchewan government to assume $73 million of the $135 million cost in connection therewith, what further elements have to be considered by the federal government before a decision is made to proceed?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The principal element to be considered is whether or not the expenditure of a great many millions of dollars by the nation would be in the national interest.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who is making that determination? Is an investigation taking place at the present time?

Mr. St. Laurent: There have been investigations and I have considered the reports of all those investigations. I have not yet come to the conclusion that I can take the responsibility of recommending this project to parliament, as an undertaking of value to the nation equivalent to its cost to the nation, and I am not going to make any such recommendation until, in my own mind and conscience, I feel it is something that I can honestly do.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): In reference to the same matter, I should like to point out that the $73 million has nothing whatever to do with what the government is considering. The government has been considering the possibility of assisting with the dam. The $73 million has to do with matters which the province would do, no matter who built the dam. If it were there the province undertook to put in all of the plant that is required below for the development of power. They undertook also to take care of all the expenses in connection with the matter of irrigation. It has never been considered that this government would be paying part of that. That is, the $73 million is a matter which the province probably will undertake if the dam is put there.

I should like to say at the same time, as the one who has been perhaps proposing this more ardently than anyone else, that the settlement of the question will not be helped at all by political questions and political speeches put forward in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: A Daniel come to judgment.

Mr. Gardiner: If those who make speeches in the house—

Mr. Knowles: What is this?

Mr. Gardiner: —will recall what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has just said, and all he did say in Regina, that the question at issue is as to whether the completion of this project would be in the interests of Canada as a whole, then speeches along that line would be most helpful. But speeches here to the effect that I said something one time or another are not going to be very helpful,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: —especially when what they say I said I never did say.

Mr. Harkness: You would like to forget what you said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Minister of Agriculture agree with the editorials the other day in the Star-Phœnix and the Regina Leader-Post that excuses are no longer available, that speeches are no longer effective; what the people out there want is action.

Mr. Gardiner: They have had more action out of me than anyone else they have sent down here, including the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Action without results.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Is it not a fact this recent offer by the Saskatchewan government to participate to this extent is the result of negotiations the minister himself has conducted with the Saskatchewan government, and does the minister think it would be in the national interest to complete this dam?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, the discussions which have taken place up to the present time, since this question was discussed a year and a half ago, have been discussions to remove certain things which we indicated would have to be cleared before we could discuss the main question at all. And what was stated in the letter which came forward —and there is no reason why it should be laid on the table, because it has been published in full in the press—is that three of the difficulties raised by this government on April 24, 1953 as standing in the way of considering the main question, one being water rights, and another being the question as to what it was going to cost, and another being whether or not the provincial government was prepared to do these things which make up the $73 million, and do them completely—these three have been cleared by the province and this government by discussion. The one other which is not yet decided is as to the amount that would have to be paid by the province in order to remove any subsidy on account of power, if the project were being considered.

That is the only question which was under discussion at the conference we had on Saturday, April 17. It is suggested by the province that the offer made in this letter of April 28 would provide for that, too. But we, here, are not prepared to accept what was stated as really providing for the removal of that condition. When agreement is reached that all four obstacles are removed the real question of whether we are going to proceed or not will be open for discussion and consideration.

Mr. Coldwell: Do you consider this expenditure is in the national interest?

Mr. Knowles: Answer.

PORK

INQUIRY AS TO EXPORT TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This is really a request for clarification. In view of two different replies which have been received, one in a return in my name, and the other given yesterday to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) will the minister say, with regard to tenders called for the sale of canned pork, whether it was stipulated that these sales should be made outside Canada only, or outside the North American continent?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure which was which, but I will be very glad to consult our records and answer tomorrow.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPRATMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

730. To provide for special expenditure in connection with a commission under the Inquiries Act to inquire into the working of the Patent Act, the Copyright Act, the Industrial Designs Act and other related legislation, $25,000.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, this item asks for the expenditure of $25,000 to provide for the appointment of a commission under the Inquiries Act to inquire into the working of the Patent Act, the Copyright Act, the Industrial Designs Act and other related legislation.

The Secretary of State told us on another occasion, in very general terms, of his intentions to appoint Mr. Justice Ilsley as commissioner. I think it would be of interest to hon. members if he were to expand upon what he said on the earlier occasion. It would be helpful if he would tell us in what respect the acts have been found to be inadequate, and the nature and scope of the inquiry which is proposed to be undertaken by the commissioner.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, when I became Secretary of State there had been under consideration for some time a number of amendments to the Patent Act, one of which was actually introduced at the time I made the announcement in February with respect to the setting up of this commission.

It seemed to me, from such information as I was able to get on the subject—one which I admit, quite frankly, is new to me and with which I am not familiar—that some of these amendments were relatively far-reaching in their scope, and that there also appeared to be some need to consider some of the other procedures.

The matter had been under consideration for some time. After discussion with some of my colleagues, and such informal advice as I was able to get on the subject, it seemed to me it was sufficiently important to warrant an inquiry to find out what would really be the appropriate recasting of this patent legislation, which is very important from the point of view of the future industrial development of this country.

It was also represented to me by officials of the department that the Copyright Act was in considerable need, not merely of amendment but of complete overhaul; that it had not been revised for a good many years, and that many changes in the handling of copyright had developed in the interval. It was pointed out that the act really should be completely overhauled, as is customary in respect of all these pieces of legislation from time to time.

It was also drawn to my attention that the industrial designs act was really quite out of date, and that there had been tremendous development in industrial designs in recent years. Through the national gallery, with the assistance of the Department of Trade and Commerce, an attempt has been made to stimulate and promote industrial design in Canada, instead of relying, as we have in the past, upon work done in the United States, the United Kingdom and elsewhere.

I have no doubt some hon. members have attended the exhibitions which have been held under the aegis of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in the old Laurentian club building in the last two years where, after competitions, the best designs have been selected. A lot of good work has been done here in the field of industrial design, and it is quite obvious that the legislation does need to be considered again, and that it is, in many respects which I will not attempt to enumerate because, quite frankly, I am not competent to do so, inadequate at the moment. That is precisely one of the reasons why it seems to me we should have some competent people to take a real look at these things. I do not think that most of us in the House of Commons would feel that we have sufficient detailed knowledge of these matters to consider new legislation without advice. It would be much better to have a report from really competent people who would hear interested parties and would be able to consider what the public interest really is.

Then, the Trade Marks Act was pretty thoroughly revised at the last session of the last parliament, and is to come into operation on July 1. It is not intended that this proposed commission of inquiry should give detailed consideration to that act. It would be prepared to hear recommendations, if the terms of reference we have in mind are adopted, and incidentally to give consideration to any representations which might be made as to improvements which might be made in that legislation as well. But there is no thought in that case of attempting to go over the whole of the generally excellent work done quite recently by parliament after a great deal of work by very competent people in the field. I do not think I can put in much briefer compass the kind of considerations the government had in mind than I did on February 11 last at page 1995 of Hansard where I said:

> . . . it is the intention of the government within the next few months to establish a public inquiry under the Inquiries Act into the working of the Patent Act, the Copyright Act, the industrial designs act and other related legislation.

Without attempting to give any specific terms of reference, I indicated that the general scope of the inquiry was to ensure:

> . . . that adequate stimulus is being given to inventive and creative talent in Canada; to see that at the same time the public interest is being protected from undue exploitation of property in inventions and ideas.

It is my confident hope that a commission presided over by Chief Justice Ilsley will keep in mind these two considerations: The consideration that we do want to give adequate encouragement to invention and to creativeness in Canada, and at the same time we do not want to create the kind of restrictions and monopolistic practices which will prevent the public from getting a proper benefit from such creativeness and inventiveness. That is about all that I can really usefully say at this stage.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this item presents the possibility of one of the most useful inquiries that could be held. Having regard to the fact that we have as yet no indication of the terms of reference, I feel it is appropriate to make certain comments on the assumption that the terms of reference have not yet been settled. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. Pickersgill: That assumption is quite correct. As a matter of fact it will be recalled, sir, that at the time I had that bill before the house I asked for comments, and the hon. member for Kamloops said there had not been any notice given of this and hon. members would naturally want to think about it. I thought that was a most reasonable view to take. And he said that surely the matter could wait until these estimates came up. I gave an undertaking at that time that the terms of reference would not be settled finally until an opportunity had been given for any hon. member who wished to do so to give his views, and that the government would take into consideration the views that were expressed in drawing up the reference. I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that no final decision has been made, and that the government will welcome any constructive suggestions from any quarter of the house in drawing up the terms of reference.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I was merely asking for information and not in any way challenging the position of the minister in presenting this item for the approval of the committee. I simply wished to be clear that even if there were a draft form of reference at the moment, I was directing remarks with the knowledge of that fact. I do therefore propose to make certain observations in regard to this subject, because the terms of reference under which this inquiry is conducted will, in a very large measure, indicate the pattern in respect of which the government is seeking information.

We have seen immense strides in this country within the past few years. One of the advantages of some accumulation of years is that it does make it possible to review within one's own memory the almost unbelievable changes that have taken place in this country in the past half century. From a country that was largely agricultural, and boasted of the fact that it was, we have become a country that is predominantly industrial in the actual physical production, while at the same time recognizing that agriculture is still the basic industry of this country. This immense change has been based largely upon research, combined with the education received by young Canadians in our public and high schools and in our universities, particularly in the technical branches of those universities.

Within the years that have passed the names of many Canadians have become household words all over the world. That is not confined to industrial research. We all remember the name of Saunders and his effect on agricultural production. We all remember the name of Banting, and millions of people over the world remember it from day to day with a tremendous sense of personal indebtedness. We all know the name of Best and his magnificent contribution to the preservation of blood plasma as well as his participation in the development of insulin. Within recent years we also have seen some remarkable developments in the province of Quebec, under the council that has been established there to encourage new types of ceramic and metal production. There are a number of names that I could mention now that are becoming well known far outside of Canada as a result of that planned activity. I could go on and mention many others in the aircraft industry and in other types of industry whose inventions and names are well known.

Having said all that, I think it is important for us to realize that a great part of our expansion has been the direct result of the impact on our lives of the demands of other nations through two world wars. God forbid that anyone should suggest that wars in themselves have been beneficial in their effect. Certainly that is not my suggestion. Nevertheless, this is the process of history. Other countries have had the same experience in other times. Nations which had exhausted their basic resources, that had a highly-developed skill accumulated throughout long years, found it necessary to look to other lands for those raw materials. In that process those other lands have advanced and in turn have learned how to use the raw material.

In the first world war we suddenly found that we could produce new types of heavy equipment. Our production of guns, of munitions of war and of many of the medical supplies opened new fields of industrial development in this country which after the war were turned to the advantage of our people in employment and in prosperity. Having learned something of our resources through necessity, other countries then turned more and more to Canada after world war I. They not only looked upon us as the source of raw materials but they also brought their industrial plants here and started production here because of cheap power, because of the availability of resources, and because of the fact that we have very satisfactory water routes through which to carry our production to the markets of the world. In addition to that was the fact that being as close as we are to the coal producing areas of the United States we were able to find the industrial fuel in the central parts of the country as well as in the maritimes and in Alberta. Perhaps there may be some measure of regret in connection with that in the maritimes and in Alberta because undoubtedly it is limiting the employment of coal in the central part of Canada because of the greater availability of anthracite and bituminous coal from the mines of the United States which are fairly close to us.

Simply mentioning that indicates the kind of challenge that is presented to us. I am convinced that one of the ways in which to use our great coal resources in this country, and we sometimes forget that today we have the largest known undeveloped coal resources in the world, is to find new processes by which coal can be used for other things than fuel, and also for use as fuel in a liquid form as has been done in other countries.

I recall on different occasions seeing exhibitions in Germany and Czechoslovakia of the really fantastic products made from coal. I recall one exhibit at the world fair in Paris in 1937 which was wholly devoted to products produced from coal. I recall that you could get everything from your hat to your shoes made from coal, and I might add that this was a German exhibit.

Far from those things being ersatz products in the term of contempt in which that word was sometimes used, those products were enduring and had the quality particularly of holding dyes and things of that kind which made many of them more enduring in some cases than other products made with more conventional material. We even found sweetening material being used instead of sugar and that material came from coal.

All these things are merely a hint of the possibilities that exist in the development of our coal resources by applied research. It may be well for us to recall that at the time Britain was regularly winning the Schneider trophy before the war with the fastest piston engine airplanes, the engines were powered by liquid fuel made from coal.

There is a challenge to us to seek new methods of employment of the vast resources of coal in the maritimes and in Alberta, and may I, by way of comment, simply mention the fact that in a number of places in Europe they are developing electric energy from the burning of coal in seams underground, and producing electric energy at costs a little higher than hydroelectric power. That is being carried on today with tremendous success in Russia, Germany, and in Poland. So much for that particular field of research. That is merely a hint, I think, of the wide scope for research of this kind.

But I come back to the fact that in this great development that has taken place in the years during and since the last war we have been very largely the heirs or assigns, or perhaps I should put it the other way and say the assigns or heirs to inventions in the United States, Great Britain, Germany, and other countries. We have been the assigns in the case of the United States and Britain, and we have been the heirs through a process of international legal procedure in the case of Germany, Japan, and some other countries.

Our automobile production, our electrical production, our employment of wood resources, most of these things largely employ at this time the patents and design that have been the result of long years of research and experiment in the United States. But that is only natural. Companies like the Ford Motor Company, General Motors, and Chrysler very naturally make automobiles of the same design and pattern as those which have come off the drafting boards in the United States as a result of research there. In the case of great electrical companies like General Electric, Westinghouse and English Electric, there again we use very largely the patents, designs and research of the parent organizations in the United States and Britain of those companies which have been located in Canada.

There has, of course, been very considerable Canadian development in the field of research. I suggest, however, that here is one field in which Canadians today are challenged to establish their own independence and to follow a new line in industry, in the employment of agricultural production, in the employment of many of our new-found minerals, in the employment of various products used, particularly those used in the employment of our seafood and fresh water food, along different lines than have yet been discovered in any other land. After all, no 15 million people in the world today have the bounty which Providence has placed at our disposal, and the value of that bounty will in large measure be determined by research which will decide the kind of final product that goes to the consumer from these various things.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do speak on this subject in some detail because it happens to be a subject with which I was closely associated not so many years ago. As the minister knows, research in this country is carried on not only in the government field by the national research council, but also by the Ontario research foundation, the research council of Alberta, the British Columbia research council, the research foundation of Nova Scotia, and the specialized research organizations in the province of Quebec where they have been set up in different specialized fields. These organizations have done great work but one of the things I found in my earlier inquiry into this subject at the time I had the responsibility for introducing certain legislation in the Ontario legislature was that there is a great need for information about research, for the pooling of research knowledge, and for the integration of research generally by voluntary efforts based upon readily available information.

Merely to give an example of the almost incredible duplication we found in some cases, I discovered on inquiry that at the time we were setting up a new research group to co-ordinate research there were three different organizations which, unknown to each other, were conducting research into blood diseases then affecting partridge in the province of Ontario. It was fairly extensive research. Of course, it was something that affected the tourist business and the people that were interested in sport. For instance, people making ammunition were interested in there being more partridge; sportsmen were interested in there being more partridge; and the government was interested in the disease which possibly might be contagious and might affect other birds or even animals. As the result of the setting up of this integrating committee, that inquiry was all co-ordinated into one single research activity.

We found other cases of duplication and multiplication in matters that to some might seem to be more important than were the mortal statistics of the partridge population of the province of Ontario. However, this procedure was welcomed. I know that the same experience has been found by the national research council as that found by these other provincial organizations I have mentioned. Mr. Chairman, it is a fact, however, that a great deal of patient and constant educational work needs to be done in this country in order to demonstrate to our manufacturers that co-operation in research is not in conflict with normal healthy competition in most cases but that, in fact, it is to the mutual advantage of all.

What is known as group research—and that is a name that now has special significance—is developing rather slowly in Canada. We have one example of group research in Canada that is a stimulating example of what can be done. It is in the Sarnia field where both the public development in the Polymer plant and the private development in the Dow Chemical plant are associated in an effective partnership along with other new industries that have recently started there and are carrying on very successfully different types of group research.

Canada today is operating in a highly competitive market. We have said that before. We should continue to repeat it. What we face is not merely a competition based upon the skill of the worker, the energy and drive of management or the availability of capital. It is something that is based upon the research which will put in the hands of the ultimate consumer the highest quality product that can come from any particular article. Why is it that today most people concede that Germany produces the best camera equipment? We had some reference to a German company which has recently set up in Canada and which is developing here a new and highly successful industry based upon German research. It is because of their tremendous concentration on research. A large part of the almost unbelievable revival of industrial production in western Germany is the result of the devotion of an extremely large part of their manpower to pure research. As a result, in Germany today there will be seen in the shops articles not only of high quality but of new design and of new uses which are giving many of the producers an advantage in world competition in these days.

I should like to say that, along with group research, we have evidence of what can be achieved by highly specialized research. One of the most remarkable examples in the world—if not perhaps the most remarkable one—of the value of pure research is to be found at the Philips electric plant at Eindhoven in Holland. There, in a country that could be contained within the boundaries of lake Ontario, where a population much smaller than ours occupies that small land area, there is to be found an industrial plant employing more than 30,000 workmen in one place as well as with subsidiary plants in other places. Their world position in the highly competitive field of electrical production, and particularly electronics, has been based on the concentration on pure research.

In Eindhoven alone I found over 2,000 men and women working on nothing but pure research. As a result, they have been years ahead in many new types of production in the electronic and mechanical-electric field and in the heavy electrical production field. It is that factor alone, along with the skill of the workmen, the drive of the management and the availability of markets by seaborne routes, that has given them this tremendous industry in what is such a comparatively small country.

I mention this example to suggest the wide, almost limitless field for inquiry that exists. In this country with our enormous resources, how can we put those raw materials to still greater effect than is now being done in Holland where they must import all their raw materials and yet are able to produce this extraordinary result because of research itself? How can we widen in every way the employment of our agricultural products, of which we have such an abundance? Agricultural chemurgy is today one specialized field of chemical research that needs to be explored in this country in order to find new ways of turning into finished industrial products the enormous food surpluses we normally have. In our competition not only with the United States and Britain but with Germany and Japan as well,—and I would underline Germany and Japan with their high skill and low wages—we must in this competitive world be prepared to meet them on even terms. We can only do that by a process of education and encouragement of research, along with inquiry into practical methods of research.

While I certainly believe in the encouragement of such examples of private research as are to be found in the Philips plant in Eindhoven—yes, are to be found in some of our great wood products industries in this country today—may I suggest that we should also remember that there may be some types of development where, under the national research council or some of the provincial research organizations, pilot plants may well be the answer to the problem. Those pilot plants might be conducted in co-operation with industry or separately, all depending on the particular circumstances. This also is a field of exploration that is before us.

All I have sought to do, Mr. Chairman, is by illustration to express my own belief in the vital importance of research to Canada at this time and to suggest some lines of inquiry which this commission might follow in seeking to place before the government recommendations or legislation that would encourage research throughout Canada.

I want to go back and to say only a few words about one subject I mentioned before. I mentioned what happened in the case of the invention of the jet engine by a young Englishman named Whittle. I recalled that Sir Robert Watson-Watt, the man primarily responsible for the invention of that other great development of the war period, radar, had pointed out that as the result of a certain lack of supervision of patents and through no fault of Whittle, certainly through no lack of loyalty or intense devotion to the British cause, the patent of this new device had become public property. I pointed out that German agents had obtained full drawings of the patent and that actually, although it was a British invention, the Germans had produced jet engines before they were produced in Britain with the result that many of the jets that have been employed by the Russians in the past few years are the direct heirs and descendants of that unfortunate accident.

I say that because we all know that Russian jet development is almost entirely dependent upon the fact that Russia occupied East Germany where the great engine plants had been established to keep them as far away as possible from British, American and Canadian bombing, and that therefore they acquired these plants where they still stood and they absorbed much of the technical skill that was available. I want to repeat that this was not something merely to illustrate caution. That was a tragic incident that has actually increased the danger to the whole world on a scale that we can hardly yet realize. It is likely that those who saw that huge Tupelov bomber fly over Red square a few weeks ago would not have seen such an event for years to come had it not been for the accidental discovery of that patent through the very simple circumstance that it was patented in the ordinary way and became available to German agents who passed it on to their own government.

Along with the inquiry into ways by which we can encourage research, may I most strongly urge that an inquiry also be conducted into the way in which, without in any way limiting the initiative of our people and suppressing inventive development, we may seek to avoid a repetition of that tragic event which has greatly increased the danger to every one of us at this time.

This is a subject perhaps second to none in its importance to the development of Canada. Research at a high level, research such as is applied to industry in Germany, Japan, Holland, the United States and Britain at this time, can expand employment enormously in the use of the resources we possess. This inquiry could well open the door to new stages of development which would mean prosperity to Canada on a scale of which we have hardly yet dreamed.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fulton: Before it carries, if the minister is not going to make any comment on the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, which I rather felt he might do—

Mr. Pickersgill: I was going to wait until I had heard all hon. members.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear the minister indicate that he intends to reply. When he replies I wish he would also cover in brief outline the procedure under which it is intended that this inquiry should operate. Is it intended that the commissioner should sit in various parts of Canada or is it felt that the purpose will be sufficiently served if he sits in Ottawa and invites interested parties either to send written or to make oral representations in Ottawa? Is it proposed that the chief justice should be the sole commissioner, or will he have other commissioners sitting with him? What arrangements are being made for technical and advisory staff? These questions are ones which occur to me concerning which I think the house and the country would be interested in knowing the answers so that it will be as well and as widely understood as possible how those who are interested in this matter should go about making their representations.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I have listened carefully, as I think every other hon. member did, to the most interesting and, for me, in many respects instructive observations made by the Leader of the Opposition. Of course I know that he understands as well as the rest of us that the only way in which this commission of inquiry can promote research is an indirect one. The positive promotion by the federal authorities of research is the responsibility of such organisms as the national research council, the defence research board, the fisheries research council, the various research organizations in the Department of Agriculture, the bureau of mines and a great many other places in the federal government, as well as of provincial agencies and university bodies to which the hon. gentleman referred.

I do think, however, that his contribution was in no sense irrelevant because I think it is most important that the patent law and the law with respect to industrial design should be considered precisely from the points of view the hon. member mentioned. In other words, the primary purpose of having patents, as I conceive it, is not to create or consecrate a particular kind of private property for the benefit of some individual to be used selfishly for his own good; it is primarily to give stimulus to inventiveness because it is believed that such stimulus is in the public interest. To the extent to which our law can be so drafted and administered that it does tend to encourage Canadians to do independent research and encourages them by giving them the benefit of their research, to that extent will the industrial and other developments which are based on that kind of research also benefit.

I do feel, and it is one of the reasons the government felt it was desirable to have a commission of inquiry, that the first and most important consideration in the minds of the commissioners should be how will these laws conduce to the development of this country. I think that the Leader of the Opposition, by emphasizing the points he did—and I shall see that they are drawn to the attention of the commission of inquiry—will give an orientation to the inquiry which will be most helpful.

With respect to the question of maintaining proper security for patents that are of significance from the point of view of the defence of the country, I indicated the other day on the third reading of the bill that was before the house at that time, and I do not think I can indicate any more than that, that the present law does contain about as much protection as anybody has been able to conceive it is possible to put in the law itself. But I will certainly suggest to the commissioners that they should give consideration to any method by which they think the law can be strengthened.

I think the Leader of the Opposition is right in feeling that it is not so much the words of the law as the way that it is administered and the vigilance with which these things are scrutinized to make sure, when an application is made to patent any invention such as the one to which he referred, that before publicity of any kind is given to it it is referred to the proper organization, such as the defence research board, which body can consider its merits and exercise their best judgment as to whether or not it is the kind of thing which requires secrecy for national security reasons.

As to the question of procedure, I have had one or two discussions with Chief Justice Ilsley about the way in which the inquiry will be carried on. I do not think it would be wise to commit the commission in advance by saying that they would not sit anywhere except in Ottawa. Personally I hope it will not be necessary to go anywhere else. I do not feel that this is the kind of inquiry where, in the normal course, it should be necessary to travel about the country. I conceive that the number of people who will wish to make representations will be relatively small, as it is a relatively specialized field. It would probably be quite adequate to provide for hearings here in Ottawa. I do not think it would be wise to limit the commission.

It is not intended that Chief Justice Ilsley should be the sole commissioner. Perhaps I might disclose to the committee that the government has already given consideration to the personnel of the commission and it is intended to ask, in addition to Chief Justice Ilsley, Mr. Guy Favreau, who is a member of the restrictive trade practices commission and Mr. W. W. Buchanan, who is a member of the tariff board, to be commissioners with Chief Justice Ilsley. The reason for the selection of these two gentlemen is that there is an obvious relationship between the fields of patents and copyright on the one hand, and restrictive practices, as well as the administration of customs on the other. It was felt that it would be of benefit to the inquiry to have the particular kind of experience these gentlemen already have in the ordinary occupations in which they are serving, and that their service on this commission would increase their value as public servants when they have completed this work.

Now, as to technical assistance Chief Justice Ilsley is giving some consideration to the kind and extent of technical assistance he will need, apart from such assistance as will be provided by the government through its regular agencies, such as the commissioner of patents—

Mr. Fulton: Whether it is coming from inside or outside, that is what I had in mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: There will be, I believe, a necessity for some other technical assistance, but Chief Justice Ilsley has by no means made up his mind yet as to what he is really going to need. It is my hope and expectation that this inquiry can be set up in the next fortnight or so and begin work immediately. I plan to have some discussions myself with the chief justice, and the officers of my department will be having them as well. Our feeling is that the commission itself will have to decide what it needs, and what it needs it will get.

Perhaps I should say one more word about the amount. This is a real estimate. It is perhaps a "guesstimate", if I may use the language of Time magazine. No one can forecast very accurately, except in relation to previous experience what such a commission will cost.

Mr. Drew: It is not a conservative figure?

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the fact Chief Justice Ilsley is going to preside over this commission I do not think it will be run extravagantly.

Mr. Drew: I assure the minister, Mr. Chairman, that I do not propose to extend my remarks. I am grateful for the indication that he will consider the suggestions that have been made. I wish to add one other suggestion that I omitted because I was speaking without notes on this subject. One subject that I would hope would also be included in the terms of reference, and it is to the scope of the terms of reference that my remarks have been directed, is the assistance that can be given to research, whether it be industrial or agricultural research or other types of research, by such things as tax relief, accelerated depreciation on research equipment and other encouragements of that kind. This step has been taken in Britain and the United States, and more particularly in those European countries that have been encouraging research so strongly in the past few years. I would hope that the terms of reference would specifically call for an inquiry into that type of encouragement of research, so that we could have a digest of the experience of other countries in that field.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I should say one word on that point. It is a point upon which I could not make any commitment without consulting my colleagues because to include subjects of this sort would probably be trespassing upon responsibilities that are not mine. I shall draw the hon. gentleman's remarks to the attention of those of my colleagues who are not here and who are concerned with this suggestion. I shall see that the suggestion is given consideration by the government.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to make one comment on the personnel of the proposed commission, Mr. Chairman, not in any sense to suggest that their qualifications have not been already carefully considered, but just to express the hope that by virtue of setting up this particular commission of inquiry and including upon it a member who is also a member of the restrictive trade practices commission, that it will not unduly limit the scope of that equally important inquiry the restrictive trade practices commission is making into the subject of loss leaders. I am sure that will have been carefully considered, but it is a caution which occurs to me. We are all extremely interested in the protection of the small businessman who is suffering as a result of the loss leader practice now. I would not like to see anything done which would hinder the prosecution of an inquiry into that practice.

I just wondered whether possibly there would not be personnel available elsewhere who might not actually have to come from that commission itself. Has that point been given consideration?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, that point was given careful consideration. I had several consultations with the Minister of Justice about that point and also with Mr. Favreau, as well as with Chief Justice Ilsley. It was felt that priority would have to be given to the primary duties of Mr. Favreau as a member of the restrictive trade practices commission, but that his services were so desirable on other grounds that this inquiry would adapt itself to the exigencies of the other service.

It is not my expectation that it will be possible for this commission to complete its work in time to contemplate any legislation at the next session of parliament. I do not think that would be physically possible, and therefore I do not believe we will be impeding the work of this commission of inquiry in any way by giving the priority I have indicated to the other.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: Is it the desire that I should call items 728 and 729?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, proceed with Justice.

The Chairman: We shall then proceed with the Department of Justice, item No. 162.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

162. Departmental administration (including the former administration of justice—miscellaneous expenditure, including expenses of litigated matters, $427,600.

Mr. Fulton: On this item, Mr. Chairman, I think it is appropriate to raise several matters of a general nature. The one which I have particularly in mind to discuss is the matter of the security screening system in practice for the purpose of ensuring that all those in the public service shall be loyal to Canada and to no other country. There has been considerable discussion of this matter during this session, largely by way of question and answer and also considerable comment on it in the press.

Before I proceed with any general remarks, I should like to ask the minister if he will indicate whether, as a result of any consideration the government may have given following that earlier discussion, there are any substantial changes in the method now being followed or in the government's readiness to give information which previously has been withheld. This might obviate the necessity for any remarks at this time.

Mr. Garson: The answer to my hon. friend's question is no.

Mr. Fulton: Then, I should like to proceed by reviewing in as brief a fashion as I can the discussions that have taken place in the past, and laying before the committee some reasons that I believe indicate there should be a substantial change in the policy of the government, not only with respect to its machinery for carrying out any screening but with respect to its policy of giving information to this country on the results of those efforts.

I state at the outset my opinion that there is an entirely undesirable and unnecessary degree of secrecy surrounding this matter of security within the public service. There can be surely no disagreement on the general principle that, in the light of the revelations made here in 1945 and 1946, and more recently in Australia in connection with the Petrov case, and what we know generally of communist methods, it is essential that industry, government, and all those concerned with the particular or general administration of our affairs should ensure to the maximum possible degree that those who are charged with responsibility in any way in connection with the handling of those affairs should be loyal to Canada, and should not have communist loyalty.

It is on that basis that the security program was set up. I feel also that there would be no disagreement with two other general provisions of the program, the first of which is the desirability of ensuring that the program is as effective as it can be made to accomplish its object of screening out all those as to whose loyalty there is reason for question or doubt. And, along with that, there should be the fulfilment of the desire to ensure that the working of that system is not unfair to those who may come under suspicion. It is in connection with the problem of compromising those two equally desirable objectives, the efficiency of the screening system and its effectiveness, and the preservation of fairness to those who may be subject to review, that the difficulty seems to lie.

I suggest that what has been revealed during the past session, and on earlier occasions, indicates that our system falls down badly under both these headings. The reasons I advance in support of that proposition are those features which have emerged from the discussion of the subject. The first is the unreasonable and, I think, the dangerous refusal of this government to give information as to what results have been achieved by security measures. I wish to be careful not to make any statements which are not based on facts. But here we are left to draw our own conclusions in the realm of fancy, and that is as a result of the government's refusal to give information to which I submit the house and the country are properly entitled.

It is difficult therefore to make statements on the basis of fact. Nevertheless I think we do have to draw such conclusions as it is reasonable to draw from the situation as we find it. And it is as consistent with the government's refusal to give information to draw the conclusion that the results of their system have not been effective as it would be to draw the conclusion that they have been effective. If they have been effective, then I can see no reason why the results should not be made known. Because I submit those results can be made known in a manner which is not unfair to any individual, and which would result in no prejudice either to the private or public interest.

What is the history of this refusal to give information? The government says it cannot be given without prejudice to individuals. Well, so far as this year is concerned, on March 3 I began to ask detailed questions regarding the government's security screening program. It was on that date that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as the Acting Prime Minister, refused that information. The following question, to which an answer was refused, is found at page 2618 of Hansard:

> 1. Since January 1, 1947, how many dominion government employees of all categories have been screened out of their former positions for security reasons in each department, agency, or crown corporation?
> 2. Of these (a) how many have been dismissed from the department, agency or crown corporation in question; (b) how many have been moved to other less sensitive positions?

No name was asked for; not even the identification of a position within a department was asked for. All that was asked was a simple total, broken down by departments, agencies of government or crown corporations. On that occasion the Acting Prime Minister said:

> In my opinion it is not in the public interest to say why people were dismissed from the service, whether it was on security grounds or otherwise.

I submit it is very much in the public interest to know whether people have been dismissed from the public service on security grounds. It is in the public interest, and for two reasons: First, we are entitled to know whether disloyal people have been found in the public service and, if so, what damage may have been done during the period they were in it. Secondly, we are entitled to know how effective government measures are, by which they are seeking to protect the public interest and the loyalty of our public service. How can it be argued that this parliament, which represents the people of Canada, is not entitled to information of that kind, and is not entitled to know whether people have been dismissed from the service on security grounds?

I pointed out to the Acting Prime Minister on that date that the questions as asked would not give the identity of any individual. I am prepared to admit that unless an individual himself seeks to make a public issue of it, and is prepared to have it made public, he is entitled to such protection as he can be given in connection with these security matters. I pointed out to the Acting Prime Minister—the Minister of Trade and Commerce—on that occasion that no individual would be identified by giving an answer to the questions in the form in which they were asked. I pressed him for a reconsideration of his decision. That reconsideration was refused, and the questions were ordered to be dropped.

In the course of that further discussion the Minister of Trade and Commerce used a word, the use of which I cannot believe was other than deliberate, because the question had been under consideration and had appeared on the order paper for some days. He used the word "McCarthyism" in a context which could only have the implication that those who sought to obtain any information whatsoever about this matter were guilty of that particular form of activity. In what I shall have to say a little later I think it will emerge clearly that if there is any "McCarthyism" involved here it rests squarely with the government, and the likelihood of it is made more probable because of the course of action followed by the government itself in connection with its whole program of security screening.

Here, this type of factual information as to the totals of those affected is denied. We do not find that to be the situation in the United States or in Great Britain. I am not referring at all to the particular committee in the United States headed by the senator whose name is so well known to us here. But there are other and more appropriate methods of inquiry being conducted down there by the executive itself, following procedures which I think it might be generally agreed are on a sound and proper basis.

By coincidence, on the very same day that the answers were being refused to the Canadian people, similar information was being made available by the executive of the United States to the people of the United States. I have a report which appeared in the New York Times of March 3. Actually it was given down there the previous day. It was given in Washington on March 2. Here are some examples of the information which the people of the United States are given as to the effectiveness of their security screening program. The article commences:

383 persons were included today in a broadly-defined subversive category among 2,427 security risk separations from government employment during the final seven months of 1953. Philip Young, chairman of the civil service commission, explained to a Senate committee however, that he could not say any or all of the 383 were either communists or subversives.

He said they had "derogatory material of a substantial nature in their personnel file".

Therefore, without identifying anybody the total is given. A little later in the article it indicates that a complete breakdown of the results of their security screening program has also been given. It reported a total of 1,074 dismissals and 1,353 resignations under the security program between May 28 and December 31 last year. Mr. Young gave this breakdown, and the article continues to give other figures. It is a very complete breakdown of a total of over 2,000 cases. That is the type of information that I asked for here in this house on March 3 and was refused by the Canadian government on that day, but which had been given to the United States people just one day before.

Then, in case it is felt that the practice in the United States is coloured by what goes on there under the guise of McCarthyism—although I point out that this was not a McCarthy type of inquiry, this was a careful, cautious, and sensible statement made by the executive, in contrast to the other—but in case it is felt that what is done down there under the present circumstances would not be a safe example, I refer to the practice in Great Britain, where on at least two occasions to my knowledge and I should think probably far more, very complete information has been given as to the results of the government security screening program, as to what has been found, the number of dismissals, and so on. In 1950 information was given out through the British information service as follows:

The number of cases considered by the end of April, 1950 was 86, of which one was because of membership in the fascist party. The following table shows the disposition of the cases considered.

Then, they give a breakdown as to how that whole 86 are made up. It might be interesting to read this into the record:

Transferred to non-secret departments	32
Resigned	5
Exonerated and reinstated	19

That, Mr, Chairman, is a most interesting figure, in view of what I shall have to say under the second general heading of my criticism of the government's security methods; that is, that they do not come up to standard on the point of preserving fairness to the dismissed civil servant because there is no appeal system provided here as there is in the United Kingdom. It is very interesting to note that under their system 19 suspected civil servants were exonerated and reinstated. The breakdown continues:

Dismissed, (including 1 fascist)	7
Retired for health reasons before completion of investigations	1
On special leave, either sub judice or confirmed communists awaiting transfer or dismissal	2

I can see no reason why that sort of information should not be given here. Indeed, there is no reason, there can be no justification, for refusal of similar information in Canada. That was April, 1950. On a later occasion similar information was given in the British House of Commons. Actually, this information came to my attention through a United States newspaper, the Christian Science Monitor, of March 17, 1954, which contained a report reading as follows:

British security investigations have resulted in the dismissal of 24 British civil servants, chancellor of the exchequer Richard Butler told the House of Commons. Another 72 persons have been transferred to other duties, he said.

It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that that statement of 1954 brings more up to date the statement given up to the end of April, 1950.

I have not taken the time to make a detailed check of the British Hansard to find if there were other occasions when these periodic reports on the results and the effectiveness of their security system were made to their house, but I should think it is probably extremely likely. And since what has been said makes perfectly evident that the United Kingdom, which pays as much attention to the question of the security and the dignity of the individual as we do here, finds this factual information as to the total number affected can be given without prejudice to them at all, then there is no justifiable reason whatsoever why the same course should not be followed here.

I have indicated that on March 3 an attempt to get this sort of information was refused by the government. I have indicated that in other jurisdictions that information is given. In case it might be felt that that was an isolated case and that the government would perhaps reconsider it, I made another effort to obtain factual information. The question appeared in Hansard of March 25, 1954 and was answered on March 29. The question was as follows:

On the occasion when the loyalty screening of government employees was first completed, were there any dismissals or transfers, and if so, how many, in the following departments or agencies of government; (a) external affairs; (b) national defence; (c) national research council; (d) Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (both domestic and international services); (e) national film board?

I think it will be agreed, Mr. Chairman, that generally speaking these are very important departments or agencies of government having to deal, as they do, with matters vital to our national defence, or alternatively matters of general informational services where communist leanings or communist loyalties could be most disastrous from the point of view of their effect on the material which goes out over those services. Therefore it is a very important thing for the people of Canada to know how effective has been the result of the government screening in these vital departments. The answer was given by the Prime Minister himself on this occasion as follows:

The only answer I can make is that this government must take the responsibility of refusing to make a public record of the information requested by the question for the reasons given by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Howe) in answering orally a similar question on March 3.

So that the decision of the government remains the same. This information, of a type which is available to the people of the United States and of the United Kingdom, is not to be made available to the Canadian people through their House of Commons. I pointed out immediately to the Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, as you will probably recall, that similar information had been given here on a previous occasion with respect to the national film board. On that occasion, when we asked a question as to how many releases for security reasons had been made from that board we were given the figures. They will be found at page 1343 of Hansard of March 29, 1950 when, after having made a general report on the screening of the national film board, the minister was asked a question as to the numbers released, and he replied as follows:

Perhaps I should tell the house that during the course of the screening there were some 580 odd files examined, and as a result thereof, and for reasons which could be attributed to the security screening, there were three separations from the board.

I also find that on another occasion in 1950 I asked a question as to the number of separations from the national research council for security reasons and I was given the information that two had been thus separated. On that occasion we were given their actual positions on the board. Therefore, back in 1950 there was no objection to answering one or two isolated questions and answering them in more detail than they are now being asked. Yet, in 1954 questions dealing with exactly similar matters in a more general form with less detail are being refused. In 1950 the government was willing to say how many separations had been made from the national film board for security reasons, and in 1954 it is not.

What reason, Mr. Chairman, can there be? What harm was done by information given in 1950, except perhaps to the government? What harm was done to the general interest or welfare which could result in a change of decision? I suggest that we can only draw the conclusion with which we are left, and on the basis of lack of information that conclusion is as logical as any other conclusion can be, namely that the only interest which could suffer is that of the government, and that it is for that reason they do not wish to disclose this information. That is the reason for the change of heart and the change of attitude between 1950 and 1954.

Whatever the reason I submit that the present policy is wrong and unjustified, and indeed is dangerous rather than beneficial to the public interest, because I submit it is dangerous to leave the people of Canada in the dark as to the effectiveness of the government's security screening measures.

Not only are we refused information as to the effectiveness of these measures from the point of view of the number of dismissals which may have resulted, and which would enable us to make some estimate as to whether this screening is being vigorously and successfully pursued, but we are also denied information as to who is carrying it out. The Canadian people are not to be permitted to know the personnel who are in large measure charged with supplying the advice on which a decision is made as to whether a civil servant should be removed. I can think of nothing more important for us to know, and no information to which we are more entitled, than the names of the persons who are in charge of this highly important and in fact vital duty in connection with the protection of the public interest.

But hon. members will recall that when we asked the names of the personnel of the security panel, the security panel which, as I understand it, passes on the more important cases of security investigations, we were told that it is an established and general principle to preserve the anonymity of civil servants serving on interdepartmental committees of this nature. All we are to know is that this panel is made up of senior officers of government departments which are themselves most concerned with security matters. We were not even to know whether the present Secretary of State on a former occasion served on the secretariat of that panel. He was not being asked whether he is a member of the panel now. We asked whether he had formerly been on it. Perhaps the mistake I made was asking whether, if he had been on it, he has now an opportunity to answer officially any questions with relation to the work of the panel, because I can imagine the government saying, "Oh, oh, if we say he was on it then perhaps he will be pressed to give an answer to some questions so we had better hide again behind this cloak of secrecy and simply say we are not going to say whether he was on it or not." Of course, it is a matter of general knowledge that the present Secretary of State was on the secretariat at the time when he—

Mr. Pickersgill: That it not correct.

Mr. Fulton: Well, now we have the answer to my question, Mr. Chairman, and how much and simpler it would have been if the government had said "No" when I asked the question some two or three months ago. Now we have got that information—

Mr. Knowles: We thought he was ubiquitous.

Mr. Fulton: —and it need not have been necessary to take so long to get it. The Secretary of State now indicates he is willing to give some answers to these questions: I hope his attitude will permeate the epidermis of the Minister of Justice and produce in him some reaction and also in the Prime Minister, so that we can perhaps have a realistic approach to this question of security screening and find out some information as to what is going on and who is carrying out this work. Perhaps I may ask the Secretary of State while he is in this answering mood, if he will tell us whether he is on the security panel at the present time?

Mr. Knowles: He is as silent as the Minister of agriculture was a little while ago.

Mr. Fulton: We will leave him to think that one over. The second branch on which I suggest our security screening system falls far short of the desirable standard is that it does not ensure that there will be the maximum possible fairness to the individual who may come under security investigation.

But perhaps, Mr. Chairman, before I go on to that I might mention one other factor in connection with the important point that this house is entitled to information as to who is carrying out this work, and is entitled to know who is serving on the security panel. One of the reasons why we seek this information is that we cannot but help recall with considerable misgiving, when we think about it, the examples of inefficiency in the past with respect to this matter of security in the public service. We think of revelations at the time of the royal commission on espionage when it was made clear to what extent there had been communist infiltration into the public service. That started the matter off. We have to remember that there had been that infiltration and no one in the government knew anything about it.

Then we were further disturbed to learn that, notwithstanding that there had been a notebook turned over by Mr. Gouzenko, showing among others the name of Klaus Fuchs, that matter had not been followed up with the result that Fuchs continued for an appreciable period to turn over to his Russian masters secrets of vital importance to the defence of the free world. Although this name had been in the notebook turned over by Mr. Gouzenko, when I pressed in 1950 for information regarding measures taken to investigate the names of others in the notebook we got answers which are masterpieces as an example of lack of information. They were lengthy, courteous, but completely uninformative as to what was being done to follow up and to make sure that all those with their names in the notebook had been investigated, and that those who could genuinely be suspected with regard to their loyalty had been removed from the public service.

We could obtain no information to satisfy us that the government had acted vigorously under that heading. And I was disturbed to find out just recently, from an answer given to me by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, that although Sam Carr was clearly shown to be involved in this espionage ring and was also shown to have obtained his certificate of naturalization by fraud, that that certificate has not been revoked.

Mr. Harris: Would my hon. friend state the nature of the fraud?

Mr. Fulton: It will be found in the report of the royal commission on espionage that at the time when he made his application for citizenship he said in evidence that he had no loyalty to any country other than Canada, and it was later found that at the very time he made that statement he was engaged in espionage. If the minister cares to read the report of the royal commission with particular reference to Sam Carr he will find very interesting reading showing the extent to which efforts were made to give Carr his citizenship at the very time when he was engaged in espionage.

Mr. Harris: I read the report.

Mr. Fulton: That man is now free to wander about the world with a valid certificate of naturalization giving him all the position—until it is revoked—of a Canadian citizen. But in the answer given to me by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration it is stated clearly that Sam Carr swore an oath or subscribed to a declaration of allegiance. I had better read the question and the answer. The question is as follows:

In order to obtain his certificate of naturalization on March 1, 1945, did Sam Carr swear an oath or subscribe to a declaration of allegiance or make any other form of affirmation of loyalty to His Majesty and to Canada?

The answer is: yes. Well, on March 1, 1945, he was up to his neck in espionage under orders from his Russian masters, yet swearing allegiance to Canada and to His Majesty. The second question was as follows:

Has his grant of naturalization ever been revoked on grounds that it was obtained by false representations or on any other grounds?

The answer is: no. The result is, as I have said, that Sam Carr is now free to produce that certificate which has the effect of enabling him to say "I am a Canadian citizen"—and it has never been revoked—wherever he may go.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I turn to the second ground of criticism of the government's security screening measures, namely, that they have in them all the elements which make them potentially unfair and in fact unfair to civil servants who may be investigated. I would point out that under the Canadian system there exists no right of appeal by any civil servant who may be suspected or who may have been dismissed from his position or transferred to a less sensitive position on security grounds. That fact was made clear in lengthy answers to questions asked in the house and which I need not summarize in detail because I am sure the effect of them will be fresh in the minds of the members of the committee.

It will be recalled that the explanation was given that in arriving at their decisions as to the suitability of a civil servant to continue in his present employment, there were taken into account the associations of that civil servant with others who may be suspected or be known to be disloyal. The explanation was also given that when a decision was being arrived at as to the suitability or otherwise of the civil servant to continue in his employment, he was not confronted, as a general rule, with the statement that he was suspected and was not given an opportunity to clear himself of the suspicion. We therefore have two features. First, we have what can only be called the principle of guilt by association accepted in this method. Second, we have the fact that the man suspected and in effect found guilty and removed from his employment is not given an opportunity to meet the case against him.

When you realize, Mr. Chairman, that those two aspects are present under our screening system, and then remember that the Minister of Trade and Commerce used the word "McCarthyism" as applied to those who were trying to get information on these things on March 3, 1954, I think you will agree with me when I say that, if there is McCarthyism here, you can see where it lies.

There are other and older forms than that one of vile investigating methods—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I think that my hon. friend—and I am sure quite unintentionally—is misrepresenting, or perhaps has not remembered, the explanations which heretofore have been given about the very process which he is purporting to describe.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, indeed I have. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any point of privilege here. I certainly remember them and I am coming to them. I am going to show them to be completely unfounded and groundless.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I should like—

Mr. Fulton: The minister will have an opportunity to reply.

The Chairman: Order. I must hear the minister's question of privilege before I can decide whether or not it is one.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has been complaining, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Drew: What is the point of privilege?

Mr. Garson: I will state my question of privilege if my hon. friend will give me an opportunity to do so. My hon. friend has been complaining that he has had difficulty in getting from the government a description of what takes place in matters of this kind. Yet, in the face of that complaint, he himself goes on to describe what takes places. I suggest he has made it clear that the only source of information he could have for the statements he is making is the information which he obtained from the government. I should like to place on record this correction as to what it was he obtained from us.

Mr. Rowe: There is no question of privilege in that.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Garson: The hon. member is misrepresenting the information he has received from us.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, by what the minister has said already you will see clearly that there is no question of privilege involved in this discussion at all.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Would you not like to have the explanation?

Mr. Fulton: I have told the minister that I am going to deal with some of the so-called explanations and justifications contained in the answers. If the minister thinks I have not completely or fully placed the matter on the record he will have the opportunity to reply.

Mr. Garson: But, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that my hon. friend has made it abundantly clear that any information he possesses is that which he has received from us—indeed his complaint is that he has not been able to get enough information about the matter—I think that he should—and I would say gladly—accept a correction when he is now laying before the house inaccurately information which he received from us.

Mr. Rowe: That is not a question of privilege. It is a speech within a speech.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member is misquoting information which he obtained from the government.

Mr. Fulton: We can read into the record the questions and the answers received. This is not a question of privilege. I will do that if the minister wants me to do so.

The Chairman: If the minister wishes to correct a statement which the hon. member for Kamloops has attributed to him, I think I should hear the minister. On the other hand,—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman,—

The Chairman: Order. On the other hand, if the minister intends to refer to some other matter, then I cannot hold it to be a question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: The answers were given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, not by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: The description which my hon. friend has been purporting to give and has been giving rather inaccurately of what took place was the subject matter—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I rise—

Mr. Garson: May I just finish?

Mr. Drew: —on a point of order.

The Chairman: Order. The minister is on his feet on a question of privilege.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Drew: That is true. But the minister is not the chairman. I rose before Your Honour had sat down.

The Chairman: Order. The Leader of the Opposition should not rise while I am on my feet.

Mr. Drew: That is quite true, Mr. Chairman. I rose on a point of order, and I do not yet know under what rule you can tell what the point of order is before I present it. Are you prepared to hear the point of order?

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Drew: We will leave it until 2.30.

The Chairman: Perhaps we can discuss both the question of privilege and the point of order at 2.30.

Mr. Knowles: Saved by the bell!

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at one o'clock some of the heat which we expect to find soon outside the chamber had apparently made itself apparent inside the chamber. The Minister of Justice had been addressing himself to a question of privilege and the Leader of the Opposition had risen on a point of order. During the luncheon adjournment, I had the opportunity of perusing Hansard, and after such perusal I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to citations 191, 192 and 193 of Beauchesne, third edition. I shall only refer to them briefly. Citation 191 reads in part as follows.

> Only in very aggravated cases, requiring the immediate interposition of the house, will any business be suddenly interrupted.

In citation 192 we find the following:

> A dispute arising between two hon. members as to allegations of facts hardly fulfils the conditions of a privileged question, and, if deemed to be a matter to be at once entertained, it is more convenient to postpone other business rather than extend the area of privilege.

I am of the opinion that perhaps there is not a true question of privilege here and that the hon. member for Kamloops should be allowed to continue. May I point out that under ordinary circumstances the time of the hon. member for Kamloops would have expired at one o'clock, but, owing to the interruption while we were discussing the question of privilege and the point of order, I think he is entitled to at least an additional five minutes.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for the care with which you have considered these matters. I should like to suggest that if you had gone on to citation 193 you might read into the record a reference to "so-called questions of privilege" which I would think would be the category in which this one would fall.

The subject I was dealing with when the minister raised his point was that the procedure the government follows in dealing with these matters of security is such as to open the door to the possibility of unfairness and, indeed, I submit there is inherent in the whole procedure itself an element of unfairness in that a decision will be arrived at in part upon the basis of the associations of the civil servant under suspicion to which that civil servant has no opportunity to answer. It is not only because of the possibility of an adverse decision being arrived at on the basis of association but on the general principle that a man who is suspected is apt to suffer prejudice to himself as a result of the suspicions against him and should have the opportunity to know the case and to answer it. That is inherent in our whole system of justice, and while I do not overlook the point that has been made before that here men are not, in the strict sense, on trial, nevertheless I submit the same principles apply.

There can be no more fundamental right than the right to a livelihood, the right to work, and yet that right is placed in jeopardy and the person apt to lose it has no opportunity even of knowing that his right is placed in jeopardy. A decision is made, is communicated to him and he either has to leave the government service altogether or is transferred to what is called a less sensitive position. That is not the system which is followed in other jurisdictions. There the civil servant is given the fullest opportunity of knowing the nature of the case against him, is asked if he wishes to make any explanation and is afforded the opportunity to make an explanation. There are tribunals set up before which the suspected person can appear and, as I have pointed out in an earlier quotation, in the United Kingdom there has been quite a substantial number of reinstatements as the result of the suspected person being given the opportunity to explain the situation on the basis of which he has come under suspicion and to produce a satisfactory explanation for the associations which he has made or other circumstances which have given rise to the suspicion.

I will conclude at this point, although I shall have more to say at a later stage, by summarizing in this way. There can be no disagreement, I take it, that the government is under the very heavy obligation of ensuring the loyalty of the public service of Canada. However, I have given reasons why I believe that we have no cause to be satisfied at the present time that they are efficiently and vigorously discharging that obligation. We are not given any facts upon which we can base any such conclusion, and I have referred the committee to two or three examples from the past on the basis of which I suggest we have cause for uncertainty and dissatisfaction, because they are examples of past carelessness.

But, on the other hand, we have no assurance that whatever measures they do take are taken with fairness to the individual because, on the basis of the system as outlined by the ministers themselves, there exist these two particular features which carry with them, inevitably and inescapably, the element of unfairness. This element, I submit can be overcome by working out a method of appeal procedure along the lines that have been suggested previously, along lines which are suggested by the setting up of these procedures in other jurisdictions, particularly in the United Kingdom.

Before sitting down there is a correction I should like to make because I do not want to leave a wrong impression. When I was referring to the fact that Sam Carr had not had his certificate of naturalization revoked the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration asked me in the course of my remarks whether it was alleged that Carr had acquired his certificate by fraud. As I recall it, I said that the report of the royal commission indicated that. I do not want to leave the impression that the report of the royal commission states as a fact that Carr acquired his naturalization certificate by fraud. What they do is to make it abundantly clear that at the time when he was granted the certificate in 1945 he was engaged vigorously in espionage activities. It is my own conclusion following from that, and on the basis of the answer that the minister gave to the written question—that he got the certificate on the basis of an allegation of loyalty to Canada and to His Majesty—that obviously he acquired it as the result of a fraudulent declaration.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fulton: I wonder whether the minister has any comments to make on the matter. The minister still refuses to agree that there is justification for giving factual information as to the number of cases thus far dealt with and the disposition of those cases?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I differ from my hon. friend in what he has just said.

Mr. Fulton: For what reasons does the minister differ?

Mr. Garson: For reasons that have been many times explained.

Mr. Casselman: Reasons of secrecy!

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister explain how he can reconcile his position with the fact that in the United Kingdom they give totals and break down the disposition of those totals without naming names—that is not asked for here—without doing any prejudice to the individual? If that can be done there how does it follow that it cannot be done here without giving rise to prejudice against the individual?

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fulton: Is there some difference in human nature between the people of this country and the people in other countries? Is there some factor which would dictate a difference in policy?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Fulton: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I have asked the minister questions which are reasonable and which I think deserve an answer. I have given the background for my questions and they are based on fact. I am not content to have the minister sit silent.

Mr. St. Laurent: I know that the hon. gentleman is just as concerned as we are, Mr. Chairman, about the proper administration of security measures in this country. He asks if there is any difference between human nature in this country and human nature in other countries. I believe that is a rather rhetorical question. Of course there is no difference in human nature in this country and human nature in other countries. It so happens, however, that this government is responsible for the administration of security measures in this country and is not responsible for the administration of security measures in other countries. I am sure that the hon. member is doing his best to serve the interests of his fellow citizens. I hope he would be generous enough to think we too are doing our best.

It may be that we are making mistakes, but we are doing our best to balance this difficult equation between the security of the classified information that has to be available in some branches of the service, and fairness to the individual. The hon. gentleman speaks about there being conviction and of there being exoneration as a result of appeals. I think that is not quite the question. No doubt the right to earn one's living is a right that it is damaging to take from anyone, but there is no inherent right in anyone to enjoy my confidence for confidential services in assisting me in discharging the responsibilities for which I am the one who is responsible to parliament and to the Canadian people.

This matter of reliance upon someone else with respect to confidential relations is not something that is determined on the basis of there being guilt or innocence. It is a matter of appreciation. The hon. gentleman is still exercising a profession that it was my privilege to exercise for a great many years. There is no obligation upon anyone in the community to employ him, any more than there was any obligation upon anyone in the community to employ me. It was only if they had confidence in an individual that they went to him for confidential advice and confidential assistance.

These matters are matters with which it is extremely delicate to deal, and about which we are just as careful as we can be; careful of the feeling that in our selection of confidential assistants we are taking every possible precaution to avoid the divulging of anything that is required to be kept secret. This does not involve only a question of loyalty, but it involves a question of there being solidity of character and discretion in the persons who are placed in that confidential relationship. There cannot be any question of exonerating someone about whom serious and honest doubts exist in the mind of the one who happens to be responsible for whatever is done by that one individual in assisting him in discharging his public responsibilities.

It is not a question of guilt or exoneration. It is a question of the degree of confidence one is prepared to place in an individual. Fortunately there are not many troublesome cases. There are some. The hon. gentleman says that up to 1950 we did disclose the numbers. There were two occasions when that was done, as the hon. member knows. There was a great and rather general anxiety about the film board in 1949 and 1950, to such an extent that the Department of National Defence was not entrusting its classified films to the film board. It was decided, therefore, that there would be a thorough screening of everyone in the film board.

When the minister made his report to parliament I believe he said some 580 files had been carefully scrutinized, and there had been a few separations from the board required as a result of that incident. He did say then for the purpose of satisfying the public that there was not anything very serious the matter with the film board; that only three out of 580 odd had been found to be such that their separation from the board was required in order to restore full confidence in the security of information that might be imparted by work entrusted to the film board.

Then there was another question that came up a short time afterwards as to the number who had been separated for security reasons from the national research council. There was no reason whatever to refrain from giving that information. There were only two, and they had been prosecuted and convicted. Those were facts that already were public. We were very happy to be able to say there were no others. I would be very happy if I could say that since that time there have been no others anywhere in the public service, but I am not in a position to say that. There have not been very many in the civil service. There have been quite a number who had been enrolled in the armed services without having been screened, and when they were screened were found to be persons that it was felt preferable not to have in the armed forces. But in the civilian departments of government there have not been very many. There have been many cases of consideration as to whether someone who was not in a confidential relationship, not in a position where he had access to classified material should be placed in such a position. But that is something about which no statistics can be maintained.

If there is any doubt at all about the advisability of putting someone into a confidential relationship who has not had that relationship before—well, nothing happens. I have been quite concerned about this, and I have tried to get information—

Mr. Fulton: I hope you do not have the same difficulty I have had.

Mr. St. Laurent: As a matter of fact I did have some difficulty, but perhaps not for the same reason. I did have some difficulty because there has been no compilation made of those who have been either not transferred to some other position because there was some doubt about them or those who have been transferred to some other position because there was some uneasiness about the possibility of their divulging information, either through motives of disloyalty or other reasons for possible indiscretions.

There has been no tabulation kept of that. I can understand that where they have a system regarding this as some kind of trial which has to take place before some kind of special board, there may be exact mathematical computations of the number of cases that come before that board, and there is possible a mathematical determination of what proportion is dealt with in one way and what proportion is dealt with in another way. Rightly or wrongly we have not felt that that was desirable, unless there is something that appears to us to justify a conviction. We try to avoid the possibility of leaks, without there being anything concretely determined about it.

There can be all sorts of examples. There is no guilt by association; but sometimes there is information about association that does disturb us. It is unfortunate, but I think we have to assume that there are efforts made by foreign powers to obtain through their espionage or intelligence services information that we think they should not have. And we have to be on our guard against the possibility of their furthering their purposes.

Are our measures fully effective? No one could say that, except those to whom these possible agents or others would make their reports; and we cannot get information from them. But we do assume that they are making efforts to get this kind of information, and we feel that we have to be on our guard. There are personal files for all those who are in any confidential capacity, and all sorts of information becomes available and has to be considered. And whenever there is anything that appears to be derogatory in any way, because of character, because of the possible susceptibility to blackmail and because of social contacts, well, we have to appraise all that.

Fortunately it does not often make us feel that our responsibility requires action, and there has not been any case where we have been put in possession of material that would justify prosecution, though there have been some bits of information that might have been sufficient to make a case. But that would require disclosing the sources from which this information was obtained; and I think that that would be very detrimental to our counter-intelligence activities. I think that it is very necessary for all our counter-intelligence activities that they be not publicized. They have to be secret in order to be effective.

Now, we did give serious consideration to the possibility of having some kind of appeal, and we came to the conclusion that we were better able to discharge our responsibility in that regard under the present system. We never refuse to reconsider a question; but we endeavour to exhaust everything that would be available on any kind of appeal, except, of course, saying to the individual, "I am sorry, but I feel that I can no longer rely upon you because of such and such a thing. What have you got to say?" That we have not felt would be the proper procedure, because that would make it an accusation, and we are not accusing anyone; any more than I felt I was being accused when someone who had been my client went to some other lawyer. I felt that it was his business to place his confidence wherever he considered he should do so. This matter of confidence in the reliability of others is not something that can be decided as a result of a trial. We have to be honest with others, but we have also to be honest with ourselves. And we try to keep ourselves surrounded by persons in whom individually we have implicit confidence.

With respect to unfairness about others, we are extremely cautious, even when it is possible to find some less sensitive position worth as much money. Because it may well be that if someone is taken out of a line of service for which he prepared himself, and which he intended to make his career, though he may get the same remuneration in some other job, it is still unfortunate to have to do anything like that. And we do our best to be fair. I do not think the hon. member, or any other member of parliament, has heard of any concrete case where unfairness was actually experienced, or where one felt that unfairness had been imposed upon any individual. Perhaps the hon. gentleman feels that the whole system is unfair; but the hon. gentleman must realize that it is not easy to maintain that balance. We may be wrong, but we do not think it would be better maintained by setting up any established and recognized security board to make decisions.

The hon. member has spoken about a security panel, and asked whether the Secretary of State was a member of it.

Mr. Fulton: Of the secretariat.

Mr. St. Laurent: He asked if the Secretary of State had been secretary, and he said he had not been. The hon. member asked if the Secretary of State was still a member of the board. I think it has been made clear in the former statements that have been made here that this panel is an interdepartmental committee of officials. There is no member of the government on the panel, and there is no requirement that whatever anxiety any minister or deputy minister may have about any individual shall go to the panel. It is the minister and the deputy minister who are responsible for the department.

They sometimes have recourse to the panel for the purpose of securing advice of those we have implicit confidence in because of the positions they occupy in the service, and the experience we have had with them while they were in the service. The declarations that have been made show, in a general way, how that interdepartmental committee is made up, and I do not think that the hon. gentleman feels there would be anything of value in disclosing at any particular moment the names of the officials who happened at that time to be members of the panel. They make no decisions; they simply tender advice and of course they do not deal only with the screening of individuals. They deal with the many and varied aspects of our counter-intelligence service and consider and advise on the sufficiency of the measures that are taken with respect to those matters. I think that our efforts for the protection of the secrecy of our classified material have been successful. That of course is a matter of opinion because we were quite as surprised as anyone could be at the revelations which took place in 1945.

We have been possibly more careful, but we cannot be sure that, careful as we have been, we have been 100 per cent successful. That is something about which we cannot have accurate information. If we were to attempt to state figures we would have to go through a very large number of files, because there are many occasions where the possibility of indiscretion, the possibility of there being disloyalty, is one factor about which we are perhaps a little bit uncertain, but there develops some other obvious and plausible reasons for a change, and the change is made and made with all the appearance as having been made for other than security anxieties. I am not saying that we falsely represent, even to ourselves, why the change is being made, but this other situation is such that the change would probably be made anyway, and because we have not been too happy over the situation, a change will be made.

How would that be classified? Just as an illustration—I do not think it fits any case, so I can perhaps use it—suppose there is the case of a young office boy who is used for the purpose of delivering packets, and the question arises as to whether he could be used for the delivery of packets that would contain classified material. A special screening is made. Well, suppose it develops that we find that unfortunately there had been occasions where there had been pilfering. Well, he certainly would not get the job that would put him in a position where he could have in his possession classified material. Would that be a security case, or would it be otherwise counted?

The statement of a certain number of figures would certainly not mean anything unless we were able to elaborate and to describe the cases to which these figures applied. In the two instances that the hon. gentleman referred to the situation was quite different. There was no possible objection and no possible reason for not disclosing them. There had been two employees of the national research council who had been prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act, had been found guilty and had been dismissed.

The hon. gentleman proceeds from the same premises that we proceed from. The system should be efficient in protecting the secrecy of what should be kept secret. It should be such as not to be unfair to individuals about whom any decision has to be made. It is in the application of those principles that the hon. gentleman feels there would be advantage in more publicity. We do not think that is so. I do not think the hon. gentleman really believes that we are refraining from making disclosures because we feel it would be embarrassing to the government. I do not see how it could be embarrassing to the government unless we were compelled to disclose that we are taking the kind of risks that we are unwilling to take. It certainly would be embarrassing to have to admit that we were taking calculated risks in a matter susceptible to such consequences as the maintaining of proper security of classified material.

It must not be overlooked, you know, that we belong to the NATO organization, and that we exchange a lot of classified information with our allies. Even if we could take the responsibility of calculated risks for ourselves, we certainly could not take any responsibility for calculated risks for classified information coming from other sources, or we would very soon cease getting that classified information. That does not mean that our affairs are being run by others, but it does mean that we assure our allies that we take every possible precaution and that we do not consider that everyone who has not been convicted is entitled to be trusted with this confidential information.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member for Kamloops will permit me, I interjected something when he was speaking this morning which may have been misleading. I have not had any connection with the secretariat of the security panel, but I was, as I think is quite notorious, the chairman of the security panel for something over a year.

Mr. Fulton: We are grateful to the Secretary of State for giving us information which was refused on a former occasion.

I appreciate the attitude of the Prime Minister and the careful way in which he has dealt with this matter. I agree the whole question is one of great concern, one which we should try to handle on the basis that it is of equal concern to all of us. If in a matter of this kind there are objections and differences of opinion then the objections can best be met and the differences can best be resolved with benefit to the nation by being discussed, with moderation on either side.

I am therefore glad the Prime Minister has taken this occasion to place before us so clearly those considerations which influence the government in deciding to continue unmodified, so far at any rate, its course of policy in dealing with this matter, so that they can be discussed fully.

There are one or two statements which the Prime Minister has made which indicate that we on this side have not perhaps made clear our approach to the matter and our suggestion as to how it may be dealt with. I hope we can make our views clear and the government will then be willing to reconsider again whether there is not some merit for what we say and some justification therefore on their part for modifying the present procedure.

The Prime Minister has based his case on the principle in part that no one has an absolute right to employment, particularly in a position with security implications. He has drawn a parallel between the employment of a civil servant and the retention by a client of a solicitor. He has pointed out that no solicitor has a right to continue to be retained by a client by whom he has been retained on a previous occasion. But, with respect, I do not think the parallel is apt.

The civil servant has made a choice which involves many sacrifices. We have always agreed, in the past at any rate, that remuneration in the public service is not on the same level generally speaking with remuneration in private employment. It is true they have some recompense for that. There is what we call security of tenure, and there used to be some pension privileges which did not exist in private employment. The civil servant has therefore made his choice and embarked on a career; he is committed to a course. I know the Prime Minister did not intend that his analogy should be taken too literally and I do not wish to emphasize the point too much, but I think there is a very wide difference between the matter of selection which is exercised each time a client chooses a solicitor, and the permanence of the choice made by a civil servant. While I agree in strict fact that he has no irrevocable right to be continued in that employment, we on this side maintain he cannot be removed from that employment without the strictest proof possible that he is no longer qualified to continue in that employment.

Now, if that be the case—and that seems to me to be a matter of simple justice, on the basis of good relations alone, if you like, between the two sides—it seems to me that you cannot lightly dispense with the services of a man—though I am not suggesting it is done—who has dedicated himself to the public service and has perhaps been there for ten years. The problem therefore seems to me to be one of approach and we would place more emphasis on the necessity of maintaining that person in the public service, not up to the point where the public interest is going to be prejudiced, but simply as to where suspicion as to his suitability has been aroused so that the process of exhausting every possibility in his defence will be thoroughly carried out; so that that man may be given an opportunity to explain his position; after which the decision and the ultimate responsibility will have to be exercised.

The Prime Minister has stated that it may be that I take objection to this system on the basis that it is inherently unfair. It is true that I do so in part, and I think it could be made less inherently unfair. But I also take objection to it on the basis of the experience of one case within my knowledge where there was unfairness, and another case where, I admit, I have nothing but suspicion to go on, but it appears to me to be very suspicious. In the first case, the man involved does not even know the case against him. It is only by reason of a lengthy discussion with him myself that we have decided that it must be on grounds of security. We could be wrong, but in my opinion the conclusion is inescapable, though he has not been told that he was under suspicion in connection with security. He was not brought in and interviewed and told that certain facts seemed to require an explanation.

He has given me an explanation which seems to me to meet the situation and with which any reasonable person would be satisfied. He was not a highly placed civil servant in charge of confidential work, and in fact I think it would be fair to describe him as a rather junior employee. No reason was given to him for his services being dispensed with and he cannot go to another employer without references. One can imagine what would happen. "Where did you last work? Why did you leave?" He would have to answer: "I do not know. They told me my services were no longer required."

That man has a choice. He has, I suppose, a right to make a public issue of the matter and bring his name before the public and let it be known that he fell under suspicion because of certain activities with a security implication. He says he thinks he can explain the matter and indeed he is convinced he can explain it satisfactorily, namely, that the association which previously existed no longer exists, and did not exist, incidentally, at the time his services were dispensed with. He can do that, or he can accept the situation because there is no procedure by which he can appeal, no procedure by which he can bring his case before the authorities and have a hearing before the authorities in person.

It is my desire, while still emphasizing the necessity of taking these measures which will protect the security of the public service, to work out a procedure within that general aim which will satisfy us as being as fair as it can be so that we can say to those who apply these security tests that they can be rigorously and vigorously employed because we have protected the individual, given him a fair hearing, and they can now go ahead and apply the policy as vigorously as they wish. I am not suggesting that any board be set up which would in itself make a decision. I am prepared to go along, at the moment at any rate, with the Prime Minister when he said on a former occasion that the ultimate decision as to whether a man is suitable must rest with the government. I am prepared to go along with the view that theirs is the responsibility; but I think there should be something in the nature of an intermediate board before which hearings could be held and to which a man would have an opportunity to state his case. That board could pass on its findings with respect to that hearing to the minister for his information at the time when he exercises his final decision.

That is the system which is followed in the United Kingdom. I hope I can make it very clear that I do not think that because it is done in the United Kingdom it has to be done here. It is not that at all. But I put this forward for consideration. The United Kingdom is, I should think, even more apt to feel the first Russian hydrogen bomb than we are. They are a lot closer and therefore they have just as much at stake in preserving the secrecy of secret information as we have, and they seem to have been able to work out this procedure by which they feel they can protect their security interests and yet provide a method which will protect the sense of justice and fairness to the individual.

This method was evolved as long ago as 1948 when the Labour government was in power and, on the basis of the information I have been able to gather, I understand it is still being followed by the present government in the United Kingdom. I would therefore like to place on the record at some length a quotation from the British Hansard wherein Mr. Attlee outlined the procedure in a debate on March 25, 1948. He said, and this is to be found at columns 3421 to 3423 inclusive:

Suppose there is a case in which there is room to suspect disloyalty. The first thing to be done is to see that the civil servant concerned is informed. He should not be merely informed that he is suspected, but should be given, as far as possible, chapter and verse, saying, "You are a member of this organization, you did this or that, can you explain it?" He ought to have the case put before him perfectly clearly. Secondly he must be given the opportunity of studying that case, and then given the opportunity of putting in his reply, and also of making his reply. That then goes before the departmental head, who must consider whether it is a matter in which action must be taken. He must then go to the minister, and, whatever we think of ministers, they have a pretty fair knowledge of psychology, as they have been in this house for some time. They will have a broad view; we have to take a broad view of these things. They will look at the whole of the evidence and consider whether or not there is a prima facie case for transferring this man on these grounds or, it may be, even for dismissing him.

Then we want something beyond the minister to assist him. We are, therefore, proposing a further safeguard. We are setting up an advisory body of three retired civil servants. I hope to give the names some time, and I am quite sure they will be names which will inspire confidence in the civil service. If the minister considers there is a prima facie case, he will send the whole of the evidence before this body. Before this body the person concerned will be able to appear and make his case. He will also be able to ask other people to speak for him. The whole of this will be sifted very carefully, wherever the information comes from, by this advisory body; and the advisory body will then send their advice to the minister. The minister will then have to decide on the whole of the case as to whether he takes their advice, or rejects their advice, or what action he proposes to take. That, I think, gives the opportunity people ought to have of stating their case.

Then the prime minister of Britain went on to say this, and this is a point that has been raised here, and I think he dealt with it fairly effectively:

It is quite impossible—and everyone will realize that it is—that we should give in detail exactly the sources of information. If we do that, we destroy anything like an effective security service. But it is our intention to do this with the greatest possible tenderness for the individual, consistent with the security of the community and, as I have said, the security of the fellow members of the civil service.

Then a little bit later in that same debate he was asked a question by Mr. Brown as follows:

Mr. W. J. Brown: I wish to thank the prime minister for his statement, but I would like to ask whether it would be within the competence of the proposed advisory body of retired civil servants to send, not only for the papers that would be supplied, but also for the man himself?

The Prime Minister: I think that is quite clear. He would certainly appear.

Hence under that system—and I am not just saying it is a good system because it happens to be in effect there; I am saying that I think it is a good system because it does seem to protect the individual against possible injustice—the individual has the opportunity of knowing the nature of the case against him.

It may be that there was an unwise association in the past which has come to light. It may be that it is a perfectly innocent association. There may be a perfectly simple explanation for that association and one which—if the explanation were ever asked for or an opportunity afforded for it to be given —would satisfy the authorities that there is no security risk here, that all that needs to be done is to draw to the attention of the person that this is an undesirable association and the matter will rest there. But in the case I have in mind there was no such opportunity to explain. One could also imagine other cases where there is a simple and satisfactory explanation which could be made were the basis of the suspicion known to the suspected person. I am convinced that under the present procedure followed here—indeed it has been stated that it is not the general practice to inform the civil servant that he is under suspicion or the reasons for the suspicion—in general there can be no opportunity of meeting the case afforded to the man who is suspected, however innocent he may be. I do not like to think that sort of principle and procedure is followed here in Canada. That is my point.

With respect to the type of appeal, or intermediate hearing and procedure—to which I have referred, and which is afforded in the United Kingdom, I believe that the nature of the case could be stated to the individual concerned without the revelation of any particular piece of information which would enable a genuinely disloyal person to trace and to break down the security system. I do not think facts and dates need necessarily be given with particularity nor need the source of the information be given. Indeed, in the United Kingdom Mr. Attlee made it clear that there must be limitations upon the right of the suspected person to know all the information. He referred to a number of cases which were brought to his attention by the association over there which looks after civil service matters. He told them: I said at the outset that I did not mean that every piece of information, including the sources, in our possession, would be made available but rather an outline of the case with as much particularity as possible; and he repeated that what would be done was to inform the suspect of the nature of the case against him with as much particularity as possible having regard to the necessity to protect their own security system.

Mr. Knowles: Is that system still in effect under the present British government?

Mr. Fulton: My information is that the same system is at present in effect. Indeed it was Mr. Butler who gave the latest figures as to the number of cases dealt with under that system and the results. I can see the reason for the doubts and for the care which would have to be exercised but I can see no insuperable obstacle to the implementation of a similar system here in Canada so that we can demand with confidence—and it is our duty to demand; it is the government's duty to discharge the responsibility—the most vigorous and effective enforcement of a policy of security, secure ourselves in the knowledge, as would be the government, that as far as it is humanly possible to ensure it, no individual is going to be unjustly prejudiced as a result of the application of that policy.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, without breaking the continuity of discussion that has taken place today, I should like to say just a word on this matter. I do so somewhat reluctantly after listening to the Prime Minister. I want to assure him that I believe when he was speaking every hon. member in this committee was conscious of the fact that he was doing so with conviction, with sincerity and with honesty of purpose in the discharge of the heavy responsibilities that rest upon him in these particular days. That is the way I felt, and I am sure every other hon. member of the committee will agree with me.

There is, however, a phase that I should like to take up this afternoon. There is no question about it that we are living in extremely tense times. We are living in days the like of which human history has never before witnessed. To my mind there are two realms in which the enemy of mankind is at work. One is in the realm of physics which in these days is expressing itself in the scientific realm, where there is a danger which is so great that it threatens the survival of the human race. That is one realm in which the enemy is at work.

There is another realm, the realm of the human mind and the human personality. In that respect I refer to what some of us hold as a very deep conviction, the basic freedom of individual man. The enemy is at work in both these fields, and living in such times as we do, witnessing the things that are happening in the world and at the highest possible level of world affairs, there is no question that anyone who is interested at all must be interested to the point of being alarmed. We read of investigations being carried on in other countries, particularly the United States. We cannot help but be influenced by the result of some of these investigations, and it would be inconceivable and the height of stupidity for anyone to conclude that the same espionage forces that have been at work there have forgotten all about Canada. They just have not. Yet when we ask about the matter, and I do not want to be too harsh, we are politely told that it is well in hand and that we must therefore trust the government.

I go a long way in trusting the government with such responsibility but I must confess that I do not know very much about the situation and I do not think I am different from any other hon. member. I must confess I should like to know something about it. I am not interested in some individual case here and there but I am certainly interested in the methods that are being pursued. I do not know if it was news to other hon. members but it was news to me that the Secretary of State was the chairman of that security panel. I doubt whether anyone knew that. We are told that to reveal any steps that are being taken might possibly incriminate some innocent person. I have the greatest sympathy for those who are attempting to manage the affairs of the country and who do not wish to cast any reflection upon the character or integrity of any person. I think everybody in the house sympathizes with that position, but just the same I do believe that in many cases it can be used as a sort of red herring drawn across the trail, a red herring which is sometimes labelled "guilt by association".

I realize there is a principle involved there and that the greatest of care must be taken. I call it a red herring because I believe that is exactly what it is. I do not know of anyone who has actually been declared to be guilty of anything just because he may have been friendly with a person who was vitally involved. Nevertheless there is a principle, and I think the principle is largely one of personal responsibility. I can think of it in a rather light vein. I am a clergyman by ordinary profession. I have to watch my step. If I went downtown and were seen entering a pub I might be able to come out and tell one of my elders whom I met on the street that I went in to see a man.

An hon. Member: You might not be able to come out.

Mr. Hansell: I might be able to argue that I was in there trying to convert men from the errors of their ways. However, if I were seen going in there regularly I might not be guilty of anything but I could not very well blame my board of elders if they asked for my resignation. After all, much of it boils down to personal responsibility, and sometimes steps have to be taken. Just the other day I was reading about the decision made by the board of men directed, I believe, by the President of the United States, to investigate the case of Dr. Oppenheimer. We all know the result. Dr. Oppenheimer, one of the greatest scientists of the day, from now on is denied secret information. Yet the board came out with the clear-cut statement that they believed that Dr. Oppenheimer was a loyal citizen of the United States. I believe he is.

Not long ago I talked to a gentleman whose name I cannot tell you because he spoke to me in confidence, a man who had rubbed elbows with some of these great scientists. He said that clearly they live in a different world from us. He said that he can quite understand how in their associations they may come in contact with people who may be part of an espionage ring and yet they will not recognize it at all. Be that as it may, sometimes steps have to be taken because after all in these days we are not dealing merely with a man's position or job but with the possibility of the survival of the human race. We are dealing with the greatest of all fundamental freedoms, the freedom of individual man.

The system of espionage that is being used by the Russians, the enemies of our way of life, is so inconceivable and so fantastic that it pushes the wildest spy fiction of my teenage days completely into the background. That is why I say it is not merely a matter of somebody running off with some secrets or pilfering a diplomatic bag, it is a question of a system that has been devised to so permeate our way of life as to be able to engineer men of the highest possible intellectual calibre into positions at the highest level where those men have actually influenced government policy. There is no question about that.

I only have to refer to the person of Harry Dexter White, who became assistant treasurer of the United States. He had a tremendous power that affected the economic destinies of the nation. There is no question in my mind but that the debauching of the currency of China was part of a scheme. While I cannot put my finger on any particular spot, there is no question in my mind but that the same evil powers had designs on wrecking the United Kingdom economy. I must say it is only because of the integrity and stamina of the English-speaking people, and their leadership through the times, that they have been able to come through and apparently come out on top.

It is this matter of the influencing of government policy at the highest level that is significant to my way of thinking. I have a newspaper clipping here. I am sorry I cannot give the date of it, but it cannot be very long ago because I never keep these clippings too long. I believe I clipped it from a paper giving a summary of the news, and the heading is, "U.S. Reds Strong, F.B.I. Chief says." It goes on to say:

> The United States communist party has "strong fifth column strength", federal bureau of investigation director J. Edgar Hoover has told the House of Representatives appropriations committee.
> Hoover's comments to the committee—which was considering F.B.I. estimates for the coming fiscal year—were made recently in private. They were released February 6.
> Hoover listed the following as objectives of the American communist party:
> Settlement of the Korean war; recall of American troops from abroad; a five-power peace pact including communist China; resumption of U.S. trade with iron curtain nations.

Let us make note of the last point. It is the matter of influencing of government policy, which policy is tied in with the destiny of the nation, that gives some of us extreme concern.

In another debate yesterday I referred to a recent report that has been made by the commission set up by the Australian government to look into the Petrov case. I have here a news dispatch, which I suppose all hon. members have read dated May 18, I believe, giving an analysis of that somewhat preliminary report. I am not going to read a great deal of it, but I should like to read a part of it. It says:

> Petrov and his agents painstakingly collected details about the personal lives of various persons and sent them to Moscow. The dockets included their relations with women, their drinking habits, whether they were short of money, whether they could be inveigled into talking, and their political leanings.
> Other scandalous material became known about Australians' private lives, this was held for its blackmail value—to put the heat on those who might become involved directly or indirectly with the soviet intelligence system.

The MVD sought its recruits usually among junior civil service employees, government clerks and sometimes newspaper reporters who might have off-the-record information.

Persons whom the Russians considered "soft" were:

1. Australians already converted to the socialistic theories of Karl Marx.
2. People whose vanity could be appealed to.
3. People who had "a desire to do what they thought to be important".

Once they agreed to do some task for Russia, they found themselves increasingly obligated—and the blackmail material became increasingly effective.

I could read on, but the report is there for anyone to read. It is not, therefore, merely a matter of the stealing of secrets involved in nuclear energy or something of that kind. It is more than that. They work upon human nature. There is not a person living whose personality or whose human nature has no chinks through which he could be reached in some or any of these ways which are so cleverly and subtly designed. It is for that reason we have to be so very careful.

I am not going to repeat the request of the hon. member for Kamloops. I shall have another suggestion to make about that, but I believe the Prime Minister should tell us something about the activities of the R.C.M.P., the organization charged with dealing with communism in Canada. I have a report here of April 29, 1954. I suppose the minister has read it. In an interview a former member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police stated that there are between 8,000 and 9,000 card-bearing communists in Canada at present, and when sympathizers and fellow travellers are counted the total might exceed 50,000. The point I wanted to make was that he said there were schools inaugurated and being carried on throughout Canada, and that the leaders in some of these schools are trained in Moscow. The article reads as follows:

The national school was held annually at a location about 100 miles from Toronto, he said. Provincial schools were held several times a year to indoctrinate new members. The party also operated a summer school each year at Sylvan lake in Alberta.

In addition there were local study groups and schools for adults and children in Montreal, Ottawa, Windsor, Toronto and Winnipeg, as well as other centres. Toronto was headquarters for the largest organized groups but Winnipeg for years had been the centre for a "virile" communist organization.

These are local study groups and schools for adults and children. I believe we should have some sort of report about that from the minister, since his estimates are before us.

I do not want to keep the house any longer, Mr. Chairman, but the Prime Minister must not feel too badly if there is an indication from many members of their extreme concern about this, shall I say, philosophical espionage system in Canada that attempts to capture the minds of men towards their philosophy, and lead Canada astray in respect to its highest level policy making.

That is what I am personally concerned about. Because once it is done you cannot retreat from your position. I do not know how long our present government is going to be in office, but one thing is certain: They are on their way out, because that is the only way they can go.

Mr. Harris: And that is the only reason you can give.

Mr. Hansell: And some other responsible leaders are going to take their place. When I go through the country I say to the people, "I am not going to be too harsh on the Liberal government, but it has to be changed some time. You do not suppose there is going to be a Liberal government here a hundred years from now, do you"?

Mr. Harris: Could be.

Mr. Hansell: There just is not going to be; we might as well recognize that.

Mr. Pearson: New faces, perhaps.

Mr. Hansell: I am saying that one government builds upon another. The work of one government cannot always be retrieved. It is not just a matter of coming here for a session of parliament, getting up and talking, drawing our pay and going home. We represent the people, and our responsibility is toward the destiny of this nation. Is the nation going to follow the line of least resistance, or are we going to emerge a virile nation, a God-fearing nation of men and women with honesty and integrity of purpose, a nation as free as God intended men should be, when He created them in the likeness of His own image?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, under this vote I, too, desire to discuss a phase of security, a phase slightly different from that which has been under discussion for several hours. I do not know just how far the Minister of Justice can go in answering what I have in mind, but I sincerely hope he will go as far as possible in removing some of the confusion which exists in the minds of many people in Canada, and which I can say definitely exists at the moment in my own mind.

I shall introduce what I have to say in this way: A few years ago I had read of a nationally-known communist in eastern Canada. Being nationally-known he held a pretty high position in the communist organization. I gather that to get to a high position in a communist organization one has to be dogmatic, a strict follower of the party line, something of a rabble-rouser, and definitely a revolutionary in their sense of the term. This man resigned in 1953 from the communist party and received a great deal of publicity throughout the length and breadth of this country in the press. I have been interested in having brought to my attention by a number of people remarks he made this year in the province of Quebec at a public meeting. I am referring to a man named Pat Walsh. The Quebec daily newspaper, L'Action Catholique, in its issue of Tuesday, January 26, quoted Mr. Walsh as follows:

> I believe the time has come for me to reveal that when I took part in communist manifestations or when I was connected with communist organizations I was secretly working for the Department of Justice in Ottawa. At the time of my public resignation in February 1953 I had agreed with the authorities of the Department of Justice not to reveal this fact in order not to compromise the secret work of other agents inside the communist organizations. But today circumstances have changed and I have decided to reveal the fact that in reality I have always been a secret agent working for the central power.

I have taken this matter up with the Department of Justice. It is my understanding that it is the policy of the department when statements of this kind are made that neither the department nor the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will declare whether or not they are true. If that is so, perhaps there is a good explanation for it which, I am sure, the minister will give. If it is so, then I think first of all there is danger in allowing men with the past record and reputation of this man to make statements of that kind. I believe there is a danger there.

But my second point is perhaps more important, that if the information is correct, has consideration been given to whether or not a wrong policy is being followed in this matter of security, as it is related to a knowledge of communist activities? I can clearly and completely understand why, for purposes of security, the Department of Justice would like to have men placed in what they consider to be subversive organizations, to find out what is going on. Undoubtedly they have such men; the case of Sergeant Leopold proves that conclusively.

However, to reach the position of national importance in the communist organization in this country one would have to prove himself a good communist. He would have to persuade people in the Dominion of Canada to change their loyalty from this country to another, to accept a party and policy line from outside this country. In other words, to reach a position of that kind, you would have to be a successful evangelist of communism, and convert the democratic people of Canada to communism. If it is correct that he was an agent of the federal department, then the government itself was employing a man to do the very thing we want to overthrow.

To me the whole situation is intriguing and at the same time confusing. It is a point upon which we should be given some clarification, and within the realm of security the minister should go as far as possible to inform us in the matter. Here we have a statement made by a man known formally as an avowed communist that he was at all times an agent of the Department of Justice. No denial is forthcoming, and we are told it cannot be forthcoming. Yet in the same month, in an issue of the Globe and Mail of January 13, we read about a man named Captain J. H. De Graff, allegedly a former Russian and British espionage agent.

In this report the R.C.M.P. are quoted as saying—and this is in quotation marks—that Captain De Graff is the genuine article; that he is a big operator, and that he served for three years in Montreal with the R.C.M.P. who knew him simply as Captain Johnny X. Here is a statement from the R.C.M.P. that another man was for three years working with the department as a secret service operator. Now that can be correct or incorrect, or perhaps the R.C.M.P. never made any such statement, although it is in quotation marks in the newspaper column. But it has never been denied, as far as I know, nor have the R.C.M.P. stated that they never made any such statement.

In one case there is no denial that they ever said this man was a secret service agent. Therefore he can get away with the statement the same as a former communist can get away with it when he makes a public speech in the province of Quebec. I think, sir, you cannot put both of them together and make them coincide. There must be some basis of policy as far as the Department of Justice is concerned in cases like this; and in view of the fact we have in one month two different men making this claim, it is of some importance and should be considered.

If possible I should like to hear from the minister just what is the policy as far as statements by his department or by the R.C.M.P. are concerned, on statements of this nature, and also what is the policy as regards the production of information or the production of files? Is there any, or has there been a definite policy, or is it strictly a matter of expediency under the circumstances of the case? Perhaps it might even go to political purposes. I am not saying anything about the actions of my hon. friend but I do know that in the past it was most difficult to understand the policy operations of the R.C.M.P.

I can very well remember, Mr. Chairman, when Canada was at war with Japan, the Japanese Canadians were moved off the Pacific coast. There were certain activities, commissions and advisory boards in British Columbia on this matter of the Japanese. A great many felt that there was one man in British Columbia who, instead of being left fairly loose just outside Lillooet, I think it was at Minto, should have been interned because the feeling there amongst the Japanese was that he had his loyalty in Japan, that he was a member of a national organization in Japan, that he was the British Columbia representative. The feeling and the pressure got to the point where the federal government made an investigation.

A learned judge was appointed to make the inquiry. I appeared, sir, before that inquiry on the stand and under oath. Why was I called? Because I had in my possession two copies of a newspaper that was printed in Japan in which this man's photograph appeared, and there was a write-up on him. These two papers were what we would term fascist organs; they were the official organs of a fascist national organization in Japan. I had these two magazines translated, and so I was called about the actual newspapers and the translation. At that inquiry it was asked whether the R.C.M.P. would produce their file on this man. Their file was of interest, and an inquiry was sent to the Department of Justice. The answer came back that the R.C.M.P. did not have the authority and could not get the authority for the production of this file. So, there was a file asked for from the R.C.M.P. on a matter that was being investigated, and it was denied. Nobody asked to produce any file on me but the counsel of the commission produced the secret service reports on me without being asked. That was the first time I knew I was being dogged and my utterances were being taken down by an agent of the R.C.M.P., and it was produced in that inquiry. Not that I am ashamed of anything I say at any time, and they can dog me all they like and they can take down every word I say and it will not bother me one bit. I do not take off my hat in this House of Commons to any man or woman or to any man or woman in Canada in my love of and loyalty to this Dominion of Canada.

What I am speaking about is this matter of production of files and giving of information. I think, sir, on this phase I have said enough. The minister understands the confusion and disturbance about it. If there can oe a clear and explicit explanation of matters of this nature, as well as of matters that were raised by previous speakers, it will mean a great deal, it will be of great benefit to all the people in the Dominion of Canada, because knowledge is a lot better than lack of knowledge or guessing or rumour.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, we are interested readers here of my hon. friend's very excellent column in the Vancouver Province.

Mr. Winch: I guessed that.

Mr. Garson: And as he was good enough in his column in the issue of Saturday, March 20, 1954, to give us quite an effective notice of motion of the matter that he was going to bring up today I was able, by reason of that fact, to ask the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for a report upon all the major relevant allegations that were contained in this newspaper column. But before I deal point by point with these allegations, let me say a word with regard to the general policy which is followed by the special branch of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police engaged in counter-espionage work.

I am sure that I do not need to explain in any great detail to the members of such a well-informed body as the House of Commons that counter-espionage is scarcely the exact equivalent of conducting a Sunday school class, and that the R.C.M.P. special branch necessarily employs from time to time those whom it thinks will serve its particular purposes. I am sure, moreover, that the members upon the least reflection will agree with us that it would be a grave error indeed to discuss here any of our activities in the special branch, and especially to admit or deny any allegations of sometimes irresponsible people claiming to have been in our employ.

We are all aware that the practice of espionage and counter-espionage, the contest between enemy nations to secure and to prevent the securing of intelligence involves the building up, as completely as possible, of a large mass of information; and oftentimes the answer in the affirmative or negative to some simple statement of fact may be the last item needed to complete the general pattern of, if I may use that figure of speech, the jig-saw puzzle which the intelligence department is trying to put together; and this last simple answer may finally determine what that whole pattern is.

In counter-espionage work there is therefore only one safe policy to follow, and that is the policy of complete reticence about our own counter-espionage and complete reticence in respect of the espionage against which we are trying to protect Canada. It is for that reason that we have consistently refused to say anything with regard to the allegations of gentlemen like Mr. Pat Walsh. I must confess that when I read my hon. friend's column, the one in question to which I have just referred, I was a little taken aback by his allegation that we had departed from that policy in the Captain De Graff case, though I was very gratified when he said at the conclusion of his remarks concerning the Pat Walsh matter, and I quote from him, "that if this case stood alone the position of the Minister of Justice is quite understandable." I gather from his whole column that the part that was not so understandable to him was that we should take the position we did in connection with the Pat Walsh matter, and then in the Captain De Graff case we should make revelations or comments.

Now, the report which I get from the R.C.M.P. on the Captain De Graff case and which I submit to members of this house as being accurate is to the following effect, as are all the reports which I receive from the force.

My hon. friend from Vancouver East referred to newspaper reports in which the R.C.M.P. is alleged to have described Captain De Graff as "the genuine article" and further "he was for three years in regular duty in Montreal with the R.C.M.P." Hence my hon. friend charges the Department of Justice with giving information about a secret agent in this case while refusing it in the Walsh case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to show that there has been no inconsistency in principle I think it is necessary to begin with to recapitulate the substance of information which I have already conveyed verbally to my hon. friend from Vancouver East, to the effect that Captain De Graff as long ago as 1951 began making public appearances under cover of the name of "Captain X", and received a certain amount of newspaper publicity for these appearances in which he described his work in the Russian and British intelligence services. We conceded that Captain De Graff was undoubtedly a man of considerable knowledge in this field. During this period beginning 1951 the R.C.M.P. was asked on many occasions to give some indication of the authenticity of his background, that is the authenticity of the background he had been claiming for himself. This the police consistently declined to do until Captain De Graff last January, as reported in the Ottawa Journal, January 12, voluntarily disclosed his true identity.

At that time the press again sought some indication from the police about Captain De Graff's reliability. I think it is important that I should emphasize that. What the press sought was some indication from the police as to Captain De Graff's reliability as an expert in the field of secret intelligence work. Undoubtedly the press wished to reassure themselves that he was not an impostor. At that time the press was told in general terms that Captain De Graff did have a background of successful work in secret intelligence, but this comment referred only to his activities before his arrival in Canada, activities in which, as I indicated a moment ago, he had been claiming association with the Russian and British intelligence services.

So far as the commissioner has been able to discover, no spokesman at R.C.M.P. headquarters used the phrase which I think my hon. friend has used, namely, "the genuine article".

Mr. Winch: I was referring to the comment in the newspaper column.

Mr. Garson: I quite agree: What I am saying is that we did not use the phrase my hon. friend quoted from the newspaper column. In other words, the R.C.M.P. was not the source of the items in the newspaper columns to the effect that Captain De Graff was "the genuine article".

As to Captain De Graff's possible relations with the R.C.M.P., the public interest requires us to continue to maintain a policy that such matters are never publicly disclosed even if a person claims, as did Captain De Graff, and as Pat Walsh made claim, to have been a secret agent of the R.C.M.P., even when such a claim may have a surface appearance of truth.

I think it will be readily appreciated by all of us that any official confirmation by the police acknowledging such a relationship would have a direct and adverse effect upon Canadian interests. Moreover, inasmuch as the Prime Minister has stated today that we work in security matters with the security agents of our partner nations in NATO, for us to make statements of this sort would destroy that confidence in our reliability which these other nations must continue to have if there is going to be that degree of co-operation between our efforts that there should be.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I submit that our policy in these two cases has been quite consistent in that we have neither confirmed nor denied the statements attributed to Pat Walsh and to Captain De Graff that they were secret agents of the R.C.M.P.

Now, with regard to another matter—and I hope my hon. friend from Vancouver East will forgive me if I mispronounce a Japanese name—in the Morii case my hon. friend will recall his reference to the proceedings of the royal commission which was set up in October 1942 under Mr. Justice J. C. A. Cameron of the exchequer court to inquire into a report of an allegation published in the Vancouver News-Herald to the effect that a black dragon society was active among the Japanese in British Columbia; and that one Etsuji Morii was connected with that society, and that the R.C.M.P. had been "complacent" in dealing with this gentleman. These newspaper articles particularly claimed that the force had been at fault in accepting this gentleman's services in arranging for evacuation of persons of Japanese descent from the west coast.

I think I should here insert parenthetically that the royal commission's report disposed of all these allegations as being unfounded, and described in detail the useful work of this gentleman for the Japanese community, for the Canadian government and for the R.C.M.P. with respect to this evacuation.

My hon. friend's article stated that the R.C.M.P. file on Morii was asked for by counsel of the Vancouver News-Herald and production of it was denied. My hon. friend from Vancouver East is quite correct in this statement. By telegram dated November 13, 1942, to the counsel for the R.C.M.P., former commissioner Wood wired as follows:

> It is not considered in public interest nor has it been policy in past to produce confidential files as in case of Morii where frequent references are made to information received from secret service of other countries and thus lead to disclosure of identity of confidential informants (stop) Such action would be violation of undertaking given secret service of other countries.

That is in line with what I have stated to be our consistent policy and the policy which we have followed in the cases of Pat Walsh and Captain De Graff.

But my hon. friend's article goes on to allege a serious inconsistency in that, in spite of the rule with regard to the production of these files, a police file on my hon. friend himself was introduced as he says before the commission. My hon. friend's paragraph to this effect in his article is in these words:

> Without any warning and without any request being made to counsel the federal government produced the R.C.M.P. file on myself. As a matter of fact, from this file they read into the record R.C.M.P. verbatim reports from the speeches I had made.

I regarded this as a rather serious affair—the allegation that we would not produce a file in one case and that we would produce a file on my hon. friend and read from such files speeches of his into the record of the royal commission. I therefore instructed that a careful search should be made of the proceedings of the royal commission. A search was made of all of the proceedings conducted under Mr. Justice Cameron and also a search of his report to the then minister of justice. I must say, Mr. Chairman—and I say it with some embarrassment; I do not like to contradict my hon. friend from Vancouver East—that the fact is that there is no record whatever in either the proceedings or the commissioner's report that such a file was ever produced at that inquiry and much less that it was read into the record.

Mr. Winch: I can still remember the questioning.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is perhaps confusing the production of that report which did not take place and which was not read into the record with another episode. He may have recalled that a Sergeant J. K. Barnes, at that time head of the R.C.M.P. intelligence section at Vancouver, had stated in his testimony that my hon. friend as a member of an advisory board established by the government to give assistance to the security commission of the British Columbia government with regard to the evacuation of Japanese was permitted to address a group of Japanese who had complained about the treatment they were receiving from the R.C.M.P. My hon. friend was accompanied on that occasion by another member of the force, Constable Turner, who heard my hon. friend say, and so reported to Sergeant Barnes certain statements, which statements may have been the ones to which I think my hon. friend refers. But there was no report as my hon. friend alleges.

I hope that all of this will convince my hon. friend that there is some fairly substantial measure of consistency in the policy that we follow in this regard. I have always understood him to agree with us—and I hope he will correct me if I misunderstand him—that in the operation of a special branch or of any secret service activity there is only one policy that can be followed and that is complete reticence and complete non-production of files.

While I am on my feet I might perhaps refer to a matter which was raised by the hon. member for Macleod in quoting former superintendent Leopold with regard to the number of communists—that is the actual card-carrying members of the party—in Canada at the present time and also as to the number of fellow travellers or supporters of the communist party line. The figures my friend the hon. member for Macleod gave were between 8,000 and 9,000 for card-carrying members and 50,000 for the fellow travellers.

I might now point up that information by laying before the members of the committee the fact that at the time former superintendent Leopold retired in July, 1952, he indicated at a press interview which had been arranged for him by the R.C.M.P. that he intended to continue his activities against the communists but in his new capacity as a private citizen. As would obviously be the case, the reports of this interview received considerable publicity. I should like to refer to the account of it which was given by the Canadian Press for July 30, 1952, in which Mr. Leopold indicated the intention to which I have just referred. In that interview Mr. Leopold gave with approval his estimate of the strength of the communist party in Canada as being from 8,000 to 9,000 card-carrying members. Mr. Leopold's statement reflected, of course, his own personal opinion which, it should be allowed, was based upon a considerable amount of official knowledge and experience. However, it did not necessarily coincide exactly with the official estimates; for at that time, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police special branch was engaged in one of its periodical assessments of party strength and official figures were in process of revision.

