With regard to smaller areas gaining self-sufficiency, the local people would feel much better if they had control over their own destiny. Members of Parliament are often frustrated because of their lack of input and the fact that this government often will not listen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all items preceding No. 36 stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT RESEARCH CENTRE

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 10, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stewart:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all communications, transcripts or notes of interviews, memos, notes of telephone conversations, applications for grants, bursaries and fellowships between the government through the International Development Research Centre and any other person or group requesting or being considered for financial grants from the International Development Research Centre, particularly relating to financial grants or fellowships or financial sponsorship to individuals who hold or held elected or appointed office in governments of other countries or who were or are members of recognized political parties in other foreign nations.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, because of a particular situation in the House on June 10, debate on this motion was shortened, so I thank you again for giving me the opportunity to finish the remarks which I began on that day.

The motion under consideration is a motion regarding Canada's role in international aid, with particular reference being made to the International Development Research Centre. The motion was introduced by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart). In his remarks at the opening of debate that day he criticized—unfairly, I felt—Canada's aid program for those parts of the world which need help at this particular time. The argument he used was simply that when times are tough in Canada, we should think of ourselves first and other people when times get better. I do not hold to that principle, simply because the aid program Canada has is a program which, as well as helping people in the Third World, also helps Canadians. Eighty per cent of the aid given by Canada remains here. Because it is given in a tied form, the money which is given in the form of aid is used to buy materials here in Canada.

International Development Research Centre

The motion directs itself particularly to the International Development Research Centre here in Ottawa, which is a small group receiving about 3 per cent of the aid budget of Canada. However, I feel that the work done by this centre amounts to far more than 3 per cent of our total aid program. Throughout its history, I believe the International Development Research Centre has shown that this kind of aid given in this particular way helps bring about results in the developing world and in Canada as well. The results produced by the centre far outweigh the money spent.

An editorial in the Cape Breton Post of April 3 of this year gives a very positive outlook on the work of the International Development Research Centre, and I would just like to read from that editorial as follows:

> The annual review of Canada's International Development Research Centre affords a textbook example of the way to go about helping the unfortunates of the impoverished Third World. Instead of making magniloquent talk about "global negotiations" and "the Spirit of Cancun," this unobtrusive federal agency goes about sponsoring a myriad of relatively inexpensive programs aimed at applying scientific knowledge toward heightening the quality of life.
> Since its formation in 1970 the Centre has been concentrating on supporting researchers living and working in developing regions and on other research to promote the well-being of the rural poor of the semi-arid tropics. Their crying needs are food, energy, clean water and sanitation which in our blessed abundance we here tend to take for granted. Yet, as the IDRC points out, simply acquiring enough of these occupies one-third of the world's people, all day, every day. To fail to do so is to fail to survive.

The tone of that editorial is very close to the direction taken by the parliamentary task force on North-South relations, on which I happened to have the privilege to serve last year. All three parties in this House were represented on that task force, and the task force presented the same basic idea about aid. That idea is that aid is not something which deprives but something which really does build an economic base for people to develop themselves. I would just like to read from page 12 of our report as follows:

> Investment (not charity) in the well-being of the poor is frequently the best economic investment a country or the world can make. A small farmer with education raises his yields dramatically. A mother with decent nutrition can nurse healthy children who can learn and work more productively.

Robert McNamara, a former minister of defence of the United States and a former president of the World Bank—certainly anything but a left-wing socialist in his basic thinking—has observed:

> It used to be said that lack of capital was the chief obstacle to economic growth. But we now know that capital formation explains less than one-third of the variations in growth rates among developing countries; human resource development explains a great deal more. Investment in the human potential of the poor, then, is not only morally right, it is very sound economics.

Coming from Robert McNamara, a former president of the World Bank, I say that is something which should be taken with no grain of salt.

> The lesson is being learned. The International Development Strategy for the 1980s, recently approved at the Special Session of the United Nations, gives concrete expression to the philosophy of investment in the poor. It contains specific goals and objectives relating to the elimination of hunger, universal primary education, primary health care for all and a sharp reduction in infant mortality by the end of the century. In particular the role of women in development and the need to integrate them into all the sectors of development has been fully recognized.