I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that the figure given by superintendent Leopold on that occasion is much the same as that which I understood my friend the hon. member for Macleod to state as being the number of card-carrying members in Mr. Leopold's opinion just the other day. With regard to the number of fellow travellers, the figure that the hon. member for Macleod mentioned was 50,000. That figure cannot be too far wrong because the number of votes cast for Labour-Progressive candidates in the last general election was 63,000.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I propose to raise a new subject. On this item we have been dealing with different matters and then perhaps returning to them. Before I proceed to deal with that subject, however, I simply want to make a few observations with regard to the subject which was discussed earlier by the hon. member for Kamloops and, following him, by the Prime Minister. In the discussion with regard to what is described as security within the civil service, I think there will be general agreement that it presents an extremely difficult problem. I think every one of us will recognize that there must be a great many cases in which the very nature of the employment is such that it is difficult to apply ordinary standards. Nevertheless, the thing which is causing great concern to some of us, as has been mentioned before, is the fact that, in answer to the demand that has been made on a number of occasions that the actual activity of working in support of the recognized communist party that is under the direction of Moscow should in some way be defined, we have been told that a satisfactory definition cannot be given and that this might invade the realm of freedom of thought and freedom of speech. That being the case, it is extremely difficult for us to understand how something that cannot be defined in one case can be defined in the other.

Those cases which certainly arouse the greatest concern in my mind are the cases where a person is discharged or dismissed because of the allegation that he either is a communist or is sympathetic to communism. In the case mentioned by the Prime Minister, where it was decided not to permit the national film board to make certain films for the Department of National Defence, on security grounds, we know that it was quite clearly stated that the question of communism and communist sympathy was behind that concern. The difficulty here is that something that cannot be stated as a law in one case to create a penalty, according to the government, is used as a basis for denying the right to work in another case. Also we find that contrary to the procedure at Westminster there is no stated case placed before the civil servant concerned nor even a digest of the case in a great many instances. They are simply confronted with the fact that the finding has been made.

What it really amounts to is that we do not know what the law is and we do not know who the judges are. We neither know what definition applies nor do we know who apply that definition. Surely at a time that the rule of law is in itself one of the great issues dividing people between the free and the enslaved, we should seek on every possible occasion to err, if anything, on the side of the rule of law. I simply close my observations in this respect by asking once again that the government consider the possibility of at least an understandable definition of what the offence of communist activity or communist sympathy is which will deny a civil servant the right of employment, and I also support the arguments so ably presented by the hon. member for Kamloops that we should know who in fact are exercising this very great power in relation to many people who are carrying on duties which carry with them responsibilities and also a certain assurance of continuity of employment which is a little different from the ordinary type of employment that we would normally discuss.

Having made these observations on this subject, I wish to proceed to a subject which I raised before. It is one that I think is of very great importance at a time when freedom of the press and freedom of speech generally are so much in our minds. I am not dealing with this subject by way of proposal for amendment of the Criminal Code or otherwise. I wish to deal with the law as it applies to contempt of court proceedings and make certain suggestions which I hope the minister will take under consideration and then decide what can be done to deal with this aspect of a problem that has been presented to us by certain recent occurrences.

The proceedings in relation to what is described as contempt of court are in many respects today amongst the most unsatisfactory and unusual in Canadian jurisprudence. It is in fact a carry-over of ancient law. The power of judges to commit for contempt is an old common law practice. As far as Canada is concerned, we have simply inherited the statute law on this subject which goes back over a period of almost one thousand years of legal history. The British common law is part of the law of Canada except to the extent that it has been modified either by statutes of the parliament of Canada, provincial statutes, or both.

The fact is that there are at least seven sections set out in the index of the Criminal Code that deal with contempt of court, sections 165, 180, 607, 608, 678, 841 and 975. I am referring now of course to the numbers of sections in the code that has been the law for some time. Section 165 is the general section providing a penalty in the case of disobedience of orders of the court. That brings us to the fact that there are two distinct types of contempt of court. There is contempt of court which is in fact disobedience of some court order such as refusal to comply with a definite order of the court, the refusal of a witness to answer questions, or some similar disobedience of the orders of the court made under these various powers.

The second branch of this question relates to contempt outside of the court which is deemed to have some bearing on court proceedings. It is in this field that the great difficulty arises, and particularly with regard to contempt of court proceedings taken against publishers of newspapers, magazines or books and the writers of the material in those publications. Without in any way questioning the necessity for appropriate measures to enforce compliance with orders of the court, and above all for adequate protection of those who are appearing before the courts in criminal proceedings, I submit that the necessity for a clear definition of contempt of court has been given a new and somewhat dramatic emphasis by what has happened within the past few weeks.

I had occasion to refer not long ago to the warning issued by Sir Albert Walsh, chief justice of Newfoundland, on May 18. That was a blanket warning to all residents of Newfoundland that any comments about a case then before the court against a man named Valdmanis might be regarded as contempt of court. I can find no precedent for a shotgun blast of that kind. The point with which I am greatly concerned is that a general warning of this kind that any reference to the proceedings then before the court might be interpreted as contempt of court may in fact throw a blanket of secrecy around the proceedings, which is wholly inconsistent with our concept of open, public and free trial.

Secret trials and star chamber procedure have for a very long time been regarded as inexcusable within this and other nations of the commonwealth, and we should be very careful that, no matter how good the intentions are, we should be on our guard to prevent anything creeping into our jurisprudence which would deny the completely free discussion, within proper bounds, of matters which are of concern to the people. An open trial means not only the presence of other people in court. It means not only the right of newspapers to inform others about what is happening in court. It means also the proper and legitimate discussion of the trial so that the public generally may know what is going on and what is happening under our legal system. It must be remembered that one of the things asserted over and over again is the statement that criminal punishment is perhaps intended not so much to visit a penalty upon the individual as to offer an example to others which will be a deterrent against a repetition of a similar crime.

There is a great deal of discussion at the moment about the very unpleasant details of hanging. Not one of us likes to contemplate that part of our legal procedure. However, we have been told for a very long time that it is not the thought of inflicting the death penalty upon a person guilty of murder that is so important in these proceedings as the warning it may offer to others of the penalty that follows murder or conduct of that kind. There must also certainly be an advantage to society in knowing the nature of things that will bring penalties; that is a natural consequence of one aspect of publicity in the press and over the radio. There is also the fact that the accused has an opportunity to have his case presented as well. If there were general objection to what took place then, while it might perhaps not be possible to have that public sentiment produce any satisfactory results immediately in relation to that individual, it is possible that this expression of public sentiment will subsequently be interpreted in new laws which will follow the general development of advancement and improvement in our society.

Someone may ask why we should be so concerned about that here. This is the place, Mr. Chairman, where these things should be considered because the judges are simply called upon to interpret the laws that are passed here, in the provincial legislatures or, in their own local sphere of responsibility, by municipal councils. It is our responsibility particularly to correct anything that, by public evidence, is found to be unsatisfactory. I believe it is important that we have before us another recent case which brings this whole situation into clear focus where, in effect, a penalty was imposed as a result of what was stated to be contempt of court. I refer to the contempt of court proceedings in the Balcombe case, recently tried in Cornwall by the chief justice of Ontario, Chief Justice McRuer.

On that occasion the chief justice brought before the court certain people responsible for the sale and distribution of magazines that had referred in advance to the circumstances connected with this trial. As will be recalled, one man against whom the penalty was imposed, amongst others, was a man named Bryan. Following that the chief justice reviewed the case and changed the penalty that had been imposed. A question was raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert, and the Minister of Justice obtained a statement from Chief Justice McRuer which was placed on the record. This statement was in the third person, and appears at page 2621 of Hansard for March 3, 1954. I quote what the chief justice had to say concerning the power under which he acted in this particular case and also the power under which he reviewed the case and changed the penalty.

The matter was brought before the court by an application made by Mr. Kelly, the counsel for the accused Balcombe in the case of Regina v. Balcombe, and the material upon which the order was based was placed before Chief Justice McRuer on this application. The chief justice, exercising the inherent power vested in a judge of a court of superior jurisdiction, directed that the publishers and the distributor in the Cornwall area should be brought before the court to show cause why they should not be committed for contempt of court. In imposing the penalty, Chief Justice McRuer exercised the inherent power vested in a judge of any court of superior jurisdiction in a matter of this character, and likewise the chief justice in remitting part of Mr. Bryan's sentence, exercised an inherent power that is vested in a judge who imposes such a sentence when he considers that the service of part of the sentence may have sufficiently purged the contempt of the prisoner.

In that case the chief justice was simply saying this: As a judge, I have acted under the inherent power conferred upon a judge of the superior court. It is for me to decide what will constitute contempt, and it is for me to decide the penalty. Also inherent within my power as a judge of the superior court is the right to review and to decide that the penalty should be changed if that should be my opinion. It seems to me that this statement by the chief justice, to which I take no exception as an accurate interpretation of the situation as it stands, does emphasize the very loose and undefined position of publishers and others who may be called upon to distribute publications throughout Canada, and the danger in which any publisher may be under such a broad warning as that now given by the chief justice of Newfoundland.

It seems to me that these two statements brought together emphasize as never before the need for a definition of contempt of court outside of the court, and particularly contempt of court such as would constitute grounds for proceedings against a publisher or someone distributing the publication. Since the contempt of court proceedings in the Balcombe case were in regard to publications from the United States, which had been distributed and sold here, that emphasizes the fact that publishers of periodicals or newspapers in Canada with a wide circulation may be responsible in any provincial jurisdiction for what may happen there, according to the interpretation placed upon the meaning of contempt of court by any judge of a superior court of any of the provinces. Surely, that is too vague and uncertain a position when we speak with pride of the freedom of the press. It is not only the right of the press to speak with freedom about their opinions. Surely there can be no case where freedom of the press can be more important in its ultimate effect than the proper discussion of proceedings in court, where the subsequent security of the individual may depend upon the extent of the information conveyed through the press, which will bring the necessary reforms—if reforms should take place.

The law on this subject has a long history —a history going back to antiquity. In recent years however the statement in one case has been quoted over and over again with satisfaction by judges who have dealt with this matter in jurisdictions where there is an appropriate appeal.

In Great Britain the case which has been quoted most frequently, and with satisfaction, by other judges in other cases since that time, is that of Regina v. Payne and Cooper

> The applicant must show that something has been published which either is clearly intended, or at least is calculated, to prejudice a trial which is pending.

Mr. Chairman, if that were the test of contempt of court as it related to a statement published in the press, then there have been cases here in Canada where a penalty for contempt of court has been imposed in which it could not, in fact, have been imposed under this interpretation. It will be found that the statement in Regina v. Payne and Cooper was quoted with satisfaction in one of the leading cases on this subject in 1936 by Mr. Justice Du Parcq in the case of ex parte Gaskell and Chambers Limited (1936), 2 King's Bench, at page 595. At that time the subject under discussion was the very question that was raised in Newfoundland as to the publication of civil proceedings at a time when criminal proceedings are under way.

In that case the quotation I have just given from Regina v. Payne and Cooper was quoted with satisfaction, and a motion to commit was dismissed on the ground that the applicant did not show these requirements.

I mention that for this reason, that it has almost come to be taken as a definition of the condition that must be met, if an applicant is to succeed in seeking to have a penalty imposed for the publication of something in connection with a pending trial.

I know that there is under consideration at the present time a provision for an appeal in contempt cases. This is contained in the proposed amendment to the Criminal Code. I would point out however that this relates only to the right of appeal, and not to a definition.

When I raised this matter a few days ago the Minister of Justice spoke of the fact that this is something of primary concern to the provinces—to the provincial governments and legislatures—because of the exclusive provincial jurisdiction over the administration of justice. I submit that this is something definitely under the jurisdiction of this parliament, because what has come down to us as an inherent right of the courts is something clearly in the nature of criminal proceedings, because it is declared to be an offence by a judge, and a penalty is imposed.

I submit that the fact that contempt of court is within the jurisdiction of this parliament is demonstrated beyond question by the fact that we now have seven sections of the Criminal Code specifically declaring certain cases where conduct of a particular kind will be held to be contempt; and a penalty is provided. If it was appropriate for this parliament to create penalties for refusal to do certain things within the courts, where the administration of justice is under provincial jurisdiction, then surely it is equally appropriate to define this type of contempt of court where there is an offence and where a penalty is imposed.

May I point out that there are a number of cases where the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in a particular field has not been accepted as a reason for not dealing with it by the parliament of Canada, where there has been something of a criminal or quasi-criminal nature which called for the imposition of a penalty of such a nature as would apply to a criminal offence. And, just to give one example, I would refer to those sections in the existing Criminal Code dealing with unlawful acts in restraint of trade. Those are sections 498, 498A and 499. Surely in the ordinary course of events trade would come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial governments and legislatures under property and civil rights. The fact, however, that a penalty has to be imposed for certain acts that are to be described as offences was regarded as sufficient ground for dealing with that matter under the sections to which I have referred. And there are other statutory provisions which follow the same course.

It must be remembered that no suggestion of any allegation of impropriety against any judge is contained in a discussion of this subject and in the argument that the present proceedings are unsatisfactory and that any statement by any judge may in itself constitute a possible limitation of freedom of the press or freedom of the individual. We should remember at all times that our responsibility is to pass laws, and that the responsibility of the judges is to interpret those laws and to impose penalties.

The actual procedure of those courts is defined by provincial laws which state how courts will be carried on. The judges within those laws that describe the administration of justice, and under the many statutes of this parliament, of the provincial legislatures, and of the municipal councils in their local fields, must observe those laws and give even-handed justice in relation to those who may be brought before them in connection with any of those laws. It is our responsibility and not the responsibility of the judge to make new laws. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the combination of these two statements which I have quoted and the numerous discussions in recent months and years do point out to us that the judges in these cases are called upon to make the law, and they are also called upon to decide what the penalty will be. I submit the time is overdue for us to make the law with regard to contempt of court by publications in the press or in periodicals and even to decide what the penalty will be.

I am sure that the judges of this country, for whom by tradition and experience I have the utmost respect, would themselves welcome such a guide and such assistance in the interpretation of this extremely difficult subject.

Mr. Garson: May I ask a question?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Garson: I understood my hon. friend to quote with approval what he describes as almost a definition of the conditions which must be met before a judge is warranted in citing for contempt. Would he not agree that what he has quoted is good law in itself? If so, wherein does the necessity of our passing a law to confirm or clarify it lie.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly the situation: that does not bind our judges now. Chief Justice McRuer said he acted on the inherent authority of the judges. I could, but I do not need to, recite cases. The Minister of Justice knows of a case which has gone far beyond the limitation of this kind; what is more, the Minister of Justice knows very well that we have no appeal procedure in this country which brings cases before the courts in the way that they are brought before the courts of appeal in Britain. It was in such a case that this judgment was given. Mr. Chairman, what I am pointing out is that there is a procedure there, but it is also a procedure that is based upon long-standing judgments. We have seen fit to define contempt of court in a number of cases. If it was wise for us to define acts in those cases, I submit it is proper for us to define acts in this case. I submit in fact it is more appropriate to define contempt when it is something that relates to the freedom of the press and to the very great difficulty there must be in the minds of publishers at this time as to what actually does constitute contempt of court.

Mr. Garson: Can my hon. friend tell me of the cases in which we have defined contempt of court?

Mr. Drew: That is exactly the point. There is no definition at the present time. There was no attempt specifically to define what contempt is in the case to which I have referred that was dealt with by the chief justice of Ontario. It was simply his decision, under his inherent powers, that there had been contempt of court; then, it was his decision, under his inherent powers, that he had gone too far; that he subsequently thought that a more moderate sentence would be more in keeping with the offence with which he had dealt.

There was a case here in the city of Ottawa —I think it was just three years ago—when a very reputable publication, the Ottawa Journal, was fined $3,000 for contempt of court. Without questioning the authority of the judge to impose it—I might add it was the same judge who imposed the penalty in Cornwall this year—the Journal editorially subsequently pointed out that they were puzzled as to how the court had arrived at this figure, or how the chief justice had arrived at this figure, and I should imagine everybody would be puzzled. I do not think we should be puzzled at how a judge or court arrives at penalties. I think we should know in advance what the penalties are. That does not mean we should know the exact amount. In regard to incarceration, it should not be less than a certain period and not more than a certain period, and in the case of a money penalty, it should not be less than a certain amount and not more than a certain amount. It does seem to me that it is a most extraordinarily open-ended power in the hands of any judge, no matter how much we may respect our judiciary, to leave him completely free to decide what the penalty would be. The fact is, I know nothing at the moment that would say that a penalty of a million dollars would not be within the competence of a judge if he decided that was the proper penalty to impose against some large publishing house. I know of nothing at all that suggests any uniform pattern. It is entirely at the whim of the judge himself. I am sure that all of our judges would exercise their best judgment; but, Mr. Chairman, there is another strange aspect about this. We are very much inclined to make sure that in most cases the persons who feel themselves offended will not themselves judge what should be done. That is because we recognize we are all human beings, even judges.

In this case it is perfectly true that the offence technically is an offence against the court. Nevertheless, in a number of cases that have come forward recently, and I would refer particularly to one which was decided in Vancouver within the last few weeks, it was obvious that there was some feeling that this is an allegation against the judge and the jurors as individuals. Nevertheless, the judge who saw himself affected by what had been alleged or stated was himself the one who created the law and said what the contempt was in this case. Without in any way seeking to review the decision, I may say that it was a very unusual type of contempt, to say the least. Then, also the same judge, having declared the law in that particular case, and a very unusual law it was, he imposed the penalty. I do not think that is in keeping with our ordinary practice. Surely our practice is not only to define an offence, to define a penalty, but also to allow a thing of this kind to be dealt with in an atmosphere of objective detachment, which may be very difficult for even the most high-minded individual when that individual himself may feel that there has been some reflection on him personally, as there appears to be in the case in Vancouver to which I have referred.

This suggests to me a further reason why it is vitally important that we should provide safeguards against injustice. When I use the word "injustice" I am applying that neither to any judge nor to anyone who has dealt with any of these cases. I apply it to injustice within the law. I point out, however, that this is the high court of parliament. This is the place to decide now whether the time has come to follow the same practice as has been followed in cases that perhaps could have much less serious consequences in their general impact upon society, and to define both the offence and the penalty and to make sure that the person who deals with the question will, in the ordinary course of events, most likely not be the person who has himself been affected. I should also like to point out another matter related to the statement by Sir Albert Walsh, chief justice of Newfoundland, in relation to the warning given to the public of Newfoundland with reference to these recent decisions which have been made which affected publishers in other cases.

I know there have been cases in Britain where under the most severe limitation publication of civil proceedings has been described as contempt of court. That was only, however, where it was done in a way that was likely to prejudice the individual, and that was very carefully pointed out in the case I cited where the application was refused on that very ground.

I would point out that in this case in Newfoundland, without in any way going into the merits, the allegation in a civil case is precisely the same as in a criminal case so there should be no possibility of prejudice to the individual concerned by a repetition in a much simpler form of the very allegation repeated over and over again in connection with criminal proceedings.

I remember distinctly how well established a practice it is to publish civil proceedings. As the Minister of Justice knows, I was for some time master of the supreme court of Ontario, and I remember that one of the regular proceedings each day was for the press to come and obtain copies of civil proceedings that had been heard in master's chambers.

These were published with complete freedom and there was never the slightest chance that any single detail in any of these civil proceedings could possibly be subject to restraint unless an order had been made declaring that they should not be published.

I place this before the Minister of Justice, Mr. Chairman, that if there is to be any restraint on publication of this kind in regard to civil proceedings it should only be under order. After all, that is a simple procedure.

I recall very well a case that the Minister of Justice will probably remember, namely, the famous Miller will case. Many people are not aware that one very interesting paragraph in that will has never been published. It is a most unusual paragraph and it was not published because it would have caused considerable embarrassment to certain individuals and dependents. The order was obtained on proper application supported by convincing evidence that it would cause embarrassment, and that there was no real necessity for its publication. Under that order that paragraph has never been published to this day, interesting though the will was and still is.

I can recall other orders where, because of indecency or slanderous statements and things of that kind, orders were made in very rare cases in regard to particular paragraphs of some documents. That, I submit, Mr. Chairman, is the proper procedure. In that case the court knows, the public knows, and everyone has a right to know what may or may not be published.

I think it is contrary to our whole idea of free and open trial before the courts to place blanket warnings before the public which might carry forward this very uncertain, unsatisfactory and unsound practice, in regard to contempt of court proceedings in relation to the press, a stage still further in connection with the proceedings now under way.

In my opinion this threat to newspapers in Newfoundland indicates that this whole question of contempt of court has got completely out of hand. It should not be necessary for me to repeat, as I did once before, that personally I have the highest regard for Sir Albert Walsh in his judicial and personal capacity, as I have for every member of that bench.

But it is my responsibility, as it is the responsibility of every member of this high court of parliament, to deal with any matter that comes before us where we think a possible injustice may be done or something be done affecting the general welfare of our society.

It is in that light that I have brought this matter before the Minister of Justice today, and I would point out that the chief justice of Newfoundland expressed some concern about the trial of this case by press and radio.

I do not take exception to certain statements in regard to the rights of the individual that were made, but I would point out that it was also by press and radio that the chief justice issued his warning which, with an undefined law, may have a very limiting effect upon freedom of the press and freedom of speech in that part of Canada which has a longer tradition, in many respects, of judicial proceedings than other parts of Canada with which Newfoundland is now joined as part of one nation.

I would also point out that the proceedings which took place in Newfoundland are likely to have their effect upon the proceedings that take place in other parts of Canada.

The question arises as to what parliament can do. I submit that, entirely contrary to what the Minister of Justice said the other day about the administration of justice bringing this within the jurisdiction of the provinces, this is a subject under the authority of parliament. It has been so declared in other cases of contempt. There is an offence and there is a penalty. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is entirely in keeping with the other section now in the code, and other sections in other laws, that we should be prepared to deal with this subject.

I believe the Minister of Justice could very well have legislation framed during the course of the present session. After all, there is certain legislation not yet before us. It would be possible to define this law in a very simple way and, Mr. Chairman, I for one would feel much more satisfied about the situation if there were a clear definition which made it quite certain that the likelihood of injury to someone being tried must definitely and unquestionably be proved, and also that there be some definite limits both to the penalty that may be imposed by way of jail sentence, and to the penalty that may be imposed by way of a fine.

This, Mr. Chairman, is something that has been discussed quite often, and I know it has been before the Minister of Justice to an extent. But I submit there would still be time to draft a satisfactory statute dealing with this subject, and I believe the freedom of the press and the right of the press to the time-honoured protection of knowing what the law is in advance demands that this high court of parliament define this particular type of contempt, as other types have been defined, and take away from the judges for their own satisfaction as well as ours what members of this high court of parliament have, namely the responsibility for deciding the extent of the penalty that can be imposed.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, in the same manner as the Leader of the Opposition, I have a very high regard for Sir Albert Walsh and his colleagues on the Newfoundland bench, and likewise for Chief Justice McRuer and his colleagues of the supreme court of Ontario. I think that my hon. friend would agree with me that we can share an equally high opinion of the judges in the Canadian courts generally.

Is this therefore not the situation? For many long years—for decades if not for generations—the parliament of Great Britain and the parliament and the legislatures of Canada also, having a high opinion of judges, have not felt that they were under the necessity of defining what constituted contempt of court or of setting the limits of the penalties that could be imposed for it. If the need for that which my hon. friend is now requesting be an inherent one, if it be something in the nature of things, as he seems to represent it, I should think the likelihood is that it would have made itself felt some time before now.

There are one or two distinctions to be drawn here. For example, when my hon. friend raised this matter the other day, he was speaking not about contempt of court but about a warning which had been given by Chief Justice Sir Albert Walsh and his colleagues of the superior court of Newfoundland in the city of St. John's, arising out of the publication by the newspapers there of some material. My suggestion to my hon. friend was that, if he were, as I understood him to be, objecting to that warning as an improper act in the administration of justice, it was a matter which was the concern of the attorney general of Newfoundland because that matter is clearly involved in the administration of justice in Newfoundland. If that warning were to be followed in the actual trial itself by citation by Sir Albert or any of his colleagues of anyone for disregarding the warning or in some other way committing a contempt of court, I do not share my hon. friend's view that the presiding judge in a trial, in the exercise of the inherent right of the court to punish for contempt in order that it may have that proper control over its own trials that it should have if it is to conduct them properly, can do this capriciously or, to use my hon. friend's word, at the presiding judge's whim. He cannot introduce some new concept of contempt of court and, on the basis of this concept in his own mind, cite for contempt and impose a penalty.

For my hon. friend himself quoted—and I thought very aptly indeed—one of the leading cases in England which said that, in order to prove contempt of court, the applicant must show that something has been published that was clearly intended or at least was calculated to mislead a trial which was pending. I think it is a fairly elementary proposition that if the judge in any court wishes properly, in accordance with the decided cases as to what contempt of court is, to cite for contempt of court, he must act in accordance with the jurisprudence which has been built up upon the subject of contempt of court.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the Minister of Justice but I would point out that in the Vancouver case that was not the test. It was something entirely different. It was after a verdict had actually been given.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I really hesitate to discuss the Vancouver case, the Balcombe case or these other cases, and for this amongst other reasons. In terms of the definition that my hon. friend quoted, and with which offhand I venture to agree—I think this is a very good statement of the jurisprudence upon the subject of this particular kind of contempt of court—my hon. friend will see by the most casual perusal of the definition he cited that the applicant must show that something has been published which clearly is intended or at least is calculated to mislead the trial which is pending. That, Mr. Chairman, is a question of fact. One of the greatest difficulties we have in discussing the merits of the contempt of court in the Balcombe case or the possible contempt of court in the case in Newfoundland or the merits of the warning that was issued in Newfoundland as applied to the facts there—one reason why it is almost impossible to discuss these things intelligently is that they hinge upon the facts, and we do not have a comprehensive statement of the facts.

This is an extremely important matter, and it is very much to the credit of the Leader of the Opposition that he raised it. After he brought it up the other day I wrote to Sir Albert Walsh the following letter dated May 31:

Dear Sir Albert:

I am enclosing herewith the Hansard report of May 27, 1954, in which is recorded an exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and myself with regard to a statement attributed to you in the Daily News of St. John's.

[Mr. Garson.]

One of the difficulties of discussing a question of this sort intelligently in the House of Commons is that, in a matter which it seems to me hinges largely upon fact, we do not have a comprehensive statement of the facts. If, therefore, you could directly or if you think it preferable, through the Attorney General of Newfoundland, put me in possession of material relevant to any discussion which may be opened up by the Leader of the Opposition or others, such a course would, I think, lessen the possibility of the debates here creating a misunderstanding by Canadian public opinion of the issues involved.

That is one reason why it is so difficult to deal with, as finally and as conclusively as they deserve to be dealt with, the points raised by my friend the Leader of the Opposition.

However, in general terms I think this much can be said. To begin with, with great deference, in the light of the case law which my hon. friend himself cited, which is fairly clear and explicit of one type of contempt, I would doubt as to whether there is any definition which we could insert in the Criminal Code or in any other statute which would be any clearer or better statement of what that type of contempt consisted, than what my hon. friend referred to—and very correctly—as almost a definition of the conditions which must be met before the judge is entitled to cite for contempt of court. On that point therefore I would doubt very much whether it was desirable that we should insert a section to that effect in the Criminal Code, something which, as my hon. friend himself has proven, is already dealt with in the jurisprudence upon the subject. If we did so—as I am sure he would be the first to agree—we could only do so in relation to those criminal courts which are referred to in the Criminal Code itself. Rather than do that, the royal commission which was charged with the task of consolidating the code, our own Department of Justice and, up until the present time, the House of Commons and the other place—although I understand that the members of the other place are examining this particular provision at the present time—have thought that the substantial points which my friend the Leader of the Opposition has raised today might be properly met by providing, as the new Criminal Code consolidation bill provides in clause 9:

Where a court, judge, justice or magistrate summarily convicts a person for a contempt of court and imposes punishment in respect thereof, that person may, with leave of the court of appeal or a judge thereof, appeal to the court of appeal

(a) from the conviction, or

(b) against the punishment imposed.

It continues in subsection 2 as follows:

For the purposes of an appeal under subsection (1) the provisions of Part XVIII apply, mutatis mutandis.

That means, as I am sure my hon. friend will agree, that for the first time in Canada we will have an appeal both from the conviction and the sentence in respect of a citation for contempt of court. This appeal will enable the appeal court to deal with the question of what constitutes contempt of court, or to use my hon. friend's term, what is its proper definition. Thus it will cover the case in which a judge, purporting to cite for contempt of court, has imposed a penalty for something which, whatever it may be, is not contempt of court. All these points can go before the court of appeal; and there can also go before the court of appeal for reconsideration the adequacy of the sentence which has been imposed. Thus I would think, with great deference, that in the new Criminal Code Bill No. 7 we have anticipated my hon. friend and have gone already as far as we should go in this direction which he has suggested.

With regard to contempt of court committed in a civil court, without going into the matter too carefully I would be inclined to think that an appeal from a citation for contempt of court occurring in provincial courts exercising civil jurisdiction would more than likely have to be provided by provincial legislation. For offhand I cannot entirely accept my hon. friend's suggestion that contempt of court is a crime in the narrow sense. I would say that the power to cite for contempt of court is an inherent power of a court of superior jurisdiction to control the proceedings before the court itself, and that if there are to be any limitations upon the power to cite for contempt in a provincial court of civil jurisdiction dealing with civil cases the question would have to be carefully looked into as to whether that could be provided by any other than provincial legislation.

Mr. Drew: I want to deal very briefly with two points raised by the Minister of Justice. First of all, I am very strongly of the opinion that this is properly a subject for action by parliament. I would point out that section 164 of the existing code indicates how far parliament has gone in dealing with penalties relating to matters that may come under not only laws of the parliament of Canada but provincial laws as well. The minister will remember that section 164 reads as follows:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, without lawful excuse, disobeys any act of the parliament of Canada or of any legislature in Canada by wilfully doing any act which it forbids, or omitting to do any act which it requires to be done, unless some penalty or other mode of punishment is expressly provided by law.

I read that for this reason. This is intended to make sure that there shall be no loose interpretation of the inherent authority of the court but rather that in any case where any act, either of the parliament of Canada or of a provincial legislature, calls for something to be done, the failure to carry out that obligation renders the person liable to one year's imprisonment for such failure if some penalty has not otherwise been provided either by the parliament of Canada, under its jurisdiction with relation to criminal law because otherwise it would have no right to enter that field, or by the provincial legislature. I mention that because I submit, while it is not on all fours with the problem before us, that it does indicate the extent to which, under the general authority of the parliament of Canada, anything that savours of criminal law or a criminal offence or punitive action is within our jurisdiction and calls for action.

With respect to the point made by the Minister of Justice about the quotation I gave from the case I described as the leading case at the moment in Britain, I would point out that does not apply here because the judges here act under the inherent power of the court, as Chief Justice McRuer said.

Mr. Garson: They do in England too.

Mr. Drew: Oh yes, but of course, as the Minister of Justice knows, there is an appeal procedure which over the years has established very clearly a definite jurisprudence. That is exactly the point I am making. These cases to which I refer are cases that follow a definite line of precedents. I have pointed out in support of my contention that we need something here to define the penalty in line with other definitions and stated penalties. The fact is that we have had cases in Canada which have clearly demonstrated that our judges do not feel themselves bound by the limitation to which I have already referred in regard to publication of matter in the press.

It is with that thought in mind that I submit that if offences in court against the orders of the court need to be defined it is even more necessary, in relation to those things that go out to hundreds, thousands and millions of people for reading, that the offence should be defined and the definition should be in the simplest, most understandable form. Without suggesting that it should be limited to that, I certainly would feel very much more satisfied if a simple statute were enacted that merely interpreted in statute form the definition I quoted from the English case and also what the maximum penalty will be.

I can only repeat that as the situation stands at the moment some publication which might be assessed a penalty of $1 million—and in these days of high penalties that is not an impossibility—would have no argument to sustain the claim that that was an excessive penalty. Surely with the best of judges and with the best of intent on the part of these judges, which no one questions, it is not consistent with our practice to leave such wide powers in the hands of any judge at this time.

Mr. Garson: I should like to make two observations. First we were under the impression that by providing an appeal we were meeting the very points which my hon. friend has just now so clearly enunciated. The other point is this. Does my hon. friend really think that we would be well advised to use our power to enact statutes in relation to the criminal law to attempt to define what should be contempt of court and the punishment therefore in civil actions in the provincial courts of civil jurisdiction? Should such statutes not be left to the provincial legislatures to enact even if we had the power to enact them?

Mr. Drew: I submit that the action under which a person is haled before a court by way of contempt of court proceedings is in fact a criminal proceeding and that it should be dealt with in that way for the whole of Canada so that in every part of the country publishers will know exactly what they have a right to do and will be warned in advance, in accordance with our ordinary concept of justice, of the things that they must not do.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, if the discussion on this phase is over, there is one matter I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member would not object if I were to interrupt him at this moment to ask the hon. member for Prince Albert if he wishes to follow the same line of discussion as the Leader of the Opposition. If the hon. member for Vancouver East is agreeable, I think we might make our debate more orderly if we followed the same line of argument.

Mr. Power (St. John's West): Could I say a word on this point?

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member for Vancouver East agreeable that the hon. member should follow the same line of discussion?

Mr. Winch: I presume I can follow after this subject is finished.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes. I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Winch: I presume I can follow afterwards?

The Deputy Chairman: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I thought we might make our discussion more orderly by discussing one subject at a time.

Mr. Power (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of attempting to give my view as to what should be done about the law of contempt or of stepping in between the Leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Justice. However, I believe something should be cleared up in connection with this matter. The Leader of the Opposition expressed his respect for the Newfoundland bench and the chief justice of Newfoundland. He did say something else in connection with the Valdmanis case that should be mentioned because people do read the spicy parts of speeches.

In referring to the Valdmanis case the Leader of the Opposition mentioned secret trials and star chamber proceedings. I do not think the Leader of the Opposition would like that phrase to stand in connection with this matter because he knows, and everybody in this house knows, that there are no secret trials or star chamber proceedings in Newfoundland.

Mr. Winch: There is one matter I should like to mention on this item because it is a policy matter, and I do not know of any other item in the estimates under which it could be raised. Actually, it is a request to the Minister of Justice to use his position in a way I think will prove of benefit to Canada as a whole.

Unfortunately, there are those people who, for one reason or another, come into conflict with the law. When they are caught, they have to pay the penalty of the law. In these modern days of penology the old punitive idea is rapidly disappearing, and I am certain that all of us in this house are very pleased that this forward step has been made in the penitentiary system in Canada. I personally know of the progress being made and I want to add my words of commendation concerning the changes that have taken place in recent years. The minister is most certainly to be congratulated on that phase of the activities of his department.

I am certain the minister will agree with the idea that once a person comes out of the penitentiary after serving the penalty for his crime against society, it is the hope of everyone in authority that the person can take his place as a respected and responsible member of society. I feel I am absolutely safe in saying that in the majority of cases the various police authorities do not obstruct those who have served the penalty and who try to become useful members of society. I know a great many of the members of the various police forces of Canada who do everything they possibly can to co-operate and to help those who have served a term in prison. I want to emphasize that statement I have just made, that in my opinion the majority of the officers of the police forces go out of their way to assist because of what I am now going to say.

It is unfortunate, but there is a minority in the police forces of Canada, and I include the R.C.M.P., who do not take the position that these people who break the law and have served their penalty should be assisted. I am not speaking from hearsay or rumour. I am speaking from a working knowledge of the fact that unfortunately there are a few on the police forces, including the R.C.M.P., who will go out of their way to persecute a person who has served a sentence, instead of helping him. I ask the Minister of Justice, as the nominal head of law and justice in this country, as well as the R.C.M.P., if there is any way of issuing a directive to indicate that these people should be helped if they are deserving of help.

I could take a great deal of time in giving instance after instance to prove my point, but I am just going to give one. I am not going to mention any names because that would not be fair, and it would only give publicity to the matter. I definitely know of a man who broke the law—no question about it. He was found guilty and paid the penalty. He spent a term in the penitentiary, and I was convinced he had learned his lesson. He came out determined he would never go back. He got himself a job and proved he had ability. He rose to be manager of the company. He had a family, and then what happened? No sooner had he become established than the R.C.M.P. came in and told his employer he had a record. Fortunately for this man he was wise, and had told his employer when he applied. He was staying at a motel, and the R.C.M.P. officer went to the motel owner and told him the man had a record and to get rid of him.

This went on for a period of time, and at last the man could not stand any more of it. He moved about two provinces away and got another job. He proved himself again and rose to be the top salesman for this company so that now he is the boss over all the other salesmen. His life, Mr. Chairman, is still being made a living hell on his route. Many of the customers upon whom he calls are told, even before he gets there, that this man is going to travel that route. During the last two months, because of the weather in the prairie provinces, he tried to avoid that embarrassment by going into British Columbia. In the city of Kamloops, what happened? He was there one day when the R.C.M.P. came into the hotel and he was driven out again. As I say, I am not mentioning any names. I am just citing one case, and I am glad it is rare. You can see what that could do to a man who is trying to make good, and who has paid the penalty.

I shall be glad, in confidence, to turn the entire information over to my hon. friend. I am going to reiterate what I said before, that in the majority of cases the police officers are found to be co-operative. There are some who take this attitude of persecution. I hope the minister can perhaps do something, either directly or through some other medium, to make it clear to all law enforcement officers that they should be very careful in protecting people, and very careful in watching those they think are not going to reform. However, when they see a man or woman trying to rehabilitate themselves, trying to be good citizens, the officers should help them instead of trying to drive them down.

There is one other case I would like to refer to the minister, in the hope that perhaps he can do something about it. It is a case which I had brought to my attention about two years ago, and concerns a young man who was called from his home by his chum. They were going down the street, and the chum—

Mr. Garson: May I interrupt the hon. member for a moment, to say only this, that what my hon. friend states in relation to this case is so completely at variance with the instruction and the traditions of the mounted police that I know he will not take offence if I say I find it extremely difficult to believe. But I will welcome his bringing all the details of the case before me; and he may rest completely assured that it will have the most careful investigation. And if there is any foundation for the allegations which my hon. friend has made, he may be sure the proper steps will be taken.

Mr. Winch: I welcome the remarks of the minister. That is one of the reasons I mentioned it, because I was certain he would get up and make a definite statement. And may I suggest that I am not speaking of one case, or a particular record. I am speaking from experience in a number of cases. I reiterate that this is not to be taken as a criticism of the majority of law enforcement officers in this dominion, or of the R.C.M.P. But I wish to get across the point that there is still a minority who are not doing what the minister wants. I said a moment ago that I will be glad to turn over the complete file of this particular case, in confidence. That is one sample. I could give him quite a number.

Mr. Garson: I would be glad to have them all.

Mr. Winch: And then, on the other point—and to me it is the important point. From my understanding it can be handled only by the federal government, or perhaps by the house. It refers to a young man in his teens who, along with his chum, was out on the street. Apparently this chum was not too good, and told this boy that he wanted to go behind a store for a few minutes. While the chum did not know it the other boy was breaking and entering. They were arrested. The boy who broke and entered was sentenced, and the other boy was let go on a suspended sentence. He never spent a day in a provincial jail, or a day in a penitentiary —and never has in his whole life.

Some time later he got a job. Just to indicate his ability, let me say that he worked up to a position where he had to be bonded. An application was made by the company—one of the best known companies in Canada—for the bond. They received a refusal—"his name is on a police blotter". He lost his job.

Then he got another job, and five years later had worked up to an administrative position, where he had to be bonded. Again the company gave the answer: "No, his name is on a police blotter". Sir, today that man has lost all hope; he is frustrated; he is an itinerant worker; his wife and child have left him—all because the bonding company will not give him a bond, all because twenty-three years ago his name was put on a police blotter, under the circumstances I have described. And even after that period of time, the bonding company will not give him a bond.

I took the matter up with the local police department and asked if something could be done. The answer was: "We are sorry. We agree with you. We know this man. We know his father—he was an officer of this police force. But we cannot do a thing about it; it is the law. It is something that comes under the federal government."

I have not been able to find out how the matter stands, and what can be done about it. And that is the first of three such cases that have come to my attention. I thought I would raise the matter here and ask the minister if there is anything that can be done, or is required to be done, so far as the law is concerned, in a case of that kind.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Garson: If I understood my hon. friend correctly it would seem to me that this has not anything to do with the police. It has only to do with the policy of the bonding company. That company, controlling its own money and its own business policy, is entitled to say upon what terms it will grant a bond. If the company has a fixed policy that will not grant a bond to anyone who has a criminal record, however slight or however long ago, then that company policy would prevent the issuance of a bond. The police were quite correct when they told my hon. friend that there was nothing they could do about it. But they were not correct if, as he said, they told him that that was the law.

There is no law about it at all. If he was convicted and was released on suspended sentence, he was in fact convicted. That fact is recorded in a public record. And if the bonding company will not issue a bond, that is not the fault of the police or the law. I doubt very much if we could pass a law here, other than one which would expunge convictions from the records beyond a certain date, which would change the situation of which my hon. friend complains.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I would refer first to the statement made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I must say that when he stated that even a minority of the R.C.M.P. were hounding persons within this country who at some time had been convicted, it is something that is not in keeping with my experience nor, I am sure, the experience of Canadians generally.

The mounted police need no defence. For many years, to a degree experienced by perhaps only a few in the house, I have appeared opposite them, and I have never known this distinguished body, either in a minority or in a majority, to do anything that would interfere with the rehabilitation of any person who at any time had committed an offence.

The R.C.M.P. need no defence; and I think the hon. gentleman would have been far better advised had he placed this case before the authorities. If, as he says, there are several cases, then I think the minister should ask for those several cases, because apparently there is a concentration in one province of such wrongdoing that is not to be found in the other provinces.

I say this because I feel that to generalize, as the hon. member has done, in regard to this great force, with its traditions for service, for honour and for proper police protection, and to castigate them even as a minority before the House of Commons, does not give to them that degree of fairness that I feel they deserve.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kamloops is to be congratulated on the effective manner in which he discussed this very serious problem of preserving and maintaining the security of the state while, at the same time, maintaining the rights of the individual to the maximum extent. This afternoon parliament discussed a subject worthy of the best traditions of the House of Commons.

Generally speaking, it is good that from time to time major questions such as this should be considered with the fullest and frankest exchange of opinions. We realize the danger which we face nationally and internationally from communism. However, in meeting communism, we must not allow ourselves to drift into a condition that might be described as a garrison state. In meeting the terrible challenge that communism has raised as against freedom everywhere in the world the major responsibility of democratic parliaments today is to endeavour at all times not to imperil unnecessarily personal rights and freedom beyond that boundary wherein the safety of the state must be of paramount importance and must be maintained.

This afternoon the Prime Minister dealt with this matter at considerable length. At times I felt he was having difficulty in explaining his support for a system which has its imperfections, which had its shortcomings and its dangers revealed by the hon. member for Kamloops and which inherently in its constitution is a denial of the rule of law and the maintenance of the rights of the individual. Everywhere, among nations with a democratic background and a parliamentary heritage, the same difficulty besets the endeavours of governments to achieve their purposes through established institutions.

The hon. member for Kamloops showed what had been done in Britain. I intend to refer to what is being done or projected in the United States to the end that, where there are in the present system shortcomings that endanger the rights of the individual, those rights shall be maintained within the widest possible limits consistent with safety.

Parliament today found out for the first time that the Secretary of State was the chairman of this committee during a period of time. Because of the knowledge he possesses, the Secretary of State is one who should at least give the committee some idea of the operation of this secret committee. History shows that anonymously-manned committees dealing with the freedom of the individual are generally the prelude to the denial of the rights of the individual. Such procedure is the antithesis of freedom. It subjects the individual not to the rule of law but to the arbitrarily capricious exercise of the power of the state. These things are necessarily so when danger threatens. What parliament has to face is this fact. While we want to assure our security as of the first importance, under no circumstances do we want anything in the nature of a star chamber that operates behind closed doors, is presided over by the instrument of anonymity, that carries out its work without the evidence of the individual accused, and which, by the course that it follows, pronounces upon that individual, in the event of his being found unfit, a penalty that will remain with him throughout life.

Today, as always, there are those who challenge freedom. I listened to the Leader of the Opposition today dealing with some remarks made by the chief justice of Newfoundland to the press of that province, which anticipated that the press might commit an offence for which punishment was intimated.

Freedom cannot survive without hospitality to ideas with which we disagree. I fear for freedom when the right of the press to speak fearlessly and to report fairly is challenged at any time. There is that everlasting conflict between freedom of speech and the fear of it. There is an everlasting conflict between, on the one hand, the tendency to suppress what we disagree with, and on the other the right to speak as we wish, so long as in speaking we do not speak treasonably, seditiously, blasphemously or libellously. Without freedom of the press there can be no political liberty. It will soon be a memory. That is why I agree with what the hon. gentleman said, that the right of the individual to appeal against conviction registered for contempt is in the nature of a reform that has been long needed and required.

I know of no better definition of what freedom of the press means than that once spoken by Jefferson when he said:

> The basis of our governments being the opinion of the people, the very first object should be to keep that right; and were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without a government, I should not hesitate a moment to prefer the latter. But I should mean that every man should receive those papers and be capable of reading them.

Freedom of the press is challenged when warnings are made in advance as to what will take place if the newspapers do what they have the right to do, namely, to report fairly and accurately the facts of a case. And the challenge is multiplied where there is no right of appeal after conviction when the newspaper does its duty and publishes what it is entitled to do.

I cannot see what the challenge to security is in having revealed the names of the members of this committee. Shall we have a body charged with the power to determine a man's reputation for all time to come? A body that is anonymous? That body may be right in most of the conclusions it comes to, but a secret tribunal is a perversion of justice and a denial of our heritage.

I ask the minister to explain where there is in our security that which requires that this committee shall remain undesignated. Why should not the accused have the right to give evidence before that body? I realize that the identity of his accusers cannot be made available to him, otherwise it might very well be that the entire system of counter-espionage would be defeated. But surely an individual, anonymously charged, anonymously proceeded against, should have the right to know something of the general nature of the charge. Surely he has a right not to be condemned in a secret tribunal, meeting secretly, and coming to a decision behind closed doors.

Mr. Garson: I am quite sure my hon. friend does not wish to mislead the committee. It has been explained on a great many occasions that the secret panel, to which my hon. friend has referred, does not deal with any of these individual cases at all. It deals with the general question of security, questions of policy, and the like. But the idea that the case of a person who is suspected of being a poor security risk comes up before the security panel is quite without foundation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not say that they come before the security panel. I say the security panel determines the question, and the person whose reputation will be destroyed by suspicion and by the action taken should at least have the right to answer.

But let the minister reply to me when I have concluded my remarks, because I have some suggestions to make in connection with this matter. I admit it cannot be a public investigation, but we do not want it to be by a legislative committee either. The experience in recent weeks of a public investigation of communist wrongdoers or potential wrongdoers is a perversion of democracy where trial takes place by innuendo and where, in the public mind, conviction takes place by suspicion.

No, not by a public legislative committee. After all, in an organization such as that, headline hunting takes the place of judicial calm, and guilt is determined on the basis of the charge laid, regardless of the evidence.

It cannot be publicly done; it cannot be by public inquiry. If it is to be done in the only way available, namely through consideration by representatives on a panel, I suggest this, that first and foremost there should be the right to answer, and where there is any preponderance of evidence the security of the state shall determine the result.

But surely the principle of an anonymous tribunal need not necessarily be adopted in order either to preserve the security of the state or to assure justice.

A recent case in the United States is of interest. That is the case of Dr. Oppenheimer who was suspended last December, and who made his appeal to the atomic energy commission security board. That board made its decision yesterday, and by a majority of two to one determined that, while Dr. Oppenheimer was not guilty of any direct offence, in the interests of security the acceptance of his withdrawal in December, as requested, should be continued.

But apparently that is not to be the final move. In yesterday's issue of the Christian Science Monitor President Eisenhower is reported to have said that the Oppenheimer case is still going through a quasi-judicial process and that until the appeal was finally settled he would not comment.

In that I think there is a suggestion that might well be adopted in this country, namely that in any decision that is made adverse to the individual he should at least have available a quasi-judicial appeal, at which he could present his side of the case so that injustice shall not be done, and so that unfairness will not be allowed to pass unchallenged, while at the same time maintaining the security of the state.

After all, this is a very difficult problem to handle. It is one that challenges the ingenuity of those who would meet it. These things admitted, nonetheless I believe this. Every individual should have the right of appeal to a quasi-judicial body, not meeting openly, in order to give him the opportunity, whoever the accused may be, to place his side of the case before that body to the end that, in maintaining our security, we do not go to the length of making possible the sacrifice of an innocent man's future by the failure to provide those safeguards which freedom, throughout the years, has established to maintain and assure the maintenance of the freedom of the individual.

Only the other day I came upon a novel that was written in the first world war and which, I think, epitomizes what I have been trying to place before the committee. It was one written by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch. The title page reads as follows:

> The best revenge on your enemy is not to be like him.

The story that is revealed in this novel is of two antagonists, each steeped in hatred of the other and who, after years, grew to resemble each other so closely that at the end it became hard to tell one from the other.

Mr. Chairman, let us maintain our national security in the world of today but let us not go to the point that we sacrifice the freedoms for which we contend and imitate the thing we hate in order to defeat that thing. That represents the viewpoint that I think might be brought before the committee. It is not advanced in any spirit of criticism but in a realization that, in the cold war of today that seems destined to continue for many years in our generation, first and foremost in this citadel of freedom each of us must speak out to the end that there may be preserved that degree of freedom which will assure the mainsprings of resistance against the forces of communism. I do not believe that those mainsprings can be maintained by sacrificing them unnecessarily for the expediency of the moment.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take only a moment or two of the time of the committee to express my opinion with regard to the department run by the Minister of Justice. I think we as Canadians can all be proud of the groups of people who come under his jurisdiction, and we can all hope that they will continue to be maintained at the high standard at which they are maintained today.

I would refer particularly to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I think that every member of parliament and also a great many citizens of this country have heard the words of praise from visitors to this country with regard to their appearance, their efficiency and their integrity. I am glad to know that the present minister is maintaining that high standard in this extremely important force.

I should also like to pay him a compliment on the way in which our penal institutions under his jurisdiction have been maintained. I think we have every reason to be justly proud of the little trouble we have had in our penitentiaries in the past years. I also think that we can and should show the same admiration towards the judges of this country; and it is on this point that I wish to say the few words that I am going to say tonight.

The judges in this country have had the happy position of being well respected ever since the founding of the dominion. Anything that might happen to them to change this opinion of the people would be a serious detriment to the country. Since the end of the war there have been numerous cases where our judiciary have been used to arbitrate in industrial disputes. It may be extremely flattering to the judiciary to be picked as arbitrators on these boards, but I do not believe that this is a good way for the judges of our country to be used. To me the work of a judge in administering justice seems to be a different field from that of an arbitrator. It is necessary for an arbitrator to stretch justice one way or the other so that a plane of mutual understanding can be reached. I do not like to think for a minute that justice in our courts should be regarded as something that could be stretched one way or the other in order to meet some compromising position between two opinions. I do not believe the man lives who can spend weeks and weeks in making extremely important decisions which are not justice decisions but which are expedient decisions, without an effect being produced upon his opinions. I cannot help feeling that the people who sit and watch the performance in these arbitration cases cannot have the proper respect for the arbitrator acting as a judge after they have had the experience of watching one of these arbitration cases.

I think it is highly important to this country that some method be found to relieve the judges of the responsibility of accepting positions as arbitrators. Not only do we have the two different schools of thought—they are different; and I sincerely hope they will always remain so—but we have judges absent from their offices for weeks at a time when the lawyers in that community—and I am not a lawyer—have not the access to the judge which they should have. This absenteeism must make the position of many solicitors extremely difficult. I should therefore like to see the Minister of Justice spend the time that is necessary to make with the provinces the arrangements, which must be made, to return our judges to their benches, so that they may not be put in the position where labour leaders and management both feel that it is not justice that is being dispensed and where, in some cases, they will exhort their supporters to disregard the opinion of a man whose opinion should not be disregarded.

I would plead with the minister that he take the steps that are necessary for the discontinuance of this practice of using judges on arbitration commissions.

It may be that the judges should be paid more. I am not in a posiiton to argue one way or the other about that, but it certainly should be made perfectly clear that a condition exists now that did not exist ten years ago and it should not be allowed to continue for years. If the process of arbitration is to be permanent, if it is to go on down through the years, then it is time that we changed our system so that we will not have judges acting as arbitrators in labour disputes.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I will be brief but I have something to say. I do not doubt the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver East. I think he will get somewhere with the Minister of Justice, but his experience is not mine. I have sponsored a great many convicted people, I think about 172, released on permit or parole, and only three have failed. Even they did not fail very badly. One man was the worst because he could not keep away from liquor. My worst problem is not the police. The worst problem I meet in trying to rehabilitate some of these men is their own thinking. I have never had a boy under 20 years of age who was a repeater.

When the Prime Minister was minister of justice he said that it was in the best interests of human beings not to make them serve the full term of their sentences. Our present Solicitor General was kind enough to let me have a boy when he had only served half his sentence last week which shows that the Department of Justice and the minister have not changed their attitude. I think it is in the best interests of the man who makes a mistake not to make him serve his full term, and I think the Minister of Justice will support that statement.

We have a man in Fort William now who has been a repeater. I refused to sponsor him when he was released this time because I could not believe him. You have to judge a man by his conduct, and I am still hoping that some day he will change his mind and go to the proper source for help to overcome his difficulties. I must say that I have had co-operation from our police in Fort William. In the case of one man who was released on permit the mounted police went further in my opinion than I thought they should go, further than I would go because I was a little bit afraid that the man would not keep his word. That prisoner came from Westminster jail and not from Fort William.

The mounted police have co-operated with me splendidly, and I think that the hon. member for Vancouver East will find that the case he mentioned will be cleared up completely either by the Minister of Justice or by the chief of the remission branch. I do not doubt his experience at all. It is heartburning to a man who is trying to make good to be hounded. It is the duty of all of us to see that these men get a chance to make good. I thank the chief of the remission branch and the Minister of Justice for the co-operation they have given me. We have got to be very careful in recommending anybody for parole or release on permit. We should thoroughly examine the case in co-operation with the chief of police or the provincial police, and when we are convinced that the boy, man or woman wants to make good and is ready to be released we should trust them and co-operate all the way.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Fort William referred to me twice, and may I say that he and I are not far apart at all. As a matter of fact we are very close. I agree with him completely that the big problem is the man himself and I have never said anything different. When I spoke this afternoon I said not once but at least half a dozen times that in my experience the majority of the law enforcement officers in Canada, including the R.C.M.P., are doing a splendid job in assisting those who have served their penalty. I even said more than that. I said that from my personal knowledge many of them go out of their way to help.

I did say that there was a minority, a few if you like, who did not fall into that class. I drew that to the attention of the minister because, as I explained when I started, in my estimation a forthright statement by the Minister of Justice would mean a great deal to all the law enforcement bodies of Canada. From what the minister said I am certain that he understood me perfectly. The only one who did not understand me, who did not pay attention to what I said about the majority, was the hon. member for Prince Albert. Why he had to pick on my reference to the few is up to him. I think I know the reason why. But what I said was quite clear to the minister. I will give him the information and I am certain, as has been said by the hon. member for Fort William, that the case will be very carefully investigated in confidence because it involves some persons in the civil service.

While I am on my feet may I say one other thing. Strangely enough, once again I am going to do as I did when I started this afternoon, speak in commendation of the minister and his administration. No matter what party we represent, I believe that if we think the government is wrong we should criticize them as severely as we can, and if we think they are right and are doing a good job we should commend them. I am always prepared to do that and I always have. I have been most interested in an experiment that has been carried on now for approximately two and a half years in the British Columbia penitentiary. As it is an experiment, I presume that the authority for it must have come from the Minister of Justice. I understand it is the only penitentiary in Canada where such an experiment has taken place. It is not costing the government or the taxpayers any money. I am referring to the Dale Carnegie course in the British Columbia penitentiary. It was my privilege to spend two days in the penitentiary as a visitor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winch: I got in and I got out. Unfortunately the warden was not there on account of ill health, but in the two days I met all the top officials and a great many of the guards and they spoke in the highest terms of this course which was being conducted as an experiment. I spoke to a great number of the inmates, and they were high in their praise of the course. Since that time I have found out that for the last course, which I believe was the third, there were more applicants than the instructor could possibly take because he will not take more than 35.

Since I arrived in Ottawa I have received a number of letters from the inmates who took the first course telling me of the jobs they now hold since they have been released into society, and how this course completely changed their outlook and their attitudes to life. From what I heard from officials of the penitentiary, the guards, the inmates and those who are graduates of the course and who are now back in society, I am convinced that this is perhaps one of the finest experiments ever authorized by the Minister of Justice. It has proven itself in British Columbia. I should like to ask the minister whether he has received reports of this experiment and if so has he made any analysis of them? Is his conclusion that it would be worth while spending the taxpayers money to have the same experiment conducted in all the penitentiaries across Canada? I believe it would be a successful move to rehabilitate those who have broken the law.

Let me say again that I feel this is one of the finest experiments ever conducted. I congratulate the minister upon it. I believe it has proven itself in the one penitentiary to such an extent that it might now be advisable for the department to consider expanding it to include all the penitentiaries in Canada.

Mr. Hahn: Unlike the gentleman who has just taken his seat, it has not been my privilege to spend a day or two in the British Columbia penitentiary, even though it is in my riding. We are not happy about having it in that particular part of the riding, as the Minister of Justice knows, and that is one of the reasons I am rising at this time. I do wish, however, to commend the minister and the mounted police, as well as everyone else who has anything to do with the administration of justice in this country. I think they are doing an excellent job.

I should like to reiterate what the member for Vancouver East said concerning the experiment in the British Columbia institution. In so far as the effect upon the morale of prisoners is concerned, from all the reports I have been receiving I would say that everything the hon. member has said is completely justified. It appears that the experiment is a success.

However, to return to the removal of this particular prison. Many years ago when the district of New Westminster was a small district, it was decided to build a penitentiary along the Fraser river somewhere between what was then known as Sapperton, and the royal city of New Westminster. Since that time the city has grown rapidly, and it has now reached the point where it is almost impossible for anyone to buy property on which to build a home. The penitentiary, because it overlooks the Fraser river, is situated on property with one of the finest views in the whole of British Columbia. The city fathers of New Westminster have indicated from time to time that they wish to have the penitentiary moved. I should like to draw to the minister's attention that if it is possible to have a long-range program in connection with this matter of building penitentiaries certainly one of the first areas to be given consideration should be the New Westminster area. The penitentiary should be moved, let us say, to the Agassiz area, which I understand is desirous of having it, or in some other district that desires it.

Mr. Nesbitt: It has been suggested many times in this house during this session that the minister ought to hold a conference with the attorneys general of the various provinces with respect to the very urgent matter of death on the highways. At this moment I certainly do not propose to deal with that matter. I feel it is a very good suggestion, and the reasons for it have been set forth many times. If such a conference is held by the minister, there is a problem that I think should be on the agenda for consideration, and if such a conference is not held perhaps the minister might consider introducing appropriate legislation to deal with the matter.

The matter with which I wish to deal for a few moments is bicycles and the riders thereof. I am not concerned with adults who ride bicycles. I do not believe that is a matter for proper consideration. Bicycles are here to stay, and adults have to ride them to get to work. It is true that in certain countries, such as England, there are paths on the side of the highway along which adults may ride bicycles. There are certain highways in Ontario, I believe Nos. 400 and 401, upon which bicycles are prohibited. I do not propose to deal with the matter of adults riding bicycles. I am concerned with children who ride bicycles.

I fully realize that the matter of licensing bicycles, and the way they must be lighted, is the concern of the province. I do not wish to touch on that at all. The state is concerned, however, with the welfare of its children. Parents are supposed to be able to look after themselves, but they are also supposed to look after their children. Occasionally we find situations in which parents are not as careful of their children as they might be. In such a case the state has to step in.

Now, the bicycle is a vehicle which arrived before the automobile, and probably for that reason legislation in this respect has not been introduced. I am told, I do not know from personal experience, that 50 years ago there were very few cars on the highway. We had nothing like the traffic situation we have today. Consequently, whether the people who rode bicycles were 50 years of age or ten years of age made little difference. Today, the picture is quite different. Our highways are covered with cars moving at high speeds and with great power. More people own cars in Canada today than ever before. Traffic congestion on our highways, as we all know without going into detail, has become appalling and conditions in the cities are even worse.

Let us compare the bicycle with the automobile for a moment.

[Mr. Hahn.]

The Chairman: I wonder whether the hon. member would indicate whether he is dealing with a matter within the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Justice.

Mr. Nesbitt: I certainly am, Mr. Chairman. The Department of Justice can pass regulations affecting the person, not the vehicles, and it is to that I am directing my remarks. I am using a bit of background material to illustrate my point. It was recognized at an early date that people had to reach some degree of adult maturity before they were issued licences to drive motor vehicles, inasmuch as they were considered dangerous objects when driven at high speeds, and perhaps by persons without good judgment.

A bicycle is also a vehicle, albeit a human-driven rather than a power-driven vehicle. As I am going to show, a bicycle is just as great a menace when driven by a person without mature judgment as is an automobile. Children ranging from six to nine years who ride on the highways or other widely used public thoroughfares constitute a great menace not only to themselves but to the drivers of automobiles. It is my feeling that the minister should look into the matter as to whether or not children below a certain age—possibly sixteen years or fourteen years—should be prohibited from riding bicycles. I know there would be a great outcry if little Johnnie were to have his bicycle taken away from him, but I do insist that at the present time bicycles ridden by young children constitute a great menace.

I imagine most hon. members drive automobiles and have met with this problem. I do not need to give examples. I could say that only last week in my own constituency a horrible accident occurred resulting in the loss of two young lives. Apparently the question as to who was at fault is very much in doubt.

Only the other day when driving to Ottawa from Hull on the narrow interprovincial bridge a small boy who could not have been more than eight or nine years of age, and with an even smaller boy on the handlebars, was weaving in and out of traffic. Finally he fell off, and the smaller one with him. It was only by great good fortune that both of them were not killed instantly.

I do not think I need to say more on the subject, because any automobile driver knows exactly what I mean. In addition to the personal risk involving the loss of life of these young children, there is also the further fact that indirectly they cause other motor accidents. I am sure many hon. members have had occasion hastily to put on their brakes to avoid hitting a small child on a bicycle weaving in and out of traffic, or passing on the wrong side. Sometimes these young children ride down the street three or four abreast. They cannot help being a menace to traffic, and also to themselves.

The statistical material—

Mr. Garson: I dislike very much raising a point of order, but I really believe the subject matter which my hon. friend is discussing is clearly not our concern here, unless his proposal would be that we should make it a crime for certain persons to ride a bicycle. Since we have the power to pass laws making certain acts crimes that is the way we would have to do it. However, I believe most provinces have municipal acts under which the municipalities are empowered to pass bylaws regulating the riding of bicycles. And it is much better that they should pass such laws, because there would be many municipalities in which bicycle traffic would represent no hazard at all, while in others it would represent a great hazard. Each municipality should have the law which best suits its needs. With all deference to my hon. friend, I do not think it is a matter which comes under our jurisdiction here.

Mr. Nesbitt: I quite agree with the minister, that there are other considerations of which account must be taken. But I do point out that legislation could be introduced by the minister which would make it a criminal offence for a person of, let us say, under fourteen or sixteen years of age to ride a bicycle. I am only advocating that the minister examine the subject thoroughly.

He has just brought up the interesting point that in the backwoods areas, where there might be little traffic, there is no menace presented either to the child riding the bicycle or to automobile drivers, but that the situation is quite different in the more heavily populated areas. I am bringing up the point so that it can be considered, as I thought I had made clear at the beginning of my remarks.

If the minister has no objection I shall take only a moment to conclude what I have to say, by placing on record certain statistical information which, I might add, is not of much help to us.

An hon. Member: Why give it, then?

Mr. Nesbitt: The statistical information is not of much help to us, and if a conference is held I would hope that the minister would try to obtain further information. I feel this is a very important subject.

Figures from the Canada Year Book indicate that in 1950 there were 55 persons killed while riding bicycles in Canada—and these figures are exclusive of Quebec. There appear to be no traffic figures available for that province. In 1951 there were 55 killed, and in 1952 there were 52. However, the figures for injuries are somewhat different. In 1950 there were 1,656 persons injured while riding bicycles in this country—again, exclusive of Quebec. In 1951 there were 1,673 and in 1952 there were 1,874, showing a steady increase.

There has been no breaking down of these figures into age groups and, as I said before, the figures do not include Quebec.

As I suggested earlier, perhaps the minister might look into the problem and discuss it with the attorneys general of the provinces. It would be a step toward the saving of young lives, would prevent injury and also prevent the snarling of traffic on our increasingly crowded highways and thoroughfares.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I have been most patient. I had intended to talk on this item for two or three minutes about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but inasmuch as that subject has been discussed by several speakers, I shall make my remarks brief.

I might tell the minister that as a boy I had a very dim view of the Royal North West Mounted Police, as it was then known. I was in the woods fighting with a boy friend of mine, when a man who claimed to be a member of that force came along, arrested me and locked me up in the small wooden jail, in a room about 10 by 16. I was let out that evening and was thoroughly indignant, as you can understand.

A friend of ours owned a beautiful ranch, and lived within 10 miles of us. He had gone to Nelson for some time. This same self-styled police officer took another English settler out to that ranch, sold it to him, obtained his down payment and then left the district. Shortly thereafter we found he was not a member of the Royal North West Mounted Police, and naturally our opinion of the police force changed.

I listened with keen interest to what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I am sure those cases must be very few and far between. I know the minister will investigate thoroughly and give the results of the investigation to the house. I must say my experience for a good many years has been one of increased respect for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I have found them to be officers and men showing courtesy and tact. Since I was a boy I have known a number of inspectors, officers and members of the force. I served overseas with some of them, and have always been very much impressed by their impartiality and the high grade of their work. In my opinion their efficiency, courtesy and fairness has been demonstrated in my district on several occasions.

A most difficult situation arose in connection with the transportation of the Japanese to the interior. Most of them came to the Kootenays. The matter was handled efficiently and with courtesy. Every consideration was given to human feelings, and every sympathy was shown for these unfortunate people who were moved into that district at that time. Then, during the policing of those camps, there was nothing but general commendation of the attitude of the officers and men in charge of that work. The most interesting illustration is the occasions when the R.C.M.P. have been called in to deal with the Sons of Freedom. I think that is a test of discipline, of efficiency, of tact and of great forbearance under extreme provocation. When you come to handle anywhere from 100 to 300 or 400 naked Sons of Freedom you have an unusual problem from a police point of view, and a problem which puts the police under such circumstances under great provocation. I have personal knowledge, Mr. Chairman, of the very efficient and humane way in which the R.C.MP. handled several very difficult and tantalizing situations.

Previous to the remarks of the speakers concerning the R.C.M.P. I had intended to rise principally to point out also that their fairness, their impartiality and their knowledge of their responsibility to the people of Canada as a whole was well demonstrated on April 28 of this year when two R.C.M.P. constables stopped General Foulkes in a car, in which was sitting the Minister of National Defence, because the car failed to have the necessary licence plates. I have heard appreciation of that action expressed by a number of people whom I have met since then and during the last week, as I have just returned from opening one of the most important airports in Canada. This action on the part of the two R.C.M.P. constables indicates very clearly to the Canadian people that neither rank, prestige nor position is a defence against the law. I think it also indicates very clearly that the civil power in this country, those forces that are given the duty to administer the law, are still supreme, and I would suggest to the minister, as it has been suggested to me by persons who have discussed the matter with me, that those two constables deserve commendation from their senior officers for their impartial attitude in such circumstances.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Just before this item passes I should like to ask the minister two or three questions. Perhaps I could wait until the particular item comes up, but then I am always up against the proposition that I should have asked it before. Some weeks ago an item appeared in the London Free Press dealing with thievery at Camp Ipperwash. The item in the Free Press went on to state that civilians were stopped on the street of a town near Camp Ipperwash and that allegedly stolen goods were taken from those civilians right on the street. That seemed to me to be a rather unusual procedure. Since that time there has been a rather ominous silence as far as the newspapers are concerned. I have not heard anything more about it. Under what statute did the R.C.M.P. act in a case like that? What report, if any, has the minister regarding this alleged offence at Camp Ipperwash and the apprehension of civilians in those towns adjacent to the area? What action, if any, has been taken against the wrongdoers? Have any charges been laid? What happened in the matter? Personally, as far as I am concerned, from any experience that I have had with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, their work has been efficiently done, and I am just bringing this up because of the interest many of my constituents have in the articles that appeared in the newspaper at that time.

Mr. Garson: What was the date of that seizure?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I could not tell the minister but I will find it out for him.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend could get the date and particulars then I would have to make inquiries and find out what the basis was. There may have been a search warrant to seize these particular articles, but of course at the moment I do not know as to that. If my hon. friend will get the particulars I can find out for him.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. Garson: While I am on my feet I might clear up two other points that were raised by the hon. member for New Westminster about moving the British Columbia penitentiary from New Westminster to Agassiz. The difficulty here is that it would cost at least $10 million to replace that same penitentiary in a new location, and the salvage value of the present plant would be practically nil except for the land. So, as I have already informed my hon. friend by letter, the prospects of that sort of project being taken care of in the near future are not very great.

With regard to the Dale Carnegie course in British Columbia penitentiary, I wish to thank the hon. member for Vancouver East for the very complimentary and I think truthful testimonial he gave concerning it. He will be glad to know that in another one of our penitentiaries on the opposite end of Canada, the Dorchester penitentiary in New Brunswick, they have had two Dale Carnegie courses with very gratifying results.

Mr. Campbell: I have a question for the minister. Has the minister investigated the case of the thirteen-year-old boy who was incarcerated in the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary about a year ago?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I did. I investigated it by writing to the solicitor general of the province of Quebec. If my hon. friend is interested I would be glad to show him, or read into the record if necessary, the solicitor general's explanation of it which we found to be, under all the circumstances, satisfactory.

Mr. Campbell: Is the boy still there?

Mr. Garson: Yes, he is still there and will remain, I am afraid. Perhaps I had better read this letter, which will explain the reason why he is still there. The commissioner of the penitentiaries came to me about this boy. He was very much disturbed, as I am sure anyone would be, that he had been presented to the penitentiary and was there. There was an irregularity with the warrant of commitment, and he refused to receive him on that account and turned him back. Of course that defective warrant could easily be cured, and in the meanwhile I telephoned to the solicitor general of Quebec. This is the letter I got back in reply. It is dated October 24, 1953, and addressed to myself from Quebec. The letter follows:

Dear Sir:—

Unfortunately, I did not get the information concerning the two cases about which you spoke to me over the phone yesterday on time to call you back yesterday afternoon. I tried to reach you this morning, and I understand that you will be at your office only on Monday. I take the liberty of writing you today, and I will call you again on Monday when, I hope, you will have this letter on hand.

The cases of these two young kids, in my opinion, should be treated differently.

First—

And then he gives the name which I do not think I should read into the record. I continue:

First—this young boy has been sentenced to two years in penitentiary on the 28th September, 1953, for assault. His record convinces me that he is a bad character, vicious, homosexual and that it is not possible to entertain any hopes for his rehabilitation in one of our reform institutions.

His father and mother are separated since nine years. The father lives in Montreal, and apparently does not take care of his son. The mother is a prostitute and of a very low character.

In 1948,—was placed in one of our protection schools at Levis. He was then charged with indecent assault. He escaped from that institution and continued to commit these assaults on other children, boys and girls, even with his young brother. On the 10th June, 1949, he was sentenced to five years to the reform school. From there, he went to an insane asylum to undergo treatments, and he went back home.

On the 9th December, 1952 he was again sentenced to reform school for theft, and went to our institution at Mont St. Antoine in Montreal, from where his mother succeeded to get him out on the 17th May 1953, in spite of the refusal of the director of the institution. Blank escaped and went as far as Saskatchewan from there he was brought back by the R.C.M.P. in August, 1953. He then re-entered the reform school at Mont St. Antoine. He escaped again from that institution and went back to Chicoutimi. Arrested in Quebec for vagrancy, he appeared before the juvenile court and was then interned in another reform institution from where he again escaped and he then went back to Chicoutimi where he committed an assault with bodily harm on the person of his grandmother. He was then sentenced to two years in penitentiary. It appears to me that there is no danger that the atmosphere of the penitentiary is liable to have a bad effect on his moral character. I would rather think that Blank may have a bad effect on those who are already there.

In this case, I do not think that the sentence should be disturbed. This boy is a danger for the community, and apparently our reform institutions for young boys do not succeed in preventing him from escaping.

Under the circumstances with a proper warrant it is pretty hard with our responsibilities to reject the custody of this young lad, although I am sure I express the views of all of us here that so far as our penitentiaries are concerned generally we would very much prefer not to have young people in them at all below an age much older than that of this young boy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many are there?

Mr. Garson: Not a very large number.

Mr. Nicholson: Was this the young lad about whom the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam inquired?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I think that is the one.

Mr. Campbell: That does not sound the least bit like the boy that I saw in the penitentiary, and it does not compare with the report the officials of the penitentiary gave us when we were there. In fact, they told us that the boy had been sent there as a monster, but they took the opposite view. They said the boy was a nice boy, a good boy, and a well behaved boy.

An hon. Member: Perhaps they wanted to get rid of him.

Mr. Campbell: That is the report we received from the officials of the penitentiary. Perhaps they did not tell the whole story. Is the minister certain this is the 13-year-old boy? Or is there one besides the boy mentioned last spring? There is only one 13-year-old, as far as I know.

Mr. Garson: This is the boy in question.

Mr. Nicholson: I would like to corroborate what my colleague for The Battlefords has said, and I am sorry the minister has not a report from his own officials. Is this a report from the attorney general of the province?

Mr. Garson: No, not the attorney general, the solicitor general.

Mr. Nicholson: Well, I am sorry the minister has not a report from his officials at St. Vincent de Paul. Like the hon. member for Vancouver East, I spent one day in the penitentiary—a day at St. Vincent de Paul with some of my colleagues—

Mr. Fulton: Pity they did not lock the doors.

Mr. Nicholson: —and I am happy to say that I got out again. But while I am on my feet I would like to congratulate the minister on the splendid work being done at the federal training school and at the penitentiary too.

The St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, built before confederation, was originally designed to hold 400 criminals and they now have 1,200 within its walls, so it is very crowded. The federal training school is designed to give these young chaps under 25 a new start in life and I would like to speak very highly of the personnel both in the penitentiary and in the federal training school. We visited both and I wish the minister would get a report from the officers of the federal training school where this 13-year-old lad is.

This young boy happens to be the same age as our son at home and I just cannot believe that he is the villain that this report indicates. I agree that the parents have had a very bad record, and it is my view that society should be judged for the environment in which this young boy has lived. Apparently he has done a lot of travelling, and I believe is threatened with t.b. While I was there he asked for the privilege of demonstrating his scooter to the visitors. The convicts at the training centre were playing volley ball in the recreation centre and this young lad came out with the scooter which had been presented to him by the officers and staff. He shot in and out among the players and appeared to be a likeable boy.

I think he is probably in a much better environment in the federal training centre where he has good food and friends who are trying to help him. It is their hope that they may be able to find a home for him. I wish some married couples in this country who have had the misfortune of not having children in their homes could see this young lad as we saw him there. He is a favourite with the members of the staff and they would like to see him given a better chance than the prospect of having to spend the rest of his life in the penitentiary.

I would ask the minister to get a report from the officers in the federal training centre on this particular case for I am sure that report would show a wide discrepancy compared with the report the minister put on the record.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the various words of criticism and praise that have been applied to the R.C.M.P. and I am not going to make any extended remarks along that line.

I have a very high regard for the R.C.M.P. Those members of the force whom I have known and with whom I have had anything to do have been gentlemen and have attempted to do a real good job. I believe the historic tradition of the R.C.M.P. still lives on.

Of course, we have got to recognize that there is a difference in the constitutional make-up of all men and that includes policemen. You find some who are pretty abrupt and have perhaps the police complex, but you find others who are very courteous and chummy.

I recall on one occasion I was driving at night and suddenly in front of me I saw a flashlight going on and I thought I had better stop in case there had been an accident. I stopped and it was not long before an R.C.M.P. constable came up to my window. I pulled the glass down and he more or less bellowed into my ear, "Where is your driver's licence?" I was a little taken aback, but I held my composure a bit and I said, "Why, it is in my pocket." He said, "Let me see it," and I said, "Well, I will if you say 'please'." And that took him aback a little bit and I had a little more time in which to recompose myself. I said to him, "I will tell you what I will do. I will let you see my card and I will be pleased to show you my driver's licence if you ask nicely for it." I added, "There is such a thing as common courtesy."

I gave him my card with my name on it and he walked around my car and came back again and he was writing something down. I fancied he was writing down the licence number, and I put my car into low gear and began driving slowly away. Then I put it in second gear and it was not long until I was away. He never saw my driver's licence. I rather expected that I might receive a subpoena to appear in police court the next day, but I never received one. I just say that I do not think that is particularly characteristic of our R.C.M.P. However, there is a difference in their make-up. We cannot expect them to be smiling at all times although, when they have a little job to do, it is nice if they are pleasant. Mr. Chairman, I did not rise necessarily for the purpose of saying that, although I want to go on record as saying and believing that the R.C.M.P. for the most part are an extremely commendable force.

I rose particularly, Mr. Chairman, to bring to the attention of the minister something that I know he must be greatly concerned about. The background of what I have to say originates in the case of a young man who, not so long ago, committed a murder, was sent up for trial and was sentenced to be hanged. He was a young man just 18 years of age. Fortunately—I fancy fortunately; in some people's view, fortunately—the remission branch commuted his sentence to life imprisonment. The whole case caused a tremendous stir throughout this nation, particularly in the community in which the crime was committed and the trial was held. Much publicity was given to the case by press and radio, and I followed it with a good deal of interest. It seemed to me that the whole case was one involving what today we commonly term the problem of juvenile delinquency. I know that the minister has a tremendous job on his hands, but this matter is becoming a serious problem not only to this nation but also to other nations. I refer to this sort of hoodlum gang of teen-agers who seem to roam our streets and thrive on wickedness. I assert that they are no good to anyone and that they are really a blot on our society. The case I mentioned gave rise to a good deal of comment and a good deal of extremely sound editorial comment. I want to congratulate the press on their editorial comments. They brought out some fine suggestions and observations not merely with respect to the case itself but with respect to the whole matter of juvenile delinquency.

I have been greatly interested in this subject for a good many years because I have had some little experience in directing and running boys' summer camps; and I have taken a course or two in the study of youth and related subjects of that kind. I used to hold that there never was such a thing as a bad boy. But sometimes, in my problems, my mind would wander and I would begin to take a different position altogether and to conclude that there never was such a thing as a good boy. Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, the basic problem of juvenile delinquency is there. We can talk all we like about punishment and about the punitive angle in relation to our criminal law and yet ignore the influences leading up to the crime that juvenile delinquency can be charged with.

There must be some basic reason for the problem. I know that the minister is just as greatly concerned about the problem as is anyone else. After all, he is responsible for the administration of justice throughout the country. Basically, I think the problem can be stated in this way. There is a disregard for the eternal concept which has been true throughout human history—the concept, in fact, that cannot be escaped—namely that a man is a responsible being, responsible to his fellow man and to his Creator and Judge. I have no use for this mollycoddling of young people whenever they do that which is wrong.

My friend the hon. member for Vancouver East stated this afternoon that he was glad to see that we were coming to a time when we were doing away with the punitive angle of our whole concept of administering justice in respect of crime. I do not know that I altogether agree with him in that particular statement. At least I am not glad. We may be getting away from the punitive principle in relation to crime. However, he did not state that at the same time crime was on the increase. I agree with him in a good deal that he said. I agree that in the rehabilitation of criminals there must be something more than simply punishment. However, I am still just old-fashioned enough to believe what Solomon said about sparing the rod and spoiling the child. Yet I am a family man and am extremely proud of my family and of the way they have turned out. However, that is neither here nor there.

I know the problem must give the minister some concern because we read in the papers not long ago what was said by a commissioner appointed, I believe, by the Quebec government. I think that is so, although the newspaper report does not say so. I will read it to the minister. It is headed "Too Many Youth in Penitentiaries" and reads as follows:

Too many Canadian teen-agers are being sent to prison, the federal penitentiaries commissioner says in his report for the year ended March 31 last.

Commissioner R. B. Gibson said in his report to parliament—

I fancy he means to the legislature.

An hon. Member: Parliament.

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps the minister will correct me there. The article continues:

—that, of the total penitentiary population on March 31, 564, or 11·4 per cent were under 21 years of age.

One boy of 13 was doing a term,—

That evidently is the one referred to a little while ago.

—seventeen others were under 16 and forty-eight were 16. Major General Gibson lamented the fact that so many Quebec youngsters were being sent to jail. "The continuing committal of youths of 14 to 18 is a matter of grave concern. Too many youths are being sent to the penitentiaries for lack of an adequate number of provincially operated reformatory institutions. Probation is not being used to the extent possible as an alternative to incarceration."

I read that because I know the minister must be concerned with the situation, but nevertheless I still maintain that the more important thing is that there must be influences leading up to the point where there is such a thing as juvenile delinquency. I know the minister's problem is one of administration of the law after crimes have been committed, and I am talking about something else for which I can hardly make him responsible.

The reason I rise on this occasion is to put forth something that is of tremendous interest to me, and I am just wondering if he has considered whether his administration can be correlated with other organizations throughout the country, municipal, provincial and so on, that are doing their best to obviate juvenile delinquency. What I have in mind is this. We have often heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare say that his department is very much concerned with preventive medicine. That is good. We often ask him what he is doing in connection with the health of the nation and he says that he is interested in preventive medicine. I think we should ask the Minister of Justice to what extent his department might be able to exercise influence in preventing crimes rather than spending so much time and energy in administering the law after crimes have been committed.

There are several matters that I think I might refer to under this head. Not so long ago Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, who is Britain's home secretary and is charged with enforcing the law and bringing criminals to justice, made a speech in which he gave a number of reasons for the phenomenal increase in crime during the last decade. He had this to say:

There used to be a feeling in regard to the ordinary unimportant aspects of life that when one did wrong it was an offence to God as well as an unpleasant thing to do. It is vitally important that there should be the recognition that crime is wrong in the moral sense and that punishment is deserved. This view is often absent from the minds of those who come before the courts.

The problem which most impresses me is this: Can we, in the second half of this lunatic twentieth century into which we have been born, make the spiritual stature of man at least approximately commensurate with the scientific advances for which he is responsible? If we can, the hopes of changing a mad century into a sane one are enormous.

The same gentleman, Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, said that there were perhaps four things that are responsible for juvenile delinquency in particular, and I know that the minister cannot control them. He said that the first one is the lack of parental control. I am afraid that he put his finger on a vital spot. I believe our parents have got to indicate to their children that when they do wrong punishment is sure. Personally I have no use for all this talk which I label a sort of quack psychology. The second cause to which he referred is the increasing problem of broken homes which contributes to juvenile delinquency. The report the minister read concerning the 13-year-old boy indicated that he has the background of a broken home. The third point, said Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, is that false values are propagated by motion pictures and the modern pulp literature. I want to dwell on that for a moment because here is where I believe the Minister of Justice and his department can be of some help.

I know they claim to have no jurisdiction over the censorship of motion pictures, but there is no question in my mind that motion pictures as they are shown on the screen today have a tremendous effect upon our juveniles. Television is now beginning to come into its own in Canada and if it is permitted to go to the same lengths in what it portrays I rather despair of the juveniles of the coming generation. If I had my way, Mr. Chairman, I would not permit a hold-up scene to be shown in a motion picture theatre. If I had my way I would not permit guns to be fired in any scene shown in a motion picture theatre. I would not permit murder to be shown. Neither would I permit a drinking scene. Some people may scorn that view—

Mr. Blackmore: But you are right just the same.

Mr. Hansell: —but the proof of the pudding is in what is happening. That is the proof. The modern motion picture is largely responsible for what youngsters learn about these things. When people are grown up and are mature, sensible and stable the situation may be a little different. Certain motion pictures are advertised as adult entertainment and some of the teen-agers say: This is going to be juicy, we will go to see it. These are things that have to be faced, and I say that we must tackle this problem from the standpoint of the influences that lead up to the commission of crime.

We do not have to go very far from this building to see the results of the hoodlum gang. Go to some of the restaurants and drop in for a pot of tea at the time when young people are leaving the dance halls and the "pubs". I have done that. I like a pot of tea before going to bed, and I can tell you that on one or two occasions I actually have been frightened enough to leave the restaurant. On looking around outside I was not able to see a policeman anywhere. Perhaps they know what is happening and they are around the corner somewhere out of sight. You do not have to go far to see the results of what I call the hoodlum gang.

There is another cause responsible for juvenile delinquency, the lessening of the power of religion—

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: —in the ordinary affairs of life. I do not say this because of my profession. I think it is common sense that if any boy—or girl—is brought up to believe that he is responsible to his fellow men and to his Creator, and that crime is punishable, and is taught to respect the great moral principles of life, he will have before him the greatest deterrent to crime that could be devised. However, I am afraid that is seriously lacking.

I am not going to talk tonight as though I were talking to a conference of preachers, because I know I am not. Believe me, if I were talking to a conference of preachers on this subject, I would give them hell.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Hansell: I am rather hard on preachers. I believe they have a real job to do. There are too many soft soapers instead of facing right up to the real facts of life. There is too much mollycoddling of that which is wrong, and countenancing of that which is wrong by saying they do not mean any harm. Let us not kid ourselves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, those are some of the things which I believe are lacking in our social life today. I come now to the main point. I should like to ask what the government can do about it. Well, I think they could do a lot about it. I do not know that I want to focus the responsibility for this on the Minister of Justice. Perhaps he will say that is someone else's department. I believe that this government should bring into existence throughout this country great recreational institutions, parks, and so on. They could be put into operation with trained young people as leaders, men and women who are expert along that line. It is done in a very small and modified way by some municipalities, but I believe it could be done to a greater extent. There is need for youth leaders to go out and create in young people today a real regard for the moral principles of life.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member will agree with me that perhaps I am entitled at this time to ask him if he will please get back into the Department of Justice.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with you, but I do not agree with those who applauded you. There is one other point I should like to mention. I do not know whether or not it is possible for the Department of Justice to introduce any particular law of this kind. They may say that it is outside their jurisdiction altogether. I am a great believer in the curfew. I am a great believer that young people should be home at a proper time. I am a great believer that the place of young people at night is in the home. Some of our smaller municipalities have the curfew, and I think it works well. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice agrees with that, but I should like to have some expression from him as to whether his department has seriously considered some method whereby they could synchronize their work with the various organizations throughout the country to curb, so far as possible, this thing which is becoming, as we must recognize, a menace to our social life and to our country; this thing we call juvenile delinquency. I feel the minister should answer that question and tell the committee just what he thinks can be done.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure many members of this house sitting here tonight must have been shocked, as I was, to hear some of the words which have just been spoken. I think it is a great pity that the vast majority of devoted and earnest clergymen in this country should have been maligned by an ex-colleague, whose associations have apparently been most unfortunate.

Item agreed to.

163. Remission service, including $10,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies, as may be approved by treasury board, $137,276.

Mr. Dinsdale: I notice there is provision in this item for $10,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies. Tonight I have been listening with interest, in some cases, to a discussion of the situation prevailing within prisons and penitentiaries. Many tributes have been made to the improvements that have taken place in these institutions since the end of the war. I would agree heartily with those statements. It has been rather interesting to hear the several members confess their respective criminal records so far as contact with prison institutions is concerned; that is all to the good, I am sure, because open confession is good for the soul.

I, too, have some confession to make. I belong to the pre-Archambault report group of folk who were associated with prisons and penitentiaries in this country. I know that there is now a vast difference in the internal atmosphere as compared to the years 1938, 1939 and 1940, when I went in and out of several penal institutions in this country. I do not want to emphasize that particular aspect of the problem; that progress is excellent. I should like to say, however, that good institutional care is of little value unless some attention is given to the matter of after-care, the very crucial period in the experience of a prisoner when he is trying to re-establish contact with the community.

You can house him in a palace, you can subject him to all the remedial programs that there are in the book of modern penology, but unless something is done to soften the shock of readjustment to the outside world then there is great possibility that the improvement in conditions in the institutions will be wasted. We are all aware that particularly servicemen, who spent four or five years in some branch of the armed forces, had to pass through a rehabilitation program. Life in the services was so unique, cutting them off from regular society, that considerable sums of money were spent in helping the servicemen to readjust themselves to society.

I think the same problem faces the prisoner who has spent a period of time in one of the penal institutions. First of all, he becomes somewhat of an institutionalized personality who has been subjected to a more or less rigorous routine, and who has been suddenly projected into the outside world to fend for himself, and who often finds such adjustment very difficult indeed.

From my three years' active work in this field I found that the real problem of the prisoner begins after discharge. He is not too badly off when he is under institutional care. But upon release he faces for the first time the social stigma of being branded as someone who has served time. This confronts him first of all in hunting for a job. A good many prisoners find it almost impossible to re-establish themselves in civilian occupations, because as soon as their prison records become known to prospective employers, their chances of obtaining work are gone. I would point out that because of this stigma which attaches to penal servitude, even the Canadian civil service will not employ a discharged prisoner. I know that on many occasions we could not find employment for discharged prisoners in ordinary positions. This was in the early days of the war. We arranged a scheme whereby we contacted farmers out west who would accept responsibility for one of these discharged prisoners until such time as he could fend for himself in the labour market. In most cases the only chance of securing employment was where it was possible for the agency working in the field of prisoner rehabilitation to make contact with a sympathetic employer who understood the circumstances and was willing to co-operate in helping a prisoner make a successful readjustment to society.

There has been much comment this evening on the efficiency of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is one of the finest police forces in the world; but I discovered that, although the situation is improving, sometimes municipal police were not too much in sympathy with the after-care problem of the discharged prisoner. If a crime occurred in a local area the municipal police would proceed immediately to investigate thoroughly any of the men in that area who had prison records, and would not be too careful in their approach to the matter. They would approach an employer and reveal that a particular employee had a criminal record, with the result that the employee again found himself foot-loose and fancy free.

This reference to recognized prisoners' aid societies provides an opportunity to discuss this very important problem. There has been some comment to the effect that in Canada we do not use the parole system as widely as possible. Certainly we do not use it to as great an extent as one finds in the United States or even in the United Kingdom. The experience in those countries has shown that wherever possible it is desirable to get prisoners out from under institutional care as quickly as possible, so that they may make a successful readjustment in their communities. Certainly there is no merit in prolonging the period of imprisonment within an institution. Today, when the emphasis is on the remedial rather than on the punitive aspect in the treatment of criminals, the desire is to get the criminal back into society so that he may fill a useful place in the community with his fellow citizens.

There are three private agencies operating in the field of prisoner after-care. They are the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society, and the Salvation Army. I would be interested to know just how far the federal government goes in supporting the excellent work of these private agencies in this very important field. I repeat that the best institutions in the land, equipped with all modern techniques, psychiatrists, psychologists, work programs, and all the other aids, are of little avail unless we can overcome the problem that arises when the discharged prisoner comes in contact with society. It is not his performance in the prison institution with which we are concerned; it is his performance as a free citizen in the broader community.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister to answer my question.

Mr. Garson: I am not sure whether I have properly comprehended the main point of my hon. friend's question, but I hope he will correct me if I have not done so. I understood him to be asking what we can do to prevent juvenile delinquency.

Mr. Hansell: To synchronize the work of your department with that of other organizations in Canada which are attempting to prevent juvenile delinquency.

Mr. Garson: So far as the rehabilitation of prisoners is concerned, we can do and we have been doing a great deal. When the prisoners enter a penitentiary they come in contact at once with a classification officer who is a trained psychologist and who, in relation to each one of them, makes out a card index record. He discusses with them their previous history, their family background and aptitudes. He prepares a study of their cases in the same way that a personnel officer does in a large and efficient industry. He keeps in periodical contact with each prisoner during his whole term in prison, and advises him as to the vocational training course he should take. He advises him as to the way in which he can rehabilitate himself after his discharge. He makes contacts with organizations such as the John Howard Society and the Salvation Army, which will provide the after-care about which the hon. member for Brandon spoke. In that way he assists the discharged prisoner to make a successful rehabilitation as an honest man in civilian life.

Our record is a very good one in the matter of the rehabilitation of prisoners who have been in our penitentiaries. The rate of recidivism from our institutions is very much lower than it is from any of the other institutions in Canada, and is improving all the time. But if my hon. friend is speaking about the prevention of juvenile delinquency and crime, the prevention of the coming of prisoners into the penitentiary in the first place, then I think he is dealing with a subject matter which, in almost all of its aspects, is the responsibility of the provinces. Take the matter of the curfew. We have no authority over that, likewise we have no authority over the censoring of the movies; we have no authority over the enforcement of the laws that we pass here with regard to crime comics or obscene literature. It was contemplated when our country was created that the federal government would have all those functions which deal with national matters—defence, banking and commerce and the money supply, the interest rate, interprovincial railway and highway traffic, interprovincial commerce, international affairs and the like. On the other hand all of those matters which related to the individual as a person, education, property and civil rights, and that sort of thing, all local institutions and controls come under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments and legislatures.

The only way in which we can assist in the prevention of crime where it originates in the local communities is by helping the provinces discharge their responsibilities by means of dominion-provincial tax agreements and other like arrangements. By these means we have tried to put every province in Canada in a position to provide a reasonable minimum service under all of those heads, if they wish to do so; but we have no direct contact with or direct responsibility for most of the influences that would have to do with the prevention of crime.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: I do not want to hold up the item, but I want to say a word with relation to the staff of the remission service. In our association with the special committee on capital and corporal punishment, some of us, myself included, have come to realize—others may have already done so—the difficulties of the very important and hard-working branch of the department. I just want to say that I know the minister's difficulties in connection with the staff, particularly the senior staff of that branch. I should like to hear from him what steps are being taken to ensure that this branch and his department generally will be adequately staffed. I know he has difficulties in that regard which we can perhaps help him to overcome. I know the minister's department is rather short of staff at the moment.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Fleming: Ten o'clock.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 4, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR—EMPEROR HAILE SELASSIE OF ETHIOPIA

Mr. Speaker: This morning there occurs one of those very rare but indeed very happy occasions, when it is my privilege to draw the attention of the house to the presence in our gallery of a most distinguished visitor. I refer to His Imperial Majesty, Haile Selassie, Emperor of Ethiopia. I take it as a great honour to be able, in your name, to extend to him a most hearty welcome. If ever a man possessed the virtues of courage, perseverance and love of country, it is the Emperor of the ancient Kingdom of Ethiopia. We cannot but admire the statesman who, in the darkest hour, when the league of nations had unfortunately decided to recognize the conquest of Ethiopia, stoutly answered, "Whatever the world will do, my people will fight on until they have forced the invader from the country or are themselves exterminated."

From then on he worked hard and prepared himself for what was to come. He had refused to bow to brute force, and once more in the history of the world faith and honesty were to triumph. I need not recite all the events which took place but a few years ago, events which are well known by all of you. Yet, it may be useful to recall such great deeds for the benefit of those who will come after us.

It was on January 15, 1941, that Haile Selassie arrived in Ethiopia from his Sudan headquarters, and there unfurled his red, green and yellow banner, rallied around him some of his faithful warriors in a secret rendezvous, and inspired his subjects to raise their arms and join a gradually expanding army. A few months later he returned to the throne and in less than a year, with the help of the allies, his beloved country was again completely free and independent.

(Translation):

Having extended a most cordial welcome to His Majesty Haile Selassie I, Emperor of Ethiopia, to this parliament, in Ottawa, and recalled the virtues of faith and courage which have inspired his conduct in life, I would feel remiss in my duty were I not to associate my French-speaking colleagues in the tribute I have paid him on behalf of the members of this house.

(Text):

There is not much more to be said at this time, except perhaps to recall briefly that although geographically our countries may appear far distant, they are very close together in the way of understanding and fraternity. This becomes evident when we stop to think of the numerous Canadians now living in Ethiopia and helping to make of that great country a country greater still, of a deserving nation, a happy and prosperous nation.

To Your Majesty we express our thanks for coming to Canada, and our regret that your visit must be so short. When you leave us, you will carry with you, I assure you, the best wishes of the people of this country for you personally, and the members of your family, your parliament, and your valiant people.

DIVORCE JURISDICTION

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 470, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, this bill, as I indicated a few days ago, might be referred to as an act for the relief of parliament.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—REPORTED EVICTIONS IN WINDSOR AREA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Public Works. As it is based upon a wire I have just received, I have been unable to give notice. Has the acting minister any comment to make on the report today that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is serving eviction notices on unemployed tenants and home purchasers in the Windsor area?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister of Public Works has just handed me a telegram sent to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I am not aware of the situation, but I will make inquiry and report later.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT— REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ADDITIONAL CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister in connection with an order for return passed on May 26 for the production of correspondence passing between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan in connection with the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project. In view of the fact that the government has now replied to a letter of the premier of Saskatchewan, would the Prime Minister consider tabling that letter and making it available?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The answer that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is preparing to a letter of April 28, I believe it is, of the premier of Saskatchewan, is under active consideration, and I hope that it will be dispatched within the next couple of days. A copy of it would be filed at the same time as the other correspondence.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS TO POST OFFICE ACT AND MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Having informed us of measures coming forward, can he tell us when we may expect to see copies of amendments to the Post Office Act and the Municipal Grants Act, and also when we may expect to proceed with those two pieces of legislation which have been announced?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that the amendment to the Post Office Act is now before the other house.

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think that is so. It will probably come here from the other house either today or very early next week. With respect to the other legislation—

Mr. Abbott: It is on the order paper, in the resolution stage.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. St. Laurent: The resolution is on the order paper, and will be called as soon as it can be reached conveniently.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out, on a question of privilege, that I feel it would be desirable to have some indication of when it will come forward, because the presence of that resolution on the order paper has prevented the introduction of other motions relating to this subject. I would like to have an assurance that we are proceeding with it, and some indication of when we may expect to do so.

Mr. Abbott: The resolution stands in my name. I will be happy to bring it before the house just as soon as it suits the convenience of the house. We seem to be making fairly rapid progress now in connection with the estimates, and if we can dispose of a few things, such as contempt of court, and one thing and another, in the next day or two, we may be able to bring it in.

Mr. Drew: Since this has to do with the proceedings in the house, may I point out that the suggestion that there is any delay in proceedings is not consistent with the practice of this house, and that we have reached a stage in the session when it will be highly desirable that we have information in regard to an act which affects many municipalities in this country, and also is covered by a resolution which has had the effect of preventing our introducing a resolution dealing with this subject in another form—which we have indicated we believe would be a more satisfactory procedure.

I think therefore the time is more than due for this to be dealt with, so that we can have the act before us, study its effectiveness and deal with it more satisfactorily when it comes up.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

The Chairman: We will proceed with item 295. May I inform hon. members that they will find the vote at page 43 of the blue book, and the details at page 360.

Customs and excise divisions—

295. General administration (including the former customs excise seizure expenses and adjustments), $2,822,515.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I understand that we are to deal specifically with the customs and excise divisions this morning, and that general remarks may be postponed. Does the minister propose to make a statement?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Chairman, by way of a brief explanation, I should like to speak for a moment or two on the estimates which are now before the committee.

These estimates cover the operation of the customs and excise division of the Department of National Revenue, consisting of the headquarters at Ottawa and their operative branches, consisting of some 232 ports and 104 outports situated throughout the country. As the committee is aware, this division is closely associated with the industry and commerce of the country through its control of imported goods and the collection of customs duties, as well as excise and sales taxes, and of the excise duties on alcohol and tobacco products. There is also a more pleasant association, at least from the importers' point of view, through the procedures for the refunds and drawbacks of duties and taxes remitted under certain conditions.

In addition to this relationship with industry and commerce from which, by the way, we derive by far our greatest customs and excise revenue, this division is concerned with a phase of work which is more familiar to the general travelling public, that of examining persons, motor vehicles, aircraft, trains and ships entering Canada.

A third phase of the division's activity is supervision under the Excise Act of those licensed establishments who manufacture or use alcohol or tobacco in the manufacture of their products.

In keeping with the general development of the country, more goods were imported into Canada in the fiscal year ending the 31st of March, 1954, than ever before, there being over 60,000 more import entries than in the fiscal year 1953, which reached an all-time high of 3,365,695 import entries. Again more vehicles than ever before travelled back and forth across our boundaries. In the fiscal year ending 1954, over thirteen and a half million vehicles, carrying returning Canadians and Americans, entered Canada, which was over 900,000 more than the fiscal year ending March 1953. In the calendar year ending 31st December, 1953, there were over one million more vehicles entering Canada than in the previous calendar year.

You will see in the estimates an increase in the number of positions and in the amount for salaries. This is directly related, over and above the general increase in civil service salaries, to the increasing amount of work which this division is called upon to perform. I should like to tell the committee that the staffing of our ports is rigidly controlled on a systematic basis, whereby the department can gauge very accurately the number of staff required at ports in relation to the amount of business which is presented to and processed through the port, the hours of service required for the general and importing public, and the number of points of duty which have to be manned by customs officials at international border points throughout Canada. I think the committee will agree with me that in this division, which is responsible for the collection of revenue, amounting to over $1,518 million in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954, any arbitrary method of staff restriction which is not realistically geared to the actual facts could result in a loss of revenue, if by physical inability, inadequate customs and excise examination and supervision resulted.