It is with those thoughts and in those terms that I would like to draw my remarks to a close because I realize my time is very limited. I would like to finish by telling of a small incident. I spoke today with a physician friend of mine formerly from Saskatoon and now from St. Boniface, Dr. Ian Carr, who is one of the physicians for social responsibility and has just returned from the Pugwash conference. He spoke to me today, and for the first time I met a person who spoke about the possibility of an impending third world war as being within the timetable of a few months. He spoke of 18 months as being a timetable people who were at Pugwash feel is a probability or a reality in relation to a nuclear world war.

With respect to development, one of the greatest problems is that huge amounts of money are being taken out of the economies of the world and directed to the building of armaments. My colleague, the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish), referred to this. Many of these armaments are now being sent into developing countries with no purpose at all except to destroy. Somehow we, the responsible people on the face of the globe, must take note of this reality. Something must be done to reduce the tensions which bring about war so that everyone will have enough on which to live and so that everyone will have access to health care and the opportunity to be educated. That seems reasonable. Why is it that we cannot find a way to turn the whole armaments movement around? We do not have centuries in which to do this. We should be turning it around within a matter of hours, days, weeks and months, because the inevitable drive of armaments is for destruction.

I hate to finish my remarks on that note, but I think what I said does relate to what is going on. The hon. member for Simcoe South criticized aid programs in his speech. Instead of using aid money to build a human world, money is being used to build armaments for the destruction not just of the first world, the second world and the third world, but the whole world. I think my colleagues here and people everywhere should take this matter very seriously.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to participate in this debate and a particular honour to follow my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle), who, as we all know, has dedicated a large part of his life to helping others, mainly the poor people of South America. I am also delighted to follow the distinguished member for Saskatoon East in this debate because he was a recipient under the bursary program of IRDC. That points to another avenue of success for IRDC that makes a lot of countries envy the program launched by the Right Hon. L. B. Pearson in 1971.

• (1710)

I think it would be proper for me to begin my remarks by quoting the president of IRDC, Mr. Ivan Head, who said:

> It is shortsighted to assume that North-South relations are played according to the rules of a zero-sum game in which each point gained by one participant is a point lost to another. International development, in fact, is a mutually beneficial process in which all win, or in default of which all lose. The over-all health and vitality of the developing world is central to the well-being of the economically developed nations—

That includes Canada. I believe that those words of wisdom from the president of IRDC mean that we should think about this warning. The hon. member for Saskatoon East brought out the point that aid to a developing country is aid to the donor country, because we make sure that the wealth of the world is better divided.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the philosophy behind the establishment of the International Development Research Centre was to develop and support research throughout the world, and particularly in developing countries, since only 3 per cent of research was being done in those countries. In the eighteenth century, famous scientists such as Lavoisier and Celsius made their contribution to the well-being of the population of this earth, while the nineteenth century had Ampère, Kelvin, Pasteur, Darwin and Doppler, to name only a few. The twentieth century, however, has not seen the same level of research activity in developing countries, and of course far less there than elsewhere. So the philosophy behind the IDRC, Mr. Speaker, was to enable industrialized countries like Canada to make a contribution to research in various fields, with emphasis on nutrition, farming, drinking water supplies, forest protection and so forth. As a result, Mr. Speaker, projects have been designed and implemented by the government and the IDRC, and their success has been the pride of that agency.

Mr. Speaker, with my colleague for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) and others, I have had an opportunity to visit a number of projects in the Philippines, Singapore, and Bangladesh. It was very exciting to see the results of these projects and the impact these research and development activities can have on the economic development and well-being of developing countries. In the Philippines for instance, rice production, in certain areas, had more than tripled, thanks to flood-resistant strains that were developed locally. Similarly, special wheat strains were developed locally for growing during the dry season on the same soil where rice is grown during the rainy season, since in that climate, crops can be grown twelve months a year.

There are research centres that attract researchers from all over the world, because they have been able to provide favourable conditions for their work. Those of us who have had an opportunity to visit Bangladesh will have seen that this country, which so often suffers from typhoons and floods has, in only a few years, with the help of the IDRC, been able to develop special strains of rice and wheat and other agricultural products that are highly weather-resistant, and today, one of the most serious problems facing Bangladesh is a shortage of storage space for rice and wheat. It goes to show, Mr. Speaker, that the activities of our International Development Research Centre have had tangible and extremely useful results for developing countries. At the same time, the IDRC has tried to meet the needs of countries that are faced with a variety of problems. There are of course Canadians and North Americans who, from their comfortable vantage point, tend to judge people in developing countries rather severely, and who tend to believe programs like W5, for instance, whose staff filmed a horror story about the results of the DRIP project in Haiti. They were not altogether factual or honest in their approach, because they neglected to mention the positive achievements of both CIDA and the IDRC. Mr. Speaker, if people would only look at the facts, they would see how often the IDRC and CIDA have been successful in their activities.