The estimates as tabled before you show an increase of $2,643,131, but 95 per cent of this is accounted for by salaries and wages, the remainder being made up of such things as law and other costs, uniforms, telephone, telegraph, teletype costs, and so forth.

At the same time there is a decrease of $86,400 in vote 298, construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment over last year's estimates.

I shall be pleased to answer any questions from the committee concerning these estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have listened with interest to the recital by the minister of the mounting activity, accompanied of course by the mounting work, and I have also listened with interest to his explanation that the additional amount being expended is nearly all salary increases.

I was surprised that the minister said nothing about one aspect of the work which seemed to me important, and which I thought he would refer to because of the legislation which was passed in December last. I refer of course to the amendment of the Customs Act, which proposed to deal with dumping. I should like to recall to the minister one or two of the things which he said in December last. I should like to recall that he and others stressed that this was not a tariff measure, that it was a measure of law enforcement; and I wish that could be said loudly enough so that some people of the baser sort would not insist, as soon as anyone speaks about the enforcement of the tariff law, that he at once becomes a high-as-Haman's-gallows tariff man. It was made very clear in this debate on both sides of the house that what we were attempting was the enforcement of law. I propose to ask the minister to give us something in the nature of a progress report on the act and its effects, on the steps which have been taken to make it effective, and on the results. I should like to remind the minister briefly of one or two things which he said in December last, as reported at page 674 of Hansard as follows:

> This revision of the law is designed to help meet the difficulties arising from end of season and end of line imports which are dumped into Canada at abnormally low prices.

He also said:

> I should make it clear to the house that the proposed amendment is fully consistent with our international obligations.

Everyone will agree that the progress of events since that time, the existence of substantial unemployment, the manifest difficulties which certain industries are finding, and in general the whole trend of business from a seller's to a buyer's market justifies us in asking the minister to explain in more detail what steps have been taken to make the enforcement satisfactory, and just what the results are.

Last autumn the minister explained that calculations of prices relevant to the operation of the act would have to be made over a period of months. At page 977 of Hansard he referred to the training which would have to be given. I understand that certain special procedures were contemplated. I wonder whether the minister would now make a general statement, which I suggest should include first of all whatever changes of method, including staff, have been carried into effect and second, just what results, if any, he feels have been achieved. I might say I understand that general comments which would ordinarily be made on the first item are, in this case, being reserved until later.

Mr. Gillis: Before the minister makes that statement I should like to say this. I have to go out to a committee, and I wish the minister would include something on this point. The Minister of Finance has a bill on the order paper to amend the customs tariff. In schedule B of that bill it is indicated there is to be a change with respect to goods on which there is a drawback; that the drawback is to be removed. I wish the minister would explain whether that has reference to coal imported from the United States and used for metallurgical purposes? That coal now is subject to a drawback which practically wipes out the 50-cent tariff on it. Will the minister clarify the point as to whether it refers to that particular import?

The Chairman: I just noticed that the hon. member for Greenwood, after making some remarks which I considered were somewhat general, and which would ordinarily take place in the general discussion on the first item, indicated that the general discussion might take place on a later item. I have not been informed of any such arrangement. It would of course be in the hands of the committee if such an arrangement were entered into. Might I be informed of the intention in that regard?

Mr. Harris: The hon. member for Greenwood has correctly stated the situation. In order to arrange the business of the house it was found convenient to have the debate on this matter take place at a more convenient time later so that the matters which required question and answer could be dealt with now, and then at a later time one could make the general observations that he wished to make.

The Chairman: Is that agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McCann: If I may, I would answer the question of the hon. member for Cape Breton South having to do with the matter of drawback at this time. That has gone through the resolution stage and of course will be in the bill presented by the Minister of Finance. I suggest it would be better if his question were brought up again when the bill of the Minister of Finance is before the committee. It is really a matter of settling policy.

I should like to draw to the attention of the committee that the Department of National Revenue is an administration department entirely. When the statutes are handed to us we do the best we can to administer them according to law.

Mr. Gillis: Thank you.

Mr. McCann: With reference to the other matter brought up by the hon. member for Greenwood, this of course has reference to the change that was made in December last, in this session, in the Customs Act whereby the valuation for duty purposes was changed. Subsection 6 was added to section 35 of the act, which attempted to deal with a particular problem that presented itself at that time, and probably to a certain extent continues to come before us and will continue to come before us for some time. The amendment at that time was to this effect:

> (6) Notwithstanding anything in this act, where the market price of any manufactured goods in the country of export—

I would draw the committee's attention particularly to that last sentence. It continues:

> —has, as the result of the advance of the season or the marketing period, declined to levels that do not reflect in the opinion of the minister their normal price, the value for duty shall be the amount determined and declared by the minister to be the average price, weighted as to quantity, at which the like or similar goods were sold for consumption in the country of export during a reasonable period, not exceeding six months, immediately preceding the date of shipment of the goods to Canada.

I think I should perhaps read the rest of the instructions which were given to our officers in an attempt to carry out this provision of the act:

To give effect to the purpose of this amendment, collectors, appraisers, and any officer acting as appraiser, are instructed to closely scrutinize the invoice values of all manufactured goods, comparing such values with home market values shown and certified on previous importations of similar goods by the same or other importer. In any case where invoice values indicate price decline, such as is contemplated by the foregoing valuation provision, or the values appear abnormally low, the importer is to be advised that the entry may be subject to amendment in accordance therewith. The invoice is to be forwarded to the department with as full information as possible and the reasons for believing that the value shown is below the normal value, in order that the matter may be inquired into and the value for duty established as provided for by the new subsection of section 35.

This instruction was also issued to our collectors:

For the purpose of administration of section 35(6) of the Customs Act, referred to on page 1-44 of the book of instructions to port officers—

We send out instructions to all port officers as to how they are to carry out the law.

—importers are to be instructed to advise their suppliers that customs invoices covering manufactured goods of the type contemplated by this section will require to show, in addition to the usual fair market value and selling price data, the highest price at which like or similar goods were sold and delivered for home consumption during the six months immediately preceding the date of shipment to Canada. Typical of the goods which might be affected by this section are style fabrics, dresses, textiles, shoes and purses; refrigerators; automobiles. This list is illustrative only and is by no means exhaustive; and officers should use their own judgment in determining whether other goods are affected at their individual ports.

Mr. Macdonnell: What was the date of that report?

Mr. McCann: These were the instructions given outlining the method by which we attempted to put this section of the act into effect.

Mr. Macdonnell: But what was the date?

Mr. McCann: One was dated February 26, 1954, and the other, issued on December 7, 1953, was issued just after the act was amended.

That will give hon. members some understanding of the action that has been taken by the department to implement this amendment to the act. I am sure we are all interested in the results of that action. While we can give some definite result, I would suggest to the committee that it is impossible for anyone to determine to what extent importers have been deterred from making importations into Canada of those goods so affected because of the fact that they would not know at that time just what the amount of the invoice would be. Therefore, I cannot say to what extent this has affected importations. I simply do not know, and I suggest it is hard for anyone to make an accurate estimate.

However, the method we have followed is to send appraisers to other countries which were disposed to export end of the line or end of season goods to this country, and appraisals are made of the prices and of the range of prices for six months previous to the time of export.

Our figures in that connection show that the average weighted price over the period has not been far off the initial price at which that type of goods has, in the first instance, been sold to the people in the country where they were manufactured, and that if exported to this country it closely approximated the price in the first instance.

That applies to a variety of goods and we have a wide quantity with reference to printed piece goods; model 82 refrigerators; model L3 refrigerators; model 105 refrigerators; embossed cotton piece goods; again, refrigerators of different types; more cotton piece goods, which include a long list now under investigation. That list includes drapery fabrics, drapes, shirting, denims, corduroy, synthetic piece goods, cotton piece goods, upholstery, floor coverings, plush fabrics, and here I am giving only a partial list to indicate the cases which are still under investigation and have not yet been included.

Mr. Macdonnell: Could the minister give us the values involved, roughly?

Mr. McCann: Yes, I could give the values in some of these instances. For example, and going back over the imports, clothing and wearing apparel made from woven fabrics, women's and children's dresses made wholly from cotton, and giving the number of pieces, in the month of January 1953, there were 45,330 pieces valued at $107,000—

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister permit a question? What I am trying to get at is the amount involved in the report which you have received and which, as I understand it, you are now investigating. I want to know whether we can fully assess the material results of the act.

Mr. McCann: Do you wish to have the total amount in a definite period?

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, I think that would show—

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I cannot hear too well down here in this corner, but my understanding was that this first item was to be allowed to stand. Could we have an explanation as to whether a decision was made in that regard? I do not see any point in proceeding with this discussion if the item is to be allowed to stand.

The Chairman: As I understand it, there was an agreement reached to the effect that the items be subject to question and answer and that the general discussion would take place on a later item.

Mr. Nicholson: Well, Mr. Chairman, if we are not going to carry the item at this stage, I do not see any point in continuing with this discussion. We hear a good deal about extravagance and waste, and it was announced last night that we would be going ahead at eleven o'clock. The officials who are here today are men who have a very pressing responsibility and I do not think it is fair to have them here over a long discussion. I wonder if that matter could be cleared up.

The Chairman: My understanding is that the item will be carried when the questioning is completed, but that the general discussion which would ordinarily take place on this item will be deferred. I think perhaps one thing which might conveniently be resolved at this time is the item on which a general discussion will take place. I should think hon. members would wish to know with some certainty when the general discussion will take place.

Mr. Nicholson: As long as there is an understanding that we are not going to spend the whole morning or the day and then have this item stand, and as long as we know whether we are to have the discussion on the first item or not, I will be satisfied. Will the leader of the house indicate what the decision was? Is this item to stand after we have spent some time on it or is it to carry after we are through discussing it?

Mr. Harris: My understanding was that we would proceed with the questions and answers so that information could be obtained, and that if hon. members then chose to have an extended general debate on customs, it could be deferred. It does not really matter what item is used for the general discussion. I would give the assurance there could be one. But I took it that rather than having at the moment extended speeches of a general nature with respect to customs matters, an effort would be made to ascertain, with the officials present, information which could perhaps be the basis of a later general discussion.

Mr. Drew: There is one feature of this situation that I think has been causing a great deal of concern to many of the members of the House of Commons, and not only to those on this side of the chamber. As has already been pointed out by the hon. member for Greenwood, the question of the level of the tariff is not at the moment in any way at issue in this discussion. Unfortunately there are those who seek to confuse the public mind—and I regret to say that they do so deliberately—by the suggestion that any comments about the appropriate application of anti-dumping legislation is an expression of a high-tariff policy.

Let us in the first place recognize the fact that this government has continued the policy of tariffs—and in some cases substantial tariffs—but that the question of tariffs is not the one before us. This party has indicated its belief in Canada's ability to proceed as effectively and as efficiently, with a proper level of taxation, as any people can under comparable conditions. We are dealing now with something quite different from the long-debated question of high or low tariff, a subject which has not been before us for discussion in the present session or in recent sessions.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I just heard an impatient interjection of "question" by someone who is not anxious to listen to any discussion of business now before this committee.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I just finished outlining the understanding between our own members and hon. members of the party of the Leader of the Opposition. The remarks which the Leader of the Opposition is now making are completely out of order with respect to that understanding and I wish to give notice that the understanding is ended.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the understanding is ended in a complete misapprehension and in a most unfair manner. What I am dealing with is entirely on all fours with the understanding. I am coming to the suggestion that has been made outside of this chamber—and even by members in it on the other side—that these discussions on anti-dumping legislation had to do with principles relating to tariffs. I am dealing with the question of anti-dumping legislation and I understood that was the subject before us. Unless I have misunderstood the situation, it is my purpose to proceed to discuss the effect of the anti-dumping legislation. I resent any suggestion that there has been the slightest breach of any understanding that existed with regard to the transaction of business in this chamber.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the Leader of the Opposition heard me say twice that the understanding was that we would have the question-and-answer period and not have the general discussion. Both from what the Leader of the Opposition was saying before I interrupted and from what he has said since then, I gather that he proposes to make general remarks with respect to anti-dumping legislation.

Mr. Drew: No; that is not correct.

Mr. Harris: If that is not correct, I myself am under a misapprehension. However, I am sure that had he proceeded much further I would have had to say, on behalf of hon. members, that they should be at liberty to make the type of statement that he is making; and that would abrogate the understanding.

Mr. Knowles: Where is the understanding now?

An hon. Member: Let us have questions.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there can at no time be too great a rigidity in the procedure by which questions or other matters are put before this chamber; otherwise the whole procedure in parliament becomes a farce. I was anticipating what may be said. I now direct a question to the minister as to whether, in view of what I have said, it is not correct that the announcement today by Rhys M. Sale, president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, with regard to the lay-off of 6,650 men in the Ford plant in Windsor alone is not a question directly related to the application of these anti-dumping provisions and whether also the further lay-off of 2,700 employees at the Ford plant in Oakville—oh, no; I am just reading the dispatch that has been handed to me—the 6,650 employees are at the Windsor and Oakville plants.

Mr. McCann: Is the Leader of the Opposition suggesting that automobiles are being dumped into this country?

Mr. Drew: I am asking the question whether any inquiry has been made as to the situation resulting from the possible importation into this country of automobiles of different types, not only from the United States but from other countries, and its possible application to this situation. I do so in view of the fact that we were led to believe that automobile production was at its highest level and we are now told that there is going to be a cut-back of at least 15 per cent this year, with extremely serious consequences to employment in the automobile industry.

An hon. Member: Building up British trade.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, there is no evidence at all that we know of that automobiles are being dumped into this country. I suggest again that this is neither the place nor the time for the consideration of the policy. Our department is entirely administrative. I must insist that if there are questions with reference to the administration we shall be glad to attempt to answer them. If hon. members want to deal with policy with reference to trade and imports coming into this country, all well and good; that matter can be discussed on the estimates of the Minister of Finance. I am not here to answer his questions.

Mr. Knowles: Not yet.

Mr. McCann: Not yet; and I hope I may continue to say "not yet". Our department is the administrative arm of the government with respect to customs, excise and taxation. I am not supposed to be here to answer questions upon the subject of what the policy of the government is. The proper person to address those questions to is the Minister of Finance.

I will attempt to go back to the hon. member for Greenwood and give him the results of the application of the policy and how those compare with a year ago. That is the point at which this other discussion was interjected. I want to say that importations for the first four months, were as follows, with reference to what I said before, of clothing, wearing apparel made from woven fabrics, cotton dresses, women's and children's. Those are the big items. For each month I could give the number of pieces, the value for duty in our country, and the comparative value as between the month of January, 1954, and the month of January, 1953.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the minister—

Mr. McCann: Excuse me a minute. Of that particular type of material 23,514 pieces were imported in 1954 as against 45,380 pieces valued at $107,000. The price in January, 1954 was $2.35 per piece compared with a price of $2.38 when the valuation for duty purposes section went into effect. In February the value per piece is $2.54—this is the invoice for duty purposes—compared with $2.14, for March $2.96 compared with $2.38, for April $3.35 per piece compared with $2.97.

You understand the significance of that. It means that in the last instance the value for duty purposes per piece was $3.35 compared with $2.97. These figures indicate to me at least that the value of these invoices per piece went up to $3.35 from $2.97, a difference of 38 cents per piece. When an invoice comes in and, by reason of our investigations, it is changed from X dollars and a different value is put on it up to $3.35 and duty is paid on that, that certainly must be a deterrent to importers to bring end of the season and end of the line goods into this country, and our manufacturers would have the advantage of that increase in price.

Mr. Drew: I assure the hon. member and the minister that I have no desire whatever to introduce any heat or acrimony into this discussion of the estimates. I was under the impression that the questions that have been asked by the hon. member for Greenwood, and the points that have been put forward were entirely within the understanding that had been discussed, and the hon. member for Greenwood had referred to this question of tariff as a necessary protection to the interpretation that is sometimes placed on the discussion of this matter. I am raising something that has only been brought to my attention within the last few minutes which has to do with what appears to be a very serious situation developing in the automobile industry. I would point out that if there is some other place within these estimates where this should be discussed I am prepared to discuss it then.

I was under the impression, however, that the administration of this act is under the minister, and that if, for instance, there were to be an inquiry into the situation in the automobile industry similar to that which is to be conducted with respect to the textile industry, it would be appropriate to place that suggestion before the minister whose estimates are now before us. If I am incorrect in that, I am prepared to put it forward otherwise, but if the hon. member has had an opportunity to read the announcement that just came over the wire a short time ago he will know that the president of the Ford company has announced that, contrary to earlier expectations, a drop in production—

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order, I wonder whether all hon. members will be permitted to take part in a discussion of the very serious unemployment situation that is developing. I am sure a number of members in this group would like to take part in such a discussion if it is in order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this is the house of parliament and it is the duty of parliament at the earliest appropriate moment to deal with matters of importance. This is something that will very seriously affect not only Windsor and Oakville but all other communities supplying the various parts of these automobiles. It is an entirely unexpected development, and I submit it is the duty of parliament to place the facts before those who have a substantial measure of responsibility in this matter at the first opportunity. I will simply ask the minister if it is not so that it would be within his power to order an inquiry in relation to the application of the anti-dumping measures administered by his department similar to that which is to be conducted with respect to the textile industry.

Mr. McCann: Of course I think the Leader of the Opposition knows that it is not within my power to instigate any such investigation. To date there is no evidence that this condition of unemployment in Windsor and the releasing of a number of employees there has anything whatever to do with the importation of automobiles into Canada either whole or in parts. I heard the announcement over the radio, and apart from that I know nothing about it. My understanding is that the lay-off is for a short period of time and it may be due to changes in design or patterns or some part of the establishment being held up. I think that it is probably due to lack of consumer buying. I have heard that there is a war on between the Ford people and General Motors and that they have large inventories of stocks. Therefore I would not be a bit surprised that probably as the result of increased inventories it has been necessary for them to take this step. But at this time I can assure the hon. member that it has nothing to do with dumping into this country.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit one question? Did he not hear the whole of the radio news item—

Mr. McCann: No, I did not.

Mr. Knowles: —which was to the effect that only a portion of the lay-off is temporary and a large portion is not.

Mr. McCann: I did not hear the whole thing.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister's figures of recent prices compared, I understand, with those of last December seem to indicate a rather satisfactory situation, that is to say, that from the point of view of the customs administration the prices for duty purposes are now somewhat higher. But I should like to get at this point. Could we get figures showing comparative prices some months earlier? Furthermore, and this is particularly what I want to get, how many reports have been received in response to the two directives which were sent out? It seems to me that would give us an indication as to how large a situation there was requiring treatment.

Mr. McCann: I am unable to give the exact number of reports that have been received but it must have been very considerable because I have given the answer with respect to where action has been taken and I have given information as to the great number of cases that are under investigation at the present time. This does not mean that delivery of these goods is not made to the importer or buyer. We reserve the right to reconsider and reassess the amount of duty that shall be paid. That means that with respect to these items and commodities under investigation the final determination has not been made of the amount that shall be paid on the invoices because the invoices may be reappraised and corrected.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not asking the minister for an exact detailed figure but surely he can indicate to me whether they have received scores of reports or hundreds of reports. I merely want a rough figure.

Mr. McCann: All over the country it would run into hundreds of reports from the different ports.

Mr. Macdonnell: So that you have the situation of hundreds of reports coming in indicating a situation which requires the consideration of the department under the terms of the act of last December.

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell: You have these cases under review now.

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Last December, when the matter was under debate in the house, the minister gave us a good deal of information as to how typical prices in the United States were arrived at. Was I correct in understanding then that the organization for finding those prices was going to be set up?

Mr. McCann: That is right. It has been.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister say a bit more about that? While I am on my feet, I have one other question. I think he spoke about four countries being involved. Am I correct? I thought I heard that somewhere in the minister's statement. Well, I abandon that and I would ask the minister to give me further information as to the method of organization to make the situation more shipshape and watertight.

Mr. McCann: I might indicate to the hon. member for Greenwood that since December we have taken on 26 additional appraisers. These people are delegated from here to examine into exporters' prices, and are operating from here in the United States.

Mr. Macdonnell: Are these officials all in the United States?

Mr. McCann: No, not all in the United States at the one time.

Mr. Macdonnell: Where else?

Mr. McCann: Some of them are in the United Kingdom. We are communicating with some other people with a view to having appraisers accepted in their countries. You just cannot walk in, you know, and send an appraiser into a country that is exporting something into Canada, then have him investigate prices in the country of origin. There has to be negotiation with these countries, and as the need arises we do that. Presently, our people are in the United States and Great Britain principally because they are the biggest exporters to this country.

Mr. Knowles: The minister indicated that investigations were being made—under the provisions of the statute that has been under discussion—into a number of lines. As I listened to the list, it seemed to consist mainly of textiles and clothing items, but he referred also to refrigerators. Could he say what kind of refrigerators he had in mind? Could he say whether any other items of household equipment, such as stoves, furnaces and so on are under investigation?

When he answers those questions, could he say something as to the effect on Canadian importers which might arise from the knowledge that duties on these imports could be increased several months after the goods have been brought into the country? There are those who suggest that this is having a deterring effect on the importation of such goods as household equipment.

Mr. McCann: In answer to the hon. member's question, I am informed that the type of refrigerators that have been imported are mostly household refrigerators. There have not been many other articles of household effects.

Mr. Knowles: I mean are they electrical, ice or gas or all three?

Mr. McCann: It is hard to answer what particular type, whether they have been electric, ice or gas. They would all be subject to the dumping duty if they were end of the line or seasonal stuff that were being shipped into Canada. So far as the type goes, the list only indicates the different models. There are a lot of different models, and I presume the model means the size.

So far as the application of the dumping duty is concerned, the department administers it with due care and reason. So far we have had no complaints from the importers because of delay or because of the unfair application of this valuation for duty purposes.

Mr. Knowles: I suppose, however, the department would not know whether any importers were refraining from trying to import because of the fear of what would happen.

Mr. McCann: No, I emphasized that at the start. There is no one who can determine how many importers have been deterred from making importations by reason of the application of this section.

Mr. Knowles: I realize that it is a point on which statistics would not be available. There are some of us who fear that that is what is happening. There is another subject, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask questions about, but if the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has a question in the same field, I shall yield and come back to this later.

Mr. Montgomery: My question is related to the administration of this amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Go ahead.

Mr. Montgomery: I am not quite clear, and perhaps the minister could make it more plain, who instigates this action to increase this duty. Is it the department on its own initiative that gives instructions to the customs collectors at points of entry or does the department just act when a request is received from an industry? For instance, you raised the duty on these textile goods, and it went up from month to month. Who instigated that? Was it your customs men at the border who took action as the goods came through or was this done at the request of an industry? I should like that cleared up.

Mr. McCann: I am sure that if the hon. member is conversant with what has happened within the last few months he will know that public demand and governmental action brought about the amendment. This parliament passed it, and that was the start of it. We, as administrators, through our appraisers put into effect the application of the amendment. We did not instigate it, we applied it. Does that answer your question?

Mr. Montgomery: I am afraid I am not making myself clear. I readily understand that the act was amended as the result of the demands of industry generally. The point I have in mind is this. Suppose I go to the United States and buy some article, such as a refrigerator, a radio or piece of household furniture. I bring it to the border. Is it the duty of the customs inspector, regardless of whether the article is listed on that list, to check the price and raise the invoice? Who is going to decide whether the invoice should be raised at the border?

Mr. McCann: That is what our appraisers are there for. That is what we are paying our good money to them for, to appraise these goods at the price—

Mr. Knowles: Is it good money?

Mr. McCann: It is the very best; none of this new stuff. Perhaps the hon. member was not here at the time I read the instructions giving effect to this amendment. Collectors, appraisers and any officers acting as appraisers are instructed to closely scrutinize the invoice value of all manufactured goods and compare such values with the home market values shown and certified by previous importations. They have a pattern there to follow. What would a refrigerator like this be invoiced at a month ago? They can look that up. Why would this one be invoiced at $25 less, even if you brought it to the border yourself. We compare it and put up the valuation, and you pay the duty on that increased value.

Mr. Montgomery: I want to go a step farther now; that is not the end of it. Then these appraisers that you have are sent to the country of export to investigate and ascertain if this price that has been arbitrarily set at the border is fair and reasonable?

Mr. McCann: No. The point is this: Is the value at which they are exported the fair and reasonable value, comparable to the price at which they have been selling in their own country, under comparable conditions? But if at the end of a season they want to dump 10,000 manufactured articles into this country, or so many thousand yards of end of the season or end of the line, we say, "No, you cannot do that unless you invoice them at a value based on the weighted index of what you have been selling them for in your own country for the last six months, prior to this export".

Mr. Montgomery: How does the collector at the border know that these goods I am bringing in are end of the line goods?

Mr. McCann: He does not know. But here is the further instruction:

> The invoice is to be forwarded to the department with as full information as possible of the reasons for believing that the value shown is below the normal value in order that the matter may be inquired into and the value for duty established, as provided by the new sub-section (6) of section 35.

Mr. Montgomery: I thank the minister for being patient with me. But in those instructions I heard him read there is no mention of end of the season.

Mr. McCann: You have to read the instructions in conjunction with the section of the act.

Mr. Nickle: The minister has referred to differentials in prices for the various months of 1953 and 1954. Those prices, I presume, are the appraised prices for duty purposes, are they?

Mr. McCann: These are the declared prices on their invoices, by the importer.

Mr. Nickle: These are the invoiced prices, not the appraised prices?

Mr. McCann: No, not the appraised prices; they are the declared prices.

Mr. Nickle: Could the minister give us an indication in respect of the piece goods to which he has referred as to the final appraised price for duty purposes placed on these particular items by his department?

Mr. McCann: I do not know that we can give that information to the hon. member, because we must always be careful not to disclose the business of individuals or firms to the public.

Mr. Nickle: The minister has indicated that the invoiced prices on a particular item is a certain amount. Is he giving away any more information there than he would be giving away if he gave us the price for that same item established by his department for duty purposes? In other words, how big a spread is there between the invoiced price and the appraised price for duty purposes?

Mr. McCann: It would vary from item to item. But the indication I have given is that in April a year ago, let us say, the price was $2.97 and now it is $3.35. So that you have that invoice jacked up to the extent of 38 cents per piece. And the percentage of that would be about 10 per cent above the price at which similar goods would have been invoiced, and were invoiced, in April a year ago.

Mr. Nickle: We have a spread here from $2.97 to $3.35. That $3.35 price which the minister mentioned a minute ago was the invoiced price. In other words, the invoiced price, the actual cost of the goods in the country of origin, has increased in the last year; is that correct?

Mr. McCann: That is correct.

Mr. Nickle: On this particular item the invoice now is $3.35. What is the appraised price for duty purposes placed on that particular item?

Mr. McCann: This would be the appraised price, too, in this instance.

Mr. Nickle: What would be the invoiced price, the actual cost of these goods in the country of origin?

Mr. McCann: That would not make much difference to us, because it would be on a percentage basis. We would compare the invoiced price with the actual average price for six months in the home market.

Mr. Nickle: From the minister's own statement the cost of these particular items, these piece goods, has gone up in the last year. Yet, presumably, a higher rate of duty is being applied against them through the application of this anti-dumping legislation. I was perhaps under a misapprehension that the price had somehow taken a big slide or slump in the last year, and that the goods were being dumped into Canada at prices considerably below the prices charged for the same items a year ago. Yet, according to the minister's statement, we have the invoiced price substantially increased, and now subject to a still higher rate of duty, through the application of the anti-dumping provision.

Mr. McCann: The whole point I attempted to make in giving these figures was that the legislation of December has had some effect in bringing the price up to a level that would represent a fair market value of the goods in question, as against the dumping price. So we have a price of $3.35 as against what you might call the dumping price of $2.97.

Mr. Nickle: I can come to only one conclusion from that, sir, and that is that the price quoted at $3.35 for this item is not the invoiced price of that item in the country of origin but is, rather, the appraised price which the minister's department has placed upon it. In other words, it is the appraised price for duty purposes, and is not the invoiced price.

Mr. McCann: It could be the invoiced price accepted by us, and then would be also the appraised price.

Mr. Nickle: The minister says it could be. May I ask if we can have submitted or read to us, or placed on the record in some way, a comparative statement covering, let us say, the first four months of 1953 and the first four months of the current year. That would be a comparative statement for all the items where there has been a difference between the invoiced price of the manufactured article and the appraised price for duty purposes? In other words it would include all items where the anti-dumping ruling has been applied.

In that comparative statement could we have a breakdown of the type of item, the volume brought into Canada, and then the following information: The appraised price, by items and by total value each month for each item; the appraised price for duty purposes per unit and per total value for each item; and, finally, a statement for each item for each month showing the total increase in duty imposed on all those items upon which anti-dumping legislation has been applied?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, that would be a monumental task. Before I would attempt it I would have to revise these estimates and ask for an extra appropriation to carry out the work—because an enormous amount of work would be involved. If there is any particular item that the hon. member is interested in, about which he wants information, we shall try to get it from the department for him. But such a general request as the hon. member has made, I am afraid, would cost an awful lot of time and money and would need a lot more employees in the department.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, actually what I am asking for would not involve a great deal of work. There are a very limited number of items, certain textiles, refrigerators and a few other miscellaneous items, against which the anti-dumping legislation has been applied since it was passed a few months ago. Surely, sir, it would be possible to list in very simple form the particular items, refrigerators, textiles and the rest, against which this legislation has been applied. List them by item, volume and prices, and then wind up with a statement of increases dollar-wise in duties which have been applied in an effort to protect the Canadian manufacturers, presumably, against those foreign imports.

Mr. McCann: We shall take note of the hon. gentleman's question and try to give him some information with reference to the query he has made. Perhaps it might satisfy him if we gave him typical examples rather than all the invoices and all the types of goods. I think what he wants is something to indicate what has been the general increase as a result of the policy which was adopted a few months ago.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. Nickle: That is right, sir. Could the minister not give us the information say on one particular type of refrigerator, any one, his choice, from the list he has there showing the duty?

Mr. McCann: I am afraid I have not that information with me.

Mr. Nickle: Is there not another item against which the legislation has been applied on which the minister could give us information as to invoice price, appraised price for duty purposes and the increase in duty that has resulted?

Mr. Macdonnell: Before the minister answers may I add a word? I myself was going to ask for something of that kind, because it seems to me that the figures we have now do not really carry conviction with them. It is reassuring to a point to take the December figures and the present figures and to infer from them that a lesson has been learned. It seems to me that if the minister could suggest one or two items in which we could have a comparison running back it would help. I should like to see a comparison not merely with the first four months of 1954 and December last, but with the first four months of 1954 perhaps with similar months of 1953. In any event, perhaps the minister and his officials can suggest some way in which this comparison could be made effective without all that work which I am sure none of us wishes to cause.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask a few questions about mixed fruit. I am still one of those simple souls who thinks that mixed fruit is mixed fruit and not peaches. That seems to have been the source of considerable argument, and I do not suppose the argument is over yet. I raise the matter because there are still one or two questions that I want to ask directly on the issue as to whether mixed fruit is peaches or not; also I want to question the way in which the Department of National Revenue is dealing with matters that come before the tariff board where the Department of National Revenue is involved. I recognize that the tariff board comes under the Minister of Finance, but my interest is not in the administration of the tariff board, but rather in the nature of the recommendations made to the tariff board by the Department of National Revenue.

Perhaps I might take just a moment to put on the record what has been the issue in respect of this question as to whether mixed fruit is peaches or not. As I understand it, there are in the Customs Tariff several items which fix the rate of duty on peaches and on one or two other items of fruit. In all cases these are tins of fruit. Then there is the n.o.p. item, "not otherwise provided". It appears—

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, does the hon. gentleman think this matter ought to be discussed now when it is still before the court?

Mr. Knowles: I would be interested to know if it is before the court.

Mr. McCann: Yes, it is.

Mr. Knowles: In what way?

Mr. McCann: It is still before the Exchequer Court, in that we have the right to make our appeal. Our appeal, if any, has not been heard at all. As far as the department goes, the importers made an appeal, and there was a judgment of the president of the Exchequer Court; but the department has the right to appeal, and that has not yet been heard.

Mr. Knowles: At the moment I am seeking information; I am not arguing.

Mr. McCann: That is the position.

Mr. Knowles: Let us get this straight. As I understand it, there was an appeal from the tariff board to the Exchequer Court of Canada. The Exchequer Court issued its decision, in effect confirming the decision of the tariff board. I do not know that there has yet been an appeal from the Exchequer Court ruling to the Supreme Court.

Mr. McCann: No, there has not been; there has been an appeal from the decision of the tariff board to the Exchequer Court by the department. Do not forget there are two parties to an action that comes before the tariff board. Here were the Department of National Revenue and the importer, and the tariff board gave a decision. The importers made an appeal to the Exchequer Court. That appeal has been dealt with. The Department of National Revenue has the right to make an appeal to the Exchequer Court.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: May I add a word?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order; there are several lawyers around, including yourself, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to know what the situation is when a court has made a decision and no further appeal has been made. Is such a matter sub judice?

The Chairman: I am not familar with the particular case, but might I point out this. I understand that, in accordance with our rules, a matter is not sub judice if an appeal has not actually been filed. I do not know whether an appeal has been filed in this particular instance. If it has not been filed, I do not think I can rule this subject out as being sub judice. On the other hand, may I draw to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the agreement which was apparently entered into earlier this morning, and the point of order raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie. If my understanding is correct, it is the wish of the committee that we confine ourselves to questions and answers at this time and general discussion will take place at a later date. Although I do not think I can rule the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre out of order on the ground that it is sub judice, I do think that they are perhaps not in accordance with the agreement which the hon. members have apparently arrived at.

Mr. Knowles: I am very happy to accept both of your rulings. Have you been able, sir, to ascertain yet which item it is that has been fixed for the general discussion? I am prepared to defer this discussion to that other item if I can be told which one it is.

The Chairman: I have not yet been informed of any item, nor has the committee come to any agreement on that point.

Mr. Macdonnell: I might attempt to assist the situation. My understanding is that general discussion would take place on item No. 299, general administration of the taxation division. I think the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration agrees with that.

Mr. Harris: I was under the impression that the understanding had ended about half an hour ago.

Mr. Macdonnell: I thought the withdrawal had been withdrawn. That was my hope.

Mr. Harris: I am most anxious to accommodate hon. members but when one member breaks that understanding, even if—

Mr. Macdonnell: Not consciously or intentionally.

Mr. Harris: Well, I cannot be responsible if hon. members are not aware of the understanding and certain things follow from that. But as far as the general discussion is concerned, if hon. members want to make speeches with respect to the customs items on the general item on taxation then I have no objection.

Mr. McCann: Oh, no!

Mr. Harris: Will the minister excuse me a moment? He, of course, will be in the position that he will understand these are direct statements and will not lead to any answers. The officials are here by arrangement this morning and we have already had one hon. member seeking to make a general statement. As I said, I thought that that had ended the discussion, though I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wishes to say—

Mr. Knowles: Wishes to say a few things and ask a few questions.

Mr. Harris: —a few things, and there is no reason why he should not have that right when the Leader of the Opposition exercised it.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I think it is only fair to mention that the Leader of the Opposition made it quite clear, in the point he raised, that he was asking questions which he thought related to the matter under discussion, namely the application of the December amendment in relation to dumping. He made his statement and said he was asking these questions as they applied to the particular subject which was agreed to be the subject for discussion this morning. I thought that had been made quite clear and the understanding had been respected, and we were carrying on under it. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that that is the position and we should now so continue.

Mr. Harris: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might proceed with his general remarks. If I interrupt him at about the same point in his remarks that I did in the case of the Leader of the Opposition, we may find that he too intends to observe the understanding.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am not too sure as to the meaning of that remark, but I am in a very co-operative mood this morning, and the leader of the house can confirm that, because these arrangements have been changed so often this morning that I have forgotten how many times they have been made and upset.

However, Mr. Chairman, I shall not take very many minutes to deal with this matter. I do not intend to debate the issue of whether mixed fruit is peaches. The department ruled one way and that ruling was that mixed fruit should be classified as peaches and the effect of that was to increase the duty. The case was taken to the tariff board and the tariff board ruled against the department. Their ruling was to the effect that mixed fruit was mixed fruit and should be charged the duty provided under n.o.p.—not otherwise provided.

The case went from the tariff board to the Exchequer Court and the Exchequer Court refused leave to appeal against the tariff board decision which had the effect of confirming the tariff board decision that mixed fruit is mixed fruit and not peaches. Where it goes from there we do not yet know.

However, there is a question of administration or policy involved in this on which I wish to say a few words. When the case was heard before the tariff board it turned out that the representations on behalf of the Department of National Revenue were made not by officers of the Department of National Revenue but by a person from the Department of Justice. It also turns out, and I have had the privilege of reading the transcript of the evidence, that in the discussion that took place—if I may put it this way—the ground was shifted two or three times.

The other side to the case appeared before the tariff board prepared to argue against the contention that mixed fruit was peaches. During the discussion the representative of the Department of Justice suggested to the tariff board that perhaps the ruling made by the Department of National Revenue was wrong, that perhaps mixed fruit should be regarded as preserves, and if that was not a satisfactory proposition then perhaps mixed fruit should be put into another basket item in the customs tariff schedule.

The result of that, Mr. Chairman, was that the people on the other side did not know where they stood. The ground was being shifted and arguments were being advanced that were not in the original proposition. It seems to me that that way of dealing with the matter is quite unfair. I recognize the fact that the position I would take was finally taken by the tariff board, when it ruled that mixed fruit should still be n.o.p., and at the moment that is the decision unless an appeal is made to the Supreme Court. But if the decision stands then somewhere along the line it looks as though there will have to be rebates of rather substantial sums.

On one occasion on the orders of the day I asked the Minister of National Revenue whether it was the intention of the Department of National Revenue to continue this practice of having a representative of the Department of Justice represent the Department of National Revenue in these hearings before the tariff board. Indeed, it is on that point that I would like him to comment. On that occasion he gave the short answer "Yes". But it seems to me that this is an unfair way of dealing with this matter. When the case comes before the tariff board it makes it very difficult for the opposite side when someone comes in from the Department of Justice and shifts the ground considerably, as was done in this case, so that the other party does not know what arguments they will have to answer.

It seems to me, if one can think of this in the sense of court procedure, that that is hardly a fair way to deal with it. I am sure the Minister of National Revenue is familiar with all the facts of the case and I would appreciate it if he would comment on that particular matter, namely the way in which the Department of National Revenue makes its representations to the tariff board when a ruling of the department has been appealed to that board.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. gentleman's question I could give him a little of the background here in connection with the lawyers who appeared before the tariff board. They began appearing early in the life of the present tariff board. As a matter of fact, a lawyer was involved in one of the cases heard on April 25, 1949, and that was appealed, although I need not go into the details. On May 18 there was an appeal before the board, and in 1949 three lawyers represented the appellant in appeal case No. 177. There are numerous other instances I could give which would serve to indicate that lawyers have appeared in all the cases since the very beginning. The first time that the Department of National Revenue used a lawyer there was on June 7, 1950, on appeal No. 214. If the hon. member wishes to know if it is our intention to continue to use lawyers the answer is yes, and the Department of Justice being the legal advisers to every government department we propose to use their services when required.

Mr. Knowles: But, Mr. Chairman, I was not objecting to the use of lawyers. I was raising the point that a person should not be brought in from some other department to take the attitude that it was his job to sort the thing out and to offer suggestions to the tariff board. Rather, I feel that a representative of the Department of National Revenue should conduct its side of the case so that the two opposing parties could know where they stood.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I think you will appreciate that it is the duty of the tariff board to bring out all the facts and if our counsel can assist them in that it is his duty to do so.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, possibly the statistical information which I desire is readily available, possibly not. In any event I should like to make my request with reference to the decisions of the tariff board. I understand it is the right of the Department of National Revenue to appeal against the decisions of the tariff board. In cases where they do not appeal against the decision, they are faced with the problem of making their own decision in the light of that decision. I can mention the specific case, for example. Would the department have readily available statistics showing the number of cases, say over the period of the last twelve months or the fiscal year, where the company or the individual Canadian has appealed against the decision of the national revenue department made under a decision of the tariff board? I realize that that question is a bit involved, but if I could, I should like to have that information as to the outcome of those appeals.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that information is available. As I understand it, what the hon. member would like to know is in how many cases the department has made the decision with reference to appraisals and classification. We hear the appellants who come to see the department in those cases. We hear their arguments. Then a decision is made. If that decision is not acceptable then the appellant—the importer—has the right to put his case before the tariff board. As a matter of fact, where an acceptable decision is not made, we, on occasion, make this suggestion: Here is our decision—a decision which is not arbitrarily made but made after argument and after reasoning and where the importer does not choose to accept it; if you are not satisfied then your best course to follow is to make an appeal to the tariff board and see what they say about it. If we are not satisfied with that decision we can appeal it in the same manner as we propose to do in this case of fruits.

Mr. Knowles: Are you going to appeal that case?

Mr. McCann: We may. I am not saying what we are going to do. We have the right to appeal. Within the limitation of time we will make a decision as to whether or not we may appeal.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is not yet in a position to announce whether an appeal will be made?

Mr. McCann: I am not making any announcement as to our future action. As I said in response to the hon. gentleman's question, they can appeal to the tariff board and the tariff board makes a decision. If we are satisfied with it, we will act on it. If we are not satisfied, we can appeal to the Exchequer Court or to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Shaw: Possibly I might make my point just a little bit clearer. The case I have in mind is one where the tariff board has already rendered a decision. This relates to the sales tax. I may be more specific and say it is in the case of furnaces excluded from the sales tax. To take an individual case, whereas individual manufacturers apply for a refund, the Department of National Revenue say: No; under the tariff board ruling we have decided that you are not covered; there is no refund. I understand he has the right to appeal to the Exchequer Court against that decision of the revenue department. Those are the cases I am concerned about. In some cases did the individual appeal to the Exchequer Court against the decision of the department in the past twelve months? If so, in how many cases did the department win and in how many cases did the individual win? That is the type of information I want.

Mr. McCann: I am informed by my officials that on that issue they do not know of any appeals.

Mr. Shaw: Then there are going to be some.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Nickle: I do not want to hark back to this matter too often, but I am still a little bit confused, as perhaps was the minister when he answered my earlier question. In order to avoid any further confusion on this matter, I should like to know just what prices he was quoting when he made this reference to $2.97 and now $3.35. Was he referring to the invoiced prices, the actual cost of the goods in the country of origin, or was he referring to the appraised prices for duty purposes?

Mr. McCann: The reference is made to the value accepted at customs. It may have been the actual value; I mean it may have been the value that they had on their invoice. In any event it was the final value, whether it was the accepted value in the first instance or the appraised value.

Mr. Nickle: In other words, it was the price on which duty was paid?

Mr. McCann: It was the price on which duty was applied; that is right.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. Nickle: I asked earlier for a comparative statement. The importance of the question I have just asked, as to whether they were talking about invoiced prices or the appraised prices or appraised values, is to be seen in cases like this, using the assumed example of a refrigerator which may have an invoiced price of say $100. On a duty rate of 20 per cent the duty will be $20 or a total cost landed in Canada of $120. Under the terms of the anti-dumping legislation that particular refrigerator may have been priced by your officials, say at $150 as contrasted with the invoiced price of $100. At the same duty rate, that would put a duty of $30 on that refrigerator or a landed cost in Canada of $130 compared with $120, or an increase in duty of $10.

What I am trying to get at is the actual value to the Canadian manufacturer and the actual cost to the Canadian consumer in the application of this anti-dumping legislation. In other words, what were the invoiced values of the goods which have been reappraised under this anti-dumping legislation? What were the appraised values, what was the total duty levied and what was the difference in duty under the old terms of the anti-dumping legislation as contrasted with the actual duty charged under this new anti-dumping legislation? Would it be possible to obtain from the minister, while we are dealing with these estimates, a statement along that line covering refrigerators, textiles and the other items against which this anti-dumping legislation has been applied?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I understand the hon. gentleman's point. We shall try to give him that information in specific cases in order that he may understand what the effect has been of the application of this new valuation for duty purposes.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, could we obtain that information today? Could we obtain it during consideration of these estimates?

Mr. McCann: I am afraid not. It will take a few days to prepare it. We shall try to get it before the end of the session.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think there ought to be a distinct understanding about the matter. I think the point raised is an extremely important one. Without having this information we really have not an understanding of what has been going on. If the minister cannot let us have it while the estimates are under consideration, can it be understood that it will be produced and, I would hope by consent, be placed on Hansard later. I think it is highly desirable that this information should be available.

Mr. McCann: We will do that.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Knowles: I have one question. If the decision with regard to mixed fruits stands, can the minister say what amount of money would be required to be rebated?

Mr. McCann: I have not any idea just what the amount of money would be. I suggest that it is hardly fair to put up hypothetical questions like that until a decision has been made.

Mr. Knowles: It was hardly fair to put up the rate of duty either.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: I want to be quite clear, Mr. Chairman. Are you going to call item 295?

The Chairman: Item 295 has been called.

Item agreed to.

Customs and excise divisions—
296. Inspection, investigation and audit services, $3,376,797.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish the minister would say something on this item as to the extension of services, ports, outports and preventive stations. Just in general terms I should like to know how great the extension is.

Mr. Knowles: That is item 297.

Mr. Macdonnell: No.

The Chairman: Item 296 has reference to inspection, investigation and audit services.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Macdonnell: The next line in my book reads: "Ports, outports and preventive stations".

Mr. Knowles: That is the heading for the next item.

Mr. McCann: I think that is item 297.

Item agreed to.

Ports, outports and preventive stations—
297. Operation and maintenance, $22,553,155.

Mr. McCann: This vote, which covers 337 ports with a total staff of 6,000 persons, shows a net increase over last year of $2,051,554. A breakdown of this amount shows an increase in the following headings. I will just give them roughly. In salaries and wages the increase is $1,909,000. Of this amount $1,490,000 is to cover the general salary revision. The balance is to cover the salaries of 137 additional officers, as well as normal annual increases and reclassifications. Travelling expenses are up $80,000. The increase is due to the greater volume of business which necessitates increased transfers of staff between ports to handle peak loads. It is also due to the necessary use of a greater number of relieving officers. The higher cost is predicated on the actual expenditures during 1953-54 which amounted to $296,000. Uniforms cost us $30,000 more and the increase is to cover the initial issue of summer weight uniforms. The issue of uniforms is restricted to officers meeting the travelling public at frontier points and other immigration points and takes into consideration varying climatic conditions.

I am sure that the general public is of the opinion that our customs and immigration officers—I will add immigration—are all neatly clad and present a good appearance. We have numerous letters from all over the country with reference both to their appearance and their courtesy. Telephones and telegrams will cost us $25,000 more. This is based upon last year's expenditures and the increase in rates. The balance of the increase is to provide for increased costs for printing and distribution of regulations and memoranda, for cartage, postage, light, power, water and stationery, materials and supplies. Is that the answer?

Mr. Macdonnell: There is one other point I want to ask about, and perhaps it can be dealt with in the same way as the minister is going to deal with the request of the hon. member for Calgary South. I should like to know what the story is about smuggling at the moment, and particularly cigarette smuggling. Has the situation improved?

Mr. McCann: I can give a very satisfactory answer to that. Smuggling has greatly decreased within the last year. That is indicated by the monthly figures of seizures, on which we base our information. In March of 1954 there were 181,693 cigarettes seized compared with 1,300,000 in March of 1953, so you will see that there is a very big drop. The drop has taken place since last July. In July of 1953 there were 1,861,000. The number dropped in August and September, was a little higher in October and from November of last year has ranged from 400,000 down to 181,000 in March of 1954. Seizures are away down and that is very encouraging. As a matter of fact I have the figure for April, 1954, which is still lower. It is 164,000 compared with 2,498,271 in April a year ago.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the minister attribute that to the increasing efficiency of his department?

Mr. McCann: In part, and I think the big factor was the reduction of the taxation. It was not as profitable to smuggle cigarettes into Canada after the tax and the price had been lowered.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to bring a matter to the attention of the minister which I have been asked to bring to his attention by responsible organizations in my constituency. We now have a very modern airport at Castlegar. As a matter of fact there were over 15,000 people there on May 30 to see the airport reopened. If our radio reception was as good as the airfield we would be very fortunate. The airport is serviced by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. Recently they have put larger planes in service and there is greatly increased travel between the coast and other parts of Canada to this airport.

I have been asked by responsible organizations to ask the minister if he would consider investigating the question of having this airport made a port of entry. The present arrangements are quite inconvenient for large numbers of travellers. I would ask the minister to have that matter investigated to see if it is possible to have a port of entry there.

Mr. McCann: I will be very glad to do that.

Item agreed to.

Ports, outports and preventive stations—

298. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $1,050,000.

Mr. Herridge: I am sorry to delay the committee but I have been sitting here all morning waiting for these one or two small items. I want to bring to the minister's attention the necessity for certain improvements and extensions at one or two ports on the boundary of my constituency. I do so again at the request of chambers of commerce, farmers' institutes and other responsible organizations. The people who make representations to me are always responsible and my representations are always very modest. I want to refer to Nelway first. I am told that there are some extensions being made there for the housing of part-time summer employees who are used in the summer months, and that the buildings that are going to be used as residences by the summer employees are being serviced by chemical toilets although the other buildings are serviced by water. There is water available which is piped to the other buildings. Yet the buildings for the part-time employees are being serviced by chemical toilets although they are only a few feet away from the main buildings. I have been asked to bring that matter to the attention of the minister because the people who make this recommendation consider chemical toilets obsolete. I also understand that there have been some objections from the American officials on the other side of the line.

I also want to mention the port of entry at Waneta. The department's facilities there are, to say the least, most shabby and inadequate. Owing to the improvement of roads, the improvement of the bridge crossing the Pend-d'Oreille river at that point and the building of the dam at Waneta the traffic has increased greatly. However, the minister's staff and officials are housed under very poor circumstances and I do ask for consideration of the improvement of these quarters because the port is certainly of growing importance and the facilities are inadequate at the present time.

Mr. McCann: I will do that.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: Item 299.

Mr. McCann: No.

Mr. Knowles: Should we not carry the supplementary item first and leave item 299 until after lunch?

Mr. McCann: Yes.

The Chairman: Supplementary item 691. Shall this item carry? Carried.

Mr. McCann: Items 587 and 588 in the further supplementaries.

Mr. Knowles: Where are they?

Mr. McCann: Item 587 is a small item of $27,000 for the inspection, investigation and audit services. The details are on page 20. Item 588 is a further amount of $303,000 required for operation and maintenance. The details are on page 20. These items are in the further supplementary estimates.

Mr. Knowles: I think we passed those before the 31st of March.

Mr. McCann: Oh yes, that is right.

Mr. Knowles: Did you not spend that money?

Mr. McCann: They happened to be on the list I have here, but the only one we are concerned with is item 691.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that the Department of National Revenue was under discussion at adjournment this morning, but this afternoon it is the intention to discuss resolution No. 53, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

International shortwave broadcasting service—

53. Maintenance and operation including authority to credit to the appropriation revenue from the rental of facilities in Radio-Canada building to an amount of $160,000 and to re-expend it for the purposes of the international service, $2,199,150.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister going to make a statement by way of report on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. McCann: This item No. 53 has to do with the international shortwave broadcasting service. The appropriation asked for this year is $2,199,150, which is an increase over last year of $171,000. The shortwave broadcasting service broadcasts regularly to Europe, Latin America and Australia, as well as providing Canadian news and radio entertainment for the Canadian armed forces establishments in northern Canada and the forces in Korea and Europe.

Mr. Fleming: I do not mean to interrupt the minister, but I assumed that before we went into the details of the international shortwave service the minister would have some statement to make by way of report of a more general nature on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its operations in the sound and television field, as well as its financial operations.

Mr. McCann: If that is the case, I think perhaps we ought to turn to item No. 534 on page 70 of the book of estimates, which has to do with loans and investments. I feel that would be the proper item upon which to undertake it. This covers a loan to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation repayable with interest in the amount of $3 million.

Mr. Fleming: I suggest we might follow the practice that has been followed in other years and consider the several items pertaining to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation together so as to facilitate a general discussion at the outset, to be followed later by any specific matters that may arise under the individual items.

Mr. McCann: We could do that. As you will understand, the first items have been skipped because of the fact they are statutory items. The first item covers $6,250,000 which is the application of the excise tax which goes to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I have no objection to a discussion of the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in general. I have two short statements to make, one in connection with the international shortwave service and the other has to do with this loan. Probably if I gave the material with reference to the loan, it would open up the discussion and that would give a picture of the general position of the broadcasting corporation.

Mr. Knowles: Would it not be possible to agree on one of the three or four items that are before us as the item on which we have all the discussion of the C.B.C.?

Mr. McCann: If that is what the committee wants, I suggest the general discussion take place either on this item covering the loan to the C.B.C. or on the item covering the international shortwave service. I would suggest it would be better on the item covering the loan.

The Deputy Chairman: I would make this suggestion to the committee. I have looked over these items. The first two, taking them in numerical order, refer to the international shortwave broadcasting service, which is a subject of its own, and the third item is a general item referring to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation activities as a whole. Then, the supplementary item is for construction and acquisition of new buildings.

Perhaps the most orderly method would be to take them in that order, and discuss and dispose of the two items dealing with the international broadcasting service, unless there is some general discussion which involves both the international and the domestic service, in which case of course our practice has been to permit a general discussion. Perhaps I may be allowed at this time to say that, in trying to work out an orderly procedure, I have noticed, during the discussions we have had, a great deal has been said about one specific item in the estimates which would be called later. As a result of this, the general discussion has been spotty and far from consecutive; the remarks of one speaker have not followed the other.

I am in the hands of the committee entirely, but it would be my suggestion that we deal with the international shortwave broadcasting first, because it comes first. But if hon. members have remarks to make which cover all the aspects of broadcasting, then we would have to proceed with the item covering the loan.

Mr. Fleming: In view of your statement, Mr. Chairman, I may say that I wish to make some remarks of a general nature in regard to policy, and therefore I would suggest in line with your intimation that we take the more general item first. Since the international shortwave service is a specific matter not lending itself readily as a vehicle for general discussion, it might be well to call item No. 534 first. It would be a more appropriate vehicle for general discussion.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that the general desire of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—
Loans, investments and advances—

534. Loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation repayable with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine and to be applied in payment of expenditures to cover capital costs of television installations and to support the development of the service. Such loans, with interest, shall be a charge on the revenues of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation next after the charge imposed under the provisions of section 17 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, $3,000,000.

Mr. McCann: I may say, Mr. Chairman, that that procedure is quite agreeable to me. This particular item has to do with a loan to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for television installation. In this statement I have laid stress on the television side of broadcasting rather than sound broadcasting. However, it does open up the matter for discussion.

This item covers a proposed loan to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for capital expenditures on television installations. The committee will recall that last year parliament approved a loan of $4,750,000 to the corporation towards the cost of building television facilities in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Ottawa and Halifax, together with a transmitter in Montreal. The loan last year, as was explained at the time, represented only part of the cost of the program, with the remainder to be met by a further loan in this fiscal year. The amount proposed this year is $3 million and it will cover the remainder of the cost of the projects that were approved last year.

As hon. members are aware, we are in the midst of a wide development of television broadcasting in Canada. The C.B.C. began operating its production centres and stations at Montreal and Toronto in September, 1952. I would point out that that is less than two years since our first station was opened. Just over a year ago these stations were linked together by direct network connection. The Ottawa station went on the air at about the same time. The C.B.C. station in Vancouver opened last December. The second transmitter in Montreal began functioning in January of this year. The Winnipeg station will go on the air in a few days and the Halifax station is expected to start before the end of the present year. At the same time the number and variety of television programs has been greatly increased. The growing interest in the country is shown by the fact that about three-quarters of a million families are reported to have bought television sets in Canada, and it is expected that sales this year will considerably exceed those of last fiscal year when some 400,000 sets were sold.

There are also at the moment four private stations operating, with more expected to be on the air shortly. All are functioning as members of the national system and are being supplied by the C.B.C. with national program service which is amounting to from 20 to 28 hours a week.

During this year there will be further wide expansion in the television system. The C.B.C. is developing program production facilities at the regional points of Vancouver, Winnipeg, and Halifax, and will have some facilities for live output in Ottawa. In addition 16 more private stations are already authorized and will be coming on the air at different times—it is expected most of them before the end of the year. The C.B.C. will be supplying all the private stations in addition to its own with national program service.

The C.B.C. is now supplying service to the private stations at London and Kitchener by direct network connection. It is planned that such direct connections would be established with all stations in southern Ontario and Quebec just as soon as they go on the air. Stations in other parts of the country for the time being will be supplied by means of kinescope recordings. As the number of stations increase this will entail greatly expanded facilities for the making and handling of recordings. The C.B.C. is looking forward to direct network connections across the country from coast to coast, and has already asked for tenders from communication companies for extensions of network service both east and west from central Canada. Such a national direct network system will of course involve commitments for heavy annual payments by the corporation.

Because of the high sales of sets, revenues to the C.B.C. from the 15 per cent excise tax on the wholesale price of receiving sets has been actually higher than was anticipated at the beginning of the last fiscal year. The proceeds of the tax applying to television amounted to approximately $11,700,000 for 1953-54. I am sorry that since its fiscal year has just recently closed, the annual statement of the corporation is not yet available. The corporation estimates that on the television side they will show an operating surplus of some $5 million. This television operating surplus from last year has been all earmarked by the corporation for further capital expenditures, and will to this amount reduce the need for further capital loans in the future. The funds will be used to provide additional technical and production facilities, which are being made necessary for the development of the system. The present program facilities are being taxed beyond capacity to provide the number of Canadian productions at present being broadcast. With increasing pressure for the carrying of more non-Canadian programs, it has become more and more necessary to add to the facilities for producing Canadian programs. I think all the hon. members will agree that at least a reasonable proportion of our television broadcasting should be provided by Canadians for Canadians.

In this way the surplus which the corporation will show in television for the past fiscal year will be plowed back into facilities for maintaining and improving the national television service right across the country.

It is not very expensive to import television programs in Canada and put them on our television stations; it is extremely expensive to produce television programs ourselves in Canada. And it is also expensive to link the different parts of the country together by television. I think we all realize that television is bound to have a very great effect on our family and national life and particularly on the growing minds of young Canadians. At the same time we have to face the fact that the development of a Canadian system, broadcasting at least a reasonable proportion of Canadian programs, spreading across the country from coast to coast, is going to cost a great deal of money to operate. At the present time in Canada we are developing one of the most extensive television systems in the world. It represents one of the great developments in the history of our country and it is being built under a scheme of sensible co-operation between public and private interest. I believe that in television we in Canada must think in big national terms, not just weighing individual local considerations. And if we continue to think and plan for the national interest, in the interests of Canadians in all parts of the country, we are going to have a television system of which we as a nation can be justly proud.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the committee is hampered this year in its approach to the consideration of the various items affecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by the fact that there has been no committee of the house this year reviewing the operations of the corporation, and also by reason of the fact that the corporation's annual report is not in our hands.

It has been the practice throughout the two last previous parliaments that a special committee of the house should be set up in alternate sessions to review the operations of the corporation. The committee did sit in the session of 1953, and I have no doubt one will sit during the next session of parliament. Certainly we in this part of the house will be asking that such a committee be appointed at the next session.

Then, as to the annual report, I would call to the attention of the hon. members the fact that the fiscal year of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation follows the fiscal year of the government, ending on March 31. It is unfortunate that in a year when there has been no special committee reviewing the operations of the corporation, and its policies, we have not before us at this time any report of the operations of the corporation, since the one which closed with the date March 31, 1953. Here we are more than 14 months later and, apart from the somewhat brief review the minister has given to the committee, we know virtually nothing as to the financial operations of the corporation during the past 14 months. As the situation may arise in the future, I think some consideration should be given either to expediting the annual report for occasions such as this, or probably considering the possibility of making the fiscal year of the corporation coincide with the calendar year, rather than with the fiscal year of the government. I am making no further comments as to the feasibility of this suggestion. It is the sort of thing that can be discussed with the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation when a special committee next sits. But we are left in the position today where we are without the benefit of the work done by a committee, and without access to any report since that of March 31, 1953. Therefore our information in approaching the estimates affecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is quite inadequate.

Sir, we have a half dozen items before us. As the minister mentioned in his remarks, there are two items on page 8 which are of a statutory nature. The first is $6,250,000 to provide for the requirements of the sound broadcasting service. The second is an item of $15 million to provide for payment to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from the consolidated revenue fund of amounts equal to the taxes collected under the Excise Tax Act in respect of radio and television sets and equipment. Then we have item 534, immediately under debate, to provide the sum of $3 million by way of loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to cover capital costs of television installations and to support the development of the service. There are of course the other items which relate specifically to the international shortwave service, which I shall not deal with in these somewhat general remarks at this stage.

I should like to draw to the attention of the committee at the outset, sir, the fact that the bulk of the money going from the consolidated revenue fund of this country into the coffers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is going there not by direct vote of this house now but under authority of a statute passed previously. We in this part of the house took issue with the method that was proposed by the government last year, and indeed on previous occasions, in this respect. Provisions of a continuing nature were made at the insistence of the government both in the years 1951 and 1953. In the year 1951, to implement one of the proposals of the Massey royal commission, the government asked the house to make a continuing five-year grant to the corporation of $6,250,000 a year. In 1953, when the licence fee of $2.50 on radio receiving sets was abolished, a nuisance tax which we in this part of the house had attacked vigorously for many years, provision was made for substituting revenue on a much more generous scale by way of allocating to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the annual proceeds of the excise tax collected on the sale of radio and television receiving sets in Canada. At that time we were told the estimated revenue from that source for a full year would be approximately $12 million. In the case of the 1951 vote, it was set up on a five-year basis. In the case of the 1953 vote, it is set up on an indefinite basis that can go on in perpetuity unless legislation to the contrary is passed in this house.

We in the official opposition took issue with that type of indefinite provision, and we still do. We are prepared to deal on its merits with any provision, any grant or any loan that we are asked to vote in favour of the corporation to assist its work either in the field of sound or television broadcasting; but we do not believe that this matter of providing indefinite grants, continuing year after year without any control or direct vote on the part of parliament, can by any stretch of the imagination be harmonized with a proper appreciation of the importance of parliamentary control over the expenditure of public moneys.

We have been given some indication from the minister this afternoon that the estimate given to the house last year as to the revenue which was expected from the tax on radio and television receiving sets has been exceeded. We have not been given the figures as to the breakdown between the television and the radio sets. I should think it would not be very difficult to obtain those figures on a breakdown basis.

It will be recalled, sir, that the Massey royal commission recommended that the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in their financial aspects, should be carefully separated as between sound broadcasting on the one hand and television broadcasting on the other. Last year, when the government's proposal came before the house, it was suggested to us that of the $12 million of expected revenue, the amounts yielded would be approximately equal as between radio broadcasting and television broadcasting. We in the official opposition asked for a clear and definite allocation to be established by legislation so that revenue from tax on the sale of radio receiving sets would be allocated to sound broadcasting and revenue derived from taxes on the sale of television sets would be allocated to the purposes of television. But in the result, the government would not accept this proposal and insisted that the revenue derived from the tax on both sound receiving sets and television sets should be mingled.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the first thing we want to know is what is the breakdown of revenue as between the tax on radio receiving sets on the one hand and on the television sets on the other. We will want to know in a way that is just not possible without a detailed operating statement of the corporation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954 before us, what have been the revenues received and what have been the expenditures upon sound broadcasting and television broadcasting, both fully separated.

We should have a proper and detailed statement as to the use made by the corporation of the substantial sums of money which were placed at its disposal during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954. Actually, the revenues at their disposal in both fields of sound and television broadcasting for that fiscal year aggregated some $26,750,000. I gave the detail of that breakdown on May 14, 1953, at page 5418 of Hansard, in reviewing the work of the special committee on radio broadcasting for that year, and the information it had gathered as to the financial operations and plans of the corporation.

I make it quite clear now that I am asking for a detailed breakdown in this committee now of that substantial total of $26,750,000, by far the largest sum ever placed at the disposal of the corporation in any fiscal year, indeed, several times larger than the figures available to it in recent years.

We come again, sir, to the question of loans. This house, over a period of several years, has already placed at the disposal of the corporation a total of $8 million by way of loans for the development of television. One might have thought that with the very largely increased sums available to the corporation from the proceeds of the excise tax on radio receiving sets and television sets there would be no occasion for the corporation to come back to parliament for further loans. After all, with $26,750,000 available for all purposes last year, and with the information now that the estimate of $12 million given to the house at that time as to the expected revenue from the proceeds of the excise tax on receiving sets and television sets is less than the amount actually realized, one would think that there would not be occasion to come back to parliament asking for more loans; yet we are being asked now to provide a loan of an additional $3 million to cover the capital cost of television installations and to support the development of the service.

The house, Mr. Chairman, has been given no adequate explanation of this item, and I call upon the minister for infinitely more information than he has yet imparted to the house to justify this substantial loan, in addition to all the other revenues that are available to the corporation from the various sources which have been allotted to it by parliament.

Let me remind the house, sir, as to what some of those revenues are which are now regularly available to the corporation. We have, first of all, the excise tax and it is to be observed that this year the statutory item with respect to the proceeds of the excise tax stands at $15 million. That, in itself, is an increase of $3 million over the estimate of $12 million upon which the house proceeded at the 1953 session. In addition there is the continuing grant of $6,250,000 under the program approved by parliament in 1951. In addition to these two sources, Mr. Chairman, there are still available to the corporation its revenues from commercial broadcasting. Indeed, we have not been given the figures of revenue from commercial broadcasting for this past fiscal year, but on reference to the annual report of the corporation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1953, we may see that the revenue from commercial broadcasting in that year exceeded $2,500,000 from sound broadcasting, and even in the very limited operation in the television field I find that for the fiscal year there had been received a total of $518,000 by way of commercial revenue in respect of television broadcasting.

Now, with the very largely increased program of television operations carried on by the corporation in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954, it must be apparent that the revenues to the corporation from commercial broadcasting must be very much larger than that and would aggregate something in excess of $3 million. There are some other items of revenue as well.

I draw attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that these are very substantial sources of revenue to the corporation, and now, more than ever before in our history, when dealing with the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its operations, we are dealing with an organization whose claims upon the public treasury are becoming ever greater and now reach into very substantial amounts which call on the part of parliament for the strictest review and the exercise of the fullest parliamentary control.

Mention has been made, sir, of the way in which the public has been purchasing receiving sets. Indeed, sir, the rate at which the public has been purchasing television sets has been extraordinary. In the year 1954, according to the dominion bureau of statistics' daily bulletin for March 26, we learn that manufacturers' sales of television receivers soared to as high as 366,498 units in the full year 1953 compared with 137,236 in 1952. In other words, sir, the total television receiving sets sold in Canada in 1953 were almost three times the number sold in Canada in 1952. Radio sales rose more moderately to 620,800 in 1953 from 568,844 in the year 1952. The value of the TV sets sold in 1953 was $148,753,000 compared with $60,659,000 in 1952, and radio sales were valued at $52,119,000 compared with $50,-125,000 in the year 1952.

The sale of TV sets by areas in Canada in 1953 is also striking. In the Atlantic provinces it was only 869; in Quebec 119,519; in Ontario 225,726; in the prairie provinces 1,270; and in British Columbia 19,114. The extraordinary rate of public purchases of television sets is continuing in 1954, according to the figures issued by the Radio-Television Manufacturers Association of Canada which reported that the sale of television sets for the first four months of 1954 amounted to 137,267 compared with 94,136 in a like period in 1953. In respect of the sale of sound receiving sets, sales for the first four months of 1954 totalled 142,517 units compared with 198,021 units in the like period of 1953.

It will be observed from these figures, Mr. Chairman, that the tendency now is for the sales of the radio receiving sets to decline.

There is a decline indicated in this four-month period of 1954 of 25 per cent as compared with the first four months of 1953. But this extraordinary rate at which the public is purchasing television sets, evident in 1953, is being continued in 1954 at an increased rate, and if this rate of purchase continues up to the end of 1954 then in this year alone there will probably be more than 400,000 sets purchased in Canada.

Now, sir, I turn from the subject of finance, knowing that we have been given only the scratchiest and sketchiest kind of information, quite inadequate for the needs of the house in facing its responsibilities in regard to the substantial amounts that are now under consideration, to the question of policy, which is a matter of high importance.

There have been extensive debates in this house on the subject in relation to both sound broadcasting and television for years past. I am not going to suggest that there is any occasion now to cover all the ground that has been covered in other years. But I wish to make several facts plain, so far as the policy to which we subscribe is concerned, as well as to make quite clear what I deem to be the inevitable effects of the policy now being pursued by the government in relation to the licensing of stations, and in particular of television stations.

In the first place, sir, we have in the government's policy a point-blank contradiction as between its policy on sound broadcasting on the one hand and television broadcasting on the other.

Let me take as my illustration the testimony of Mr. Browne, an official of the Department of Transport, before the special committee on broadcasting of the 1953 session. I quoted this in my remarks in the debate on May 14, 1953, as can be found at page 5419 of Hansard. This is the question I put to him:

> You say there is no policy against licensing—

This is for sound broadcasting, Mr. Chairman.

> —two or more stations in the same area?

The answer was:

> There is no government policy which restricts the number of stations of which I am aware.

That was the testimony of an official in the Department of Transport through whom the function of the licensing of stations is exercised. It is quite clear that there is no government policy against the licensing of more than one station in areas where there are existing stations in the field of sound broadcasting. Mr. Chairman, the result is that, apart from what our views may be with regard to the regulation of sound broadcasting in general, we at least do not have to attack a policy of local monopoly in favour of existing stations. At any rate, the government's policy, whatever may have been its shortcomings, in the field of sound broadcasting has not been open to that criticism.

We still have our views, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the whole method of control and regulation of radio broadcasting in Canada. We consider it to be unsound in its nature that the system should call for the operation of a national system on the part of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and that at the same time the corporation, clothed with that responsibility, should be charged also with the responsibility of and be given the wide powers of regulation over all other broadcasting in Canada. There are many private stations in Canada. Our view was and continues to be that the proper method of regulating broadcasting in Canada would be through a separate board which would be a public board, fully responsible to parliament, discharging a public responsibility, but clothed with the responsibility and power needed in relation to the regulation of all forms of broadcasting in Canada, whether they are publicly or privately owned stations. We do not think that the best results are obtained by having a corporation which is charged with the duty of operating in the national field also being given these broad regulatory powers. The two functions are separate and distinct and, in our submission, they should be discharged by separate bodies in the same way as the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada exercises the powers vested in it under the Railway Act over both the privately-owned Canadian Pacific Railway and the publicly-owned Canadian National Railways. It is a system of that kind that we think would be best suited to the needs of Canada in this important field of communications.

I come now to the field of government policy in relation to television broadcasting. Here I think one can best illustrate government policy by placing side by side with the description of policy given by Mr. Browne, in the passage that I have just quoted from his evidence which was given something over a year ago, a question following in the same gentleman's testimony. I asked him this question:

> Q. In other words, it is not the policy to foster a local monopoly in sound broadcasting?—A. There is no government policy, as I have said, akin to that which at the present time applies in the case of television.

Sir, the policy of the government in relation to television is to foster a series of local monopolies in Canada. Along with that policy has gone the policy of fostering a monopoly for the publicly-owned stations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the large cities—the metropolitan areas—where there has been the greatest demand, actually, for the establishment of more television outlets. The inevitable results of this policy which the government has stubbornly followed have been, first of all, to delay for years the introduction of television in Canada and, now that television has been introduced into Canada, as it was introduced in a rather modified form a year and a half or two years ago and, so far as the publicly-owned system is concerned, is now being extended by rather slow degrees to deny at the same time to other areas that service in the field of television which they desire and which at the same time many organizations are prepared to risk their capital to provide. The reason that many areas in this country are still denied any television and further the reason that areas in this country which have limited television today are denied more opportunities of having alternative television services is that the government has stubbornly followed this policy first of delaying the development of television and now of fostering local monopoly.

We of the Progressive Conservative party do not believe in any policy of local monopoly. We believe that the best results will be achieved not only for those who wish to receive additional programs but in the whole aspect of the relationship between parliament and public authority on the one hand and operations in this field on the other, if competition is not discouraged, as the government is deliberately discouraging it.

We are not alone in holding that view. Others have put that view forward. Indeed, organizations within the Liberal party itself have publicly declared that view before now. I take you back, Mr. Chairman, to November 11, 1951, when the Young Liberal Federation of Canada in its meeting at Vancouver, according to a Canadian Press dispatch of that date from Vancouver, asked the government to establish an independent administration to control radio and television, including the C.B.C. I come forward to October 27, 1952, when a Canadian Press dispatch of that date reports that the advisory council of the Liberal federation, which is described as the high command of the federal party in power, passed this resolution:

"Recognizing that the use of radio has become universal in Canada . . .

And so on. They recommended abolition of the radio licence fee. That recommendation was carried out. That fact leads me to ask why other similar recommendations of these bodies have not yet been carried out.

I come forward to May 16, 1953, and I have here the reports of two newspapers reporting on the resolution passed by the Ontario Young Liberal Association at its convention in the city of Toronto on that date. The report reads as follows:

The Ontario Young Liberal Association yesterday voted down a suggestion that it endorse the present C.B.C. television monopoly in major markets and in several other resolutions found itself at odds with federal party policy.

Only one delegate to the annual meeting in the King Edward hotel voted in favour of the resolution underlining that private TV stations should be kept out of Toronto and other major Canadian cities until there was enough revenue available to support competing stations. Two of the delegates led a stinging attack on C.B.C.-TV policy.

Let me make this comment on that last remark "on C.B.C.-TV policy". It is not so much C.B.C. policy as it is government policy that this monopolistic system should be encouraged.

Then, sir, we come down to May 29, 1954, which was last week. We have a Canadian Press dispatch dated May 29, reporting on a meeting held in this city of Ottawa of the Young Liberal Federation of Canada. I take two or three paragraphs from the Canadian Press dispatch reporting on that meeting. Mention is made, of course, of the fact that it was announced that no resolutions could be made public at the close of that meeting because they had first to be reviewed by some powers that be in the party. Therefore the text of the resolution has been withheld from the public. Mr. Chairman, I think it may be said that other parties in this country are more democratic in that regard. At any rate, it is evident that some information sifted through the iron curtain that was applied. I read this paragraph from the Canadian Press dispatch of May 29:

It was understood, however, that the convention approved a resolution submitted by the Young Liberal Association of B.C. that a separate body be established to control the licensing and regulate the operation of all radio and television stations in Canada. At present, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation holds this power.

And further:

The Young Liberal Association of British Columbia brought the controversial television resolution to the floor of the convention. B.C. delegates said it was defeated after five votes.

The resolution said "the provision of competitive alternative television service in all areas of Canada would stimulate employment, the development of a great industry and provide that alternative source of information and entertainment essential to a well-informed public."

It said the government should be urged "to implement at once its announced policy of permitting alternative and competitive television service in all areas of Canada, especially the six major markets of Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax."

Mr. McCann: That resolution was defeated.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, it was defeated, we are told, by five votes—

Mr. McCann: That does not make any difference. It was defeated.

Mr. Fleming: —indicating how close was the division of expressed opinion in that meeting, even in the face of the fact that the delegates who voted for that resolution knew that they were voting to condemn government policy. Where you find this Young Liberal Federation—

Mr. Lesage: It is a free party.

Mr. Fleming: Isn't that impressive when the powers that be within the Liberal party do not permit the text of these resolutions to go to the public! Remarkably free! How impressive is the freedom of these meetings and their transactions! Let me comment further that when in that meeting you find practically half the delegates, within five of half the number, voting for a resolution which on the face of it was a stinging condemnation of the policy of the Liberal government, I think you have a very good barometer by which to judge the extent of the criticism within the party itself of this arid, negative, backward policy of the government in sterilizing the development of television in Canada and encouraging the baneful development of monopoly.

Mr. McCann: Would you like to have a parliament elected on that basis?

Mr. Fleming: Liberal? Never.

Mr. McCann: Any kind. You would want the minority to rule.

Mr. Fleming: No, I have never advocated that the minority should rule. That is one reason I have said repeatedly that this government does not have any right to rule in the way it does because it does not represent a majority of the Canadian people. It was elected with 48 per cent of the votes of the Canadian people.

Mr. Lesage: How many did you get?

Mr. Fleming: I have drawn attention to what is an eloquent comment on the feeling within the Liberal party about the Liberal government's policy of monopoly. Now, sir, I turn to remarks which I think are entitled to very great respect. They come from a gentleman for whom I have learned to have a high regard in the frequent contacts I have had with him as a member of the house and as a member of the special committee on radio broadcasting from year to year since I came into the house in 1945. It is Mr. Davidson Dunton, the chairman of the board of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, whom I regard as a very conscientious official of that corporation. In a recent address which Mr. Dunton made in Saskatoon on May 14, 1954, he faced up in a very frank way, it seemed to me, to the problem of trying to reconcile freedom of expression and freedom of communication on the one hand with regulation in the field of sound and television broadcasting on the other. I shall quote a couple of passages from his speech, and I think hon. members will listen to them with interest. After referring to the early origin of the struggle for freedom of speech he says:

But conditions have changed since the early days of the original fights for freedom of expression. Now a relatively small number of great printing presses turn out a large part of the actual reading material of most people. A few transmitting stations put out all the broadcasting heard effectively by the population of a whole region. A handful of men control the making of most moving pictures seen by millions. In effect a small number of men —publishers, broadcasters, film organization heads— can control a large part of the ideas and impressions and opinions that reach the minds of most people.

I think that if we are realistic we have to admit that an inherent danger to a genuinely free and fair interchange of ideas has developed from the concentration of so much power over means of mass communication in the hands of so few. I am very conscious of this myself because I and others of the C.B.C. belong to the few, together with controllers of publishing, film and other broadcasting organizations.

Further down he says:

There is true freedom in mass communication only if ideas which happen to appeal to lesser numbers of people have a reasonable opportunity to be heard. Then people as a whole have a chance to weigh and choose, and perhaps change their minds, for themselves. The essence of freedom lies in freedom to choose from a variety of alternatives; if there are no alternatives—in kinds of ideas and material presented—there can be no freedom of choice.

I think that final sentence from Mr. Dunton's speech is one that deserves to be echoed.

The essence of freedom lies in freedom to choose from a variety of alternatives; if there are no alternatives—in kinds of ideas and material presented—there can be no freedom of choice.

Please do not misunderstand what I am saying on this point, Mr. Chairman. I am not saying that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation does not attempt to provide a variety of ideas or a variety of programs, but I am saying that no one organization can fulfil the specifications of freedom laid down in this penetrating observation of Mr. Dunton if the ideas are coming from one organization or in local areas from one station or one source. That is why this policy of fostering monopoly is fraught with the utmost dangers. It is a policy that has run too long. It is a policy that, in my submission, must be abandoned. It is true that you cannot force people to listen over the air. Listeners retain the freedom to turn the dials and shut off the machine. But the fact of the matter is that as long as it is government policy to attempt to confine people to one source in this rapidly developing means of communication, television, the effects and influence of which on the minds and lives of people are simply incalculable, we are courting a danger to the very fundamentals of our whole conception of freedom.

I do urge upon the house that the house address itself to the imminent, pressing perils for Canadians of a policy of monopoly which this government has deliberately followed, has deliberately fostered and to which it still unrepentantly adheres. This policy must be put aside. The government must cease to impose monopoly upon the people. Encouragement should be given, with all the safeguards that are available under law, to permitting people to have alternative sources of communication in this important and rapidly expanding field. The time has come, Mr. Chairman, for a drastic change in our policy in relation to regulation in this field.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, this estimate always provides an occasion to discuss matters concerning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I may say that usually during the preceding year I have had the opportunity to view and hear a good many of the programs or have been directed to them and have heard them pretty thoroughly discussed by someone who listened constantly. This year I am not quite in that position, but in spite of the criticisms that have just been levelled against the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I want to remind the committee—

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman: I thought my criticisms were directed against government policy, and I expressly dissociated the C.B.C. from the policy that was imposed upon them.

Mr. Coldwell: It is very difficult to distinguish between criticism of government policy in this field and criticism of the corporation itself. After all I want to say to my hon. friend that the foundation of this system was laid not by the C.C.F. nor by the Liberals, but by the government of the late R. B. Bennett and the Conservative party. When Mr. Bennett introduced a measure for setting up the radio broadcasting commission in 1932, upon which basis the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was subsequently set up, I recall that the fundamentals of the measure received the support of the party leaders and I believe the unanimous support of this house.

As I said, I am not so familiar personally with the programs this year as I have been in other years, but when I look at the record of what our broadcasting corporation has done throughout the years, particularly during the past year, I find this. Considering the record of television first, I may say that a year ago this week, June 2, 1953, I had the privilege of witnessing that remarkable television account of the coronation. I thought it was handled by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and by the B.B.C. of course, with dignity. It was something of which the B.B.C., the C.B.C., and of course the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F., who made possible the quick transmissions of the films to Canada, can be proud. As a matter of fact, I noted that program was awarded the Sylvania television award for 1953, which is a presentation by the Sylvania Electric Products Corporation. The judges were a panel of judges headed by that very well known commentator, one whom we used to hear commentating during the philharmonic concerts from New York on Sunday afternoon, Mr. Deems Taylor.

This award was given for outstanding contribution to creative television programming and was presented to the B.B.C., the C.B.C. and the A.B.C. for the wonderful coverage of the coronation. I believe I might read part of the citation. The award was given:

> . . . for more than speed. It includes our recognition of the dignity and good taste, in keeping with the solemnity of the subject displayed by ABC, and we tender our thanks to the BBC for its initiation of service and to the CBC for its part in retransmission.

As one of those who witnessed that program, and perhaps because of my own church affiliation, I appreciated the fact that the coronation itself was introduced into what is perhaps the most solemn and beautiful service of the Anglican communion, and I felt very pleased indeed with what was done in that regard.

If we look at the radio broadcasting awards that have been given the C.B.C. during the past year, following as they do similar awards in other years, we find the following summary prepared by my office from the newspapers. The C.B.C. won six first awards in five different programming categories and three honourable mentions for programs in a competition with United States programs at the eighteenth exhibition of educational programs held at Ohio state university this year. It is interesting to note how these great private organizations in the United States fared. The N.B.C. received one special award, one first and one honourable mention. The United Nations radio—of course, that is not a private organization but a public one—received two first and the Mutual Broadcasting Company, a private company, received one honourable mention. I feel it is well to have on the record the C.B.C. programs that won first prizes. They were: Trans-Canada matinee; Wednesday night, for the productions of "1984"; "Press Conference"; the presentation of the play, "The Vigil"; the children's program, "Roundabout"; and the program "Cuckoo-Clock House".

I think that is very interesting and is a very effective answer in many respects to the criticisms that are made, both of the policy under which this parliament operates the C.B.C. and of the C.B.C. itself. I feel we have to bear this in mind, that television and radio are monopolies. To the organizations operating these stations, we allocate airways. No one else can use those airways, so once we allocate them they are monopolies. In my opinion, since it is a natural monopoly, it should be under public control. My hon. friend criticizes this monopoly, but I should like to hear him criticize some other monopolies in this country. I should like to hear him criticize the Bell Telephone Company in this part of the world. I should like to hear him criticize the Aluminum Company of Canada. I should like to hear him criticize the International Nickel Company, and a number of monopolies that exist in this country, and which no attempt has been made to curb. If we are going to have criticism of what is a natural monopoly, which I think we must keep under public control, then by the same token surely we should see to it that we curb private monopolies that are not natural monopolies even if they are built up on the natural resources of the country.

I mentioned the coronation program because I believe it made a very deep impression on all the people who witnessed the dignity of the service, and the manner in which the film was presented in contrast with the manner in which it was presented in the United States. One of the great broadcasting organizations there introduced a gorilla or chimpanzee in the middle of the program to advertise a private product. This indicates the extent to which private organizations will sometimes go in order to display advertising.

Another thing that I have in mind is that I noticed the minister said that private television stations—I am not saying that there should not be private television stations—are being supplied with productions by the C.B.C., and that some of these will have to be supplied with kinescope. I am asking the minister this question. What revenue does the C.B.C. derive when it supplies these private stations with programs that must cost the C.B.C. a great deal of money to produce. To what extent do they pay for the films that are made available by the C.B.C.? It seems to me that if we are thinking of television, we should know something about that. When we have a direct network program across Canada supplying programs to both private and public stations, as the minister intimated that is going to be very costly. I feel we should go into the division of costs very thoroughly indeed.

May I add that I was talking a few days ago to a gentleman for whom I have quite a lot of respect, who operates a station of which I have some knowledge and which is a good private station. He was asked if he was going into television. He said he did not know, because after all it would cost from $250,000 to a half million to set up a television station in the area where he lived. I venture to say that only big money can put stations of that description into operation. And if we are going to rely entirely on big accumulations of money to build our television stations we shall be in the same position as we are in some areas of this country where we have only one outlet in the form of newspapers—areas where there are single newspapers owning broadcasting facilities and moulding public opinion, just as well as attempting to control it in the areas in which they operate.

It seems to me that if we are going to have freedom of the press, freedom of opinion and the like, we must consider this matter very carefully. And then I think that, so far as I have been able to see, both in its television and in its sound broadcasting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is trying to give to us various types of opinion, however they may differ. And these opinions are expressed over radio and television. As all of us know, from time to time there have been complaints about the freedom of speech that has been exercised on the C.B.C. national broadcasting system.

I listened to the extract from the speech delivered in Saskatoon by Mr. Davidson Dunton, and quoted by the hon. member for Eglinton, and my interpretation of that speech was somewhat different from that placed upon it by my hon. friend. I think what the chairman of the broadcasting corporation was pleading for was more tolerance and more free speech on the radio. I venture to ask this question: Would that be obtained or assured if there were private control of television and radio in this country? I venture to say it would not. Moreover, when the Massey commission reported to the house —upon which the present policy of the house, not the government, is based—it made these very points to which I now refer.

Let me now say something about Canadian talent. This year we have not had a radio committee. I suppose that probably we shall have one next year. I think it is a good thing to have the broadcasting corporation appear before a parliamentary committee. However, because we have not had a committee, we do not know to what extent Canadian talent is being used by private stations. We know that when the committee met in former years we were told that very little encouragement was given to private talent by some—not all—of the private stations in Canada. It was shown that, as a matter of fact, private talent was largely developed through the C.B.C.

There are one or two exceptions to this. I would like to pay my respects again to a private company, Canadian Industries Limited, for its very remarkable program in developing private talent, "Singing Stars of Tomorrow". I have often wished that program had been undertaken by the C.B.C.; but I suppose, owing to the fact that a substantial sum of money is given as awards, it might have been the subject of criticism in the house.

Mrs. Fairclough: They get a deduction in their income tax.

Mr. Coldwell: My hon. friend says that they get a deduction in their income tax, which the C.B.C. would not get. However, be that as it may, let me pay my respects again to that most excellent and interesting program. It is one program to which I have listened consistently on Sunday evenings all through the years—with the result that I have not been able to listen to "Stage 54" as well. And may I say to the corporation that I wish some means could be found of having those two programs at different times. I used to enjoy the Stage series very much indeed a few years ago.

Then, some of the other programs put on by the C.B.C. are worth mentioning. One should draw attention to the manner in which Canadian talent has been improved and encouraged through C.B.C. opera and C.B.C. drama. I did hear in this past winter the production of "Julius Caesar" over the air, as one of four, I believe, drama broadcasts. It was remarkable. I have seen "Julius Caesar" played on the stage, and only recently I saw the film—and may I say I did not care for the manner of its production.

I did think however that the manner in which the play was performed by the C.B.C. drama company was beyond expectations, and reflected great credit upon those people who were participating in the program.

After all, such programs are important; because if we are going to build up the kind of Canada in which many of us believe, a Canada which will be prosperous materially, we must have a Canada that will match its material prosperity by its cultural development. I do not believe money is wasted when we spend it to encourage drama or to encourage opera, or when we spend money to buy good pictures for our national gallery, or to build and establish a national library.

All of these are cultural assets; if we are going to build a great nation materially we must build it culturally as well. If we are to be an independent nation, free from control by the ideas of the great nation to the south, then it seems to me most important that we have an organization that will control the kind of programs we get over television and over radio, to see that they are Canadian in background and in outlook.

Because, as we all know, radio and television are potent means of propaganda and education. I was not here when the radio broadcasting commission was set up, but I was here when the present corporation was set up. I believe those who established the commission had the same views as those who set up the corporation. And certainly those who voted for the corporation in 1936 held the view that what we were trying to do was to promote a Canadian system of broadcasting which would be used to build up the national life and culture of this country.

Now, I want to say something about revenues. It is quite true, as the hon. member for Eglinton has said, that the amount collected under the excise from the sale of television and radio sets now going to the C.B.C. has assumed very considerable proportions—larger than was estimated last year. But I have always been a bit troubled about this method of financing the corporation. We have had tremendous developments in television in Canada, and we may have even greater developments in the next few years. So long as people are buying radio and television sets, the C.B.C. will have very considerable revenue. But there will come a saturation point, surely; and when that saturation point comes it seems to me parliament will be faced with a problem.

While we supported the abolition of the licence fee, nevertheless some other more stable form of financial support for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its television activities will have to be found sooner or later. That is something we should keep in mind when the committee meets next year. We should get some estimates from the broadcasting corporation as to what the outlook in the future may be regarding this revenue.

I do not want to say a great deal more. It is quite true that this house should know what revenue is being received. It should know how that revenue is being spent. I suppose it is very difficult to give breakdowns today because we have not got the final report of the operations of the corporation for the last year. That is the advantage of a radio committee. Across the floor of this house we indulge in debate on various phases of government policy or of government operation. But when we get the corporation or the organization before a parliamentary committee, with the officials there who can speak for themselves, we can go into these matters much more thoroughly.

There are other programs that I have not mentioned this afternoon that are of great value. School broadcasts and the manner in which they are undertaken, for example, are a great aid to the schools of Canada. I hope that they will not only be continued but will be expanded. I want to say that I personally have confidence in the general work that the corporation is doing and for which we are paying. It is true that in various areas the corporation must of necessity have a monopoly in the district because, as I have indicated, television is such an expensive operation, and the cost of producing programs so great that if we are to have the type of program we must have, we cannot have half a dozen trying to produce programs and using available facilities to produce programs that are inferior to what might be done through joint public effort. It seems to me that is one of the great advantages of having the kind of television we have at the present time. The awards to which I referred, given in the United States for our Canadian radio and television programs, are eloquent tribute to what is being done. Of course great improvement is possible. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope that a committee will be set up next year, and instead of our talking across the floor, without all the information we should have at our fingertips, we can go into the operations of the corporation much more thoroughly than we can this year.

Mr. Hansell: We are happy once again to be able to join in this debate in respect to the appropriations now being voted for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, both in the sound radio field and in the television field. Over the years we have voted a tremendous amount of money for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We are now called upon once again to vote considerable sums for that organization. We have not vigorously opposed the voting of moneys to this corporation, but one thing we do want to make plain is that when we are voting such moneys for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is a government-owned corporation, it must expect to be open to criticism, perhaps serious criticism, and sometimes harsh criticism. I am quite sure, because of the fact that those in authority in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are human, as we all are, they may, because of human tendencies, resent some criticism; yet on the other hand I am quite sure they are men who would appreciate honest, fair and constructive criticism.

We are not the only ones in parliament of course who are critics of radio and television policy. We have found that the press of this country have also been critics of the present government policy with respect to radio and television. Not so very long ago an article appeared in Maclean's magazine. I do not know whether the minister would care to comment at all on the article, whether it is a correct appraisal of the situation, or whether it is out of line. I do not expect the minister to take account of everything that is written in the press of Canada with respect to government radio policy. If he took time to do that, perhaps he would not be doing very much else. The article did contain an appraisal and an analysis—although of course it was critical—of present radio and television. It applied particularly to television policy in Canada. The criticism appearing in Maclean's magazine, I believe in the early April issue, was written by Mr. Scott Young. It was based on the fundamental principle that government control of television and broadcasting is precisely the same as government control of the press and publications generally; that such control is a well recognized feature of dictatorship, whether communism, fascist, or nazi, and therefore has no place in a free country.

In his analysis Mr. Young pointed out what the government's aims really were in respect to television policy. He lists three or four of them. One is, it is supposed to serve all tastes. Another is to keep television Canadian in belief and ideas with the allied point of subduing United States influence. Quite a lot of discussion has taken place about United States influence. Perhaps it is partly justified, I do not know; but I am not so frightened as some appear to be of the influence that might come to us from our good neighbours to the south, although there are some practices there relating to television and radio that I would not want to see adopted here. I hope parliamentary committee investigations will not be televised. It lowers the dignity of our parliamentary institutions, and it does no particular good to portray in this dramatic fashion the entire truth of those investigations. I think very largely that in the United States in televising the various congressional committees, such as the Kefauver crime committee of a few years ago, and the recent committee on subversive influences, the intentions of the authorities may have been good, but it has eventually worked out to be rather a dramatic farce. I hope personally the time will never come when such a thing is repeated in this parliament.

However, on the broad principles I am not so worried as some people seem to be with respect to American influence in this country as far as radio and television are concerned. As a matter of fact, we are having it now; we have always had it; and some of the best and most popular programs over our networks, and this will probably be the case over our television networks for years to come, are American productions.

Another thing Mr. Young lists here as government intention as regards TV is to maintain good taste, and in addition to avoid commercial influence while making television pay its way. Mr. Young points out in his article that these objectives have not been reached by any stretch of the imagination.

For example, he analyses a weekend review of television which might be seen on any television station. I will quote from the article I have here in my hand which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, and which is more or less a summary of Mr. Young's article. He states:

> For instance, if the week were average and they were watching CBLT-Toronto they would see about 65 hours of television. They would see 17 elderly movies, mostly American and some quite good, and in the time not taken up by movies they would see 24 commercial programs produced in the United States and sponsored here by American companies whose products also sell in Canada.
> They would see six Canadian commercially sponsored programs, a fraction of the number C.B.C. had hoped to sell. On a time basis, only about 45 per cent of what they saw would originate in Canada, . . .

That shows how far we have fallen short of making our TV really Canadian. On a time basis only 45 per cent of what they saw would originate in Canada.

> . . . 50 per cent or more in the United States, the rest in Britain—a very broad interpretation of the C.B.C.'s feeling that a majority of its programs should be of Canadian content.

Mr. Young also analyses the financial picture as to what might have been expected according to the announcements made previously by the appropriate authorities, including the minister. He states:

> Of the $22 million spent by C.B.C.-TV in its first 19 months of operation, the $11 million for capital outlay must be considered a long term investment. But a return of $1,750,000 in advertising revenue for the remaining $11 million of operating costs is a figure that has only one explanation. No one ever should have expected, let alone promised, that TV under the C.B.C. system could ever pay its own way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the previous speeches made here this afternoon on this item and I quite realize that the speech of the spokesman for the Progressive Conservative party and that of the leader of the C.C.F. ran true to form. I do not blame the leader of the C.C.F. for taking the attitude in his speech that he has always taken over the years, because he thinks of all things in terms of a socialist concept. Nor can I blame him for supporting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in practically everything it does. He has supported them over the years simply because to a very high degree the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is socialist in concept.

However, Mr. Chairman, I want to comment on one or two things the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, and I do not want to comment in too harsh a fashion. I think there were some things left out, some things he did not say, that are perhaps as significant as those he did say.

He said he enjoyed most of the programs over the C.B.C. No one can criticize him for that. While I am not a radio fiend, one who sits at his radio day and night, and I do not own a television set, because there is not a television station within about 1,000 miles of my home—and I do not expect there will be for some little time—I must confess that I enjoy many of the programs that come over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stations.

But the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spent considerable time applauding the C.B.C. for its televising of the coronation. I did not see it over television and I suppose they did a good job. I am quite willing to give them credit for that. I saw the coronation in the motion pictures and I too was very much impressed. But the thing my hon. friend did not say was that the televising of the coronation over the Canadian stations was merely a televising of the film. Well, now, there is no trick in televising a film. The trick is in producing the film in the first place. The good job I thought the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation did was the most important one of getting this film over here without any delay.

I think they are to be commended on that, for it was seen here practically within hours of the actual coronation taking place. It is nice to laud that program, but I would point out that that was not merely a feature of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Any TV station which had a similar film could have done the same job.

There are good programs on the C.B.C., and the work the C.B.C. is doing is commendable. This group has never criticized the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the way in which it is conducting its own affairs in respect to the programs that it puts on. What we have criticized is the government radio policy in Canada of permitting the C.B.C., which is a government institution, to be a monopoly.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, "Yes, but there are other monopolies," just as though one wrong justifies another. But that is not so. I do not know what control the government may have over commercial monopolies such as that mentioned by my hon. friend, but they certainly do have control over radio and television in Canada and they seem very determined to maintain that control as a monopoly. Just because there are other monopolies does not mean that this one should continue to exist.

We have not even criticized—not too harshly, at least—the method of financing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We have not vigorously opposed these expenditures. In our speeches we have said that we believe a good deal of the expenditure could be cut down. On numerous occasions we have said that if private radio stations were given the opportunity of carrying on a separate network and were given more latitude in the operation of radio and, in the future, of television, money could be saved. We have advocated and said—I personally have said it from time to time and I still believe it—that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, although government-owned, should be able to function on a commercial basis side by side with independent and private radio, and that if independent and private radio can "make a go of it" financially, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be able to do the same thing. But even though we have said that, we have been willing to subsidize them. We have been willing to subsidize them for those sustaining programs that do not bring in any revenue. I do not think that we could be any fairer than that.

We did not vigorously oppose the new policy introduced a little while ago, namely, that of doing away with the licence fees and the collection of the sales tax on radio and television equipment; we did not vigorously oppose that policy. That is a nice handsome sum that is coming to the corporation over and above the commercial revenues which they receive and which would not be coming to private radio. Yet private radio could handle the job without that subsidy. As yet we have not vigorously opposed that procedure; we have not vigorously opposed subsidizing of the C.B.C. But what we have opposed—and I repeat it again—is the placing of the control of radio in the hands of the corporation which controls its competitors. That is the position we have taken, and I think that is the most sensible position that anyone could possibly take.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke in terms of independent radio control —I think that was the phrase he used—as though those of us who may be critics of the corporation were wanting to put the control of radio into private hands. We have never advocated that course. What we have advocated is that a separate regulatory body be set up. It could be easily set up by nominations coming to the government as to the personnel of such a body. I do not care whether it is called a commission or something else. The government could appoint one member; perhaps they could call upon the independent stations to appoint another; and perhaps those two could even appoint a third. Those are incidental details about which we are not greatly concerned. However, we are not advocating, as the hon. member hinted—I do not think that he perhaps did it intentionally; it may have been a slip of the tongue—that private radio should be the controlling force of radio in Canada. We have recommended that certain phases of radio and television should be controlled but have maintained that they should not be controlled by the government-owned Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

There is one other matter upon which I should like to say a few words. The speech of the chairman of the board of governors of the C.B.C., as it was given at the convocation of Saskatchewan University, has been brought into the picture. I did not hear the speech but I know the gentleman well enough to know that his speech would be carefully given. I would not think for a moment that Mr. Dunton would advocate a tightening up of the control of speech; I do not think he wants that. I can quite understand his advocating, in his speech, the greatest measure possible of freedom of speech; I quite suppose that he did that. But according to what I have read in the papers I believe that he may have made just a little slip. I am quoting from a newspaper article which reports that in the course of his speech he said this—I might say that the article is from the Winnipeg Tribune and it reads as follows:

> The C.B.C. chairman warned that there was a danger to the free and fair interchange of ideas when power over mass communication was "in the hands of so few".
> He went on to say: "I am very conscious of this myself because I and others of the C.B.C. belong to the few, together with controllers of publishing, film and other broadcasting organizations".

The point of this newspaper editorial and the point I want to bring out is simply this. We can place the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the same category as that of other mediums of publication, as far as the principle of publication is concerned. I want to make that point clear. In my own mind the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is just as much a medium of publication as is any newspaper or any motion picture theatre. I put them all in the same category. I do not think there can be any denial of that statement. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation puts on plays and feature programs, so do the newspapers and so do the magazines of our country—the only difference is that in the one instance the vehicle is the spoken word and in the other it is the printed word. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation also put on newscasts, and they are to be complimented on the way in which they are given. The newspapers also publish news. That is what they were originally intended for. That is why they are called newspapers. The newspapers advertise in their columns. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation also advertise by reason of their commercially sponsored programs. Comparing them as mediums of publication, one can find no difference.

The one difference is this. The chairman of the board of governors linked himself with the publishers, producers of motion pictures and other radio station operators, and thus indicated that there was an association. Recently we have heard a great deal about the imposition of guilt by association. I am not going to say that there is any guilt in this case. I think the opposite is the case so far as his speech is concerned. What he has determined is more or less a type of responsibility by reason of association, and that is all right. I am not criticizing that, but where the difference arises is that in the case of radio and television there is a monopoly of control. Anyone in this country who can raise the funds can institute a newspaper or publication house for the printing of literature if he wishes to do so without having to go to some higher national body for a licence. The same thing is true with respect to motion pictures. Anyone can take motion pictures. I have a motion picture camera myself. Anyone can go into the business if they want to and nobody is going to stop them.