Of course, there is a difference between countries that have to cope with a number of climatic conditions such as typhoons—I was referring just now to Bangladesh which has this problem as well as floods—the droughts in the Sahel, earthquakes and flooding in Nicaragua and hurricanes in the West Indies, Mr. Speaker, there is indeed a difference between these countries and ours and our neighbour to the South, which are blessed with a stable climate and well-defined seasons during which farm production can go on uninterrupted, without the risk of the catastrophes I have just mentioned. Mr. Speaker, that is why the activities of our research centre are so widely supported, and let me remind my colleagues opposite that it was not a minister on this side of the House who, with great verve and eloquence, defended the activities of the IDRC in Vienna in 1979. I am referring to the Hon. Senator Martial Asselin who was talking about the IDRC's activities and its achievements. He used the IDRC as an example of what other industrialized countries could do to provide assistance to developing countries. So this should help to reassure the member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) with respect to the activities of the IDRC and its achievements.

To get back to this horror story that was shown to Canadian television audiences on the W5 program, the film only stressed the administrative problems the project had experienced. For instance, the program showed some fire hydrants, with the comment: How ridiculous to instal fire hydrants in a village like Petit-Goave! Well, Mr. Speaker, it would be ridiculous not to instal fire hydrants, because those people need water and fire protection as much as any Canadian, because their buildings and homes are made of wood. Furthermore, the hydrant is a water station. Since most homes do not have drinking water, people have to go to a water station, and the hydrants are a source of potable water. And as to the comment that it was entirely ridiculous to replace the fire hydrants, they were put there by the Americans in the first place, many years ago, I think in the thirties, for the reasons I just mentioned.

In the same program, an attempt was also made to have Canadians believe that the roads that were built had been and were being used only by project workers. That is absolute nonsense, Mr. Speaker, because we used the road that goes up to the mountains, and besides being used to move equipment and supplies for the construction of the clinic and the technical training school, the road is also there to help people get around, for instance, farmers who have to come down from the mountain with their produce to Petit-Goave, and would otherwise have to go through the valleys along rough paths. The road is built and it will be around for a long time because it has not been eroded by rainfall. It is maintained by the people of Petit-Goave, and it is used by area farmers and the people in charge of the medical clinic and the school, so the people are really motivated to maintain the road.

There was also the issue of irrigation projects. Here again, Mr. Speaker, the program would have Canadians believe—and after all, why shouldn't they, since they are paying for the project through their taxes—that the irrigation project was useless since it had to be redone. Now I am sorry, but we visited this project, and I think the whole story was a fantasy, because the project is going to improve the irrigation of arable land in the area concerned, while it will not require a lot of maintenance and repairs since there is very little soil erosion in that particular area. My point, Mr. Speaker, is that all this almost obscene talk about the complete or almost complete failure of certain projects is certainly not conducive to making Canadians understand the need and the urgency for continuing projects that have been undertaken in order to help developing countries.

Of course, not everything went according to plan, and we must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that carrying out an integerated project in a country like Haiti with its particular political climate is quite different from what it would be in Canada. We were so ambitious and so eager to get on with it, and I am referring to our CIDA officers, so eager to carry out this project that would benefit an entire region of Haiti, that we may have been a bit too enthusiastic and optimistic about the eventual results. However, out of the $21 million invested in the project, a very large portion, I would say at least 90 per cent, will help to improve the lives and well-being of the people of Haiti.

It was therefore unfair of the program's producers to criticize these activities the way they did, and to repeat the program a second time, which they did about two weeks ago after getting further information on CIDA activities in Haiti, as though they were trying to get the Canadian people up in arms about what CIDA is doing. Of course, they used this guy who probably helped the W5 producer to get his information, and I am referring to this Mr. Templeman, an official who had no responsibility himself for the project. I fail to understand, Mr. Speaker, why a responsible television network like CTV would have used an official who had certain views or opinions on the DRIP project but was not at all involved in the program, since he was assigned to the Canadian diplomatic service in Haiti.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about another aspect of the motion proposed by my colleague for Simcoe South, namely, fellowships. I mentioned earlier that my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon East had been awarded one of the fellowships, which are one of the major components of the IDRC's program. Since the motion mentions this component rather specifically, I shall say a few words on the subject.