There are many motion picture producing companies in Canada. I have a return in my office which I forgot to bring to the chamber that indicates there are many motion picture producing companies in Canada. I have forgotten how many there are, but anyone can start such a company if they want to do so. You do not have to have a licence unless it is a business licence in a city or community in which the company is established, and that is only a matter of routine.

The fact of the matter is that the difference between the various mediums of publication is that the C.B.C. controls its competitors while the other mediums of publication are free, and that is a very basic difference. In the past we in this party have advocated two things. We have advocated that the radio committee should be made a regular standing committee that would meet every year. I am not going to take any time now on that point. The other thing we have recommended, and I have mentioned it previously, is that there should be a separate regulatory body. We can talk how we like and try to pare down the view that the C.B.C. is not a monopoly, but it still remains a monopoly. It remains a monopoly in three spheres.

In the first place, to a very large extent it is a commercial monopoly. I want to be fair in analysing that particular point because it is not true to say that it has a complete monopoly of commercial broadcasting. The independent radio stations are getting along reasonably well financially, and I do not think that they are complaining too much about that. They are paid a nominal sum for carrying the commercial broadcasts that are sent out over the networks by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. But nevertheless there is a certain degree of monopoly in the commercial field, particularly in national network commercial programs.

I have been referring particularly to sound broadcasting, but we are now entering the field of television. It is still in its infant stage, and I must say that so far as licensing is concerned I think the field should be pretty well wide open so that private television interests can develop television in Canada wherever it is possible to obtain a channel in order that private industry may to a large extent bear the financial responsibility of the expansion that must take place within the next few years in this field. Otherwise we are going to have a monopoly of commercial television broadcasting in Canada. I am most sincere on that point.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar pointed out that in talking to one man he asked him if he expected to go into the television field and the man said that he did not know, that it would cost him a lot of money to get started, anywhere from $150,000 to $500,000. That may be so. I will not doubt that but that is all the more reason for giving the private television interests all the encouragement possible to go into the field. If it costs so much, then it is going to cost equally as much for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to cover the entire area of Canada.

While it may cost a good deal in the initial stages to engage in the operation of a television station, it can be a fairly good paying proposition. I do not know whether it is altogether accurate for me to compare Canadian figures with those of the United States, but I have an article in my hand from a magazine known as Tide to which I should like to refer. It is an old issue of three or four years ago. I am not going to read the article but it does give an account of a television station in a community with a population of 28,000 people. That is a small city. I think the population of the city of Lethbridge would be about 25,000.

Mr. Hahn: New Westminster has 28,000.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member for New Westminster says that New Westminster has 28,000. But of course there is a difference because any television station in New Westminster would reach many more than 28,000 people. It would reach a population of well-nigh a million people in that area. But here is the community of Bloomington, Indiana—I might as well give the name—with a population of 28,000 people, and yet within two years the television station there was operating at a profit. As I say, I do not know whether it is completely fair for me to compare that with Canada, but I do not see why the figures should not be reasonably comparable.

I have been talking about monopoly in the commercial field. I should also like to say a word concerning monopoly in the cultural field. I believe we are going astray in our thinking when we say that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has responsibility for the cultural interests in the nation. In my opinion culture is something that you may aid through radio or TV. You may do that just as well, I suppose, as you can demoralize the life of the people by the same process. I realize that, but a lot of these things, such as culture and the social complex of many things, originate very largely and are the responsibility of the home and other institutions.

I refer to this because it has been said often that the plowing of money into the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is not lost by reason of the artists developed through their activities, the encouragement given to musicians and artists of one kind or another. I maintain this, and I think I am right, that talent is not produced by radio or TV, but talent is something that is inborn. Talent is something that is not trained; it is something that is discovered. I say it is a misconception to lean over backwards in our thinking or to be too much concerned with what the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is doing to develop a certain type of culture in Canada. If they do insist upon that, then I say that is all the more reason why TV and radio should have more opportunity. I do not believe you can discover or develop culture by going through one individual channel.

Who is to decide what type of culture we want in Canada? Culture comes from all directions. In Canada we are in a particularly favourable position in that respect. We are a people of various racial origins bringing our various cultures from various parts of the world. If those cultures could be brought together in some way or other, we could produce a tremendous Canadian culture that would be comparable with any in the world. But it should be free; it should be open. All the airways and the TV channels should be open to the entire country and the material should not be all put through one particular channel.

Then I come to what is most important of all. I have not kept my eye on the clock, and I do not want to go over my time.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should have advised the hon. member that his time had expired, but I presume the committee has been giving unanimous consent to the hon. member continuing.

Mr. Hansell: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman; I appreciate that. I shall only be a minute or two, otherwise I would have to rise a litle later. I come now to the very serious principle of thought control. I know there are many officials in radio, particularly in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, who are willing to say, "We do not want to channel the thinking of Canada through only one medium." I believe they are honourable men. Nevertheless, the principle is there, and all the apparatus is there; the organization is there. If you have control of the one medium in Canada that controls all radio and TV throughout the country, then of necessity you cannot escape being charged with monopoly of thought control. There is only one channel of thought control. That is a monopoly more vicious than any other control to be found anywhere, and much more vicious than the monopolies mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Perhaps the International Nickel Company is a monopoly, but what can nickel do? It is only a piece of metal. I do not believe that nickel has any brains.

An hon. Member: Thought control.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member says "thought control". I cannot see any brains or the ability of nickel to think.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that a reflection on an hon. member?

Mr. Hansell: If he is a nickel-headed member, I suppose it is.

An hon. Member: What about their ads?

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member refers to their ads, but that is a different medium altogether. It is the realm of publication again. This thought control is a serious thing because if there is one thing the dictatorships of the earth want, it is thought control. Here is the medium through which that very thing is done. I do not think I could do any better than to quote from a radio broadcast that was given by Chester A. Bloom. The pamphlet copy I have is entitled "The Threat of Thought Control". I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I might read just one paragraph from it? It is enlightening. I quote:

> The real truth is that steady refusal to grant such fair rights can only be motivated by determination to maintain control over the thinking of the people of Canada. The government and the CBC are obviously determined to maintain the same kind of control over the public mind by means of television.
> Let me give you just one small example of how this works. The talk I am making to you today will be broadcast from 67 independent radio stations in Canada. If I were giving it over the CBC network, as I often have, it would go out simultaneously and at an immediate hour. But because it is to be given by independent stations served by an independent bureau, it had to be copied on 67 records and mailed out separately to each station. That means a long delay before it can go on the air. Obviously, it also means that no such broadcast can deal with immediate events. This is a subtle handicap on freedom of speech over the radio.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I quote that because I think it is pertinent to the discussion. I shall conclude by amplifying that quotation by saying this: No individual in Canada could broadcast to this nation over a national network unless he received permission or was invited to do so by the small committee of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It does not make any difference what kind of message he has; it does not make any difference what kind of proposals he has to make; it does not make any difference whether he has a million dollars, he could not do it without first receiving the sanction of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Knowles: Would you want the man with the million dollars to have the right to buy that time?

Mr. Hansell: I know what my hon. friend means. He means that only those with money would be able to do it.

Mr. Knowles: You would have such persons controlling our thoughts.

Mr. Hansell: Well, if all the money was in the hands of one person or one corporation, I would say that is so. The same thing applies to the newspaper business, the publication business. It takes millions of dollars for a man to float a daily newspaper; but you can do that anywhere in Canada, if you have the money. Does my hon. friend object to that?

Mr. Knowles: Is my hon. friend satisfied with the treatment the press gives to members of parliament?

Mr. Hansell: Well, I don't know that I am but, believe me, my hon. friend should be.

Mr. Knowles: We thrive on the treatment they give us.

Mr. Hansell: Yes, you surely do. And even though that may be the case, I would give the press the absolute right to function as they do today, with the privilege given to any person or any organization to be able to float a newspaper and to have a representative here in the press gallery.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a question?

Mr. Lennard: Oh, for goodness' sake, he is ten minutes overtime now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the statement by the hon. member for Macleod mean that he is repudiating the policy that the Alberta government followed in the press law a few years ago?

Mr. Hansell: Now, Mr. Chairman, I don't know if you are going to permit me to answer that or not. I want to answer it. Because, Mr. Chairman, that very question has been asked over and over again.

Mr. Sinclair: And never answered.

Mr. Hansell: And answered a good many times. Believe me, I have not been floating around from coast to coast in this country without having that question popped at me a good many times. I have not read the papers of this country without having that bit of propaganda put to me a good many times—and also misrepresented, as is the intention of my hon. friend's question. Yes, I will answer the question. The press act to which my hon. friend refers was in no sense of the word control of the press, by reason of their being able to criticize or to comment in any way they wanted, editorially, in their newspapers.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Hansell: Yes, I will explain.

Mr. Pickersgill: I prefer the view of the supreme court in the matter.

Mr. Hansell: The supreme court's view was that it was unconstitutional for that government to put it in; that was their view. What the press act did was this, that when a falsehood was given out in a news report of government activity, then the government had the right to correct that report.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: If that is not thought control, what is?

Mr. Knowles: You were arguing against thought control.

Mr. Hansell: No.

Mr. Knowles: You were a minute ago.

Mr. Hansell: What I say is that the government claimed the right to correct that which was false, by a law.

Mr. Knowles: You mean that which the government said was false.

Mr. Hansell: So that the newspapers would print in equal terms the correct truth. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Knowles: Who determines the truth?

Mr. Pickersgill: "What is truth?" said Pontius Pilate.

The Chairman: We are discussing the estimates of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Hansell: I am only answering the question I was asked. The government should know what is the truth concerning its own actions. Let me ask the minister, who is a responsible minister of the crown, this question: Does he know the truth? When anything is reported about his department does he know the truth of that report?

Mr. Knowles: If he knew the truth it would make him free from the Liberal party.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. McCann: My respect for other people prompts me to say that I believe what they tell me, and that they do not tell me anything else but the truth.

Mr. Hansell: Well, Mr. Chairman, the profundity of the minister's answer leaves me staggered and spellbound.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the time for levity has passed, and that we had better get back on the rail and discuss the estimates of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to accommodate the minister. But let him not accuse me of getting off the track; it was my friend the Secretary of State who initiated it.

Now, I am against thought control.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: And I believe every member in this house is. I believe those who are enjoying a little humour at the moment, if one may judge by their laughter, are also opposed to thought control. And, even to say the worst, even though I did not agree with the Alberta press act, if it is thought control then I would be against it. But I do not believe it is.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with its control over sound radio and television, is the only medium through which there can be freedom of expression over networks in Canada. That is what I am opposed to. I will always oppose it. While I am reasonable in wanting the broadcasting corporation to stay out of the red, and while I am willing to cast my vote for appropriations wherever they are needed, while I commend them on the work they are doing, I must seriously and vigorously criticize government radio and television policy for its monopolistic principles.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to attempt to answer the opinions expressed by the hon. member of the opposite side as the hon. minister can ably do it. First of all, I should like to commend the C.B.C. upon the effort it has made in trying to give to the Ottawa area television programs which would satisfy both elements in the community. I believe however that they have not succeeded in this. I may be told that this is neither the time nor the place to discuss this subject, and it may be pointed out to me that permits are issued by the Department of Transport. However, those permits are given out or are refused in accordance with the policy laid down by the Department of National Revenue.

Not knowing exactly where to go I have taken advantage of the opportunity afforded this afternoon to ask the minister if anything can be done to meet the situation I shall describe. As I said before, the broadcasting corporation has made a noteworthy effort. But, under present circumstances, a large proportion of the English-speaking population of this area do not speak French, and it will be kept in mind that a considerable part of the programming is in French. Then, there is a proportion of the French-speaking population who do not speak English, and, again, hon. members will realize that a considerable portion of the television is in English.

As it is, neither the French-speaking nor the English-speaking portions of the population are fully satisfied. While the programs may be satisfactory in both languages, they do not satisfy those elements for which the television system has been established.

I know an attempt was made by station CKCH to establish another channel. This may not have come before the Minister of National Revenue. However I have spoken about it to the Minister of Transport and found that he was not opposed to the idea. But they are governed by the regulations which say that two television systems cannot be installed within a radius of fifty miles or so. I can understand that perfectly if the same broadcasts were coming from Toronto or Montreal over the French or English system; that is, if there were two of those systems in the same vicinity it would be too many. In Montreal they established a French system and also an English system, because there was a large element that was in need of that service. We have the very same situation in Hull and Ottawa. There is a large French-speaking element that would like to have the system that comes from Montreal in French, and there is a very important English population which has to listen to French programs coming from Montreal when they would prefer to receive the programs coming from Toronto. I really believe we shall never be able to satisfy the two elements, even after the trial is made, unless there is a change in the policy, such as has been done in Montreal, to permit another system to be established here. In other words, to have a system which would reproduce the programs coming from the French system in Montreal. I would ask the minister whether he would study the matter and see if there might not be possibilities of giving to CKCH, which is a well-established radio station here, and well-known as the French station of the region. the right to establish in the near future a station which would connect with Montreal, and thereby give better satisfaction to both the French and English-speaking population.

I know the hon. members for Ottawa East and Russell have been doing some work toward the establishment of a system of that kind. I really believe that the minister is well disposed. He has no intention of not trying to give to the population what it needs. Today I am asking him officially if it will be possible in the near future so to organize matters that CKCH would get permission to establish that system.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, after all that has been said during the past few days in the house regarding the screening of the civil service, the armed forces and so forth, I have a question that I should like to put to the minister. It deals with Mr. Reuben Ship, who was the author of the C.B.C. program "The Investigator" put over "Stage 54" last Sunday. Did the minister or the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation know that Mr. Ship was deported from the United States during the past year or two?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, if the general discussion on this matter is finished—

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I have a few remarks to make. They will be brief, because I do not intend to—

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, I merely waited for an answer from the minister.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, it was decided that the general discussion with reference to the C.B.C. would take place. When the general discussion is finished I shall be glad to attempt to answer any of the questions. There are the questions of the hon. member for Eglinton and some that the hon. member for Macleod put and so on. I shall take occasion to answer all of the questions at that time. I could give an answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Drew: On that point, we had a misunderstanding before, and I do not want a misunderstanding again. The general discussion is not ended. I should like an answer at this point on the understanding that that does not end the general discussion.

Mr. Nicholson: I understood we were to proceed with the general discussion. Quite a number of us have waited for some time to say a few words. If the minister starts answering questions now and the rest of us are cut off, it will hardly be carrying out the understanding we had the other day.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member for Wentworth completed his remarks?

Mr. Lennard: I asked the question; I do not know the answer. If the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation did not know about this man, it is about time that they did, and it is about time they screened the employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to see whether they have any employees who should not be there. I do not know what the answer to the question is.

Mr. McCann: The C.B.C. reports that a play entitled "The Investigator" was broadcast last Sunday evening. The script was submitted by an outside writer and was accepted on the basis of its interest and dramatic entertainment value. The C.B.C. does not hold itself responsible regarding the personal or political connections of outside writers who may submit scripts. The corporation does, of course, take the responsibility for accepting and broadcasting any given script. That relates to Reuben Ship, the gentleman of whom the hon. member spoke.

Mr. Trainor: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is there any editing of those scripts?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to review at length, as some have done, the activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, nor of broadcasting in general in Canada, but I do wish to join with others who have commended the officers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on their excellent work and all the active members of our radio stations throughout Canada, whether they be private broadcasters or broadcasting on behalf of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am one of those who believes that private radio has its place, and that has been recognized in our system for a number of years.

A few moments ago someone mentioned the worthy efforts of some private radio stations in connection with certain programs. One of the greatest efforts put out by the private radio today is the community service given in the local areas. I think that the committee pretty well agrees that all in all there is general satisfaction today with the administration and the services that our people receive from our radio system. But a new field has come along in the last few years, namely, television. We have recognized from year to year the efforts of private radio stations, and we have established them in almost every part of Canada.

May I speak more familiarly of certain areas in my own part of Ottawa? For example, CBO is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation station. Then we have three other private stations, and one additional one has received a permit but it has not yet been established. However, the same does not apply in the field of television. Up to now the policy which has been announced and followed is that in a certain area where the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has an outlet there shall be no private outlet. One understands how that policy was developed in the first place. You cannot proceed at this stage with television as you can with radio stations. There is only one source of revenue. The revenue is not large and it cannot be tapped by everybody in the early beginnings of television as an industry.

On the other hand, there are situations where one must consider the service to be given to the population in a certain area. In Montreal the policy adopted was to give an appropriate service to the French language people by having two outlets, an English-speaking outlet and a French-speaking outlet. In this area for some time there has been a great demand for another outlet.

The Chairman: Order. I am extremely sorry to have to interrupt the hon. gentleman but it being five o'clock we must now proceed to consideration of public and private bills.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE VOTING AGE

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 390, to amend the Canada Elections Act (age of voters).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I believe that in a democracy we should have the widest possible basis for our franchise. Over the years progress has been made in broadening the basis for eligibility of voters. Gradually property qualifications have been abolished, voting has been extended to women and now every Canadian subject is allowed to vote on reaching the age of 21. But I believe there is just one group remaining in the country that should be given the franchise, and that is the group from 18 years of age to 21. I believe that that group should be given the vote, because if one looks over their education, qualifications, and their knowledge I think it will be seen that that group is the best educated group in Canada. I believe that their knowledge on public affairs is second to that of no other age group in the nation.

Over the years our educational standards have been going up. People have been leaving school at a more advanced age. In 1911 the average 18-year old had a grade VII education. Thirty years later the average 18-year-old had a grade X education. The 1951 census showed once again that the educational standards of the Canadian people are rising, and that the average Canadian had been in school .5 years longer in 1951 than when the previous census was taken in 1941.

At present a person is eligible to vote when he or she becomes 21, provided, of course, there is a general election at that time. We usually have a federal general election every four or five years, so that the average Canadian, in practice, is not able to cast his first ballot until he is 22 or 23 years of age. If we lowered the age of voters to 18 you would not give every person in Canada of 18 years of age a vote in a federal election at 18. That would depend on when the federal general election was called. It would mean that the average citizen would vote for the first time at the average age of 19 or 20, rather than 22 or 23 which is the practical result of having the vote at the age of 21.

I believe that a student coming out of high school should be able to vote as soon thereafter as possible, as far as age qualification is concerned. I do not think it lends itself to young Canadians keeping and maintaining an interest in public affairs to have a long gap of years between the time they graduate from high school and the time they are eligible to vote. I believe young Canadians would take a more active interest in public affairs if the voting age were lowered to 18.

We know that from our own experience in Saskatchewan. You can go out to Saskatchewan and you can campaign in a federal election, and you will find that your audience is older on the average than when you campaign in that province during a provincial election, because in Saskatchewan we have given our citizens the right to vote at the age of 18. Campaigning in a provincial election you find a substantial proportion of your audience are teen-agers, and I can tell you that they do take an active interest in public affairs; they do take their right to vote seriously; and they do attend public meetings. I think if they are encouraged in that way, by reducing the voting age, to attend political meetings at an early age that that interest is more likely to continue in the years ahead.

Saskatchewan is not the only province in Canada which has reduced its voting age. In 1944 Alberta reduced the voting age in the province to 19; in 1953 British Columbia reduced its voting age to 19. Saskatchewan, however, is the first and only province in Canada so far to reduce the voting age to 18. I believe that young Canadians between the ages of 18 and 21, no matter what other hon. members in this house may think and say, are responsible persons, and I think they are sufficiently responsible to be given the right to vote, and to be given the right to have a voice in public affairs.

Whenever the country faces an emergency, whenever the country is engaged in war, then we are quite happy to extend the voting principle to 18-year olds when they are in the armed forces. If we are prepared to do that when we need them to defend democracy in wartime, why should they be denied the right to vote in peacetime, the right to a voice in public affairs, and the right to a voice by the ballot in the decisions that will be made which may result in their having to don a uniform and lay down their lives for their country.

Canada was prepared to spend huge sums of money in giving a very intricate and thorough training to young Canadians during the war. They showed themselves capable of undertaking that training by assimilating knowledge, and they were able to operate very efficiently the most intricate and complicated instruments of war. Of this I am sure: Some day the 18-year-olds in Canada will have the franchise. It is just a matter of time. The trend is already apparent. Three of the ten provinces in Canada have reduced the voting age. Of another thing we can be sure, when the C.C.F. party becomes the government in any other province, the voting age will be reduced to 18. From two precedents I think it also follows that should the Social Credit party be elected in any other province in Canada, the chances are that the voting age in that province will be reduced to 19. Hence the trend is definitely for a reduction in the voting age. I am sure the age will be reduced to 18. It is only a matter of time; and I do not see why the time should not be now.

President Eisenhower of the United States is himself in favour of giving the vote to young Americans 18 years of age. He presented that proposal to congress in his speech on January 7 in these words:

> For years our citizens between the ages of 18 and 21 have, in time of peril, been summoned to fight for America. They should participate in the political process that produces this fateful summons. I urge congress to propose to the states a constitutional amendment permitting citizens to vote when they reach the age of 18.

Gerald Waring points out in his column that at least one section of another political party in Canada other than the C.C.F. is in favour of giving the franchise to 18-year-olds. In his column on May 6 he states as follows:

> Last month the provincial Liberal convention in Ontario joined the national C.C.F. party in favouring a reduction of the voting age minimum to 18 years.

Mr. McIlraith: They did not join the national C.C.F. party; they merely favoured the granting of the franchise at 18.

Mr. Argue: If the hon. member wants to quarrel with the way in which Gerald Waring wrote his column, that is all right; but to me it is perfectly clear that what he is saying is that the Ontario Liberal convention joined the C.C.F. party in favouring a reduction of the voting age to 18 years.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sure the hon. member would not wish to mislead anyone by his remarks; I am quite sure of that. I was merely pointing out that what the young Liberals did was to recommend that the franchise be granted at age 18. They did not join the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Argue: I am sure there is no move on foot by the C.C.F. to have the Ontario Liberal party join the national C.C.F. I am sure of that. We do not want the kiss of death now or at any other time.

An hon. Member: You have had it.

Mr. Argue: After President Eisenhower had called on congress to lower the voting age to 18, the matter was discussed in the United States senate. The proposition that the voting age should be reduced to 18 was passed in the United States senate by a vote of 34 to 24. In other words, the senators in the United States, by a substantial majority, are in favour of a reduction in the voting age to 18. That vote cannot result in the enactment of the necessary constitutional amendment because, in order to have such a constitutional amendment such a proposition must have a two-thirds majority. In this particular vote, the majority came close to but did not quite reach the necessary two-thirds.

I think the President of the United States is proposing something that is reasonable, sensible and progressive and something that the United States will adopt in time. Certainly the vote in the United States senate shows that a substantial part of congress is in favour of reducing the voting age. I hope that our government here will consider a reduction in the voting age and will bring in—if not during this present session, at least before the next general election—the necessary legislation to bring about this result. I naturally hope that the bill I am presenting will get the support of the majority of hon. members. However, if that support should not be forthcoming I am hoping that the government itself, before the next general election, will bring in legislation to provide for a reduction of the voting age to 18.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say a few words on this bill. It is not the first time that this bill or a similar one has come before the house, but I did not avail myself of addressing the house on previous occasions. Before going further I naturally want to state that I agree fully with the first part of what the hon. member had to say. I am sure we all agree that universal suffrage is the goal today, in theory and in practice, of most governments throughout the world at the present time. However, even though that is the situation, we must all recognize the fact that there are certain inhabitants of states that cannot be given the right to vote. In this country and in most other democracies the only ones excluded are the insane and the minors.

Mr. Drew: And judges.

Mr. Jutras: In considering this bill the questions arise as to who is a minor and when a person ceases to be a minor. I realize that the tendency in this country—and indeed in many others—is to lower the voting age from 21 to 18. The age varies a great deal, even right in Canada. Various provinces have taken various ages, all the way from 18 to 21, but I believe there are several countries in the world where the age is still 25. This great hurry to get the people to vote no doubt flows from what I often think is our great hurry to get our children educated in this country. I sometimes wonder whether we are not nowadays trying to rush our education a little bit too much. In days gone by children would start to school at the age of 7; then they started to go to school at 6. Now they start at the age of 5, and even at the age of 4. There is a tendency to try to rush them through as soon as possible and to get them out into life as soon as possible.

I am quite satisfied that the average young man and the average young woman at the age of 17 in this country is quite responsible enough to exercise, and quite capable of exercising, his or her franchise in this country. However, the point that comes to my mind is this: Are we wise or are we fair in imposing upon them the responsibility of being obliged to cast a vote at that age? It is true that it is a great privilege to exercise the franchise in a country. But something more than a privilege is involved. Great responsibility is entailed in the exercise of this right of the franchise.

For one thing it would seem to me that to lower the age at the federal level would be premature in Canada at this stage. I must say quite frankly that I think the hon. member would have a hard time justifying 18 more than 19 or 19 more than 18 or even 17 more than 18. I admit it is very hard to draw the line, and the line has to be drawn more or less in an arbitrary way. Up until now the line has been drawn at age 21.

I do not think there are any very great reasons to justify lowering that age by even one year. I might at some time agree that there might be some justification for lowering it by one year or two years, but I frankly wonder whether it would be a service, as the hon. member has just said, to this class. Here again I do not know why he classes those from 18 to 21 in a special group. I wonder whether it would really be a favour to them to impose the responsibility on them of casting their vote.

Surely there does not seem to be any very keen desire on their part to exercise their responsibility at the present time. Taking the results of the last election, if they were to follow the example set by their elders, that would seem to be an indication that there is not a very keen desire on the part of any particular group to go to the polls on voting day. According to the results of the last election, even the older people did not go to the polls in the numbers that they should have. There is no doubt that even in the group from 18 to 21 the same attitude probably prevails. That is just incidental, but I thought I would mention it.

Even today when our children go to school at an early age and are rushed through as quickly as possible it is my experience that the average person at age 18, if he is going to take up a profession, is still in the process of getting his professional education, and he has not yet taken over the actual responsibilities of life or become interested in the intricacies and application of government. I think it is also true of the average high school student who, as the hon. member has said, may attend meetings, will still have fresh in his memory the knowledge of what government is and how it is constituted. They have the theory of government fresh in their minds but they have not yet had to deal with the application of the theory.

Mind you, there are a certain number who by the age of 18 are already established in life, but they would be a minority. The greater number of those from 18 to 21 are quite busy at that stage in deciding on their future. They have a very great decision to make. They have to decide how they will grapple with life in the years to come. For the most part their minds are quite preoccupied and they have little time for the actual application of politics in the country. I would question whether there is actually a long gap, as the hon. member said, from the time they leave school and become established in life and the time they actually cast their first vote. I would think in most cases the gap might be a year or two or three years at the most.

The point I should like to come back to is that these people will have plenty of opportunity to discharge the responsibility of voting in the years to come. I think it is not a bad principle to give them a chance to establish themselves and to become accustomed to their environment after assuming the full responsibilities of citizenship and all that goes with it. Then they are automatically and, generally speaking, naturally ready to assume the responsibility of the franchise.

Whether there is any great merit in having them break in gradually, so to speak, so far as voting is concerned is a very debatable question and one that could be debated for a long time. Inasmuch as some provinces have a lower voting age it would seem to me that the first step would be to give this group the vote first at the lower levels of government. I do not think it would be logical to have students or young people voting in federal elections when they did not have the right to vote in provincial or municipal elections. It seems to me they should be given the privilege first at the lower level. Once they have been granted the responsibility of the franchise at a lower age at the provincial level generally throughout the country, then in my opinion that would be the time to consider giving them the same responsibility on the federal level.

But it seems to me it would not be quite logical for them to start to vote in federal elections before they could vote at the lower levels. As far as I can ascertain at the moment, there is no great desire on the part of this group to cast their votes at that early age. I remember reading an article a few weeks ago in one of the local papers at home. In passing, I might say that it is a progressive and well illustrated weekly. I refer to the Carillon News. From time to time that paper makes it a practice to take a cross-section of public opinion and question people generally on various questions that arise.

A few weeks ago they questioned a cross-section of the high school students at the college and asked them if they were in favour of voting at the age of 19. I suppose they picked the age of 19 because the last provincial government that dealt with the question set that as the age. However, the response from the high school students was very much divided. A great many held that they would rather wait a few more years until they were established. Some thought that they were quite qualified and quite ready to assume the responsibility. A week later the newspaper asked the same question of a group of senior citizens, and again opinion was very much divided. No clear-cut pattern was apparent in the minds of these two classes of citizens. Therefore I say that there is no great demand for such a move at the present time. If the age is to be lowered I would, as I say, much prefer to see it done first at the lower levels of government before it is done at the federal level.

I am not questioning whether the young people are responsible or qualified at that age. I am quite convinced that they are fully qualified and capable of casting an intelligent vote at that age. The question that I have in mind is whether these heavy responsibilities should be placed on their shoulders at that early age. Why not give them a little break until the age of 21 when they would have an even better working knowledge of the intricacies of life and the intricacies of the various levels of government.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): This bill, when it is passed, will make it possible for Canadian voters to exercise their franchise in federal elections when they reach the age of 18 years. At this time I wish to compliment the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) for sponsoring this bill and for the interest he is taking in the youth of this country. I believe that he is an example of what the young people of Canada can do when they get an early start and are interested in public affairs. At the age of 24 he was sitting as a member of this house, and is an example of what can be done by the youth of this country. He became interested in public affairs at an early age in the university parliament in the University of Saskatchewan. His interest in the future citizens of Canada and his faith in the ability of the young people of this country I am sure to a large extent have motivated him in sponsoring this bill and urging the young people to take a greater part in the affairs of Canada.

Some members in this house have opposed this bill on the grounds that young Canadians are too immature; that they are not interested in the affairs of state. If that is so, I feel it is a sad commentary on the educational standards of this country. One of the contributing causes of that lack of interest, if there is that lack, may lie in the very fact that they are not permitted to participate in these activities. They feel excluded. Do hon. members realize that in spite of the fact the qualifying age of voters is now 21 the young people of Canada who reached their 21st birthday on August 10 last will not exercise their franchise in the ordinary course of events until they are 24 or 25 years of age. If this bill were passed and the minimum age were set at 18, still the average age of a Canadian casting his first vote would be about 20. I maintain that at that age young Canadians are capable of exercising their franchise in a very real way.

If any precedent is necessary I would refer the members of this house to the record of the first provincial government in Canada to grant the right to vote to those who are 18. That province has taken the lead in social legislation, and improving within its own jurisdiction the conditions of the people. It is now one of the most progressive provinces in the whole Dominion of Canada. I can remember sitting in this house when a young man from that province sat here as the member for Weyburn. He was elected when about 31, and at the age of 41 he became the premier of Saskatchewan. He is now making a signal contribution to Canadian history in the form of progressive legislation. That government is really working for the people, in the interests of the people and is in truth governed by the people.

In that province we urge the young people to participate and to feel that they are a part of this Canada. We urge them that part of their responsibilities as citizens of Canada is to take part in the elections of that province. It has been my privilege to live in that province for over 50 years. I have watched the youth grow. I know something about them and their attitude towards public affairs today. They are capable and they are responsible. When Canada finds herself in the position when she must defend her shores and the democratic rights of government, there are no members in this house who say the young people lack ability; that they lack skill or that they are not responsible or mature. The records indicate that the youths of 18, 19 and 20 take on the responsibilities of men much senior to that, and exercise a judgment and skill that has placed Canada high in the records of those who fight for democratic rights.

Surely those rights should be granted in time of peace to these same people when they reach that age. If they are fit to go out and die for their country, surely they are fit to vote for the policies for that country. It is a well established fact that we learn by doing. How could we do better than to encourage the young people at the age when they learn easily to take part in government? This will urge people to learn more about their government, learn more about the policies of government and learn more about the effect of government upon the history of their own nation. Surely that could be only for the good of any country. Surely the knowledge of the masses is the one thing that democracy needs. Only those who are the enemies of democracy would deny or talk against knowledge for the masses. The passage of this bill will be a move to encourage the youth of Canada to take an active part in the democratic processes by an early exercise of their right to vote. They will be ready to study the problems of the country and the means of solving them. Youth, when it is urged by proper motives, can achieve miracles.

I watched a young man who could not find his place in the classroom of an ordinary high school. He left high school and entered the air force. Suddenly he became imbued with the idea that he wanted to have the wings of the Royal Air Force pinned upon his chest. He could overcome almost any obstacle. He could study and master the necessary sciences. He passed and stood there proudly as the wing commander placed these wings upon his breast. This made a man of him. He did not know what he could do, his parents did not know his abilities, until he became inspired by a desire to achieve something. Let us support this bill as a measure which will inspire the youth of this country to make Canada the greatest contributor to human progress in the world.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am going to make a very sort contribution to this debate, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps I may be excused for making it rather personal. I have just been trying, as well as I can, to look back on my own life and try to assess myself as a voter between the years of 18 and 21. The result is not satisfactory.

Mr. Knowles: Has it been any more satisfactory since you were 21?

Mr. Macdonnell: There is a very obvious answer to that, I know, and anyone who wishes to make it can make it. I can only speak for myself.

I want to come to another point that has been referred to already, and that is the disappointing sense of responsibility that is shown even by those who have the vote, as judged by the performance at the last election.

The point I want to make is this. I have been reading an interesting book on the progress of civilization. It does not make one feel too happy because the whole purport of it is to show how civilization is becoming more and more a mass affair in which it is harder and harder to preserve individuality, and those qualities which I think civilization had more obviously fifty years ago than it has today. The same writer points out that on this continent progress toward mass civilization is growing faster than anywhere else. Partly for reasons given by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), I find myself with the feeling that what we need is not to add to the mass; what we need to do is to try to give people more time. Just as my hon. friend across the floor said, we should try to give the young people more time to prepare themselves for responsibilities which should be taken seriously, and which are not now taken seriously.

I suggest that to spread the vote out that much more will not produce the results which have been suggested by the hon. member who preceded me. It will not produce those results, except among a very few, and will make the vote something which is cast before people before they have any interest in it, and before they are likely to have any desire to take it seriously. And for that reason I hope this measure will not pass.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry this measure has come up in the way it has. When I say that I am referring particularly to the attitude of the sponsor of the bill when he seeks to make it a party measure, and has introduced for its support a line of provincial politics which has nothing to do with the issue or the subject matter. And he seemed to be supported rather strongly in that by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden).

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that there was nothing in my address which would lead to that conclusion, at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Castleden: I merely pointed out an example of where it was being used.

Mr. McIlraith: In support of what I have said I would refer to the hon. member's remarks about the premier of one of our provinces, and the government of that province. This is a subject which has been of great interest to me for many years, and I had hoped that it would not be treated as the hon. member has treated it. With due deference, provincial governments have their own responsibilities and tasks and I, for one, object to having them dragged in here, and their merits or demerits constantly talked about. I regret that the hon. member saw fit to take this opportunity to drag it in, in a left-handed way, and then lay on the praise for their operations. I would welcome the opportunity to discuss their merits or demerits, but it seems to me this is not the proper place to do it. The hon. member for Yorkton, of course, may have his views in the matter.

There is one other point that should be pointed out concerning the hon. member's speech. He made some comments about members of the armed forces that would have the support of all of us, but at no time in his speech did he admit that the armed forces already have the vote. On the other hand the sponsor of the bill was very clear on the point, and did make it clear in his remarks. The hon. member for Yorkton did not.

If one wanted to go into the background of this subject he would find that the party on this side of the house is the one that has carried the historic battle for the extension of the franchise. But, be that as it may, the situation in which we now find ourselves is one which I believe the whole population in Canada has pretty well accepted and agreed to the proposition that we should have the widest possible base among our citizens for eligibility to vote. I believe that is common ground among all parties.

The problem confronting those who concern themselves with the age limit in the elections act is that of deciding when a person has assumed the responsibilities of citizenship. And that is a difficult problem. It is not simply a matter of saying that at this age or at that age they assume those responsibilities. The law in most of its aspects gives them full responsibility at the age of 21. Generally speaking, the armed forces take them in at the age of 18 and, in some branches I believe, at 17½. In some parts of the services it may be younger than that. Where it is clear that citizens as members of the armed forces have assumed the responsibilities of citizenship in the highest way, immediately they are given the vote.

What we have to determine here is at what point a citizen not in the armed forces assumes full responsibility. Where is the line? About all one can do in the elections act is to choose an arbitrary age, and no matter what that age is, whether it be 21, 19, 18, 17 or at some other point, it is going to be possible to argue, and with real weight and authority, that there are some under that age who have assumed a very high degree of responsibility in the community. On the other hand it will also be possible to argue that there are some above the age who have not yet come to the full responsibilities of citizenship.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has referred to teen-agers attending election meetings. I would tell him that last summer I saw a great number of teen-agers under the age of 18 years who attended open-air election meetings. Following the hon. member's argument, those persons should have the right to vote. Let me say seriously that the training the young people have under our school system is indeed extraordinary in this respect. They have good information and a considerable amount of knowledge about public affairs. I mention this only to show that it cannot be argued that simply because a person under 21 years attends an election meeting he should be allowed to vote.

This question has been discussed at parliamentary committees which in the past have studied the elections act. The suggested change has been turned down. I, for one, have felt that while in the circumstances what was done was wholly proper, the treatment given the subject in those committees was scarcely adequate. To treat this subject adequately it seems that one would have to examine the whole question. One would have to look into our legislation which gives added income tax exemption for educational purposes in respect of those over 16 years. Deduction allowances for children for income tax purposes normally stop at the age of 16.

We have what I regard, and I believe is also regarded by members of all parties, as a very fine provision permitting the extension of that exemption beyond the age of 16 when they are continuing their education. I do not want at this late date in the session when there is an attempt to amend the elections act in an arbitrary fashion to do something which would be quoted against me later when we come to extend some of the educational provisions about which I am rather partial. When I refer to that subject I am, of course, also including the subject of scholarships. I am not going to digress into that educational field, but I think we have made good progress in the last few years, and I hope we can go further in developing provisions for the education of the young people.

A nice question arises when one has to decide at just what age a young person who is wholly maintained by his parents should receive the right to vote. Certainly he is not in the same position as his fellow classmate who enlisted in the armed services and is on active service. It is that type of question I would like to see examined and discussed more fully.

As I said in opening my remarks, this is a subject that has absorbed my attention to a considerable degree in the past. It is something that should be examined into pretty thoroughly, but I should like it to come up in another way so that we could really look at these things. I should like to get some more statistical information on one or two aspects of it. The hon. member who is sponsoring the bill—I am not critical of him—is naturally enthusiastic about it. He said that if we do not get it now we shall get it later. That is not the issue to be determined here. The issue before the house is an amendment to the elections act. Incidentally, I think there is a technical mistake in the bill about the armed forces. Be that as it may, that is the issue before the house. I do not think that issue should be determined in that way at all now.

It may be that the age should be reduced. I am certainly openminded, and rather inclined to think that probably it should be reduced; but I am not prepared to amend the elections act at this time on a few speeches to reduce the age from 21 to 18 without further consideration and without a full examination of what I consider to be the real facets that must be considered before a decision is taken. I realize that that may not be acceptable to the hon. member proposing the bill, but I think it is the right way to go about it. I for one do not wish to see something done here in a rush to amend the elections act that is going to hamper things that I hope we can do in the next few years by way of extending the opportunity for education through scholarships and educational grants. I do not want anything done here rashly that is going to interfere with that. I should like therefore to have this matter considered in what—if I may use the term and not be misunderstood—I believe to be a more mature way. I am in favour of the idea behind the suggestion, but I think this method of dealing with the subject is at least premature.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do want to deal with one statement, because sometimes these repeated statements made in a certain recurring confusion of the mind become embedded in the minds of others. In the friendliest way may I refer to the comment of the hon. member who has just spoken in regard to the fact that his party has been the party which has always extended the franchise.

Mr. McIlraith: I limited that historically; I was quite careful to limit it.

Mr. Drew: To what?

Mr. McIlraith: I was careful to limit that in my reference to the hon. member who sponsored the bill and the other hon. member of that party. I was very careful to point out that if one was dealing with the historical aspects of it probably the best case could be made out for this party.

Mr. Knowles: How about dealing with the idea?

Mr. Drew: I do want to deal with this very briefly because we so constantly hear statements about the great achievements of the party opposite in every field—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew:—no matter what it may be.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Right.

Mr. Drew: Once in a while it may do some of them good to be reminded of the fact that this has become a habit that leads them to make those statements without any regard to the actual history of the country. The fact is that the voting age and the general principles in regard to voting were established under a Conservative party which had the responsibility of setting up the electoral machinery in this country in the first instance. There were a number of extensions during the life of that continuing Conservative government, and then the next great step in the extension of the franchise came in 1918 when Sir Robert Borden was head of the government. In May 1918, the franchise was extended to all women of the age of 21, and there you had universal franchise subject only to the age limit. With deference to the admiration that the hon. member who has just spoken constantly expresses for the history of his own party, I would suggest that from time to time it might be well to restrain that enthusiasm within the bounds of the actual political history of this country.

There is one aspect of this problem that I do think should be borne in mind by all hon. members. I do not think there is any single member here on either side of the house who is not equally proud of the type of young people of 18 to 21 that we have here in Canada. Our education, the type of life in a country of wide spaces and immense opportunities has given us youth of whom all of us have every reason to be proud. I am certain that neither one side of the house nor the other, nor in any segment of this house, is there any greater appreciation of the high character of our youth which would differentiate any hon. member from another. We all share that pride and we all have reason to share that pride. I do not want to sound offensive, but I do say very often that there are differences, and without being offensive I will say quite frankly that my youngest child, who is now fourteen, gives evidence of judgment which I would be quite prepared to accept as against the judgment of a number who have spoken here.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Chip off the old block.

Mr. Knowles: Smarter than the old man.

Mr. Lesage: The race is improving.

Mr. Drew: Of course I naturally am prejudiced on that subject. We are all prejudiced in regard to the estimate of the judgment, character and the ability of our youth to face the future here in Canada.

Mr. McIvor: Six o'clock.

Mr. Drew: If I may finish this sentence, there is just one point that should be given consideration in discussing this subject, namely, that the age of 21 was not chosen as an arbitrary age at which the ability to make a political decision had been reached; but it is the age at which for not only generations but centuries we have imposed upon young people a full legal liability. Until they are 21 we have provided that people up to that age need not be answerable for the contracts that are signed and other things of that kind, under the theory that their judgment may not be developed to the point that the full legal responsibility should be imposed.

The time may have come to change that concept in regard to that matter. The fact remains, however, that the choice of the voting age of 21 was not an arbitrary decision in regard to their political wisdom, but was related to the age of political responsibility. I would be the first to be ready to consider a change of the age, with my admiration of Canadian youth; but let us remember that this was the basis upon which the age was originally fixed, and we have to consider this when we are dealing with an ordinary change in voting age that is before us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time for the consideration of public bills has expired.

Mr. Tucker: I would ask leave of the house, by unanimous consent, to revert to motions, in order that I may present a report.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we should revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): I have the honour to present the third report of the special committee on veterans affairs, in English and in French.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Dispense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the assistant clerk dispense with the reading of the report?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair. At eight o'clock the committee will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

The Chairman: Item 534.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, when I adjourned the debate at five o'clock I was speaking about the general policy on television in Canada and more particularly as it relates to the capital area. I mentioned, by way of comparison, that in the case of radio broadcasting there were a number of private stations and one C.B.C. outlet in Ottawa, and that one of those private stations was a French language station. There is also another opening for a French language outlet in Ottawa, a licence for which was recently granted to a group from Eastview. The French language radio station CKCH in Hull carries the C.B.C. French programs originating in Montreal. These programs otherwise would not be available to this area. However, the arrangement has worked very well and I think has relieved the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of a certain responsibility to this French-speaking audience and also has worked very well for the private station in Hull.

I want the committee to bear in mind that this is the capital of Canada, the one place of all places in this country where the dual culture of this nation should be found and reflected in all its spheres of activity. Ottawa, the capital, should be the mirror of the nation. It is here that the bilingual character of the nation should be most highly exemplified. The history of the Ottawa valley area is a recital of the life and work of the energetic Canadians of French and English origin who have toiled together, since Champlain landed here, to make this capital. The French and the English populations of this area are almost equal in number. Our schools are bilingual or English-speaking. The people of French origin speak French and most of them, of course, speak English fluently. Many people of English origin, including those of Scots and Irish descent, speak the French language very well. Ottawa has the only bilingual university on the continent. We have our French and English theatres, our French and English press, and the proceedings of our parliament are carried on in both languages.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, may I say that it is with some emotion and deep pride that I am very happy to bear witness to the existence of the French element in the capital city of Canada. It is truly with pride and emotion that we find that the French-speaking population of the capital city and of the surrounding district is approximately five times the number of French-speaking settlers who stayed on the American continent following the conquest, some three hundred years ago.

But in spite of all the obstacles that we have met, in spite of all the ups and downs of the first settlers and I would even add in spite of the faults in the constitution that have hindered the progress of French education in every province except Quebec, which has respected the constitution by maintaining the two languages, we are still proud and still satisfied to have progressed and to have co-operated with the English-speaking element of our province in making the city of Ottawa and the surrounding area truly representative of the Canadian nation.

We have tried, in co-operation with our fellow citizens of English origin, to give to the rest of the country an example of what our Canadian fatherland should be.

I take the opportunity, tonight, while I am on the subject of radio broadcasting, to extend my congratulations in particular to our Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), who is also a native son of Ontario, and who has helped us so much to obtain the satisfaction of our just claims at all times. I know that the Minister of Transport is wholeheartedly in favour of the establishment of French television in the Ottawa district, and that with his help this objective will be achieved in the near future.

(Text):

I mention all this, Mr. Chairman, in order to demonstrate that—not by reason of a legal claim nor by reason of necessity but rather on account of the understanding and respect which we have for the traditions and the claims of this national capital—all cultural activities carried on in this area should bear the character of the two great races.

When television was introduced into Canada, and particularly into this area, it was quite understandable that the number of the programs would not be great, that they would not be too wonderful in quality and of course that they could not be perfectly bilingual. Like the hon. member for Hull, I am pleased to say that, because of the immediate service given by the C.B.C. with respect to a certain number of French programs, the reaction was very good. In the short time after the station was introduced into Ottawa we had quite a satisfactory number of programs in the French language. As a matter of fact, as hon. members doubtless know from experience now that they have been listening in room 16, it is quite pleasing not only for French-speaking people but also for those who are English-speaking but also speak French to see some of the very good French programs coming from Montreal. There are very good programs in French coming from Montreal. On the other hand, the number is limited because this station in Ottawa serves the English population, a great number of whom, of course, do not speak French.

The programs in English are very attractive. They are not all good but I must say that some of them are very attractive, and they are followed closely by the people of this district. However, I think we have reached the point where we can say that the situation is not satisfactory to everyone. Indeed, it cannot be satisfactory to everyone because the 40 per cent of the programs, say, which are French programs coming from Montreal do not provide a wide selection for the French audience; and on the other hand, the 60 per cent of the programs which are English programs coming from Toronto or Montreal do not provide what you would call a wide selection either for the people who want to listen to English programs.

I am not speaking of the quality of the programs. I said before that some of them are very good. I think the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is doing a very good job in rearing this very young child and we cannot expect it to run before it has started to walk.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would he be a little more specific as to what he means—and I hope this will not be regarded as Toronto patriotism—by saying that he feels that the programs emanating from Ontario are not very satisfactory in the province of Quebec? Could he make that more specific?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I did not say that.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then I misunderstood the hon. member.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I did not say anything like that. What I did say was that a proportion of 50 per cent to 60 per cent of English programs in an evening is not sufficient fare for the English-speaking audience and a proportion of 40 per cent to 45 per cent of French programs is not satisfactory for the French-speaking audience. There is not sufficient listening time for either one and there is not a sufficient selection in either language. At this time in this district we have an audience which is in some respects satisfied, because after all this is a new development, but there are a great many who feel that they should not buy sets at all because there are too few programs to watch in any one evening.

In Montreal the problem was tackled from a bilingual point of view. Montreal was given a French station and an English station. But Montreal is not as bilingual as the city of Ottawa and the surrounding area. This is the most bilingual area in any part of Canada. In any event, as I said before, it is more than that. It is the capital of Canada and surely it is here, if anywhere in Canada, that we should find stations providing programs in the French and English languages.

There is another aspect of the question. French programs produced in Montreal are just as costly as programs produced in English, but at the present time they are being used through one outlet only. They could very well be used in Ottawa without in any way increasing the cost of production. There is a relay system between Montreal and Ottawa, and I understand that all that would be required in Ottawa would be a transmitter which would probably use the same antenna. Therefore the matter of cost is not a big factor, and much greater use could be made of the programs already being produced in Montreal if they were not limited to that city and the partial use now being made of them in Ottawa.

My suggestion is that the C.B.C. should announce at an early date, perhaps not immediately but at an early date, whether it is its intention to instal a transmitter to televise the French programs coming from Montreal. We should have a statement of policy from the C.B.C. as to whether it intends to have its own French outlet in Ottawa or whether it does not intend to do so. That is why I have not raised the question of a private station up to this point. I do not think it arises until an answer is given to that question by the C.B.C. I do not know whether the minister will be in a position to make a statement today or on another occasion, but I say the whole problem is whether or not the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation intends to have a French outlet in Ottawa. If it does not intend to do so then I say it is up to the government to reach a decision as soon as possible to permit whoever applies—if he is a responsible party and undertakes to carry C.B.C. programs emanating from Montreal—to have a station in Ottawa.

But I am confident that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, knowing the situation in this area much better than I do, must have plans, and I regard it as quite possible that in the near future there will be an answer from that source in the form of a statement that a French C.B.C. transmitter is to be built in Ottawa. But I repeat that if that is not to be done the government should reconsider its policy in respect of a French language private station in this particular area where the situation, so far as permitting private stations is concerned, is much unlike that of areas where the population speaks one language.

I think that people's minds should be put at rest. The government should relieve the people of their anxiety in this regard. By so doing they would help to foster good will toward the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and would also help industry which would be able to sell a great number of television sets in this area if there were a French television outlet. Television, Mr. Chairman, can be an active agent in the development of our national culture, and I am confident that on those grounds the house will agree that its extension should be in the finest and best traditions of the people who joined hands at confederation to make this a great and united country.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a very few remarks. I am not going to deal with policy, administration or programs because this afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar ably placed before the committee the views of this group in that connection. I will only say that I listen quite frequently to "Stage 54" and I do want to express my appreciation of the magnificent production of "Richard III" some time earlier this year. I have heard a good many people say that it was an excellent piece of work on the part of the C.B.C.

I rise primarily to make my eighth annual plea for improved radio reception in the northern part of my constituency of Kootenay West. There are some 5,000 people residing there who are unable to receive satisfactory radio reception after nightfall and during the greater part of the day. Owing to the weakness of the signals from Nelson and Trail they have very poor radio reception at times. I want to impress upon the minister that while other people in Canada are getting all the latest in television I have 5,000 people in my constituency who still have to enjoy decent radio reception. I am very glad to know that the corporation is giving serious consideration to the question with a view to ascertaining the possibility of establishing low-power relay transmitters. We are very pleased with that, but I do want to emphasize that these people have been most patient to go on for thirty years without adequate and proper radio reception.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I am very pleased to see that I have the support of the hon. member for Charlotte. I think these people are now entitled to some action on the part of the corporation and the government. I want to emphasize that these are very useful people. They are primarily outdoor workers and they have to enjoy their radios largely in the evening hours. They are people who are producing a large quantity of forest, metal and mineral products, and a considerable quantity of agricultural products. I think it is most unfair, Mr. Chairman, that year after year this productive segment of our population should be denied even ordinary radio reception.

In addition to that I am bringing to the minister's attention that the income taxes per capita paid in the constituency of Kootenay West is one of the highest in Canada. Representative organizations in the district have for years been pressing for some action in this respect. I have recently heard from the chamber of commerce, boards of trade, the Canadian Legion, the farmers' organizations and the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire. Everybody is concerned about this. They feel they are entitled by this time to action by way of providing proper radio reception.

I do urge that this question be given every consideration and the needs of these people be met in the very near future. I would suggest that today there is no shortage of funds so far as the C.B.C. is concerned. I do feel that when there are millions being spent for television in other parts of Canada these good people are entitled to adequate radio reception. When the minister replies, I should like to hear his comment on this question that is so important to about 5,000 of my constituents.

Mr. Gour (Russell): At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the C.B.C. for the good work they have done up to now. I have to extend those congratulations to include the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Revenue, because they have done splendid work right from the first and I am sure they will continue to do their usual fine job. I wish to speak tonight on behalf of the television viewers in this district, not only the French viewers but the English viewers as well. I am not raising the question of language at this time, because I have received just as many complaints from the English people as I have from the French people when they have been forced to turn off their television sets because they did not understand what was said in French.

In view of the good administration we have received up to now I know it will not be too long before this situation is remedied. I do not want to make this a question of language. I am sure that this government, in view of the good administration we have received from it, will not delay too long in settling the problem. If it is found that the C.B.C. is unable to establish a second station in Ottawa for the benefit of the French-speaking people, then I hope consideration will be given to the private company that has made application. It is a responsible company, and it will do a good job. I am sure that the Minister of National Revenue, the C.B.C. and this good government we have will see that justice is done in that connection in the near future, just as they have given justice from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I was interested this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, in listening to the hon. member for Macleod express his fears about thought control by the C.B.C. I suppose it is possible, but if so then all I can say is that they are exercising it in a most inefficient manner. I would commend to the minister that he tighten up his control of C.B.C. because I, myself, on the invitation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, have participated in programs on many occasions. I do not believe the C.B.C. or the minister have ever had any reason to suspect that I was a devout admirer of the present government.

I believe we have to look at this thing a little more reasonably than that. I would suggest that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is, in itself, an example of something new perhaps in our society in its administrative set-up. I do not believe anyone can really level a charge at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that it has been the agent or the propagandist for any particular political or economic group in the country. In fact, one of the things of which we, as Canadians, should be extremely proud is the record of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

This afternoon the hon. member for Macleod spoke of the further danger of imposing a rigid, uniform pattern of culture upon Canadians. I find culture a rather repugnant word, as a matter of fact. However, it is perhaps the only one we can use. I wonder whether there is not something to be considered here apart merely from the people's uninformed taste. Now, I myself lay no claims whatever to having a particularly sophisticated cultural taste. But I have this, shall I say, degree of development, that I do recognize there are people in our society who have that particularly well informed and well developed cultural taste. We should be wise if we give them every opportunity to present their ideas to us in as effective a manner as possible.

Certainly I think the C.B.C. has been giving that opportunity. My colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West, just mentioned the performance of "Richard III" by "Stage 54". Now, that was only one of a series. Anyone who has listened to this series will realize that throughout the last considerable period of time the C.B.C. has been presenting all the Shakespearean chronicle plays, and presenting them most effectively in an adapted form from the pen of some of their extremely gifted writers. I often think of an incident that took place in my home two or three years ago when the C.B.C. was presenting Lister Sinclair's adaptation of "Oedipus Rex", probably the most dramatic psychological play in existence. Lister Sinclair's adaptation of it was superb, in my opinion. My opinion in that regard was reinforced by a curious incident that took place. At that time we had a young native coast Indian living with us who was going to the university. He came into the living room when the play "Oedipus Rex" was on. He sat down and stayed there for the whole performance almost motionless beside the radio. It occurred to me at that time, Mr. Chairman, that any artistic power that could bring the beauty of Greek culture across the period of time of about 2,500 years and eons of time culturally to a product of the primitive culture of the B.C. coast Indian and hold that lad glued to the radio, is something we would do well to be very proud of.

The hon. member for Macleod was somewhat sceptical about the development of talent by means of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It may be that he has a different definition of talent from the one to which I am accustomed. But I think most of us would agree that unless talents are given the opportunity to develop, to be refined to their fullest extent, then they are going to be largely useless. Certainly the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation if it has done nothing else has provided the opportunity of developing the artistic and dramatic talents of Canadian people. This is true to such an extent that there are many of our friends and neighbours across the line who openly envy us the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the opportunities it gives for precisely that talent development.

Not long after the session opened I had occasion to write a short article for a United States periodical. I received quite a lot of correspondence about it from across the line because it dealt with a United States problem. One of the letters I received was from a farmer in the state of New York who said he was writing to me, not merely to commend the article I had written but also as some expression of gratitude toward Canada and Canadians for the continued pleasure he has received from tuning in to the C.B.C. broadcasts every day. It may be that at some future date the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation might establish itself as a monopoly of culture and of thought control. But to speak today as though there were no other broadcasting organization in the field is to present a completely false picture. And it is equally false to suggest that those private radio outlets are even in the same category or class as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, when it comes to intellectual, cultural or artistic standards—because they just are not.

Anyone who has spoken over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation facilities and also over private radio station facilities need not be told about the vast difference in efficiency and care exercised by the employees of the two types of organizations. On every occasion I have spoken over a C.B.C. outlet I have been afforded every possible help with regard to the organization of my material for the address, advice as to how to present it, advice as to what parts to stress—endless and limitless patience and time taken to make sure that I got the best out of the opportunity afforded to me.

In fact, I might say this—and it bears to some extent on the question of the C.B.C. being an organ of propaganda—that on more than one occasion employees of the C.B.C. in Vancouver have complained to me that the worst offenders from their point of view as radio-technical experts, and the most completely determined not to take advantage of the facilities offered by the C.B.C., have been cabinet ministers who, according to many of the radio technicians in Vancouver, seem to feel that because they are cabinet ministers they have, by some mysterious means, mastered the technique of radio and do not require advice or help. Many times I have seen employees of the C.B.C. station in Vancouver tearing their hair because some cabinet minister came in and insisted upon pontificating on the radio, thus lowering their general level of technical efficiency. I am not saying that all C.B.C. programs are admirable. They are not; some of them are lousy.

Mr. Knowles: The cabinet minister broadcasts?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): And the lousiest ones are the ones to which I think the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has resort because this parliament is so niggardly and stingy. I refer to the foul soap operas that they take from the American networks—private enterprise programs which pay very well for the privilege of poisoning the whole well of Canadian culture, with all due deference to my hon. friend from Macleod.

I think that these soap operas are a far greater moral and intellectual danger to the Canadian people than many of those things about which hon. members in this house tear their hair; because they present a foul, sentimental, saccharine picture of life that, at certain points, has sufficient similarity to real life to influence unintelligent, or not very intelligent, unsophisticated people. So that you have, of course, the result of a silly husband or a silly wife getting very fed up with their spouses because they do not behave in the impossibly inane and noble manner of the product of Aunt Lucy's mind.

So what I would like to see is that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be given a sufficient fund so that they can thumb their noses at every soap manufacturer who wishes to poison the minds of the Canadian people.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister some questions which will be of a different kind. In spite of the sanguinity of the hon. member for Nanaimo, I still think, with the member for Macleod, that there is considerable cause for anxiety in Canada, lest the minds of Canadian people be controlled by forces that Canadians would never wish to have control their minds. I would like to ask the minister a few questions which he will be able to answer at his leisure. Probably he will not have the material with him tonight, but if we can have the answers to these questions in detail, those answers ought to go a long way to reassure us.

First, who decides policy of the C.B.C.?

Second, what means of screening has the minister, to make sure C.B.C. personnel are all pro-Canadian, and not pinkos in some respects, if not positively pro-Russian?

Third, Canada beams broadcasts into how many European countries? We have never had a detailed report on that matter. To what countries are those broadcasts beamed?

Fourth, in which languages are these broadcasts beamed into European countries?

Fifth, what is the general purpose of these broadcasts? Indications are, from the estimates, that more and more money is being spent on such broadcasts into, let us say, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Yugoslavia and other countries behind the iron curtain. I would like to know what the purpose of such broadcasts might be. What is the general purpose of doing it, anyway?

Sixth, in the main, is the general purpose to encourage peoples in iron curtain countries to hope for deliverance, or is it to encourage them to be satisfied with their communist rulers? I would like to have that answered pretty thoroughly, and to have it adequately documented.

Seventh, during the year 1953 how many Canadian broadcasts were directed to Czechoslovakia, for example?

Eighth, how many of these could be classified as having political significance?

Ninth, how many have had pro-communist leanings?

Tenth, how many have had anti-communist leanings?

Eleventh, on what grounds would the minister justify the expenditure of Canadian taxpayers' money upon broadcasts into Europe that are neither pro-communist nor anti-communist?

I have had the privilege of reading some of the broadcasts that have been sent into some of those countries. As I recall it, one of them told about Canadian wildlife. What would be the purpose of spending Canadian money on telling Czechoslovakia or Poland about the wildlife of Canada?

An hon. Member: The wild life?

Mr. Blackmore: The deer and the antelope.

Those questions have a bearing on the matter of foreign broadcasts. I do not listen to every broadcast which comes over the C.B.C. Before I proceed to say any more, let me hasten to express my appreciation of the C.B.C.'s work. Many fine compliments have been paid to the C.B.C. this afternoon in this house. Every single one of them the C.B.C. completely merits and richly deserves. But if it should be found that after all this cultural excellence and technical excellence and artistic excellence and all the other kinds of excellence, we were being subverted unawares, it would be a very very serious thing. I have read through two or three broadcasts coming from overseas and some from Canada which certainly followed the communist line and which certainly were subtly indoctrinating Canadians with the communist attitude. The correspondence I have from various parts of Canada show that the impression which I have expressed is not an impression which I alone have formed.

What would be evidence of the communist line? Well, all speeches that are designed to show the Canadian people that there just is not any way out of the difficulty in which we find ourselves except the C.C.F. or socialism right on up to communism, including government ownership and centralizing control, and all the rest of it that constitutes the C.C.F. doctrine and socialism; all talks which do this are certainly following the communist line. All talks which seek to glorify Russia, articles like those by the famous Bill Boss, filling our newspapers today all over Canada abundantly, every one of which indicates that Russia has got some glorious form of life over there if we could only just find out about it; all those are following the communist line and are softening the Canadian people up and are certainly giving comfort to the enemy.

All broadcasts which tend to weaken the faith of the Canadian people in God, Christianity, the Bible, the teachings of the Bible, all of those are pro-communist.

I have mentioned once already in an interview with the press which I did not expect to be published, but which was published, that I heard a talk, a beautiful talk on termites. The construction of that talk was just perfect; the language was just perfect; the delivery, well, it was just the answer to a prayer; it was on termites. Well, why in the world should you have a half-hour talk on termites? It was an educational broadcast, we will grant, yes. It came over the air into my home just as my children were sitting around after the supper hour. Do you know what that thing taught in a general way? That the termites with their automatic regimented inevitable way of life were living in the kind of condition that human beings would live under some time in the future. The whole talk was given with that strange, scientific, detached melancholia which characterizes so many of our high-minded professors when they are philosophizing on the inevitability of evolution and all that kind of thing. That talk, just as sure as we are in this house, was a communist talk. It was an evolutionary talk. It was indoctrinating the people on evolution.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

I have spoken once before, maybe twice before, about talks that were chosen to indoctrinate the people on evolution.

Now, if those wisecracks were just loud enough so that I could hear them the hon. member who is making them would not make them. He just makes them loud enough for Hansard to get them and so that I cannot get them. That is just about the lowest kind of trick that can be played.

Mr. Argue: I said nothing.

Mr. Blackmore: There are people over there who were saying things that I could not get but Hansard could get. Come right out with them, and be men, and I will take care of them.

I objected to speeches by Brock Chisholm. They were bad speeches, bad through and through. I can see no reason in the world why we should pay good Canadian taxpayers' money to have that kind of thing foisted upon our Canadian people. All power to the C.B.C. for giving us the knowledge and information! The argument will be, and it was regarding Brock Chisholm's talks: Well, we believe in giving the Canadian people a chance to hear every side of the story. But there never was an answer given over the air to Brock Chisholm, and there never was an answer given over the air to the termite speech, and there never will be.

Mr. Nicholson: Has the hon. member asked the C.B.C. to give him a chance to answer it?

Mr. Blackmore: I was in no position to ask the C.B.C.; even if I had been, why should I? The C.B.C. did not wait for me to ask them to put Brock Chisholm over the air, nor the termites speech over the air. If they could be moved upon to put those speeches over the air, they should have been moved upon to put the answers to them over the air, by all means whatsoever. They should have had the answers right at the time the talks were given.

Mr. Nicholson: Does the hon. member not believe in free speech?

Mr. Blackmore: Surely! I believe in free speech for every side of the story and every side of the case. That is just exactly what we are not getting. All these talks, indoctrinating the people with the communist attitude, the socialistic attitude, are never answered.

Mr. Zaplitny: Are they the same?

Mr. Nicholson: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, I will permit a question; any time I am afraid to be asked a question by the hon. gentleman I shall retire.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. gentleman's party has free time on the C.B.C. Has he ever asked his party to give him a chance to make use of the free time to reply to Brock Chisholm?

Mr. Blackmore: That is just the kind of thing you would expect from a socialist. He would ask the Social Crediters, who have one-half as much time as the socialists, while the socialists are devoting all their time to putting over their ideology, to spend their social credit time answering the false doctrine spread over the air by the C.B.C.! Would that not just be the ideal for the C.C.F. people!

Mr. Knowles: A typical Social Credit answer.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not wish to go into too much detail on this matter.

I do not think the ordinary Canadian or American begins to realize what is happening to him. The first thing we know this country will be captured by communist influence infiltrating into our hearts and our homes without our even knowing what is happening to us.

Mr. Argue: It must be pretty strong.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, communist doctrine has all the power of the prince of darkness and all his cunning; for that is just exactly what it is; it is the doctrine of the prince of darkness, that is all. Anyone who heard Brock Chisholm talk, or who heard the "termites" talk would know it was of the evil one. That was easy to see because they were calling in question the sacred teachings of the Bible.

This is a Christian country. When this country wants communism it will vote for communism. As I recall it, 100 candidates offered Canadians the opportunity to send communists to Ottawa to govern Canada and not one of them saved his deposit.

An hon. Member: Then what are you worried about?

Mr. Blackmore: I am worried lest a government which was sent down here to fight communism should now turn round and abet communism, spread its doctrines through the radio stations of the C.B.C., an organization publicly owned and publicly paid for. Now, would not that be a most astonishing state of affairs? If all I am saying is true, and I am afraid there is a lot more truth in it than many people believe, we require to be very careful.

Just to show how serious the situation is, and I do not know whether or not the minister's attention has been drawn to this, I have here an article. Though it does not have any particular bearing on radio, yet it certainly does show the kind of thing we are faced with. This article appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 1, 1954. This article was carried on page 2 under the heading "Congress Studies Document on Red Plans for Revolution". It reports that Senator Knowland put a document into congressional records recently. That document, the senator thought, apparently outlined the plans of Mao Tse-tung for the complete conquest of the world. The article closes with these portentous quoted words:

> Twenty years from now world revolution will be an accomplished fact.

Details of the procedure by which this horror is to be brought about are laid down. Now if we go on in the way we have been doing for the last eight years, there is not a thing on earth except our Heavenly Father who can stop this world revolution, because we are doing everything in our power to help this revolution along. That is the reason I am worried so much about what comes through the C.B.C. I cannot see any reason in the world for speeches slanted in favour of the communist line.

Mr. Campbell: Do you look under the bed every night?

Mr. Blackmore: No, but I say my prayers every night. I wonder if my hon. friend does that. If he did that for a year or two it would straighten out his thinking.

Mr. Knowles: That is a nice Christian attitude.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I am going to leave this question now and ask the minister to give a detailed answer. He cannot do so tonight, I know, but I believe it will do the minister and all of us good to think about these questions.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there are some aspects to this question on which I do feel some remarks should be made. The subject has been discussed from many angles today, but one of the most interesting aspects of this discussion has been the frequent reference to the cultural aspects of C.B.C. broadcasting, and I was interested to hear just a short time ago a suggestion that the government has in fact been somewhat niggardly in not providing still more money so that culture might be provided to the Canadian people by the C.B.C., presumably both by television and by radio.

I would like to speak for a while about television which is today recognized, not only as a new medium of entertainment, which is having a profound effect upon the social habits of our people but which also is having a very considerable effect on the thinking of our people and their impressions about public events. I have no intention of expressing my opinion about the rather remarkable television performance that is taking place day by day in the United States. Undoubtedly the people of the United States, and Canadians who live along the border within range of the television broadcasts, are seeing a unique employment of this new vehicle of communication. Without making any remarks about it, and I have very definite opinions on the subject, I would simply wish to say that if anyone is in any uncertainty about the impact of television upon the minds of the people it is only necessary to call on some friends in the United States today and to see the amount of time that is being consumed in watching a particular type of exchange of ideas which is supposed to be part of the processes of democracy.

This new vehicle can have a tremendous effect. This new vehicle was recognized early as being one that was not only a means of communication but also had great cultural possibilities as well. On many occasions reference has been made to the report on the arts, letters and sciences which we commonly know as the Massey report. In that report there are findings in regard to television. I wish to place on the record two short quotations which I take from pages 304 and 305 of that report. First, under the heading of "Programs", I find this statement:

> For such television programs it will be essential to ensure the maintenance of good taste and a suitable and adequate use of Canadian materials and Canadian talent.

Then on the next page, under "Recommendations", I find:

> We therefore recommend:
> h. That the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation exercise a strict control over all television stations in Canada in order to avoid excessive commercialism and to encourage Canadian content and the use of Canadian talent.

That recommendation follows the observation on the other page. But, Mr. Chairman, this idea of television being a means by which a distinctly Canadian culture can be conveyed to Canadians has been the reason for the very unusual limitations which have been placed upon television broadcasting in this country.

Speech after speech has impressed upon us the fact that we should be prepared to accept, with regard to ordinary competition between public and private stations, limitations which would be comparable with the competition between the publicly and privately-owned railways, on the ground that it is so essential that here in Canada we should make sure that we prevent Canadians being called upon to submit to the kind of television broadcasts they have in the United States. That is not my argument. That is the argument that has been put forward over and over again for denying to Canadian owners of television sets the advantages of competition and the advantages of a selection of stations, something which in itself is part of the whole policy of free choice and which would undoubtedly comply with those words of Mr. Dunton, the chairman of the broadcasting corporation, when he put the situation briefly as follows:

> The essence of freedom lies in freedom to choose from a variety of alternatives; if there are no alternatives—in kinds of ideas and material presented—there can be no freedom of choice.

By that test, Mr. Chairman, there is no freedom of choice for Canadians today so far as the policy of the government is concerned. There is freedom of choice, however, in certain parts of Canada. There is freedom of choice in that part of Ontario along the north shore of the St. Lawrence, the north shore of lake Ontario and of lake Huron. Throughout the whole of that area within a distance of anywhere from 50 to 100 miles Canadians have a choice of alternatives; and they are making that choice.

Mr. Nicholson: Is there any choice in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Drew: Oh, yes. The hon. member perhaps has not noticed that recently it has been decided to have private broadcasting of television over there just so that there will be a choice. Incidentally I may say also that there is a choice of continental broadcasts which are very good and which the people are able to receive on the sets in England.

However, in Britain where the government set up the B.B.C., which in many respects we have followed, they have decided that they are going to follow this excellent definition of freedom given by the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation: The essence of freedom lies in freedom to choose from a variety of alternatives. The administration have decided in Britain to give the people that freedom to choose a variety of alternatives. The people there are going to have it and therefore we in this country might well re-examine our position. Particularly, however, we might re-examine our position for another reason.

When I heard tonight the suggestion made that this government was niggardly in its allowance for public broadcasting, I wondered just how far anyone was prepared to go. The C.B.C. is now receiving over $30 million. How much more do they need? If $30 million will not do it, then I should like to know at just what price Canadian culture really comes. We are certainly going to be an expensively cultured people if this amount does not provide an adequate start. The fact is that freedom of choice also carries with it freedom to choose whether you will accept culture or will not accept it. Apparently the idea was that by having only a chosen instrument—and a very limited instrument at that—Canadians were to have no alternative but to accept such culture as they receive.

May I at this point repeat something that has been said before so that there may be no misunderstanding about it. This is not a criticism of the administration of the C.B.C. It is the duty of those who administer the C.B.C. to carry out government policy. If they do not carry out government policy in a public organization, they have no right to be there. After all, it is the government that is the executive agency of this parliament which is supposed to interpret policies which will be put into effect by those who are chosen to administer those policies. I hope there will be no suggestion by the minister or by anyone else that if what is happening is not satisfactory, it is something for which they can accept no responsibility but they must after all look to those who operate the C.B.C. No, Mr. Chairman; whether it be the publicly-owned railway, the publicly-owned air lines, the publicly-owned ships, the public-owned television or radio broadcasting, it is the government that decides the policy and it is the duty of those appointed in an executive capacity to carry those policies into effect.

Under those circumstances, Mr. Chairman, we then come to the question as to what actually happens where there is this freedom to choose that we have heard of. The area in which there is the densest concentration of television sets in Canada is in the area around Toronto and from there over to Hamilton and on to Niagara Falls. For that area figures have been compiled, and it has been found that those with television sets in that area tune in on broadcasts from the United States to the extent of at least 70 per cent of the receiving time during which they have their sets turned on. Therefore, with all this expense, where there is freedom of choice these owners of television sets are employing, at the outside, only 30 per cent of the time to avail themselves of this expensive means of developing Canadian culture.

Then let us examine that 30 per cent. Is that 30 per cent devoted to all-Canadian programs? Is it exclusively designed to avoiding here in Canada all the sins, errors and iniquities of television in the United States to which my hon. friends on the left so constantly refer? No, Mr. Chairman; at least 50 per cent of those broadcasts going over the C.B.C. television have a source in the United States. Hence, of the programs received by those using television sets in that area, 85 per cent at least come from the United States and at this great expense we are providing 15 per cent for Canadians from Canadian sources. If that is the way that we are going to develop Canadian culture, Mr. Chairman, then the sooner we re-examine this situation the better. To borrow the words that have been used by someone else in a context which perhaps might almost suggest some caution in using them, it would seem that if that is the case, this indeed is a time for an agonizing reappraisal of Canadian television broadcasting in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, there is not one of us here who is not anxious to make sure that Canadians—and particularly young Canadians—are given a pride in Canada; an appropriate interpretation of Canadian history; an appreciation of their own language, whether it be English or French; and an appreciation of their own background and their own culture. What we are doing at the present time is spending huge sums of money to make sure that a still larger number of Canadians get their ideas from television broadcasting stations in the United States. That was not the basic concept under which this house was asked to vote the large sums of money that go to the C.B.C.

Then, of course, there are a number of other things. I merely wish to interject at this point an interesting sidelight. It does seem that a little more attention might well be paid by the government to some broad directives which would interpret government policy in the employment of the C.B.C., even within that limited area that it does occupy. For instance, I asked the other day if the minister had received any information about a television broadcast in Vancouver early in the month of May where it was stated that a number of well known communists were able to present themselves by means of television to the audience in that area.

I must admit that the Tribune of Toronto, which is the communist newspaper, is not one of my regular sources of information, but since this matter was drawn to my attention from Vancouver I was interested to read this item in the Canadian Tribune. The heading is "Good for C.B.C.". The article reads as follows:

> We'd like to congratulate C.B.C. T.V. for its enterprise and initiative in televising Vancouver's May day rally at Brockton Point oval. A. A. MacLeod, Harvey Murphy, Bill Stewart and Homer Stevens and the overflow crowd were seen and heard by thousands of T.V. viewers via CBUT.

I think hon. members all know that A. A. MacLeod, Harold Murphy, Bill Stewart and Homer Stevens are well known communists, and that the congratulations being extended on this occasion by the communist Tribune were because of the fact that they had been televised in that way. I am not suggesting for one moment that this represents any designed policy on the part of those responsible for TV broadcasting within the C.B.C. or of those stating the policy for the C.B.C. However, I can think of quite a number of organizations in this country from one side to the other that are intensely loyal to Canada which would welcome the opportunity to have their meetings televised and have not been quite so successful as these gentlemen were in Vancouver at the beginning of May. I merely mention this to suggest that perhaps a little more caution might be exercised in this respect.

Let us again consider the standards of culture, and it is culture for which we are paying this money for television. Let us not forget that, because there are private applicants who have been very ready to provide television to Canadians in every part of Canada. The reason they are not doing it today is that in the name of culture we are making sure that the people get Canadian programs, in the slow process by which these things finally arrive under the present policy. Let us see how the standards of culture are established. I wonder how many hon. members have seen those cultural broadcasts of second-rate wrestlers in the United States which are presented to us here as part of the cultural training for Canadians at public expense. I wonder how many have seen some of those slugging matches by second, third, fourth and fifth-rate boxers. Actually I sometimes wonder whether suggestions, such as that made by such a high authority as the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that we might relax the gambling practices in this country, might not be related to the fact that about the only excuse for looking at some of them would be if you had a little bet on them. Of course, not knowing who they are in advance it would make a fair bet because if they are fixed the results would be equally sporting in any event from our point of view.

These are some of the choice cultural developments which are being brought to us at this great expense. No, Mr. Chairman, it may be desirable to get back to what the original concept was. I was very interested today when the leader of the C.C.F. party spoke of the fact that it was the Conservative party that had been responsible for introducing a publicly-owned broadcasting system in Canada. You know, it is almost sacrilege to some of our friends opposite to remind them that the Conservative party has been responsible for introducing a great many of these activities. I was interested, however, in his reference to the fact that when the broad policy was laid down under which public broadcasting would be set up in this country it was done by a Conservative prime minister. The suggestion was that we were in some way departing from that idea.

I have made it clear on earlier occasions that we believe that it is essential that we have a publicly-owned system for particular services. In this enormous country of ours, the third largest in the world and with only fifteen million people, it is obvious that if we are going to carry ordinary radio and television broadcasts to distant points throughout Canada the ordinary competitive demands of commercial broadcasting would not be likely to perform that service in many places. Actually that was the basic reason for having a publicly-owned service, that we would be able to provide broadcasting services for all Canadians, regardless of where they might be.

That same policy should now apply to television. It should be the function of the C.B.C. to provide the communicating services, the relay services, whether by microwave relay or by coaxial cable. By every device the C.B.C. might well make communication available and then we might permit some of these private applicants who want to set up TV broadcasting stations to do so and see what kind of programs they produce. The fact is they could not give us very much less Canadian culture than we are getting at the moment.

The fact is that under the very test of competition we would offer to Canadian talent an opportunity which Canadian talent is being denied today by this government in the name of the improvement of Canadian culture. No wonder the young Liberals, gathered here so short a time ago, presented a very vigorous request that we have in this country the advantages of a competitive system under which private broadcasters would be able to bring to this new vehicle of communication, entertainment and knowledge the advantages of competition where private stations side by side with public stations would vie with each other in offering to Canadian talent programs of which we could justly be proud and programs which would offer opportunities to young Canadians here in Canada instead of forcing them, as they are so often required to do, to go beyond our own borders for the return which their services so genuinely merits.

At a time when we have before us these very large sums, Mr. Chairman, I think it is time for an over-all review. Let us go back to the broad question of television broadcasting. One of the things that seem to be overlooked is that in the name of culture we are going outside of Canada today to get films from the United States, some of them very old films—even Mack Sennett films, and I may say those are better than some I have seen—to entertain our people. These television arrangements are made through contracts with the people in the United States who control these films which have been, in so many cases, stored away. Then again we have talent from the United States being brought to Canada apparently to step up the standards which the C.B.C. believes are required for this kind of thing. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, the way to get talent of our own is to widen the opportunity.

This is no brief for private ownership or public ownership. It was a Conservative government that gave this country publicly-owned radio, and now its partner publicly-owned television. We stand by that policy, but we stand also by the policy of competition. We stand by the policy of encouraging Canadian talent and broadening the opportunity of choice so well defined by the chairman of the broadcasting corporation, and in that way taking advantage of the competition between publicly and privately-owned operations.

On a number of occasions we have had the report of the commission on arts, letters and sciences presented to us as an answer to this demand. The very distinguished gentleman who had so much to do with the preparation of that report and is now the Governor General of Canada, found it necessary to remove some uncertainty as to what had actually been meant by that report. Not enough attention has been paid to the explanatory speech made by Mr. Massey in Montreal on Monday, June 11, 1951. This is what he said in part in that speech:

> Although our report is long and involved, on only one point does there appear to be some misunderstanding. May I mention it now? My colleagues and I recommended that private television broadcasting stations be licensed only when the C.B.C. has available national programs, some of which the private stations would use. This does not mean, however, that there can be no television in say, Vancouver or Halifax, until the C.B.C. has completed a system of national television networks, a long and costly business. We were talking of programs. The national programs would, of course, be in the form of films or of kinescope, which for a long time to come will no doubt form a large part of the program material of television in Canada on all stations, whether private or C.B.C., until the time when television networks in Canada are possible.

In those words, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Massey was pointing the way in which we could widen and increase the opportunity for Canadian talent to have its chance. He was pointing the way in which we could expand Canadian culture. He was suggesting that we have films made in Canada, and that they be distributed to private stations as well as to public stations where the ordinary network facilities are not available. Let us remember that it is not likely within long years to come that network facilities are going to be available except to a limited number of cities in Canada. The range of television broadcasting is so short as compared with radio broadcasting that consequently these expensive microwave relay transmission chains or the relatively costly coaxial cables can serve only a limited number of cities. The broadcasts will carry only a limited distance from these points. There are cities in the northland right across Canada, and not in the distant northland, where we are still a very long way from having those communication services available to us. It is not too late, even now with the mistakes that have been made, to get back to the policy that was so clearly defined by Mr. Massey in that speech in Montreal and made for the purpose of removing the uncertainty as to what the words in his report had really meant.

We have discussed the moneys available to the C.B.C. At what point are we going to end the contribution of public money for this purpose? We do not know where it will go. Can anyone here tonight say what new sales are going to be made of new types of broadcasting sets or new types of television sets when colour becomes common next year, certainly to those who get broadcasts from the United States? We cannot tell how much more will be available than is available today. The method by which we are financing the C.B.C. is not consistent with the measure of supervision that should be demanded by members of this parliament over the expenditures of public moneys by any of the agencies they create. Most certainly that should be subjected to rigid, continuing and exact tests.

I am not going to deal with the particular subject of the content of radio broadcasting. I have said before, and I repeat, that we get many excellent programs that originate with the C.B.C. We must examine the whole picture objectively on balance. My point is that with whatever excellent programs there may be, some that are very much to the contrary are mixed up with them. What we must do is to examine how far we have gone along the road that was laid down as the reason for giving so much public money to this organization. I submit that on the evidence before us, by the policy the government is laying down, and for that the C.B.C. is not responsible, the government itself would deny the fulfilment of these purposes, and is in fact making these expenditures largely ineffective for the purpose of carrying out the stated intention of those who initiated this plan of heavy public expenditure.

I want to deal briefly with another specialized branch and that is the international service. This international service is operated by the C.B.C. I understand that it is supposed to be an agent of the Department of External Affairs. The estimates for the coming year for the international shortwave broadcasting service amount to $2,394,450. There is one way, one sure easy way, by which we could have some evidence as to what is really being accomplished by the international shortwave broadcasts. We could have placed before us reports from the Canadian embassies in those countries beyond the iron curtain where they have a chance to hear them. Let us have a report from Moscow where we have a Canadian embassy as to how many Russians hear that broadcast. Let us have a report as to how often the members of the Canadian embassy in Moscow listen to this Canadian report. Let us find out how many Russians they have heard of who have heard that report. I will say this, that I have been informed by someone who has at least had the opportunity of visiting the Canadian embassy in Moscow that on the very rare occasion they ever heard of a Canadian broadcast being put on, it was promptly blocked off by the very simple method available in Russia, or anywhere else.

Let us ask the representative in Czechoslovakia how many Czechs have heard broadcasts; or in Hungary, or in Roumania, or in Poland, or in Bulgaria, or in any other country to which we are beaming those broadcasts at this time. Let us have a full and effective statement from those Canadians who have been actually over there as to what they have found. Mr. Chairman, as it stands at the present time, we have had not one word of evidence before us which justifies the expenditure of another cent on that particular type of broadcast.

Mr. McCann: We have not had the opportunity to give it to you.

Mr. Drew: Oh yes.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. It was decided—and the Leader of the Opposition I would say to him is the worst offender that we have today of going against an agreement which is made—

Mr. Drew: What agreement?

Mr. McCann: That we had this morning as to the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Drew: That statement is untrue.

Mr. McCann: It is true.

Mr. Drew: It is untrue.

Mr. McCann: And again this afternoon it was decided here that the general discussion would take place on the item of the loan. However, he is off on a tangent into the transactions of the international shortwave broadcasting, on which I told him I was prepared to make a statement. And yet he boldly says, "We have not had one word of information with regard to this particular matter." And I say to him that he has not given me the opportunity.

Mr. Drew: First of all I repeat that the statement made by the minister that any understanding was made is absolutely untrue.

Mr. McCann: Look at the record of Hansard.

Mr. Drew: It is absolutely untrue. The fact is that here we are at this time, with this broadcasting debate going on as long as it has, without any evidence before us which would tell us what the service is. If we are going to get evidence from the minister as to the usefulness of that service, then I for one would immediately welcome it, because we have waited for it.

But I want evidence of statements of the men who have been there, and not just generalities by the minister or from anyone else as to the kind of programs which are being sent to those countries. Also I want to hear from the minister, when he explains this, what supervision they have over those who are doing the broadcasting, as well as the supervision over the content of the broadcasts themselves.

We have heard complaints about the content of those broadcasts from people in this country who are able to understand those broadcasts in the languages in which they are sent. The minister has said that we are going to get a statement. Well, we are waiting for it. But, Mr. Chairman, let us go back to the statements we have had about Canadian broadcasts. Let me repeat what was said in that respect by the Minister of Transport as reported in Hansard of March 17, 1953 when he said:

> What I believe the people of Canada want more than anything else is that in the field of television the programs should be of Canadian origination and of Canadian content and should not be canned programs coming in from the United States.

He also indicated that the general purpose of radio broadcasting is Canadian content. Mr. Chairman, we are getting canned broadcasts from the United States. What has been done is to use public money to increase the number of broadcasts from the United States, instead of diminishing it. I submit that this is a time for re-examination and an assurance from the minister that the money voted on this occasion to the department will in fact be supervised under a clear policy by the government, and will in fact conform to the stated purposes so clearly outlined by the government itself when it initiated this service.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, before the item carries I would like to suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that he has moved a long way from the position that the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett took when the radio bill was introduced. While the Leader of the Opposition was speaking I was reading what Mr. Bennett said on May 18, 1932. He said, in setting forth three important points:

> First of all, this country must be assured of complete Canadian control of broadcasting from Canadian sources, free from foreign interference or influence. Without such control radio broadcasting can never become a great agency for the communication of matters of national concern and for the diffusion of national thought and ideals, and without such control it can never be the agency by which national consciousness may be fostered and sustained and national unity still further strengthened.

And on the second point:

> No other scheme than that of public ownership can ensure to the people of this country, without regard to class or place, equal enjoyment of the benefits and pleasures of radio broadcasting. Private ownership must necessarily discriminate between densely and sparsely populated areas. This is not a correctable fault in private ownership; it is an inescapable and inherent demerit of that system. It does not seem right that in Canada the towns should be preferred to the countryside or the prosperous communities to those less fortunate.

The argument of the Leader of the Opposition is that free enterprise should be able to take the cream of the crop, and that the federal government should wait for a long time for the people on the frontiers to have television.

Mr. Drew: I said the very opposite.

Mr. Nicholson: And Mr. Bennett's third point was this:

> The use of the air, or the air itself, whatever you may please to call it, that lies over the soil or land of Canada is a natural resource over which we have complete jurisdiction under the recent decision of the privy council. I believe that there is no government in Canada that does not regret today that it has parted with some of these natural resources for considerations wholly inadequate and on terms that do not reflect the principle under which the crown holds the natural resources in trust for all the people. In view of these circumstances and of the further fact that broadcasting is a science that is only yet in its infancy and about which we know little yet, I cannot think that any government would be warranted in leaving the air to private exploitation and not reserving it for development for the use of the people.

I submit that if that argument was sound 22 years ago—and it was—it is equally sound today, when we are considering the future of television. And I am happy to say that the father of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, speaking for the opposition of that day said:

> I just wish to endorse the views expressed by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and to say that I am in full accord with the principle embodied in this bill. I have been supporting this principle from the first more particularly after the work of the Aird commission, but I knew the difficulties in the way and the strength of the propaganda carried on to prevent the work of that commission from having the results which we witness today.

And the leader of this party at that time, the late Mr. Woodsworth, said:

> I should just like to associate myself with the last speaker (Mr. Lapointe) in congratulating the Prime Minister on his promptness in bringing down this bill to implement the report which has been unanimously adopted. May I further express my own very great appreciation of the admirable statement which the Prime Minister has made?

As the hon. member for Hamilton West said correctly this afternoon when the leader of this group was speaking, and when he regretted that the C.B.C. was not able to sponsor "Singing Stars" but had to leave that to a private corporation, the private corporation could deduct from income tax the cost of those broadcasts, which meant that in the long run the Canadian taxpayer did pay for the broadcasts.

I hope that the parliament of this country will make adequate funds available to the C.B.C. so that the goal Mr. Bennett had 22 years ago for radio will be realized for television. I represent in parliament over 50,000 people. We have no radio station there and we have no television either. I hope we shall not have to wait until the free enterprisers decide that it is a profitable field in the country for expansion before our people will have the privilege of having television programs.

An hon. Member: Does the hon. member think that the government should do it?

Mr. Nicholson: I believe the people of Canada collectively have to provide those services for the people. I see no reason why we cannot, through our publicly-owned C.B.C., carry out the principles Mr. Bennett outlined 22 years ago when he suggested the airwaves belonged to all the people and all the people should have the advantages that those in the cities have.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: Before I ask one or two questions of the minister I should like to comment on what has just been said. I would say first that everything that was outlined by Mr. Bennett 22 years ago has been done, but that the world does move. In 22 years new problems and new situations arise, and I feel rather proud of belonging to a party that does not have to be sterilized and remain absolutely as it was 22 years ago. We are prepared to progress, and as a matter of fact I do not understand that there is any considerable body of people in this country today who deny that there is a place for the private broadcasting stations, just as we have proclaimed and affirmed that there is a great place for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

In this connection a good deal has been said about the wise remarks made by the head of the C.B.C. with regard to the all-important question of freedom and of choice. I should like to contribute a small extract from a speech made by a man whose name I think is now well known, Malcolm Muggeridge of London Punch. It is quoted in Time of August 3 last, and it is very relevant to the question of freedom and of the rights of minorities which we have been discussing, and which I think has become much clearer in the last 22 years than it was at that time. It has become much more—what shall I say—vital to us and much more precarious than it was then, too. These are extracts from a letter that Muggeridge wrote, as I say, appearing in Time:

> Radio, you consider, is too potent an influence to be allowed, like printing, to be under private control . . . Private television companies, you argue, because they must look to advertising sponsors for their revenue, would necessarily be guilty of vulgarization and distortion to serve their own base interests. On the other hand, the B.B.C. may be relied on to sustain elevated standards. Let us see how the system has worked in practice.
> In those disastrous years prior to September 1939, you will recall, one notable voice was never heard from Broadcasting House; a voice which, in 1940 when it was almost too late, was able to summon up endurance and courage. How wonderful it would have been if this voice, Sir Winston Churchill's, had been heard on the air warning of the wrath to come. The corporation, however, would not have it because of Britain's appeasement policy. I would myself cheerfully have put up with hours of Mr. J. Fred Muggs—

I am not quite sure who Mr. Muggs is. He is evidently a well-known prize bore.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): A termite.

Mr. Macdonnell: I continue:

> I would myself cheerfully have put up with hours of Mr. J. Fred Muggs for such a deliverance as Sir Winston Churchill would have provided from the B.B.C.'s bromides.
> Freedom, it seems to me, lies not so much in objectivity, which is largely beyond human realization, as in variety. Those who appear regularly on B.B.C. must be prepared to blow their trumpets or sound their cymbals or scratch their violins in accordance with the corporation's baton. Whether the music is good or bad, there is one orchestra with one conductor, following one score, and this state of affairs is both unhealthy and dangerous.

I suggest to the hon. member for Mackenzie that whatever wisdom there is in this is wisdom that we have learned in the last twenty years by reason of certain dangers that were undreamt of twenty-two years ago.

I continue to read briefly:

> Last year, during the Republican convention in Chicago, I sat with my head in a television set for four days. The convention coverage could not have been better done. There was not the smallest sign of partisanship. At intervals a personable young lady appeared to recommend a particular brand of refrigerator, but when her appearance would have interrupted a dramatic development, it was postponed. According to the fatuous mythology of the Left, the sponsors should have been Taftites. If so, there was nothing to give the smallest indication that this was the case.
> Most of the British newspapers have put up a particularly hilarious performance. They do not want to lose advertising to commercial television. They have therefore discovered all sorts of high-minded reasons for preserving in the case of the B.B.C. a monopoly which, in any other field, they would denounce. Then there has been the unforgettable spectacle of politicians rising up to explain how their sensitive natures recoil from the vulgarity of commercial radio. It is rather as though Moll Flanders, confronted with the possibility of finding herself alone with a gentleman friend, should have fainted right away from shyness.
> Does anyone suppose that if the Elizabethan theatre had been under public control it would have produced Shakespeare? Mr. Justice Shallow in all his many guises would have greatly exerted himself to, as it were, keep Sir John Falstaff off the air.

I have read that, Mr. Chairman, because it seems to me a voice pointing us to realities. I think the reality of the situation is that we should have C.B.C. strong and able to render the service it is rendering, but why should it be necessary to go back 22 years when the problem was different? The problem then was to be sure that there was a C.B.C., and it was done and it has gone on and we have supported it. But entirely new conditions have arisen which, as I say, I think carry the judgment of the people as to the propriety also of the private stations to give the local services.

Mr. Knowles: The basic principle is there, though.

Mr. Macdonnell: Having said that I want to ask the minister some questions about the statement of income and expenditures which we have. I have in my hand a report of the corporation to March 31, 1953. I have no doubt the minister has figures available up to March 31, 1954, and if so they might be helpful.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have just a brief question or two that I should like to ask the minister in regard to the matter of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It has been brought to my attention that a situation occurred, and the type of situation that I will deal with in a moment could occur only in western Ontario, the Toronto area or in Quebec in the thickly populated parts of Quebec. It is my understanding that owing to C.B.C. regulations it is quite impossible for two or three or more privately-owned radio stations to broadcast programs simultaneously. The situation I am referring to arose in connection with a privately-owned retail store, which I believe wished to put on a live program in one of the areas of western Ontario. The city from which it was intended to broadcast was in the centre of quite a large agricultural area. Since a fair number of people came from the outlying areas the idea was conceived that other small cities equipped with radio stations might carry the program at the same time. Naturally, it costs money to employ live talent. This program could have been broadcast simultaneously from two or three other adjoining small cities with radio stations. But apparently the request was turned down as it was considered that this would constitute the setting up of a private network.

Now having had some legal training I realize that statutes have to be put in force to deal with matters such as the setting up of networks in opposition to the ones that have been approved, but it would seem to me that this type of situation was not envisaged by the people who drafted the C.B.C. regulations. When the minister makes his statement I would like to hear some comment on this situation because it does not seem reasonable or exactly fair.

There have been a number of remarks about programs this afternoon and this evening in regard to the C.B.C. Quite frankly I personally enjoy a very great many of the programs put out by the C.B.C. For example, C.B.C.'s "Wednesday Night" is a particularly fine program, and I think the carrying of the Metropolitan Opera albeit from the United States and financed by the Texaco Company, which comes through on Saturday afternoon, is a fine thing also. But I think the C.B.C.'s "Wednesday Night" is produced by the C.B.C. itself. I think the C.B.C.'s "Wednesday Night" program is a very good example of a very high cultural effort enjoyed by a number of people, but I think the number of people who listen to the C.B.C.'s "Wednesday Night", compared with the number who do not listen, would astound the minister. In fact, only a small percentage of the people actually listen to it.

I am not criticizing this effort for indeed the program is an excellent one, but I am simply pointing out that it is very difficult to foist culture on people if they do not wish to listen to it. It might be argued that the people should listen to it, but they will not listen to it if they do not like it, and I am sure there is very little can be done about it.

Now, regarding the other programs that come through, the C.B.C. did carry at one time on Sunday afternoons a program of the New York philharmonic orchestra. This was one of the so-called cultural programs which did have a very wide audience, and was widely enjoyed by a great many people. I think I can say quite truthfully that if I have had one I have had more than 50 people asking me to find out some time or other why this program was no longer carried over the air on a Sunday afternoon. This program was heard for many years, and indeed it is one of the oldest programs on radio. However, for some reason or other it is no longer carried. It may be it is carried on some of the C.B.C. stations, but I know it is no longer carried over CBL which is the principal station heard in Toronto and western Ontario, an area which is one of the most thickly populated parts of the country.

As regards the programs carried on TV, I would just like to make a few comments on one which was carried last evening over CBOT Ottawa. It was a very interesting production of Richard Strauss's opera "Salome" which represented a very high cultural experience. It is very pleasant indeed to see operas produced over the air, but I cannot say that I think that particular one was the best that could have been given. Those who are familiar with the biblical story of John the Baptist and Salome, and there have been several operas done on this theme, will know that this one is particularly gruesome. I happened to see it last evening and there were a number of people watching. At the end of the opera the young lady in question, after doing the dance of the seven veils—and it was quite agreeable—takes the head of John the Baptist and proceeds to carry it around by the hair, and she fondled it rather considerably.

I do not intend to bring any levity into this matter. There were a number of people there quite near me who said they had to get up and leave. It was rather unpleasant to many people. I would just like to mention these things. Many of the programs are good but I think the minister might direct the staff to pay a little more attention to some of the programs produced both on TV and on the C.B.C. radio. Sometimes what is considered culture by some rather high-minded people in these offices is sometimes considered by the ordinary person to be rather offensive. I see, Mr. Chairman, it is almost ten o'clock so I will conclude my remarks at this juncture.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, this debate this afternoon, as usual, has been very interesting. We have heard words of criticism and words of commendation with reference to the C.B.C. To those who have extended commendation I am grateful, as well as to those who have offered criticism, because we can all learn from criticism. However, some of the criticism and some of the statements made were wrong in terms of fact, and I want to put on the record this statement with reference to the one made by the Leader of the Opposition.

He made the statement that the C.B.C. has a duty to carry out government policy. That statement is not correct. According to statute the C.B.C. is not an instrument of government to carry out government policy, but on the contrary is supposed to carry out independently the will of parliament in accordance with the C.B.C. act. It is to parliament that the C.B.C. is responsible, and that is the reason—oh, yes. The hon. member for Greenwood shakes his head. Let him read over the Canadian Broadcasting Act and he will see to whom they are responsible. They are not responsible to the minister and they are not responsible to the government. They are responsible to parliament and that is the reason we have the biannual meetings of the radio committee.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

The hon. member for Eglinton, in criticizing the government before he left for Toronto —and we might expect of course, that he would give that criticism and then—

Mr. Macdonnell: It is a very respectable place to which to go.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member complained the committee was not held this year. I might point out that the committee concluded its final hearings last year early in May, and brought in its report on the 9th of May. However, in that regard I will go so far as to say that we will welcome the setting up of the committee on radio at the next session of parliament, and that will be one of our very first duties.

The hon. member also complained that we had not the annual statement for the year 1954. But our fiscal year ends on March 31 so that we have had about eight or ten weeks in which to prepare an annual statement, have it audited, and presented to the house. There is no commercial organization of a type similar to the C.B.C. that can have a statement ready within six or eight weeks after the end of the fiscal year, have it audited, and bring it before the shareholders. That statement will be given in due course.

Meantime, I want to make this statement with reference to our finances. Revenues and expenditures for the period ending March 31, 1954, are approximately the following: on sound radio we get a government grant of $6,250,000, and excise tax income amounted to $5,057,000; commercial revenue has been $2,471,000 and miscellaneous about $314,000, so that the receipts on sound radio have been $14,092,000. Our operating expenditures were $12,486,000 and depreciation and obsolescence amounted to $515,000. We therefore have an operating surplus on sound radio for the year ending March 31, 1954, of $1,091,000.

Now, on the television side the excise tax revenue has been $11,700,000, and commercial revenue, which is very good for the time we have been in operation, amounted to $1,334,000. Miscellaneous revenue is about $48,000. Our expenditures, operating, are $7,326,000. That leaves a balance of $5,756,000. As against that we have written off for depreciation and obsolescence $425,000, leaving a net operating revenue of $5,331,000. As I stated this afternoon, that will be used for further capital expenditures along with this amount of money of $3 million if the committee passes it.

The hon. member for Eglinton was critical of our finances and he was critical of our policy. I should just like to bring to the attention of the committee what the policy is as set out in a statement which I made on Monday, March 30, 1953. I had previously made a statement on December 8, 1952, in which I mentioned six centres in which Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television stations were to be established immediately and indicated that applications would be received for private stations to serve other areas. This will answer the question of the hon. member for Macleod. Any town of 25,000 or 30,000 can make application for a private television station and they are likely to get it because it would not be one of the areas that are what might be called pre-empted by the C.B.C. I pointed out that under the plan the private stations licensed would carry national program service of the C.B.C.—that is one of the stipulations—besides having time for programming of their own. I said also, as reported at page 409 of Hansard of December 8, 1952:

> Since the objective will be to extend services as widely throughout Canada as is practicable, no two stations will be licensed at the present to serve the same area. A television station can serve only a comparatively small area. Canada is very large and it will require a good many stations before television can be brought to the people in most parts of our country. It is desirable to have one station in as many areas as possible before there are two in any one area.

I suggest that that is a very simple and practical policy. These words make it clear that it was not the policy of the government to create monopoly in television or to limit any one area indefinitely to one television station. The principle of one station to an area is to apply only until an adequate system is developed.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. McCann: At the rate that applications for stations are being received, it may not be long—time has shown that there are 16 either in operation or under construction—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hear several hon. members mentioning the fact that it is ten o'clock. Is the consent of the committee given for the minister to complete his statement this evening?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McCann: —it may not be long before there is a sufficient degree of national coverage to justify the government and the C.B.C. giving consideration to permitting two and perhaps in some cases more than two stations in certain areas. It is anticipated that, in due course, private stations will be permitted in areas covered by C.B.C. stations, and the C.B.C. may establish stations in some areas originally covered by private stations. The ultimate objective of the C.B.C. is to have at least one station in every province of Canada where that is practicable. We understand that private applications have been under development in the five provinces where no C.B.C. station is now under way.

Of course, this was the condition back in 1953, over a year ago. I just want to state to the committee and to the country that the policy of the government with reference to licences is the same today and will continue to be the same for a further period as it was when we initiated it on March 30, 1953.

I think it was the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who asked—

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I apologize for interrupting the minister but my understanding is that there are still one or two statements to be given. There is one that the Leader of the Opposition asked for. After all it is ten o'clock and I do not see any reason at all why we should be sitting here indefinitely. If it were only a question of two or three minutes, that would be another matter.

Mr. McCann: That suits me all right. I am not breaking any agreement.

Mr. Macdonnell: Just a minute. I want to know what the minister means by that. If he is suggesting—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: This is where we started.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, if that remark was directed at me, may I ask that the minister withdraw it?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I was under the impression that the committee had given unanimous consent to the minister to continue. However it is more than possible that in the chorus of yeas and nays I may not have heard those who were opposed. Therefore if there was any idea that there was unanimous consent, the idea was mine. It being ten o'clock, shall I report the resolution and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall take first a resolution which is not yet on the order paper with respect to the Canadian armed forces. There will be two stages to this resolution, namely the signification of His Excellency's consent and recommendation and then the resolution stage itself. As I understand it, that has been agreed upon in the veterans affairs committee. Then we shall take consideration of the amendment to the bill which came back from the other place with respect to inventions of public servants. I understand this is only a matter of some technical changes in the French version of the bill. Then we shall take the National Harbours Board Act, the Veterans Land Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act, the Customs Tariff, Income Tax Act and Canadian National Railways. If we complete that business we plan to proceed with disability allowances. We shall take that debate until we reach second reading but not continue with the committee stage. If we still have time we shall take supply beginning with national revenue, followed by fisheries, mines and technical surveys, legislation and privy council.

Mr. Green: I wish to raise one point. It was my understanding that the Veterans Land Act would be taken before the National Harbours Board Act.

Mr. Harris: I am sorry if I read the items in the wrong order. They will be changed as the hon. member suggests.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY REPORT

Mr. Bell:

For a copy of the report of an economic study of the proposed St. Lawrence waterway, made in 1951 by the Department of Trade and Commerce, as referred to by the Minister of Transport at page 1666 of Hansard of December 6, 1951.

He said: Mr. Speaker, after a discussion with the minister I would request that this motion be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

PROVISION OF VARIOUS BENEFITS TO MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the proposed measure respecting benefits for members of the Canadian forces, Bill 101 now before the house, by substituting for paragraph (c) of sub-clause (2) of clause 12, relating to the Unemployment Insurance Act, the following:

"(c) every person who was a member of the regular forces on and immediately prior to the 5th day of July, 1950, and thereafter without any interruption in service as such member, was on service in a theatre of operations on the strength of the special force and was discharged from the regular forces within three years from the date he ceased to serve on the strength of the special force; and"

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved that this resolution be referred to the committee of the whole on Bill No. 101.

Motion agreed to.

WHEAT

DECLINE IN EXPORTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce relating to the overseas exports of wheat. Would the minister comment on the terrifying drop to 14,600,000 bushels for the four weeks ending May 26 from 35,400,000 for the same period a year ago?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have had no notice of the question. I am not sure that my hon. friend's figures are correct but I will be glad to look into the matter and answer this question tomorrow.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, my figures are correct.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NAVAL DOCKYARD, ESQUIMALT—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) or in his absence the parliamentary assistant. Can the house be informed as to the situation relative to the strike or walkout of over one hundred employees at H.M.C. dockyard at Esquimalt on Vancouver island?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave notice of this question to the associate minister and he passed it on to me last night. The situation, as hon. members know, is that prevailing rate employees of the Department of National Defence and other government departments have the same conditions of work and wage rates as those enjoyed by employees of corresponding civilian industries in the locality. That practice prevails as regards the dockyard workers at Esquimalt. They receive the same rates and work under the same conditions as the two civilian shipyards in the vicinity.

Under the authority of treasury board minute TB 460455 dated October 30, 1953, it was provided that the superintendent of the dockyard may authorize payments of premium for what is called dirty work, that is work in boilers and so on, for which in his opinion private shipyards in the Esquimalt area would pay a premium rate. On Friday, June 4, seven employees of the dockyard were ordered to perform welding work. But in their view this was dirty work and entitled them to the premium. In the view of the superintendent it was not, and in his view, had they been employed by civilian industries in the locality, they would not have received the payment of the premium.

The issue between them is purely a question of fact. The employees did not have recourse to the grievance procedure laid down. They stopped work and a number of other employees have stopped work, presumably out of sympathy for them. That is the situation.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence following the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). Is his department taking any steps to settle this dispute?

Mr. Claxton: There is a grievance procedure in existence, and if employees would have recourse to it, that could be followed.

[Later:]

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like to correct the answer I gave to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). In accordance with a memorandum which has just reached my hand, the seven employees did not stop work. They were suspended for refusing to do their jobs. The other employees stopped work presumably out of sympathy for their attitude.

NURSES

ALLEGED SHORTAGE IN CANADA—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Has the minister seen the published statement of the president of the Canadian Hospital Council, Dr. McGugan, to the effect that there is a shortage of 10,000 graduate nurses in Canada? If so, has the government under consideration any measures that would tend to alleviate this potentially dangerous situation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, perhaps my hon. friend would allow me to take this question as notice and I shall deal with it later.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—REPORTED EVICTIONS IN WINDSOR AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), and to information requested by the hon. members for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and York South (Mr. Noseworthy), on Friday, June 4, relating to eviction notices being served by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on tenants and persons who have purchased houses from the corporation in Windsor. I might add also that some representations were made a few days earlier by Mr. Earl Watson of local 195 of the U.A.W. C.I.O. to the hon. members for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and Essex West (Mr. Brown).

I have made inquiries of Central Mortgage and am advised that six notices of intention to cancel agreements for sale have been served recently on purchasers of houses from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Windsor. None of the notices has yet expired and no court action has been commenced. Of the six upon whom notices have been served, two have called upon the officials of the corporation and have paid their arrears in full. One of the others has paid part of the arrears and has arranged for the balance. In the fourth case the family service bureau is taking a hand as there is domestic trouble. It is expected that this case also will be satisfactorily settled. The remaining two purchasers have not yet called upon the corporation's branch office.

Three notices of termination of lease have also been served. These notices have likewise not expired, but the tenants have all paid their arrears and are being reinstated.

During the last three months there has been one eviction in Windsor. In that case the tenant paid no attention to the notice that was served upon him, and the matter was taken to court. The tenant voluntarily vacated on June 1, as a result of the court decision. In this case the tenant was not an unemployed person and made no effort to make arrangements with corporation officials.

On March 30 the Minister of Public Works outlined the policy of the corporation in respect to purchasers and tenants in arrears. The minister pointed out at that time that where there is genuine distress arising out of unemployment the corporation will give every possible consideration to working out an arrangement suitable to both the purchaser or tenant and the corporation, but that having regard to its responsibility for the management of public funds, the corporation does not follow a policy of waiving or postponing the collection of monthly instalments on a wholesale basis. Each individual case is dealt with on its merits and only such measure of relief as the circumstances of each individual case may warrant is given.

The corporation has under management in the Windsor area over 1,000 houses. These are rented at rentals considerably below the market. In addition, the corporation has under agreement for sale some 3,000 houses. In these cases also, the repayment arrangements are most favourable to the purchasers.

In the circumstances, I believe the house will agree that the policy followed by the corporation is the only policy that can be followed consistent with its responsibilities.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as a question supplementary to the answer given by the parliamentary assistant, may I ask him if he will draw to the attention of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation the desirability of giving consideration to the general and unexpected distress in Windsor caused by the unanticipated lay-off of men by the Ford plant which will greatly affect the very situation that he has outlined and will bring into operation the policy explained by the minister in this house?

Mr. Bourget: I will be glad to do that.

[Later]:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Public Works in the absence of the Minister of Public Works and the acting minister.

Some hon. Members: No; he is here.

Mr. Noseworthy: In view of the further lay-offs which are reported from Windsor, will the government assure the house that those laid off will not be evicted from any homes they are purchasing under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Acting Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, just to point out to my hon. friend that I am not absent, may I say that the answer to his question lies in the answer previously made by the parliamentary assistant.

GRAIN

UNITED STATES SELLING POLICY—REPORTED DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It arises out of a question I asked him on Tuesday with regard to meetings in Washington in connection with the grain selling policy. Is it a fact that Mr. M. W. Sharp, associate deputy minister of trade and commerce, and William C. McNamara, assistant chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board, have been in discussion with officials in Washington with regard to the fact that the United States is making available surplus supplies of corn, oats, barley and rye for export markets at prices below world prices and also with a view to seeing whether something of a common policy might be arrived at so that Canada's market in these grains would not be lost?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Sharp and Mr. McNamara were in Washington last week discussing various matters with the department of agriculture and the various branches thereof. It was not my understanding that the matters referred to by my hon. friend were the subject of conversation, although they may have been. I think they were discussing sales of wheat. However, I regret to inform the house that, in spite of representations, the Americans cut their price of wheat on Friday by ten cents.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, what effect will that cut have on the prediction the minister made some time ago with regard to the optimistic future for the marketing of Canadian wheat at present prices?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The minister is just as optimistic now as he was when he made the statement.

Mr. Knowles: Your optimism is all you have left.

PORK

INQUIRY AS TO EXPORT TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he can now clarify the point I raised on Thursday last with reference to the terms of the tender on canned pork sale? The minister will recall that I asked whether the terms were that the goods should be shipped off the North American continent or merely outside of Canada.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was out of the city on Friday and Saturday last and the information has not reached me. However I will certainly have it tomorrow.

Mrs. Fairclough: Thank you.

PUBLIC SERVANTS' INVENTIONS

PROVISION FOR OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT AND PAYMENT—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 444, respecting inventions by public servants.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, naturally I have no objection to the amendments proposed by Their Honours with respect to this bill. They are set out at page 703 of our Votes and Proceedings for Thursday, June 3. Since the purpose of these amendments is to make certain corrections in the French version, I merely rise to express the hope that we will not carry forward into the French version of this bill a mistake that appears in the 17th of the proposed amendments. I refer to the spelling of the word "fonctionnaires". It should read "fonctionnaires"; not "fronctionnaires".

Mr. Speaker: I do not find the exact place where the hon. member has found the misspelled word, but if it is there as he has noticed it, it will be corrected. I think it is worth mentioning that the hon. member had perused the French version in such an expert manner as to have detected that misspelled word. I am sure that those who are responsible for the French translation will be very grateful to him and will correct this clerical error. There is no doubt that in spelling the word "fonctionnaires" in French the "r" must be deleted after the "f".

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

VETERANS LAND ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE ASSISTANCE FOR HOME CONSTRUCTION, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. 459, to amend the Veterans Land Act—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, this bill has had very careful study by the veterans affairs committee. I think there was unanimity as to the principle and application of each of the sections of the bill. Certain amendments were recommended and I understand that they are before us this morning. For that reason I do not see that it is necessary to have an extensive discussion of the bill at this time.

Clause agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: I would draw to the attention of the committee that the bill has not been reprinted. According to the bill I have before me, the numbers were changed in the committee and clauses 2 to 9 would not appear to be in the hands of hon. members. However, I understand that these clauses were all adopted by the special committee on veterans affairs. I will call the clauses slowly in order that hon. members will not be caught by surprise.

Clauses 2 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING POLICING, HARBOUR TOLLS, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. 421, to amend the National Harbours Board Act—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Owner.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I regret that the Minister of Transport is not in the house for the consideration of this bill. It is one which is of great importance to those portions of Canada where there are national harbours. It involves some very important principles and I believe that this is a case in which the minister should not have deputized his parliamentary assistant to handle the bill in the committee stage of the house. I would hope that the minister could be present before the discussion has gone very far. He was here a few minutes ago and I see no reason why he should not be in the house to participate in the discussion.

There was very little debate on the measure when it was given second reading in the house. The reason for that was that the bill was complicated. It contained some drastic new provisions and those on the opposition side felt that it would be appropriate to have the bill studied in the standing committee and that a more effective debate could take place when it came back to the house. In the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines we heard representations from counsel for the Shipping Federation of Canada and the Vancouver chamber of shipping. Very serious objections were taken to certain sections of the bill. Some amendments were made which had the result of reducing the objectionable features, but in our opinion further amendments are required before the bill can be considered satisfactory.

I should like to point out the position of the national harbours board. It was set up in 1936 to manage seven of the harbours of Canada, namely, Halifax, Saint John, Chicoutimi, Quebec, Montreal, Churchill and Vancouver. It has no jurisdiction whatever over the other ports of Canada, some of which are of great importance. For example, there are the ports of New Westminster on the west coast, Sorel on the St. Lawrence and St. John's in Newfoundland. The national harbours board only has jurisdiction over seven of the ports of Canada.

I submit that the important thing about these ports is not the national harbours board but the business that flows through the ports. Representing one of the constituencies in the city of Vancouver, I can say without fear of contradiction that we do not want the national harbours board to interfere with the shipping business through our port to any greater extent than is absolutely necessary for the national harbours board to carry on its business. This is where our main objection to the bill arises. We believe that the bill gives the national harbours board far more power than it requires to carry out the management of these ports. It gives it so much power that the result may very well be to interfere with and cut down business in these Canadian ports.

It must be remembered that these ports are in competition with other Canadian ports that do not come under the national harbours board. For example, Vancouver is in stiff competition with the port of New Westminster, and we do not feel we should be handicapped by bureaucratic restrictions which do not apply to the port of New Westminster. Furthermore, we are in very stiff competition with the west coast United States ports such as Seattle, Tacoma, Portland and San Francisco. Every curb that is put on the business of the port of Vancouver has a tendency to force business from that port into the United States ports. It must be remembered that this shipping business is an international business. The rules are international rules. This business is not conducted under rules Canadians like to make; it is carried on under broad international rules. It is of the utmost importance that there be no restrictions imposed by the Canadian government which will have the effect of diverting that shipping to other ports.

I said a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, that the powers which still remain in this bill, after the amendments proposed by the committee, are too extensive. I propose to mention four of those powers about which we make serious complaint. In the first place, dealing with clause 1 of the bill, hon. members will find that there is a definition of the word "owner". It defines the "owner" of a vessel. Then, it defines the owner of goods. My objection is to the definition of the owner of a vessel. In the case of a vessel the owner was originally defined to include the agent, charterer or master of the vessel. In the committee the word "charterer" was qualified by adding the words "by demise", so that only the charterer by demise is to be considered as the owner. If he is the charterer by demise he has taken the ship over as a whole and is quite properly made subject to the restrictions and penalties imposed upon an owner.

However, the word "agent" still remains, and we object strenuously to having the agent treated in the same way as the owner of the vessel. These agents for vessels are not agents in the ordinary sense of the word. They merely look after the servicing of the vessel while she is in port. For example, they may arrange for the docking of the vessel, for her supplies to be purchased and also may arrange for the cargo that is to be shipped out as well as for the cargo that has been brought into the port. There are two or three different types of agents. Some are known as berthing agents and they look after the arrangements for the berthing of the vessel. Some are known as husbanding agents, who look after the various matters to which I have referred. Some are general agents, but in no case are they responsible in any way for the operation of the vessel itself. Yet, in the way this bill is drawn, these shipping agents are to be made responsible for whatever is done by the vessel itself.

The most objectionable section of the bill is the clause containing what will be the new section 16 (7) of the act. Under this provision the board can sue the agent for any damage done to harbour board property by a vessel, and that might involve thousands of dollars. It is absolutely unfair that the agent should be put in the position of being responsible for claims of that kind. This new section 16 of the act gives the national harbours board the power to seize a vessel if a vessel does damage to harbour board property or in case of various other eventualities. This power of seizure is of the greatest protection to the board. It is a drastic power because whenever a vessel is seized the result is a loss of thousands of dollars each day it is tied up, yet, the board is given this power to seize. In every case the ships carry insurance which protects them against claims of this kind, so the board is protected by this insurance.

It was admitted in the committee that the national harbours board has never lost one cent by reason of damage done to harbour property by a vessel, yet it is now asking the right to make the agents fully responsible for damage of this kind. I know it will be argued that the act now contains power to sue the agent; that was argued in the committee. But I point out that the power has never been exercised in the 18 years during which the board has been in existence. Furthermore, it is only a secondary recourse for the board. Under the act as it is now, the first recourse is to seize the ship, and that is what ought to be done in every case. This right to claim against an agent is only a secondary recourse, and as I say has never yet had to be exercised.

In this bill the national harbours board is going much farther in taking the widest possible power to sue the agent, whether or not it has seized the ship. If this bill goes through in its present form, the national harbours board will be able to let the ship go out of harbour, then turn around and sue the agent for any damage that has been done. The subsection in question is subsection 7 of the new section 16. It reads in this way:

> Whether or not all or any of the rights of the board under this section are exercised by the board, the board may, in any case described in subsection (1), proceed against the owner of the vessel—

I point out that covers the agent because the owner is defined as including the agent.

> —in any court of competent jurisdiction for the amount owing to the board (or for the balance thereof in the event of any sale contemplated by subsection (3)) and may also exercise against the owner—

Which again includes the agent.

—of the vessel any other right or remedy available to the board at law

That is a far wider power than the board has at the present time, and we believe that the word "agent" should be deleted from the definition of "owner" in respect of a vessel, so that the only people who would be subject to this wide power would be those who are actually responsible for the operation of the vessel.

It was suggested in committee either by the parliamentary assistant or by someone speaking on behalf of the board that agents could insure against this damage. I am informed that there is no possible way in which an agent can take out insurance against a claim of that kind. A vessel is insured for this damage and, in the marine business, that is considered sufficient to meet the situation.

Then it was suggested that the agent could make the owners of the ship put up a bond to protect the agent against any such claim. Well, that would mean that the agent would have to ask the ship owner to put up a bond of, let us say, a hundred thousand or perhaps half a million dollars.

What would be the answer of the ship owner to a request of that kind? He would say, "Well, I do not have to do this in the United States; I can send my ship to Seattle and not be bothered with providing a bond to protect the agent from damage, for which he never should be sued." The result inevitably would be that our national ports would lose business. In the case of Vancouver, the shipping agent could say to the ship owner, "In Vancouver I am liable for this damage. From now on we will use the port of New Westminster, because there is no such restriction there, and no liability set out as broad as is mentioned in the bill. We will just do our shipping business through the port of New Westminster."

Mr. Chairman, that would be completely and utterly unfair. There is no reason why agents doing business in national ports of Canada should be put in that position. Mind you, there are many shipping agents in these ports. They are reputable people who are doing business in a way recognized by the trade, and as it has been done over a countless number of years. Why should the national harbours board now ask for this further power which can have only the one effect, that of making it more onerous to do business in the national ports?

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 1 of Bill 421 be amended by deleting the word "agent" as it appears in the first line of paragraph (ea).

[Mr. Green.]

In opening my remarks I said that there were four different points about which we were concerned. Three of these have to do with later sections, so I shall merely outline our objections at this time. There is a provision in the bill to give the national harbours board power to set up police forces in the different national ports. Under the bill as presented those police constables were given power to operate not only on property of the national harbours board but for 50 miles in any direction from that property. Members of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines realized that was ridiculous, and cut down the distance to 25 miles. For all practical purposes, I say that even 25 miles in every direction from harbours board property is just as ridiculous as 50 miles. I believe it should be cut down to, let us say, perhaps one mile.

Then there is a provision in the new section 16 (1) (d) which gives the board power to seize a vessel where it believes there has been a breach of board bylaws. This is a form of thought policing by the board; it can act if it thinks there has been a breach of the bylaws. Mind you, it does not have to prove a breach; if it thinks there has been that breach it may seize the vessel. The maximum penalty is $500. The board has this power to seize and to hold a vessel which, as I said before, means delay and expense, and perhaps the loss of thousands of dollars for each day the vessel is held.

Then, we object to a provision which refers to goods. The board now asks a general lien on all the goods of an owner, no matter when they may come over a dock, for charges which have not been paid on goods sent over the dock earlier. For example, a man may bring in goods today, and there may be, in respect of those goods, a charge which is not paid. Mind you, the board now has the power to hold the goods. We will suppose it lets the goods go; and then perhaps a year from now the same owner brings in other goods on that dock. Under this bill it asks the right to seize those goods, in priority to any other claim. Someone may have money owing on the goods, or there may be some other claim against them; but under the arbitrary power given by this measure the board will be able to seize the goods for charges which may have been incurred months before.

I shall deal in greater detail with the other objections when we reach the later sections in the bill. Meantime I am asking consideration for the amendment I have moved in which I have asked that the word "agent" be deleted.

May I point out to the minister who, I am glad to see, is now in his seat, that this bill is not one involving party considerations at all. But it is of vital importance to those ports which operate under the national harbours board. I would hope he would accept my amendment in that spirit. We do not want unnecessary restrictions placed upon the business being done through our ports, and we believe that this liability against the agent should be deleted from the bill.

Mr. Winch: As a member from the city of Vancouver I am keenly interested in the bill before the committee. Most certainly before voting on its various sections I want to be completely certain in my own mind as to the implications involved.

I followed closely the explanations given in the committee meetings, where this bill was considered, and I am not either happy or satisfied that the explanations given by the parliamentary assistant and representatives of the harbours board were adequate. As I say, I was unhappy with the explanations that were given in the committee, and in the intervening time have given a great deal of thought to this bill, and in particular to clause 1, with the result that I find myself in agreement with the hon. member who has just spoken as regards the new definition of an owner. I cannot see the reasons why the government finds it necessary to bring in such a far-reaching interpretation of the meaning of owner. I can very well understand the reasons why objections are being raised in the house, and why those who are interested in shipping are very much concerned.

In the committee it was explained to us that, as already pointed out, in the many years that there have been harbour boards in Canada no financial losses whatsoever have been sustained. It is obvious therefore that the term "agent" in clause 1 is introduced not because of anything that has happened in the entire history of the harbour board in Canada. That being so, what different situation in the future do the harbour boards anticipate that necessitates the introduction of the term "agent" in the act? As I understand the act as it will read if this passes, it is conceivable that an agent could be sued for a navigation difficulty in the operation of a vessel. I for the life of me cannot see why there should be the possibility of a financial penalty on an agent for an act in which he himself is not concerned. When we bring in that kind of principle into the law of Canada we are taking a mighty serious step, and every hon. member should give consideration to what he is doing.

I do not want to repeat too much of what has been said, but I do want to add my voice to the argument against what I think is a very unfair principle, namely, that there should be two kinds of rights and two powers in the operations of the harbours board of Canada. If the ports that come under the operation of the harbours board are going to have the type of regulations, type of interpretations, if this act passes, then it does seem to me to be distinctly unfair that other harbours do not have to live up to the same rules, regulations and interpretations and financial responsibility.

I am not going to take the position that if this goes through, as far as the harbours of Canada under the harbours board are concerned, it would automatically mean that all the other acts that govern the other harbours should be changed accordingly, because that would be an unfair position to take, since if it is wrong for the harbours under the harbours board to have this power and regulations and extension of authority, then it would be unfair for the others. Therefore I think that the only thing to do is to see that the power is not taken in this bill under its administration. It is going to place a number of the operators who ship out of the seven harbours under the harbours board under an unfair situation.

I have been trying to make some investigation as to what it would mean, and as near as I have been able to find out—and this confirms the investigation of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra—there is not any insurance company that would give out the type of insurance that an agent would think he would have to have for his own protection. It is because once an act is passed it is the letter of the law that counts, and the only way to find out exactly what it is going to mean is to have a case go to court and get the interpretation of the judge. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the interpretation which the shipping firms and their legal advisers, who are maritime lawyers, are placing on it now is just as good as the interpretation that has been placed upon it by the government and by the parliamentary assistant, who takes the position that in law the things we fear would not be done. He has no basis in fact to state that, because he does not know. Therefore, because I do think it will place agents and shipping firms in an embarrassing position at least and also I think in perhaps an impossible situation or that it will give rise to very grave concern and doubts, it is not the type of legislation that should be passed.

In view of the experience of the harbours board, in view of the experience of the government in the past when they have not had this power, there has been no indication that they need this power, and the bill should not go through at this time. I want to add my word in this way. I sincerely hope that all hon. members will realize that since Canada is a trading nation we have to be very careful in what we write into the statute books, and that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will be accepted by this house in the interest of Canada as a trading nation.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I might be allowed to make a statement before this matter proceeds too far. First, let me say in answer to my hon. friend, who I understand took me to task because I was not here during the opening of this discussion of the bill, that the committee understands I am sure full well the value and importance of parliamentary assistants. I have full confidence in my parliamentary assistant. When parliamentary assistants are named it is clearly stated that they are appointed for the purpose of assuming certain duties and performing certain tasks as assigned to them by the minister, and I have assigned to my parliamentary assistant, because I have full confidence in his qualifications, the task of presenting this bill to the house. I understand from hon. members who were on the committee that he has done an excellent job, and I am pleased that colleagues from both sides of the house have so indicated to me.

Mr. Green: I do not think that anybody from this side indicated that.

Mr. Chevrier: I said "from both sides of the house". I do not know why it is necessary that the minister should be here for all of the bills that are discussed. However, be that as it may, I simply wanted to say that I have confidence in the competence and in the qualifications of the parliamentary assistant to deal with this just as adequately as I can.

Let me deal with the subject matter of this measure. I am sure there is a misapprehension about this bill. Surely this bill cannot be what hon. members say it is. I looked at it earlier; I discussed it with my officers, and I came to the conclusion that this was a simple bill, with perhaps one exception that I can deal with later.

There is nothing in this bill which is not already contained in the act, and anybody who rises in his place and says that the national harbours board by this amendment is taking tremendous powers, powers that it did not have before, is mistaken.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat seems to be of that opinion. Well, let me tell him at once that if he looks at clause 16 of the act he will see that at the end of it are to be found the very powers which are contained in the amending bill with reference to the owner. All this bill does is to clarify the powers which the national harbours board already has. All this bill does is to expand with one exception, as I said, the powers that the board has. It is really a bill to improve the phraseology, and all the Department of Justice was doing when they approved of this bill was to find ways of clarifying and redefining the section already contained in the act.

If my hon. friends will look at the National Harbours Board Act, the statutes of 1936, chapter 42, section 16, paragraph 2, they will find the latter part of it reads as follows:

> . . . the board shall have a preferential lien upon the vessel and upon the proceeds thereof until payment has been made or adequate security has been given for such damages, whether direct or indirect, and for the amount of all such injury, damages, expenses and costs as may be awarded in any suit resulting therefrom, and the owner, charterer, master or agent of such vessel shall also be liable to the board for all such injury, damages, expenses and costs.

Therefore, if this amendment is accepted, we are withdrawing from the board the powers which were conferred upon it under the act of 1936, and it seems to me that the house certainly does not want to take away from the board the powers which already exist.

The exception to which I referred is the one having to do with the peace officers, and in this case the board felt that because of the difficult jurisdictional problem, which the parliamentary assistant has explained in committee and will explain here also, and which difficult jurisdictional problem exists in Montreal and to a large extent in Vancouver—

Mr. Green: Oh, no!

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says "Oh, no". I think the parliamentary assistant and I must take advice, not from my hon. friend, but from our officers who state that there are jurisdictional difficulties in the city of Vancouver.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately the proceedings of the committee have not yet been printed, but I am sure the minister will not quarrel with the statement that either the representative of the harbours board or his parliamentary assistant told me in committee that there had not been any trouble in Vancouver.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I was not there and, of course, I must accept the word of my hon. friend; but I am sure the parliamentary assistant would not have said that with reference to the city of Montreal because

I know there are at least five if not more different jurisdictions. Occasions have arisen in the past when charges were laid and warrants had to be backed in at least four different jurisdictions. Then, on one occasion, because the person who was being apprehended ran one-half of the distance between the north and south shores of the river St. Lawrence on the Jacques Cartier bridge, he was outside the jurisdiction, and could not be apprehended.

I am quite sure a situation like that should not obtain and I am quite sure the house would not want it to obtain, particularly when it would put the national harbours board to all sorts of expense.

I did not rise to impede the passing of this bill. I rose to try to help it through, and I am convinced in my own mind that the bill, as I understand it, and with but one exception, simply clarifies and redefines the powers which already exist in regard to the national harbours board. I repeat that, because of other business, I will have to leave the house within a short time, but I have full confidence in the handling of this legislation by my parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, the members of the committee which reviewed this case spent a good deal of time on it and despite what the Minister of Transport has said there were changes made in the bill.

I believe this bill has been poorly drafted. I think there are three important functions which are being affected, namely, the functions of the charterer, the owner, and the agents. I drew from my very limited experience in the shipping field by referring to a trip I made last year on a ship owned by the Stag Steamship Company of Newcastle. She was chartered by the Rank Milling Company of London and the agent in Churchill was the Montreal Shipping Company.

As this bill came before us any one of those three could be held responsible for offences of any one of the others and I think it is unfortunate that a bill should come before parliament under which the charterer, in this case the Rank Milling Company, could be held responsible for damage done to the harbours board facilities at Churchill, and for a mistake made by the captain or officers of that particular ship.

The committee was good enough to make a change which would relieve the Rank Milling Company, the charterer in this particular case, of any responsibility for damage done by the ship.

The evidence given before the committee has just come to my hand, and when this matter was before us Mr. Finlay, counsel for the national harbours board, set forth a case as reported at page 180, to the effect that the Montreal Shipping Company, acting as the sole agent at law, would go down to the wharf at Montreal and, let us say, through its negligence there was a fire. In that case no act of the vessel was involved, but in spite of the fact that the vessel was not involved the vessel owners could be held liable because the Montreal Shipping Company was acting as the agent.

That is the opinion of our learned counsel. I think the Stag Steamship Company with offices in Newcastle, having engaged the Montreal Shipping Company to be its agent in Montreal, should not be held responsible for a fire caused by the Montreal Shipping Company before the Begonia reached Montreal. While the Montreal Shipping Company is acting for the Stag Steamship Company I think the Stag Steamship Company should not be held responsible for negligence on the part of the Montreal Shipping Company, and vice versa.

We made some progress in the committee. I have not before me the bill as revised, but I think it was agreeable that section 16, paragraph 1 (d), should be amended so that this point could be cleared up. As I said, I think there was poor draftsmanship in this particular bill. I do not think we wish to draft legislation that holds one company responsible for offenders caused by another.

I realize that the national harbours board has a large investment in the harbour facilities across the country and I think those who damage those facilities should be held responsible. I think the harbours board should collect from those who are responsible, and I do not think the agent should be held responsible for damage caused by the vessel. I believe that the term "owner" as originally drafted in the bill to include "the agent, charterer or master of the vessel" should be altered.

I am concerned about what the passing of this bill will do to Churchill because the shipping out of that harbour is of vital importance to that part of Canada in which I live. The agent for most of the ships there has been the Montreal Shipping Company and I expect that the Montreal Shipping Company will continue to do a large volume of business in Montreal; but I am afraid that if this legislation goes through their risks in connection with the handling of ships at Churchill will be so great in comparison with the revenue they receive that they will decide not to operate there. The proposal that is made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to strike out the word "agent" in this section is, I think, a reasonable one. I think it is unfortunate that section 16 was worded in such a way as to say as follows:

> The board may, as provided in section 18, seize any vessel within the territorial waters of Canada in any case where, in the opinion of the board, . . .
> (d) the owner of the vessel has committed an offence under this act or the by-laws, punishable upon summary conviction by a penalty payable under section 21 to the board; . . .

As is pointed out, there has been a change in that wording but I think it is unfortunate that acts come before parliament where it is assumed that the owner of the boat—in this case the Stag Steamship Company—should be held responsible for a fire started by gasoline drums that were placed there improperly and that the board should have the power to seize the boat belonging to the Stag Steamship Company for acts for which the owners of this particular boat were in no way responsible.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I presume that under this section a general discussion can take place. I rise to voice the strongest possible objection to section 4A whereby the board shall have—

> . . . the power to appoint police constables for the enforcement of this act and the by-laws and for the enforcement of the laws of Canada or any province in so far as the enforcement of such laws relates to the protection of property under the administration of the board or to the protection of persons present upon, or property situated upon, premises under the administration of the board, and for that purpose every such police constable is deemed to be a peace officer within the meaning of the Criminal Code and to possess jurisdiction as such upon property under the administration of the board and in any place not more than 50 miles distant from property under the administration of the board.

To me that is an example of bureaucracy gone mad. That goes further than any other legislation in this country. There has never been a statute that permitted a board to set up its own police force. The sidenote reads:

> The purpose of the new section is to eliminate the current necessity for swearing in harbour police as special constables of some municipal or provincial police force or of the R.C.M.P. The status created would be analogous to that established by the Railway Act as regards railway constables.

Railway constables are not appointed by any board. Section 456 of the Railway Act provides that railway constables are appointed by:

> A superior or county court judge, two justices of the peace, or a stipendiary or police magistrate, in any part of Canada, a clerk of the peace, clerk of the crown or judge of the sessions of the peace in the province of Quebec . . .

Section 4A strikes me as being a most unusual, unnecessary and unjustifiable extension of the power of appointment of police officers. What parliament is being asked to do is to give the national harbours board power to establish for itself an independent police force with jurisdiction up to 25 miles from a harbour. That provision makes individuals—whether they are involved or not subject to investigation if living within 25 miles of a harbour. That provision is a far cry from the age-old principle that police officers shall not be appointed by any administrative board; otherwise the liberty of the subject may be invaded by the whims and despotism of the board acting through its own appointees.

The explanation given in the sidenote to the effect that it creates a status analogous to that established by the Railway Act is true; but it is not true if there is any suggestion that the Railway Act allows the board to appoint those who will enforce the law. This provision amounts to a new step forward: an administrative board to enforce its own administration, it sets up its own police. Our concept of freedom denies that those who administer the law shall enforce the law. This section may be a short-cut but, if it is carried into effect, it seems to me that the rights of the citizen will be lost in a jungle of divergent jurisdictions. The minister said: After all, what is a matter of 24 miles? As I understand it, under the Railway Act the jurisdiction is half a mile.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): One-quarter of a mile from the property.

Mr. Diefenbaker: One-quarter of a mile. This act extends the jurisdiction farther than that which can be justified. The 25 miles provision is beyond reason in any circumstances. It has always been true that when bureaucrats endeavour to make short-cuts in order to achieve what they believe to be beneficent ends, the individual's rights of freedom are always endangered. My objections are twofold. The first is that the appointment of constables should not be in the hands of a national harbours board, an administrative institution. In the second place, there is no reason whatever why jurisdiction should be extended beyond the quarter of a mile. That provision one can understand. The enforcement of the law by police officers would be defeated unless there was some opportunity to go out beyond the immediate area or confines of the area of their jurisdiction. The Railway Act indicates that the railway officials have found that a quarter of a mile to invade the jurisdiction of other authorities is sufficient leeway. I think that consideration should be given to this matter. We do not want to start to establish in parliament the right of any board to set up its own police force. If a police force is to be set up, let it be set up in the same way as is done under the Railway Act where a superior court judge or a county court judge makes the appointments.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I have already stated my objections to this act both on second reading and in committee. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has explained the legal and technical difficulties that are still evident in the act. I think that we should review this bit of legislation and see what has happened to it. This bill originally came from the other place. They considered it on second reading and there was considerable discussion on it there. I remember the headlines of the newspapers at the time were to the effect that the national harbours board bill had created a flurry in the Senate. The senators expressed their worries and fears about the powers contained in the bill and then referred it to a committee of the other place. We do not have a report of the proceedings of that committee, but I believe that five or six amendments were made there. In this house the bill has been discussed on second reading and dealt with in the standing committee where, after considerable discussion, three or four amendments were made. Therefore I think we should appreciate that we now have before us a bill that has had ten amendments made to it since it was originally drafted. In that respect there is a reflection on either the Department of Justice or the Department of Transport so far as this legislation is concerned.

When the government members were thumping their desks a few minutes ago, with smiles on their faces, with respect to the words used by the Minister of Transport, I could not help but think that the attitude of the government members in the committee had surprised me. I was amazed at the lack of interest in the bill on the part of some of them.

Mr. Byrne: Oh, nonsense!

Mr. Bell: It is true it is a very technical measure. I appreciate that a highly trained lawyer has difficulty in understanding it. Nevertheless, during the two afternoons that the bill was considered in the committee I was surprised, as a new member, at this business of sitting back, not making too much attempt to understand the bill and yelling "carried, carried". A representative of the shipping federation of Montreal appeared before the committee and endeavoured to explain the bill. I am not saying he was completely right in everything he said but he did point out some weaknesses in the legislation that were not uncovered in the debate on second reading. I must admit that I overlooked one or two of the points he made which I now think are quite valid. Yet he was not treated with too much courtesy, and I feel that the government did not hold its end up in the consideration of this bill in the committee. At the same time the harbours board officials were, as far as I was concerned, quite ready to listen to any suggested changes. They made their explanations although, as I have said, I did not agree with all of them.

I have two objections to the bill as it now stands, to which I should like to refer again. The first objection was very carefully explained by the hon. member for Prince Albert. It is interesting that, although he perhaps has not had the time to examine the bill carefully, right off the bat he picked out this very dangerous section which gives the police officers so much power and jurisdiction. It is an example of the growing tendency toward a police state of which we are seeing so much. I still object to the extensive jurisdiction. It has been reduced to 25 miles, but the principle of having jurisdiction over that area of a waterfront is very dangerous. I object to the power of appointment of police officers because we do not know where it will stop. It may not be abused but the powers will be there.

My second objection was dealt with very well by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and it concerns the interpretation given to the meaning of the word "owner" under the bill. In the old act the word "owner" was used very loosely throughout the legislation. It was probably given the common law interpretation that has extended right up to the present time, and it was admitted that there were not too many difficulties. Yet the draftsmen of the bill have come along, put the word "owner" in the interpretation section and have given it this particular meaning which includes agents. I maintain that if it were necessary to include "agent" under the definition of "owner" it should have been spelled out in each section. In that way we would be able to understand the meaning of it. It would not be so difficult for us.

As the matter now stands we have this board definition of "owner" in the interpretation section which will apply in each place where that word is used in the old act. For that reason I support the amendment now presented. Otherwise, I think we will find ourselves in considerable trouble. On the east coast, and speaking particularly of Saint John, because the Halifax members do not seem to be worried about the shipping business even though last year was a poor one, it is my opinion that we are definitely up against it. While I appreciate that some of the amendments and new provisions in the act will be good for efficient administration, I for one would just as soon see the act left alone if there is even a slight danger that the little shipping we have left on the east coast will be endangered in any way.

Mr. McIvor: I think hon. members on this side of the house who were members of the committee can only do one thing, forgive the hon. member who has just spoken for his slam. I was a member of the committee. I was interested and I give every other hon. member credit for being interested. I voted for the bill because I was convinced that it was right.

Mr. Green: You are easily convinced.

Mr. McIvor: I do not think that the suggestion of the hon. member from away up yonder—

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. McIvor: —with respect to a quarter of a mile has any sense to it. What is a quarter of a mile when you want to catch somebody? When they get outside the 25-mile limit they are gone. On the question of agent, let us suppose that a ship comes from a country where the harbours board has no jurisdiction and cannot sue the owner. I think it is their duty to take care of the agent, and I am going to support the bill.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the committee that considered the bill and a week ago last Wednesday I had the honour to preside as chairman. Certainly the government members showed a distinct interest in the various sections of the measure. One can understand that possibly they did not take as long as some of the opposition members to understand the explanations made by the officials of the department and the harbours board, but that is no fault of the government members. I think it is simply fallacious for the hon. member to say that the government members showed no interest. I have never heard such nonsense since I have been in the house.

Mr. Gour (Russell): Cheap politics.

Mr. Byrne: Liberal members have confidence in the officials and in the Minister of Transport. They know that he would not introduce a bill that would be as restrictive to shipping as was indicated by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. In my opinion that is simply going too far. As I said, I was a member of the committee and I heard the questions asked. In particular the late Mr. Conacher asked a considerable number of questions and so did others. I think it is going a little too far to say that these members had no interest in the bill because they did not object and vote against it. In my opinion the hon. member for Saint John-Albert is being presumptuous.

Mr. Hahn: The hon. member for Kootenay East, who just spoke, mentioned that it did not take them too long to understand what was taking place. We can all appreciate that there are those who have the opposite point of view, in some instances. For various reasons we cannot see completely eye to eye with all that the government proposes, or feel that every bill that is introduced is good. We do not necessarily accept it as being good. We like to investigate it a little more closely.

In so far as agents are concerned I, for one, would like a clearer definition. As I understand it, in the shipping world there are three different types of agents. We have the berthing agent, the husbanding agent and the general agent. My reason for raising the question is that I happen to be a representative of a district having a seaport, the city of New Westminster. Some will say that port is not covered by this particular act; but on page 222 of the evidence of the committee I find a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. It reads as follows:

> Mr. Green: Under this amendment they would get wide open jurisdiction as peace officers within 50 miles of harbour property, in every direction. Is that right?
> Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That is right.

I understand this provision has been amended to 25 miles, but even that puts New Westminster within the area. Naturally, I am interested enough in wanting this shipping from the Vancouver area, if it is possible to get it, and to see that the 25-mile limit is cut down to 10 or 5 miles so that New Westminster harbour will not come within their jurisdiction.

It is necessary, I believe, for every one of us to check some of these things a little more closely. It is only natural for the members who are on the government side to support their minister. If the Conservatives formed the government and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra were in the minister's position, he would expect support from his members. I can, therefore, excuse the Liberals for going out of their way to do so in a wholehearted manner today. Unfortunately, I was not able to be present at every meeting of the committee this time, but in checking the evidence I did not notice that any one of the amendments adopted had been proposed in the first instance by any member of the committee.

I should like a clarification of this particular question, as to whether or not New Westminster harbour comes within the 25 mile limit established as the jurisdiction of the board under the act.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): There is very little that I can add, Mr. Chairman, to what has already been said by the minister this morning in outlining the reasons the proposed amendment should be supported. As I have said on many occasions in the committee, the explanatory notes to this bill clearly set out the reason for the new definition of owner. I shall quote again from those explanatory notes:

The prime purpose is to enable the board charges made under other provisions of the act to be imposed directly upon carriers and bailees of goods as contrasted with the actual owners thereof; in many instances the carriers or the bailees are the only persons with whom the board has any direct dealings.

A secondary purpose is also given in the explanatory notes. This secondary purpose is to eliminate the necessity for use elsewhere in the act of cumbersome phrases such as "agents, owners, masters or consignees, etc." of goods or vessels.

This morning the minister quoted the wording of the present section 16 of the act. To this I want to add, as I have already said on a number of occasions in the committee, that the wording that was quoted by the minister is exactly the same as we have had in our harbours statutes since 1913. I shall read a quotation that I gave in the committee from the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners Act, chapter 54, statutes of 1913, section 29 (2):

In a case coming within paragraph (c) or (d) of subsection 1 of this section—

Such paragraphs correspond exactly to paragraphs (c) and (d) of the existing section 16 (1) of the National Harbours Board Act.

—the vessel may be seized and detained until the injury so done has been repaired by the master or crew or by other persons interested, and until all damages thereby directly or indirectly caused to the corporation, (including the expense of following, searching for, discovering and seizing such vessel) have been paid to the corporation; and for the amount of all such injury, damages, expenses and costs, the corporation shall have a preferential lien upon the vessel and upon the proceeds thereof until security has been given to pay the amount of such damages, whether direct or indirect, and of such injury and costs as may be awarded in any suit resulting therefrom,—

And this is the important part of the section.

—and the owner, charterer, master or agent of such vessel shall also be liable to the corporation for all such injury and damages.

This language was repeated exactly in the National Harbours Board Act of 1936, and this wording still exists in the act now. The provision that I have just quoted from the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners Act of 1913, was repeated in the Saint John Harbour Commissioners Act, chapter 70 of the statutes of 1919, section 22 (2). The same wording was repeated in 1926 in the Chicoutimi Harbour Commissioners Act, chapter 6, section 17 (2), and again in the Halifax Harbour Commissioners Act, 1927, chapter 58, section 22 (2). I believe this makes it clear we are not seeking any additional powers by the introduction of this definition of owner in clause 1 of the bill.

I want to make a few remarks with regard—

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Chairman, when we rose at one o'clock I was explaining that no new power is being sought by the definition of "owner" in clause 1 of the bill. Let me say, speaking to the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, that if we take the word "agent" from the proposed definition of "owner", we will in fact be taking something away from the board. Because, as I said before, this power permitting the board to hold the agent responsible for the damages caused by the owner of the vessel existed since 1913 in our harbours legislation. I referred to some of the harbour commission acts passed since 1913, and pointed out that the same wording was repeated in 1936, when the National Harbours Board Act was passed by the House of Commons.

I would remind the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that when that act was passed in 1936 he was a member of the house; yet I have seen nothing in Hansard indicating that either he or any member of his party then opposed the present wording as it appears in section 16 of the act. I might add that the wording of that section was drafted before 1936, by a government which was of the same political faith as that of the hon. member.

If he refers to what was said in 1936 by the then leader of the opposition, he will find that the leader of the opposition of that day approved without any restriction whatsoever the proposed legislation creating the national harbours board as we know it today.

I do not see how any hon. member can argue that we want to make responsible for any action of the owner such agents as contractors and suppliers of fuel, or goods or any other kind of supplies that enter into the operation of a ship. It has been clearly demonstrated before the committee that the word "agent" means the legal agent of the ship, and not a contractor, a supplier of fuel or a supplier of food for that ship. I would remind the hon. member that the word "agent" is used in section 16 of the act, and has the same meaning in the proposed legislation as it has in that section.

May I refer also to the argument advanced this morning, that if this power is retained the port of Vancouver, and some other ports in Canada, might lose business. I would again point out that this power has been in existence since 1913, and was re-enacted in 1936 when the National Harbours Board Act was passed. It has not been shown that there has been any loss of business because of this section. If my hon. friend is afraid of competition from United States western ports such as Seattle and San Francisco I would remind him of the charges in respect of ships operating to and from those ports. An examination of those charges shows that, for a ship of 7,000 gross tons, the handling cost per ton of cargo at Vancouver is approximately $7.50 whereas at Seattle it is $10.24 and at San Francisco it is $9.36. So that this shows the hon. member need not fear competition from other west coast United States ports.

I should like now to deal briefly with what was said by the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for New Westminster regarding national harbours board constables who, from now on, if this legislation is passed, will become peace officers. As I explained in the debate on second reading, we wish to give to national harbours board constables a status equivalent to and comparable with that given railway constables under the Railway Act. And here I do not agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert when he says that railway constables are appointed by magistrates. They are not in fact appointed by magistrates; they are merely sworn in by magistrates. I think the hon. member used the expression "appointed" by magistrates.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would refer the parliamentary assistant to section 456 of the Railway Act.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That deals with the swearing in of constables.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I suggest that the parliamentary assistant is not correct in his view of section 456 which reads:

(1) A superior or county court judge, two justices of the peace, or a stipendiary or police magistrate, in any part of Canada, a clerk of the peace, clerk of the crown or judge of the sessions of the peace in the province of Quebec, within whose jurisdiction the railway runs, may, on the application of the company or any clerk or agent of the company, appoint any persons who are British subjects to act as constables on and along such railway.

I just mentioned that because I thought the parliamentary assistant had not read the section.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): My hon. friend must know that the actual appointment is made by the railway company. This morning in his remarks he mentioned that the Railway Act gave power to the board of transport commissioners to appoint constables, but that power is not given to the board; it is given to the railway companies.

I wish to remind the committee that we had a similar provision in the act respecting the harbour and river police of the province of Quebec. Section 3 of that act, which was repealed in 1936, reads:

The governor in council may, from time to time, establish, at the ports of Montreal and Quebec respectively, a harbour and river police force, and appoint one or more superintendents of such force, with jurisdiction over such part or parts of the province of Quebec as are defined by the governor in council.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who makes the appointment?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The governor in council.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the present bill it is not to be made by the governor in council; it is by the board.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): In answer to the last point made by the hon. member for Prince Albert I quote section 4 of the same act respecting the harbour and river police of the province of Quebec, which reads:

The minister may, from time to time, appoint harbour and river police constables under and within the jurisdiction of such superintendents of harbour and river police.

Subsection 2 of the same section reads:

Such constables shall be subject to all lawful directions of the superintendents, and shall have and be charged with all the powers, rights and responsibilities of police constables.

The hon. member for Prince Albert this morning objected to the jurisdiction being given to these harbour board constables. I wish to remind him that under present circumstances our constables are sworn in either as provincial constables or as municipal constables, and they have, as either provincial police constables or municipal police constables, wider powers than those they are to be given in the proposed legislation. In saying that and meeting the point made this morning by the hon. member for New Westminster, I pointed out that under this proposed legislation our constables will be allowed to act only if the offence or the act is related to the national harbours board's property, and it ends there. You can readily see, Mr. Chairman, that their powers under the new bill will be much more restricted than the powers that they now have when they are sworn in as provincial police constables or as municipal police constables.

As far as the territorial jurisdiction is concerned, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will recall, I am sure, that in the committee I mentioned on many occasions I had an open mind on the subject. I said however I wanted to warn the committee that on the one hand we were giving powers to those constables. I warned the committee to be careful not to take away by limiting their jurisdiction what we were giving them by making them peace officers. Here again I wish to remind hon. members of this committee that the offence must be committed in connection with some of the national harbours board's property. I wish also to make a correction of a statement which was attributed to me this morning by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra when he said that, before the committee, I had stated that we had had no trouble with the municipal authorities in Vancouver. Surely, I said that. I said it in answer to a question after I had stated that there was some reluctance on the part of some municipal authorities to the swearing in of harbour constables as constables of their municipalities. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra then asked me: "Have you had that trouble in Vancouver?" and I said: "No." But I said nothing which could be interpreted as meaning that there was no inconvenience in being required to have our constables sworn in as municipal police, either in Vancouver or anywhere else. I recall definitely repeating what I said in the house on second reading when I pointed out the difficulties, for example, in Montreal, and I said that in Montreal the national harbours board's property extended over a distance of some 25 miles and covered four different municipalities. I also recall having given the example of the harbour at Vancouver and having said that the board's property extended over three municipal districts, namely, that of Burnaby, that of Vancouver city and that of North Vancouver. I think those examples in themselves are sufficient to indicate to the committee that there are some inconveniences there, and they should be sufficient reason for supporting what is contemplated by the proposed bill, that is to make our constables peace officers who will no longer be required to be sworn in in those various municipalities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The parliamentary assistant has, I submit, not answered the objection that I raised to this unusual section, namely, section 4A, which would give an administrative board the power to appoint police officers.

The Chairman: Order. I will not stop the hon. member for Prince Albert. I was just wondering, if he intends to devote himself particularly to clause 3, whether we might not make better progress if we deferred the discussion until that clause is reached. I have already allowed a certain amount of discussion on that subject, and I would not stop him, and whatever would suit the convenience of the committee would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I believe the House of Commons today establishes a record for the longest session that has ever taken place, and I would be the last to add to that record; but the agreement was that there should be a general discussion at the beginning, which after all will clarify the issues. I do ask you, sir, to give consideration to a reply to the matters raised by the parliamentary assistant. He said that—

Mr. Winch: Would the hon. member address the microphones; we all want to hear him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He said that there were two examples. One was of appointment by the governor general, and that, of course, is not applicable at all to the objection I raised that the administrative boards should not have the power to appoint enforcement officers. The second example was that the minister, under an act now repealed, did have the power to appoint temporary constables.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I beg the hon. member's pardon, but they are not temporary constables.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister had the power to appoint special constables. Neither of those examples answers the contention I advanced this morning that this is the first time in the history of the Canadian parliament that parliament has been asked to give power to an administrative board to appoint enforcement officers. This is a step that I view with fear and alarm. The administrative officials on a board should not have the power to appoint enforcement officers, and the reason my hon. friend has been able to give no example of this having been done before is this: it would mean the opening of the door to political considerations in the enforcement of the law. That is the danger.

If a board has the power to appoint police officers it has the power to dismiss them, and police officers should have the assurance that whatever they may do, even though it may not be politically appropriate, is done without fear of dismissal. That is why police officers throughout the years have been kept free from the control of any administrative board.

My hon. friend, referring to the Railway Act, said that all that the judges and other named officials had was the power to swear in the police officers. That is not correct. I do not want to reread the section, but section 456 says in part:

A superior or county court judge,—

And other officials named herein.

—may, on the application of the company or any clerk or agent of the company, appoint any persons who are British subjects to act as constables on and along such railway.

Then subsection 2 states:

Every person so appointed shall take an oath or make a solemn declaration, which may be administered by any judge or other official, authorized to make the appointment or to administer oaths—

And then follows the oath. Then section 457 says:

(1) Every constable so appointed, who has taken such oath or made such declaration, may act as a constable for the preservation of the peace, and for the security of persons and property against unlawful acts.

(a) on such railway, and on any of the works belonging thereto;

And also:

(c) in all places not more than a quarter of a mile distant from such railway.

Then it goes on to say, under section 459:

(1) A superior or county court judge or a stipendiary or police magistrate, in any part of Canada, or a judge of the sessions of the peace in the province of Quebec, may dismiss any such constable who is acting within his jurisdiction.

(2) The company, or any clerk or agent of the company, may also dismiss any such constable who is acting on such railway.

(3) Upon every such dismissal, all powers protection and privileges, which belonged to any such person by reason of such appointment, wholly cease.

I have not heard any explanation from the parliamentary assistant as to why parliament should advance the extra step and empower a board to appoint its own police officers. It has not been done before. A short-cut may appear advantageous temporarily; it may afford the board the opportunity to appoint a few individuals who otherwise would not be appointed; but in the interest of the preservation of the rights of the individual, and the maintenance of the inviolability of the police officers appointed, it is a dangerous course to follow.

Why not follow the procedure set out in the Railway Act? It is not a difficult one. All that has to be done is for the representative of the board to go before a superior or county court judge in, we will say, for example, Vancouver and ask for the appointment of constables. That will ensure that there will be no suggestion that the board in choosing its enforcement officers would make that person answerable for his failure to carry out the orders of the board, that we may preserve the security and, I might almost say, the sacred function of police officers. Otherwise the independence that we expect in police officers will be, either intentionally or unintentionally, subject to the control of the board appointing them. If the appointment is made by the governor general in council, or by judges or lesser judicial officers, well and good. Why depart from what is regarded as one of the most sacred principles we have in our jurisprudence, namely, that a police officer shall not be under the control of the body whose work he enforces. In that way we will be assured that not only must justice be done but that what is being done will appear to be just?

It is just as important that, in what is done, right and justice shall prevail, as it is that one shall have reason to point to the possibility or likelihood of any bias interfering with the performance of the duties resting on police officers.

To empower a board to appoint its police officers is a tremendous power, and no explanation has been given as to why there should be such a pronounced departure from the course that for the past 250 years, under British jurisprudence and in Canada since the foundation of our country, has been accepted as the proper one.

The section in its present form opens the door to a condition under which police officers, in carrying out their duties and responsibilities, could be dependent on the whim of the board which appointed them. The right to appoint implies the right to dismiss. All of us have heard of influences which have been brought to bear on police officers. It is to their honour that they have kept themselves above such influences.

Why then should police officers, charged with so important a duty as the maintenance of justice and law in our harbours, find themselves in a position where those that appoint them have the right to dismiss them? I submit with utmost seriousness that we should continue the system introduced under the Railway Act, which has not been proven to be slow in operation. It has proven to be effective. Peace officers should continue to be appointed by the public authority charged with the administration of justice rather than by administrative boards.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this morning, when I made some comments in connection with the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I indicated that I did not think there was any vital change with respect to this act, save in one respect, namely the matter which my hon. friend has raised. I should like to consider the statement he has made with respect to clause 3 and to consider particularly the citation in respect of the Railway Act. I wonder whether it would not meet with the wishes of the committee if we could proceed subject to clause 3 standing. If we could proceed with the discussion of the bill and if we are successful in passing all clauses save that one, perhaps from now until then it will be possible to give some consideration to that clause; and if not, then tomorrow I am sure we shall have something to report which might meet the wishes of the committee. I am sure it is not the intention of the national harbours board or of the government to take powers which are unusual, if the committee feels that they are. With that understanding—

Mr. Green: Might I point out to the minister that there is also a serious objection to clause 3 in that the jurisdiction is given over an area of 25 miles in every direction from the borders of the harbours board property. We have a most decided objection to that clause.

Mr. Chevrier: May I say this. I think the whole clause should stand. We will look at the whole clause and not at only a portion of it—

Mr. Green: We would want to be sure that the minister is also considering that feature of clause 3.

Mr. Chevrier: The answer is yes.

The Chairman: Is that procedure agreeable to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on clause 1?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this morning I moved that the definition of "owner" should be amended to strike out "agent". We do not believe that the vessel's agent should be subjected to the same restrictions and penalties as is the vessel's owner. We are not the only ones to take that stand. Before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines counsel for the Shipping Federation of Canada and for the Vancouver chamber of shipping protested strongly against the provision of this bill which makes the agent stand in the shoes of the owner in so far as liability is concerned. Since the committee finished its sittings I have had a wire from the Vancouver chamber of shipping in which they state as follows:

> Vancouver Chamber of Shipping vigorously protests the wording of section two one EA particularly in regard to the inclusion of agent in the definition of owner as defined here and elsewhere.

If this bill is carried in its present form throughout the new sections and throughout what remains of the former bill the word "owner" will include "agent". There is no justification whatever in law or in equity for an agent of these vessels to be liable for damage done to harbours board property by the vessel. The agent has nothing whatever to do with the operation of the vessel. Yet this bill will make it possible for the government to collect the whole of such damage from the agent and to let the ship and the ship owner go free.

Both the minister and the parliamentary assistant have tried to answer my submission with the statement that the bill does not make any change whatever in the law. I propose just to review what the law has been, what it is at the present time, and what it will be if this new bill becomes law. In the first place, let us go to the powers given to harbour commissions which do not come under the National Harbours Board Act. I am beginning to think that a harbour that does not come under the National Harbours Board Act is lucky. I have here the statute setting up the New Westminster harbour commission. It is chapter 158 of the statutes of 1913. I would point out that New Westminster is a port with which the port of Vancouver is in direct competition. Here is the only power given to the New Westminster harbour commission. It is contained in section 24, which reads as follows:

The corporation may, in the following cases, seize and detain any vessel at any place within the limits of the province of British Columbia:—

(a) whenever any sum is due in respect of a vessel for rates or for commutation of rates, and is unpaid;

(b) whenever the master, owner or person in charge of the vessel has infringed any provision of this act, or any by-law in force under this act, and has thereby rendered himself liable to a penalty.

In other words, that statute gives to the New Westminster harbour commission power to seize and detain a vessel, but there is no power to make a claim against the agent for damage that is done.

Then we come to the National Harbours Board Act as it stands at the present time. The section I am going to quote was the same as that in the act which set up the Vancouver harbour commission. The section in the act is section 16, which reads in this way:

The board—

That is the national harbours board.

—may, in the manner hereinafter set forth, seize and detain any vessel within the limits of the territorial waters of Canada in the following cases:—

Mind you, Mr. Chairman, this power of seizing and detaining a vessel is just about the most drastic power that can be exercised under our law.

—(a) whenever any sum is due in respect of the vessel for rates or tolls or for commuted rates or tolls and is unpaid;

(b) whenever the master, owner or person in charge of the vessel has violated or has failed to observe any provision of this act, or any by-law in force under this act, and has rendered himself liable to any penalty;—

That is the second ground on which the harbours board can seize.

—(c) whenever any injury has been done by the vessel or by the fault or neglect of the crew, while acting as the crew or under order of their superior officers, to any works or property under the administration, management and control of the board; or

(d) whenever any obstruction whatever has been offered or made to the operations of the board by any vessel or by the fault or neglect of the crew, while acting as the crew or under order of their superior officers.

We have those four provisions under which a vessel can be seized or detained. Then subsection 2 goes on to provide as follows:

In a case coming within paragraphs (c) or (d) of subsection (1) . . .

That is, in only two of those four cases does subsection 2 apply, Then subsection 2 goes on to give a lien, to provide for selling and so on. Then at the end of that subsection we find the portion which both the minister and the parliamentary assistant quoted this morning:

. . . the board has a preferential lien upon the vessel and upon the proceeds thereof until payment has been made or adequate security has been given for such damages, whether direct or indirect, and for the amount of all such injury, damages, expenses and costs as may be awarded in any suit resulting therefrom,—

Then we find these words:

—and the owner, charterer, master or agent of such vessel is also liable to the board for all such injury, damages, expenses and costs.

That provision only applies in the event of seizure under two of the four provisions for seizure. Furthermore, it obviously means that the board must first seize the ship, and that of course was the argument made by counsel for the Shipping Federation of Canada. In actual practice that is what has been done. I understand there has never been a case in which a claim has been brought against an agent. Why would there be? The board has the right to seize the vessel. Not only does it have the right to seize the vessel, but if we turn to section 15 of the National Harbours Board Act we find a provision that the customs official cannot let the vessel go out of the harbour until she has received a clearance from the national harbours board. Subsection 3 of that section reads as follows:

No officer of customs shall grant a clearance to any vessel to leave,

(a) any harbour under the jurisdiction of the board until the master thereof produces to such officer of customs a certificate from an authorized officer of the board certifying that the rates or tolls on such vessel have been paid or that none are payable thereon or that in so far as the board is concerned a clearance may be granted—

In other words, no ship can leave the port of Vancouver until she produces to the customs officials a clearance from the national harbours board. Therefore it is impossible for a ship to get away if the national harbours board is not asleep. The subsection continues:

(b) any other harbour or port in Canada—

That means any harbour that is not one of the seven national harbours.

—if he has been notified by the board to withhold such clearance until further notified by the board that in so far as the board is concerned a clearance may be granted.

It is no wonder that the provision about suing the agent has been a dead letter and that no action has ever been taken under it. No action should be taken either because the agent is in no way responsible for the operation of the vessel. Then we come to the bill. The minister and his parliamentary assistant both say that the new bill does not give the board any wider powers, that it will have the same powers as it has had all along. If we turn to clause 8 of the bill, which contains a complete new section 16 for the National Harbours Board Act, we find in subsection 7 the following overriding provision:

Whether or not all or any of the rights of the board under this section are exercised by the board, the board may, in any case described in subsection (1)—

I point out that there is an extension in itself. Subsection 1 contains six different provisions under which the board can seize a vessel, two of which are brand new and were not in the act before. But now the board is taking the power to claim against the agent in respect of the first two provisions, something they cannot do under the act as it stands at the present time. I continue:

—proceed against the owner of the vessel in any port of competent jurisdiction for the amount owing to the board, or for the balance thereof in the event of any sale contemplated by subsection (3), and may also exercise against the owner of the vessel any other right or remedy available to the board at law.

In that new subsection there is no suggestion at all that first recourse shall be had to the vessel. The board is taking the power to sue the agent right at the start. The board can let the vessel go out of the harbour and then sue the agent for any damage that is done by the vessel. It is no wonder that the shipping agents of Canada are upset about the provision. They cannot get insurance to cover damages of that kind, they cannot in fairness be asked to demand a bond from their shipping company, and in effect they are being put in a corner and made subject to a liability for which an agent should never be made liable.

I do repeat that the legislation should be restricted to the owner, the charterer by demise who has taken over the whole vessel, and the master. They are the people who can properly be made responsible for damage done by the vessel, but there is no right whatever to make the agent liable for that damage. I have here the brief which was submitted and I want to read the paragraph which points out that these agents are not agents in the accepted sense in ordinary business on shore. It reads as follows:

Section 1, subsection 1(e) (ea) which defines the owner as including the agent and charterer does not otherwise define what is meant by the words "agent" or "charterer" except as to the qualification that it is intended to mean the agent or charterer of the vessel. It is interesting to note as regards the agent, for instance, that the words used are not "the agent of the owner", but "the agent of the vessel"; therefore it is quite clear that reference is had to what is known in common parlance as "vessels' agents" or as "husbanding agents". Vessels' agents or husbanding agents are not in any sense of the word the representatives of the owners of the vessel. They are simply co-ordinators of services and will, for a modest fee, provide certain services to vessels coming into a port to load and discharge cargo. They will act as agents de liaison between the master of the vessel and the stevedores who will load and discharge the vessel, the ship chandlers who will replenish her stores, the coal or oil merchant who will fill her bunkers, the shipping master who will sign off or sign on her crew, the customs officer who will grant a certificate of clearance, the tug owner who will provide towing services in and out of berth, the pilotage authority who will provide the pilot to take the vessel out to sea.

Agents who do work of that kind should not be made liable for damage by the vessel to the harbours board property. Yet with the new subsection 7 of section 16 these agents will be primarily liable for all such damage. It is to remedy that difficulty that I have moved that the word "agent" be deleted from the definition of "owner". The harbours board will still have the complete right to seize and detain the vessel and to prevent the customs people giving clearance. It still has complete rights against the owner, the charterer by demise and the master; but why drag the poor agent into this liability?

Mr. Winch: I should like to say a few words on this clause. Hon. members know that I am not a lawyer, but after listening to the discussion on clause 1, which I think started about 11.30 this morning, I have come to a conclusion which I should like to submit indirectly, shall I say, as a question to the minister and his parliamentary assistant. It is quite obvious that learned counsel who are members of the house do not agree on the meaning, interpretation or potentialities of clause 1 which contains the definition of "owner". It was quite obvious before the standing committee which examined the bill that there was no common ground between learned counsel of the harbours board and learned counsel representing the ship operators of Canada. There was no common ground between learned counsel before the committee and is not now on the floor of the house with respect to the interpretation, meaning or potentialities. I cannot remember counsel for the shipping federation raising any objections in the standing committee to the act as it has stood since 1936 with respect to the definition of "owner". His objection was to the dangers that his clients saw in the amending section. I cannot remember any objection being raised to the act as it has operated since 1936 by the official representative of the federation before the committee.

This afternoon we have heard the parliamentary assistant say that there is absolutely no extension of power in this amendment, that the harbours board has always had this power since the inception of the act. As I said, I am not a lawyer. I am just trying to apply a little common sense. If we cannot get the lawyers to agree on the interpretation or potential meaning of the provision, if there were no objections raised before the committee of this house by the representative of the shipping federation concerning the existing act, and if we have a statement by the parliamentary assistant that there is no extension of power, then why do we not let this subsection go and leave the act as it was, since it seems to have satisfied everybody. Then we could get on with the following clauses of the bill.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Winch: May I ask that consideration be given my suggestion?

Mr. Chevrier: I shall be glad to give consideration and reply to my hon. friend immediately. When the government introduces legislation, it is responsible for that legislation. When there is disagreement in the house, in a committee or elsewhere, the government has a legal adviser. In this instance, the legal adviser happens to be the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice has looked at this clause and has approved of it. Not only has the department examined and approved of it, but the legislative committee has approved of it.

There would be no purpose in adopting the suggestion made by my hon. friend, because then we would never make any headway with legislation. We have to take responsibility for legislation we introduce. We may be mistaken, but the advice the Department of Justice has given is that this clause is one which does not extend the powers beyond the original interpretation. I do not want to add more than that—

Mr. Winch: Then why insist on it?

Mr. Chevrier: —to the explanation the parliamentary assistant has given. We believe it clarifies the act, and we believe it makes for better phraseology in the act.

Mr. Winch: It is the greatest clarification by confusion that I have heard of in a long time.

Mr. Chevrier: There are lots of things my hon. friend has not heard of.

Mr. Hosking: I had no intention of taking part in this debate. This bill has been introduced by the government because of changing conditions. Everyone knows there is more shipping in our harbours today, owned by foreign capital or controlled by a foreign country, than there was previously. In order to bring our laws up to date, certain changes have to be made, and the government has introduced a measure to make those changes. Everyone who was a member of the committee clearly understood that, and being one of the members of that committee I had no intention of speaking about it until the member for Saint John-Albert suggested that the government members on the committee were not interested in complaining about the bill.

Naturally, we are not interested in complaining about the bill. Why should we be? Our Minister of Transport has introduced a bill to protect the taxpayers' money, and there was no one in the opposition who suggested that by this bill the board could collect money that did not belong to the taxpayers of this country. If any owner, agent or master was in control of a ship that damaged the harbour, certainly someone should pay. We as members supporting the government are anxious to see that the taxpayers' money, the money of the people whom we represent and the people who charged us with the responsibility of taking care of their assets, should be protected. Naturally, we agree. It is for that reason we have had very little to say, and certainly nothing to say that would be uncomplimentary to the bill when it was in committee.

When a new member stands up and suggests—I would not use the words suggested to me, in his ignorance—that we were uninterested, I would disagree. By our silence we have agreed with the policy adopted by the government to take care of the money the taxpayers have put up to build these harbours. We are here to see that the persons who cause damage to these installations make restitution. When we hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra suggest that if a company does not pay the charges on a cargo for one trip, and comes back into the harbour again, the government should not be in a position to collect the charges at that time—

Mr. Green: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I was not talking about vessels then, I was talking about goods.

Mr. Hosking: I am making the same point with regard to goods. If the company has not paid the charges for handling those goods, there is only one place the responsibility rests and that is with the company that had their goods handled. If at any time the ship of that company enters the harbour, they should be made to pay so the taxpayers of this country do not have to stand the loss. I never heard of anything so ridiculous as to suggest that a company, doing business over our harbours, which escapes out of the harbour without paying its bills, should be allowed to come back into the harbour again and transact business, and that the harbours board should not have the right then to collect the just dues for the services rendered. It is the same principle as that mentioned by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, that the taxpayers of this country have no right to collect what belongs to them. It is for these reasons I have entered this debate.

Mr. Bell: I should like to say that my whole contention is not directed towards restricting the harbours board in their efficient administration. The effect of it is simply to say that we will not have ships in our harbours to worry about if this legislation goes through in its present form.

Mr. Hosking: Canada is a growing country and we would still have plenty of ships here; do not worry about that.

Mr. Green: There is one point raised by the hon. member for Wellington South. He said that these changes were to meet new conditions. He is the only one who has that idea. Certainly, that idea was not put forward by anybody representing the harbours board or the department. There are no changed conditions to be met by the bill. There were foreign ships in our ports before the war. In fact, there was nothing else. We did not have any Canadian merchant ships left, and we are not going to have any left in another few weeks or so. The situation is just as it was before the war.

Would the minister give consideration to changing the word "agent" in clause 1 where it appears in paragraph (ea) to something like, "the legal representative of the owner." I do not think anybody would quarrel with a definition of that kind. The difficulty with the use of the word "agent" is that it means the bill picks up all these shipping agents. It would be better if the minister could get away from that and use the term "legal representative of the owner." Then, you would no longer catch the man who is the agent of the vessel, and that is the unfair feature of this provision. The man who is just the agent may be made liable for damages running into hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. Chevrier: In answer to what my friend says, I could not accept that suggestion because my officers tell me it would lead to a worse situation.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 42; nays, 69.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Green: There was an amendment moved to clause 1 in committee that of adding the words "by demise" after the word "charterer". I do not know whether the committee had the authority to make that amendment, without having it moved also in the house.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 as amended carry?

Mr. Green: I would like to have an answer to that.

Mr. Winch: I am not certain of the procedure. We have only the existing bill before us; we do not have the bill as amended by the committee. What sections are we passing? Are we passing the sections in the bill, or the sections as amended in the committee?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I agree that the committee approved of adding the words "by demise" after the word "charterer". We were of the opinion that we were not adding anything by saying "charterer by demise" instead of "charterer." I repeat that we are prepared to accept that amendment.

Mr. Winch: May I ask you a question, Mr. Chairman: Are we passing the sections in the bill now before us, as introduced from the Senate, or are we passing the sections as reported and amended by the committee?

The Chairman: I have before me the bill as reported from the committee, and containing the amendments. For instance, in subparagraph (ea) I have before me the amending words "by demise" after the word "charterer"; so that we are now dealing with the clause as amended by the committee. Shall clause 1 carry as amended?

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Chairman: By leave, shall clause 3 stand?

Clause 3 stands.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Use of harbours and facilities.

Mr. Green: May we have an explanation as to why it should be necessary to include in lines 30 to 34 the provision that the board can contract itself out of civil liability? Why should not the board be responsible for civil liability, just as any other firm would be?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): This was explained when I spoke on second reading the other day, and it was also explained in committee. We are not adding anything through this amendment, we are just clarifying the existing position. I explained in the debate on second reading and in committee that the bylaws are merely the reflection of the conditions of the national harbours board's contracts with the users of its property. As in the case of a private owner, those contracts may have conditions dealing with the liability of the owner, and restricting that liability. We claim we have had this right ever since the act was passed in 1936. This proposed amendment is only to clarify the situation. As I said, it adds no power to the board.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

On clause 8—Seizure of vessels.

Mr. Green: Will the minister or the parliamentary assistant explain why the words "in the opinion of the board" have been added? This is the section which enables the board to seize vessels. As I have already pointed out today, that is a very drastic right. Hitherto the act contained no such words. The board was given power to seize only if certain conditions existed. Now the board is asking to be put in a position where, if in its opinion certain conditions exist, it can seize.

I see no reason why a governmental body should have that privilege. Surely they should have to stand behind their own actions. If a certain thing has been done, then let them seize; but what earthly right have they first of all to form an opinion that someone has done something and, on the basis of such opinion, to seize a vessel which may mean a loss of thousands of dollars. It seems to be an example of bureaucracy running wild. I can see no reason at all why the words "in the opinion of the board" should be included in the section.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand that from the legal position it makes no difference whether the words "in the opinion of the board" are there or not. So far as my officers are concerned, they do not insist. If it will please hon. members, I would have no objection to taking those words out, so that we may proceed with the bill. My colleague will move that the words "in the opinion of the board" as they appear in line 26 of section 16 be stricken out. Then perhaps we can get on with the section.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be delighted so to move, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Green: Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another objection to this clause, paragraph (d). In the committee changes were made to (b) and (c) which had the effect of taking away the direct responsibility of the owner and placing it on the vessel itself. But here in (d) we still have the word "owner" which, of course, includes the agent. Paragraph (d) is as follows:

> The board may, as provided in section 18, seize any vessel within the territorial waters of Canada in any case where . . .
> (d) the owner of the vessel has in respect of the vessel committed an offence under this act or the by-laws, punishable upon summary conviction by a penalty payable under section 21 to the board.

The fact about that paragraph which should be noted is that it gives the board the right to seize a vessel before there has been any proof of breach of the bylaws. It can be seized before there has been any proof that the bylaws have been broken.

The maximum fine for breaking a bylaw is $500, so that the board is trying to get in the position where it can seize and detain a vessel although there may or may not be a breach of the bylaw for which the total penalty would be only $500. Because the agent is covered by the definition of owner, the board can also seize the vessel where it is thought that the agent has broken a bylaw, let alone the owner having broken a bylaw or the vessel having broken it. There is a provision in paragraph (f) for seizure where there has been a conviction for breaking a bylaw. That surely should be enough if a bylaw has actually been broken and it has been proved to be broken. Then, I suppose one could not quarrel so much with the power of seizure. Surely there should not be the power of seizure of a vessel where there may or may not have been a breach of a bylaw and the maximum penalty is only $500.

I move:

> That clause 8 of Bill No. 421 be amended by deleting clause 16 (1) (d).

Mr. Winch: Before the motion is put, would you read the amendment to that clause, Mr. Chairman, which was made in committee? I think a change was made to meet that objection.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand that changes were made in paragraphs (b) and (c). The parliamentary assistant tells me that he was not prepared to accept the changes in committee for reasons which he gave there.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, may I ask you, for information, to read from the amended bill, which you have and we have not, subparagraph (d), as you have it?

The Deputy Chairman: Subparagraph (d) as reported to this committee from the railways, canals and telegraph lines committee reads:

> the owner of the vessel has in respect of the vessel committed an offence under this act or the bylaws, punishable upon summary conviction by a penalty payable under section 21 to the board;

Mr. Winch: I think I am correct in saying that the objection raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is taken care of by the amendment made in committee. You understand, Mr. Chairman, we are under a a grave difficulty here. We have not the amended bill before us. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra had forgotten that we did move and pass an amendment in committee.

Mr. Green: No; as a matter of fact, when I read the paragraph just now I read it as though it contained the words "in respect of the vessel." I read those words in. The bad feature is that this paragraph enables the board to seize the vessel before there has been any conviction for a breach of a bylaw. They may seize it after there has been a breach of a bylaw and it is proved that there has been a breach under paragraph (f); and I am not quarrelling with that right: but paragraph (d) gives the right to seize the vessel before it has been proved that there has been any breach of the bylaw. In view of the fact that the maximum fine can be only $500, the board should be prepared to drop this drastic right of seizure in respect of a small thing like that. We do not want to have our ships tied up and perhaps held for days when the most that can be done to them at the finish is to fine them $500. In the meantime they have lost perhaps $50,000 or $75,000 because they have been tied up. The power to seize under those conditions might very well be dropped.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): In reply may I point out to the hon. member that this power exists now under subparagraph 1 (b) of the existing section 16. I quote the opening paragraph of section 16 (1) (b), as follows:

> The board may, in the manner hereinafter set forth, seize and detain any vessel within the limits of the territorial waters of Canada in the following cases:
> (b) whenever the master, owner or person in charge of the vessel has violated or has failed to observe any provision of this act, or any bylaw in force under this act, and has rendered himself liable to any penalty;

Mr. Green: Under the act as it stands at present there is power to seize where there has been a conviction for breaking a bylaw. I submit that the paragraph—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Would you mind repeating that?

Mr. Green: —the paragraph the parliamentary assistant has just read means that the board may seize where a person has been convicted but that is specially covered by the new subparagraph (f) which was not in the old act. Now you have the two provisions. The board can seize when the man has been convicted for breaking a bylaw and can seize when they think he should be convicted. I do not think it is right that the vessel should be seized before there has been any conviction.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The words I have just quoted clearly indicate that this power to seize the vessel before the conviction is obtained exists now. I shall let the wording that I have quoted speak for itself.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Board to have a general lien.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Subclause 1 (1) reads:

> The board has a general lien in preference to all other rights, interests, claims and demands whatsoever upon all goods in its possession for the payment of any debt owing to the board by the person in whom title to such goods is vested, whether or not the debt was incurred in respect of those goods.

I am just asking for information. I read the section over and I wondered what the situation would be under the following circumstances. A shipping company has an agent, A. The tolls, and whatever the expenses of the harbours board are, are not paid. Six months later another shipping company has the same agent, and that agent has goods on the harbour premises. Are those goods of the other shipping company liable for a debt previously incurred for which there was no liability except under the lien?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I think the answer to that, Mr. Chairman, is contained in the wording itself. I wish to refer the committee to subparagraph (c) which reads as follows—I beg the committee's pardon; it is clause 17 (1):

> The board has a general lien in preference to all other rights, interests, claims and demands whatsoever upon all goods in its possession for the payment of any debt owing to the board by the person in whom title to such goods is vested, whether or not the debt was incurred in respect of those goods.

This answers quite fully the point made by the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; I simply asked the question under the circumstances I outlined.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The answer is no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is much simpler than using so many words.

Mr. Green: In line 22 of clause 9 we find the same words, "in the opinion of the board". There it is just as objectionable as it was in clause 8. I suggest these words should be deleted.

Mr. Chevrier: In the other case we were adding the words "in the opinion of the board"; whereas in this case they are already there. There is no change.

Mr. Green: Where does that appear in the clause?

Mr. Chevrier: The words are not underlined.

Mr. Green: Why is the board any more entitled to have this thought control in respect to goods than in respect to the vessels? If they have not the right to detain those goods then they should not be allowed to get away with it here by adding the words "in the opinion of the board". That suggestion is just as objectionable in this case as it was in the other.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I was in error earlier when I made the interjection which I did. I think perhaps there is no difference between this case and the former one, and I would ask my colleague the Minister of National Revenue to move that the words "in the opinion of the board" in lines 21 and 22 of clause 9 of the bill be stricken out.

Mr. McCann: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 10 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

The Chairman: Is it the desire of the committee to revert to clause 3?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Chairman. The minister agreed to give this clause consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, my understanding was that we were to report progress on this now so that during the course of the evening we might give consideration to clause 3.

Mr. Green: The committee on veterans affairs is sitting this evening.

Mr. Chevrier: We will try to meet my hon. friend on anything that is reasonable.

The Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the minister has agreed to allow this to stand over until tomorrow.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Green.]

BANKING AND COMMERCE

NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) leave to revert to the presenting of reports?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina) presented the ninth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.

MOTOR VEHICLE TRANSPORT

PROVISION FOR REGULATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL AND INTERNATIONAL HIGHWAY TRANSPORT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) leave to revert to the introduction of bills?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 474, respecting extra-provincial motor vehicle transport.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an explanatory statement to the house on introducing this bill. The judgment of the privy council in the Winner case decided that the federal parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over interprovincial and international transportation undertakings. This jurisdiction extends not only to undertakings engaged in transport of goods or passengers between provinces, or between a province and another country, but also covers traffic movements within the province which are carried on as a part of an interprovincial or international undertaking.

Although such undertakings are subject to certain provincial laws of application, it appears that only parliament can legislate with respect to such matters as the granting of licences and the fixing of rates. It follows that federal legislation is required before control can be exercised by the province.

The purpose of this bill, therefore, is to enable provincial administrations to exercise control within each province over interprovincial and international highway transport undertaking. This would place the provinces in much the same position as before the decision of the courts in the Winner case. The act would come into force in a province by proclamation as and when that province is ready to operate under its terms.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. J. J. McCann (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 447, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this bill is the result of the resolution which has been passed and I would like to make a few general comments on it. Hon. members will recall from the budget that the tax reductions this year which, I ventured to say at the time, you could put in your eye, are practically all contained in the Excise Tax Act. I shall not take up the time of the house at any length in dealing with this but I think we should remind ourselves of one or two things which, although they have been said again and again, require to be repeated.

We should remind ourselves of the extent of the hidden taxes which pyramid and which hurt the individual and which also put up the costs of all those who are manufacturing. We should remind ourselves that these high taxes have now produced a vicious circle so that we are finding it harder to sell abroad. We should remind ourselves that unemployment marches on and that the government has had very little to say about how it is to be dealt with.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) suggested that businessmen sharpen their pencils and figure out how they can reduce costs, but it would have been much more practical if some of the taxes could have been reduced. At the same time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), as reported at page 2106 of Hansard, rather blithely suggested this was the year to loosen up the purse strings, in other words it was not a year for economy. As a result of those and other things we now find disturbing signs, and we have had them for some time, in the textile industry. We have also seen them in the electrical manufacturing industry, and now we have disturbing news from the motorcar industry of substantial layoffs on the part of some of the larger manufacturers.

As the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) pointed out in his speech, the minister seemed to be interested only in two or three-wheeled vehicles and to have nothing whatever to offer as regards four-wheeled vehicles. In other words, no reduction was made in the huge tax on motorcars and we can, I think, very easily attribute the present layoffs, which are disturbing, and which perhaps will be more disturbing, to the fact that there has been no reduction on motorcars. Prices are high and therefore we have distress cropping up in the motor industry as well as in the textile and electrical appliances industries.

When we come more to the details of this bill it is hard to see why some of the articles were selected at all. In fact, it seems as though the minister was in a very light-hearted mood when he made the selection. We have firearms, golf clubs, fishing reels, cameras, ash trays, tires, and tubes. Tires and tubes are more practical and more important. However, it almost looks as though the minister had been in rather a light-hearted mood, or perhaps had thought that, as there was such a small reduction anyway, it did not matter much where it was put, and that one place would be as good as another.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to take up more of the time of the house. We now have this bill implementing what was set out in the budget resolutions. The matter was debated at that time. I shall not now take up more of the time of the house.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has just pointed out, this is one of the bills that implement the budget proposals made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on April 6. We feel that this bill points up the fact that the minister took the taxes off in the wrong places. This bill specifically indicates that on a certain number of luxury goods there is to be a reduction in taxes but that, as for the general sales tax across the board, which should have been reduced, no effort was made by the government to make any reduction in that direction. We therefore look upon this measure as another one of those bills that reduce the taxes in the wrong places, without cutting taxes that should have been reduced.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr Speaker, I do not wish to prolong the discussion but inasmuch as I did not have an opportunity of saying anything with regard to the budget, I want to say a few words with respect to this bill.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has stated that the unemployment situation is serious. Today an announcement was made by the wheat board to the effect that the sales price of wheat had been reduced by some ten cents a bushel, a fact which indicates a serious situation in the marketing of the products of this country and one that deserves the serious attention of the house, late though it is in the session. The hon. member for Greenwood referred to the unemployment situation as being somewhat intensified in recent days in the automobile industry, and the hon. member who just took his seat stated that the reductions which were made in taxation this year were reductions on those things that did not seriously affect the economy of the people. There still remain the hidden taxes on the needs of the home, including furniture, clothing, boots and shoes and the like. The reductions on those things on which they were made represent but little saving for the average man or woman in this country.

In the last few days particular attention has been given to the automobile industry. In view of the fall-away in the purchase of and the demand for automobiles and the fact that the tremendous taxes levied on automobiles have been responsible for the reduction in that demand, I suggest that consideration should be given, even at this late date, to bringing in legislation which would reduce the excise and other taxes that are levied on automobiles today, in order to meet the threatening and rising unemployment situation.

One does not want to go back to 1929; one does not want to recall those days; but, in considering the events of today, one cannot lose sight of the fact that during 1929 unemployment was touching industries similar to those which are affected today. In 1929 we had a tremendous bumper crop of wheat, as we had in 1928. No action was taken then when action should have been taken. Even as late as February, 1930, in the speech from the throne of that year, the governor general had words placed in his mouth to the effect that Canada was in an exceptionally fine position, for no part of the 1929 wheat crop had been sold. Today we are in the same position as far as the 1953 crop is concerned. I feel that even now, in these late days of the session, serious consideration should be given by the government to doing something to meet not only the agricultural situation but generally the threatening and rising unemployment problem which must be met and which can only be met now in advance of a possibly more serious situation developing in the future.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word with regard to this bill. Under it no relief, or practically none, is given to the Canadian manufacturer of watches and clocks. The excise tax has been reduced by only 5 per cent, leaving a 10 per cent excise on watches and clocks except those for use of railway men and the blind. This leaves a 10 per cent excise tax; and on top of that we have the 10 per cent sales tax. These taxes result in a tremendous handicap to the Canadian manufacturer. On top of that, watch parts and watches are allowed into this country under an extremely low duty—what you might call a dumping duty—which does not give the Canadian manufacturer or the Canadian worker a chance to compete. I personally feel—as I know do those in the business—that this excise tax on clocks and watches certainly should be taken off altogether. Clocks and watches are not luxury items; they are a necessity. A worker has to have a clock in order to know when to get up to go to work, so that he may work all during the day and the week. At the end of the week he gets his pay cheque but his taxes are deducted. I do not think you should charge that man twice; and that is what is being done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Application to Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I should probably make a short statement about the bill. This bill, of course, implements the budget resolutions that have been before the house. At the same time that the act is being amended the opportunity is being taken, as is customary, to propose amendments to certain administrative sections so as to keep the act up to date with changing conditions in Canadian business or within the administration. Of the 15 clauses in the bill, 8 are the result of budgetary resolutions, 5 are amendments to administrative sections of the act, and one is to restore a section accidentally deleted through an error in numbering. The remaining one is for establishing a date on which the various sections of the bill come into force.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—How return to be signed.

Mr. Macdonnell: This is stated to be a subsection which was inadvertently repealed by the amendments of 1952-53 and should be restored. Have any situations arisen in the interval which need to be cured in any way? Is there anything that needs to be done other than the mere restoration?

Mr. Benidickson: It is the mere restoration of the clause. Administratively we have not really run into serious trouble, but it was not intended that it should be deleted. This relates to the tax on insurance premiums section.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Calculation of sale price and duty paid value.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Will the parliamentary assistant explain exactly how this is going to work?

Mr. Benidickson: I gave an explanation of this at the resolution stage. I think my hon. friend probably remembers that. This is another item to implement the budget resolutions. It happened that late in 1953 the tariff board ruled in an appeal that an importer could segregate the packaging material from the contents for duty purposes. This had the effect of permitting the importer to import goods subject to excise tax and pay the excise tax on the goods only and not on the packaging material. This of course was an unfair advantage in relation to the Canadian manufacturer who paid on the total price.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—Drawback.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the parliamentary assistant say something about this clause?

Mr. Benidickson: This clause is one that reorganizes and simplifies the drawback section in the act and also adds to the list of goods subject to drawback. The drawback is extended to goods supplied as ships' stores, goods to be used for the reconstruction, equipment or repair of ships, and aircraft and telegraph cable ships under certain conditions. It is a clarifying clause, and I think it spells it out a little more clearly. In addition, it will remove the necessity of using the refund sections of the act for regular remissions that take place.

Mr. Macdonnell: I was out of my seat for a moment and I should like, by leave, to ask the parliamentary assistant to say a word about clause 7.

Mr. Benidickson: This just makes it clear that sales and excise taxes will not be paid on these particular tariff items. Tariff item 704 is the item which permits the free entry of personal and household effects bequeathed to Canadians from any British country. Item 708 is the tariff item which gives effect to an international agreement we have with our partners in NATO under which servicemen's goods are imported duty free, and this merely makes it clear that they are also free from sales and excise taxes.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like some explanation of clause 10.

The Chairman: I understood that the parliamentary assistant replied with respect to clause 10.

Mr. Macdonnell: Oh, yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 and 12 agreed to.

On clause 13—Time limited for prosecution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant the meaning of this section. I do so because if I read it correctly the clause, while on the face of it appearing to fix the period of limitation at three years for summary conviction matters, in addition provides that action can be taken alternatively within one year from the date on which evidence, sufficient in the opinion of the minister to justify a prosecution for the offence, came to his knowledge. That would seem to extend the period of prosecution almost synonymously with eternity. As I see it, if the crown were in the position at the end of three years that it had no action or in its opinion could not successfully take proceedings, it could extend the investigation indefinitely until such time as the minister signified by a simple certificate that within one year of a certain date sufficient evidence had been secured or was in process of being secured, and therefore action could now be taken.

I must say that is not what one would call a limitation section. If my interpretation is correct, and I am merely submitting it to the parliamentary assistant for his consideration, it is actually a delimitation section, with the period limited only to within one year from the date on which the minister signs a certificate that evidence has come to his knowledge which in his opinion is sufficient upon which to found a prosecution. I think the essence of our law, even for the most serious offences, is that there must be a limitation to the taking of proceedings at some time.

In the case of murder, for instance, as I recall it, the person must die within one year and one day of the wrongful acts. While I wish to see every assistance given to the department to punish fraud and wrongdoing, surely the books of prosecution should not be open indefinitely as they will be under this clause when proceedings will be conditional and upon the prerequisite that the minister signs a certificate that information has finally come to the department within one year of which prosecution can take place.

Mr. Benidickson: The only difference between this proposal and the present act is the extension from six months to one year for the minister to have the opportunity to get his auditors' reports and for the person involved to have the opportunity to answer the minister. It is found that auditors are somewhat behind these days and six months has not been sufficient. This is modelled on the Income Tax Act. There they have a five-year period instead of three years, but they also have the twelve-month period instead of six months, and it has been found that it is necessary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With deference to the hon. member, I point out that it is not quite as simple as that. The present section reads in part as follows:

> . . . but where false or fraudulent acts . . . are involved in any offence committed . . . the prosecution or suit may be commenced at any time within the said period of three years or within six months after the minister or the deputy minister of national revenue for customs and excise has knowledge or notice of such false or fraudulent acts . . .

Up to the present time the only reason for delimiting the period of action has been the fraud or fraudulent acts of the individual. I would have no objection to the period of one year provided it was limited to fraud and fraudulent acts.

Mr. Benidickson: That uniformity too, I believe, is modelled on the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That does not answer the situation at all. The hon. gentleman says the only change we have made is to extend the present six months' period following the three years to one year, but that is not the only change. The only reason for the three years not being the final period of limitation previously was in a case where there had been fraud or fraudulent acts. I can understand the arguments of my hon. friend that the auditors are far behind and that there should be an additional six months provided in order to meet the wrongdoing of fraudulent individuals. But surely where there has not been fraud the individual should not be placed in a position where, no matter how long after the alleged offence, he could find himself in a position where he is subject to a prosecution. That is not the principle of the law. The principle of law is that a period of limitation should ordinarily be provided.

The minister says that the earlier provision is in effect in the Income Tax Act, if I heard him correctly. Would he read the corresponding section of the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder whether we could have this clause stand and then we could look at the schedules while my assistant is checking the act.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

The Chairman: Is it agreed that this clause stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Schedule II agreed to.

On schedule III.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question or two concerning schedule III. I refer in particular to that portion of schedule III that appears on page 11 of the printed bill under the subheading "charitable, health, etc.". I take it that the only items which have been added to this list, which is a list of items exempt from the sales tax, are hearing aids and parts thereof, including batteries specifically designed for use with such hearing aids. We welcome the addition of these items to the list of goods exempt from the sales tax. Has any further consideration been given to the request for sales tax exemption to charitable organizations under this subheading? Are any other charitable or health items now under consideration for sales tax exemption?

Mr. Benidickson: As I explained at the resolution stage, these matters are subject to frequent representations, particularly just prior to the introduction of the budget. The committees that do review these matters did have representation in connection with the charitable institutions. There were some suggestions about widening this group of exempted articles, but in the view of the government this was as far as it should go at this budget.

On clause 13—Time limited for prosecution.

Mr. Benidickson: I have here the section to which I was making reference. It is section 136(4) of the Income Tax Act, in the section of the act dealing with procedure and evidence. Under the heading "Limitation of prosecution", it says:

> An information or complaint under the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to summary convictions, in respect of an offence under this act, may be laid or made on or before a day five years from the time when the matter of the information or complaint arose or within one year from the day on which evidence, sufficient in the opinion of the minister to justify a prosecution for the offence, came to his knowledge, and the minister's certificate as to the day on which such evidence came to his knowledge is conclusive evidence thereof.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time? Now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Abbott) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXCISE ACT

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 448, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Duties.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. Benidickson: I made on the resolution stage quite a full explanation of the proposal in this budget to change the method of taxing beer from a malt basis to a gallonage basis. My remarks appear at page 4835 of Hansard for May 18, 1954. Most of the changes in this act are consequent upon that change in the method of taxation.

Subsection 1 of section 1 of this bill proposes the removal from the act of marking provisions which it is felt would be better issued as regulations. This section 171 has been in the act for the last 15 or 20 years, but has been outdated by the change in the production methods of the modern breweries, as well as new methods of marketing and distribution by interlocking arrangements or reciprocal agreements. To meet these changes, it is desired to adopt labelling requirements similar to those which have been in effect for distilleries for some time and which have worked out very satisfactorily for comparable conditions.

Under section 176 of the act—which it will be seen is also being amended by section 3 of this bill—the governor in council is empowered to make such regulations as are necessary for the carrying into effect and the enforcement of the provisions of the act, and it is considered that this authority should be extended to provide for the prescribing of regulations for the marking of containers.

Mr. Macdonnell: Am I correct in understanding that the substance of this is that there be two methods of taxing, one by gallonage and the other by poundage, and that this is really designed to remove any discrimination by applying only one method?

Mr. Benidickson: The substance of the bill is that we adopt the gallonage method. It changes the schedules, establishing new methods for taxing on a basis of gallonage, rather than the system we have had hitherto of taxing on a poundage basis, on the malt.

Mr. Macdonnell: Then we can take it that this bill, which seems to have a rather large number of sections to achieve a simple purpose, is to make the necessary technical changes to give effect to what the parliamentary assistant has just said.

Mr. Benidickson: With the exception of the labelling regulation, that is correct.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Does the parliamentary assistant expect to get in more revenue in this way?

Mr. Benidickson: I explained at the resolution stage that the gallonage rate seems to be approximately the rate that was effective on the malt. I explained that when the original tax on a poundage basis was established the brewers were putting about two pounds of malt to a gallon of beer. We have found that under efficient manufacturing methods that has been becoming somewhat less. I believe it is down to roughly 1·8 pounds per gallon of beer. We think that the tax revenue will be about the same, with the exception I indicated that there would be an effective reduction in the rate on about 6 per cent of the beer that is brewed, which is manufactured from corn flakes and corn adjuncts. But the agricultural community felt that we were taxing them unfairly on the beer in relation to the product made from malt.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 468, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Schedule A amended.

Mr. Macdonnell: There is a tremendous amount of detail in this bill. Is the effect of it precisely to embody the schedules contained in the resolution, and to what extent if any is there a change?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, the only changes from the resolutions as passed by the committee of ways and means on May 31 would refer to items 146 and 147, which deal with the import duties on ale and beer. These new sections merely parallel the new gallonage taxing rates we have just discussed. The only changes in these items are those in italics. On the first page of the schedule my hon. friend will see two items, namely items 146 and 147, and he will note that, as indicated in italics the tax is being changed to 38 cents per gallon, consistent with the action we took under the Excise Act, to provide a tax on Canadian manufactured beer and ale of 38 cents a gallon.

Mr. Macdonnell: That was set out in the minister's speech?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. Apart from that, every item in schedule A is as it was passed in committee of ways and means the other evening.

Mr. Knowles: Including the amendments made in committee.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. The schedule has been amended in accordance with the resolutions that came finally from the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the parliamentary assistant referring to clause 1 or to the whole bill?

Mr. Benidickson: I am speaking about clause 1 at the moment. I propose to refer to clause 2 later.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, before clause 1 is carried let me say that when the resolution was before the committee I asked the parliamentary assistant whether consideration was being given to the removal of the tariff imposed on wagons. Although it was not possible for me to be here during the discussion, I did read what was said in the debate, and I did not find anything in connection with the suggestion I had made and which had been made for some years by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would say something about it today, because it would seem to me that we are not following out the policy laid down by a former minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, in 1944, wherein he declared it was the intention of the government to make duty-free all those implements and instruments used by farmers in the process of production. I pointed out the other day that wagons certainly are used by farmers in the process of producing food. Therefore, under Mr. Ilsley's policy, which doubtless was reflecting government policy, it should be included.

Mr. Knowles: They have had only 10 years. Are you not rushing them?

Mr. Low: Perhaps so; but it would be interesting to hear what the parliamentary assistant has to say.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Benidickson: I did refer to my hon. friend's speech when I spoke later in the day, as reported at page 5285 of Hansard. One point I made was that this year the submissions from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture came in rather late. It was agreed by both sides that in another year they would meet at some time earlier, prior to the budget. So far as this specific item is concerned, I assured the hon. member that that matter would be considered for another budget.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Idem.

Mr. Benidickson: There is an amendment to be moved to clause 2.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That clause 2 of Bill 468 be amended by inserting, immediately after "402e", the words "respecting wire of iron or steel".

Mr. Benidickson: I would like to explain that amendment. The amendment moved by the minister will correct the technical error in the drafting of clause 2. Owing to a typographical mistake, the tariff item that was originally to be No. 402c appears in chapter 60 of the Revised Statutes of 1952 as 402e. I understand that when the revised statutes were prepared there was a broken "c" and the printer thought it was an "e" and the result is we have two sections numbered 402e in the revised statutes. Then these words in the amendment are added so that the particular 402e we are changing is identified as the one "respecting wire of iron or steel." There are two, and therefore we indicate which one is being changed to be called 402c.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have one question. Obviously, I do not know the technical significance or the effect of this. Sometimes these minor wordings can be very important in a certain business. Has this change been brought to the attention of people who might be concerned, so that they have had a chance to make representations? Is that not a fair thing to suggest?

Mr. Benidickson: In this particular case, Mr. Chairman, it is only of technical significance. The committee will recall that we had a change in this item in 1952, the same year that we were passing the revised statutes. The "c" was broken. The printer thought it was an "e". The error was missed. There is no change in rates; it has no significance to anybody who does business under this item.

Mr. Gillis: Is this an amendment to clause 2?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: I want to say something on clause 3.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 3—Schedule B amended.