[English]

The general objective of the fellowships program of IDRC is to improve the competence of professionals and researchers from developing countries, and to broaden the resource base of Canadian professionals concerned with international development. In the past year the program's orientation has shifted toward shorter term awards with particular emphasis on upgrading of professional, managerial, or research skills rather than long-term academic training.

The fellowships program offers several different categories of awards, and I will list a few of them. There are ten Pearson fellowships to be offered in the 1982-83 year with a total value of $375,000. In this program IDRC is offering carefully selected public servants a nine to twelve-month program in Canada to improve their professional and managerial skills. Each program involves a series of placements in government, industry, university, research centres and/or appropriate centres. For 1981-82, the field of concentration of agriculture. For 1982-83, awards will be made in the health field.

The purpose of the fellowship is to assist young public servants in developing countries to enhance themselves professionally so that they might better serve their country. They must be 25 to 35 years of age, have at least three years' working experience, and be citizens of developing countries. In order to be selected, candidates must be nominated by Canadian missions, undergo regional interviews and pass a final selection by an IRDC committee in Ottawa. The value of the award is the total of the actual cost of round-trip travel for the fellow and his or her family, research and Canadian travel up to $5,000, and a basic stipend of $16,000 with allowances for family, medical expenses, clothing and other necessities.

Pre and post-project awards are to provide training for individuals who have been or are to be associated with an IDRC supported project. The pre-project award will assist in the training of an individual who is key to a proposed IDRC project. The post-project award will upgrade the qualifications of an individual who has shown great promise during the life of the project. The training given should enable this individual to contribute to building up research capabilities in the home country. You now have, Mr. Speaker, a broader view of the program and how the beneficiaries of the bursaries are selected.

[Translation]

However, at the beginning of the second decade of the IDRC's existence, there is still much to be done, and I hope that the Canadian people and the members of this House will now have better understanding of the activities of the IDRC.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity today to speak in this debate. Since some time has elapsed since we heard the motion, I am going to start out by reading the motion my colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart), has presented. It asks:

• (1730)

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all communications, transcripts or notes of interviews, memos, notes of telephone conversations, applications for grants, bursaries and fellowships between the government through the International Development Research Centre and any other person or group requesting or being considered for financial grants from the International Development Research Centre, particularly relating to financial grants or fellowships or financial sponsorship to individuals who hold or held elected or appointed office in governments of other countries or who were or are members of recognized political parties in other foreign nations.

I have not heard any speakers so far give any logical reasons why the government should not supply this information. That is the bottom line of this whole debate. If such wonderful things are being done, as mentioned by the last speaker and by some others, why is the government hesitating to make this information public? That is all the motion asks. If it is such wonderful information and if the record is so wonderful, I would think the ministers would be falling all over each other to see who could present it first.

I believe hon. members on the government side will have an opportunity today to vote in favour of this motion and the government will then be required to present this information. If hon. members believe this has been such a wonderful program and that everything is hunky-dory and satisfactory, I would say to government members here that here is their wonderful chance to make it public and to vote in favour of this motion today. The government will then supply all this wonderful information it is talking about. That is all we ask.

We now have a freedom of information bill and we will see how it works pretty soon. But here is a chance to show that the government really believes in making information public. That is the bottom line to this whole debate, as I have just said.

In the report of the parliamentary task force on North-South relations it states that in 1978 the Treasury Board conducted a study on the effectiveness of food aid, but the results were never made public. Hon. members can find that on page 49 of the report.

Again, if the results were so wonderful and if this money is doing such marvellous things as feeding hungry people and enabling people to become self-sufficient, which is the object of the whole exercise, why was the report not made public? This sort of thing is what is bothering the people of Canada. It bothers me and it bothers my colleague, the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart). The request is reasonable. Just tell us what is going on and let us have the complete history. I think the chairman of the committee would be right up front if he said, "Let the people of Canada know what is going on".