Mr. Gillis: I wanted to say a word or two on clause 3, with reference to schedule B, on the principle of the drawback, which is to be found on page 11 of the bill, item 1044. That item sets out that fire clay or fire brick imported into Canada for certain purposes is subject to a duty, but that duty is wiped out by permitting a 99 per cent drawback of the duty if the material is imported for those purposes. I consider that that drawback, even in those particular cases, retards and militates against the development of industry of that kind in Canada. I do not see very much sense in importing fire brick or fire clay from the United States and putting a tariff against it and then permitting a 99 per cent drawback on the material, which in effect nullifies the tariff. In my judgment that principle prevents the development of an industry of the type that we are dealing with.

I point out also that that same principle militates against the maintenance and the development of a coal industry in this country. Coal is facing a crisis, and this drawback on coal imported from the United States and used for metallurgical purposes is a principle that is preventing the expansion and maintenance of a coal industry in this country. For a great many years there has been a duty of 50 cents a ton on bituminous coal from the United States; but coal imported from the United States has a drawback of 99 per cent, which means that on all coal imported and used in Canada for metallurgical purposes the tariff is wiped out because of the drawback.

I disagree completely with that principle. If we are going to put on a tariff, then the tariff should be applied without the device that is now being used, as indicated by this part of the schedule B. There would be very little difficulty in developing a fire clay or a fire brick industry in this country. There is a substantial fire clay and fire brick industry in Canada at the present time, particularly in the maritime provinces. The device of a drawback or a refund of the tariff put on at the border, in my opinion, is a bad principle, and it injures the development and expansion of industry in this country, I do not care what industry it is. I know it has militated greatly against the best interests of the coal industry in this country, and I would suggest to the parliamentary assistant—I know he cannot do anything about it now—that this matter should be taken under the consideration of the Department of Finance with the end in view of arriving at some other arrangement that would not put in the stop-blocks that this device puts against the development of industry in Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the parliamentary assistant relate this section through to the schedule in the budget resolutions?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. In the budget resolutions it is item 3 on the last page of the ways and means resolutions, items 1044 and 1052.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does that mean that all the items we have here on the last page are the same as the items in the budget resolutions? There is no change. It is entirely tied into this last page?

Mr. Benidickson: That is right. The new schedule is entirely in accordance with item 3 of the ways and means resolutions.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 467, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to make one or two general observations, Mr. Speaker. The Income Tax Act has now invaded the lives of almost everybody and is a matter of great importance to them. It seems to me a great pity that a matter which is infinitely complicated in itself seems almost more complicated by what on the face of it looks like a multiplication of statutes.

We have the Income War Tax Act; we have the Income Tax Act and then we have The Income Tax Act. These last two are extraordinarily difficult to keep separate because sometimes the "the's" get spelled with small letters instead of capital letters. I suppose it is obvious to say it is desirable that legislation should be clear, simple, definite and unequivocal.

As I said a moment ago, the subject matter here is extraordinarily complicated. I would ask the minister whether it is not possible that even further efforts might be made to simplify the situation. Will it eventually work out so that these three will not be necessary? I understand there are certain temporary features which make it hard to deal with the situation at the moment, but it seems to me that at the present time it is a little like the antediluvian method of dealing with land titles when people had to carry the title deeds around with them in a box, otherwise they could not make a title to their property. After that we got registration deeds and that, of course, led eventually to the land title system wherein they adopted the method we now have of dealing with ships and applied it to land.

I am not going to belabour the point but I would just ask the minister whether there is any hope that we might work out a simpler method. I am quite sure he will agree that almost anyone whose affairs are in the least bit complicated must obtain outside assistance, although I admit the Department of National Revenue does a good deal to help. Nevertheless it is still true that anyone whose affairs are complicated must obtain legal advice and, as a matter of fact, there are actually only a minority of lawyers who have mastered the intricacies of the whole act. I suppose it would be a sad day for them if things became too simple, but I imagine that even after simplification there would be plenty of difficulties with which they can deal.

I know it is difficult but I would like to submit to the minister that the problem still remains of doing something to make this complicated situation seem less complicated and somewhat more clear than it is now.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since this is the last crack we will get at the Income Tax Act during this session I should like to say just a brief word. I submit once again my complaint that this bill amending the Income Tax Act does not include a provision to wipe out the 3 per cent floor under medical expenses allowed as deductible for income tax purposes. There is no case that is less necessary to make on the floor of this house both because the case is so clear in regard to what we ask, and because it has been made so often.

I regret the minister has not seen fit to meet our request in this connection at this session, but I hope he will do so at the next session, if he is still here. If he is not here, or if he has moved to some other type of employment, I hope his successor in the Department of Finance, whoever he may be, will make that change.

Just to make sure that the minister's successor is aware of the importance of this matter, I should like to give notice that I will again place a notice of motion calling for the deductibility of medical expenses right from the first dollar on the order paper at the beginning of the next session.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say a word or two at this time. First of all I would suggest that the Department of National Revenue—and I see the minister is now in the house—consider putting up a district tax office in the new federal building being erected at Peterborough. As things stand at present the citizens of Peterborough have to go many, many miles down to Belleville in order to have their accounts checked, and since that is a journey of about 75 miles it is very hard for them to do that. Peterborough has a population of over 45,000 and that population is increasing all the time. It is a tremendous district and there is a good deal of income tax paid there. For that reason I feel that something should be done for the people in that district. At the present time there is a temporary income tax office installed at the old customs house for about two months before April 30.

Mr. Speaker: Might I suggest to the hon. member that he discuss this matter when the estimates of the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Public Works, or the Department of Finance are before the house. I think he has made his point in a brief form at this moment and that ought to be sufficient in view of the fact that the principle of this bill is under discussion at this time.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did make my point and I hope something will be done about it. However, in connection with the Income Tax Act I would have liked to have seen some consideration given to those who have to purchase glasses, in view of the heavy expenditure they have to incur in that regard. In addition, no consideration has been given to the cost of ambulance service, and many people have to pay for ambulances or taxis every week in order to take them to hospital for treatment. I also think further consideration should have been given to the blind and the present earning level increased in that regard instead of being kept at its present level.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my subject deals with the question of taxation on savings for pension purposes. I raised the issue on the resolution stage when the minister was not present, though a brief reply was given to the point I endeavoured to make at that time. Since then I have taken the trouble to study with some care the answers given by the minister to some of the same problems last year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what we are being asked to do in this bill is to increase the exemption allowed to people who are employed in regard to the contribution which they make to approved pension funds. The exemptions covered in the act extend to $900 for employees' contribution, and $900 for the employer's contribution, which is a total contribution to the pension fund of $1,800. With respect to arrears, I understand in this case the employee, if he so wishes, can pay another $900 and the employer an additional $900 making a total of $1,800, or $3,600 in all which is the amount of earnings which will be exempt from tax in the case of an employed person.

As I understand the present bill, the $900 contribution in each case is increased to $1,500, which means that a total of $6,000 of the earnings of an employed person can be put aside into a pension fund and thus be exempt from tax. For a man to be able to save that much money, after paying living expenses and meeting other taxes, I estimate that his tax bracket would have to be in the neighbourhood of 47½ or 50 per cent, so that, in effect, in the case of an employed person the government is contributing half the money that that person saves and puts into a pension fund.

Now, I would like to say a few words about the views expressed by the minister last year, because I have not been convinced by what was said this year, nor by reading last year's debate, that the self-employed person is in any different position from that of the employed person. I hope the minister himself, who has always expressed some doubt or at least some concern on this point, will in time accept the argument that has been advanced by a good many people and which affects a great many people in this country.

The number of people who paid income tax in the self-employed class during the last full year for which tax statistics are available was 319,000; they are made up of primary producers, professional men, business proprietors and financial people. Those 319,000 taxpayers represent a fairly good cross-section of the industry of the country. I may say right now that the income tax they paid was $246 million in 1951. In other words, 320,000 people paid $246 million of income tax as against $543 million income tax paid by employees who are now entitled to the benefits of the tax-free saving which is allowed to those who contribute to pension funds. In other words, the amount of tax paid in the case of the self-employed was half as much as that paid by the employees. Yet the deductions which those self-employed people were allowed to make for their savings paid into pension funds was only 4 mills on the tax dollar paid by them. Four mills on the tax dollar was the total extent of the pension deduction made by that class of people. The employed, on the other hand, averaged 20 cents in pension deductions on every tax dollar paid by them. There is therefore a great disparity between the position of the two groups. Unless the minister and the government are thoroughly satisfied that that disparity is not unfair, I suggest that it is not too late even yet to find a means of dealing with this problem.

May I deal briefly with the points which the minister made last year. In the first place he said that this system of allowing deductions for the savings made by people during their earning years was a departure in principle from the general principle of the act, that new principle being that there is a tax postponement given on savings devoted to the purchase of retirement annuities. The adoption of this principle followed the Ives commission report which advocated a uniform system of taxing pension income when it is received as a pension and not when the money is put into the fund as a saving. That procedure has the effect of freeing from tax the income as it is earned and put into the fund but makes it taxable after retirement when that income is paid back to the pensioner in the form of his pension.

Obviously there is a great disparity in the rate of tax paid by a man who is at the height of his earning powers and is making his best salary in his middle years and the rate of tax which he will pay on a relatively small pension after he has retired. The consequence is that you are treating one class of people in one way and are treating another class of people in a different way. In other words, to ask the self-employed to pay a tax on their earnings when they are at the height of their earning capacity and then to be relatively free when that pension eventually becomes payable after they are retired and when their income is small is quite unfair, in my opinion.

The minister explained the advantage of this method. He said that it was a principle that was a departure in the first instance. But, the principle having been adopted, he found there was considerable mechanical difficulty in applying it further and going beyond the case of employed persons. As I understand the proposition, that argument simply comes down to the statement that the mechanics of tax convenience stand in the way of treating the self-employed person in the same way as the employed person is treated. I suggest to this honourable house that that is not an answer for what is obviously a disparity or a discrimination between the two groups.

The second point that was made is that the government is interested in seeing pension plans adopted in industry. However, it does not agree that because employees have tax postponement, therefore self-employed persons should likewise have it in respect of their voluntary savings. Mr. Speaker, if saving for a pension is good for a Canadian because he is employed and paid by another, why is not saving for a pension equally good for his neighbour who makes his own living? Why call the saving of one person voluntary and the saving of the other person involuntary or something different in kind?

The third point was that the self-employed can buy endowment policies or annuities and that he receives very reasonable tax treatment. I agree that that is the case. After he has paid his tax on his income, if he has any left with which to buy an annuity, he can buy an annuity on favourable terms as to tax. But that is not really the dispute at all in this case. The question is whether he should be allowed to buy his annuity before he has paid his tax.

The fourth point was that an employee's savings are locked up in an approved pension plan. That is quite true, although I suggest that it is no more true than it would be in the case of self-employed persons if the approved annuity plans in which they could invest were not subject to anticipation. As I see it, the minister's point is that when an employed person makes his contribution into the firm's pension fund he has no right to withdraw it during the course of his employment or, in fact, until he reaches a certain age. I believe there are a great many exceptions to that provision. I myself know of some in my own experience. I refer to those who leave employment after a period of time, even under these approved plans, and withdraw the capital from the fund. However, that is by the way. The point is that the savings of a self-employed person could equally well be tied up by annuity plans which could not be anticipated. I see no insuperable technical problem in that matter. I am sure that the insurance company annuities and the government annuities could be written in terms which would prevent anticipation of the fund, except in certain emergency cases which would be so minor as not to affect the principal.

The fifth point which the minister made was that if this benefit or principle or policy of encouraging savings for old age pensions were extended beyond employees, there would be no logical stopping point short of allowing this privilege to everybody, including employees not now covered by pension plans. To that argument I say "Quite so". There is and there should be no stopping point short of every person who is earning enough money to save some of it for a pension or annuity against the time when he will have to retire.

Those who are not working for firms which have had the initiative to instal pension plans are unable to get the benefit that accrues to their neighbours in an adjoining plant where there is an approved pension plan in effect. In two plants on the same street you will find that the employees are affected differently. The employee is not responsible for that condition. It is his employer who in the one case has not seen fit to instal a pension plan. As the law stands, the employee can do nothing about it. If the minister would accept my proposition and approve certain types of annuities which are the equivalent to pensions the employee whose firm did not see fit to have a plan could still make his savings, provide for his retirement and obtain his exemption just as the other employee does.

The sixth point made by the minister was that he did not know what volume of savings would be attracted. He thought that a substantial sum might be involved. I think that is so. The amount might be substantial, and I will come to the actual amount in a few minutes when I deal with the minister's next point which I give in his own words as follows:

> I am not sure that at this stage of Canada's development I would like to take the responsibility for directing the savings of the Canadian people away from equities into debt securities.

What that means is, as I understand it, that if the 320,000 self-employed who now pay taxes saved $240 on an average, basing the amount on the rate of savings of a member of parliament under the parliamentary pension fund, the amount of savings which would be tax exempt would be only $76 million. To say that the economy of Canada is going to be thrown off balance or that our capital investment program is going to be upset by an amount of $76 million, and that that it is a serious matter for the government seems to me to be illogical and unrealistic. I think the minister was probably reaching for arguments at that point to satisfy the department because obviously they do not wish to undertake to deal with the problem owing to the mechanical difficulties.

It seems to me that the argument that it would seriously affect the investment balance as between equity and debt securities is quite a long shot as an answer to this serious discrimination. Surely if the investment policy of the country is involved tax policy can act more directly to secure investment in equities as the minister has done with his very creditable arrangement for allowing deductions from tax with respect to dividends. Surely it could be done much more effectively that way than by making fish out of the self-employed and budget birds out of the employed.

Mr. Knowles: You mean fryers.

Mr. Michener: The minister's concern seems to be that those who are self-employed should be required to risk their capital in equity investment instead of saving it for their retirement but those who have security of employment with a firm paying their salaries are not subject to the same concern. What he says in effect is that these employed chaps had better be careful, that they had better save for their old age and the department will not now tax the money they are receiving in the pension fund which is going into gilt-edge securities. On the other hand, he says that the people who do not have the security of a steady job and who are working at their own risk had better risk their savings as well if they have any after paying income tax. He says that he thinks that they should not save anything that has not been fully taxed even if it goes into an approved form of annuity that is payable and taxable when the person is too old to work.

May I refer again to the figures as to the amounts and number of people involved. They are the best I could find. As I said before, there are about 320,000 self-employed who pay income tax. They are divided into a great many different categories. I shall not repeat the instances which I gave in my earlier remarks. I think perhaps one of the most cogent instances is the case of a nurse who is employed by a hospital working alongside a nurse who is working for a patient by the day.

Mr. Abbott: Would my hon. friend permit a question? What does he include in "self-employed"?

Mr. Michener: In "self-employed" I include all those—

Mr. Abbott: Farmers?

Mr. Michener: Yes, farmers, fishermen, all those who are working on their own and do not receive their income in the form of a wage or salary cheque. I take it that is the category in the taxation statistics. I have the very excellent book for the year 1951 and it gives these figures. Primary producers, which would include farmers and fishermen, had a taxable income of $117 million on which they paid a tax of $23 million. These statistics show how much of that total taxable income was allowed as a deduction by reason of being paid into a pension fund. In the case of that large group of producers whose taxable income was $117 million only $76,000 was allowed as a deduction from taxable income by reason of the amount being saved by some sort of a pension.

When we come to the professional group, which includes many hon. members in the house, taxable income amounted to $158 million, and the total amount which was allowed to be saved tax free was $227,000. In the case of business proprietors, small businessmen who were able to put aside something towards a pension, the amount of $314,000 was not taxed. I am not sure how they were able to save anything that was tax exempt. However, the taxation statistics for that year show that a total of $908,000 was actually allowed to self-employed persons as tax exempt by reason of it having been saved in some sort of pension scheme recognized by the income tax authorities. That is less than $1 million for 320,000 business people, a very good cross-section of the business community of the country.

I come to the amount of the exemption allowed to the employed simply because they were employed and not on any other basis of distinction. They earned and received the same kind of dollars, and the only principle of differentiation was that in the one case they were paid by an employer's cheque and in the other case the money was earned by some kind of trade or activity. The amount that was allowed by way of exemption to the employed in the same period was $95 million, which was 100 times as much as the amount allowed to the self-employed. That is out of all proportion, of course, to the numbers in these two representative groups. The number of employees was 2,444,000, which is perhaps eight times as many as the self-employed.

As I said before the principle involved appears to me to come down simply to one of the method of receiving one's remuneration for one's activity in the commercial life of the country. I do urge the minister to review this situation again, and I would be glad to suggest to him a very simple amendment to the act which would make it possible for the department to approve pension fund or annuity payments, which have the same features as approved pension plans now for industry. In this way a great number of people throughout the country who wish to provide for their old age, or for the time when they must retire, can do so on the same terms as those who are employed.

Income Tax Act

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Middlesex West): I should like to say a word while we are discussing the amendments to the Income Tax Act. There are two points that I should like to mention. One case concerns a father who is able to send a young boy or girl through school to enter a profession or to be a high school teacher. After the child reaches the age of 16 the deduction of $150 is no longer permitted from income tax and the family allowance payments are stopped. If the child is continuing in school, the parent is able to claim $400 per year deduction from income tax. I approve of that very strongly.

However, then we have the case of another boy or girl whose parents are not able to send them on to school in the manner of the first parent I mentioned. In this case the boy or girl struggles to get through school, then takes a six weeks' course at Toronto and spends one year as a teacher. Then, this young person may return to normal school and endeavour, by means of summer courses, to improve his situation until he eventually gets his B.A. and becomes a high school teacher. My feeling is that such a young man or young woman should be able to claim the tuition fees and the amount spent for books for these summer courses as a deduction from income tax.

My own feeling is that boy or girl is endeavouring to improve his or her situation and improve the standards of the profession which he or she decides upon. The income tax department will receive more in taxes because that boy or girl made that improvement, and consequently receives higher wages.

There is another class to which I shall refer, and with respect to whom I should like to see a clarification of the act. I refer to the young farm boy who stays on the farm. This young boy has completed perhaps two or three years of high school, and returns to the farm at 15 or 16 years of age. The family allowance payments are stopped and the father is not able to claim any reduction from his income tax because the boy no longer attends school. The father enters into an agreement with the boy, verbally I will admit, by means of which the boy agrees to stay on the farm without wages until such time as he is ready to be married when the father will supply him with a farm.

When the farm is passed over to the boy at the age of 26 or 27, the income tax department steps in and says, "You have received $10,000 in this year and you must pay income tax on the amount." Now, that is unfair to this young man. He has worked for some 10 or 12 years without wages in order that he may receive the farm, and to be taxed on that amount in one year is unfair. The boy would have no objection to having the amount spread over the period when he was working on the farm, and he is quite willing to pay income tax on that. It is unfair when he works all those years without wages and then when he receives the farm in lieu of wages to be faced with all that tax in one year. I should like the Minister of Finance to endeavour to clarify that in the interests of these young farm boys.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Insurance proceeds expended.

Mr. Macdonnell: I was hoping the minister might say something perhaps at this stage about the question of the intricacy of this legislation.

Mr. Abbott: I had planned to do that as soon as we got into committee. It is quite true that the Income Tax Act is complex. It always has been, and as a matter of fact it perhaps becomes a little more complex each year. The reason for that, as I have had occasion to say several times, is an endeavour to introduce various relief provisions into the act. It is found from experience that certain exemptions are desirable, certain special cases need to be taken care of, and provision is made in the law for them. You will find a number of examples of that in the bill which is now before the committee. A great many of these are rather minor in character, but they are of a relief nature. Some of them have been suggested by members of parliament, some by the bar association, some by accountants associations, and so on.

There are three acts referred to here, it is true. You have the principal act and that is the, with a small "t", Income Tax Act. The Income War Tax Act must continue in force as long as there are taxes to which it applies. The other is The, with a capital "T", Income Tax Act, and that is really a transitional measure that operated from the period 1949 to 1952. I repeat that the reason for the apparent complexity of this statute is a genuine desire to ensure that the charging provisions are as fairly and equitably applied as possible.

The simplest kind of income tax act would be just to put a flat rate or a progressive rate of tax on people's income, without any exemptions or deductions, but that would be manifestly unfair. The complexity is due almost entirely to the deductions, the exemptions, the relief provisions, the exceptions and so on. I should like to say that it will become simpler in future years but I just do not believe it will.

Mr. Macdonnell: I suppose there are also, in addition to the relief sections, the sections that work in the opposite direction.

Mr. Abbott: The ones to which I euphemistically refer as the loophole sections.

Mr. Nowlan: I wanted to say that one quite realizes the complexity of this act. I am sure we can also sympathize with the minister when he says it is very complex, although possibly we recognize the fact he is using a euphemistic expression when he states that all these amendments are for the relief of the poor taxpayer.

Mr. Abbott: Not all; I said the great majority.

Mr. Nowlan: I have glanced rather quickly over the bill, and I think that although the minister may say the great majority are minor and probably the great majority are for relief, yet there are about 50 amendments to the various clauses and subsections of these various acts. It does seem to me that a bill that is as complex as that should not be delayed until May 31 before receiving first reading and having the bill distributed to the members of this house. There are quite a few competent accountants in this house, and I would say we have some lawyers who have tried to earn a living by interpreting this and similar acts. I am quite sure if any one of them had taken this bill when it first came into the house and spent all the available time, except for meal hours, they would just about now have been able to arrive at some intelligent approximation of what all these sections mean. Because, when you read one clause you find that it says, perhaps, "save and except for subsection 2 of paragraph (w) of clause 4 of section 97"—and when you go there you find that you end up with everything except the Acts of the Apostles and the beatitudes—and anything else that can be thrown in, just for good measure.

The minister brings in his bill at this time. Of course we accept his statement, because he is always so frank with the house, and so good-natured. He just smiles and says, "This is all right". Sometimes I think he has been impressed by one of his parliamentary predecessors who at one time is supposed to have said, "Hold the legislation back until the hot weather comes along, and it will drive the boys home." Well, we have not had any hot weather, but time is getting on. I am simply saying that I do think a bill like this could have been brought in earlier in the session, so that those who have had some experience in dealing with these matters could have done something about it.

Some of us will be receiving briefs from tax foundations; we will be receiving protests about this section or that section. I do not think this is the best way of dealing with it. And when we complain about something next year we are told, "Oh well, it was before you and you did not deal with it." And we certainly did not, for the very simple reason that, frankly, we did not understand it, and did not have time to have an appreciation of it.

While I am on my feet let me say this, that the minister referred to the fact that we are maintaining the title of the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. Abbott: That is a special statute.

Mr. Nowlan: He said it is being done because of some of the old cases. When the minister replies later in the committee I would ask him to consider something which has just come to my attention. I have here a letter from a widow whose son worked for a short time in 1947, and who subsequently was drowned. He had served in the air force and had been badly wounded. She went through his papers this year, because she had dreaded the thought of looking at them before. Included among those papers she found a T-4 slip for $40. She took the matter up with the department and was told, "Our records do not go back to 1947; therefore we cannot deal with this deduction."

I submit that if you or I were in arrears in 1947 the department would very soon find some way of checking those records and dealing with the matter. Or, as the hon. member for Calgary North points out to me, we do know that in dealing with the farmers they go back to the early forties and even to the thirties. I admit that that is not connected with their records, but that it is a matter of investigation. Arbitrary action, such as I have described in the case of this widow, is hard for the taxpayers to believe. I say that the department at least should go into its files and see if it can find a duplicate of that T-4 slip. If there should be a deduction, then the widow is entitled to it, and she should not be told, "We do not keep records going back that far." Frankly, I do not believe it. I say it is an arbitrary statement which should not have been made and, personally, I think the position is worthy of more consideration.

Mr. Abbott: I wish to say first of all that there has been no intention of holding back the passage of this bill. It has been ready for some time, but there have been other matters engaging the attention of the house. No one would have been better pleased than the Minister of Finance if the budget resolutions could have been disposed of some weeks ago, and the bills introduced. But each measure must take its turn, and this one has been brought in as quickly as possible.

My hon. friend does himself less than justice when he says that he cannot understand the provisions of this measure. With some knowledge of his years as a member of the bar I am sure that a couple of hours of reading of this bill, with the explanatory notes, would have informed him fully on the subject.

Mr. Nowlan: That is flattering.

Mr. Knowles: He might do better if he did not read the explanatory notes.

Mr. Macdonnell: I can assure the minister that whatever may be true of my colleague who has just spoken, a couple of hours was not enough for me. And now that my colleague has raised this point I would like to underline it to the best of my ability, because after all this bill has complications of its own, and it is more difficult by far to understand than any other legislation.

Mr. Abbott: That is true in every jurisdiction.

Mr. Macdonnell: I would like to have taken more time, but the leader of the house has been fair in dealing with us. And when it was put up to us that he wanted to have the legislation completed—and I do not know if he will accomplish it by Wednesday night—we felt we had to co-operate. But what my colleague from Digby-Annapolis-Kings has said about trying to do justice to this bill over a week end is as true as it can be.

I do appeal to the minister and to the leader of the house to let us have this very complicated measure a good deal earlier, because one does face the real danger of having someone say to him, "Well, you were pretty stupid; you did not understand what you were doing when you passed that bill." And it is not pleasant to listen to that kind of criticism.

Mr. Harkness: I take it that clause 1 is not one of the relieving sections to which the minister has referred.

Mr. Abbott: It clarifies the existing section.

Mr. Harkness: This one does not relieve; it makes it possible to collect more income tax, so far as I can see.

Mr. Abbott: Oh no.

Mr. Harkness: Let us say that a farmer has one of his barns burned down, and uses the proceeds of the insurance to repair his barn within a year's time. My understanding is that that is looked upon as income—and I am referring to the money he received from the insurance company.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: But as an expense he can charge off the cost of repairs.

Mr. Harkness: And he is charged income tax on it.

Mr. Abbott: No; it is a complete offset.

Mr. Harkness: I notice that the paragraph says:

...within a reasonable time after the damage, on repairing the damage.

What does that mean? What is a reasonable time? If a farmer builds an implement shed three years later, is he going to be assessed on the cost of that because it came out of the insurance money he received three years before?

Mr. Abbott: When the proceeds of fire insurance are received they must be treated as a "disposition" of assets, and they are deducted from the asset account. If they are used in their entirety to replace the building, then there is a complete offset. Let us say that $5,000 insurance money was received. That amount is taken into income account. The $5,000 expended for repairing the building is an expense, so that there is no income tax payable. One amount offsets the other. But if the $5,000 is received and only $3,000 is spent, there will be a recapture to the extent of $2,000.

With due respect to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, this section is merely putting in clear form what has been the recognized and existing practice in the department.

Mr. Harkness: What is the "reasonable time" to which reference is made in clause 1(1)(ii)?

Mr. Abbott: Well, that would depend upon the extent of the repairs. If they are extensive it would be spread over a considerable period of time. On the other hand, if the repairs are minor they would have to be done within a shorter time. What is a "reasonable time" is a question of fact.

Mr. Harkness: It is evident that the time must be more than a year because subparagraph (i) contains the expression "within the year" whereas subparagraph (ii) contains the expression "within a reasonable time after the damage". So that it is some time after a year. Does it mean any indefinite number of years?

Mr. Abbott: It might run over one fiscal period into the next, depending on the loss.

Mr. Macdonnell: What is the principle behind this? In one way it looks as if the minister is taxing capital gains. Is it because of the concession in respect of the premiums?

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend has put his finger on it. The premiums are allowed as an expense.

Mr. Macdonnell: But not able to relate the amounts involved.

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Monteith: I have a question for the minister. Suppose a policy for $5,000, for argument's sake, becomes payable in one year. At the end of the year $2,500 has been spent on repairs, and the other $2,500 is to be spent in the following year. Does the $2,500 excess insurance become taxable income in the first year and the other $2,500 expenses in the second year or do both years work together?

Mr. Abbott: I am advised they would be matched up. That is where reasonable time comes in. In the example which my hon. friend gave $2,500 would be matched up against repairs in the first fiscal period and the next $2,500 would be matched up to the extent of repairs of $2,500 in that period. It would be carried over.

Mr. Monteith: The excess $2,500 would be allowed as a reserve and not taxable at the end of the first year?

Mr. Abbott: That would be the practical effect of it, yes.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Compound interest.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, spread through clause 2 of the bill are a number of subclauses that deal with the question of the amount allowed as deductible with respect to payments into a pension fund. I gather that the figure of $900 is being raised to $1,500 in respect of the amount that an employee pays in, and also in respect of the matching amount that an employer might pay in; I gather also that the amount that one may pay or that an employer can pay in respect of service prior to the time when one became a contributor is being increased to the same figure of $1,500 per year. As the minister probably knows, when we were on the resolution dealing with this matter we put a question to the parliamentary assistant several times, which naturally he was not in a position to answer because of his position as a parliamentary assistant. I wonder whether the minister can come through now and tell us who asked for this change?

Mr. Abbott: We had a great many representations on this. I cannot recall offhand who in particular asked for it, but it is an amendment which has my complete support. I believe in a steeply progressive income tax, and I support the principle that a deduction may be made in the case of approved pension plans of the contributions made by the employer and the employee. The figure of $900 was established some years ago prior to what we all recognize as being a very substantial rise in the general level of prices. If $900 was fair 5 years or 10 years ago, then a somewhat higher figure is fair today. Let me say this at once. I believe that we should be as fair to people of moderate or high income as we are to people of low income. The basis of our Income Tax Act is, as I say, a steeply progressive tax where your high bracket income taxpayer pays a very substantial portion of his income back in the form of taxes, and I support that. But I see no reason why one should not be equally fair in a tax provision to that class of taxpayer as any other.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I remember when the $900 figure was written into the statute, and as I recall I made no objection to it at the time. But it did seem to me it was a pretty generous provision to make, bearing in mind the amount of pension that one can buy if he is in a position to pay $900 into a fund, and if that $900 can be matched by $900 from the employer. Everyone knows the provisions of the pension plan to which members of parliament contribute. We are paying in only $240 a year, and if we are here long enough it is possible, on the basis of that amount per year, plus the money which is put in by the government and the interest put into the fund, for a member of parliament to obtain a pension of $3,000 a year.

When you start to talk about contributions of $900 a year, matched by another $900, you can readily see, without bothering to go into the kind of figures I gave earlier, that you are talking about a much higher pension. My point is that the $900 ceiling was higher than it needed to be in 1946. It may be that we should have objected to it then so that we would not have this argument thrown at us now. But that being the case, I certainly do not think it is necessary to raise this ceiling to $1,500.

As the hon. member for St. Paul's has pointed out, it is possible in some instances for a total amount of $6,000 in the course of a year to be made income tax deductible in the case of one person. That would be $3,000 from the employee and $3,000 from the employer. The kind of employees I know best are not making enough that that kind of money could be deducted in the course of a year for pension purposes. But the point is, as the hon. member for St. Paul's pointed out, that anyone whose pension contributions are of that size is up in an income tax bracket where there is quite a substantial saving because of the percentage that applies to his top increment of income. It does seem to me that this is going a little too high, bearing in mind, as I say, the fact that $900 is being changed to $1,500 in four places.

I think there are some flaws which the minister might point out in the argument put forward by the hon. member for St. Paul's. But generally I agree with the position the hon. member took that we should be extending this provision on a horizontal basis, taking in more people, rather than extending it on a vertical basis as the minister is doing in this provision of this bill. I still wish he could be more specific as to who asked for this change.

Mr. Nicholson: Before the clause carries I want to support what my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, has said. This is a provision that is pretty difficult for us to justify with a serious face. We were trying to get some information from the parliamentary assistant as to how much this was going to cost taxpayers. The parliamentary assistant was not able to answer that question. While the total probably is not large, it is going to give assistance to people who are in very high income brackets and who in my opinion do not need assistance. I wonder whether the minister can now give us some estimate as to how much this proposed change is going to cost the treasury of the country.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed it is really almost impossible to give an accurate estimate of what this will cost. It would not be substantial, of course, because my hon. friend is quite right. There is a relatively small number of people who would be benefited by the amendment. It is only the people who have the somewhat larger incomes, and therefore would be able to pay in the larger amount. But, as I say, I can see no difference in principle between giving that kind of man fair treatment and giving it to the larger mass who have not that size of an income.

Mr. Knowles: It is a question of what is fair. We think this goes too far.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend may argue that it was not fair in the first place. But, as he himself said, he did not protest it at that time.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Michener: I have not any quarrel with the clause in so far as it deals with employees except, as has been said, it seems to be giving relief upwards instead of horizontally, as I have argued for. This would be the appropriate place for an amendment, Mr. Chairman. I am saying simply as to that that there is not a very difficult technical problem involved in making the change which I have suggested. If the minister would accept the idea, it might be dealt with in general terms and left for regulation because it seems to me it is largely a mechanical problem in the department to determine proportionately what sort of savings a small businessman or a man who is self-employed, professional and other groups that I call self-employed, should be allowed to make which would be equivalent to an approved pension fund that their fellows in the employed class are making. I appreciate there is probably an administrative problem there, but it does not seem to me at all insuperable and I do urge that the effort be made.

I have an amendment here, Mr. Chairman, which I am not going to move now but I would submit it for the consideration of the minister. If the minister has made up his mind that this is something which cannot be dealt with now I certainly would not wish to urge it upon him for immediate decision because I know that there are difficulties involved. My suggested amendment deals with subsection 5 of section 2 of the bill. It amends sections in the act which now deal with employees. The addition which I suggest would deal with the taxpayer generally and the whole section would read:

"The following amounts may be deducted in computing the income tax of a taxpayer for the taxation year.

(i) The amount contributed by a taxpayer under an approved superannuation fund or plan . . .

(iii) Not exceeding $3,000 paid in the year by a self-employed taxpayer for or on account of the purchase for himself of an approved retirement annuity or pension as defined by the regulations."

If that phraseology were not broad enough it might be extended to include superannuation fund or plan, or approved annuity or pension plan, and then would follow the suggested third paragraph set out above.

The $3,000 I suggest as being a comparable figure because an employed person has a possibility of saving $3,000 which will not be taxed. The $1,500 of salary he receives and the $1,500 the employer contributes are all part of the man's salary because no employer would contribute to a pension fund an amount which his employee is not earning.

I am aware this would not solve the problem entirely but it leaves it open if the minister is so disposed to tackle it and it would perhaps assist him in working out a solution.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, this is a problem with which, as some hon. members know, I have been struggling for seven or eight years, and it is not really as simple as my hon. friend from St. Paul's would perhaps like us to think. There are mechanical difficulties, it is true, as he has pointed out, but for me that has not been the main problem.

The main problem has been how to assure fairness for all taxpayers in the country in connection with this sort of thing. We all have different ideas as to how we should make provision for our later years. Some do it by buying annuities; some work for employers who have pension plans; some buy government bonds, some prefer to invest in equities; and some like to leave their money in the bank.

In principle it might be argued that every Canadian should be entitled, if you will, to have a deduction from his current earnings with respect to savings which he makes in order to provide for his old age. But, as I have pointed out on another occasion, and my hon. friend referred to it today, under certain kinds of savings he is free to use that money for the purchase of a new automobile tomorrow if he changes his mind, or use it to buy a house, or any one of a variety of things.

What the hon. member refers to as mechanical difficulties are mostly the difficulties inherent in working out a plan which would be fair to all Canadian taxpayers. It is not nearly so bad for the man who buys an annuity as is sometimes made out. When the annuity comes due he is taxed only on the interest contained in the annuity. In the case of the approved pension plan he is taxed on the full proceeds. One of the reasons why we made this higher than $900 was, in a sense, to eliminate double taxation.

I can honestly say that nothing would please me more than to be able to find a way of providing this kind of benefit for a self-employed person. I was myself a self-employed person and a practising lawyer, in the same manner as the hon. member for St. Paul's, and I have had representations from colleagues at the bar, from members of the medical profession and others to the effect that something of this sort ought to be done. But it is not quite so simple, and that is illustrated by the fact that even in the United States they have not been able to find a method of providing a pension deduction for the self-employed.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is there any taxation system where they have been able to do so?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know of any, Mr. Chairman. I understand there has been a royal commission set up in the United Kingdom to consider this point and I do not know whether their report is final, but so far as I am aware I know of no jurisdiction, with a modern income tax system such as ours, where they have been able to find a solution to this problem. I am sorry to say I have not been able to do better than my colleagues in some other countries, but we have not been able to work out a suitable plan.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister say a word on section 2, subsection (3c), at the top of page 3 of the bill?

Mr. Abbott: I think the explanatory note explains it pretty well, Mr. Chairman. This was brought to our attention in the first instance by, I think, the superintendent of the high schools for Ottawa. As the explanatory note points out, it enables teachers who leave their employment and relinquish their pension rights to come back in again and re-establish their pension position if they so desire.

Mr. Macdonnell: But that is still not very clear. The phrase I referred to reads "employed by Her Majesty". Does that refer to the public service? It does not seem at first blush to agree with the explanatory note.

Mr. Abbott: It is to take care of those employed by a province as well as others, that is to say, "a person whose taxable income for the year is exempt by virtue of section 62". I am informed that does not apply to Her Majesty, but it does apply to a municipality or school board. Some teachers are provincially employed. I am not an expert on school teachers or their problems and I had to consult with my technical staff to make sure we are giving the teachers the benefit we are trying to give them.

Mr. Pearkes: Does that apply to colleges?

Mr. Abbott: I would think it was quite broad enough to cover them.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am sorry but I am still not as clear as I would like to be and as, I am sure, the minister would like me to be. I still do not understand how Her Majesty comes to be featured in this.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that because some teachers are employed by the provinces and some by local school boards and municipalities that this refers to a person whose taxable income is exempt by virtue of section 62. I am learning all the time. I am told normal college teachers are usually provincial government employees.

Mr. Monteith: Would it apply to private school teachers?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Nowlan: What about a definition of teacher? It is obvious it would apply to a normal college, but suppose it were a provincial university, as for example the University of New Brunswick. Now, would the staff there, employed by Her Majesty, be considered teachers or professors?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that they would be covered by section 62 which is referred to here, if they were in an approved pension plan. There have to be the two requirements. They must be members of an approved pension plan and either be employed by Her Majesty or be employed by one of the bodies which are entitled to avail themselves of section 62.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions to ask on clause 2 but I see that it is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at six o'clock we were discussing clause 2. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I think we were discussing paragraph (3c) under subclause 6, I presume it is. I have a couple of other questions having to do with the treatment of teachers. The explanation is to the effect that the new paragraph (3c) relates to teachers who at one time were members of an approved pension plan but upon leaving that particular employment withdrew their contributions. I am wondering whether their contributions at the time they withdrew them were taxable in their hands under the act as it now stands.

Mr. Abbott: I would think so, yes. I would think the answer is in the affirmative.

Mr. Monteith: With respect to paragraph (3a) of subclause 6, would the minister explain that paragraph, or whatever he wants to call it, which has to do with a contract being entered into for receiving so much money on the promise to repay an increased amount.

Mr. Abbott: It is section (3a), subsection (b). Is that the section my hon. friend is asking about? What is the information he requires? The section seems reasonably clear. What point is he in doubt about?

Mr. Monteith: I am sorry, but it is not entirely clear to me. As I understand it, it has to do with the case where somebody borrows a certain amount of money and undertakes to pay back so much more.

Mr. Abbott: Where bonds are sold at discount, for instance. That is a fairly common practice.

Mr. Monteith: I understand that. I was applying it to another type of case where in certain deals the payment of a premium is promised. It is the same thing as selling bonds at discount, but the interest allowed is on the amount that is promised to be repaid. Is that it?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am still bothered about the clause at the top of page 3 of the bill which we were dealing with just before we recessed. I have two questions. The minister suggested that my difficulty with respect to whether this was limited to government employees was answered by the "or" after the words "Her Majesty" but I wonder whether that is really so unless the minister suggests that the use of the word "or" followed by "a person" etc., opens the thing up wide. My second question is this. I have not been able to find section 62, subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (i) of subsection 1. As I understand it, the act to which we are referred is chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. I have that here, and unless I have overlooked something that is not it. If you will look at section 62 you will find that paragraph (i) of subparagraph (ii) does not fit in with that. In other words, I am not able to find the words "while he was not a contributor" and I am not able to tie it in at all. I have also tried chapter 40 of the statutes of 1952-53, but it does not seem to fit in with that either.

Mr. Abbott: I will check that. Perhaps we might let that stand and I will have the reference checked. It is a question of whether or not the reference is accurate. The section relates to municipalities or school boards which are exempt the same as charitable organizations, but I will see that the cross-reference is checked.

Mrs. Fairclough: With reference to subclause 4 of clause 2, I understand that if, under the $900 maximum, the taxpayer had contributions in excess of the $900 he was permitted to carry forward the excess to become deductible in the following year. Is the carry-over provision to be permitted now that the maximum has been increased to $1,500?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, that still obtains.

Mr. Monteith: With respect to subclause 9, I wonder why the minister feels that meals should not be allowed as travelling expenses. Apparently it is still going to be permissible to charge your car expenses if you have to go out of town on business for a day but you cannot charge the cost of your meals unless you are out of town and away from your own area for more than twelve hours.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. A certain situation has developed whereby, for instance, delivery people, men who are delivering milk or other commodities of that sort, can avail themselves of the language of the section as it now stands and charge the cost of their lunch as an expense. That is not available to ordinary employees who are operating in the area in which they live. It is only intended that these expenses should be deductible as an expense from income if the employee is away from his normal place of business and is really in travel status.

Mr. Monteith: I can understand the minister's predicament in this respect.

Mr. Abbott: He is not in a predicament at all.

Mr. Monteith: I think he is just trying to straighten out an angle of the act.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Monteith: I can quite understand that, but I think that in turn it is only going to impose a very heavy penalty on certain other taxpayers. I can name many hundreds in certain classes who are now going to be penalized because of this provision. I quite see the point but I am wondering whether some other method of getting around it could not be arrived at.

Mr. Abbott: That is a matter of opinion. I think my hon. friend would agree that the man who has his lunch downtown should not be able to deduct the expense of that lunch from his income.

Mr. Monteith: I am not suggesting that. What I am suggesting is that if a man travels fifty miles from here for a day's work—

Mr. Abbott: He is in the clear. He can deduct his expenses. He has got to be away twelve hours.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Suppose he only goes fifteen miles, like a milkman?

Mr. Monteith: The way the explanation reads, if he is not away for more than twelve hours he cannot deduct.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Monteith: No matter how far he may travel.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Monteith: Then I claim this is imposing a hardship on that particular type of taxpayer.

Mr. Abbott: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think it is a matter of some substance. There must be a large number of such cases. Let us take a very simple one, a man who goes from Toronto to Oshawa, spends the day there and has his lunch. It seems to me just contrary to common sense to say that is not an expense that he has incurred. As a matter of fact you are inviting him—

Mr. Abbott: Why should he be better off than the man who comes downtown from his house in Rosedale to Bay street, and buys his lunch there in the middle of the day? Why should he be able to deduct the cost of his lunch when the stock salesman who comes down from Rosedale to Bay street and buys his lunch cannot do it?

Mrs. Fairclough: As the minister knows it has been the practice in offices that send employees out of town to do specific jobs to pay their expenses for the day. Does the minister mean that in the future those who are conducting professional activities should say to their employees, "Now, we will pay your train fare to Toronto or your plane fare to Ottawa, but when it comes to lunch you are on your own?"

Mr. Abbott: There is nothing to prevent the employer from paying for his employee's lunch.

Mrs. Fairclough: And charging it up as an expense of doing business?

Mr. Abbott: Precisely; the employee cannot deduct it.

Mrs. Fairclough: In other words, the employer may charge these expenses as part of the expense of doing business, but if a man is working on his own, he cannot do it?

Mr. Abbott: If he is working on his own account, and grossing up his income, of course he can. The basic principle is, as my hon. friend knows better than most members, salary and wages by definition are taxable income. There are no deductions allowed unless a salary or wage earner is in a travel status and is only away for the purpose of his employer's business. The employer may pay the employee's travelling expenses, including his, to use a colloquialism, eats and sleeps. This has been the practice under the Income Tax Act for years. This is a loophole section, which is designed to prevent people who, in fact, are at home every night and who are living at home just the same as the clerk I mentioned a moment ago, from deducting the cost of their lunches under the section as it now stands. It would be a manifest injustice to others who are not entitled to avail themselves of that privilege.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Could we go just one step farther? Take a man, say a milkman, who is selling on commission. He leaves in the morning around four or five o'clock and is not paid wages but is paid so much a quart on what he sells. In what position is that individual with respect to his meals?

Mr. Abbott: He cannot charge up his meals as an expense unless he is away for more than twelve hours.

Mrs. Fairclough: Do I understand, then, from the minister's explanation that this section does not apply to those whose remuneration is gleaned from fees or the like, but would only apply to those who are on straight salary or wages?

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend knows that the self-employed and professional man or woman can only deduct as expenses the expenses which are wholly and necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning the income. As a result, I cannot deduct the price of my lunch at Bowles restaurant if I am practising law and eat at Bowles restaurant in the middle of the day. If I were practising law, as I used to do, I could go home for lunch, but as it happens I was expected to have my lunch downtown. You cannot charge up, generally speaking, the expenses of your lunch downtown if you prefer to have it there instead of returning home.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Will the minister answer this? Take the case of the same milkman who cannot charge up his meals unless he is away for more than twelve hours. Suppose he has an employee with him and he pays this boy so much a day, I presume in addition to his meals. In what position is this man on commission with respect to that?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Abbott: It would apply to the boy too. He would have to pay for his own lunch out of his earnings after taxes, the same as you and I have to do. I have the answer to the hon. member for Greenwood now.

Mr. Knowles: That is what I was going to give the minister.

Mr. Abbott: The explanation, I am informed, is that there really should be a comma after section 62—oh, there is a comma. It is subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (i) of subsection 1, and that is subsection 1 of this section of the act.

Mr. Knowles: The reference is to section 11 of the act.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Monteith: I should like to know just what the application of that is again—subparagraph (ii)—

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps it could be shortly put this way. It applies to either Her Majesty, and that would be the provincial government, or the whole of section 62.

Mrs. Fairclough: Could I ask the minister, if he has not already answered it, what is the purpose of this subclause 10 on page 3 of the bill? At first glance it rather looks as though it merely sets out what has always been the general practice. What is the change, if any?

Mr. Abbott: I understand that this conforms to existing practice, but we have given depreciation to the owner of an automobile outside of section 20. Section 20 provides for recapture and this is really a supplement to cover the case of automobile depreciation. It has been taken from under section 20.

Mr. McIvor: I was asked this question and I was not able to give a good answer. Railroad men get their expenses when they are away on the road. Supposing a bush worker is living in the city and working in the bush and only gets home on week ends. Why does he not get his expenses?

Mr. Abbott: I suppose the answer is that that is a personal expense in going home to see his family on the week end.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister answered part of my original question, but he has not yet answered the other question. Is it clear that the teachers referred to are not confined to those in government employment?

Mr. Abbott: Precisely; I tried to make it clear that it is intended to cover teachers whether they are employed by school boards, municipalities or by provincial governments. I hope it is comprehensive. I am assured it is.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Idem.

Mr. Monteith: I should like to read this, if I may.

Mr. Abbott: This is just to correct a clerical error.

Mr. Monteith: Yes, I quite agree but it is just a matter of pointing out the appropriateness of the remarks made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings a few minutes ago. This clause reads:

> Where depreciable property of a taxpayer as defined for the purpose of section 20 has been disposed of under such circumstances that subsection (4) of section 20 is applicable to determine, for the purpose of paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 11, the capital cost of the property to the person by whom the property was acquired, subsections (2), (5) and (6) are not applicable in respect of the disposition.

Now, all I am trying to point out is that I realize the details are necessary to make all the references applicable, but I think it bears out what the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings said to the effect we should have had more time on the bill before it came before the committee to study these references.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5.

Mr. Macdonnell: Could the minister give us an illustration under clause 5?

Mr. Abbott: Well, Mr. Chairman, this is to take care of a case where, when the depreciation account is first set up the property is, let us say, a two-flat property entirely rented. In the course of time the owner decides to occupy one of the flats. Under the rule as it now stands one is obliged to revalue the whole property for depreciation purposes at the time the change in the character of occupation takes place. Now, this new rule will enable a revaluation to be made only of the part which has changed. It is perhaps a loophole section. It could work both ways. It could relieve the taxpayer, or it could prevent his getting any undue advantage.

Mrs. Fairclough: What is the effect of the change in paragraph (g)?

Mr. Abbott: Property which has been sold may include elements for fixed assets, good will, accounts receivable and the like. When those have been apportioned for the purposes of the seller, the same apportionment will apply with respect to the buyer.

Mrs. Fairclough: In cases where the various components of the sale are itemized and valued separately, I take it that—

Mr. Abbott: They would have to be, in any case, as my hon. friend knows.

Mrs. Fairclough: Sometimes in bulk sales they are not. In any event I am thinking of depreciable assets. I take it that the purchaser must set up in his books the assets so acquired at precisely the same amount as set up in the books of the vendor, is that correct?

Mr. Abbott: That is right, yes.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6.

Mr. Monteith: I notice that the change is made with respect to an iron lung. I think what I have to say would be in order, although I am not sure whether I would be out of order in discussing what I shall attempt to discuss. However if I am not in order I will abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman. This amendment comes under section 27 of the act and has to do with medical expenses. Section 27 (c) states that medical expenses may be deducted to—> —an amount equal to that portion of medical expenses in excess of 3 per cent of the taxpayer's income for the year paid either by the taxpayer or his legal representatives

> (i) within a period of 12 months ending in the year and not included in the calculation of a deduction for medical expenses under this act for a previous year, or
> (ii) in the event of the death of the taxpayer, within a period of 12 months commencing in the year and not included in the calculation of a deduction for medical expenses under this act for a previous year.

What I am getting at is this, that under paragraph (c) medical expenses paid within a 12 months' period ending in the taxation year may be deducted. That really in my estimation bonuses the person who does not pay his medical expenses when they are due. He can save up medical expenses for three years, and get a reduction of 3 per cent in that one year; whereas if he applied it in each year, as he should and paid when due, he would be getting the full deduction. In my estimation it is not equitable, and I think something should be done about it.

Mr. Abbott: This was changed some years ago. It was represented to me that people found great difficulty in paying heavy medical expenses within the year in which they were incurred.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Abbott: We amended the law to enable them to accumulate those expenses. We cannot have it both ways. My hon. friend may be right, but I do not think what we are doing is unfair. Fortunately these exceptional medical expenses are not incurred every year. They are exceptional; and under the philosophy, with which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre does not agree, the exemption permitted here is to provide for unusual medical expenses which hit a person and are really beyond what ordinarily would be expected in a normal year. It was as a result of widespread representations that we took out the old test of being incurred within the taxation period.

Mr. Monteith: The minister may be right. I shall not follow the point further.

An hon. Member: You had better not.

Mr. Monteith: Why not? Under section 27 (d) there is a deduction of $500 if the taxpayer——was totally blind at any time in the year or was, throughout the whole of the year, necessarily—

The Chairman: Order. I allowed the hon. member some leeway with respect to the other matter. However, I do not believe he should discuss paragraph (d).

Mr. Monteith: All right, Mr. Chairman. I was wondering, myself, whether I was in order.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—"Control period".

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister give us an illustration of the operation under clause 7.

Mr. Abbott: This, again, is a relieving clause. It relates to designated surplus, as my hon. friend knows. Cases were brought to my attention where a dividend was paid during the course of a fiscal year in anticipation of the fact that earnings would be sufficient in that year to provide for the payment of that dividend. But under the law as it stands that dividend could not qualify, and was taxable. That was not the real intention of the act. There were some cases where it was possible that some hardship might be the result. This is a relieving clause.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Where income from business or partnership and employment.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister give an illustration?

Mr. Abbott: This, again, is a relieving clause. We have had examples where an individual was a person in a partnership which was dissolved during the course of the year, and he then went into employment. A case might arise where he might be assessed on, let us say, as much as 18 months' income in one fiscal period. This is to enable apportionment and to relieve that hardship.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

On clause 10—Rents or trust income from farming or fishing.

Mr. Macdonnell: This, I understand, is an averaging clause for farmers. It seems to me it has caused a great deal of injustice. I am not yet clear where the legislation stands. I have here a copy of the Nielsen case of a year or two ago. At that time, due to the wording of the section, apparently a farmer who had been late by even as little as a day in any of his filings was not eligible for the averaging privilege. That happened in the Nielsen case. This case approves the judgment of the court lower down. It seems to me that at that time there was the greatest possible injustice.

There has been some amelioration of the situation since that time, and I wonder if the minister would tell us what the situation is now. Because, if I understand correctly, it seems to me there is still a good deal of injustice. Surely there is such a thing as fairness, even in taxation. I have run into cases where great hardship has resulted; and it seems to me the result of that is likely to be that people will feel themselves justified in trying to evade taxation. If they feel every attempt is being made to do justice, I think their feeling will be different. I would like to know where we stand on this averaging privilege at the present time.

Mr. Abbott: This is another relieving section. As my hon. friends know, farmers and fishermen have the privilege of averaging their income over a period of five years, and they can carry losses backward and forward. They can carry it back one year, and forward for a further five years.

It has been represented that in this averaging a man might have three or four fairly good years. Then, let us say, in the fifth year he might have a heavy loss of $8,000 or $10,000, which would more than offset the earnings in the preceding years. He could carry that forward. It is true that farmers, being characteristically cautious people, are not overly optimistic. Perhaps he might fear that he really would not get a chance to offset that in future years, and he has asserted that he should be able to offset the loss in the final year against the profits which he has made in the preceding four years. That is what this section is intended to do. I think it is reasonable myself. Of course the same rule would apply to fishermen.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am still a little troubled about this. I cannot find anything in this unless the minister can point out to me the changes in the wording which override the judgment in the Nielsen case. Let me read briefly from it.

Mr. Abbott: I understand that the difficulty in the Nielsen case was taken care of in the amendment last year. I am assured that is correct. I have forgotten what the Nielsen case was.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish the minister would point out just exactly what happened because I have the section of last year here, section 16. What troubles me is this. I understand it is still the law that if a man is at all late in the year of his filing, when he seeks to average that he loses the privilege for that year, and thereby loses a year altogether. Second, if there is any year during the period when he has failed to file on time, he loses that also. I want to be satisfied because these are the offending words of this bill. These were the words that were effective in the Nielsen case, and I want the minister to point out just exactly how the difficulty is removed, and also if this is still the case, as I understand it is, that failure to file even by a day may deprive a man of the advantage of taking that year into the calculation. That seems to me eminently unjust, because a man is already penalized for his failure to file. Why should he be penalized further?

Mr. Abbott: My information is that formerly if he was late in filing he lost the benefit for all the preceding years. Now the penalty is only for the year of late filing. I meant to mention that earlier the hon. member for Middlesex West raised two or three points in his remarks on second reading. One related to the position of farmers who might employ their sons and not pay them a regular wage, but later turned over a farm or some corresponding property to them. This is a matter which involves certain questions of principle. I think that under the circumstances he outlined there probably would not be income tax payable but possibly gift tax. But, in any event, that is a question that would have to be studied and I shall see that it is considered when budget matters are under consideration.

The other matter related to deductions for young people taking summer courses. There again, that is a matter of principle that will have to be examined to see whether the existing provisions of the law should be amended to cover it.

Mr. Macdonnell: I still want to be shown where this difficulty is cured in the legislation. I have the section here. I should like to have the effective words read.

Mr. Abbott: Subsection 3 of section 42 says:

An election under subsection (1)—

That is the election to average:

—is a nullity unless the earliest of the "preceding years" is one of the six years immediately prior to the year of averaging.

I appreciate it is a bit complex, but I am told that the result of that would be that you could be late in two years and you thereby drop those two years.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I still want to be positively satisfied. Here is this case in which there was held to have been no right to average because they had been late in filing. I want to read the words:

The minister, upon assessing the appellant's income for the year 1949, did not average the appellant's income for the said years . . . The minister's grounds for refusing such election were set forth in the 1949 assessment notice and attached to T-7W form as follows namely: "Due to late filing of 1946-7 returns, you are not eligible for averaging for period from 1946 to 1949 inclusive."

Later in the judgment it says:

If parliament had wanted that the filing of income tax returns by a farmer be sufficient to allow him to ask for the averaging of his income for a taxation year and the four immediately preceding years the words: "As required by this part . . ." "would not appear in section 39(1), which would have read" . . . "and the taxpayer has filed returns of income for the preceding years."

At that time the man was adjudged to have no right. Those words are still in section 42 unaltered, and what the minister has just read does not seem to me to remove the requirement as to the filing, though it may cut down the number of years which he loses, but he still apparently is going to lose it in respect to one or two years. I suggest that that is utterly unfair, and that it should not be left in that shape.

Mr. Abbott: My information from the deputy minister of national revenue, taxation, is that the amendment last year was made following the judgment in the Nielsen case, and the effect of that amendment is that there is a penalty of one year in the event of late filing. Prior to that the benefit with respect to all the preceding years was lost. I would have to get out last year's statute and study it and compare it with this one, but I am taking the assurance which is given me that the effect of the amendment made last year was to narrow the penalty down to the loss of one year. There must be some penalty and there should be some penalty for late filing. It is well-known that the tax returns should be filed, and every other taxpayer pays some penalty for late filing. Late filing in here means that the farmer or the fisherman, as the case may be, would lose the benefit of one year for averaging purposes.

Mr. Monteith: In a case such as this what would happen? Say that in the first year of a five-year period a man was taxable he filed the return on time and paid his tax; the same in the second; the same in the third year, and in the fourth year he lost a few thousand dollars. He knew from the very first of the year that things were bad, cattle prices were down, and one thing and another, and he knew he lost a lot of money. As a consequence he said to himself: "I have not made any money; what is the sense of my filing a return? I do not have to pay a tax. There is no penalty." Then he comes along to the fifth year of his averaging period and he finds out that he got some of that money back. He finally files the fifth year's return on time. Is he then penalized on the year in which he lost money or can he at that time file a return for the fourth year on which he lost $8,000 and was not taxable and still take that year into his averaging profit.

Mr. Abbott: He loses the benefit of that year for averaging purposes, but he can carry it backward or forward.

Mr. Monteith: If he carried it backward or forward what would happen in the long run?

Mr. Abbott: He would of course have to file a subsequent return to establish the loss in the fourth year, but he could carry the loss back or forward.

Mr. Monteith: Which in the long run would have no effect on the five year averaging period?

Mr. Abbott: He would get a benefit of it as long as he had a profit.

Mr. Monteith: Over the five year averaging period?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: Despite the loss?

Mr. Macdonnell: As I understand it there is now a penalty set out in the act for late filing. To me there is no semblance of justice in saying that because a man who perhaps may not be very expert in these matters has not filed on time he has to incur another penalty. That is what the situation was before the Nielsen case. He had to incur another penalty. If it was a stated penalty of $10 or $20 it would not be too bad, but it may run into a very large sum. If this further penalty is imposed it may be that a man, because of this failure to file, may lose the right for one or two years. Does the minister consider there is any justice in that?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: This question, Mr. Chairman, was discussed on the amendment last year. If the amendment was inadequate last year then was the time at which my hon. friend should have raised the matter. This privilege is extended only to this class of taxpayer; no other taxpayer gets the privilege of averaging. I think we should have some penalty for people who fail to file a return whether it be a farmer or anyone else. Perhaps the penalty is too great, although I am not expressing any opinion on that now, but I do not think it is correct to say when he fails to file his return that he is a poor ignorant farmer and there should not be any penalty. I just cannot accept that.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister has not been quite fair to me. I am saying to the minister that if there should be a penalty exacted then very well let us fix it. But this penalty seems to me to have no relationship to anything. It seems to be a vindictive penalty.

Mr. Abbott: I do not think it is a very serious penalty when you can carry the losses back and forth.

Mr. Macdonnell: No, but as I understand it he is still going to lose during that one year and it may be a very important year to him. There perhaps should be a penalty imposed having regard to whatever negligence there is, but not this penalty which seems to me to have no relation to anything reasonable at all.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—Corporations.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say that I think this is a very sound amendment which has made it possible for a great many financial firms to complete their financial statement later than one month following the end of the year and not be penalized.

Mr. Abbott: This amendment was suggested by the Canadian Bar Association and the dominion association of chartered accountants.

Mr. Monteith: And what about the accountants association?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, it was suggested by both the bar association and the association of accountants.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 12—Effect of carry back of loss.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, just one question on this clause. I realize clauses 12 and 13 are somewhat reciprocal in nature but it has occurred to me that a taxpayer early in the new year and before his instalments for the previous year are complete may realize, and it is quite logical, that the first five months of the year constitute the best part of that year, but in this particular year they may be bad and he may have realized he is going to have quite a loss. If he stops paying instalments due to the fact that he knows he is going to have a loss which will apply to the previous year's profit he finds that he still has to pay an unpaid balance of tax. I understand that the other clause works out the other way but it has occurred to me that in quite good faith he may think he was not going to be taxable for the losses this year which would apply against the profits for the previous year. In spite of that he may be asked to pay interest, and that does not seem to me to be entirely reasonable.

Mr. Abbott: This only applies to instalments on tax for the profit year and, as my hon. friend has pointed out, it is reciprocal. The principle underlying it is that he has had the use of the money in the case of underpayment of tax and, on the reciprocal provision, if the government collected too much it has had the use of the money.

Mr. Monteith: I quite appreciate that. I do not know what to suggest in this respect, but it seems to me that he is in a position to be quite well aware that he is going to have money kept off him and he will still have to pay interest on the balance. It does not seem quite right.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, this amendment extends by three months the period which—

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, we have already passed clause 12.

Mr. Campbell: Have we passed clause 11?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Campbell: Well, there is just one small question. I was not aware that clause had been passed. In the case of seasonal construction, corporations engaged in that work do not start operations until the middle of May and they do not get any income until the latter part of June. In a case like that could not the provision be extended a little further for such a contractor?

Mr. Abbott: It is pretty difficult to make special rules for special types of business. This general rule is extended to all corporations. It is a relieving provision which was inserted at the recommendation of the association of chartered accountants and the Canadian Bar Association and I would hesitate to go any further at this time.

Clause 13 agreed to.

On clause 14—Farmers' and fishermen's insurers.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I believe this clause is the one which gives effect to the amendment the minister had moved to budget resolution No. 6. Can the minister say whether the insurance that makes up the 50 per cent of gross premium income referred to in this clause can include hail insurance provided on farm property?

Mr. Abbott: I understand it can, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, this is a clause to give effect to the amendment which the minister introduced and, as I understand it, later on we run into the question of the taxation of the reserves of these companies. This has to do with their premium income which is exempt when 50 per cent of their revenue comes in that way.

Mr. Abbott: This adds to section 62. This class of insurer is exempt from taxation whether on their underwriting profits or on their so-called investment income.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 15—Mutual insurance corporations.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister say a word about paragraph 3 which, I take it, applies to back taxation on investment income?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. It is in line with the supreme court decision in the Stanley Mutual case, but it was only, in a sense, by way of obiter dictum. It was not necessary for the decision of the case but in this section we have spelled it out and made it quite clear.

Mr. Macdonnell: What is the position with regard to income from the reserves over the past years when they have not been taxed?

Mr. Abbott: They have been taxed but the question was never raised in the Stanley Mutual case and the supreme court assumed they were subject to tax.

Mr. Macdonnell: So this was really a validating measure?

Mr. Abbott: Simply to clarify it and put it beyond peradventure.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 16 agreed to.

On clause 17—Employer's contribution to trust deductible.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I understand clause 11 extended the period for estimated instalments on taxation to three months following the present arrangement, and in this amendment it states ". . . within sixty days thereafter . . ." I am just wondering from an accountant's angle whether it was reasonable to suggest the extra three months in one clause and limit it to 60 days in the other. Why not make it 90 days or some other additional time?

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend appreciates, this relates to one of these employees profit sharing plans and this was a term which was suggested by the organizations which made these representations. It was submitted to us that it was reasonable to allow 60 days after the end of the fiscal year to ascertain what the profits were and to pay them into the fund and that any amount so paid within that 60 days would be eligible for deduction in the previous fiscal year.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 18—Where paid-up capital increased.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the minister give us an illustration of that clause also?

Mr. Abbott: The explanatory note is about as good an explanation as I can give. It is clarifying and also closes a possible loophole. The explanatory note says this:

> This new subsection provides a rule deeming undistributed income on hand to have been capitalized where a corporation has written up its paid-up capital and not increasing its assets by a like amount, for example, by increasing the par value of its shares. The rule provided is similar to that in the case of stock dividends.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 19 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 22—Reference to "taxation year".

Mr. Monteith: This clause reads as follows:

> Paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 85B is amended by deleting the word "or" at the end of subparagraph (iii) thereof and by adding thereto, immediately after subparagraph (iii) thereof, the following subparagraph:
> "(iiia) periods for which rent or other amounts for the possession or use of chattels other than a ship have been paid in advance, if the payment in respect thereof was made for a period of more than two years, . . .

There are a couple of comments I should like to make. Why differentiate in the case of a ship? And why should it be two years instead of one year?

Mr. Abbott: The ship is already provided for, I am advised, under another section. This was to meet a special case, I may say, to be quite frank. We were informed by a concern on the west coast that in connection with propane gas the containers in which this gas is sold, instead of being sold, were charged for on a rental basis. This was to enable them to get an appropriate deduction for prepayment of rent.

Mr. Monteith: That relates to prepayment. That is what the minister said, was it?

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Monteith: I cannot understand why it should be for a period of two years. Why not for one year or one month?

Mr. Abbott: If it was only for one year, I do not think you would bother to put a special section in the act. It is where it is over the normal taxable period.

Mr. Monteith: Does this apply, for instance, in a case of some corporation which owns an apartment house where somebody has paid it rent? That does not come under this section?

Mr. Abbott: No; that is not a chattel.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 23—Child not previously qualified for family allowance.

Mrs. Fairclough: If this amendment means what I think it means, I think it is a definite improvement to the act. By this does the minister mean that an immigrant coming into this country may elect not to receive family allowance for his children? Suppose he just had a couple of months coming to him; suppose he came, say, in October and had a couple of months the following year, rather than take the $150 exemption and the family allowance, he could refrain from accepting the family allowance for those two years and take the $400 allowance?

Mr. Abbott: No; he is obliged to accept the family allowance but he has the option of repaying; that is, he has the option of making a gift to the crown. This amendment is the result of representations we had from members on all sides of the house. I think my friend the hon. member for Hamilton West was one of them; in fact I know she was. In effect there is given to the immigrant an option to choose whichever is the more favourable basis for him in the year in which he comes into the country.

Mrs. Fairclough: Whether he receives it or whether he turns it back, it is the same thing, is it not?

Mr. Abbott: This section says, "There shall be added to the tax." As my hon. friend says, it may be that the net result is the same.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is the same thing. I think it is a definite improvement and that it will certainly remove one cause of grievance.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 24 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 32.

Mr. Nickle: The purpose of this clause, of course—and which I strongly support, naturally—is to extend for one additional year the terms of subsection 3 of section 53. The only question in my mind is this: Should not a deduction of what are, after all, nothing more nor less than normal operating expenses of the petroleum and gas mining industry be treated as a permanent deduction by eliminating the time period? In other words, should this act not be incorporated into the permanent Income Tax Act, with no limitation as to its time of application? Can we have a comment from the minister?

Mr. Abbott: That is a matter of opinion. The government has never felt that this should be done at the present time, at any rate, As my hon. friend appreciates, it is a form of incentive legislation. We have been continuing it each year from year to year. Perhaps some time it should be made a part of the permanent tax structure but that time has not yet arrived.

Mr. Nickle: I raised the question, Mr. Chairman because I think two of the four items of the so-called incentive legislation can fairly be called incentive subsidies. This particular section does not deal with anything of a nature of what could be called an incentive subsidy. The cost of exploration or development is obviously a normal operating expense of the industry and it is completely unlike a 100 per cent incentive allowance provided by the elimination of the first three years' income from income tax under the law, something which is clearly an incentive subsidy. To get back to my point again, it seems to me to be quite clear that we should continue anything in the nature of an incentive subsidy on a year to year basis, subject to annual review, but that something which is merely a provision for the deduction of what is no more nor less than normal operating expenses should not be subject to a time limit.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By leave, shall this bill be read a third time now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, before this bill carries, I should just like to say this: It seems to me to be a little bit unfair that members of this house should have a bill of this size thrown at them and be called upon to consider it in this house with only two days for perusal. For those of us who are interested in the bill it has meant a mad scramble even to read it through, much less to give it the careful study that it requires. I could not help having this point called to my mind when the minister, in reply to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) tonight, made the remark that if he had had any objection to the retention of one of the clauses he should have spoken about it last year. Considering the short space of time that has been given to the members of this house in which to consider this bill, I cannot see where criticism of that type is justified. Before third reading I feel I must protest, on my own behalf and on behalf of other hon. members, against the very short space of time which was given to us to consider this bill.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to add a word or two. I want to say that I am very unhappy about the way that the farmers' averaging section was left. I hope the minister will take another look at it in the months ahead.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to say again what I said to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) this afternoon, that no one regrets more than I do that it has not been possible to reach second reading of the income tax bill at an earlier time. The bill has been prepared for at least three weeks now but the house has seen fit to occupy itself with a good deal of other work and it has been brought on just as quickly as it has been possible to do so. It was given first reading, I believe, last week sometime, on Monday or Tuesday. It probably was not available until Wednesday or Thursday, and it is true that is not a great deal of time to examine a complicated bill of this kind. But

I cannot accept responsibility on the part of the government for that. The house has seen fit to occupy itself with other various interesting topics, and we just have not been able to reach this bill. However, the legislation has not been held up by members on the government side of the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 469, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1954, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one or two brief remarks on this measure. We have this great asset, the Canadian National Railways, and I think it is the clear duty of the house to vote moneys for capital expenditure. However, as we continue to do so I think it is well for us to remind ourselves occasionally of the increasing investment we have year by year. Therefore I propose to put certain figures on the record taken from a statement prepared by the railway in answer to a question by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and myself. I will read the total of borrowed capital only as shown in the statement and I will do so in five-year periods.

In 1923 there was a total of $1,406 million, in 1928, $1,609 million, and in 1933, $1,922 million. In that year debt was written off in the amount of $373 million and debt transferred to equity capital amounted to $270 million, leaving $1,301 million. In 1942 the amount had gone up to $1,328 million. In 1947 it had gone down to $1,272 million, and in 1951 the total was $1,472 million. In 1952 there was transferred to equity capital $736 million leaving in that year $833 million. Last year the amount had risen to $931 million.

The reason I put these figures on the record is, as I said, that I think it is wise for us to remind ourselves not only of the investment we have at the present time but of the previous amounts which have been forgiven the railway from time to time. As hon. members know, the return on that amount is negligible, although that is no fault of the railway. It is really in the interests of the railway that I think it worth while to put the figures on the record and worth reminding hon. members of our huge investment because the railway operates under great difficulties. I believe it has capable management but, as we know, it is operating under very great difficulties along with its competitor, the Canadian Pacific. I think it would be wise for us all to bear the situation in our minds, to bear in our minds the various difficulties in competition which confront the railways by reason of other forms of transportation and to bear in mind the difficulties which confront them by reason of rapidly rising costs.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while I have no proposal to put before the house and while I repeat, as I said at the outset, that I think these capital grants have to be made, I also think it worth while to remind hon. members of our huge investment, of the almost microscopic return we get on it at the present time, of the reasons for that return and of the need for us all to be on guard and wide awake to the difficulties and interests of this great operation which we own, and to see to it that it gets a fair deal.

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is adopted I should like to make a few remarks. We in Bruce county have been serviced by the Canadian National for a good while. In the early years the railway made a lot of money in that district but now, because of certain methods of management, the trucking industry has taken the business away from the railways. The situation now is that about every second year word goes around that our railroad service is going to be curtailed.

I have nothing against the capital expenditures involved in the bill, but if Canada is expecting the progress that our economists tell us we are going to have I should like to suggest to the minister that he convey to the railway that it would not be wise to think of curtailing service to good municipalities that in the past have paid a lot towards the deficits that the railway incurred and that such service, if not improved, should at least be continued.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a very few words. I rise to express the hope that the capital expenditures being provided in this bill will play some part in reversing the trend with respect to employment by the Canadian National Railways. As the house is aware, I have had occasion a number of times during the course of the session to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) whether he could give any hope that layoffs by the Canadian National Railways might be discontinued. He has expressed that hope on a number of occasions, but each time he expresses the hope more employees are laid off.

In addition to the information I have obtained from him on the floor of the house and in addition to the information that appears in the press, there is hardly a week goes by that I do not get a letter from Winnipeg telling me of still further lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways, either at the Transcona or Fort Rouge shops or in some other part of the system at Winnipeg. The situation is extremely serious so far as these employees are concerned. There are shops at Transcona where the numbers working have been reduced by half in a period of a few months. So, Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, my purpose in rising at this moment is to express the hope that the capital expenditures foreshadowed by this bill will play some part in putting a stop to these lay-offs, and that they may play some part in helping to put some of these Canadian National employees back to work once again.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Benidickson: At the resolution stage, the hon. member for Greenwood asked the Minister of Finance one or two questions, and he was assured an answer would be brought down at this time. A general understanding of this legislation is facilitated in this house not only because the bill comes up annually but it does get the lively attention of one of our larger committees each year, the railways and shipping committee. This year I think they held about five sittings, and as a result they have a very substantial Hansard containing the inquiries that were put to the president of the railway and the large staff that accompanies him to the committee to cover the great variety of questions to which answers are given.

The hon. member for Greenwood the other day asked particularly for a comment upon two points. First of all he made this statement, which appears at page 5392 of Hansard for June 2, 1954:

> My understanding is that the $72 million referred to is an amount authorized last year but not expended, and that the intention of the finance department is to have each year a new statement of the amounts actually required for the year.

I think my hon. friend was seeking assurance that we are not departing this year in this annual bill from the practice of previous legislation of this kind, because I found that my hon. friend has probably outlined the basis of this legislation and the practice under it as well as anyone has done when last year he had this to say, which does indeed describe this act of 1954. The hon. member for Greenwood last year said this, as appears at page 4516 of Hansard for April 29, 1953:

> My understanding—and I think this is important—is that the policy under the bill is to make a fresh start each year, that is to say, all the unused authorities of past years are washed out and we make a fresh start each year so that there is no overlapping period and no chance of misunderstanding between the national railways and the Department of Finance as to just what are the authority and scope of the Canadian National Railways.

That is true, and I think when the president of the road submitted the capital budget to the railways and shipping committee this year, the summary of financial commitments authorized for 1954 was presented in a form that makes it a little clearer to the members what is involved. For the first time there was clearly set out in columnar form under two headings the 1954 financial authorizations—I am referring to page 1 of the capital budget which is reproduced on page 122 of the minutes of the 1954 sittings of the railways and shipping committee. There was a separation of the projects not heretofore authorized and brought forth for the first time in 1954, and then another column clearly indicating, both in connection with additions and betterments as well as branch line construction and new equipment, items that were projects previously authorized in former financing bills.

Now, the other question that was raised by the hon. member for Greenwood referred to railway policy in the matter of depreciation account. This, of course, is important because hon. members will find opposite section 4 of the bill an item of $19,900,000, which is described as the amount for depreciation accounts for this year's financing, thus reducing the gross capital requirements for the current year from $241,767,198 to a net of $221,867,198 because these moneys set aside in the depreciation account are available for capital expenditures.

As hon. members know, the national road operates certain lines in the United States, and by reason of United States law it is sometimes necessary to have separate accounting practices for the United States operations. To an extent that is true in the matter of the depreciation account. The system of depreciation also differs between equipment and road property. I should like to describe, first of all, the practice with respect to equipment depreciation. Prior to 1940 it was the general practice of the railway to charge operating expenses with the loss of equipment destroyed or worn out in service when the equipment was retired permanently from service. But effective from 1940 the straight line depreciation on rolling stock and floating equipment was adopted. A similar practice on Canadian National lines in the United States has been in effect for some time because of the regulations of the interstate commerce commission.

Under this method a percentage of the capital cost of the equipment is charged to operating expenses annually throughout the service life of equipment, sufficient to retire the investment loss and salvage value of the worn-out units of equipment. The average service life of railway equipment is approximately 28 years. The average annual depreciation rate is approximately 3·32 per cent of the investment value. Under this system the operating expense account for each year bears a proportionate share of the equipment retirement costs irrespective of the date the equipment is retired. This is the unit method of accounting for equipment retirement and conforms to the general practice followed by class 1 roads of the United States.

In the matter of the depreciation of road property there is a difference between United States and Canadian accounts. In the United States the depreciation for national road property there is at rates approved by the interstate commerce commission for individual roads, which became mandatorily effective on January 1, 1943. The items in each primary account are treated as a group and a composite depreciation rate established. Losses on retirement are charged in their entirety to reserves. The average rate of depreciation is approximately 1·5 per cent per annum on the investment value of the various items of road property.

Now, with respect to the Canadian lines, the loss on retirement of Canadian line road property is charged to operating expenses at the time the units of property are retired from service. This is known as retirement accounting.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Capital expenditures authorized.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask the minister about the capital expenditures. I take it this item covers the capital expenditure of building a hotel. I know that in the committee Mr. Gordon mentioned that to us. Is that a fact, and how much is that expenditure?

Mr. Benidickson: As he says, the hon. member for Saskatoon was a member of that committee. Considerable detail concerning hotel capital requirements was given to the committee by Mr. Gordon. The information appears at page 142 of the proceedings of the committee. Quite fortunately, in connection with this bill I am assisted by my colleague the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport, and he is prepared to give information respecting internal details of the railway. My recollection is that capital expenditures set out for hotels were in the neighbourhood of $5 million.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Gordon at that time laid before us plans for the future in regard to office consolidation, whereby various offices would be placed in a building near the hotel. Is there anything allocated for that this year?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): It is only in the planning stage so far; no money is provided this year.

Mr. Knight: There was objection in committee to this consolidation because it was felt it would offer a good bombing target. However I think those who took that stand were thinking in terms of previous wars, and forgetting that if a bomb were to land in Montreal there would be nothing left of Montreal, or the hotel, either.

From experience in my own city, I should like to endorse the expenditure of whatever moneys are required for an hotel of that sort. Due to the foresight of Sir Henry Thornton, the Bessborough hotel in my city was built at a time when the position of Canada, from the standpoint of economics, would not have appeared to justify its building. However the building of that hotel has meant a great deal to my city and province, and has offered first-class accommodation to people from all parts of Canada. I believe it can be said that it is one of the most successful hotels in the system.

However at the time it was built there was a feeling that it would be a white elephant. This has not proved to be so, because today it is one of the most profitable hotels in Canada and has added tremendous prestige to the city. If in the opinion of the railway management an hotel, on a greater scale, is necessary for Montreal, then I would support it. Secondly, if it will place the nationally-owned railways, in which we are interested, on a competitive basis with the other railway, which draws its capital from private funds, I would be in favour of it.

Further, if it will offer a considerable amount of employment it would be worth while, and the expenditure would be justified.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I approve of most of the proposed capital expenditures in this bill, but I regret I cannot agree with my colleague from Saskatoon, and perhaps most other hon. members in the house, as to the desirability of building the hotel in Montreal. In the debate on the budget I expressed my opposition to the construction of this hotel, and I should like to reiterate that opposition tonight. As I recall, president Donald Gordon of the Canadian National Railways said that the building in Montreal was to be a luxury hotel which would accommodate 2,500 people at banquets and 4,000 people at conventions. It may be that in many respects such a building would be desirable. I agree with my colleague from Saskatoon that it would provide employment and might attract tourists. If the hotel were going to be built out of revenue, I would support the expenditure. But when one looks at section 9(2) it becomes clear that in all probability the taxpayers will ultimately have to pay for this luxury hotel. While the parliamentary assistant said the amount is only $5 million this year, eventually it will be $20 million.

I believe it was two years ago when parliament agreed to a reorganization of the capital stock of the Canadian National Railways. At that time we were told that if a billion odd dollars were changed from bonds into non-interest-bearing stock, the profit and loss position of the C.N.R. in future would be a good deal better. Actually since that time it has been better. In 1952 we made a profit of $142,000 and last year a profit of $244,000. Moreover President Gordon told the railways committee that this year probably the C.N.R. would have a substantial deficit.

I cannot believe it is sound business practice for any company to indulge in luxury expenditures at a time when it is operating at a heavy deficit. It seems to me that this is all the more so when hon. members recall that hotel expenditures of the C.N.R. in past years have not been very profitable. One of the best years the system had was in 1952. With an investment of $31,500,000 they were able to show a profit of only $535,000 and that without charging adequate depreciation. So when Mr. Gordon comes before parliament and asks for permission to build another luxury hotel, I am a bit dubious about the wisdom of granting the funds.

Let me repeat that when the C.N.R. comes before parliament and asks for expenditures to build new railways to open up the country, I support them. But I doubt very much whether the building of this luxury hotel is going to help open up the country in any way. I do not think the people in my constituency would be enthusiastic about an expenditure of this kind, nor do I think that the Canadian taxpayer will receive value for his money if the building is proceeded with. I realize that I do not speak for this party, and also that very few members in the house would agree with me. But I did wish to express my opposition to this item.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, a little over a week ago when we were considering the estimates of the Department of Transport I made reference to a railway crossing east of Woodstock, namely the Creditville crossing. I pointed out on that occasion that it was one of the most dangerous crossings in western Ontario and had been the cause of many accidents, probably more than any other crossing. Two days after I spoke in the house another accident took place at that same crossing, causing serious injury to four persons. I bring this information to the attention of the parliamentary assistant and the minister in the hope that they will take cognizance of it.

Mr. Gillis: I would like to join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in expressing the hope that the expenditure of money as indicated by this bill might have beneficial effects, so far as the employment of Canadian National Railways workers is concerned, and particularly that it might affect beneficially those who have lost their employment in the last two years. The best barometer in the country indicating that people are thinking in terms of expansion is found in the activity of the railroads.

This budget indicates that the Canadian National Railways, in co-operation with the Department of Transport, are planning ahead for some years. Since I was a member of the committee that examined the accounts of the railways this session, I was put in the position to hear the president of the Canadian National Railways outline his program of expansion and improvements and tell us about the new equipment that they would purchase within the next year or two. It was a very encouraging and optimistic report. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. It seems that for a businessman, who had the courage and the optimism to expand his own business from one outlet to four or five in the hardware field, and in addition to that have the courage and the confidence in the country to go into another business, to take the attitude that he takes here toward a proposed expenditure of something around $234 million, all carefully plotted as to the benefit that it may bring to the country, is unrealistic.

He picks out an item of $5 million. That hotel in Montreal is something the president of the Canadian National Railways was talked to very carefully about by members of the committee. There is no doubt about it, that hotel is needed in Montreal for the purpose for which it is intended. He pointed out, and any hon. member who has had the privilege of attending a national convention in Montreal over the past two or three years will agree, that there is not a hotel in Montreal that is capable of handling the kind of national and international conventions that we are getting today. They have to be divided. The words "luxury hotel" are a misnomer. It is not a luxury hotel; it is a hotel that is going to fill our need in the city of Montreal.

Mr. Gordon pointed out to the committee that the hotel is going to cater to the type of convention in that city that cannot be catered to at present by any hotel that exists there today. In addition to that he informed us that he has requests and applications from international organizations that have conventions in mind, sufficient to fill the space for the next three years. There is no doubt of it paying for itself. The fears of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre that the government is going to have to pay the shot on this hotel in the future are very unrealistic, to say the least. When you examine the contribution that the Canadian National Railways have made across this country you will agree that they are invaluable. You cannot measure it.

The hon. member for Saskatoon rightly said that when the Canadian National Railways built the first chain of hotels across this country many people took the same position as the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre is taking at this time. It was an expenditure that could not be justified; it was not needed; it was unrealistic. But in the few short years since those hotels were built they certainly have proved that they were not only an asset to the country and to the system but that they filled a great need during the past several years.

Instead of opposing this expenditure in the committee, practically every member of the committee from one section of the country to the other asked for expansions in hotels that the system is operating at the present time. I know the hotel in Halifax that is operated by the Canadian National Railways is filled to capacity all the time. You could double the size of that hotel in that city at this time and fill it six days a week. The attitude that this hotel is to be a luxury hotel is a complete distortion of the fact. It is needed in Montreal; but it will also do another thing. There is a large unemployment problem across this country today. The building of that hotel, not for the purpose of creating employment, but for the purpose of filling a need, will serve another purpose. It will stimulate the construction industry. It will use steel, and I hope the steel that it will use will be manufactured in Canada. It will stimulate practically every industry across this country, cement, steel—

Mr. Sinclair: Hardware.

Mr. Gillis: And hardware. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre may get a lot of plumbing and the refrigerators. I hope he will.

Mr. Knowles: They will need a lot of fish there, too.

Mr. Gillis: Yes. It will do many things; there is no doubt about that. I suggest to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre that in picking out these little, mediocre items of expenditures such as those he is not being the big person that he is in the business world, in the business that he himself manages.

I just thought I would say these few words because since I was a member of the committee the attitude taken by the hon. member kind of lets me and the hon. member for Saskatoon down. When we are placed on that committee the membership of our group have confidence in us, and we are not coming back to this house and recommending something that is not one hundred per cent simon pure. We have done that, and we have told the members of that group that this was a justifiable expenditure; it was in the best interests of the country; it filled the need that existed in that section. I feel a little bit hurt when my hon. friend rises in his place behind me and breathes down my neck and tells us that we were not exactly right. I think we had a better chance to examine this item than he had. I am going to be charitable to him and say that he had better take another look.

Mr. Herridge: I am really drawn to have a few words to say on this item, particularly in view of the attitude of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. I support it for the very reasons given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Saskatoon and the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I am not going to repeat their arguments, but we in general support this measure because it is an extension of the field of public ownership to provide railroad and other services. It is a fact that there is more agreement from year to year on this question. We find Liberals, Conservatives, members of this group and other members supporting this policy. In fact, you find all progressive-thinking and forward-looking people supporting this kind of policy.

Mr. Sinclair: Page the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Herridge: I also support the measure because I have confidence in the committee. We had two well-known members of our group on that committee. They returned to our group and advised us that it was a very sensible and necessary piece of legislation. In addition, while I have personally every respect for the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, I have greater confidence in the business ability of the president of the Canadian National Railways. I am quite sure he would not make a recommendation of this type to the government if he were not confident that in the long run it was in the interests of the Canadian National Railways and of the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre mentioned a luxury hotel. I think, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, that was rather stretching the fact. The evidence before the committee indicated it is a public service that is required in the city of Montreal if our railway is going to serve the public adequately. He mentioned that the company did not show a very big profit this year and suggested they might show a loss next year, and that it is all wrong from the business point of view to expand while you are showing losses. Well, surely, the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre must know that this country was built up by people who were willing to expand while the companies concerned were showing losses. That was the history of the C.P.R. and I am sure I am not going to admit that any publicly-owned corporation must show less initiative and less enterprise than a private enterprise corporation.

The very same argument was used, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, when other hotels were built in this country. I remember reading it in the press at the time one of these hotels was built at Saskatoon, as my hon. friend to my right reminds me, and conditions were pretty bad in Canada at that time. But there were people who had confidence in this country and they proceeded with the building of various publicly-owned hotels.

I remember even in the city of Vancouver when they built a city hall during the depression and when many said it could not be done, but it was done because some people had confidence in the future of the city of Vancouver. As a result, the city of Vancouver now has one of the finest city halls in Canada. It is for all these reasons, Mr. Chairman, that I wholeheartedly support this measure and compliment the president of the Canadian National Railways for his initiative, forward-looking ideas and proposals.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I am rather sorry to hear hon. members to my right take the attitude they have in respect to the building of a hotel. I feel that if we have so many millions of dollars to spend then that money would be better spent on opening up the country and constructing railway lines, particularly the Pacific Great Eastern from Squamish to Vancouver, and so to assist in opening up the great northern parts of Alberta and British Columbia.

However, I am not here to defend the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. He is quite able to do that for himself. I do not intend to say too much either as regards this hotel. I feel that a hotel may possibly be necessary in Montreal, but I think it should be the business of the Canadian National Railways to build railways first and hotels second.

The very fact that my socialist friends are so enthusiastic—and I do not blame them—when it comes to spending money which belongs to the taxpayer in keeping people employed is not altogether surprising, and I can agree with them to some extent. But I should like to remind them that the Saskatchewan government, over a period of years, has had the privilege of losing many thousands of dollars and has seen fit to close many industries they owned which could have kept some of the people in their province quite well employed. However, I am not here to fight that particular province. The government of that province will have to look after itself at the next provincial election.

I come back to the matter of the C.N.R. and the railway problem in particular. I would say that where there is any expenditure, whether it be of $5 or $20 million, we have several requirements in regard to railway extension branches which should come first, one or two of which have already been denied. In fact, I am thinking of the line from Chibougamau to St. Felicien. Part of this money could well have been spent in carrying on that line following the socialist precept that it is worth a little loss now to open up the country for a later date.

However, just to reiterate my point, I believe the railways should be the problem of the Canadian National Railways and their first task should be to open up our country and make certain Canada has a good means of transportation which will make it possible for us to progress in the way all of us hope.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say one word. The fact that my hon. friend from Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Kootenay West support this hotel makes me all the more certain that I may be right. I know that the economy ideas which I sometimes express cause them distress. But I assure them that their economic expressions sometimes cause me distress. I suppose I had better leave it at that.

However, I would like to reiterate that I do not think the spending of $20 million on a luxury hotel, and that is what this is, as Mr. Donald Gordon said in his annual report, is a good thing for the taxpayers generally. I do not think the taxpayer is receiving full value for the dollars spent.

There is one more question I wish to ask one of the parliamentary assistants and that pertains to the expenditure of $147 million on equipment. I am in favour of this item if it is properly used. But I have been told that more and more people coming east from Vancouver and British Columbia are taking the American Great Northern railroad instead of the C.N.R. or C.P.R., because it is so much quicker to come that way. I wonder, if we get this new equipment, whether the C.N.R. can take steps to speed up the service to compete with the Great Northern railway, so that the people from British Columbia will come east on that line with equal speed. Could I have an answer to that?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend is referring probably to timetables about which I cannot speak, but on the general point of equipment in so far as the C.N.R. is concerned, I recall from my sojourn in the Department of Transport that it is only about two years ago that the railway was able to commence to make any capital expenditure of note on passenger equipment so great was the pressure for freight equipment, because necessarily there was the severe postponement during the war years. However, very substantial orders for new passenger equipment have been made during the last two years. As a member of the travelling public, and from what I hear from others, I think improved services are very much in evidence.

Mr. Thatcher: I do not think the parliamentary assistant understood my question. My understanding is that if a person comes from Vancouver on the Great Northern railway, which is in the northern United States, he can arrive here more quickly than by C.N.R. or C.P.R. If we get this new equipment will it mean the C.N.R. will be able to speed up its schedule? Could I have an answer?

[Mr. Hahn.]

Mr. Fairey: Mr. Chairman, if I may presume to give an answer to that question, I raised that very question in committee and Mr. Gordon gave us to understand that both railways were going to cut down the time between Montreal and Vancouver.

Clauses 4, 5 and 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Power to aid other companies.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, this clause reads:

> The national company may aid and assist, in any manner not inconsistent with section 3, any other of the companies and railways comprised in the national system...

What other companies are referred to there?

Mr. Benidickson: The list, Mr. Chairman, is provided—

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not think it is necessary to read the entire list.

Mr. Benidickson: I was just going to point out where it could be found. The list can be found in the 1953 annual report, pages 34 and 35, and that list indicates the companies which would come under the definition of the "national system". This clause is a clause which has been in all previous acts, and indeed it was in last year's act in exactly the same form. It simply states that if the expenditures are not inconsistent with section 3 they can be for the purposes of the national as well as other companies in the system.

DISABLED PERSONS

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF ALLOWANCES—AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Martin for the second reading of Bill No. 462, to provide for allowances for disabled persons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I believe it was understood that if we got this far with this measure we would not go on with it tonight. Was that not the understanding?

Mr. Harris: I said that, Mr. Chairman, anticipating that the minister might not be present tonight because he had other public duties to attend to. But since he is present I think we ought to deal with the committee stage now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Agreements with the provinces.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, clause 3 of this bill is the one which has the meat in it. This is the clause that specifies the age at which allowances for disabled persons can be paid. It also has in it as much as we get by way of a definition of total and permanent disability. It also has in it the means test provisions, together with provisions that make it impossible to receive this allowance at the same time as one is receiving any one of certain other items, such as an allowance under the Blind Persons Act, assistance under the Old Age Assistance Act, an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act or a pension under the Old Age Security Act. In addition to that, this is the clause that specifies the maximum amount of the allowance as $40. It also specifies that the federal government will pay up to only 50 per cent of the $40 a month. In other words, I have spelled out my statement that this is the clause that has the meat of this legislation in it.

I wonder whether the minister is in a position now to comment on some of the points that were raised when we were at the second reading stage. Perhaps he could start with one that was raised by members in all parties on this side of the house, namely the question of the definition. The clause reads that the allowance can be paid to a recipient who is "totally and permanently disabled as prescribed by the regulations". In this clause there are other matters that I wish to say something about, namely, the amount of the allowance, the age at which it is payable and the division between the provinces and the federal government. Perhaps the minister might first comment on the remarks made by the hon. member for Lanark, the hon. member for Red Deer, myself and others on the way in which total and permanent disability is defined. I ask him, if he will, to relate his comments to the remarks made on this question in the brief presented to the government by the Canadian Welfare Council to which I made reference last Tuesday.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: Not yet. I am amazed to find the minister so unwilling to speak.

Mr. Michener: On clause 3 I have a question which I should like to raise for the minister's consideration. Subsection 2 provides that payment shall be made only in respect of a recipient who—and I then drop down to paragraph (f) which reads as follows:

> (f) is not a patient or resident in a hospital, nursing home, or private, charitable or public institution, except as prescribed in the regulations.

I do not know what stage the drafting of regulations has reached, but many instances readily come to my mind where a disabled person who receives a pension would be much better off and would be better cared for in a private charitable institution than elsewhere. I have some instances of that kind in mind from my own experience. I know that some of these institutions which keep elderly people who have the old age pension look after them very well on part of the pension and leave the pensioners with a certain part of it as spending money. It is a happy arrangement for elderly people and I think it would apply equally well to disabled people who would be looked after well in these private institutions by reason of the pension which they get under this act; whereas if the pension is not permitted to be paid when they are in such homes, it seems to me that one of the purposes of the act is defeated.

I appreciate the fact that one does not wish to duplicate the expenditure of public funds for disabled persons by having them maintained at public expense in a home and also by paying a pension. But if only a modest part of the funds of a home are public funds, it seems to me that it is a proper case for paying the pension. I trust that the minister has that point in mind and will deal with it in the regulations.

Mr. Blair: Further to the remarks made by the hon. member, may I say that this morning I had a letter which set out the case of a disabled war veteran—one who is 100 per cent disabled—who is contributing to the keep of a totally disabled wife in an institution. Something should be done under this act to deal with a matter of that kind. It does not seem fair that he should be contributing for that purpose part of his pension paid to him for war wounds and for other disability. He has what amounts to 100 per cent disability.

When the bill was before the house we mentioned this question of the time between the age of 16 when the family allowance stops and when this bill entitles the recipient to receive the pension at 18. I maintain that those two years are important years in the training and care of the disabled person and that those two years could be lost to some degree in the training of a disabled person or with respect to his health. Those two years are just as important as are any other years and during them they are not receiving anything.

The other point is this. If some information were given by the minister as to just what is meant by totally and permanently disabled people, it possibly would help us in this discussion. There is one other matter I wish to mention. I did not get a chance to say anything about it at the time, but there has been some discussion about who is responsible for this bill. I should like to pay tribute to one person who has worked consistently through the years. That person is Miss Eva Warden of Calgary who brought this delegation down to the house. I do not like to use the word "lobby" but she worked very hard in this matter. I believe in giving honour where honour is due; and I believe that Miss Warden should receive great credit for what she has done in promoting public opinion with respect to the bringing in of this bill.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, last week I expressed the hope that the minister would be able to give us some information at least to indicate the extent of the agreement that has been reached between his department and the provinces in connection with this matter of the defining of the expression "totally and permanently disabled as prescribed by the regulations". Personally I am confident, without having been told, that some measure of agreement was reached. Undoubtedly this matter came up for serious consideration. In the second place, I should like to know whether, in the course of discussing the matter, it was agreed tentatively at least to go as far as the Alberta act does in its present statute, that is, as amended at the last session. That brings me to the specific subject of the case where a person may be partially disabled physically and partially disabled mentally, but not sufficiently mentally ill to warrant being placed in an institution. Nevertheless that person is permanently disabled. I should like to know whether or not that type of case will be included in the definition.

Clause stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue in the morning with this debate followed by the legislation with respect to benefits for the armed forces, then the National Harbours Board Act, and then the Post Office Act. As the house knows, there is a pension bill in the veterans affairs committee that is being reported with a suggested amendment which, if His Excellency concurs, would be recommended to the house tomorrow by consent, I hope, and might be dealt with at the resolution stage so that the pension bill can be dealt with in committee of the whole with the amendment.

Then we have a bill, of which notice has been given, with respect to motor vehicle transportation. It would be our hope that hon. members opposite might find it convenient to deal with that some time later in the day after they have had an opportunity to see it. If these matters are all disposed of we shall take estimates, beginning with national revenue, then secretary of state, fisheries, and mines and technical surveys.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the motor transport bill has not yet been distributed. The minister was kind enough to give me a copy but I understand it has not been distributed generally. Therefore it would be very difficult to go on with that tomorrow. It was my understanding also that the Post Office Act would be taken before the national harbours board bill.

Mr. Harris: I know that some hon. members have committee work to attend to in the morning, and if it is not found possible to have them here at the time they have particular matters to discuss we can arrange that. However, we might leave the order I have indicated for the time being. We shall see that copies of the bill with respect to motor vehicle transportation are available the first thing in the morning, if they are not now available when hon. members leave the chamber. I am sure that the intelligent consideration which you will give to it in the meantime will lead you to be able to discuss it in the afternoon.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 8, 1954

The house met at eleven o'clock.

AGNES CAMPBELL MACPHAIL

MEMORIAL TO HONOUR THE FIRST WOMAN ELECTED TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Speaker: I am very pleased to communicate to the house the decision of the internal economy commission regarding a memorial in honour of the late Agnes Macphail.

The commissioners of internal economy have had before them for consideration representations from the lady members of the Senate and House of Commons and from senators and members of parliament generally, as well as from various women's organizations, suggesting that the election to the House of Commons of the first lady member be suitably commemorated.

The commissioners have also been informed that a bronze bust by Felix Weihs de Weldon, sculptor, of Miss Agnes Campbell Macphail, the first woman elected to the House of Commons of Canada, has been graciously offered to the House of Commons by Mrs. Meredith Reany, of Palmerston, Ontario, and Mrs. Hugh Bailey of Toronto, sisters of Miss Macphail.

The commissioners have had this matter under consideration and have recommended: (a) that to commemorate this historic event, a bronze bust of the first woman member, Miss Agnes Macphail, be placed on a pedestal in the vicinity of the chamber of the House of Commons; and (b) that for this purpose the bronze bust of Miss Macphail offered by her two sisters, be gratefully accepted.

Several appropriate dates together with arrangements for the unveiling ceremony are still under consideration and will be announced later.

WHEAT

LOSS OF MARKETS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31, to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the need for an immediate declaration of government policy with respect to the loss of farm markets for wheat and the means to be taken to protect the Canadian producers from the detrimental policies and practices of other countries.

Mr. Speaker: I will have to ask the Leader of the Opposition to move this motion before the orders of the day are called. I have to call routine proceedings. This is not the proper moment. Perhaps he could keep his motion and move it later.

Presenting reports by standing and select committees.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF FOURTH REPORT—SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 21

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the special committee on veterans affairs.

The Clerk Assistant:

The special committee on veterans affairs begs leave to present the following as a fourth report.

Your committee has considered Bill No. 339, an act to amend the Pension Act, and has agreed to report same with amendments.

With respect to clauses 10, 11, 12 and 18, as certain amendments contemplated therein would, to meet the views of the committee, result in an increased charge upon the public, your committee feels that it has no option, under the rules of the house, but to report these clauses without amendment. The committee would, however, recommend that the government consider the advisability of substituting the words and figures "1st day of May, 1954" for the words and figures "1st day of January, 1954" where they appear in the said clauses.

With respect to clauses 8 and 13 your committee has agreed to the deletion of the provisions contained therein. However, other amendments contemplated thereto would, to meet the unanimous views of the committee, also result in an increased charge upon the public.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I cannot hear what is being read.

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: It may be that proper order was not being kept, but it has been our practice lately to dispense with the reading of a report in which it is not intended to move concurrence the same day. The reason why I have not asked consent for the deputy clerk to dispense with the reading of this report is that the first paragraph is of some importance in that it deals with a bill to which an amendment is being proposed. Perhaps the deputy clerk would read the first part of the report again, and may I ask hon. members to pay attention to what is being read.

The Clerk Assistant:

Your committee has considered Bill No. 339, an act to amend the Pension Act, and has agreed to report same with amendments.

With respect to clauses 10, 11, 12 and 18, as certain amendments contemplated therein would, to meet the views of the committee, result in an increased charge upon the public, your committee feels that it has no option, under the rules of the house, but to report these clauses without amendment. The committee would, however, recommend that the government consider the advisability of substituting the words and figures "1st day of May, 1954" for the words and figures "1st day of January, 1954" where they appear in the said clauses.