The information regarding interest rates charged to Third World countries is kept secret. That bothers me. I made a simple telephone call to the department some weeks ago to find out what the interest rate was on a large loan being made to one of the Third World countries. I was advised the information was not available, that it was secret. The information is even kept secret from members of Parliament. I do not think one should be trying to force something out of a civil servant, but he told me that this information is not even made available to Members of Parliament. I asked him if he made the information available to ministers. He hesitated. I do not know whether they do or not, but I imagine the minister of the department has access to it. If he is a minister worth his salt, he would know what is going on.

Here we are giving credit to countries at the expense of the people of Canada, yet the rate of interest charged is not made public. If it is a low interest rate and it can be justified, surely we can carry the judgment of the people of Canada to decide if the cause is worth while. Canadians are not illiterate. They would accept sound argument if sound argument was put forward. But to keep information secret and for us to be told that we cannot have it makes everyone suspicious.

In Canada banks are required to divulge the interest rates they charge. I do not know why the government does not make public the rates charged when we give lines of credit to other countries.

Canadians are compassionate people. We do not need to plead with the people of Canada to be compassionate when need arises. I think all political parties are compassionate. They want to help the needy. People may have different views on how to do that, but people are compassionate. Some may object to waste and extravagance. I do, and I am sure this party objects to waste and extravagance. I think any party in Canada should object to waste and extravagance.

We have certain objectives to meet. For instance, CIDA's written policy on food aid states that, "food aid from developed countries represents an attempt to bridge the gap between food production and food requirements in developing countries until self-sufficiency is achieved." "Until self-sufficiency is achieved" sounds like an excellent objective.

Let us look at some of the results and see what is going on. For instance, Cuba is in the communist bloc and yet we have been assisting that country.

When I was a boy I used to see people gathering iron, steel and metals around our coal mines. We would be paid two bits for bringing a load to the truck. We thought it was wonderful to get some money. That steel and other metals went to Japan. It was not very many years later that it came back to us in the form of bullets used against Canadian youth, men and women. I am a little leery about giving things to communist countries.

On May 20, 1980, the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) explained in the House that Cuba was $10 million in arrears on a loan with terms of 3 per cent interest, seven years grace and 30 years maturity. At that time Cuba was two semi-annual payments in arrears. I have not been able to find out if Cuba has met the payments or whether they have been written off. But that information should be made available to the people of Canada. Why should we be lending money to Cuba at 3 per cent interest and 30 years maturity when we cannot help our home owners and our farmers who are going bankrupt and our businessmen who need money?

• (1740)

The government has a borrowing bill before us now for $7 billion. We will be paying interest probably in the range of 15 per cent to 21 per cent if we are lucky. The rate may be higher.

The New International Economic Order, for short, NIEO, is advocated by the United Nations. The object of this order is to transfer resources of countries that have worked hard to develop them and to transfer them to Third World countries. I find that somewhat bothersome.

The Brandt report worries me. I am advised that this report is strongly supported by our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). Whether or not that is true, I do not know, but it is certainly alleged that he supports it. The Brandt report says that to help develop nations we should increase foreign aid to 0.7 per cent of the gross national product. At the present time we are providing $1.23 billion per year in foreign aid. There are those who want it increased. I think we should be careful about this, especially when we see hungry people right in this country, when we see the living conditions of natives on reserves, when we see people losing their homes and their businesses, and when we see more than a million people unemployed who wonder where their next meal is coming from. We should remember that charity begins at home before we start increasing foreign aid.

The second recommendation is even more disturbing. The Brandt report recommended that a form of international income tax be levied on developed nations.

It recommended a form of international taxation or global taxation. It proposed that an international body have the authority to levy a tax on other countries for worth-while causes such as on arms trade, international investment, hydrocarbons and exhaustible minerals, luxury goods, military spending, the consumption of energy, international air travel, the use of the "international commons", ocean fishing, off-shore oil and gas, seabed mining, the use of space orbits, radio communications, etc. Also it suggested a 0.5 per cent levy on all these things. If one takes a trip to China at one's own expense, he or she must pay a 0.5 per cent tax to this international body. Certainly that would be a wonderful way to raise money, but they do not mention how many international civil servants would be needed to do the job.

I would not support an international authority to levy taxes upon Canadians. Canada is a sovereign country. If we are to tax our people, our own governments will tax them, not some international body. I oppose this with all my might and strength because it is a ridiculous situation. If we ever get to the point where we provide taxing authority to the United Nations or to any other international body, the next step will be an international police force which will be able to pound unwilling nations into submission. We should recognize that this is what would happen.

I was somewhat amazed when I read a statement of the former president of CIDA, Mr. Maurice Strong. I do not know him, but I have heard about him. He said that this idea was a prime objective, "as it provides the fairest and most dependable method of transferring resources".

We have plenty to do now right in our country with our resources. As a matter of fact, we are already helping other countries by bringing in oil, and our own oil wells are closed down.

I do not want to deal with that issue right now because I do not have the time, but the matter of interfering with national sovereignty should be watched very carefully. It may be done subtly and step by step, and eventually some world body will have control and authority to tax.

I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if he is supporting such a thing, will rise in the House and say so, or I would like to hear him rise and say that he will not support it. Also I would like to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say it, because there is a very subtle movement going on in the world today which is trying to get control of nations through the back door. If we ever get to the point where we are under the thumb of an international body, heaven help the people. Even this government is better than an international one. At least it has to report back to the people periodically.

There is something else with which I would like to deal in connection with the report. I should like to refer to a comparison which was conducted by an environmental board in the United States. It compared Iowa with Bangladesh. The member who spoke before me referred to Bangladesh. Both Iowa and Bangladesh cover the same area, in size. However, Iowa is rich in agriculture, while Bangladesh is desperately poor. The population of Iowa is two million and the population of Bangladesh is 78 million. We could simply transfer food from now to doomsday, but if we are to help the people of Bangladesh, we should help them to help themselves, to become self-sustaining and to start doing a little hard work along with receiving gifts from other countries. This is what undeveloped countries have to realize.

Let me give another example. Tanzania was once an exporter of foods. Scandinavian figures show that Tanzania's losses through self-inflicted agricultural decline are 250 per cent greater than the losses incurred because of higher oil prices. They are roughly equivalent to the foreign aid received between 1973 and 1980. Nyerere's policy of collectivizing farmland has ruined its agricultural system and has made beggars out of the people. This is not very helpful to the people of Tanzania. Would that be helping a country? This is only part of the dismal record.

From 1978 to 1981 Canada gave the government of Tanzania $91.541 million. The sum was broken down as follows: $78.92 million in the form of grants or straight gifts, $1.709 million for specific programs, and $10.912 million for food aid.

I would like to know what was done with that money. They are in worse shape now than in the years in which we gave them that money from 1978 to 1981.

What is happening? Are we building up a world slavery or something? Are we simply going to dish out money for a few big shots to use as they want while the masses go hungry? They have not fed the hungry of Bangladesh. We must remember that Canada forgave $71.9 million. We said that they did not have to pay it back at all; it was given to them. This was referred to on page 37 of the CIDA annual report of 1979-80. We should be giving aid to enable people of help themselves, not to make beggars of them. Equipment is fine, money is fine, but only if work is involved to make use of them so that they can become self-sustaining.

There are too many bleeding hearts in Canada who want to just give and give and give without expecting any results. We want the government to be accountable. This motion would be a step in the right direction. The government should be accountable for what it does. It should ensure that the money is being spent properly. Too much of our help is directed toward helping them continue with discredited communistic policies rather than helping the people. The losers are the rank and file people, the masses who obtain very little of the aid.

I wish the Government of Canada would realize that economic growth is achieved through hard work and incentive. Our farmers did not reach the level of production of today by depending upon government. It was hard work. It was the work of their brains, their backs, their arms and legs which produced the farms of the country. They produce and have produced tremendous amounts of food. There was incentive because they knew if they worked hard they could build up something for their wives, their children and the generations after them. This is what we must instil in the minds of people in these other countries. We want to help them to become self-sustaining. We do not want to become a welfare association for the world. We want an accounting of every cent which goes to these countries from the government.