With respect to clauses 8 and 13 your committee has agreed to the deletion of the provisions contained therein. However, other amendments contemplated thereto would, to meet the unanimous views of the committee, also result in an increased charge upon the public. Therefore, in obedience to the rules of the house your committee here again feels it has no option but to delete the said clauses. The committee would, however, recommend that the government consider the advisability of amending subsection (3) of section 31 and subsection (3) of section 42 of the Pension Act by striking out the words "in respect of service during world war II" where they appear in the said subsections.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Walter A. Tucker,
Chairman.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the house has just heard the report with respect to the Pension Act. By leave, I should like to move:

That Bill No 339, an act to amend the Pension Act, be considered in committee of the whole this day, and that standing order 21 be suspended in relation thereto.

May I by way of explanation add that this does not apply to the report as such, but only to the bill.

Mr. Green: One recommendation was made by the committee unanimously yesterday, and it requires the approval of the cabinet. I wonder whether it would be covered if we agreed to this procedure now?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, the bill will not be considered until His Excellency in council has had an opportunity to consider the amendment suggested in the report, and we will convey to the house the result of that consultation.

[Mr. Speaker.]

WHEAT

LOSS OF MARKETS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson) to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of public importance, namely—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The item under routine proceedings intituled "motions" has not yet been concluded.

[Later:]

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), who read his motion a moment ago, should be made aware that by this time I have received a copy of the motion which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) intended to move and, I suppose, by a mere coincidence they are on the same subject. Perhaps I should immediately give my decision as to whether I think a discussion of this matter is one of urgent public importance.

Now, when I consider these words, I am guided by the business which has been announced for today, and this is to be found at page 5620 of Hansard. I see that the first item of business for today has to do with the study of a measure respecting allowances for disabled persons which is to be considered in committee of the whole.

There are other measures which will follow and then later, I understand, there will be a motion to go into supply, at which time hon. members may discuss the matter which is contained in the motion for the adjournment.

Hon. members may say, "Perhaps we will not reach the motion to go into supply today." But if we do not reach it today we may perhaps reach it tomorrow. In any event, on Thursday and Friday we will be going into supply and I would imagine that the estimates for the Department of Trade and Commerce cannot be very much longer delayed. They should be before the house soon. In addition, there are also the estimates of the Department of Agriculture on which this matter can be dealt with.

Therefore, for the dispatch of business and in the interests of order and good business, I think we ought to postpone the discussion of this particular reduction in the price of wheat for perhaps a few hours until we go into supply, or, if we do not go into supply today, at any rate it will not be any longer than a few days hence.

Mr. Drew: Then, Mr. Speaker, I propose to avail myself of the rule to the effect that if twenty members rise on such a motion then the matter must be discussed, and I would ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I perhaps deal with the point the Leader of the Opposition has made. Paragraph 3 of standing order 31 states, relative to the mover:

He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it is in order,—

I think it is in order.

—and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

Since I gave it as my opinion that I did not think it was of urgent public importance in the sense which has always been adopted in practice, I did not, therefore, read it out, and I am not going to ask whether the member has the leave of the house; and, according to our established practice, the matter must rest there.

In this case I am not deciding on a point of order. I am deciding on practice, and by virtue of this standing order it just so happens that it is up to me to decide whether the motion is of urgent public importance. If I do not think it is of urgent public importance and do not read the motion then it is unnecessary to ask whether the hon. member has the leave of the house.

I agree that in years past the strict procedure with respect to standing order 31 was to the effect that the minute a motion was made the Speaker did not have the opportunity of deciding whether he thought it was of urgent public importance. The burden did not lie upon him, and all he had to do was to ask if the hon. member who moved the motion had leave; and if twenty hon. members rose, all the Speaker had to do was to resume his seat and allow the debate to carry on.

However, this standing order was amended in 1927—see Journals, 1927, Tuesday, March 22, page 316 and page 334. Also Hansard, 1927, Tuesday, March 22, page 1426, re: amended rule 39, now standing order 31—and ever since these words have been included, to the effect that the Speaker has to decide whether he thinks it is of urgent public importance, the practice has always been, as established by Mr. Speaker Black and his successors—and I observe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) recalls the establishment of that practice—that if the Speaker thinks that it is not a matter of urgent public importance the matter rests there. See ruling of Mr. Speaker Black, Journals, Friday, 19th February, 1932, page 62, and Hansard, February 19, 1932, pages 360 to 365 inclusive. Also ruling of Mr. Speaker Casgrain, Journals, March 10, 1939, page 178. Also rulings of Mr. Speaker Glen, Journals, February 17, 1944, page 99, and Journals, Friday, 28th April 1944, page 332. Also ruling of Mr. Speaker Fauteux, Journals, July 15, 1946, page 485. Also ruling of Mr. Speaker Macdonald, Hansard, March 5, 1951, page 884, and Journals, March 5, 1951, page 136.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I make one or two comments on this matter of your decision as to whether this is of urgent public importance. I fully realize that your decision, once made, is final and is not subject to appeal. But all I would ask Your Honour to do is to hear a word or two on this point which may perhaps lead you to reconsider that decision.

I am not going to anticipate what would have been said had you ruled otherwise, but I would ask you to consider whether the possibility of this matter being reached at a later stage today is of sufficient reality to justify your decision, appreciating the possibility that it may not be reached for another couple of days if the supply motion should not be reached today.

With regard to the matter which has been raised, a statement of government policy would be a most urgent and important matter. In view of that, I would refer Your Honour to citation 249 in Beauchesne's second edition. I realize it may not be strictly applicable to the full extent in this house in view of some of the rulings which have been made, but nevertheless I would place it before Your Honour for your consideration. It reads:

In doubtful cases, the question of urgency and of importance are left for the house to decide by giving or withholding its support.

The authority for that citation is the manual of procedure in public business of the British House of Commons and for that reason I fully realize that it may not be applicable in this house, but I take the liberty of suggesting to Your Honour that there is some merit in it, and I hope Your Honour will agree, despite the fact that for the moment you have given the decision that it is not urgent. I hope Your Honour will yourself agree that there is some doubt. I think that at the moment you have come down on the side that it is not urgent. I merely suggest that possibly Your Honour might consider that there are two points of view as to its urgency and might therefore regard it as a matter of doubt which should be left to the house to decide. That decision, of course, would be dealt with on the basis of whether or not twenty members rise in support of the motion. What I am asking in effect is that in this case Your Honour should not exercise a firm decision immediately as to the question of urgency but should leave that question to be decided by the house.

Mr. Coldwell: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say just one word. I think your ruling is in accordance with the practice of the house but might I suggest this to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house and to the government. In order to avoid any possibility of this discussion being delayed, I suggest that the government, with the consent of the house, might agree to changing the order of business today and to have this matter come up at 2.30 this afternoon. Then there would be no possibility of any great delay. I make that suggestion, Mr. Speaker, to the government and to the house.

Mr. Harris: On that point, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. I am sure that the legislation before the house will commend itself to hon. members so much that it will be through by 2.30, and we can go on with the motion to go into supply.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I direct to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the question whether, in view of the importance of the issue raised and the need for a clear declaration of policy, he will not consent to this being made a substantive motion and being dealt with immediately. There is no assurance that we shall have any discussion of supply today or tomorrow. The legislation that the house leader of the government has indicated is now coming before us is of importance and may well occupy all of today, tomorrow and even longer. This subject is one which should be clarified immediately. I suggest to the Prime Minister that consideration be given to accepting this as a substantive motion and dealing with it now.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) cannot be serious in suggesting that I can give the unanimous consent of the house. It would be an extremely bad precedent to establish that any one man can give unanimous consent for the house. With respect to the urgency of discussing this matter, may I say this. The most I would be prepared to suggest is that either when we move to go into supply at a time when that motion is to be debated or when we get into suply, the first department called be the Department of Trade and Commerce.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, just by way of reference to the remark of the Prime Minister, let me say this. I am most serious in believing that if the Prime Minister had indicated his consent, all those who are now opposed to this matter being discussed would have readily agreed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his compliment.

Mr. Speaker: In order to conclude my participation in this discussion, may I say this. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has referred to citation 249 of Beauchesne's second edition which reads as follows:

> In doubtful cases, the question of urgency and of importance are left for the house to decide by giving or withholding its support.

If the Speaker thinks that the subject matter of the motion is of urgent public importance, standing order 31 provides that he will ascertain whether the member has the leave of the house to move the motion. Twenty members must rise. If this citation 249 were to apply, the majority would have to decide. Citation 174 of Beauchesne's third edition, in the second paragraph, reads as follows:

> Urgency within this rule—
> That is within standing order 31.
> —does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

In considering the urgency of debating this motion, having regard to the meaning given to "urgency" in citation 174, I have to examine what is already on the order paper for discussion. There is the measure providing allowances for disabled persons. If I recall the debate which took place on second reading of that measure not long ago, it would seem that is a matter of rather urgent public importance. Then on the orders of the day today the acting leader of the house announced that there would be a motion to go into supply. Having regard to all the remarks that were made on both sides of the house with respect to the possibility of moving to go into supply later this day, I think we might perhaps forgo the discussion of this subject for the present. I feel sure that later in the day an opportunity for discussion will be provided on the motion to go into supply.

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON MARKETING OF SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister so that there may be a better understanding of it when this subject comes up for discussion. Is the Prime Minister in a position to announce, on behalf of the government, any government policy in connection with the marketing of our surplus wheat?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is not in a position to announce to the house any government policy different from that which has been followed up to the present time.

REQUEST FOR CO-OPERATION WITH UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether steps will be considered with a view to arriving at some method of co-operation with the United States so that the move made by Canada first on February 16 to cut the price of wheat, now followed by the United States, will not be continued by either country so that the situation will deteriorate into a price war?

Mr. Rowe: It has already started.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce going to answer?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, from our discussions with the responsible members and officials of the United States government, I assure the hon. gentleman that there is no desire on their part or on the part of Canada to get into a price war.

DECLINE IN EXPORTS—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does he not think it is an alarming situation when Canadian exports of wheat have fallen by 60 per cent in the last five weeks compared with the same period in 1953?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend asked that question yesterday and I have an answer prepared which I will give—a considered opinion. The statistics of export clearances quoted by the hon. member for Assiniboia are substantially correct, but I must point out that the results of the last few weeks are not typical of the crop year as a whole. While exports of wheat are down compared with the heavy level of exports in 1952-53, the results are not discouraging. Exports of wheat and flour up to May 26 in the present crop year amounted to 207 million bushels, which is just about the average for the period August to May inclusive for the ten years from 1941-42 to 1951-52, the ten-year period prior to the harvesting of the last three big crops.

Furthermore, the hon. member has compared exports for the month of May this year with those for May a year ago. May I point out that wheat exports in May, 1953, were exceptionally large, reaching a total of some 41 million bushels, compared with average exports of about 22 million bushels for the month of May. May I say that the fourteen weeks strike at the Vancouver elevators had much to do with that situation. Deliveries were being made against overdue contracts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was an election too.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Here is a wisecrack from the hon. member for Prince Albert—

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was an election in the offing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): —who contributes so greatly to the problem of selling wheat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): He regards the problem as one for his amusement and as a subject for his wisecracks. I regard it as something quite different.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Who has the floor, may I ask?

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, that statement is unjustified and does not afford an alibi for the government.

Mr. Chevrier: It is certainly according to the facts.

Mr. Rowe: Unparliamentary, too.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I resume my serious answer to a serious question?

Mr. Fulton: Blind optimism does not do much to sell wheat.

Mr. Speaker: I would be very grateful if hon. members would remain silent. If any unpleasant incident should develop in the house I could not be the arbiter because I cannot hear what is going on.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I assure you, Mr. Speaker, there will be no need for your intervention.

When we make comparisons with May, 1953, therefore, we are making comparisons with a near record export movement for that particular month. When the members of the wheat board appeared before the standing committee on agriculture and colonization the reasons for the reduced wheat trade this year were thoroughly gone into. World trade in wheat this year is down largely because of the bumper crops harvested almost everywhere in the world in 1953 and also because of the general reduction in reserve stocks of wheat in importing countries. Canada has continued to hold a substantial share of the world wheat export business, about as high a share as we had last year.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I must point out that we should not look only at wheat. Exports of oats, rye and flaxseed to May 26 this year are all higher than for a similar period last year, and the figures for barley, while lower than last year, have already exceeded the total reached in the second highest barley export year on record. I am not going to prophesy but it seems likely that, considering all grains and not only wheat, we shall this year probably have the third or fourth highest export year on record.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order. There was a motion made to discuss this question as a matter of urgent public importance and you decided, Mr. Speaker, that this was not the time. If it is not the time to discuss the question on such a motion then it is certainly not proper to debate the question on the orders of the day, which is exactly what we are doing now. I suggest that we discontinue these questions and answers now and proceed as quickly as possible to a time when we can discuss this matter with less heat and more light.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EXCISE AND SALES TAXES—LAY-OFFS AT FORD PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Miss Sybil Bennett (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. In view of the heavy lay-offs in the Ford plants at Windsor and Oakville, will he inform the house whether the government is considering reduction of the excise tax and the sales tax on automobiles in order to encourage sales and thus to increase employment?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having sent notice of this question to my office just before I came into the house. In reply may I say that no consideration has been given to any such policy decision. If and when any such policy has been decided upon, it will be announced to the house in the usual way.

[Later:]

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Halton. Is the government considering any measures to put a stop to the lay-offs of industrial workers that are now taking place, or any measures to put our unemployed industrial workers back to work?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government is considering at all times the whole of the economic situation in Canada, but the government is not considering interfering with the decisions of manufacturing industries in any of the sectors of the Canadian economy.

GRAIN

UNITED STATES SELLING POLICY—REPORTED DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, now that the Prime Minister is answering questions, possibly he will be able to tell us what happened at that conference or meeting at Washington between representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the United States department of agriculture. At that conference did Canada try to dissuade the United States from making a cut of ten cents a bushel in the price of wheat?

Mr. Abbott: Order. Is this a debate?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not attend that conference. All I know is that efforts were made on both sides to meet the present world situation in connection with the marketing of wheat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Abbott: You will not sell 600 million bushels of wheat by asking questions in the House of Commons.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —whether the Prime Minister attended the meeting or not, somebody in the government must have done so.

Mr. Abbott: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Somebody in the government—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —must know what representations Canada made.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will direct the question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Some hon. members may hoot. The western farmer today is hooting too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether or not Canada took a strong stand against the United States making a preliminary cut of ten cents a bushel.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did not attend the conference either. The conference was called to discuss the wheat situation. There are others selling wheat in the world besides Canada and the United States. Discussions took place with respect to whether North America is competitive with the world in selling wheat. No decision was arrived at. The action that the United States took was probably taken in the light of the discussions, but was their decision. The action that was taken yesterday by Canada was Canada's decision. I might say that parliament has placed the responsibility for fixing the price of wheat in the hands of the Canadian wheat board with instructions that the price of Canadian wheat is to be kept competitive with world prices. Those instructions are being carried out. My hon. friend, by showing alarm and concern and telling the world that Canada is in a desperate situation, is not helping to sell Canada's surplus wheat.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The same old alibi.

DROP IN BARLEY EXPORTS IN MONTH OF MAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on another subject, although it is somewhat similar. How does the minister account for the drop in the exports of barley from 18,300,000 bushels to 3,100,000 bushels comparing the same five-week period ending June 2, 1954, with the previous year, which is a drop of 83 per cent?

Mr. Sinclair: He just answered that.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I cannot say why people buy in one month and not in another month. Perhaps my hon. friend knows the answer, but I do not know. As I say, May of last year was an abnormal month for the reason that all exports from Vancouver were cut off for fourteen weeks prior to that month because of the strike at the elevators on the west coast.

IMMIGRATION

DELAY IN EXAMINATIONS AT VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the immigration department any plans under way by which immigration examination of tourists and immigrants can be speeded up at the port of Vancouver so as to avoid six-hour delays in landing, as happened yesterday when the luxury liner Oronsay arrived with some 1,349 passengers?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am not aware of the difficulty that my hon. friend mentions, but I shall look into it and report to the house.

PORK

STATEMENT AS TO EXPORT TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Hamilton West asked a question in connection with the sale of canned pork. She wanted to know whether the condition imposed was that the sale should be outside the North American continent or outside of Canada. The official return of the Minister of Agriculture stated "off the North American continent". I have looked into the matter and find that is correct.

DISABLED PERSONS

PROVISION FOR PAYMENT OF ALLOWANCES—AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Monday, June 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. 462, to provide for allowances for disabled persons—Mr. Martin—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Disabled Persons—Allowances

On clause 3—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the minister is going to deal with the questions which were raised on the second reading of the bill, of which we reminded him briefly last evening. I should like to hear from him as to the definition of permanent and total disability. I should like to hear from him as to the age at which the allowance is to be paid, with particular reference to what some of us deem "the most unkindest cut of all", namely that gap between 16 years of age where the family allowance stops and 18 years of age where the disability allowance can be commenced. Would he also comment on the remarks we have made with regard to the amount of the allowance and the division between the provinces and the federal government? Will he give some information as to how many disabled persons he expects will qualify for this allowance under the provisions set out in the bill, on the assumption that all the provinces come into the arrangement?

Mr. Pouliot: Before the minister answers, Mr. Chairman, I wish to tell him my appreciation of his having mentioned, at page 5325 of Hansard for June 1, 1954, the interest that the hon. member for Terrebonne, the hon. member for Fort William and the hon. member for Temiscouata have taken in this matter. In that connection, I have not sponsored any motion concerning aid to invalids, but I have had a lengthy correspondence with the minister and with the officials of his department concerning many deserving cases.

There are some hon. members who have sponsored motions requesting the government to give aid to invalids, and I must mention particularly the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac, and the hon. member for Bellechasse, who had resolutions standing in their names for that purpose. I should like to bring to your attention, too, the fact that if a pension is awarded to invalids the minister should be highly praised for that, as should the Prime Minister who announced that piece of legislation some months ago. Along with family allowances, the aid to invalids is one of the finest things that could be done. It is done for those who are handicapped by nature or as a result of accidents for which they have not been responsible.

Sometimes the invalid case starts at birth, and it is impossible to describe the devotion of the mothers of handicapped children. They want to look after them. There are hospitals that take care of invalids. There is a lady who has been recently appointed to the Senate who has been the chairman of the board of governors for 15 years of the deaf and dumb institute at Montreal. Many people are interested in the invalids, but those who are most interested in them are the mothers who give birth to handicapped children. We must notice that because of that motherly love they do not want their handicapped children to go to hospitals. They prefer to take care of them themselves. In my county in particular, there is a family in which the father and mother are both normal-appearing. It is a family of ten children, and five of the children are normal, but the others are not. They have suffered from birth. Although mentally they are normal, physically some of them can hardly walk, some are hunchbacked and present one of the saddest cases.

Imagine how deserving is that mother who has taken care of five children like that in her family. I shall not insist upon it, because this legislation will provide for them, and will help the parents take care of these handicapped children at home. This legislation is a step in the right direction, but on the other hand I do not understand why the age limit has been established at 18. Parents who look after the handicapped children need that help from the start, and I hope the legislation will be amended, sooner or later, so that it meets the needs of the most deserving people.

Mr. Shaw: Last night I expressed the hope that the minister would find it possible to give us further information with respect to the expression "permanently disabled". I believe the minister was on the point of rising when the house was adjourned. I do want to join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in requesting the minister to make a statement before we approve clause 3.

Possibly he would like to have all the questions now so that when he does rise he will be able to deal with them. I notice that under clause 3 (e) patients in tuberculosis sanatoria, mental institutions, homes for the aged, infirmaries or institutions for the care of incurables are excluded. Then under paragraph (f), patients who are residents in hospitals, nursing homes, private, charitable or public institutions are excluded except as provided in the regulations. Apparently there are going to be exceptions under that section, and possibly the minister would give the explanation for that. I hope he will deal with it in the course of answering the questions.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): The statement made by the minister when introducing this bill was so comprehensive, Mr. Chairman, that there is very little left that can be usefully said. It is not my intention, therefore, to speak at any length on this subject but I do welcome the initiative taken by the government in sponsoring this measure. It is, I believe, very significant that the disabled persons measure should be introduced at this time, so soon after a federal election campaign, during which the type of assistance referred to in the bill now before the house was not the subject of any election promise.

I am proud to be a supporter of a government that places such a high priority on human welfare. I am proud, too, that the provincial government of Nova Scotia has signified its intention of participating in this new program, and has, indeed, already passed the necessary legislation.

In fact, this was one of the highlights of the legislation recommended in 1954 by our late beloved premier, Angus L. Macdonald, and was one of the last items approved prior to his untimely passing. I know that I speak for the disabled in my constituency, who will benefit under this legislation, when I commend our Prime Minister for his special interest, in having this legislation brought forward, and his able lieutenant, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, for the part he is playing in sponsoring it.

The disabled in our midst have a very special claim on the sympathies of their more fortunate, able-bodied fellow citizens. There are, unhappily, a good many Canadians who, through no fault of their own, are barred through some disability from playing their full part in the life of the nation. But Canadians can be proud of the steps that have been taken in this country to provide for those unfortunate persons suffering from serious disabilities.

For many groups, such as our war veterans, the blind, and others, provision has already been made, through existing federal, provincial and local programs of one kind or another. A good deal of effective work is also being done by service clubs, and by voluntary agencies, such as the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, and others.

The rehabilitation of the disabled has also become an important feature in our legislative programs and, indeed, it is generally agreed that Canada's rehabilitation program for disabled veterans equals that of any other country.

Much has been done, also, through the federal Department of Labour, to train handicapped persons, and to place them in useful productive positions, using the facilities of the national employment service.

Through the new civilian rehabilitation branch of the labour department, federal grants have been made available, to support co-ordinated provincial rehabilitation programs, so that these can achieve maximum coverage and effectiveness. The magnitude of rehabilitation efforts in Canada is indicated by the fact that in 1949 more than 325,000 disabled persons received assistance, under a number of different programs, at a cost of some $110 million.

Then again, since the national health program was instituted in 1948, there has been a continuous increase in the health provisions for our disabled citizens. The crippled children's grant has been extensively used for rehabilitation purposes. Under the tuberculosis control, and the mental health grants, much has been done for persons handicapped by these diseases, while other grants have assisted the victims of arthritis and polio to win their way back to health. Meanwhile governmental assistance has promoted the construction of additional hospital accommodation and, under the professional training grant, health workers have been trained in the technique of rehabilitation of the disabled.

Last year an important step was taken, with the institution of the medical rehabilitation grant, to extend in every province the provisions for disabled persons.

But, despite all that is being done, there still remains a hitherto neglected group of disabled civilians for whom the community as a whole should be prepared to shoulder a share of the responsibility. These are the men and women who will benefit by this new, nation-wide program of disability allowances.

It is well for every member of this house to remember the terms of the resolution, and the provisions of the bill now before us. I note that the age of eligibility has been set at 18 years, and a residence of 10 years is required. I understand it has been estimated that the number of pensioners to be covered under this legislation will run between 25,000 and 35,000, and that the annual cost will represent an expenditure of $12 million to $16 million.

The bill states quite specifically that assistance will be available to those in need, who are "totally and permanently disabled". It would be most unfortunate if members of this house were to convey to their constituents any false impressions as to the extent of the coverage of the present measure.

Some will say that this bill is unduly restrictive; that eligibility should not be limited so rigidly, to those whose disability is total and permanent. I think, however, that if any member of this house were to take the trouble to examine the provisions of similar legislation in the United States and elsewhere, he would find that the measure now being introduced by this government is equally as generous as any similar program now in existence, anywhere.

It should not be forgotten that the ultimate aim of any forward-looking program, on behalf of the handicapped, should not be merely the provision of financial relief but, rather, victory over the handicap. There are many persons now suffering from a temporary or partial disability who could be helped back to a useful, self-supporting existence. It would then, in my view, be a retrograde step if action were now taken to encourage dependency on the part of those persons for whom rehabilitation may be possible.

Only when it proves impossible to help a disabled person to lead a happy and productive life, through his own endeavours, should we consider the provision of a pension. In such cases a pension will provide a guaranteed level of protection, and will represent a very real advance in establishing security for some thousands of our citizens who, up to this time, have had little or no help under our established programs.

No doubt there will be some who will not be satisfied with the present measure—just as there were some who spoke against family allowances, and every other progressive social measure, introduced by Liberal governments over the past 20 years. I, for one, believe in giving credit where credit is due, and I should therefore like to commend the government upon this important, humane and far-reaching social measure.

Summing up, Mr. Chairman, the social legislation introduced for Canadians, by successive Liberal governments, has provided a degree of security for our elder citizens, and has ensured at least a minimum of well-being for the very young; we have shown gratitude to our veterans and their dependents, through unsurpassed veterans legislation; the youth of our country have been assisted in their educational program, through special students grants, vocational training, grants to universities, and so on. Labour legislation has been introduced to make easier the lot of the labouring man. Unemployment insurance benefits are available for those temporarily out of work. Our people, generally, have benefited by extensive health and welfare legislation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have the disabled persons bill, and I am sure that all these other groups of Canadians will welcome this measure with that spirit of generosity towards the needy which has always been characteristic of our citizens.

[Mr Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough).]

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Chairman, before the minister replies to the questions asked I should like to put a question to him. In his statement to the house on the motion for second reading, when referring to the negotiations with the various provincial governments, he said, as reported at page 5325 of Hansard for June 1:

> There have been no official indications as yet from the provinces of Quebec and Prince Edward Island as to their intentions.

This statement has caused no little concern to the people of Prince Edward Island, and I wonder if, when the minister is answering the questions, he would bring the committee up to date on the recent negotiations with the government of Prince Edward Island on this vital question.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a word to what has been said by hon. members, particularly with regard to the age limit of 18 years. I understand there are difficulties of administration, and also that the government has to draw the line somewhere. Undoubtedly it made a survey of the number of people affected by this legislation.

I have in mind one family in my own constituency in which, unfortunately, there are three children who are permanently and totally disabled. I am thinking of the very heavy burden placed upon that young couple in connection with the raising of those children. I think of the great amount of care they are putting into it, the difficulties with which they are faced, and the terrific burden they must endure.

I have known of other cases where the members of a family have had to look after one in that family who has been totally and permanently disabled. I contend that in a family where there are three in that condition there is far more hardship, far greater need for care and for assistance, and the case is much more deserving than are other cases—deserving as they may be. Before he leaves this discussion I should like the minister to comment on whether or not, under the regulations, there would be some way to take care of two or more cases in one family. I see no reason why some provision should not be made, in those provinces where they wish to do it, to assist those families that I am sure are more deserving than any others where there is only one disabled person in the family and where the person has reached the age of 18.

When the minister is speaking I should like him to give some estimate of the number of people who he expects will be covered by this legislation and to whom assistance will be given.

Mr. Barnett: I do not intend to discuss this clause at any length, but as some of other hon. members have said, the phrasing of the various subclauses raises some questions in my mind as to just what the ultimate result of the application of the clause will be under the regulations that are drawn. The particular point that I should like to raise is a question that concerns paragraph (f) of clause 3 which says that a person may be eligible if he:

is not a patient or resident in a hospital, nursing home, or private, charitable or public institution, except as prescribed in the regulations;

I can readily understand the restriction in paragraph (c) where people are excluded from receiving the benefits under this measure if they are receiving benefits from other public plans. But the question in my mind is as to the application of the principle. It seems to me that paragraph (f) is in effect placing some citizens in a category different from those who may not be in a position to receive private charity. It seems to me that if we are to introduce a measure which provides benefits from public funds for disabled persons, it should be considered as a right of any citizen of the country, provided that they meet the qualifications in other respects. In other words, we should not place some of our citizens in the position that where they feel that because, for one reason or another, they are in receipt of private charity they are to be excluded from the benefits of this legislation. I feel that that will be the result of the application of this measure. It is not a good way to start out.

Mr. Martin: Your interpretation is right.

Mr. Barnett: It is not a good way to start out with a measure of this kind. As indicated by other members of my group, I certainly feel this measure is a necessary step in the right direction; but if we are to put some of the disabled people in Canada in the position where they feel that because they are recipients of private charity they are not eligible—

Mr. Martin: I said your interpretation was right.

Mr. Barnett: Perhaps the minister has not correctly understood the interpretation that I am trying to make of this paragraph. When the minister is speaking on this clause I would appreciate it if he would expand upon what is the intent of paragraph (f). I am more interested in understanding the minister's interpretation than I am perhaps in his understanding of my interpretation.

Mr. Martin: I agree with the hon. member, and that is the intent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister not give a reply as the various clauses are dealt with? We are now dealing with clause 3. One of the most important questions to be decided is a definition of "totally and permanently disabled". The clause provides that the definition will be prescribed by the regulations. Having regard to the fact that the essence of this bill is the payment of allowances within the limitations provided to those who are totally and permanently disabled, the minister should advise the committee what the tentative definition of those words will be so that we might be able to make suggestions to cover a subject matter very difficult to define.

Before this clause is carried he might also give to the committee an indication of the degree to which negotiations have taken place with the various provinces to the end that the definition of another question might be arrived at by agreement between the federal government and the various provinces. I would appreciate it very much if the minister would place before the committee the definition he has in mind for incorporation in the regulations, or at least that definition which will constitute a tentative one and will be representative of the view of the government.

Mr. Zaplitny: I have only a brief word to say on this clause. Generally, I support this legislation very happily because it so happens there is on the order paper a resolution in my name calling for such legislation.

There are two paragraphs in clause 3 to which I should like to refer. The first is subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (a) of subclause 2, the part which has to do with residence qualifications. It specifies that the applicant must have been in Canada for 10 years or more. There may be some particular reason for setting 10 years as the minimum. I hope the minister will give us the reason, if there is a good case for it.

I should like to draw to his attention something that I have mentioned before on different legislation, namely, that when immigrants come to this country they come under the auspices or jurisdiction of the federal government. They come presumably in good health; otherwise they would not pass their medical examination. If something should happen before they have been here 10 years and they should become disabled, at the present time they would have to apply to their local authority, that is, to the municipality, the town or the city, as the case may be, for assistance. It would appear to be rather unfair to the local authorities to require them to take on the responsibility for persons who entered Canada in good health, and through no fault of their own became disabled. I would urge that the minister reconsider this particular subparagraph to see if a shorter length of residence qualification may not be agreed upon. I shall leave it at that point until we hear the reply.

I go on to the next paragraph with which I am concerned, namely, (e), to which the hon. member for Red Deer has already referred. This paragraph specifies the persons who are excluded as those who are patients of tuberculosis sanatoria, mental institutions, homes for the aged, infirmaries or institutions for the care of incurables. I am not going to say anything about the first two exclusions, but when we come to the home for the aged and the infirmaries or institutions for the care of incurables I have this to say. The minister is aware of the fact that across Canada there are many excellent voluntary organizations and institutions which are doing their best to take care of persons in that class. Very often they have to depend on public charity in order to make ends meet. The income that they usually derive from pension and other assistance to persons who are patients in that institution does not cover the cost of operating the institution, and it appears to be a bit unfair to leave out persons who are being taken care of by these voluntary institutions, often, as I said, at the cost of having to go to the general public and beg for funds in order to keep the institution going.

I certainly hope that at least the provision contained in paragraph (f), where it provides that there may be some exceptions, may be made applicable to paragraph (e), because I think there will be cases coming up where that will become necessary. I hope the minister will consider these two points.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may deal with these questions now before we pass this clause. I thank members of the committee for their useful suggestions.

First of all, in answer to the hon. member for Prince, I think I should say that I already mentioned in the house in my statement in chief that as far as we were aware enabling legislation had been provided in eight of the 10 provinces. Undoubtedly the impression created by that observation was that in the case of the provinces of Quebec and Prince Edward Island no such enabling legislation existed, and that possibly there was not going to be any support given by these provinces to this measure.

The premier of the government of Prince Edward Island called me on the telephone and pointed out that his government intended to take advantage of this legislation just as quickly as possible. I pointed out to him that there was no enabling legislation in the province of Prince Edward Island and it was because of that that I made the statement to which he had directed my attention.

He intimated that his government had considered the matter and they were of the opinion that no enabling legislation was necessary in that province. He assured me without reservation that Prince Edward Island was going to join the scheme. I can therefore now say that there are nine provinces which will undoubtedly take advantage of the legislation, and I am hopeful that all the provinces in Canada will eventually take advantage.

With regard to the observations made by the hon. member for Dauphin, I think he has made several valuable suggestions, and I can only give him my reaction to them.

With regard to the qualifying residence period of 10 years, the hon. member will note that that is the same period required in the case of blind persons, and as this is disability legislation we are anxious to have both acts conform, one with the other, as closely as possible, consistent with the wishes of the majority of the provinces.

The question of residence was discussed with the provinces and every one of them was of the opinion that this qualifying period of 10 years was desirable. In the case of family allowances there is a lesser period of one year but the circumstances, I think, are different. In any event, this was the wish of most of the provinces. It conformed to our own thinking at the time because of our desire to see that this measure should be as consistent as we could make it with the blindness allowances act.

On the question my hon. friend raised regarding paragraphs (e) and (f), the problems he has noted have been very much in our minds and the reason for (f) is that we hope by regulation—and it is only by regulation that we can deal with this kind of situation—to try to meet the kind of cases he had in mind, and which were also referred to by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. The words "except as prescribed by regulation" in paragraph (f) will mitigate somewhat the exclusive result created by the general terms of paragraph (e).

Much has been made today and last week of the fact that the bill does not define "total and permanent disability." Now, as the hon. member for Prince Albert has pointed out, this is a very difficult matter to define. The hon. member for Lanark thought we should define total and permanent disability in the bill. But I am sure on reflection he would agree that is neither desirable nor possible.

In the Ontario measure, which we have followed very closely, there has not even been an attempt to define it under the regulations as we are going to do. The experience in Ontario has been that it was best not to define it at all. They did not even propose to do it by regulation as we are going to do. We have examined the legislation in over 30 states in the United States. Our officers have visited and talked to the officials there, and the vast majority of the states do not in their legislation define total and permanent disability. In one or two instances where it has been defined in the law itself they have got into all sorts of trouble because experience has shown that there is need for change. The best judgment we could get from the states we visited, and from Ontario, Alberta, and Newfoundland, where they have had some experience, was that we should not define it in the bill, except to state it in general terms, and that we should try instead to define it by regulation.

We will do exactly what the hon. member for Prince Albert suggested, namely, we will submit to the provinces a definition for regulation purposes which, of course, will receive their consideration and, we hope, approval.

As I said when I spoke in the house, what we have in mind is a definition along the lines of what they have generally used in Ontario by the use of the words "permanent and total disability". We mean a disability is "permanent" in the sense that it cannot be corrected within the foreseeable future, and we mean "total" in the sense that a person cannot perform the ordinary activities of daily living without the assistance of another person.

In the definition we have in mind we do not intend to have the limitation which now exists in Alberta of a twelve-month period. I think we will have no difficulty, in fact, I know we will have no difficulty, with the province of Alberta in that particular.

In order to give the committee an indication of our intentions as regards the kind of regulation which we hope will represent the wishes of both the provinces and ourselves, I might add that we will mean by "permanent" a disability to which the concept of cure cannot be applied and which is not likely to improve, or which is likely to continue throughout the lifetime of the individual.

That does not mean to say that that necessarily will be the case. It does not mean to say that rehabilitation measures will not be pursued as they are going to be pursued, and as other sections of the act indicate. But that would be a guide.

Total disability will be regarded as total—and I am not now suggesting what the regulations will be, but what we are thinking about—if, as a result of the impairment, a person is severely limited in activities pertaining to self-care or normal living.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question? What exactly did he mean in the reference he made a moment ago to the fact that a person would require the assistance of another person?

Mr. Martin: In some of the states that is their definition but it would not necessarily be ours. The general characterization I used was taken from the Ontario pamphlet describing the operation of the Ontario legislation. It is the Ontario pamphlet which says that disability must be permanent in the sense that it cannot be corrected in the foreseeable future and total in the sense that a person cannot perform the ordinary activities of daily living without the assistance of another person. That is the Ontario requirement. When I referred to this matter the other day I did not use the phrase "without the assistance of another person". That is the Ontario characterization but it is not an exclusive definition. It is just a characterization given in the Ontario pamphlet as an indication of what they have in mind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A kind of rule of thumb.

Mr. Martin: A rule of thumb, a norm; something to approach. Because of the lack of a detailed definition, what they have done in Ontario and in Alberta is to use their good judgment in each case, to look at the context and to see whether in that context, having in mind all the circumstances, the person comes within the kind of general rule of thumb to which my hon. friend refers.

As to the age of 18, may I say that in the Alberta act the age is 21 and in the Ontario act the age is 18. The age of 18 represents the age desired by the majority of the provinces. I will not say that if all the provinces come into this program the qualifying age will be 18 in all cases. I think that some of the provinces may want to stay at 21. But 18 was the earliest age to which the provinces were prepared to go. No province thought that at this time we should go below the age of 18, which is the age in the Ontario act and is the age which we think we at this time should follow.

Likewise, the amount of the allowance is one that first of all is consistent with the benefits paid under the Old Age Security Act, the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act and was the amount to which the provinces agreed. No province suggested more. In fact, I cannot say that all the provinces will be prepared to pay disability allowances at $40. However, I hope they will be prepared to do so. In any event, there would be no difficulty, under the act, in their having either some age higher than 18 or an amount less than the amount for which we are providing basically in the act.

As I said in my statement in chief, we hope that this measure will cover roughly between 25,000 and 35,000 persons. It is difficult to estimate what the number will be. When we decided on this measure we had to make certain estimates, naturally, as to cost. That is something which it is not very easy to do. However, using the figures in Alberta and in Ontario we roughly concluded that we would be covering a group numbering between 25,000 and 35,000.

The kind of case which my friend, the hon. member for Yorkton, had in mind obviously cannot be covered by this measure. This is a measure for disabled people. However, in the case he mentioned, I am sure that by rehabilitation measures some mitigation of the difficulty could be anticipated.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think I need to comment on any further matter that has been raised, except to indicate that there might be in this bill features that would not be there if it were dependent entirely on the act of the federal government alone. But this is an attempt to meet a need in a co-operative partnership with the provinces. It represents the most common denominator that could be arrived at. We do not want to put in the bill provisions which we know the provinces would be unwilling to accept or which they would find it difficult to accept. With those comments I think I may say that we look forward to this act providing, in co-operation with the provinces, valuable assistance and help to an extremely important group of our people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the minister make one further explanation. It is in connection with section 3, subsection 2 (f), which reads as follows:

(f) is not a patient or resident in a hospital, nursing home, or private, charitable or public institution, except as prescribed in the regulations;

That provision denies a person payment of this allowance while a patient in the institution named, "except as prescribed in the regulations". What has the minister in mind to include in the regulations in order to restrict what, on the face of it, would appear to be a limitation that goes too far? To what degree does the minister contemplate offering to the provinces the suggestion, to be accepted by them, that under certain circumstances such a patient would be entitled to payment?

Mr. Martin: On the surface it does seem to be restrictive. The purpose of having in the bill the phrase "as prescribed in the regulations" is to permit giving disability allowances, under certain circumstances, to certain people who are actually assuming the financial responsibility for the care they are receiving. This bill follows the lines of the Ontario act. It is not intended to provide disability allowances to the institutions that are provided for by the community, the municipality or the province. While the provision in paragraph (e) is not as exclusive as that in paragraph (d), nevertheless some of these institutions—hospital, nursing home or private, charitable or public institution—may be institutions providing care to people who are receiving moneys at the public expense. It is not intended to provide disability pensions for them unless they are actually providing for themselves. The only way we can deal with the matter in respect to all the many kinds and varieties of institutions is to wait until we are faced with a particular kind of situation. Then, if it comes within the category we intend to cover we will frame regulations so as to permit us to pay the disabled people being cared for therein. This provision is generally the same as the one in Ontario.

Mr. Knowles: When the minister was answering the point about the requirement of ten years' residence in Canada in order to qualify for this allowance, he said it was felt by the government that this legislation should be made to conform, as far as possible, to the Blind Persons Act, in view of the fact that both of them might be regarded as disability legislation. He pointed out that the ten-year requirement is in the Blind Persons Act and, as I say, he indicated that, in his view, that was one reason for having the ten-year requirement in this legislation. Without accepting that as a reason for the ten-year requirement being justifiable in either case, may I ask the minister why that argument is not carried over to the question of the division of the costs between the federal government and the provinces? As he knows, under the Blind Persons Act the division is on a 75-25 basis whereas in this legislation, which he characterizes as being comparable to the Blind Persons Act, the split is 50-50. My reasons for urging that the split be 75-25 rather than 50-50 are, in the main, two in number. First, I think that recognition should be given—and a 75-25 split would accord that recognition—to the fact that a great many people who might be regarded as disabled persons are covered by provincial moneys of one kind or another; and if they are covered by grants in the form of mothers allowance, assistance from the province or from the municipality or are in various homes, they are excluded from receiving assistance under the legislation which is now before us. As I say, I think that recognition should be given to the fact that a great deal of provincial and municipal money is going to the assistance of persons who are disabled or incapacitated in one way or another. My other reason for urging a 75-25 split rather than 50-50 is, as I indicated at an earlier stage, that it would make it possible for the provinces with their more limited resources to pay their share of a higher allowance and their share of an allowance that might start at an earlier age.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the minister as to the age at which the allowance would start. I noted in particular his statement that the mere fact that the age of 18 is set out in the bill does not mean that all the provinces will start at 18 but that in a sense it is permissive legislation as is the maximum amount of $40.

Mr. Martin: I think most of them will.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to hear that. I am hoping they will. Since the age of 18 is in a sense a permissive figure that is all the more reason why the age of 16 might have been inserted in this bill so that any province that wished to take advantage of it could do so. I believe there is only one province, and I am glad there is only one, which does not take advantage of the full amount provided under the Old Age Assistance Act. This act is set up in the same way. It is possible for a province under this legislation to pay something less than $40 and to start it at a higher age than 18.

One cannot force these things on the provinces, but if it were a 75-25 split rather than 50-50 the provinces would be in a better position to carry their share of the cost of legislation of this kind. However, I should like to hear from the minister as to why he does not feel that this legislation should conform to the Blind Persons Act in that other respect, namely, splitting the cost 75-25.

Mr. Martin: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: I said I should like to hear from the minister on that point.

Mr. Martin: It is just a matter of policy. We felt we had saved the provinces a great deal by assuming full responsibility for the 70 and over group, and that was one of the reasons.

Mr. Knowles: I feel that the provinces are saving the federal government considerable money—

Mr. Martin: I know. You made that point.

Mr. Knowles: —to the extent that, even with this legislation, they are being left with many people for whom they will still have to care. I think the federal government should have gone further and should have put this on a 75-25 basis rather than 50-50.

Mr. McIvor: Ontario.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to ask the minister a question about subclause 2 (f). I did not get the minister's full explanation with respect to nursing homes or private institutions. I have in mind a man who is only 61 years of age and is in a private nursing home. He will never get any better. It is taking practically all the income of the family to keep him there, but he refuses to be moved to some provincial institution.

Mr. Martin: That is the purpose of (f).

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Will he be covered?

Mr. Martin: That is the purpose of (f).

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Will he be covered?

Mr. Martin: I do not know all the facts, but that is the kind of case we have in mind in (f).

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The regulations would be extended to cover that type of person if it were proven that the family could not keep him?

Mr. Martin: That is the kind of situation we have in mind in (f).

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): But it would have to be proven that the family could not keep him before this legislation would be of any use to them?

Mr. Martin: Not necessarily. It depends upon who is keeping him. That is the kind of situation we want to cover by this clause.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): You would cover it?

Mr. Martin: I say that is the kind of situation.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Wait. If they could pay for him he would not be covered?

Mr. Martin: No. What we are trying to do under (f) is to deal with the situation of people who are in certain kinds of private institutions and are not being cared for by the state in one form or another. If in the case you have mentioned the family is paying fully for the care of that person, obviously that person should qualify and under this provision will qualify. That is the very reason for clause (f) to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. Shaw: On a previous occasion I raised the question of physical and/or mental disability. May I conclude that the definition of totally and permanently disabled will be broad enough to cover a person who is mentally retarded but is not confined to an institution?

Mr. Martin: I forgot to deal with that earlier. As my hon. friend knows, in Alberta that kind of person originally could not qualify. They have amended their regulations, and certainly that would meet our situation.

Mr. Knowles: I have one other question. In the Labour Gazette of April, 1952, at page 424, I find that at the formation of the national advisory committee on rehabilitation the Minister of Labour—

> . . . announced that the ultimate objective of the rehabilitation program was to make available to the estimated 100,000 seriously disabled persons of working age in Canada the best treatment obtainable and the possibility of becoming rehabilitated to the point of being able to earn their own living . . .

I should like the minister to relate the 25,000 to 35,000 persons whom he expects to be covered by this legislation—that includes persons 18 years of age and over—with the figure of 100,000 seriously disabled persons of working age in Canada as indicated by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Martin: A lot of the cases to which the Minister of Labour referred were of course veterans, workmen's compensation cases, total hospital cases and so on.

Mr. Knowles: I am not too sure about that. I believe the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough put figures on that point on the record this morning, and if one includes the types of cases now referred to by the minister the figure would be much higher than 100,000. I understand that the Minister of Labour was referring to people who are not now obtaining treatment. He said that the purpose was to make available to the estimated 100,000 seriously disabled persons of working age in Canada the best treatment obtainable and the possibility of becoming rehabilitated.

Mr. Martin: I cannot add anything to what I have said the situation is. I cannot say any more.

Mr. Knowles: Then I point out that there is a terrific gap between the number who will be covered under this legislation, with its restrictive provisions, and the number of seriously disabled persons of working age in Canada.

Mr. Kickham: I should like to say a word or two on this section. I want to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare on the introduction of this most necessary legislation. I think members of the House of Commons and the people of Canada generally felt the need of including in our social security program the very persons whom this legislation is meant to cover. I think it will round out our social security program. I cannot think of any other group in Canada who will be excluded once this legislation has been passed.

I like the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the federal government should pay 75 per cent of the cost and the provinces 25 per cent. This would be most acceptable, particularly in the four Atlantic provinces, because as the government and the minister appreciate it is most difficult for those provinces to raise the necessary funds on a dollar for dollar matching basis. I am thinking also of patients who have been hospitalized in sanatoria. This might not apply in the other provinces of Canada but I know that it applies in the province of Prince Edward Island. When the patient becomes sufficiently well to be discharged from the sanatorium our province provides no assistance for this arrested case, except I believe some form of relief which would not amount to more than $10 or $15 per month. I feel quite confident such persons would become eligible for aid under this new legislation.

I repeat that this legislation is evidence of the keen interest and the anxiety that our present Minister of National Health and Welfare has for every man, woman and child in Canada. As the member for Antigonish-Guysborough said this morning, it is indicative of the interest this government takes in every citizen in Canada. We do not wait until the public demands the passage of such beneficial legislation for our citizens. We did the same thing in 1951-52 when legislation was introduced covering our old age security program. I just wish again to congratulate our minister and the government upon the introduction of this most beneficial legislation.

Mr. Castleden: I should like to make this remark in closing, Mr. Chairman. We have tried not to talk too much about the political side of this question, but I have heard a number of speeches today about the great Liberal party and what it has been doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Castleden: I should like to point out this one simple fact. Before this bill has gone through the house, practically every province in Canada has passed enabling legislation to carry out the purposes of this measure. This is a sign that this government is late in introducing the measure.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Amount of payments by government of Canada.

Mr. Zaplitny: Is it correct to assume that all the cost of administration will be borne by the provinces, or will the federal government contribute in some form?

Mr. Martin: We will pay our own costs and they will bear theirs.

Mr. Knowles: How do they compare?

Mr. Martin: I will tell you that next year.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is not usually so ill-informed about his own legislation. Has he no idea as to how the administration costs will compare, as between what will fall upon the provincial governments and what will fall upon the federal government?

Mr. Martin: I would not want to speculate.

Mr. Knowles: What is the matter with the minister today?

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Census records.

Mr. Montgomery: This clause refers to census records taken more than 30 years ago. I should like the minister to comment on that point. When that happens to be the only method of proving age, it is a long way to go back.

Mr. Knowles: Especially for someone only 20 years of age.

Mr. Montgomery: I was wondering why that could not be made a lesser period.

Mr. Martin: I do not think that would help us. The 30-year period, I think, is quite justified. We want to have the records as accurate as possible and that was thought, by the census officials, to be desirable. It is the same as the old age assistance provision.

Mr. Zaplitny: I was going to raise the same point, and I do not believe the minister's answer is quite satisfactory. I have had considerable experience in recent years in matters of this kind, and I know there are many people in Canada who will not be able to go back 30 years because they may not be 30 years of age or may not have lived in Canada for 30 years. The applicable words in the clause are, "contained in the returns of any census taken more than 30 years before the date of the application for such information." The reference is to more than 30 years. In the prairie provinces, as the minister may know, the census is taken every five years, whereas we understand in the rest of Canada it is taken every ten years. This will mean a person may have to go back 35 years or in eastern Canada perhaps 40 years. I see no particular reason for it.

I have had considerable correspondence with respect to a similar matter under a different act, and I have yet to understand the reason for going back 30, 35 or 40 years in order to compare the census records with the claimed age of the applicant. The procedure will be useless for a large number of people. I certainly hope the minister will consider shortening the period. After all, there will be cases, as the hon. member to my right mentioned, where that will be the only method of proving age. If a person happens to have lived in Canada only 20 years, and he is asked to go back to census records 30 years ago, obviously that procedure is of no value to him. The same would be true of a person younger than 30 years of age. Since the second census records in most parts of Canada are available at ten-year intervals, it means a person may have to go back 40 or 50 years.

Mr. Martin: I want to say that there is quite a lot in what the hon. member said. But the census is by no means the most accurate way of proving age. As a matter of fact, it is not any proof at all, in the final analysis. We have not had a great deal of difficulty with this same procedure under the old age security measure. The dominion bureau of statistics, under whom the census comes, have asked us to leave this in and try it to see how it works. I think there is a lot to what the hon. member said, but we will see how it works.

Mr. Zaplitny: Under the old age security regulations no provision is made for a tribunal in case of failure to prove age by any documentary evidence.

Mr. Martin: We will do the same here.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am hoping there will be such a provision under this measure.

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Provisions of agreement.

Mr. Shaw: Those of us who were around here about 12 years ago might recall a three-hour debate that revolved around the word "domicile". If my memory serves me correctly, we were no nearer a solution at the end of three hours than we were at the beginning. For that reason, I hesitate to ask this question. In paragraph (d) subparagraph (v), we see the word "residence" used. Could the minister indicate to us what the department has in mind? It says:

. . . where a recipient, who has been granted an allowance, transfers his residence to some place out of Canada—

I believe that is of some concern because we do know of persons who find it necessary to leave the country, sometimes for rather extended periods, in search of treatment. I would be quite concerned, for that reason, if the word "residence" were not quite clearly defined. After all, it would be tragic if we later found that because a person was out of the country three or four months following the doctor's orders, he might be barred from further payments under the act. Would the minister indicate what the thinking of his officials may be in this respect?

Mr. Martin: I recall the difficulty to which my hon. friend referred, and of course with regard to the word "domicile" there is a difficulty because a person can be domiciled in a place without living there. This has produced all sorts of difficulties, as lawyers know. I do not believe the same difficulty is experienced with residence. It is the place where a person normally is in residence. We shall do our best to interpret these measures as fairly and as liberally as we can.

Mr. Knowles: Is it clear from this clause—and I am looking at 7 (d) (ii)—that there is no minimum length of time that a person has to be within any one province in order to qualify for the allowance? I take it he has to be in Canada 10 years, but that he can get it in whatever province he has resided for the longest period of time during that 10 years.

Mr. Martin: So far as the federal act is concerned, that is so.

Mr. Knowles: Have the provinces the right to make regulations any more restrictive in that respect?

Mr. Martin: They have the power to make regulations. Under section 7 (a) the province may specify the minimum age of a recipient, and any other condition of eligibility set forth in the provincial law. I do not think they will, but that is the fact.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest the minister should be more communicative on that point.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. Martin: I cannot be more communicative without being needlessly loquacious—or characteristically loquacious.

Mr. Knowles: The latter is correct.

Mr. Martin: All right, if you will; I am willing to give in to anything to meet the hon. member. I cannot say anything more than that. I do not think the provinces will. If they do wish to, the power is there.

Mr. Knowles: The expectation is that—

Mr. Martin: The expectation is that they will not.

Mr. Knowles: And that, so long as a person is 10 years in Canada, and meets the other conditions, he will be able to qualify for the allowance in some one of the provinces?

Mr. Martin: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 8 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 13—Coming into force.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the minister could break down, now, and tell us when it is intended to have this act come into force.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend heard me say on many occasions, "just as soon as possible", and that is the situation here.

Mr. Knowles: I have been hearing the minister say that ever since he became a minister.

Mr. Martin: The minister is a highly efficient man, and does things as quickly as he can.

Mr. Knowles: In this case, at what point will the minister's high efficiency and speed result in this act coming into force?

Mr. Martin: I hope just as quickly as it is possible under the circumstances so to do. And may I say to my hon. friend, seriously, that we want to have it proclaimed as quickly as possible so that the great benefits of this act may go to the people we intend to cover.

Mr. Knowles: Will the act be proclaimed in this calendar year?

Mr. Martin: You have something to say about that.

Mr. Zaplitny: I understand nine of the ten provinces have indicated their participation in the act. Is it the intention of the government to wait for the tenth province before having it proclaimed, or will that not be a factor in the date which will be set?

Mr. Martin: I would want to give that more thought. I do not think—no, I can say that we will proclaim this measure as quickly as we can. We will not wait for all the ten provinces, because all of them might not come in. I think they are all going to come in, and I am hoping that every province will come in—even that province which has not now enabling legislation. I am hoping that it will signify its formal intention soon to take advantage of this measure.

Mr. Knowles: There is no reason why it could not be proclaimed this month, is there?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend asks me questions the answers to which are perfectly obvious.

Mr. Knowles: What is the obvious answer to that question?

Mr. Martin: That is obvious.

Mr. Montgomery: May each province have a separate agreement?

Mr. Martin: Yes, as soon as this measure is passed by the other place we will then seek to have agreements concluded with each province. As a matter of fact I may say, just to show that there is no waste of time on our part, that we are ready now to sit down and discuss the matter with the provinces, and to sign.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Martin moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before this bill passes I want to say once again that we welcome it most wholeheartedly. We are glad to see legislation of this kind being put upon the statute books of this country. I wish to make it clear, however, that we will continue to work for improvements in this as in other social security legislation. We believe that the amount of the allowance should be brought up to $60, and that it should be payable at the age of 16. We believe that the split between the federal government and the provinces should be on a ratio of 75-25 rather than 50-50; and we believe that if the means test cannot be abolished at least the permissible income ceilings should be raised.

For these and other improvements we shall continue to work.

Mr. Sinclair: You should be on a radio give-away program.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

PROVISION OF VARIOUS BENEFITS TO MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

The house in committee on Bill No. 101, respecting benefits for members of the Canadian forces—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Harris: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING POLICING, HARBOUR TOLLS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, June 7, consideration in committee of Bill No. 421, to amend the National Harbours Board Act—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose previously clause 3 had been allowed to stand.

On clause 3—Police constables.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, since the adjournment of the discussion of this clause yesterday, I, together with my parliamentary assistant, have had an opportunity to consider the suggestions which were made by the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. The committee will remember that the clause is one having to do with the appointment of peace officers. The point raised by the hon. member for Prince Albert was that the national harbours board should not take unto itself greater powers than the Canadian National Railways have taken in the appointment of such peace officers, and that the appointment should be made by a judge of the superior court or the county court judge. Perhaps the point is well taken, and it will be possible to propose an amendment in the course of the next few minutes which I think will meet the difficulty.

However, after very careful consideration, it has not been possible to meet the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I refer to the mileage over which the peace officers would have jurisdiction, and the suggestion that it should be reduced from 25 miles to 5 miles or 1 mile. There is a serious difficulty in the city of Montreal which could well arise in other cities such as Vancouver. It has been brought to my attention that the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines gave careful consideration to this matter and saw fit to recommend the bill to the house with an amendment reducing the jurisdiction from 50 miles to 25 miles. That committee gave it careful consideration, and so did we, and we feel that there should not be a further reduction. I should therefore like to ask my colleague, the Minister of Finance, to move the following amendment.

Mr. Abbott: I move that clause 3 of Bill 421, an act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, be amended by striking out lines 29 and 30 on page 1 thereof and line 1 on page 2 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"4A. (1) Any superior court judge within whose jurisdiction property under the administration of the board is situated may, upon application to him by the board, appoint any person as a police constable for the enforcement of this act and the bylaws"

Mr. Chevrier: Then of course the clause would go on to read just as it is in the bill, together with subclause 2 and clause 4.

[Mr. Abbott.]

I am also asking my colleague, the Minister of Finance, to move another amendment.

Mr. Abbott: I move that the said clause 3 be further amended by adding to the proposed new section 4A the following additional subsection:

"(3) Any superior court judge referred to in subsection (1) or the board may dismiss any police constable appointed under that subsection, whereupon all powers, duties and privileges belonging to or vested in such constable by virtue of this section are terminated."

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this amendment meets in large measure the objections that I took yesterday to the previous clause 4A, which would have given the board the authority to appoint police officers. This provides that a superior court judge within whose jurisdiction property under the administration of the board is situated may appoint any person as a police officer for the enforcement of this act, also dismiss anyone appointed under that subclause. That in general covers the situation raised by myself as to the danger to our system of having appointments of police officers made by boards. In so far as it covers that question it removes a major source of objection.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, dealing with the second point raised by the minister, I might point out he has declined—

The Chairman: Order. I wonder if we might dispose of the discussion on the amendment before we proceed to other aspects of this subject? Is there any further discussion on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: No.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: I also have a second amendment moved by Mr. Abbott dealing with the same subject. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say that that meets the objection that was taken. Apparently any objection to this method of appointment did not go before the committee, and I felt yesterday when I raised the matter that it encompassed a dangerous situation. I want to thank my hon. friend for giving consideration to the introduction of an amendment such as this, which covers the points which I raised.

Mr. Chevrier: May I suggest to the hon. member that he try to convince his colleague as regards the soundness of the present position?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I had quite a job convincing the government.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, we now come to consideration of clause 3 as amended and the point which worries us is that the national harbours board under this clause will have the power to have constables appointed who will have jurisdiction 25 miles beyond the national harbours board property in any direction.

We believe that that is both unnecessary and unwise, and I propose to move an amendment cutting that distance down from 25 to 1 mile. It is significant, Mr. Chairman, that if we turn to the Railway Act, which the minister has followed in making the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert, we find that a judge appointing a constable under the Railway Act for a railway company can appoint that constable only to act on and along such railway.

These qualifying words can be found in the last line of subsection 1 of section 456 of the Railway Act. In other words, the judge appoints a constable to act only on and along that particular railway.

Now, it is worth while to see just what powers the harbour commissioners and the national harbours board have had in the past in the appointment of constables. For example, I find this provision contained in the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners Act, chapter 54 of the 1913 statutes, under section 19, which gives the power to make bylaws, and we find that the corporation may make bylaws for the following purposes:

(b) To regulate and control navigation and all works or operations within the harbour and to appoint constables and other officers to enforce the same or to enforce the provisions of any statute or marine regulation.

Obviously the power there was merely to appoint constables to act on the property of the Vancouver harbour commissioners and to enforce any statutes or marine regulations which applied to the harbour commissioners' property.

I have not had an opportunity of looking up the acts setting up the other harbour commissions, but I presume that much the same powers were granted in each case. The intention obviously was that these harbour commissions could appoint someone to look after their own property and the goods passing over that property.

Then, when the national harbours board was set up in 1936 and given power to take over the control of the seven national harbours in Canada, we find that it was given power under section 4 as follows:

The board may employ such professional, technical and other officers, clerks and employees as it may deem necessary for the proper conduct of its business.

Under that authority the board, at least in Vancouver, and I presume the same is true of the other national ports, had the power to appoint a small local force to keep order on the national harbours board property, in much the same way as the C.P.R. and C.N.R. have railway constables to keep order on their property. But the force is not a trained one in any sense of the word. In effect, that police force is a sort of glorified watchman service, though, of course, it fulfils a very useful function.

But now the national harbours board is seeking greatly to extend various powers by the amendments in the bill, and is asking for power to set up a police force. I mentioned in the committee that their constables were not trained, and I think the parliamentary assistant, or one of the officials of the national harbours board, said, "Well, we are going to give them some training". That would mean that in Vancouver we will have another police force right in the business section of the city, despite the fact that we have an efficient city police force now. The R.C.M.P. are policing all of the province outside of the cities which have their own police force and they are doing an excellent job. Why on earth should a harbour police force be set up now?

There is no objection to their carrying on their duties within the national harbours board property or within a reasonable distance of that property, but this bill, if passed, will give them the power to appoint persons to act as police officers for a distance of 25 miles from the national harbours board property in every direction. That would mean that in Vancouver the harbour police could go into any part of the city and make arrests and, in effect, act as ordinary constables.

Surely there is no justification for setting up a duplicate police force of this kind. We do not want the harbour police running around our city making arrests. If arrests have to be made in the city, let them be made by the city police, and let the harbour police co-operate with the city police and have the arrests made through them.

There is no reason at all why the citizens of Vancouver should be subjected to a harbour police force coming into their homes or acting in the same way as the regular city police force.

Mr. Chevrier: This bill does no such thing.

Mr. Green: But this bill does do such a thing. If something is stolen from the harbours board property then the harbour police would have the same right as the city police to come into the city and arrest the person who is alleged to have stolen the goods. Not only that, the distance is so great that they can arrest people in the New Westminster area. New Westminster is about 12 miles from Vancouver. By giving Vancouver harbour police jurisdiction over 25 miles, you bring about the result that these Vancouver harbour police can walk over on to another harbour commission's property and make arrests. Fortunately the New Westminster harbour commission does not come under the National Harbours Board Act. They do not have to carry that load. But here they are going to be in a position where the Vancouver harbour police can make arrests on the New Westminster harbour commission's property.

I submit that there is absolutely no reason for establishing a police force with that jurisdiction. We need only go back to the Railway Act, and there we find just what sort of power should be given to a police force of this kind. Section 457 of the Railway Act, under the heading of "Territorial limits and powers," contains these provisions:

(1) Every constable so appointed, who has taken such oath or made such declaration, may act as a constable for the preservation of the peace, and for the security of persons and property against unlawful acts

(a) on such railway, and on any of the works belonging thereto;—

We have no objection to these harbour police having jurisdiction over harbours board property. No one is questioning the wisdom of going that far. The section continues:

(b) on and about any trains, roads, wharfs, quays, landing places, warehouses, lands and premises belonging to such company, whether the same are in the county, city, town, parish, district or other local jurisdiction within which he was appointed or in any other place through which such railway passes, or in which the same terminates, or through or to which any railway passes which is worked or leased by such company; and—

The minister will notice that again the power is confined to the railway.

—(c) in all places not more than a quarter of a mile distant from such railway.

If the railway police who are a proper police force—and who are a great deal better trained and much better qualified than this other police force is going to be—are to be restricted to one-quarter of a mile from railway property, why should the harbour police be given jurisdiction over 25 miles? That is a move the justification for which I cannot see.

[Mr. Green.]

The minister today mentioned that he needs this power in Montreal. It may be that in Montreal the harbours board cannot get co-operation from the city police or from the provincial police. I would not be surprised to learn that that is the case, that the harbours board police do not get on with the other police, and hence want the power to run out into Montreal, 25 miles from harbours board territory, and to make arrests. But that condition does not exist in Vancouver and I do not believe it exists in any of the other national ports of Canada.

If there is a situation to be met in Montreal, and the Montreal members in this chamber are willing to have the harbours police making arrests in the city of Montreal outside of harbours board property, then let us restrict this 25-mile provision to the port of Montreal. There is no reason why the six other ports should be penalized in order to meet a situation which may or may not exist in the port of Montreal. This is one country, but there is no reason why one port should force a thing like this on six other ports. If there is such a thing as majority rule, surely it should apply in this case. The national harbours board is taking this drastic power in violation of a principle governing the enforcement of our Canadian laws. I suggest that no governmental body should be given police jurisdiction over other territory for a distance of 25 miles.

I therefore move:

That clause 3 of Bill No. 421 be amended by deleting the word "twenty-five" where it appears in the thirteenth line of the proposed section 4A.(1) and the word "one" be substituted therefor.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I listened carefully to all the arguments that were presented in the committee of the House of Commons that studied the bill. I have also listened carefully to both the minister and the parliamentary assistant. Neither of them has yet, to my satisfaction, brought forward any argument in support of the reason why the harbour police should have all the authority of a police officer under the Criminal Code to a distance of 25 miles beyond the property which is owned by the harbours board or is administered by it.

I completely fail to understand how the minister can differentiate between the rights, the responsibilities or the jurisdiction of the special constables of the harbours board and those of the constables on the railways of this dominion. We have in the city of Vancouver the termini of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways and the Great Northern Railway. They all have their own constables under the terms of the Railway Act. What are the duties of those special constables? Their duties are responsibility for the protection of the property of those three railways and the protection of goods in transit over those railways so long as they are on the properties of those railways. I have yet to hear of any request being made by the railways or any suggestion being made by the government that the authority which has been there for years should be changed and that those special constables who are guarding the property of the railways and the goods in transit over them should have their jurisdiction extended beyond a quarter of a mile, as it now exists under the present act.

That being the case, and no suggestion of altering that situation having been made, whence comes the differentiation as far as the harbours board property is concerned? Harbours board property is at a port and the duty of any constable is the protection of the property owned or administered by the harbours board and the protection of the goods in transit at that time in the possession of the harbours board. With regard to their complete responsibilities, the harbours board police are absolutely no different from the special constables of the railway systems of Canada. Then on what basis, on what line of logic and reasoning—when their duties and responsibilities are absolutely identical—should harbours board policemen have authority under the Criminal Code as peace officers for a distance of 25 miles outside harbours board property while the railway constables have jurisdiction only up to one-quarter of a mile from a railway. It does not make sense in any way, shape or form. I am therefore heartily in accord—and if I had my way it would be done—with bringing the jurisdiction of constables of the harbours board in line with the provisions of the Railway Act. However, I think my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is trying to do as was suggested by the minister yesterday. He is trying to be reasonable. He has come up with a compromise. His amendment will mean that harbours board policemen will have jurisdiction extending three-quarters of a mile farther than the jurisdiction of the railway police.

There is another phase which I think should be mentioned, the possibility of a clash of jurisdictions. When the police authorities are doing a good job and carrying out their responsibilities in a city such as Vancouver, I think such duties should be left to them. If my experience counts for anything, when any breach of the Criminal Code takes place on railway or harbours board property it is the local police force that does the investigating and lays the charge. I can remember when two policemen were shot on railway property in the city of Vancouver a few years ago. It was not the railway police who undertook the investigation. It was the local Vancouver police force. When it comes to areas outside harbours board or railway property, I think it is a matter for the local police force. If it should happen that an instance occurs, such as we were told about both here and in the committee, where one city police force does not co-operate, that is really no reason for causing a disturbance in the other harbour cities of the dominion.

I have only heard one reason given why the harbours board wants authority over such a large area beyond the property of the board. That was the reason that the harbours board either owns or operates a bridge in Montreal and that unless they have this jurisdiction they cannot catch a speeding car or motorcycle if it happens to get away from the end of the bridge. To me that is a pretty poor reason to ask for a change of the type being sought in section 3. Moreover, there is also this point. Even if an infraction of the law involving stolen goods does take place on property owned or administered by the harbours board, the policeman cannot conduct a search without obtaining a search warrant. Therefore he has to go before a justice of the peace or magistrate of the county or town before he can search.

Having to do that, surely right then and there is the time to place the actual responsibility in the hands of the local police force, whether city or provincial, which enforces justice in the harbour city. For all these reasons, having listened very carefully to the minister and the parliamentary assistant, I say that the provision in section 3 for the extension of power to a point 25 miles distant from harbours board property is unnecessary and unjust. The case in support of the amendment rests on the fact that the responsibility of the harbour police is the same as that of the railway police in whose case it has been found satisfactory to limit their jurisdiction to a quarter of a mile. I support the amendment.

Mr. Chevrier: May I say one word in reply to what has been argued by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I should like to say first that this matter was dealt with fully in the committee. It was also raised yesterday during the discussion of the bill. I undertook at adjournment to give the matter very careful and serious consideration. I did. I considered the matter in the light of the point made by the hon. member for Prince Albert and in the light of the argument made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and I came back to the house with the amendment that has been submitted.

The response of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was to repeat the same allegations and make the same charges against this clause as were made earlier. I can make the same reply. If the committee wants to put up with another speech by the Minister of Transport I will reply to the arguments made by the hon. member. But will it get us any place? After all, there is nothing so extraordinary, may I say to the hon. member for Vancouver East, in the powers being taken. There is nothing novel about these powers. They have these powers today.

Mr. Green: No, they have not.

Mr. Chevrier: They have the right to appoint constables who would have exactly the same powers. In fact, they could go away beyond 25 miles. As matter of fact, what the board is actually seeking to do is to limit the powers compared with what they were before.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend—

Mr. Green: How on earth does he figure that out? I should like an explanation of how he can submit to the house that this measure is limiting the jurisdiction of the harbour police.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like an explanation—

Mr. Green: If that is the case, why not leave their powers as they are, and everybody would be satisfied?

Mr. Chevrier: I should like an explanation from my hon. friend as to why there is so much fuss about this section, particularly when it was discussed for almost two days in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Green: On a point of privilege—

Mr. Hosking: Certainly it was.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: On a point of privilege—

The Chairman: Do I understand the hon. member is raising a point of order?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Green: A question of privilege. The minister has just said this point was discussed for two days in the committee. In the first place the minister was not present in the committee for one minute and could not know of his own knowledge. In the second place, it was not discussed for two days. It was brought up there and we were voted down, but it was not discussed for two days or anything like it.

Mr. Chevrier: All right, Mr. Chairman, it was not discussed for two days, but the bill was considered for two days in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. If my hon. friend wants to quibble with words to that extent, all right, I will let him have his way about it. But the bill was considered for two days in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Representations were made by a number of associations, so I am told, and the hon. member cannot rise in his place and say that this particular point was given no consideration. I do not think he is attempting to do that. No. On the other hand, a great to-do is made about the tremendous powers that are going to be taken by the national harbours board in this case. Let me tell my hon. friend that the national harbours board spends millions upon millions of dollars each year in the national ports of Canada, and I think it should have the necessary powers to protect the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: There has been handed to me an old act—and I ask the hon. member for Vancouver East to keep this in mind—which authorized the predecessor of the board of transport commissioners to appoint police officers with jurisdiction in the whole of a province. How does my hon. friend like that? How would he react to that?

Mr. Winch: I do not like it a bit.

Mr. Chevrier: He does not like it. Well, all right. If my hon. friend does not like it, then what I am saying to him is that this is a considerable reduction in the powers of the police officers who will be appointed by a superior court judge. I do not want to repeat here the reasons which were given or to make a distinction between the Canadian National Railways and the national harbours board because I think the position is not the same. So far as the jurisdiction of a police officer of a railway where the line runs from one end of Canada to the other is concerned, probably it is consistent that it should not extend beyond the quarter of a mile limit, but here the position is not at all the same. Men have taken property from the national harbours board, have been sought beyond the limits of the property and because the warrants were not backed in the proper jurisdiction it was necessary in more than one case to lose the benefit of the law in respect of the person who was being chased.

Some hon. members seem to think that the police officer is going to have all the powers that an ordinary police officer has under the Criminal Code. The hon. member for Vancouver East seemed to hold that view.

Mr. Winch: I made that clear. I said all the powers of a police officer under the Criminal Code within 25 miles and concerning property of the harbours board or under its administration. I made that clear.

Mr. Chevrier: I accept my hon. friend's correction. I was under the impression he had a different idea of the application. But what is so abnormal about the fact that a peace officer should be able to seek within the required jurisdiction, particularly if an offence has to do with the administration of board property or of persons subject to the jurisdiction of the national harbours board? It seems to me it is not beyond reason, when there are millions of dollars spent, voted by this house, to see that that money is protected.

These officers are not going to clash with the other officers of the city of Montreal or the city of Vancouver. How can they, unless warrants are made out at the instance of the national harbours board officers, and at the instance of the local police for the same offence? That I am sure will not be done. The national harbours board has been in existence since 1935, and the administration of the act by the officers has been fair, just and reasonable. I feel that we can count on the officers of the board to use their common sense, to use their judgment, not only in the city of Montreal but in the city of Vancouver as well. If this section is given a fair trial, I believe it will be workable and that hon. members will not have any reason to complain about any extraordinary power. I want to reassure the house that it is not the intention to take extraordinary powers, that extraordinary powers are not being taken under this section, but that powers are being taken for the protection of the property of the board.

Mr. Winch: It is not my intention to speak twice on this subject, but in view of the minister's remarks, I feel that I have to do so. The minister has emphasized the fact, and he was applauded by all the Liberal members, that the taxpayers of Canada have spent millions upon millions of dollars for the development of the harbours of Canada, and that these harbours have to be protected.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: There will not be a member of the house who will disagree with that statement, that the investment has to be protected. However, the same taxpayers of Canada have spent hundreds upon hundreds of millions of dollars on the Canadian National Railways and that investment has to be protected too. But in the protection of that investment, you want jurisdiction for a quarter of a mile, whereas to protect the other investment you want jurisdiction for 25 miles. How do you explain the difference? We all stand for the protection of the taxpayers' money invested in the harbours and the railways, but how do you explain the quarter of a mile in one case and the 25 miles in the other, when the responsibilities of protection are identical for both police forces?

There is only one other point I want to mention, and I do so because of a remark by the minister and also by an hon. member down here—I am sorry I cannot remember who spoke yesterday—who brought up the question of sincerity. The minister went over that again today. He told us he accepts responsibility for introducing these bills. They have had study and consideration, and he brings them forward in all sincerity. No one questions that at all. I am going to say that when the minister accepted the responsibility of sponsoring this Bill No. 421, he did so in all sincerity. I believe that. But, Mr. Chairman, they do not know everything on that side of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: They can make mistakes just as all of us do. What happened? After all the study by the government, the Department of Justice, the bill went before a committee of this house. What occurred? The committee, with a Liberal majority—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: —was persuaded by the opposition minority that the bill could be improved and there were four or five amendments made in the committee. The measure comes back here, and even with all the brains on that committee, and it had plenty, what happened? The hon. member for Prince Albert was still able, after all that review by the government and the Justice Department, the civil service, and the committee, to point out that there was still something that could be improved in the bill. There was a wrong principle involved. We are saying to you: We know you reconsidered and you saw wisdom in the suggestion by the hon. member for Prince Albert, but it is only one step farther to reconsider a third time and see the wisdom of this amendment.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that my rising is not greeted with enthusiasm. If it will relieve hon. members' pain at all, I shall tell them I will be very brief. I have a somewhat unique qualification for intervening in this debate, and that is that I did not hear any of the earlier part of it. I just heard the speeches by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Vancouver East. I was not a member of the committee. I have the advantage, as I say, of an open mind. After listening to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Vancouver East I said to myself, those arguments sound very reasonable indeed. The minister must have some tremendous argument that he is going to produce, and it is just going to flatten them out and I am going to be completely twisted around.

I waited, therefore, for the minister's argument. So far as I can make out, his great argument was that there were hundreds of millions of dollars belonging to the harbours board to be protected. He sought to distinguish, in a manner that I could not follow, between the fact the Canadian National Railways jurisdiction is one-quarter mile and the harbours board wants 25 miles. Incidentally the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra sought to meet the special case the minister raised as regards Montreal by suggesting that some special arrangements should be made.

All I want to say is that in so far as I have any claim to being, what shall I say, a man of average intelligence, I submit that any man of average intelligence who has been in this house for the last three-quarters of an hour would wonder why on earth the arguments made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Vancouver East were not accepted. He would still wait for that pulverizing argument the minister was to make.

Amendment (Mr. Green) negatived: Yeas, 44; nays, 75.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 3 as previously amended carry?

Clause 3 as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Green: Next sitting.

[Mr. Winch.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, perhaps we might alter our agenda for the moment to take care of a matter to which reference was made this morning in connection with the pension bill. There is a resolution which has been consented to by His Excellency the Governor General, and of which notification could be made now. We could then deal with the resolution, and do as we did on another occasion—that is, move that it be referred to the committee of the whole, and then it could be considered with the pension bill itself. If that would meet with the wishes of hon. members, I suggest that we do it, before proceeding with the amendment to the Post Office Act.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ADOPTED CHILDREN, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That Bill 339, intituled: "An act to amend the Pension Act", now before the house, be amended by substituting the words and figures "1st day of May, 1954" for the words and figures "1st day of January, 1954" where they appear in clauses 10, 11, 12 and 18 in the said bill and that subsection (3) of section 31 and subsection (3) of section 42 of the Pension Act be amended by striking out the words "in respect of service during world war II" where they appear in the said subsections.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved that this resolution be referred to the committee of the whole on Bill No. 339.

Motion agreed to.

And the order for committee of the whole having been called:

Mr. Green: We cannot go on now. Members of the veterans affairs committee met at 3.30. This contains some highly controversial points.

Mr. Harris: I think that the clerk assistant may have misunderstood me. It was not intended to proceed with it at this time. It was the intention to proceed now with the Post Office Act; and then, later this day, to call the Pension Act.

POST OFFICE ACT

ENLARGEMENT OF PROVISION RESPECTING DISTRIBUTION OF NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 473, to amend the Post Office Act.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the minister propose to make an explanation of the change?

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I shall make a brief explanation. This bill is being introduced as a result of representations received by the government from the Periodical Press Association on behalf of Canadian publishers, to the effect that the proposed amendment will be of benefit to them.

At the present time, Canadian publishers, in order to enjoy the reduced statutory rates on copies of their publications going to subscribers, must post such copies at the post office in the place in which the office of publication is situated.

The publishers' representations are to the effect that if more than one point of mailing was permitted they could forward their publications in certain instances by bus, by truck or by air cargo to other centres for local mailing and thus afford a faster delivery to their subscribers in different parts of the country. This would be an advantage to them in their competition with United States publications.

Apart from being an advantage to publishers, the proposed amendment could conceivably result in some saving to the Post Office Department, as we would not have to pay certain transportation charges in any instance where a publisher took advantage of this suggested procedure. In so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, we recommend the adoption of the legislation.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there are questions we will wish to ask at the committee stage, I do not propose at this time to discuss the matter at length. However, there are certain questions which, because of the nature of the bill, particularly its brevity and its apparent innocence—a feature which, may I say, we always suspect—we will want to ask. We will want to know precisely what the effect of the bill will be.

First of all, we will want to know just how many centres the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) might designate as areas to which bulk shipments might be made, in respect of any one national publication. Is this going to be a matter of several centres within a province, or the main terminal points in the provinces across Canada? We would also like to know whether or not this change in the regulation will have any effect on the content of any periodical. Will it alter in any way the rules which now exist with regard to the advertising these publications are permitted to accept?

When I ask this, I have in mind the fact of course that certain publications will be in a preferred position, by reason of their being able to get their publications into the field at distant points days quicker than otherwise they would be able to do. That is an advantage in competing for advertising in the general advertising field as against the United States publications which now enjoy that privilege.

There is also the general question of revenue. In what way will the revenue of the Post Office Department be affected by this change? Another general point into which we shall want to inquire rather closely is just what is the difference in this matter of the shipment of publications between daily newspapers and periodicals. The minister will recall that when we were speaking on the first item of his estimates I addressed a question to him with regard to the shipment of newspapers to distant points by T.C.A. in passenger seats. If I remember correctly the minister at that time told me that that was a matter strictly between the newspaper itself and T.C.A. I notice that this bill does say both newspapers and periodicals. If regulations exist which prohibit the bulk shipment of newspapers and periodicals to distant points, there to be broken down and mailed, then I should like to know under what regulation the newspapers are permitted to bulk ship, and if that permission is granted to them—possibly this is a question which would more properly be directed to the department which handles T.C.A., but nevertheless the minister, having some connection with it, must also know the answer—under what terms is T.C.A. permitted to occupy passenger seats with these newspapers, certainly to the inconvenience of the travelling public and possibly also to the detriment of their actual safety. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that in bringing up that point I am probably on the borderline. The Postmaster General has very definite responsibility in this regard because of the connection which his department has with the dissemination of this material from coast to coast. With these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, we shall rest until the bill gets to the committee stage, when we shall press for answers to these and other questions.

Post Office Act

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) referred to this as an innocent-looking bill, and one might say that the explanations that have been offered for it thus far are plausible. I think, however, most of us know the real purpose behind this bill. I rise to oppose it.

As hon. members know, this is not the first notice we have had of the amendment to the Post Office Act proposed by this bill. Earlier in the session when we had before us another bill amending the Post Office Act an attempt was made during the course of the discussion of that legislation to introduce an amendment which would have included in that bill the provision that is set out in this bill. Hon. members will recall that we were able to make the point on that occasion that as the proposed amendment to that bill went beyond the scope of the measure then before the house, it was out of order as an amendment to that bill. It is quite clear of course that it is now in order, procedurally at any rate, to bring in this proposal as the subject matter of a separate bill. But we are as opposed to this bill now as we were to the proposal when it was made on February 8, as noted on page 1902 of Hansard.

The parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General who introduced the measure today referred to it as one that would make possible the posting of magazines or periodicals, on approval by the department, at more than one place, with the privilege of having at all such mailing points the reduced rates provided for magazines and periodicals under section 11 of the Post Office Act.

Reference has been made, both today and on other occasions, to the desire of some publishers to transport certain quantities of their publications in bulk from the centre of publication to some other centre or centres in order to speed up the distribution of their periodicals to the subscribing public. It might be interesting to include in the record at this point the explanation that the Postmaster General gave us of this matter on February 8, 1954, when, as recorded at page 1902 of Hansard, he said this:

> For instance, if a newspaper in Toronto is ready for delivery at four o'clock—I am only giving a hypothetical example—and the train leaves at six o'clock, the paper would be delivered in London, for instance, or some other place, only very late that night or even the next morning. Hence the periodicals have made representations.

Another explanation given regarding this measure was in these terms:

> For instance, if a fraternal organization with its head office in Kingston has a publication printed in Brockville, the publication, with the approval of the Post Office Department, can be posted in either Kingston or Brockville.

That, I may say, was the brief explanation of this bill given to Their Honours in the other place. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no secret about this bill. There is no secret as to the identity of those who are asking for it, and as to why they are asking for it. Indeed, there is no secret to the fact that gentlemen representing certain publication companies in this country have visited Ottawa, as have gentlemen who are opposed to this measure, and that those gentlemen have called on many people here; indeed, they have called on me as well as on other members of this group.

Mrs. Fairclough: I had no calls from anyone.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Hamilton West says that they did not call on her. Maybe they did not feel she would be quite as much an obstacle to this legislation as it was thought I might be.

Mrs. Fairclough: Maybe they thought that I would use some sense.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member can make interjections like that a little later, if she still feels they are appropriate.

Mr. Lennard: You made one yourself.

Mr. Knowles: It was made clear to me that what was annoying some publications in this country is that there is a law in the province of Ontario which prohibits the publishing of liquor advertising. Some firms which are situated in the province of Ontario, firms which print their publications in that province, have been taking steps to get around that law against the publishing of liquor advertising in that province.

Mr. Rowe: This does not get around it.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe says: "this does not get around it". Just to have the record clear, let us note the Ontario law which is section 91 (3) of the Liquor Control Act of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1950, which reads:

> No person, unless authorized by the board, shall exhibit, publish or display or permit to be exhibited, published or displayed any other advertisement, or form of advertisement, or any other announcement, publication or price list of or concerning liquor or where or from whom the liquor may be had, obtained or purchased.

Now, Mr. Speaker, because of that law a magazine like Maclean's, which is printed in Ontario, which wants to carry liquor advertising, for the money to be had from carrying that advertising, has to declare that its publication is not published in Ontario but is published somewhere else. So Maclean's magazine—

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is not one of the words in that the word "display"? Does it make any difference whether it is published in Ontario or anywhere else if it is displayed for sale in Ontario?

Mr. Knowles: The law prohibits any company from displaying such advertising in Ontario or from publishing it. The law does not prohibit the printing of such material in Ontario so that Maclean's magazine, in order to get around this law, prints its magazine in Toronto but declares that it is published at the city of Montreal.

Mr. Pickersgill: How does that get around the law?

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend is not a lawyer, nor am I; but lawyers apparently have found ways of getting around it. Thus it is that they make the statement in their publication that it is published at the city of Montreal, despite the fact that it is printed in Toronto, whereupon the magazines, before being mailed, are trucked from Toronto to Montreal and are mailed from Montreal. Now, in doing that Maclean's magazine achieves two things. On the one hand it gets around this law and thereby claims it is not publishing liquor advertisements in Ontario but is publishing them in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member has not answered my question about the word "display".

Mr. Knowles: They do not display this advertising in Ontario, but they print it in Ontario and they bundle the magazines in trucks and have them carted to Montreal.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can get copies of the magazines in Ontario on the newsstands.

Mr. Knowles: But the copies you get on the newsstands in Ontario are mailed into Ontario from the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pickersgill: It does not make any difference.

Mr. Knowles: I agree with my hon. friend that in the actual result there is no difference. They are getting around the law technically but not in spirit. But I started to say that Maclean's magazine achieves two purposes by declaring Montreal to be its publishing location and by trucking its copies to Montreal before mailing them. The first purpose, which I have already indicated, is that they get around the Ontario law. The other purpose they achieve is that they get the cheap rate of postage provided for periodicals under section 11 of the Post Office Act because they are mailing their periodical at the point declared to be the point of publication.

Section 11 of the Post Office Act now requires that a periodical, in order to enjoy the cheap rate of postage, must be mailed in the postal area in which its office of publication is located.

Now, I agree with the Secretary of State that they are just gettting around the law technically but not in spirit, but in order to do this it is now costing Maclean's magazine a considerable sum of money—I understand it is of the order of $20,000 to $25,000 a year—to truck its periodicals from Toronto to Montreal.

One can understand the natural desire on the part of Maclean's magazine to have legislation, if it can be obtained, that will save them $25,000 a year, or some portion of that amount, and therefore the proposal that has been made by the Periodical Press Association, and the proposal which is implemented in this bill now before us, is that the publishers of periodicals, if they get the approval of the Postmaster General, might be able to mail their publications at the point of publication and at one or more other points while still obtaining the cheap rate of postage.

Let us look at the result which will flow from this bill with respect to the magazine of which I have been talking, and there is no secret about the fact that one of the reasons I have been talking about this magazine is that a gentleman representing that magazine came to see me and tried to argue his side of the case. However, if this bill passes it will not change the law which I read a moment ago, namely section 91, subsection 3, of chapter 210 of the revised statutes of Ontario. It will still be against the law to publish or display liquor advertisements in periodicals published in Ontario. Therefore, Maclean's, though it is printed in Toronto, will still have to be declared as being published in Montreal.

It will be possible for issues of Maclean's magazine going to subscribers outside Ontario to be mailed in Ontario under this new provision, if the Postmaster General declares Toronto to be a mailing point for this magazine. But, so far as the issues of Maclean's magazine that go into Ontario are concerned, it will still not be possible for them to be mailed from Toronto. The Ontario law will still apply. They will still have to truck the Ontario issues from Toronto down to Montreal and have them mailed in Montreal. As regards the practical result of this law you will have Maclean's magazine mailing its publication at two points, one in Montreal, its point of publication but not where it is printed, and the other from Toronto. I should spell this out again. The result will be that the issues going to the rest of Canada, outside of Ontario, will be mailed in Toronto and will obtain the lower rate of postage from that point.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I interrupt the hon. member again to ask another question? Why does he infer that? Why would not they have some of these distributed from Calgary or Vancouver? It is pure inference on the part of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Knowles: It is not pure inference. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this interruption suggests that the purpose of this legislation is along the line now inferred by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill), namely to enable the shipment of bundles of the Financial Post to Calgary, or some other point, to be distributed from there. But that is an inference which is entirely unwarranted, for whether or not advantage of this legislation will be taken for that purpose has not yet been decided.

What is definite is that Maclean's magazine wants to save this $20,000 to $25,000 it is now spending in trucking its magazine down to Montreal, and I say again that I have no objection to Maclean's magazine trying to save some money if possible. My hon. friends can snicker about that, but what we are doing here is enabling a firm to get around provincial law and still have the cheap rates granted under federal law under certain circumstances.

I could spend more time than I am allowed, Mr. Speaker, in reciting the number of times it has been said on the floor of this house that we must not interfere with provincial rights. It has been said we have got to be very careful about health insurance because that is a provincial matter; we are told that we cannot have federal aid to education because that is a provincial matter; we have got to be careful as to what we say about any provincial laws because that would be interfering with provincial matters; and on the administration of justice how many times has the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) said that is something with which we must not interfere because it is a provincial matter.

But here is a provincial law which is clear-cut and specific. This firm wants to get around it, so this firm, along with others, wants the federal government to amend a federal law to the extent that it is possible by so doing to enable them to get around the provincial law. There is one thing the federal government cannot do and that is amend the law so that it will permit a magazine printed in Toronto to be mailed from Toronto to Ontario subscribers, if it carries liquor advertisements.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be tiresome but I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one more question. How is it going to be possible for Maclean's magazine or anyone else to get around the law in Ontario by posting publications in Toronto to other provinces? They are not going to anyone in Ontario. The present practice as far as Ontario is concerned, if I followed my hon. friend correctly, is that they will continue in their present position and nothing will be done about the subscriber in Ontario. All that would be done by this bill is to permit publishers to post in Toronto magazines to other provinces. That is not getting around the law of Ontario because the people of the other provinces are not subject to the laws of Ontario. It has nothing to do with provincial rights or the law of Ontario.

Mr. Knowles: The reason they will not be breaking the Ontario law by printing a publication in Toronto and mailing it somewhere else—just a minute; listen to me now—is that some lawyer suggested to Maclean's magazine that they could get around that law by declaring that it is published in Montreal. They get around the law by saying: No, we do not publish in Toronto. The Maclean-Hunter Publishing Company may be situated in Toronto. The printers are there; and by the way their relationship with the printers is not any too good, but that is a side issue. The work may be done there,—

Mr. Martin: Stick to the point.

Mr. Knowles: —but on the masthead it says: "Published in Montreal". This government by this bill is going to permit a publication, which although printed in Toronto is technically published in Montreal, to be mailed from a point in Ontario to other provinces and thereby to get the reduced rate of postage. I appreciate the interest of the Secretary of State in this matter but I think it is an interest that recognizes the point I am making.

Mr. Trainor: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Trainor: Is the hon. member inferring that the declaration on the masthead, "Published in Montreal", in this case, is a false declaration?

Mr. Knowles: It is one of those things that it may not be possible to call false but it has a purpose that seems to be misleading. They have an office in Montreal, so far as I understand it, and they declare—

Mr. Trainor: Have they an editorial staff in Montreal?

Mr. Knowles: I do not know whether or not they have an editorial staff in Montreal. I do not believe they have. I believe their editorial staff is in Toronto, except for one distinguished member of that editorial staff who is situated here in Ottawa. I hope they do not put him in jail.

Mr. Trainor: That would be a good thing to find out. How do they define "published"?

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend will have to ask a lawyer for the answer to that question. All they say is that is the point at which it is published; and, having declared Montreal to be the point of publication, they get the cheap rates that are provided under section 11 of the Post Office Act. I think the situation is fairly clear. I am grateful for the various interjections that have been made. They make the discussion all the more interesting, and I think they have helped to bring out the point that what is involved here is not a discussion of the rights or wrongs of liquor advertising. I could go into that matter also.

Mr. Martin: Don't do it.

Mr. Knowles: I could talk about the corrupting influence of liquor profits. However, I will not go into that matter today. It is not a temperance issue, interested though I might be in that question. The issue at stake here is whether or not we are going to pass a federal law, the purpose of which is to enable people to circumvent, to a certain extent, a provincial law. Maclean's magazine is now circumventing that provincial law to a certain extent. They print the magazine in Toronto. They truck all of it to Montreal and mail it from there, thereby getting around the law that says they cannot publish in Ontario their magazine carrying liquor advertising. Once this bill passes—if the house does put it through—a magazine like Maclean's and any others that are in similar circumstances will be able to mail, as I say, all of their copies that go outside of Ontario, from Toronto, and get the cheap rates from the two points, and still technically get around the provisions of the Ontario liquor control act.

There is another aspect about this matter on which I want to make a comment. I think the way in which this whole matter has been handled has been rather odd. The Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) did not tell us of these aspects of the matter when he introduced the legislation or when he tried to introduce it on February 8. The parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General has failed today to touch on the aspects of the matter which I am discussing. I read with interest a debate to which we are not supposed to refer in this house, and I find that Their Honours in the other place made no reference to this aspect of the matter at all. Yet, as I say, because some of us raised questions about this matter when it came into the house previously, representations have been made to me as well as to other members of this group—and, for all I know, to other members of the house—that we should let this legislation go through in order that certain magazines might be able to carry this liquor advertising and not have to put out this extra money for trucking costs and, to put it in their terms, thus be better able to compete with American magazines. They have gone on and said to us: "We want to develop Canadian culture." I do not go for this idea of developing Canadian culture on the basis of liquor profits, whether they turn up in the form of advertising revenue, donations to dominion drama festivals or what have you.

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to hear my friend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) say "hear, hear". I hope this is one occasion on which he will oppose a measure brought in by the government he supports.

An hon. Member: He will walk out.

Mr. Knowles: As I say, Mr. Speaker, there has been an attempt, or at least it appears to me that there has been an attempt to cover up the real purpose of this legislation by reference to matters that are not important at all. It has been said to me, for example, that under the proposed bill it would be possible for copies of the Financial Post to be mailed in bulk from Toronto to Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver, Halifax and other places to be mailed from the post offices in those cities and thus reach the subscribers more quickly than is at present the case. When I inquired as to the extra costs of this project, it was admitted to me by the gentleman to whom I have already referred that that would necessitate an increase in the subscription price for the Financial Post; and he was not sure that that increase was being contemplated. In other words, that is a possibility which is being provided for but which may not be implemented at all. The real issue is what is happening right now, namely that liquor advertising is being carried in this magazine as well as in others, and it is the desire of this company to be aided further in getting around the provincial law by the provisions of the measure that is now before us.

Every time this matter has come up, it has been said that it will be done without adversely affecting the treasury revenues. Indeed in the bill itself there is a provision which says that that must not happen. I ask hon. members for just a moment—

Mr. Cannon: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Surely.

Mr. Cannon: Can the hon. member explain to us the mechanics of how American magazines are imported into Canada in bulk and are mailed here under the present law? Would he like to stop that practice?

Mr. Knowles: I have not time to go into all of that matter, but just briefly I might say that it is done under two arrangements. In the first place, it is done under the arrangements of American postal law. The other fact is that it is done in part under international postal arrangements that are made between Canada and the United States, and which are reciprocal in character. That is one of the arguments that these people use, namely that American magazines are imposing on the Canadian mind American culture which is supposed to be of a much lesser order than the culture that we get out of Canadian magazines. I am going to be frank enough to say right away that I think the cultural level of Canadian magazines, generally speaking, is higher than the cultural level of many American magazines that circulate widely in this country. But that is no reason for approving the principle that culture should be supported on the basis of liquor profits.

Mr. Lennard: There are some liquor advertisements in the American magazines.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, the same answer applies to them. Neither does it justify—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the trouble.

Mr. Knowles: Neither does it justify our trying to get around the Ontario provincial law in a field where the province has a right to enact legislation of that kind, and has done so.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not yet answered my question: How does this get around the Ontario law at all? He said they are getting around the Ontario law now and he says that they will continue to get around the Ontario law in exactly the same way even if this bill does not pass. In so far as his example is concerned, if I understand it correctly he is saying that this will enable them to post their publications to other provinces, which can have nothing to do with the Ontario law. He says they are getting around the Ontario law now and will continue to get around it afterwards in exactly the same way, so what are we doing to facilitate getting around the Ontario law by this legislation?

Mr. Noseworthy: You are helping to do it by cheaper rates.

Mr. Knowles: I ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) this question. Why does Maclean's magazine truck its magazines down to Montreal at the present time? Why does it not mail them in Toronto? Come on; answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: That, it seems to me, has nothing to do with this legislation at all. That is a practice which appears to be legal now. I do not know whether or not it is. I am not a lawyer any more than the hon. gentleman is.

Mr. Knowles: That is the best thing about both of us.

Mr. Pickersgill: Taking that word "display", I would somewhat doubt whether it was legal, but it appears to be legal now and it will be legal whether or not we pass this bill. It will not make the slightest difference so far as distribution in Ontario is concerned. All this would do, in the example he cites, is to facilitate the distribution of Canadian magazines in the other nine provinces outside of Ontario. That is all.

Mr. Knowles: Why can they not do that now?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I point out to both the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the Secretary of State that if I were to apply the rules on second reading strictly I would have to say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has just relinquished the floor and the Secretary of State has made his speech on second reading.

Mr. Knowles: I am happy to agree with the latter part, but in view of the earlier part of your remarks, sir, I suppose I had better be careful. I suggest to the Secretary of State that if it were not necessary for Maclean's to take its publication to Montreal at the present time it would not be doing so, and if it did not think it had to get the law changed in order to mail these publications from Toronto it would not have asked for this legislation. I am sure the Secretary of State must have been on the receiving end of the representations with respect to this matter, and he must know that what they want is the right to be able to carry liquor advertising and mail from Toronto despite the law there which says—

Mr. Lennard: To other provinces.

Mr. Knowles: They would like to do it in Ontario too but the Ontario law will not permit them. In this House of Commons, where the rights of the provinces are pleaded so often by the gentlemen on the other side of the house, we are now presented with legislation which is enabling people to get around the Ontario law. That, Mr. Speaker, is the real issue in the measure now before us.

Before you find that my time has expired may I just deal with one other point. It is argued that to make this change will not adversely affect the postal revenue. It is my contention that it will, and that it will do so in respect of Maclean's magazine itself. At the present time all the issues of Maclean's magazine are being trucked to Montreal and mailed from there. If this legislation goes through, the issues destined for Ontario will continue to be trucked to Montreal and mailed from there. There will be no change so far as issues going to points in Ontario are concerned.

In the case of the issues going to subscribers in western Canada, at the present time they are being trucked to Montreal and mailed from there to western Canada. If the bill passes they will be mailed from Toronto to western Canada. So far as the post office is concerned, there is practically no difference involved in that change. Issues for western Canada will be carried from Toronto to Sudbury or Capreol and then on west instead of being carried from Montreal to Sudbury or Capreol and then on west. The only difference is the difference in mileage between Toronto and Sudbury or Capreol on the one hand and between Montreal and Sudbury or Capreol on the other. There is a slight difference but not enough to amount to anything.

But I ask hon. members to note what will happen in the case of issues destined for the province of Quebec or the maritime provinces, including Newfoundland. At the present time all the issues for these five provinces are trucked, at Maclean's expense, to Montreal, and are mailed from Montreal to their destinations in the five provinces. After the bill goes through, issues for these five provinces, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, will be mailed in Toronto and the post office will have to bear the expense of carrying them by train from Toronto to Montreal, an expense which they do not now have to bear, an expense which at the moment is met by Maclean's magazine.

I submit that when one looks at that aspect of the matter it becomes evident that this change is actually going to cost the Post Office Department additional money compared with what it is now spending for the transport of this magazine. As I have indicated a good many times there are other publications involved. This is not an act for the relief of Maclean's magazine. It is an act of general application, but this magazine seems to be the one affected most. It is the Maclean-Hunter Publishing Company that has made the most active representations, and that is my reason for having cited that magazine as an example throughout the case I have been making this afternoon. Basically what is involved here is that we have a bill, the purpose of which is to enable firms in Ontario to get around the provincial law and still enjoy the right to the cheap postage provided in the federal act for newspapers and magazines. I think the House of Commons should turn down this measure.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mrs. Fairclough: The Postmaster General has not anwered some of the points we brought up. Does he propose to do so?

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Hamilton West did ask three or four questions. She asked first, I believe, how many centres would be involved in the mailing. I presume she meant mailing centres by each of these various magazines or periodicals. Frankly, I do not think anyone can give a definite answer to the question, because there are between 500 and 600 magazines in Canada which would be affected by such a change, if they wished to take advantage of it.

Mrs. Fairclough: I believe my question referred to a magazine having national distribution.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): The company may ask for certain centres, and then in his wisdom the Postmaster General will decide whether he will grant one, two, three or four such centres. I do not think the question can be answered more specifically than that.

Then the hon. member asked what effect the provision would have on the content of the advertising. The Post Office Department studies magazines periodically to ascertain the percentage of reading material such as editorials and news items, and whether the smaller half—to use an Irish expression—consists of advertising. That is the only examination made by the department on that score.

With respect to revenue; the bill states that the decision will be made so that it will not adversely affect postal revenue.

Then the hon. member referred to these newspapers and periodicals being carried in the seats of aircraft. In such cases they are not being carried in aircraft as mail, but rather as air cargo. It is my understanding that when they are delivered to a certain town or city they are then sent by truck to the newsstands for sale, and are not sent to the post office for posting. I believe I have answered all the questions.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, in case some attempt should be made to put upon what has lately been done in the house an interpretation that is not warranted, I should like to make one point crystal clear, with the assistance of the parliamentary assistant in the Post Office Department.