Today we are contributing $1.23 billion. It should be doing a lot of good. I would like an accounting from government as to what it is doing when it takes $1.23 billion and sends it elsewhere at a time when many people in Canada are wondering where their next meal will come from. We are so hard up that the government starts capping the indexation of the pensions of retired public servants, many of whom are not even receiving enough money now to live properly. Their average wage is only $8,000 a year. Yet the government is capping indexing in that area. Certainly, if the average wage is $8,000, some wages are higher. If the government wanted to have a proper policy and had to take money from these people who spent their lives working for the government, why did they not start at the top instead of at the bottom? It should not have been done at all. Let us have an accounting of what the government is doing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) for at least giving me an opportunity to speak for one minute. He talked about the motion in some detail. I want to say from my point of view that the short answer is that extensive files exist on the vast majority of these applications. Therefore, it would be impractical to lay before the House copies of all communications, transcripts of notes or interviews, memos, notes of telephone conversations, applications for grants, bursaries and fellowships between IDRC and any other person or group requesting or being considered for financial grants.

Furthermore, with respect to fellowships, IDRC records will not indicate whether applicants are members of political parties, neither are records indexed according to whether applicants hold or held elected or appointed office in governments of other countries.

I also want to point out that the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) has indicated in effect that he is more concerned about the spending of funds under CIDA than he is about the International Development Research Centre. Most of his remarks tended to deal with that aspect. I quote him from page 18329 of Hansard of June 10, 1982 where he says:

> I do not think there is a Canadian alive who does not want to give aid to Third World countries if and when that aid is desperately needed, Mr. Speaker.

I subscribe to that statement which he made.

He also stated—and I am paraphrasing him—that Canadians generally want to be assured that the government does not give money to unstable and communistic regimes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The time provided under Section 2 under Standing Order 48 for the consideration of this motion has now expired. The Chair would like to point out that the Standing Order also permits at this time for a further five minutes' participation in the debate by a minister of the Crown and for an additional five minutes by the mover of the motion, after which the Chair is bound to put the question.

Before I recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Irwin) I must point out that unanimous consent of the House is required for the parliamentary secretary to speak in the minister's place. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will address a few remarks in this debate on his behalf.

I really should thank the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) for putting forward this motion which was originally heard back on June 10. I had heard some of what the International Development Research Centre had done, as have most of the members of the House, but I never realized how extensive and well respected the work of the centre was throughout the world. Basically it has a small budget compared to the other budgets we have, but it has been highly spoken of on almost every occasion that it has been referred to.

I refer the House to The Financial Post article by Philip Teasdale dated August 18, 1979. He says:

> The agency, the brainchild of the late Lester Pearson, has a tiny (by foreign aid standards) annual budget of $38 million. But over the years it has earned a large reputation.
> It was the first agency in the world to devote its efforts to giving scientific and technological advice—instead of just money—to the developing countries of the Third World.

Since June 10, and before, I have talked to officials at that particular centre. We should be very proud of what we have done, as Canadians, through this centre which is only a little over a decade old. It has involved 849 projects in 100 countries. It deals with life expectancy, adult literacy and, something that I found very significant, the research and development of traditional crops. We do not try to impose on those countries the production of crops that we have in Canada. We deal with crops they have such as millets and sorghum. We have had success in Bangladesh, Egypt, Panama, Zambia, the Philippines, Korea, Ghana, Tanzania and along the Amazon.

In forestry we are helping those regions of Africa where 50 per cent of the forests will be depleted by the year 2000, if assistance is not provided. We are also providing assistance in the area of health to Ecuador, Thailand and Sudan, particularly with regard to tropical diseases.

I believe that the people involved in this work on our behalf should not be spoken of in a partisan and derogatory way. We should be aware of what they are doing and be very proud of them.

If the hon. member has complaints about CIDA and certain of its functions, that is fine. As far as the International Development Research Centre is concerned, I have seen nothing I would not be proud of as a Canadian.

In June when this motion was first before us, I thought it would provoke a very profound debate, and that is why I was prepared. I was originally to be one of the initial speakers, but now I find myself winding up the debate.

On June 10, the hon. member for Simcoe South said that we had given $107,000 to the Belgian Congo for the development of nuts, but that the only nuts that had been developed were here on the Liberal benches. Well, you have to be a little crazy to be a politician anyway, whether you are a member of the opposition, the NDP or the Liberal Party. That is acceptable. Then the hon. member went too far. He called us a cell of left-leaning demagogues headed by the right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). To be called a nut is one thing, but to be called a left-leaning demagogue is not acceptable to anyone on this side of the House.