Mention was made of the position of publishers in respect of liquor advertisements. I am referring to publishers who have their printing plants in Ontario and who then, in order to comply with the Ontario law, actually carry out the technical function of publication in another province, and mail the publications in that other province. In the case commonly referred to, it is Montreal. Will the parliamentary assistant make it clear—because I understand it is clear in the bill—that the bill will have no effect, either in its terms, its application or administration, upon that situation so far as the law of the province of Ontario is concerned; and that no magazine or other publication containing liquor advertising can comply with the law of Ontario if it is printed or published or mailed in Ontario, addressed to an Ontario destination.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Chairman, I really feel that several hon. members have very kindly answered the question, when they have carried on their own private debate. To the extent that this has relieved me of further comment, I am deeply appreciative.

But I wonder if I might say briefly to the hon. member for Eglinton that the answer to this problem, introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is in my opinion very briefly this: That such advertising as is referred to is not prohibited by federal legislation. As I said when replying to the hon. member for Hamilton West, the Post Office Department does not censor publications for liquor advertising. The reference made by the hon. member for Eglinton to the Ontario act, which was quoted previously, was absolutely accurate. It states:

> No person, unless authorized by the board—

And that is the board in Ontario.

> —shall exhibit, publish or display, or permit to be exhibited, published or displayed any other advertisement, or form of advertisement, or any other announcement, publication or price list of or concerning liquor, or where or from whom the liquor may be had, obtained or purchased.

Mr. Fleming: The parliamentary assistant has not come through with what I hoped would be a clear answer to the point I raised, because I think it is the only point seriously raised in the course of the discussion. It is the sort of point that could easily be misconstrued; therefore I hoped there would be a clear statement upon it. Let me just state my own understanding of the effect of this bill. This is federal legislation. What has been introduced into the discussion is a law of the province of Ontario, which has the effect of banning the display of liquor advertisements. We do know that at the present time magazines containing liquor advertisements do come into the province of Ontario, but they have to come from outside the province of Ontario. They cannot comply with the law of Ontario if they are printed, published and distributed in the province of Ontario, without going outside.

Now, my understanding is that the effect of this bill is such that that situation will continue so far as the law of the province of Ontario is concerned, and that there is nothing in this bill which will remove the prohibition now imposed upon the publication in Ontario of magazines containing liquor advertisements. In other words, if magazines containing liquor advertisements are to be circulated in the province of Ontario they must come in from outside.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I can say that this bill does not change anything in so far as the Ontario act is concerned to which the hon. member for Eglinton has referred. The act to which he referred is a provincial act. This bill does not change the provincial act. We have nothing to do with it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does it change the practice?

Mr. Fleming: It is a little more than that. We all appreciate that laws passed here cannot as such change laws of the province of Ontario or of any other province; but the point that needs to be clarified is one that I think can be simply done. If my understanding of the bill is correct the parliamentary assistant should be able to say very clearly that there is no change in the Ontario law and practice. It is not simply a change in the law; it is a question whether the change that is now proposed in the Post Office Act will facilitate what is today a technical compliance with the law of the province of Ontario.

Now, my understanding is—and I should like a simple confirmation of this from the parliamentary assistant—that the situation that obtains today under the law will continue after this amendment becomes law. In other words, in the case of publications which are printed in Ontario, if they do contain liquor advertisements they cannot simply be circulated in the province of Ontario; they will still have to be posted outside Ontario and enter Ontario from a source outside the province if they are intended for distribution within Ontario or to Ontario destinations. That is the point.

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I think that is an absolutely correct interpretation.

Mr. McIvor: The reason I voted against this bill was that I thought it stimulated liquor advertising. If I am wrong I will take a back seat, and I will tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that if he is not correct his speech was misleading.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Fort William was right the first time. I may say also that the hon. member for Eglinton and the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General in my view are correct in their statements that no change results in the passing of this bill with respect to magazines that are for circulation in Ontario. So far as the magazine I talked about is concerned, the picture is quite clear. There is no change in respect of its Ontario circulation. It is printed in Toronto at present, but it is ostensibly published in Montreal and is mailed from Montreal into Ontario. That situation with respect to the issues going to Ontario would not be changed one iota. We agree on that. But there will be a distinct change with respect to the many thousands of copies of Maclean's magazine which are printed in Ontario for distribution into the other nine provinces. At the present time, because of the Ontario liquor control act and because of the federal act, they have to be trucked to Montreal, mailed there (a) so as not to break the Ontario law and (b) so as to get the cheap rate of postage. When this bill is passed, if it passes, it will be possible for those many thousands of Maclean's magazines which are printed in Toronto for distribution to the other nine provinces to be mailed from Toronto at the cheap rate of postage. In other words, Mr. Chairman, I contend that this bill will facilitate a firm like Maclean's magazine getting around the Ontario law in that it will in effect publish, since it is printing it there, a magazine in Toronto for circulation to the rest of Canada. It is facilitating an attempt to get around the Ontario law against publishing liquor advertising; at the same time they will get the cheap rates set out in section 11 of the Post Office Act. I submit the hon. member for Fort William was perfectly right the first time when he voted with us against this bill.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, in so far as hon. members were informed, the bill before us on second reading with which we have dealt simply covered the principle of distribution points for mailing purposes. We are now dealing with the details of the bill. In a large measure we are dependent upon the explanations given by the government as to the effect of that bill. Certainly, I would not support any measure, either on second reading or in the committee stage, that had as an indirect or direct effect the circumvention of any provincial law in regard to advertising or any other matter over which they have jurisdiction in connection with the sale, distribution and other details connected with liquor.

I do want to interject at this point that there is one statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with which I must take issue. I do not believe there is any such thing as cheap postage in Canada, anyway.

Mr. Knowles: With that I agree. It was a relative term.

Mr. Drew: Well, relative or otherwise, I do not think it is an accurate term. In any event it is not changed by this bill. There is nothing in this bill that affects the postal rates. As I understand it—and it is upon that understanding that I voted on second reading and that I am now approaching this, unless I can be shown otherwise—this bill provides a facility that is available to publishers in the United States for the more effective distribution of their publications, under which there are designated points to which they can send their publications in bulk and from which they can then be posted for simultaneous delivery throughout the whole country. Unless there is something hidden in this, which I am unable to see, then it would seem that our publishers should have the same facilities for distribution as are available to those south of the line who are carrying on similar activities, particularly in a large country like this.

There is one point about which there can be no question whatever other than the effect that may flow from it. It is that this does not directly or indirectly change the application of the Ontario law in respect of liquor advertising. There can be no question about that. What other consequences flow from it I admit perhaps might be more accurately explained than has yet been done. It is clear that nothing contained in this act can in any way circumvent any provincial law regarding advertising of liquor in any way.

So far as I am concerned, on the basis of the information before me, I am dealing with this, both on the second reading with which we have dealt and the sections before us, on the understanding that this is giving a facility for the distribution of publications.

I have yet to see anything in this measure that produces the result which has been argued by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). If there were any way in which I could see that this was a veiled attempt to circumvent any provincial law I would certainly oppose the bill and every section of the bill. I am unable to see that and therefore I am supporting this measure.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Clause carried on division.

Title carried on division.

Bill reported on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): When shall this bill be read a third time?

An hon. Member: Next sitting of the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Next sitting.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ADOPTED CHILDREN, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 339, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: House in committee of the whole on Bill No. 339, an act to amend the Pension Act, together with resolution relative to said act.

Shall clause 1 carry?

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—Salaries.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, as hon. members know, this bill has been before the veterans affairs committee and there were quite a number of amendments proposed. I might say that amendments have been made which were more or less agreeable to the majority of the committee, with the exception of amendments relative to clause 2.

As hon. members will recall, when the resolution introducing this bill was before the house strenuous objection was taken to the principle as set out in clause 2 that the salaries of the commissioners be fixed by order in council. That is entirely contrary to the principle which has been followed since the inception of the act.

Certain groups of veterans organizations appeared before the committee and gave evidence, and the Canadian Legion, which as hon. members know speaks for the great majority of veterans across Canada, took very serious objection to clause 2. I might add that all the opposition members on the committee and one member of the government shared that serious objection to the principle as set out in clause 2. I do not feel I should review all the objections which were taken in committee at this time. They are already on record in this house and on the record of the veterans affairs committee. The chief objection taken was that it infringed the basic principle of the Canadian Pension Act in that it took away the independence of the commission as far as this matter was concerned.

I mentioned a moment ago that since the inception of this act the salaries of commissioners have been fixed by parliament. Under this new clause they would be fixed by order in council. It was also contended in committee, as it was here in the house, that the Canadian pension commission is a judicial body and if there is one body outside the judiciary of our country which should be absolutely independent it is the Canadian pension commission. The members of that commission sit and hear evidence which has to do almost entirely with the granting of pensions, and they hear that evidence for and against the granting of a pension before arriving at their decision, in the same fashion as a judge hears evidence and makes his decision. Now, the salaries of judges are not fixed by order in council and I think we would consider it an unheard-of procedure if the salaries of judges were so fixed. Along with veterans organizations across this country we feel that parliament should not in any way lose control of the administration of the Canadian Pension Act.

As I have already pointed out, it is not my intention to enlarge on these arguments which are well known to all hon. members, and particularly to those members who sat on the committee. When this matter was before the committee I listened for arguments in favour of the action we are asked to take under clause 2, that is to fix salaries by order in council, and I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I failed to hear one logical argument in favour of this procedure. A number of hon. members representing the government spoke, but not one of them presented an argument which could be termed logical in favour of clause 2. They talked all around it and tried to belittle the argument made by opposition members and others, but no sound argument was presented as to why this should be done.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it is the feeling of the majority of the members of this committee that clause 2 should not be allowed to pass and in order to bring this matter again before the committee I move:

That clause 2 of Bill No. 339 be deleted.

The Deputy Chairman: If I heard the hon. member correctly his motion was to the effect that clause 2 of this bill be deleted. Well, the motion now before the house, if it were expressed in formal terms, would be to the effect that clause 2 be now adopted. I am therefore of the opinion that the hon. member's amendment is not an amendment but a straight negative and his purpose will be obtained by a vote on the section now before the committee.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, on that point, there was an amendment moved to clause 2 in committee and I do not know in what shape clause 2 now comes before the committee of the whole house. If it is in the shape of the bill as originally drafted with the amendment moved in committee then I presume the motion moved by the hon. member for Royal would be a subamendment, but I would like to know what the position is at the present time.

The Deputy Chairman: For the information of the hon. member, the copy which I have before me indicates that clause 2 of the bill was adopted in committee without amendment.

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Chairman, that is not correct. Clause 2 was amended in committee and if I recall correctly it was the first subsection of that clause which was amended. Are we considering subsection 1 of clause 2 as amended in committee, or are we considering it as it was originally brought into the house with the recommendation from the committee for an amendment?

Mr. Bennett: Mr. Chairman, this section was amended in the special committee and the committee reported clause 2 as amended. The amendment is as follows:

That section 2 of Bill No. 339, an act to amend the Pension Act, be amended by striking out subsection 1 thereof and substituting the following:

1. Subsection 11 of section 3 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(11). The chairman, the deputy chairman, and the other commissioners and ad hoc commissioners shall each be paid a salary to be fixed by the governor in council, except that the salary to be paid to the ad hoc commissioners and the said other commissioners shall be fixed at the same rate."

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise briefly to express the opposition of this group to this section 2. While we are pleased to support this bill in general and are pleased to have the amendments that this bill introduces, we take strong exception to this section 2 for reasons similar to those outlined by the hon. member for Royal. In the committee exception was taken to it by opposition members and by some members on the government side of the house. In presenting evidence before the committee the Canadian Legion took strong exception to the principle embodied in this section. On that account we are opposed to the section. We think it is unsound. We think it is taking away from parliament the control of the commission and is taking away its independence.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman,—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. In view of the discussion that we have just had I think perhaps one matter should be straightened out by the committee before five o'clock. The copy which I hold in my hand of Bill No. 339—that is the tabled copy—indicates that clause 2 of the bill has been marked and initialled by the chairman and by the clerk of the committee as adopted in its original form. There has now been drawn to my attention an amended form of clause 2 which, I am told unofficially, was supposed to have been adopted in that committee. It is my suggestion to this committee that if they wish to put this matter in order, at this stage we should have a minister on behalf of the crown move the amendment which some members at least believe was accepted in the veterans affairs committee and which has not been reported to us as having been adopted.

Mr. Harris: In order to regularize the proceedings, I will move as indicated in the amendment that has already been read.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I may say that we in this group are also opposed to this section.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration will send up the amendment he has moved, I will read it to the committee, and we shall try to get this section regularized.

Mr. Harris: Very well.

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. Harris moves:

That section 2 of Bill No. 339, an act to amend the Pension Act, be amended by striking out subsection 1 thereof and substituting the following:

1. Subsection 11 of section 3 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"11. The chairman, the deputy chairman, and the other commissioners and ad hoc commissioners shall each be paid a salary to be fixed by the governor in council, except that the salary to be paid to the ad hoc commissioners and the said other commissioners shall be fixed at the same rate."

Shall the amendment carry? I believe the hon. member for Acadia—

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I wish to move as a subamendment:

That section 2 of Bill No. 339 be deleted.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry that I must indicate to the hon. member for Royal that if his subamendment, as I have it, is for the deletion of the whole of clause 2 of Bill No. 339,—

Mr. Brooks: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: —it is not an amendment or a subamendment, it is a straight negative of the whole proposition which will be before the committee when the amendment has been disposed of. The clause then must either be accepted or defeated. I might point out to the hon. gentleman that when and if the clause is defeated the purpose of his proposed subamendment would be achieved. The question before the committee at the moment is on the amendment moved by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration with respect to clause 2 of Bill No. 339. I saw the hon. member for Acadia—

Mr. Green: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that this exact procedure was followed in the special committee. There the amendment was moved by the parliamentary assistant. It changes paragraph 11 of the clause. Then by way of subamendment I move that the whole clause be deleted. Surely that procedure is perfectly in order. We have an amendment and it was ruled to be in order by the chairman of the special committee on veterans affairs. You have brought in an amendment which changes the section. Then I move as a subamendment that the whole section be deleted. Surely there is nothing out of order in procedure of that kind. I submit that what was done in the special committee should now be followed in the committee of the whole.

The Deputy Chairman: With due respect to procedure which may have been adopted in the select committee, may I say that the hon. member has not convinced me that I was wrong in ruling that a direct negative is not an amendment. I would point out to this committee that whether the amendment that has been proposed by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is accepted or is defeated, this committee eventually will still have to decide upon the question: Shall clause 2 be adopted? By voting "no", they will defeat clause 2, a result which is the purpose of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Royal. I am therefore of the opinion that his amendment is not an amendment but is a direct negative and that being a direct negative should be ruled out of order.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I may say that we in this group are opposed to section 2. The amendment that has been moved does not make any change in the section in so far as our objection to it is concerned. Our objection is that the section provides for the setting of the salaries of the chairman of the commission and of the commissioners by the governor in council instead of by parliament. The salaries of the judges are set by parliament. The commission is a judicial body and we feel that their salaries should also be set by parliament in order that they may be directly responsible to parliament. Up to the present time no good reason has been given by the government for this change. All the opposition members in the special committee were opposed to this section. The Canadian Legion voiced strong objection to it. Unless the government can give some really good reason for the change, we feel that the section should be allowed to stand as it was in the Pension Act.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has any extensive remarks to make, I would suggest that we might now call it five o'clock and proceed with the consideration of private and public bills.

At five o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN SLOVAK LEAGUE

Mr. R. E. Reinke (Hamilton South) moved the second reading of Bill No. 472, to incorporate Canadian Slovak League.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LAYING OF INFORMATION OR COMPLAINT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 466, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (laying of information).

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated when this bill was introduced and given first reading on May 28, its purpose is to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to make it clear that a trade union or an individual, on the one hand, or an employer or an employers' organization, on the other hand, has the right to lay an information or complaint under the act. Those who may have familiarized themselves with this matter will probably realize that as section 45 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act now stands it is quite clear that a prosecution for an offence under the act may be brought against a trade union or against an employers' organization.

I think it is fair to say that most of us who are interested in this legislation have assumed that the opposite was also the case, namely, that it was possible for actions under the act to be brought by a trade union or by an employers' organization. I indicated on May 28 that a recent court decision has created some uncertainty and ambiguity with respect to whether an information or complaint can be laid by an aggrieved trade union against an employer. Accordingly, the purpose of the bill is to amend section 45 so as to clear up this uncertainty.

In view of the fact that in introducing this measure I made reference to a recent court decision I think it would be only fair that I indicate to the house the decision that I had in mind and its terms. It is not a very lengthy one so I think I had better read it to the house, although I should point out that there are sections of the decision that do not bear on the point that the bill seeks to correct. Nevertheless, since it is a legal point I think the decision should be on the record in full. It is a judgment given by Mr. Justice A. M. Campbell of the Court of Queen's Bench and was delivered at Winnipeg on April 6, 1954. I have a copy which has been furnished to me by the deputy prothonotary of the Court of Queen's Bench, Winnipeg, so I have the correct terms of the judgment. It reads as follows:

> This is an application in chambers for an order that Emil Walterson and Laundry and Dry Cleaning Workers' Union, 306 Donalda Building "be prohibited from taking any further proceedings" against the accused applicant in ten prosecutions (informations) laid under the Criminal Code for alleged violations of sections 4 (1), 4 (2) (a), 4 (2) (b) and 4 (3) of the Manitoba Labour Relations Act, S.M. 1948, chapter 27.
> I am of the opinion that an application for an order of prohibition is the appropriate procedure in this case. It permits careful examination of the twenty-five exhibits filed, fifteen of which require study. This would not have been possible in a stated case.
>
> This is a case where prohibition should lie. An application for prohibition based upon alleged defects on the face of the proceedings before a magistrate should not be affected by the prospect of an amendment being made to the information by which such proceedings were begun. There is no proper informant in any of the informations. The union was not the "aggrieved person", neither is Emil Walterson.
>
> In any event, if the real prosecutor is Emil Walterson there is no consent to "institute" these proceedings. On the other hand, if the real prosecutor is the union, then it cannot be an informant, even acting through its president. Section 46(1) of the statute provides for a trade union or an employers' organization being informed "against" i.e., of being an "accused". I am unable to find any section of the statute allowing either of them to be an informant.
> Furthermore, in the proceedings before the magistrate, the so-called permission (consent) must stand alone. I am of the opinion that the so-called permission (consent) cannot serve the purpose intended in these proceedings. I do not think it is necessary to deal with the other arguments advanced by counsel.
> An order of prohibition will go. Costs to the applicant.

As I have already indicated, that is the judgment given by Mr. Justice A. M. Campbell on April 6, 1954. May I make it clear that this judgment related to a matter that arose under the Manitoba labour relations act. Some hon. members may ask what that has got to do with our Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The point is that the issues which arose in this case related to section 46, subsection 1, of the Manitoba labour relations act, which is identical word for word, jot for jot and tittle for tittle, with section 45, subsection 1 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

In other words if a court decision is made, and if such a decision stands, which places a certain interpretation on the words of section 46, subsection 1, of the Manitoba labour relations act, I think it follows that the same interpretation would be held to apply to the section in the federal act which is spelled out in exactly the same words. It is because of the fear that the judgment rendered by Mr. Justice Campbell might have an effect on labour relations generally, including the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, that those interested in these matters feel that what appears to be a defect or weakness in our labour law should be corrected.

May I also point out that much of what I read in quoting Mr. Justice Campbell's judgment in full does not have an immediate bearing on the issue which is presented in my bill. I merely read the whole judgment so that it might be a matter of record. What is significant in Mr. Justice Campbell's judgment is something that some lawyers might refer to as in the nature of an obiter dictum. It is this portion:

> Section 46(1) of the statute provides for a trade union or an employers' organization being informed "against" i.e., of being an "accused". I am unable to find any section of the statute allowing either of them to be an informant.

That is the crux of the judgment, namely, that the wording of the Manitoba labour relations act, with the identical language in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, makes it possible for a trade union or an employers' organization to be informed against, but according to the learned judge it does not make it possible for a trade union or an employers' organization to initiate an action under that statute even though it may regard itself as aggrieved under the terms of this legislation.

Mr. Martin: If that was the crux of the judgment, it was not an obiter dictum.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend, I would say, has made a point. Perhaps I could straighten it out this way. Maybe it was not the crux of the argument, so far as this application was concerned. It may have been that the learned judge allowed an order of prohibition on the basis of other defects which were spelled out in the judgment, but so far as labour generally is concerned, in relation to matters that may arise in the future under our labour laws, the crux of this judgment is in the sentence I have just quoted. The smile on the minister's face seems to suggest that I have straightened that out, so perhaps I may read it again.

Section 46 (1) of the statute—

The reference is to the Manitoba statute, but the language is exactly the same as we find in section 45 (1) of the federal statute.

—provides for a trade union or an employers' organization being informed "against" i.e., of being an "accused". I am unable to find any section of the statute allowing either of them to be an informant.

Now, Mr. Speaker, those who are interested in this case, both because of their interest in this particular case and because of their interest in the labour laws of this country, felt at first that the judge had made an error, and that his decision should be appealed. The latest word I have is that that decision on the part of those interested has been altered although it may be they are still planning to appeal to a higher court. Certainly labour lawyers and counsel who advised the trade union bodies, both locally at Winnipeg and nationally here at Ottawa, are of the opinion that the learned judge may have something in so far as the interpretation of the wording of the law is concerned. None of us thought that the law was meant to have that interpretation, that trade unions or employers' organizations could be informed against but could not lay an information. It is because it appears to be a defect that we felt consideration should be given to making the necessary amendment to section 45, subsection 1, of the labour code. Perhaps so that this record might be complete and clear to those who are interested, I should put on the record section 45, subsection 1, of the labour code as it now stands. It reads as follows:

A prosecution for an offence under this act may be brought against an employers' organization or a trade union and in the name of the organization or union and for the purpose of such a prosecution a trade union or an employers' organization shall be deemed to be a person, and any act or thing done or omitted by an officer or an agent of an employers' organization or trade union within the scope of his authority to act on behalf of the organization or union shall be deemed to be an act or thing done or omitted by the employers' organization or trade union.

Bearing in mind the point I am trying to make, hon. members will see that if, as I contend, there is a weakness or defect in this subsection it is in the first line or two thereof. I refer to the portion of that subsection where it says:

A prosecution for an offence under this act may be brought against . . .

And so on. Our contention is that to cure the defect the wording should be that a prosecution for an offence under this act may be brought "by or against . . ." All that is needed to ensure protection either way, if either party is aggrieved, is to insert the words "by or" in the appropriate place, just before the word "against". Those who have looked at this matter feel it would be well to make sure there are no loopholes, no point not covered, and just to do that section 45 should be further amended by adding a new subsection 3 which would read:

(3) Any information or complaint in respect of any prosecution under this act may be laid by an employer, an employers' organization, trade union or person claiming to be aggrieved under this act.

In presenting this bill, Mr. Speaker, it is my belief we are not asking for anything new. We are not asking for anything we have not assumed to be part of the labour law, but rather we are asking that the necessary step be taken to correct what appears to be a defect, in view of the decision rendered by Mr. Justice Campbell at Winnipeg to which I have made reference. I present the matter to the house hoping that favourable consideration will be given to this request of those who are interested in the correction of this defect, and that the legislation be made to read so that it will carry what we thought was the intent, namely that the aggrieved person or aggrieved body, be it a trade union or an employers' organization, should be able to lay an information under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Minister of Labour): The Minister of Labour, as my hon. friend and the house knows, is not in the city but is away on public business. In his absence I have been asked, as Acting Minister of Labour, to point out that the minister and the Department of Labour have followed with interest this judgment of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench. From the advice that has been made available to me it would seem that my hon. friend is rushing things a little too quickly by presenting an amendment to the federal legislation at this time. The information that I have is that the unions feel they have good grounds for launching an appeal and that they propose to do so. Of course, if the appeal is successful there would be no necessity for the amendment, as my hon. friend well knows.

Following the appeal, should it be desirable to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act it would seem that this should be done only after a careful examination of all the implications, and particularly the effect on trade unions as unincorporated bodies and the repercussions which, of course, may occur in the field of general law, both civil and criminal. Pending further information I am going to suggest to my hon. friend, having in mind that there is going to be an appeal launched as we are advised, that perhaps he would be willing to let the matter stand. I say to him, on behalf of the Minister of Labour, that if it is finally established that there is still any uncertainty or any defect in this section of the federal statute requiring correction, careful consideration will be given to the question as to whether or not an amendment along the lines proposed by my hon. friend should be undertaken. Having in mind this statement, I would ask my hon. friend if at this time he would be agreeable to allowing this bill to stand?

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the minister moves the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

On motion of Mr. Martin the debate was adjourned.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE VOTING AGE

The house resumed, from Friday, June 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill No. 390, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I presume if the hon. member speaks now, he will be closing the debate.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I had not realized that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) had completed his remarks on this bill, or I would have been in my place. I am really a little worried about the state of grace in which I find myself, when, for this the third time in almost as many days, I am in complete agreement with the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Fleming: Things are looking up for you.

Mr. Knowles: You were born a Tory, were you not?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I do not know whether it is possible to be born a Tory, but I heard a good deal about Toryism in my youth, and it took quite a long time to get over it. I hope, sir, that there will not be a relapse.

Mr. Drew: I assure the minister that agreement in this instance will not prejudice his position.

Mr. Pickersgill: I appreciate the intervention of the Leader of the Opposition.

I was about to say that I agree with what was said by him about this measure. I am not at all sure that when one attains the age of 21 years he is endowed with wisdom he does not have at 20, at 19, or 18 or 17, or even 14. The Leader of the Opposition referred to a member of his family who is 14, and I could refer to some members of mine, all of whom are younger than that and who sometimes display more wisdom than, in my very prejudiced view, is sometimes displayed by some legislators in this chamber—if I may be permitted to say that.

Mr. Knowles: The race is improving on that side of the chamber, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: But the reason I was impressed by the argument of the Leader of the Opposition—indeed, I had intended to make it myself, had he not got there first—was that it does seem to me that before we change the voting age we should change the age at which people who would vote would have full legal capacity. The age of 21 years is that at which one can sue and be sued on one's own account, and the age at which one assumes full legal obligations. As I conceive it, voting is one of the most important of the obligations of a full citizen. If there is to be a change in the voting age, as to the wisdom of which I think there can be two opinions, and about which up to now I must confess I have not formed any very strong views, it seems to me the other step ought to be taken first.

There is another danger in this kind of proposal. It seems to me it is the kind to which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), and perhaps to an even greater extent the hon. member who represents Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), are prone, and that is what I might call the auction type of legislation. That is to say, someone in the house makes an offer and, with no early hope of having to accept any responsibility, the hon. gentlemen can always outbid.

Mr. Knowles: You are bidding 21; we are bidding only 18.

Mr. Pickersgill: Twenty-one, or bust.

I cannot see, really, why the hon. member for Assiniboia chose the age of 18; why he did not for example choose the age of 17. In fact, most of the argument advanced in support of this measure by most of those who supported it was, if my memory serves me correctly, that we ask people to fight at the age of 18, when there is fighting to be done, and that therefore if they are old enough to fight they should be old enough to vote.

One hon. member—and I think it was my fellow Manitoban, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras)—pointed out that enlistments are permitted into the army, not at the age of 18 but at 17½. So that probably there should be an amendment, if that is to be the main argument. I do not think the fact that 18 years is already the law in Saskatchewan is any very compelling reason for most of us in the house to adopt this as a national measure.

Mr. Argue: Ask the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker).

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who is in committee and not in his seat today, is perfectly capable of making up his own mind.

The measure we are debating is a private member's bill having to do with the election of members to the House of Commons, a measure in respect of which there is no necessity of having any government policy at all. It seems to me that in relation to the election laws we, as members elected to this chamber, and not as members of the government or of the opposition, settle what the law will be. And it would not embarrass me in the slightest to find that the hon. member for Rosthern or the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir), or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris), or any other member in the house took a view of this question different from the one I take.

As hon. members can see, the view I take is not strongly held, except on the one central point, that if we are to change the age at all, then the change should be in more than merely the privilege of voting. It should be to give people full legal responsibilities in every respect, when they reach the age at which they will be permitted to vote.

I was also impressed by the general line of argument used by the hon. member for Provencher in what I considered a very thoughtful and somewhat original presentation to the house. It has been my experience, and I believe it has been the experience of a great many young men and young women between the ages of 18 and 21, that those young men and women have not really formed very fixed convictions about a large number of questions which occupy the public stage, and about which in conducting our public affairs we have to form views.

I happen to be one of those people who think it is a good thing to have political parties, to have people belonging to those parties and, except when there are very strong reasons to the contrary, to have people stick to their parties. It seems to me, sir, that if we gave the vote at the age of 18 there would be a tendency for a great many more to vote in a stereotyped fashion, before they had really had time to complete their education and to do the kind of thinking and reflecting that some, at any rate, of the citizens do in those years. If I may be personal about it, since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has drawn attention to the matter, it would have been somewhat more embarrassing to me if I had voted at the age of 18 because, undoubtedly, I would have voted differently from the way in which I have now formed—perhaps a habit—of voting.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): A temporary habit.

Mr. Knowles: You do not have to stay in the rut.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope I shall progress further; and if I do I suspect it will be because I belong to a party which is a genuinely progressive vehicle, and not merely one that sticks the progressive tag on its name.

Mr. Knowles: A horse-drawn vehicle, do you mean?

Mr. Argue: Have you got a forward gear?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, and also a brake. It seems to me that sometimes a brake is a very useful part of any mechanism that moves. I think, sir, there is another reason why, in default of any very strong ground for supporting this bill, it would be preferable not to adopt it. It is that elections—and I am not talking about what is spent by parties; I am merely talking about what it costs the taxpayers directly—cost a lot of money. If you brought thousands of additional—I have no idea what the statistics are, and I am not too good on this particular kind of arithmetic—electors, perhaps from a quarter million to half a million extra electors, on to the rolls it would mean that the cost of holding elections would be considerably increased. I doubt very much whether the results of elections would be changed to any material degree. They might be occasionally; it is a little hard to say. But it seems to me that if we have—as we have in this country—universal suffrage for persons 21 years of age and over, we do in fact in a general election get an adequate and a fair cross-section of the whole population, and that after all is what the purpose of elections is.

I do think also it is undesirable to tamper with these conventional ways of doing things unless—and this is a very important qualification—one is really convinced that by changing them definite improvement will be made.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Assiniboia felt that if this change were made it would be of benefit to one particular party rather than another. I do not think he did. Personally, I do not think it would. On balance I do not think it will have very much effect of any kind, except to increase the number of votes cast, increase the number of voters, increase the cost of elections and possibly, too, impose on a lot of Canadians the duty of making up their minds about questions on which two or three years more reflection would probably enable them to reach conclusions which would be more valid.

I go back again to my own personal experience. I think I was just as intelligent at the age of 18 as I was at the age of 21, but in the interval I had had a certain amount of experience, or a certain number of experiences, sir, and for some of us experience does alter our outlook, and in some cases it does widen our horizons; it does in some cases add to our knowledge. All these things, it seems to me, are desirable.

I would not like to be misunderstood. I am not one of those neo-fascists who believe that only the good or the virtuous or the wise should be allowed to vote. I think it is just as important for those who are not quite so good and those who are not quite so wise to be allowed to vote, too.

Mr. Knowles: After all, you were glad to win the election.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, what I wanted to make abundantly clear was I did not think that foolishness or stupidity or ignorance should be disqualifications of voters; but I do think that on balance, other things being equal, it is preferable that the voters should be informed, and I think the more information they can have the better. I do think on balance the electorate is a little more apt to be well-informed if the voting age is left at 21, where it now is, than it would be if it were to be reduced in accordance with the bill proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia. It is for those reasons, sir, that I propose, if this measure should come to a vote, to oppose it.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I do not intend to discuss this measure at any great length. I agree with the Secretary of State (Mr. Pickersgill) that if the change in voting age which is proposed by this measure does come into effect I would not consider it to be a matter of world-shattering importance. But it is a question, as he has suggested, of judgment on which members from various parts of the house might feel they can express their honest views.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to some of the arguments that he has advanced, and they have included some relation to his own experience as a young voter. I would feel that if we had an election in this country every year there would be a good deal more validity to his argument than appears to me to be at the present time. I might, for example, interject my own particular experience on the first occasion on which I had a chance to cast a ballot. It so happened that the federal election was held when I had reached or just passed the age of 20, which meant, as you can readily see, that before I cast my first vote in an election I had reached the very mature age of 24 or 25. This question should be considered in part at least from that point of view. I have long felt that one of the most disconcerting aspects of our society is the lack of interest which a large percentage of citizens take in the public affairs of the country.

Frankly, my principal reason for rising to support this measure is that I believe it would serve to stimulate in the young people in the country reaching manhood and womanhood a greater interest in the public affairs of our country. I base my reason for that in part at least upon the fact that a great many of our young people in the country are finishing their schooling at approximately the age of 18, and that in most of our modern schools today a certain amount of time is spent in arousing in the students an interest in the institution of government and in various other aspects of public affairs. If it were possible, assuming that an election followed shortly after the graduation of students from high school, to have them participate in an election to the extent of at least casting a vote, then I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, there is a likelihood that their interest would be stimulated and would continue. At least there is a greater likelihood than if they were faced with a period of years during which they would have to wait until they reached the age of 25 without having the stimulus of an election to interest them in a decision that is important so far as our national policies are concerned.

With regard to the argument advanced by the Secretary of State to the effect that along with this provision should go the right to assume full legal responsibility in every other aspect of life, I think I would agree with his point if he were to limit that to the right, for example, to stand for election and be elected as a member of parliament. But it seems to me on the basis of his own argument that the net result of allowing people of this age to vote would not be to cause any great change in the political spectrum of this country. His argument allows a good deal of ground for the discredited point that that right should not be given unless full legal responsibility in every other sense was allowed. I commend the points I have raised to the attention of the house before we are called upon to make a decision on this measure.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising for a moment to oppose this bill I do not propose to repeat the different arguments put forward on several occasions during which this bill has been before us. I wish merely to state that it is only several years ago that a poll was taken in the Westdale Collegiate in Hamilton and in other high schools in that area and the pupils themselves were opposed to the earlier voting age. I rise merely to put that on record because I know it to be a fact.

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) speaks again there are just one or two remarks I would like to make on the general principle involved in this very interesting discussion which has arisen regarding the voting age. I am sure none of us here would wish to belittle or criticize or in any way discuss the lack of ability of our 18-year-olds, nor in any way mention their lack of wisdom or maturity. We all know that the young people in Canada probably have a broader outlook, certainly a greater opportunity for education, and probably a wider experience in the light of present-day living than they had a decade or two ago.

The argument has been raised that, having reached the age of 18, they have enough experience, wisdom and maturity to make it possible for them to vote intelligently, and hence this bill has been introduced. I assume that that is the only basis on which this bill can be justified. Well, the age-old view has been, of course, that 21 is the age of, I think it is called, discretion. That view has a long history and has existed, I suppose, ever since we have had the system of common law introduced in England. Ever since that system was set up 21 has been considered the age when one becomes legally responsible for one's actions. It is the only age at which a person can enter into a binding contract, and that is a basic premise that has been in effect for, I suppose, well nigh on 1,000 years up to this time.

Presumably there is a very sound basis for that legal belief, and it is not something that you can discard lightly. That is not to say that making the voting age 18 is directly related to that legal right, duty or responsibility, but it certainly is an encroachment on that principle.

As I have already said, it would take a very careful estimate of the situation before one could bring oneself to vote for this particular measure. If my memory serves me right, when the hon. member for Assiniboia was introducing this bill he said he felt—and he can correct me if I am wrong—that our 18-year-olds are better educated today than they were at one time and they were now in a position to vote intelligently at that age. Apropos of that there is a great deal of confusion existing in educational circles regarding the education our youth are now receiving. In Ontario last year the Ontario Educational Association conducted a survey of the province of Ontario to determine just what happened to school children after they started school, what qualifications they received, from which courses they finally graduated, and what happened to them up to the time of leaving university.

They found out that out of every 100 children who commenced elementary school, only 13 ended up with any sort of graduation certificate from high school. In other words, in Ontario only 13 out of 100 graduated with a senior matriculation in high school, and since it is a very progressive and rich province I presume that figure might well be applicable to the other nine provinces. I have no way of knowing, of course, whether that is true, but you cannot merely assume because the opportunity for education is there that that opportunity is always taken. Certainly if you are using that as a criterion I would submit that that criterion is not a valid one because 13 is certainly nowhere near a majority of the youth who should graduate. The others leave school, I presume, at the average school leaving age of 16½ or 17.

Is it too much to say that they need the four years between 17 and 21, or the five years between 16 and 21, to feel their way, get their feet on the ground, and gain that experience which comes only with being in business and through the effort they must put forth to make a living? Is it too much to say that they need that four or five years to prepare their minds and to gain the necessary experience and information to vote intelligently?

It seems to me that is the only way in which we can tackle this problem. As I said, there has been a great deal of confusion in educational circles in Ontario regarding this particular problem and the plight of the student who is in high school, who leaves high school and goes on to university.

I know that of the 13 who graduate with a senior matriculation there are only three in Ontario who go on to university. Of that three, one quits, one fails and the other graduates, so we have an average now of one out of 100 children who go to elementary school in Ontario, graduate from there, and then finally graduate from university, according to the figures of the Ontario Educational Association in a survey they conducted in November, 1953.

With this in mind, and bearing in mind the views of other qualified people such as Dr. Hilda Neatby who, in her book, "Too Little for the Mind" created quite a furore, I think the situation certainly requires a great deal more study than we are able to give it, or can give it in this debate in the house at the present time. I would submit that the time is not ripe, the matter has not been sufficiently adjudicated upon, or the criterion on which we are going to change the voting age has not been sufficiently established for us to vote intelligently to change the voting age from 21 to 18 at this particular time.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I say that as I have listened to the various members who have taken part in this debate and who were opposing this bill, I find that that opposition is in accord with every extension of the franchise down through the ages.

Mr. Nowlan: How do you know?

Mr. MacInnis: I have read a little bit of history.

Mr. Nowlan: What do you mean?

Mr. MacInnis: I can tell my hon. friend that in this country for many years—

[Mr. Enfield.]

Mr. Nowlan: What a statement to make!

Mr. MacInnis: —we were definitely of the opinion that women were not persons and consequently were not entitled to vote. It was thought that women were really not to be trusted with the duty of voting to elect members of parliament who were to make the laws. I do not know, but probably my hon. friend still holds those ideas. However, he certainly would not advocate them now that women are important and have influence because they have the vote. To advocate anything of that kind would mean the disappearance of the advocate from any political scene.

From reading English history I remember the opposition to the universal franchise for persons 21 years of age and over when it was advocated in that country. I recall reading Lord Macaulay's speech in the House of Commons in opposition to the measure, wherein he told of the dreadful things that would happen to the British people if these uneducated workers were given the right to vote. However, they were given the right to vote and those dreadful things have not happened to the people of the United Kingdom. When women were given the right to vote in that country, they were not given the vote at the age of 21; they were given it at the age of 26. Although women are supposed to mature earlier than do men, they were not given the vote until they reached an age five years older than that at which men received the vote.

I think a good deal of nonsense is talked with regard to this matter of the age of discretion. In the Journal the other day, I saw a definition of "discretion". I am sorry that I forgot to bring it with me but I think it was to the effect that it is the age at which you find you cannot do the things you would like to do. It was something like that although it may not be just quite that. If it is not, it ought to be anyway.

I find that when a person becomes a member of the armed forces at the age of 18 or perhaps earlier, he is entitled to vote. If a person who becomes a member of the armed forces at the age of 18 is entitled to vote, what about the person who sets out to earn a livelihood for, say, his mother and the younger members of his family at the age of 18? I may say that there are many of them. Should not that boy or that girl be allowed to vote? Why all these fine distinctions? They have no validity at all. If the age of 21 has been set, as was said by the hon. member who preceded me, say for perhaps one thousand years, on what basis was it set? Who said that was the age where men came to the point where they could choose right from wrong or when they should have the right to take part in government as mature human beings? It was something arbitrarily set by somebody. I do not know who the nincompoop was but I have no doubt that he was just as ill-advised as I would be if I said the age should be 17.

The hon. member who preceded me referred to Dr. Neatby's book. He is right. It caused a furore but I think that is all you can say for it. Whether there is any basis of knowledge or understanding underlying what she says is a question that is much debated.

I would suggest that we get down to earth and realize that our objection to this step is the old reluctance that has come down through the ages, the old habit of wishing to limit the franchise or participation in government to as few people as possible. The young people today at the age of 18—particularly those who have not had the opportunity to go to university but who have had to take up the responsibilities of citizens before they were 21—are entitled to the vote, and we should not refuse it to them.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but in view of the comments made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I should like to say at least one or two words. Personally I have always followed the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) with a great deal of interest and usually in what he has said I have found much to commend itself to one's reason and one's judgment. However, I think this afternoon he has departed somewhat from his usual custom —if he has not gone quite to the extent of being a rabble rouser—in suggesting that those who are opposed to this bill are guilty of reaction and of living in the past. I do not subscribe to that view and I do not think it is fair of the hon. gentleman to make that suggestion. I do not think that he has any basis whatever for making it. He can perhaps speak with authority on the position of women in public life and the reason for giving women the vote. I will accept his judgment on that matter.

However, I should like to put myself in the position of saying that I think I know about as much as he does about the young people in this country. I happen to be the father of five children, all of whom now have the vote. They are now old enough to vote intelligently and well because they are 21 years of age, even though it has taken a little while to train them to vote right. I can tell the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that not one of them would accept his suggestion that it is desirable, necessary or fair that they should be given the vote at the age of 18. I have had the fortunate privilege of having children in my house, living as I do in a university town, and entertaining scores and scores of them. I am not speaking grandiloquently. Over a number of years scores of them have come in and out on Sunday nights and on week nights and they have discussed these matters.

I agree with the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Enfield) who spoke a few minutes ago on the difficulties of the situation. I think he was expressing the view of the young people in connection with this matter. With the problems being as complex as they are, they do not think that they have any God-given right to vote at the age of 18. In fact, they do not think they should vote at the age of 18. In fact, some of them wonder if we should have the age set at 21. I wonder if this is not a form of escapism that people are trying to get in hiding behind this matter and saying "There is something wrong with public life", yet bringing in youngsters of 18 to vote. What about ourselves? How many adults today are failing to accept their responsibility? How much do we fail in this House of Commons in impressing upon the public the necessity for dealing with these matters? Until we accept that responsibility, I do not think we should try to extend the franchise.

Mr. Speaker: It is now six o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Nowlan the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: At eight o'clock the house will resume consideration of the business that was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR ADOPTED CHILDREN, CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 339, to amend the Pension Act—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. I understand when the committee rose previously we were discussing clause 2 and the amendment proposed by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Shall the amendment carry?

Pension Act

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, clause 2, which it is proposed to write into the Pension Act, has the effect of repealing the provision which has been in the act since its inception in 1919 for setting the salaries of the pension commissioners. If the clause carries those salaries will from now on be set by the cabinet. There was considerable argument against such a change when the bill was in its earlier stages. In the committee on veterans affairs the parliamentary assistant brought in one amendment to this particular clause, but all it did was to provide that all the ordinary commissioners should be paid the same salary. There are of course higher salaries for the chairman and deputy chairman of the commission.

The committee will be interested in knowing that at the present time the salaries under the Pension Act are $12,000 per year for the chairman, $11,000 for the deputy chairman, and $10,000 for each of the ordinary members of the commission. This clause is most objectionable to all opposition parties and, I believe, to the veterans of Canada, for two reasons. In the first place, the setting of these salaries by the cabinet will do away with at least some of the independence of the pension commission. Second, it takes away from parliament and gives to the cabinet the right to set these salaries. That is contrary to what we had thought was the trend in this year 1954. We have been hoping that the cabinet would give up some of the autocratic powers it has had, and as a matter of fact the Emergency Powers Act was allowed to expire just eight days ago. But here we find a move in the opposite direction under which power is taken away from parliament and given to the cabinet.

First of all I should like to deal with our objection that this change will interfere with the independence of the pension commission. I do not suppose the Minister of Justice would have the temerity to argue in the house or anywhere else that the salaries of Canadian judges should be set by order in council. They have always been set by parliament. The figures have always been placed right in the statute so that the judges of the land know that they are not subject to any change being made in their salaries at the whim of the cabinet.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that there is even more reason why the Canadian pension commissioners should have their salaries set out in the Pension Act. There is even more reason why we should be careful to keep them independent and to build them up in every possible way as an independent body not subject to control by whatever government happens to be in power.

[The Chairman.]

The Pension Act was passed originally in 1919 just after the first war. In the original act the amounts that were to be paid to the chairman and the ordinary members of the commission were set out. From time to time since then there have been increases but in every single case the increase has been made by changing the statute itself.

Since I came here in 1936 I have been privileged to be a member of every special committee on veterans affairs. When it has been proposed to increase the salaries of the pension commissioners the change has been brought in in the form of a bill which has been referred to the committee on veterans affairs and in due course has come back to the house and become law in just the same way that judges' salaries have been dealt with twice within the last six or seven years.

This is very important to the veterans of Canada because they feel that the pension commission should be kept independent. One has only to go over the other provisions of the Pension Act to realize that the legislators who passed the act in the first place were very careful to build up the independence of the commission. I refer, for example, to section 4 of the Pension Act, and I believe that each of these provisions I am about to quote has been in the Pension Act since 1919. Section 4 reads in part as follows:

> The commission shall be attached to the department and the expenses required to be incurred for the discharge of its duties shall be paid out of the moneys provided by parliament.

I point out that under that section the commission is not made a part of the department but is merely attached. That was one other way to help to keep the commissioners independent. Section 5 reads as follows:

> Subject to the provisions of this act and of any regulations, the commission has full and unrestricted power and authority and exclusive jurisdiction to deal with and adjudicate upon all matters and questions relating to the award, increase, decrease, suspension or cancellation of any pension under this act and to the recovery of any overpayment that may have been made; and effect shall be given by the department and the comptroller of the treasury to the decisions of the commission.

There you have the commission given absolute power with regard to pensions, and I would point out that the last sentence is particularly noteworthy in that it provides that effect shall be given by the department and the comptroller of the treasury to the decisions of the commission. In other words, if the pension commission decides that a veteran is entitled to a pension, treasury board cannot interfere. They cannot come along and say: "You should not have given that pension", because the Pension Act is so worded that the pension commission has absolute jurisdiction. Another significant section is subsection 5 of section 5 which reads as follows:

The commission shall determine any question of interpretation of this act and the decision of the commission on any such question is final.

That means that where there is a doubt as to the legal interpretation of the Pension Act the pension commission can make that interpretation and their decision on such question is made final. Another significant section is 6 which reads as follows:

The governor in council may impose upon the commission like duties in respect of any grants in the nature of pensions, allowances or gratuities authorized to be made under any statute other than this act and effect shall be given to any adjudication by the commission under any such act either by the department or such other department of government as the governor in council may direct.

That goes very far too. I submit that it means that the handling of old age assistance payments, for example, could be turned over to the Canadian pension commission. The Department of National Health and Welfare would be bound to follow the rulings made by this pension commission if that were done.

The act shows clearly that this pension commission was intended to be a judicial body. Commissioners are always under suspicion from the veterans of Canada, because in many cases they have to turn down an application for pension. The first thought of the wounded or sick veteran in my province who fails to qualify for a pension is, oh well, that pension commission is just a branch of the government and they have turned me down; it is not a proper court and I would like to appeal to the county court or the supreme court of British Columbia.

For many years there have been rather insistent demands that there should be an appeal to the courts provided for these applicants for disability pension. Surely, the Prime Minister and the members of the government realize that by taking away these provisions for leaving parliament in control of the pension commission they are weakening that commission and making it all the more subject to criticism from the veterans of Canada. They are making all the more justification for a demand from the veterans of Canada that there be an appeal to the courts of this land from decisions of the pension commission. If it is to continue as a judicial body, then let us see that it has the same standing as the courts, and that the pension commissioners are directly under parliament rather than being under the cabinet.

The Canadian Legion take a very serious view of this. I have here the brief which they submitted to the standing committee on veterans affairs, and the Legion had this to say about this particular question:

The Canadian Legion looks upon section 2 of Bill 339 as a serious potential infringement of one of the basic principles of the Canadian Pension Act.

The original, and I think the continuing intention of the act, was that the Canadian pension commission be as independent as parliament can make it. This is as it should be.

After all the whole basis of our veteran and pension legislation rests on the conscience of the Canadian people who express their wishes through you their elected representatives. Parliament guards that trust, and indeed it is for the express purpose of executing the trust that the committee of parliamentary members meet here today.

But section 2 takes away from parliament the right to establish the quantum of salaries to be paid the pension commission and gives the right to the cabinet.

We feel that this is a definite move against the autonomy of the pension commission, an autonomy which was established by parliament and must be protected by parliament.

The salaries of the judges of our courts are fixed by parliament. That is admittedly necessary for the safe functioning of our courts. We are confident that any attempt to make or to have the judges' salaries fixed by the executive branch of government would cause a mighty outcry across the nation.

We contend that the pension commission is also a judicial body, and as such it is important that it be left so far as possible in a position that it is answerable to parliament alone. We, therefore, must strongly urge upon the committee, that the time tested and vital principles by which the pension commission salaries are fixed by parliament should be retained. We feel most strongly that parliament must continue to control in every possible way the administration of the Canadian Pension Act.

The national council of veterans also submitted a brief and they were very hesitant about this provision. They said if it did not interfere with the independence of the commission, then it might be all right. There was a great big "if" at the first of their submission.

Mr. Lapointe: I think the hon. member should read what they said.

Mr. Green: Yes, I shall be glad to do that. It reads as follows:

If—

And I emphasize that word.

—this section will facilitate the fixing and administration of commensurate salaries, without impairing the force and effect of appointments to the commission by the House of Commons, and protected from partisan or other influences which would be detrimental to the fair and impartial administration of the Canadian Pension Act, we have no objection.

Mr. Lapointe: You emphasize the "if" and I will emphasize the "we have no objection."

Mr. Green: I emphasize the "if" and I emphasize the stand taken by the Canadian Legion.

Apart from my first submission entirely, I submit that for the sake of parliament itself, this change should not be made. We have not had a free parliament in this country from 1939 until the end of May when the Emergency Powers Act went off the statute books. This parliament has been under the thumb of the cabinet since 1939, so why in June, 1954, should the cabinet seek to take away from parliament the power to set the salaries of the Canadian pension commission? This move is nothing more nor less than an affront to parliament and I can see no reason why we should agree to a change of this kind being made.

As a matter of fact, the government members on the committee were put under a great strain in trying to justify the change. One of them, and one alone, had the courage to stand up and take his stand against it. All the rest of the Liberal members of the committee voted to bring about the change. The arguments that they put up—really, I have never seen some of these able parliamentarians like the hon. member for Spadina put to such great trouble to try to make arguments that even could be listened to let alone taken as being logical. They said this change is unimportant; there is nothing to this change. Why not do some of the important things? The hon. member for Vancouver South said, why bother about this little thing? What we want to do is to increase the war veterans allowances.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: He knew very well that the government would not allow this committee to even consider the war veterans allowance, let alone raise it. When that matter was under consideration in this house he did not get up and say he wanted the allowances considered. He was on the side of the government at that time.

Mr. Philpott: On a question of privilege; if my hon. friend will look at the speech I made when we were considering raising the indemnities of members of this house, he will see that I said very clearly I would much prefer to be voting for an increase in the war veterans allowance or the old age pension.

Mr. Green: Why did the hon. member not say that when the members of all opposition parties were trying to get the powers of this committee extended to consider war veterans allowances? He was strangely silent then about war veterans allowances. However, in the committee that was his argument, that he did not want to be bothered with these pension commissioners' salaries; he was all for rushing in to get the war veterans allowance increased.

The hon. member for Spadina, and one or two of his other colleagues who dared to say anything at all said, why this is going to improve the administration of the Pension Act; it is going to be much easier to get salaries raised if we do not have to go to parliament. We will be able to get it done much quicker. There will not be a lot of fuss about it. It will be all over, and then it will be possible to spend our time on something else. This administrative argument about changing more quickly, well they rang the changes on that. And that was about the only argument they had, as a matter of fact. There was nothing else they could think of to justify it.

And I will be very much interested to hear what the Minister of Veterans Affairs has to say this evening to justify these changes. And I would like to ask the hon. member for Spadina to get up and tell us how he justifies this change being made. Let some of these other members get up and say to the house what they are saying around the corridors about this change. Let us hear them justify it; let us hear them justify taking away from parliament the right to set the salaries of the pension commissioners.

Mr. Abbott: Let us get the auction going again!

Mr. Green: Oh, the Minister of Finance may think this is funny.

Mr. Abbott: No; I just said, "Let us get the auction going again."

Mr. Green: Never mind the auction. This is not particularly funny for over a million veterans in Canada.

Mr. Abbott: We must be fair to the taxpayers as well as to the veterans.

Mr. Harkness: This does not affect the taxpayers at all.

Mr. Green: I do suggest this: Let the Prime Minister give his followers the freedom to vote as they see fit. Let him get up and tell the house that the life of the government is not at stake, and then let the Liberal members vote as they see fit. I will be very much interested to see how they vote, if he will put them in that position. There can be no excuse for enforcing party discipline on a question of this kind.

There is only one reason for making this change, and that is that it is intended to raise the salaries of the pension commissioners, and the government does not want to have any more publicity than is necessary in connection with it. It wants to be in a position to raise these salaries after members who are attending this session go to their homes. At that time there can be no discussion about it, until the house meets again in the fall, or after the new year. In fact, there could be no discussion until we got down to a consideration of veterans affairs estimates a year from now. Then we would be faced with an accomplished fact, and there would be no possible chance of making any change at that time. There would be no use talking about it then. The salaries would have been raised; parliament would have been by-passed.

That, I submit to you, is the reason why the cabinet is making the change proposed here in the bill. And let me close with these words, that this change is not of the slightest benefit to the veterans of Canada. This is a provision written into the Pension Act, not for the benefit of even one veteran in this country, but for the benefit of the government and of the members of the pension commission. This change will shake the confidence of the veterans of Canada in the pension commission; there can be no other result. Furthermore, it strikes at the independence of the pension commission. There would be no more justification for the Minister of Justice to come into this House of Commons with a provision whereby judges' salaries would be set by order in council than there is for this provision concerning members of the pension commission.

Mr. Knowles: Do not suggest that.

Mr. Harkness: That will be the next move.

Mr. Green: Well, the Minister of Justice may be pretty dumb, but he is not that dumb.

Mr. Abbott: I can think of others who are just as dumb; can't you?

Mr. Bennett: You should be a pretty good judge.

Mr. Green: I do not include the Minister of Veterans Affairs in that statement.

Mr. Abbott: Speak for yourself, John.

Mr. Green: Finally, this change is taking power away from the Canadian parliament; and, as such, it is entirely wrong. I hope the Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet will just take another look at this section before they force it through the house. If they are not interested in the submission made by me, or any other member on the opposition side of the house, then let them consider the veterans of Canada. And if they do that, they will not force this present change through.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, it is rather unfortunate that the veterans affairs committee had to return to the house with a controversy of this kind on its hands; because, otherwise, the committee got along very well. It brought about a good number of changes in the proposed legislation. It is bad near the end of a session to bring in a sore spot like this. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has served one very useful purpose: If you happen to be with him in opposition he makes his case pretty thoroughly; and it saves time for whoever comes behind him in the debate.

Now, I agree with him. We agreed in committee, and it is unfortunate we have to repeat it in the house. I agree that if the principle of parliament setting the salaries of the commission was correct from 1919 to 1954, there was not anything I could see that should have changed it.

The second point we have to consider is that there is a principle at stake here, and that is the right of members of parliament to vote money. That principle is at stake; and it is not a good thing for members of parliament to get away from that principle.

The next thing I see that is bad in the proposal is that it interferes with the independence of the commission. That commission was always looked upon as an agency which would operate between the government and the veterans, with the veterans affairs committee acting as a kind of referee. But if the cabinet now appoints the members of the commission—well, in my judgment the most trouble the commission has had in the past has been with treasury board. And if we now grant the right to at least some members of treasury board to fix the salaries of the commission, in addition to making the appointments, then in my opinion it will have the effect of making the members of that commission subservient, at least to some extent, to members of treasury board. It creates a very bad psychological effect. This complex is created, whether we like it or not: "I am working for the cabinet; they appoint me; they fix my salary; they pay me, so I had better be a good boy." There can be no doubt about that, and I think it is a very bad principle. Even at this late date this should be reconsidered.

Now, I know there is a very important debate to come up soon on an important section of our economy. I do not want to belabour this matter. We are all on record in committee. On the two points I have set out, I completely disagree with the proposal as it stands at the present time. It is bad legislation. It can set a precedent: The Minister of Justice can come in and ask for the same concession; the Minister of Transport can ask for the same thing for the benefit of the board of transport commissioners. And after that precedent is set, in the event of any argument every member is in a position to do what Mr. Speaker does every once in a while: He can go back to 1800 and take a ruling made by someone, and offer it as a precedent to justify a decision now being made.

We should consider very carefully before we pass this kind of legislation. As I said before, the committee acted in a flexible manner in respect of the bills that went before it. Many good amendments were made. This was one of the points at issue, and I think it deserves reconsideration on the part of members in the House of Commons. There should be no effort to drive in a wedge at this stage of the session. It would be a very bad precedent and, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said, it would shake the confidence of veterans across the country. It would take from members of parliament the right to vote money, and that is another bad precedent.

I believe someone on the government side, preferably the Minister of Veterans Affairs, should say, "Let us try this for another year." We have had it since 1919. It has not done any harm. The commissioners are not underpaid, and as far as I am concerned I have always thought that when they came before the veterans affairs committee they came as representatives of the veterans in an independent position. If they come in next year as appointees with salaries fixed by the treasury board, as far as I am concerned they will no longer be independent. They will be there as representatives of the government, because he who controls my job and pays me controls me. That is true in any walk of life that you may get into. I join with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in what he said. He put the case very well; there is no need of my repeating it. All members on the committee from our group take the same position.

Mr. Quelch: This clause has been what you might call the main bone of contention in the veterans affairs committee. The government has tossed it to us and said, chew on it for a while. I listened to the interesting speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. He made a pretty good case for rescinding this clause. He asked for explanations from the government as to why it was necessary to change clause 2. I understand that this section has been in the act since 1919. Therefore it is rather strange that in 1954 the government decides to change the method by which the commission shall be paid. The explanatory note merely says:

> This is a new subsection which provides that the salaries of the chairman, deputy chairman and commissioners, including ad hoc commissioners, are to be fixed by the governor in council rather than by the statute as heretofore.

There is not one word of explanation there as to why the change is made, in spite of the fact that members on this side of the house and members from all parties have asked the government and the Minister of Veterans Affairs to give an explanation. So far we have not had a single squeak from the government. Surely it is about time that we received some information as to why this change is necessary.

When we go back to our constituencies and address meetings of veterans and they ask us why this change was made, what will be our reply? What explanation can we give to them as to the reason why the change is being made? We have not had an explanation. We hear a lot of explanations being given by members of different groups but they are not the type of explanations that one would like to give to a veterans' meeting. It is said the change is made in order to make it possible for the government to raise the salaries of the commission without going through parliament; that it is being made in order to give the government the whip hand over the commission so that if they grant pensions that are too high then they can be threatened with a reduction in salaries. If, on the other hand, they do just exactly what the government want them to do they will increase their salaries as a reward. I do not agree with that, but we must have an explanation.

The Minister of Finance shakes his head. I think he should shake his head. He should do more than that. He should rise in his place and explain to the committee why this change is necessary, because we are going to have to make an explanation, and if we are not given an explanation by the government, we shall have to give an explanation of our own. I am afraid that if we give an explanation of our own it will perhaps not be as good an explanation as could be given by members of the government. Therefore we shall be bound to vote against this clause unless the government can give some good reason why the section should not remain in the act.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I have a brief word on clause 2. First of all we should consider what sort of a body the pension commission is. Is it a quasi, or semi-judicial body, or is it not? If it is not a semi-judicial body, then there should be procedure for appeals from it to the courts. If it is a quasi-judicial body, then it should be as independent as possible, and the salaries of the commissioners should be fixed by parliament and not by order in council. It is either one or the other. It would appear from what we have had intimated to us by members of the government that it is a quasi-judicial body. That seems the whole tenor of the intention of the act all the way through, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has already pointed out. If it is a quasi-judicial body, I do not think there is a member in this house who seriously would get up in his place and say that the body should not be as independent of the government as possible, since that is the whole purpose of quasi-judicial bodies, to be independent of the government.

Explanations have been offered by members on the government side of the house as to why this is being done. It is said that it is more expedient; that it is quicker; that parliament sits too long now, and that rather than having to introduce a bill to change the salaries of the pension commissioners it could be done much easier by order in council. I have never heard any argument presented before, on behalf of any kind of democratic government, that used expediency as an excuse. There were certain states in the world that used expediency as an excuse for their existence, but fortunately several of them have passed out of the picture.

Let us look at this question of expediency. How often would the government have to introduce a bill to change the salaries of the pension commission? That is one of the explanations that has been offered. Would it have to be done every year, every session of parliament, or once every parliament?

Mr. Lennard: Once every ten years.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps once every ten years but not more often. If the raising or the lowering of the salaries of the pension commissioners was justified, it is quite likely that the bill would go through without any trouble. If it was not justified there would be a lot of debate about it. If there was some objection to lowering or raising the salaries of the commissioners there should be a debate about it. That is what I always understood we were sent down here for. If there is some objection to anything like that, it should be debated.

There are one or two other remarks I should like to make with regard to the matter, but it was adequately covered by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the hon. member for Cape Breton South. However, I should like to mention the fact that the Canadian Legion, which represents by far the greatest number of veterans in Canada and certainly could not be described as a splinter group, went into this very carefully in their brief, and they objected strenuously to it.

The other thing is whether the cabinet—and I do not think anybody actually believes that the cabinet would—would interfere with the pension commission. I do not think that is fair criticism. But whether they would interfere or not, the fact that the pension commission might think that they would might affect the commission's actions. If you think that your independence is going to be threatened you might behave in a little different way from what you ordinarily would. Of course there is the other matter, too; that it is possible by order in council to raise or lower the salaries of the pension commissioners without the introduction of a bill, and parliament would not have to pass on it. It has been suggested that that might be the reason this change is being made in the act.

The last thing I should like to mention is this. There is another answer given by government members as to why we should not argue this matter. They say it is only a trivial change in the act, and since it is trivial, why should we waste the time of the committee or the house arguing about it? If it is such a trivial thing, after all the objections that have been put forward by the Canadian Legion and by all the opposition and by one member on the government side of the house, why is the government hanging on to this amendment to the act with such bulldog tenacity. There must be some reason; otherwise they would save all the time that is being taken by deleting section 2. There must be some reason for hanging on and I think hon. members are entitled to an explanation of what it is from the minister.

Mr. Dinsdale: I opposed any change in section 2 most strenuously in the committee, and I want to take this opportunity this evening to repeat the opposition to the change here in the committee of the whole house. I can state my viewpoint quite briefly so as not to labour the point. I think the proposed change in section 2 violates a fundamental principle regarding the sovereignty of parliament. It is because of that that I opposed it in committee and repeat that opposition at this time.

During the first half of the present century there has been a tendency for the consideration of governmental business to shift from the floor of parliament to the offices of the executive arm of government. No matter how you look at this change, the only answer that comes out is that it is just another subtle erosion in the same direction. It is removing discussion and control from the floor of the House of Commons and vesting it in the executive arm of government. That process has been described as the "passing of parliament" by authorities on our parliamentary process and procedure. That is the reason why I oppose what has been described by government members on the committee as a small attempt to shift the governmental centre of gravity from the floor of the house and place it in the hands of the executive.

This issue in some respects reminds me of a struggle which took place in this house shortly after I first came to parliament when a seemingly innocuous bill was introduced by the then minister of public works which, if carried, would have interfered with the principle of tendering for government contracts. A great outcry arose from all sides of the house with the result that the bill was defeated in a resounding fashion. It is my hope that as a result of this renewed discussion on the floor of the house tonight all hon. members will take a firm stand against any further invasion of the sovereign rights of parliament, because in the long run it is not the large issues which have brought us to this sorry pass, as far as parliamentary procedure is concerned, but the small nibbling away at our parliamentary processes.

This has been said before but I repeat it now. The only argument which has been advanced in defence of this measure, and it was done in a halfhearted and feeble fashion by those spokesmen on the government side who usually tackle points of discussion with vigour and enthusiasm, was that of administrative efficiency and, in other words, the streamlining of the parliamentary process. If that is the objective why not do away with parliamentary discussion altogether? The basis of our democratic parliamentary system is the public discussion of important issues. Because of that fact, Mr. Chairman, I would very strongly urge hon. members of this house to adhere to the same principle in regard to the control of the salary of the members of the pension board as that which applies to the judiciary in Canada at the present time; for this board, as has already been pointed out, is more or less a semi-judicial body.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I very seldom take any part in a debate on veterans affairs because in this group we have a number of members who make a study of veterans legislation and bills of this kind are usually left to them to our entire satisfaction. I am not speaking now because I am not satisfied with what has been said on this matter by the hon. member for Cape Breton South; I am merely supporting the position he has taken.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

From the moment I saw this provision in the bill when it was first introduced in the house I felt it was a proposal that should be opposed by every hon. member in this house who has any concern for the freedom of members of parliament and for increasing the influence of parliament in our life. I think it is a most dangerous thing to have a body such as the pension commission have its salary set without reference to this house. I have had considerable dealings with the pension commission at various times and always of a satisfactory nature. By that I do not mean that they were always able to provide a satisfactory solution to the problems I put before them, but I am quite sure they provided a satisfactory solution in so far as they were able to do so within the ambit of the legislation. But now we are not to be allowed to have some say on the salary of the commission members. That being the case I do not see how we can have any say in setting the salaries for other commissions. I would urge the government not to force this bill through the house on a majority vote. That would be doing violence to the constitution of this house.

Such bills, as an hon. member said over here a few moments ago, do not come up every year or several times a year. Increases in salary, or decreases—and that might happen some time in the future if things keep on going the way they are now—come up only on occasion, and if hon. members do not take a little time to debate the issue then it is not worth while. I would therefore urge the government as strongly as I can to take another look at this matter and leave the act as it was in this respect.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, while there may not be very much to add to the arguments that have been advanced I wish to put myself on record as supporting the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and others who have spoken. In the last few days I have received several letters from branches of the Canadian Legion in my part of the country inquiring whether I was supporting the Canadian Legion brief. I have had no hesitation in saying that I am supporting their brief, because I am sure what they ask is quite reasonable.

As regards this particular legislation I think the government has advanced a very weak argument by claiming it is not important. If it is not important then why ask us to pass it? I have heard that argument advanced now with respect to several pieces of legislation recently and it seems to me the government should not bring in any legislation which is not important. That was the argument advanced with regard to the National Harbours Board Act. If that is the case, who is wasting the time of the house? If the government brings in legislation that is not important we are not going to get anything but criticism from the Canadian Legion and the veterans. If the government says this is not important then they are going to come to the conclusion that what any member of the government party or any member of this parliament says is not important.

Without spending any time whatsoever on the matter, may I say that I think those who are responsible for bringing this legislation forward should take another look at that particular section because it is not going to be popular. There may not be any harm done, but it leaves the impression that harm can be done; and I do not think it is a good type of legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, for the last two hours or almost two hours the committee has been listening to criticism with regard to this unusual piece of legislation. The Prime Minister has been here in the chamber. I remember so well the Prime Minister, when he was president of the Canadian Bar Association, expressing himself in the strongest possible terms on the need for the preservation of the independence of all judicial and quasi-judicial institutions. The minister may say that he has not yet had an opportunity of answering the question that is in the minds of the members of this chamber, particularly of those who view changes such as this one as major intrusions on the independence of boards that should be above any suggestion of executive control. Surely the minister can answer an extremely simple question. I am sure no hon. member on this side of the house will interfere with him or prevent him from rising and having the opportunity to do so. Indeed at this very moment, if the minister will rise and answer one question, I will give him the opportunity to do so.

The question is this. Why is this power asked for? What is the reason for this change? Why are the salaries to be fixed by the governor in council or the cabinet? What has the government in mind? What is it afraid of? Certainly we now sit long enough to enable measures such as this to be introduced. Why does a measure like this find its way on the order paper in the last days of the session if the purpose is not to push it through? We want to know why the government asks for legislation that the veterans of Canada do not want. My own branch of the Canadian Legion, as well as practically every other branch of it, has taken its stand against this legislation. What is the government trying to do? Is it trying to pronounce the death warrant on the judicial independence of this commission? Is it trying to make this institution that has been above politics a meaningless fiction in so far as independence is concerned? The minister is here. He could answer that question simply.

Mr. Brooks: But he will not do it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: His parliamentary assistant is with him. Indeed the matter is of so serious consequence that I am surprised that the Prime Minister, during the time he has been here, has not seen fit to rise in his place and explain why this measure is introduced. Why stultify this commission? Why place it under the control of the cabinet? Why make it a pawn? I know that the people of this country must be beginning to realize the fact that this government has developed a deep-rooted tendency to invade the rights of the individual and to destroy the independence of many of our institutions. Why apply legislation such as this to the one body in this country that has been above political considerations, namely the pension commission? Those are questions to which I think any fair-minded person would ask an answer.

Is this commission to become a pawn to be pushed around and to be controlled by the cabinet? That is the power, if it is granted by parliament, that will conceivably be placed in the custody of the cabinet. If one of the members of the commission does not act as the government would have him act, what is there to prevent, by order in council, reducing that person's salary or the commissioners' salaries in general? What is the purpose of this legislation?

I have sat here and listened to the debate. Even the chairman of the veterans affairs committee is here. I have heard him fulminate in the Saskatchewan legislature against this kind of thing. I have heard him speak of the danger to democracy in control over commissions and boards. I hope he will rise now and give this committee the benefit of his experience in that legislature in which he over and over again spoke of the danger of control by the executive over the instruments set up independently to administer the law. I cannot believe that he supports this measure. I should like him to make one of the speeches he made in the legislature of Saskatchewan. Powerful speeches they were and powerful were they in their arguments. I should like him to make here in this chamber one of those speeches against this measure which constitutes one of the most serious invasions of the power of a quasi-judicial body that has ever been brought before the House of Commons.

Mr. Rowe: He likely will.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are other ministers here besides the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I should like them to speak on this measure.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like them to speak on the power of the executive to control a body created by itself by having within its control the right to determine the salaries to be fixed. I remember hearing the late Mr. King speak so often about the rights of the individual and the need for the preservation of the independence of bodies set up by the crown and of their freedom from invasion by the executive and the representatives of the crown. If ever there was a piece of legislation that has within its simple wording the threat of the undermining of the independence of one of the greatest bodies that has been free from political influence within our country, it is this one. That threat is contained in these simple words: The chairman, the deputy chairman, and the other commissioners and ad hoc commissioners shall each be paid a salary to be fixed by the governor in council. As far as we are concerned, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. It may be late in the session but this is one thing we are going to fight in order to maintain the independence of judicial commissions and quasi-judicial bodies.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I think we are indebted to the members of the House of Commons who served on the veterans affairs committee and to other hon. members who have also spoken this evening in drawing the attention of the committee to this legislation which they and others of us find to be objectionable. I am happy to be able to participate in this debate because I have been waiting for over a year to have another word with the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It is just over a year ago that we had an exchange of opinions in the House of Commons, when the minister was at great pains to point out to me that he had nothing to do with the pension commission, that he had no jurisdiction over it and that he could not interfere with it in any way, although I did not ask him to do so. He was very emphatic in indicating to the house that the commission was an independent body and that the minister had nothing whatever to do with it. As evidence of that let us look at his words as found on pages 5136 and 5137 of Hansard of May 11, 1953. The minister was replying to me in the course of our exchange of information and he said this:

> The hon. member also knows that this parliament has given the Canadian pension commission sole authority and exclusive jurisdiction to adjudicate on all claims under the Pension Act. As minister I cannot make any comment on any of the decisions of the commission, nor can I intervene.

Then he goes on to say:

> I believe this was wise legislation on the part of parliament. Otherwise it can readily be seen that if a minister could intervene in any of the decisions of the commission his office would be used as an appeal court on all pension matters where applicants were not dealt with as they felt they should have been.

Then he concludes with this sentence:

> This legislation was passed by parliament as a result of requests by veteran groups.

I think that was a clear exposition of the position of the pension commission and of the position of the minister. Why are we now faced with the situation where the minister wants the power to intervene in some way with the pension commission, the power to intervene, as other members have pointed out tonight, through the medium of the salaries of the commissioners? If this clause is passed the Minister of Veterans Affairs will have something to say with regard to the pension commission. Last year he had nothing to say and wanted to have nothing to say. He did not want anybody to express opinions to him with regard to findings of the pension commission and so on. He washed his hands of the pension commission. Why does he now wish to have something to do with the pension commission?

A few minutes ago the hon. member for Prince Albert said—and I think these are his words—that the government now asks for legislation that the veterans of Canada do not want. A year ago the minister pointed out that this legislation was passed by parliament as a result of requests by veterans' groups. If the legislation was passed by parliament in response to the requests of veterans' groups and through all these years has been considered very satisfactory, why is the government now attempting to do something that is contrary to the wishes of the veterans' groups? We are hoping that we will have an explanation from the minister with regard to the encroachment upon the pension commission that will be achieved if this particular clause passes which will give to the governor in council a means of influencing the pension commission.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I am rather surprised at the violent tone that the debate on this particular section of the bill to amend the Pension Act has at times assumed. When second reading of the bill took place I had the illusion that I had very simply and clearly explained the reason for this amendment. I explained at the time that the only purpose in amending section 2 of the Pension Act, which at the present time fixes the salaries of the members of the pension commission, so that these salaries would be determined by the governor in council was to make the act more flexible in administration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lapointe: My hon. friends may laugh but I suggest that if many of them had to wait a couple of years until parliament made up its mind to give them an increase in salary to which they were entitled they possibly would not laugh so much. I explained at the time that it was solely for the purpose of being able to adjust the salaries of the pension commissioners in the same manner as adjustments are made from time to time among senior civil servants who belong to the same class of salaried government employees. I explained that in the past occasions had arisen where general increases had taken place but where members of the pension commission had not obtained the increase immediately and had to wait for a pretty long period of time until the Pension Act was amended so that they could benefit from the general increase given throughout the country.

That is the only purpose. We have heard hon. members opposite say that by introducing such an amendment to the Pension Act the government is challenging the independence of the pension commission. It has also been said that we are taking away from parliament the right to vote moneys and are going to do it by order in council.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that almost every member of the house is very well acquainted with the members of the Canadian pension commission. I would suggest that almost every hon. member has had to deal with the Canadian pension commission and has been able to satisfy himself as to the integrity and independence of every member of the commission. I doubt that any hon. member opposite would think that any member of that commission which adjudicates on the pensions to be given to veterans would be affected by the fact that the government has introduced this amendment to section 2 of the act.

It is all very nice to attack the government by saying that by such an amendment we are challenging the independence of the commission, but how is the commission created? Subsection 8 of section 3 of the Pension Act is the one which, so to speak, constitutes the commission so far as terms of appointment are concerned, and it reads as follows:

> Each commissioner, except an ad hoc commissioner, holds office during good behaviour for a period of ten years from the date of his appointment, or for such lesser period as may be specified by the governor in council in the instrument of his appointment or reappointment, but any commissioner, including an ad hoc commissioner, is removable at any time for cause by the governor in council.

That section has been in the act for I do not know how many years, certainly for many years before I had the privilege of holding the portfolio of Minister of Veterans Affairs. In other words, each one of these commissioners is appointed by order in council. He can be appointed for a year; he can be appointed for two, five or ten years, but not more than ten years. When his term of appointment is up, even if it is an appointment for one year he can be reappointed only by order in council, and should any reason arise, which fortunately has never happened, he can be removed by order in council.

Now, I sincerely ask hon. members in what manner will the present amendment add something that will affect the independence of that commission? Hon. members say we are taking away the responsibility of parliament to control money. They all know that as the matter stands now the salaries of these commissioners are provided by statute, and become a statutory item in the estimates. Parliament, from year to year, does not even consider the statutory item covering the salaries of the commissioners. If these salaries are fixed by order in council, every year the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is responsible for providing funds to administer the commission, has to come before this house and request approval of the necessary funds to pay the commissioners' salaries. Every year hon. members who are so ardent in their defence of the right of parliament have occasion to either approve, diminish or make any suggestion concerning the salaries of the commissioners they desire, whereas they would not have that opportunity under the present statute.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion that is the crux of the question. I repeat that I believe every hon. member who has to deal with the Canadian pension commission will admit this body has always been above political considerations. I can assure hon. members in this house that if I had thought for one minute that by bringing forward this amendment I was challenging the independence, the autonomy of that body, I would not have recommended it to my colleagues in the government.

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have listened with interest to the arguments that have been made on this side and now with even greater interest to the arguments of the minister. I was struck, first of all, with the phrase he used as an excuse for this change, that it would be more flexible in administration. Of course, every acquisition of power makes things more flexible in administration; that is a classic argument which could be used in eroding all the power, such as it is, that is still left in parliament. I do not think that argument carries us very far.

Secondly, we come to another classic red herring, and that is the character of the commissioners; by seeking to maintain a principle apparently we are assailing the characters of the commissioners. That was a red herring which I thought was very unworthy of the minister. Nobody on this side is assailing the character of the commissioners. What we are trying to do is prevent a situation arising where it may become more and more difficult for them to discharge the duties that are left to them. Those were the chief points, it seemed to me, the minister made. So far as I was concerned, they did not even begin to answer the arguments which were made on this side.

Mr. Hahn: I would say section 2 of Bill No. 339, if it is passed, will probably be the most important piece of legislation that this house has had the privilege of passing. I make that claim in this particular respect because I remember for so many years teaching that one of the fundamental principles of every parliament under the British empire is the control of the purse strings. From the time of King John to the time of the Westminster Act of 1911, it was a struggle for the people of Britain to try to get control of those purse strings. If there are 200 members in this house today, every one of them should be getting up here and saying, "No!", in no uncertain terms.

I feel very strongly, despite what the minister has said, Mr. Chairman, that this part of the bill should not be passed under any circumstances. I would go so far as to say that it will be possibly the darkest day of this great Liberal government about which we have heard so much—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hahn: —if this ever does become law.

Mr. Lapointe: I will take you up on that.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. Hahn: You will possibly wish you had not taken me up on that. I will say, sir, that there is more at stake in this thing than meets the eye. Nobody is questioning the integrity of the pension commission. Nobody in this house, whether they are on this side of the house or whether they are on that side of the house feels that our pension commission is not one of the best Canada will ever have. What we are questioning is the fact that the power to grant money by order in council should be given to any government, whether it happens to be the Social Credit government we shall have some day or whether it happens to be the present Liberal government.

An hon. Member: You are spoiling your case now.

Mr. Hahn: I am not spoiling my case one little bit. I stand for one principle in this house. The people have sent me here to guard their rights. Whether or not I return here at another time is not an essential matter. I want to know that the man who is sent here to represent us will have control of the purse strings that I expect him to have. I do not except this government or any government to take it upon itself to say, "We are the masters". The power was lost to us for so many centuries until 1911 that I do not think we have the right to turn around and say to this government, "It is yours for the having, gentlemen".

Mr. Harkness: The minister devoted the major portion of his remarks to trying to refute the arguments which had been made on this side of the house as to why this is a bad piece of legislation, and as to why it would impair the independence of the Canadian pension commission. He attempted to make only one argument in favour of this change. He said that it was solely, and these are his words, to adjust the salaries from time to time; that was the only purpose for making this change. The salaries of the pension commission could be changed readily from time to time whenever there was a general change in the civil service.

I cannot see that that argument has any validity whatever. Every year for the last nine years parliament has been in session for about six months in each year. This leaves only a short period of time during which, if an increase or decrease in civil service salaries had been decided upon, the pension commission would have to wait before that increase or decrease could be made applicable to the commission. In other words, the only argument advanced in favour of this change is no argument at all. It is quite apparent that a delay of three or four months or even the full six months, would not constitute any injustice, which it was inferred by the minister had been caused the pension commissioners in the past. The bill could be introduced and the matter submitted to the scrutiny of parliament, as it always has been in the past, and as it is in connection with judges' salaries. I think there is no question that that procedure we have used in the past should be followed in the future.

In considering veterans legislation, both in the House of Commons and in the committee on veterans affairs, the primary test applied has been this: Will it benefit the veterans? If we applied that test to this piece of legislation I do not think one member on the government side of the house would get up and say that this change will benefit the veterans. There is no benefit to the veterans involved in this matter at all; and there is a very great danger of the opposite effect. In other words, there is danger of the veteran having to suffer as a result of this legislation, because of a loss of independence on the part of the commission.

As evidenced by the brief submitted by the Legion, from which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra read, a large number of veterans in this country believe that a change in the method of setting the salaries of the commissioners is going to or might affect their interests. They will have less confidence in the pension commission if this goes through than they have had heretofore.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Greenwood no one on this side of the house has attacked the pension commission. No one on this side of the house has attacked its integrity, nor has anyone any ideas along that line. I do not know why the Minister of Veterans Affairs has introduced into this discussion something which has been described by the hon. member for Greenwood as a red herring. The matter of the integrity of the pension commission is not involved here at all. One of the chief reasons why we on this side of the house have been so insistent upon preventing the passage of this provision has been to protect the integrity of the pension commission, and to safeguard the high esteem in which they have been held by the veterans in this country, in the hope that it may continue into the future.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs referred to the method of appointment. I would ask him this question: Essentially, what difference is there between the method of appointment of members of the pension commission and the method of appointment of judges? They are both appointed by the government in power at the time. But certainly the Minister of Justice is not suggesting—and I hope he will not suggest—that the salaries of judges should be set by order in council. The only difference between the appointment of members of the pension commission and those of the judiciary is that in the one case the appointment is for ten years, or such lesser term as is provided, while in the other case—

An hon. Member: There is a big difference.

Mr. Harkness: —the appointment is made during good behaviour. They are both appointed, of course, during good behaviour.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Harkness: In the case of judges there can be a removal from office by an address; in the case of members of the pension commission, they can be removed by the governor in council, for cause, only. That is the only difference. But that argument, that there is a slight difference in the method of appointment, really has no bearing on the question we are considering, that of whether salaries should be set by parliament, as they have been up to this date, or whether we should turn that over as a prerogative of the government.

I would certainly hope that the government would reconsider this matter and allow the situation to remain in the satisfactory condition in which it has been ever since the pension commission has been in operation.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, the only reason the minister gave, so far as I could discover, was that he did not want parliament to delay any request the government might make for increasing the salaries of the commissioners. He asked the question how we would like our indemnities to be held up for two years. I think the minister should tell us when the House of Commons held up an increase in commissioners' salaries for two years, when that request had been made by the government. If there is any such case on record, then the minister should give us the actual date of that request.

Mr. Lapointe: That is not the statement I made.

Mr. Noseworthy: The integrity of the commissioners is not questioned. What will happen is that this legislation will give the government and the minister just a little more control, a little more power over that commission. No matter how the commission acts or what decision it may make, veterans across this country will suspect that the commission is under the thumb of the governor in council, and that it is carrying out government policy instead of the independent policy of the commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in an expression used by the minister. His explanation of the reason for the legislation was a need of flexibility. I find the definition of the word "flexible" in the Concise Oxford Dictionary is this: "That will bend without breaking; pliant, easily led, manageable." I was wondering whether that is what he had in mind, because that is exactly what we have suggested—that the placing of this power in the hands of the government would make it possible for the government to exercise control. I would ask the minister this question: What has happened in the last year or so that has accelerated this demand for flexibility in the legislation? Has any member of the commission been almost lost because of a lack of flexibility? What is the reason for the haste in this legislation? What has taken place that has demanded this drastic action which, in my opinion, denies the inviolability of this institution? I think the house would listen with keen interest to the minister were he just to reveal what has happened that has placed the government in a position where it has decided that a commission that has been in existence for more than 30 years must have its constitutional background completely changed. What event has placed the government in the position of demanding this so-called flexibility?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lapointe: I think I have already given the explanation. As I said before, it is simple. My hon. friend has referred to my use of the word "flexibility". Maybe it was not the right word; my knowledge of English is not as extensive as his. But I used it in opposition to the word "rigidity". He might read that in the dictionary, and find out what it means.

Mr. Fulton: That is a very interesting contrast which the minister suggests.

Mr. Lapointe: The contrast between Liberals and Conservatives.

Mr. Fulton: Yes; the Liberals are so flexible that they can disregard completely all principles. But the point is that the pension commission was set up on certain principles. And those principles were that, under the control of parliament—not under the control of this government—the commission should do the best possible job for the veterans. And it is that principle which we would like to see adhered to.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Mr. Abbott: And what does that mean?

Mr. Fulton: It means what it says. Possibly the Minister of Finance cannot understand the meaning of words. I do not think I used any word of more than four letters.

Mr. Lapointe: Four-letter words, from the comics?

Mr. Fulton: If there is any word the minister does not understand, I will be glad to explain it.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, I understand the words; I did not understand what the sentence meant, though.

Mr. Fulton: The house and country will understand very well what the sentence meant, and the principle I have in mind. The principle, of course, is that the affairs of the Canadian pension commission, including the salaries of the commissioners, shall be under the control of parliament. That is the principle which has been followed since the end of the first world war until the present time. It is a principle which the government now seeks to change by the bill before us, and in no particular is it more substantially changed than by the provision that salaries of the commissioners shall be in the gift of the government, so that parliament itself loses control to that extent over the salaries of the Canadian pension commission. The minister himself used the word "flexible". That is an interesting word. He said he used it in contrast to the word "rigidity". I suggest to him and to the government that with respect to its control over the salaries of the Canadian pension commission this parliament desires rigidly, or should desire rigidly, to insist upon its right to say what shall happen in respect to the Canadian pension commission and in respect to all affairs of the Canadian pension commission, than which of course there can be no more important aspect than the state of their salaries.

It would be interesting, Mr. Chairman, to hear from the minister in what way the affairs of the commission have been prejudiced by what I can only take from the minister's words to have been found by experience to be undue rigidity. Are the commissioners less able to look after the interests of the veterans because their salaries are rigidly fixed? Would it conduce better to the conduct of the affairs of the commission and the awarding of pensions if their salaries were to be flexible? Is that the suggestion the minister makes? I should hardly think so, and yet I would be interested to hear him explain what other interpretation we are to put upon his words.

The minister suggested a moment ago that there was some effort here to indicate that perhaps he did not use the English language with due facility. I wish I used the French language with the same facility that the minister uses the English language; I do indeed. The minister knows fairly well that we are not seeking to catch him out. What we are trying to do is to find the meaning and the final result of the change in the statute which he himself has introduced, and he needs no quarter on account of the use of the English language.

What then does the minister mean? Does he mean that the affairs of the commission have been unduly hampered by the fact that the salaries of the commission are set by parliament? If that is not the meaning, for what reason is this bill introduced and this provision made necessary? I should like to hear the minister say how the affairs or the administration of the commission's responsibility are prejudiced by the fact that its salaries are set by parliament at the present time.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister did not hear my question because he was engaged in conversation at the moment with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Lapointe: I heard the hon. member's question; I could not help hearing it. He repeated it many times in a different form. He made allusion to a statement that I was purported to have made and which I did not make in the course of my remarks.

Mr. Fulton: The minister will appreciate that I was not a member of the veterans affairs committee, owing to the fact the government has unduly restricted the size of its membership, and therefore I have not had the advantage of those previous exchanges with the minister; but I have asked him a perfectly simple question which is capable of a perfectly simple answer, if there were an answer. In what way have the activities of the commission, in the discharge of its responsibility, been unduly restricted by the fact that its salaries are set by act of parliament?

Mr. Lapointe: I never made the statement that they were.

Mr. Fulton: I am asking for an answer to the question.

Mr. Lapointe: I am answering you.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, the minister does not understand. I never suggested he had made that statement. I am asking him in what way would the discharge of its responsibility by the commission be impeded if the statute were not being changed? In what way would they be less better able to discharge their responsibility if we left things as they are now, instead of making this change?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, it has nothing to do with this clause, and my hon. friend knows it. This statute, which creates the pension commission, and gives the right to the pension commission to adjudicate on veterans pensions, like other similar statutes, has to have sections which determine how salaries are paid. That is the only amendment that is being made, and regardless of whether the amendment is passed by this chamber, or whether the present section remains, it has nothing to do with the flexibility or the rigidity that the commission might have in making awards of pensions to veterans, and my hon. friend knows it as well as I do.

Mr. Fulton: That is exactly what I have—

Mr. Lapointe: But nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, if I may continue, like any other one of these bills we must have sections that look after the administration of the body, and this is one of them.

Mr. Fulton: In what way does it look after the affairs of the public better than the present position?

Mr. Lapointe: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Fulton: I am asking the minister to explain. We are always open to conviction.

Mr. Abbott: You were not here earlier.

Mr. Fulton: We are always open to conviction.

Mr. Abbott: Read Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Lapointe: Read Hansard tomorrow and you will find out.

Mr. Fulton: It is very easy to say: "Read Hansard tomorrow" but to say "read Hansard tomorrow" does not indicate that the explanation will be any more valid than it is at the moment, so far as we have had it.

Mr. Abbott: Don't answer.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Finance says "don't answer". That is a typical attitude of the Minister of Finance, "don't answer".

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member should have spent the evening here instead of somewhere else.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: Other members of the Liberal party say "sit down".

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend had been here and listened he would realize that the answer has been given two or three times already.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Casselman: When did you come in?

Mr. Lennard: How long have you been here?

Mr. Fulton: If an answer has been given, and if the answer is a valid one, then why should the Minister of Finance be unwilling to have it repeated? But he says "don't answer" because he knows there is no valid answer. I suppose we are left with the situation as it has existed so often before, that where the affairs of veterans are concerned, as where the affairs of so many others of the Canadian people are concerned, control is to be removed from the House of Commons and from parliament and to be invested in the governor in council, the government. That may be the formula of words advanced by the government in explanation of this provision, but I assure you, sir, that it is not a satisfactory answer to us in the official opposition and will not be accepted as a satisfactory answer by the veterans and the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Green: I have been very disappointed that we have had no word of support for this proposed change from one government supporter on the veterans affairs committee. We had the parliamentary assistant there; we had the hon. member for Spadina and we had many other leading lights from the government side of the house. And yet not one of those hon. members has stood up in this debate to try to justify this change because they know it cannot be justified.

We have had the minister stand up and try to justify it. The minister did not attend the meetings of the committee very often; he was there once or twice. There have been ministers of veterans affairs who have attended all the meetings of the veterans affairs committees. I recall that the late Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie invariably—

Mr. Lapointe: I did not think you could be so small.

Mr. Green: —attended meetings of the veterans affairs committee and took great interest in them. The present Minister of Veterans Affairs does not even bother to do that.

An hon. Member: Dirty!

Mr. Abbott: Shame!

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Green: The Minister of Finance is interrupting here to give his views about what other people should do. Let him stand on his feet once in a while and make a proper interjection so we may be able to deal with him.

Mr. Abbott: He will stand on his feet when he needs to.

Mr. Green: Here we have government members who were actually on that committee and who sat in on all the proceedings and yet not one will get up on his feet to justify this change.

An hon. Member: They are ashamed.

Mr. Green: Of course they are ashamed. When the minister spoke he let the cat out of the bag.

Mr. MacDougall: A tom cat?

Mr. Green: Some cat is right. He explained why they are making the change. He wants to raise the salaries of the pension commissioners and he is adopting this method of doing so. He could very easily have written into the bill before he presented it to the house the amount he wishes to pay the pension commissioners. That has been the course that has been followed in other years. But he did not bother to do that. He wanted this flexible method of doing it through the cabinet. Members of the house will then have no control.

He then compared the pension commissioners to senior civil servants and in doing so he demonstrated his utter failure to realize the judicial nature of this pension commission. The pension commission is not an administrative body. The administrative work in the Department of Veterans Affairs is carried out by the deputy minister and his assistants. The pension commission is a judicial body but despite this fact the minister gets up in this house and attempts to compare the pension commission with senior civil servants who are doing administrative work. That is exactly where we part company with the minister on this suggestion—

Mr. Lapointe: I did nothing of the sort.

Mr. Green: —that salaries should be set by the governor in council rather than by parliament. He failed entirely to appreciate the fact that one other similar board under our governmental structure, namely the board of transport commissioners, have their salaries set by statute. Just a year or so ago we increased the salaries of the members of the board of transport commissioners, which is a body very much like the board of pension commissioners. It has a great deal of judicial work to do and it is important, in order that the board of transport commissioners may retain the confidence of the people who appear before them, that they should be completely independent. Their salaries are set by statute and an increase was provided for them during the 1951 session. I have here chapter 22 which amended the Railway Act and which was introduced during the second session of parliament in 1951. There we find that the new section 26, subsection 1, written into the Railway Act reads as follows:

> The chief commissioner shall be paid an annual salary equal to the salary of the President of the Exchequer Court; the assistant chief commissioner shall be paid an annual salary of fourteen thousand dollars, the deputy chief commissioner shall be paid an annual salary of thirteen thousand dollars, and each of the other commissioners shall be paid an annual salary of twelve thousand dollars.

In the minister's own department there is another board similar to the pension commission which has salaries set by statute. I refer to the war veterans allowance board. The salaries of the members of that board are not set by order in council, but are written into the War Veterans Allowance Act. If that is justifiable, and I think it is, then the salaries of the board of pension commissioners should be treated in exactly the same fashion.

Once again I urge the Prime Minister and the members of the government to take a second look at this particular section. Some of them at least must realize that they are running a grave risk of weakening the standing of the Canadian pension commission in this country by making this change. Every one of them must realize that this is a derogation of the rights of parliament and that it is against the best interests of the veterans of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively in the hope that we would have one word of explanation as to why there should be a departure from the ordinary practice of fixing the amount paid to those who will serve the people on appointment by the government in this case. But not one single reason or justification of any kind for this departure from the established practice has been put forward.

The statements that have been made have in no way answered the suggestion that the minister should tell us why this is necessary. Has any member of the board of pension commissioners said that he was going to resign because of the present salary? Is there any person about to be appointed who will not be appointed if the salaries remain as they are? These would be reasons if the minister could state that that was so. If it is not so, and there requires to be an increase, then let him say so.

But not one reason has been put forward. If the idea that the government can deal more easily with those persons under an arrangement of this kind is to be taken as a valid arrangement then is it possible that the reason we have not got the bill to amend the Judges Act before us is that the government is perhaps going to fix the salaries of the judges by order in council? Do not let the Minister of Justice laugh. This is just as much a departure from the established practice as would be the decision to fix the salaries of the judges by order in council.

We have been wondering why that bill, which was announced so long ago, is still withheld from the knowledge of members of parliament. Is that the reason? If this is such a good reason then is the government going to come before us and say they would have a chance of getting better admirals, better generals, and better air marshals if they were able to deal privately with these senior men by order in council?

An hon. Member: It would be more flexible.

Mr. Drew: It would be more flexible, there is no question about that. But the very asking of that question indicates the extent to which we would break down the authority of parliament over those senior officials who carry out the functions which are allotted to them by parliament itself.

Before we are called upon to vote on a clause of this kind, Mr. Chairman, the minister should give some explanation. No explanation of any kind has been given. There can be no possible answer to the people of Canada if we are called upon to vote in committee, as the situation stands, except that the government bit by bit is whittling away at the authority of parliament and without explanation is going to use their majority to impair the rights of parliament still further.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, if a person looked around this house this evening and attempted to find out what all the debate was about he would probably find it in what has been said here so often, namely that the rights of members of parliament who represent the people are being infringed upon. The surest sign that the government is losing touch with the people is when it attempts to endanger the democratic processes of parliament and curtail the power of the members sent here who have as much right to have a say in the spending of the money of the people as have the members of the government. They were not given any prior right to stand up and order the affairs of this government in the secret and quiet precincts of the cabinet.

Hon. members who recognize this measure as a threat to their rights should stand up here and protest. If they do not do so, it is only to be assumed that they agree that this is the right thing to do. Posterity is built on such things as this. In the history of democracy and its growth the story of demagogues, men who grew and obtained power because they wanted the flexibility to do things that would override democratic rights, is old. Historically when people stand up and oppose this procedure they are doing the thing that is right and are making a contribution to democracy. Members on this side of the house from end to end are going to oppose this legislation with everything they have. This government can remember that we stood up here and opposed it because we believed it was the right thing to do. The people of Canada should know that we are opposing this measure because we look upon it as a threat to the very basic and fundamental democratic principles.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: In view of the fact that the debate has been a somewhat protracted one, perhaps I should read the question which is on the amendment of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration moves:

That section 2 of Bill No. 339 be amended by striking out subsection 1 thereof and substituting the following:

(1) Subsection 11 of section 3 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(11) The chairman, deputy chairman, and other commissioners and the ad hoc commissioners shall each be paid a salary to be fixed by the governor in council, except that the salary to be paid to the ad hoc commissioners and the said other commissioners shall be fixed at the same rate.

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Those in favour of the amendment will kindly rise. Those opposed to the amendment will kindly rise.

Amendment agreed to: Yeas, 82; nays, 58.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment carried. Shall clause 2 as amended carry?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on the clause as amended, may I say that it occurs to me that the government has at one stroke, by the very amendment which it has now forced through the committee, destroyed the whole argument against the section as amended. The Minister of Veterans Affairs, if he has attempted to advance any justification at all, —and the justification is inadequate—has suggested that the present provision of the statute is somehow or other detrimental to the affairs of the commission because it imposes an undue rigidity. Yet by the very same amendment which the government itself has now forced through the committee, it has imposed upon it the rigidity which, with respect to the whole section, it seeks to suggest is not proper, in that the government says that it will be rigidly bound with respect to the salaries of ad hoc commissioners. If it is proper to have rigidity in one branch of this matter, why is it not proper to have rigidity in the whole section and to have the salaries of all the commissioners fixed by parliament in the statute instead of by the governor in council?

Of the absurdity and the unsound nature of the government's argument in favour of forcing through this section and of imposing its will and its desire to make the pension commission the creature of the government instead of parliament, there can be no more complete illustration than the amendment which the government itself has just moved. If, Mr. Chairman, the principle of rigidity in one part of the section is appropriate and proper, then why should not the salaries of all the commissioners, including the chairman, the deputy chairman and the ad hoc commissioners, be fixed by parliament? Why should they not accept that measure of rigidity? The measure of rigidity consists only in this. If the government is prepared to go before parliament and to justify the need for an increase in the salaries of the commissioners, then it could be obtained; but without justification, if the act stood as it at present stands, of course that increase could not be obtained. Hence the only possible support or justification for the present amendment represented by this bill is that the government wishes or may wish to give increases which are not justified and which it fears to put before parliament because it knows they would not receive the approval of parliament.

I hope that the Prime Minister himself, who has come in just at this stage where the amendment moved by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has indicated how unfounded is this fear of rigidity, will realize that the very proposition which the government has just advanced and put through the committee indicates the unwarranted nature of the amendment represented by the whole of section 2 as amended. Since the Minister of Veterans Affairs has unfortunately not been prepared to advance any justification for this section on the merits of the situation, now that the Prime Minister is here I hope that he himself may possibly agree that the section will be taken under consideration, that the government will be willing to think over what has been advanced from this side of the house and to bring in tomorrow a proposal which would have the result of restoring to parliament its control over the affairs of the Canadian pension commission.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fulton: In deference to the Prime Minister and in view of the suggestion I have just made, I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. St. Laurent: Do not be so considerate.

Mr. Fulton: I do so in order that the right hon. gentleman may have the opportunity to think the matter over tonight.

Mr. Knowles: That is heaping coals of fire upon their heads.

The Chairman: Shall I report progress and request leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take the third readings that are ready. Then we have two bills, one with reference to the Navigable Waters Protection Act and the other respecting extra-provincial motor vehicle transport, both of which we should like to take some time during the day, but we would have to fit them in to suit the convenience of hon. members. Then we will move to go into supply, taking first trade and commerce as was understood today. I hesitate to name many other departments, but we shall take national revenue and secretary of state, in that order, after we dispose of trade and commerce, then we shall take any others that there may be time for.

Mr. Rowe: What shall we do during the rest of the day?

Mr. Nowlan: Do you not plan to sit tomorrow night?

Mr. Speaker: Votes and Proceedings for yesterday, Monday, June 7, are to be corrected because of some clerical errors in the division list. On page 710 the word "nays" should read "yeas". On page 711 the word "yeas" should read "nays". On page 711 the name of Mr. Henderson should be inserted in the list of nays and the name of Mr. Anderson should be deleted. Hansard should also be corrected at page 5560 by inserting the name of Mr. Henderson in the list of nays and by deleting the name of Mr. Anderson. These are clerical errors. Is it agreed that the Clerk of the House be instructed to have the appropriate corrections made wherever they are necessary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for interrupting, but I omitted to state that after third readings tomorrow morning we will continue with this debate.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