I will conclude on a certain note of facetiousness, because I do not believe that the hon. member is really complaining about the work that the centre is doing. I think he is complaining about waste in certain agencies, and I think that kind of complaint should be guarded to a certain extent. When an agency can say that the opposition has looked at its work and has indicated it is doing a good job, it is like getting a passing grade. I believe this is acceptable because it is the role of democracy.

I would like to end by saying that the International Development Research Centre is one of the bright lights of Canadian government, of whatever political stripe, and should be encouraged and fostered. As Canadians we should be carrying on these duties abroad because this is what we do well.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about aid in this debate. All hon. members and all Canadians want to give aid where it is needed. We are talking about freedom of information and the fact that this government witholds that information no matter what subject it is on. We are also talking about the fact that the government is wasteful and a poor manager.

We want to consider the basic reason why I brought this matter up and put it on the Order Paper. My colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), asked a question, as reported in Hansard on December 16, 1980, as to why Mr. Manley was going to be given $60,000 to come to Canada to study under an IDRC grant. That is what we want to know. Why is the government so left-leaning? Every report that I read which concerns international development is left-leaning.

On November 13, 1980, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) why this country gave $100 million to Jamaica, $10 million as a grant, when Mr. Manley was prime minister. But when Mr. Seaga was in power from 1980 to 1981, all the government gave him was $2.3 million. A left-winger like Mr. Manley can get $100 million but Mr. Seaga can only get $2.3 million. I think it is pretty self-evident as to which way the government leans. I have all the meaningful figures on Jamaica here.

What does the government have to hide? The IDRC is a sacred cow, just like CIDA. What does the government have to hide? There is a bill presently before the House which proposes deindexing, but foreign aid is indexed. It is indexed to GNP. It is indexed from 0.05 per cent now, in 1982-83, rising to 0.075 per cent by 1990. The budget of CIDA is up $188.8 million. Where is the fairness and restraint there? Where is the freedom of information? Show us what the IDRC is doing and show us which countries the aid is going to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The order provided for consideration of private member's business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1982-83

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières that Bill C-125, to provide supplementary borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the House last dealt with Bill C-125 before private members' hour at five o'clock, the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) had the floor.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue my remarks with respect to Bill C-125, which would provide to the federal government supplementary borrowing authority to borrow a relatively large sum of money in order to keep the operation of the government in progress and in order to carry on business as usual. I had made some references to the large amount of our current national debt, which we estimate will amount to $150 million by the end of the 1982-83 fiscal year, and I tried to outline some of my concerns as an individual Member of Parliament. The Conservatives seemed concerned that I, as a member of the New Democratic Party, should be condemning the deficit, but I will continue to condemn the deficit of the government—

Mr. Epp: Good.

Mr. Anguish: —because I think the government has lost control of the public purse strings. In the past, the New Democratic Party has spoken in favour of deficit financing, but not perpetual deficit financing. We believe that it is all right to run a deficit if that money is being invested in someting which will generate revenue or provide security for the future. I said that I felt that the purpose of government was to govern in areas where individuals cannot operate as effectively, with due regard for economy and efficiency, in a manner which is fair and equitable to all people within a country. We are certainly an over balanced government at the federal level. I spoke about how smaller communities or constituencies of the country should be trying to become more self-sufficient in any areas that they possibly can.

During the first part of my intervention in this bill, I was also asked by the Conservatives what areas I would cut within the federal government. I will outline some of those areas, but before I do, I would like to discuss some of the ideas that we should be promoting to further self-sufficiency within the country.

I believe many areas in the country could be almost self-sufficient in all respects. There are others, of course, that could not, and there are others which should not be localized. I can understand the role of the federal government in ensuring that there is equity across Canada for as long as we are all Canadians. I hope that we all continue to be Canadians, as we know Canadians today, for many years into the future. I can understand the federal government's wanting to have control over vast areas of the economy so as to provide equity, such as by way of the established programs financing, or to provide health services and post-secondary education which is of the same standard all across Canada or at least provide these services so that there are no areas which cannot develop and have the same health care services and education as other areas of the country, no matter whether in the maritimes, in Newfoundland, British Columbia or in Saskatchewan. I can think of some areas where we should localize and try to become self-sufficient, such as the Town of Meadow Lake within my own constituency. We have a large sawmill there which is feeling the pinch because of bad economic times. But the waste material from that sawmill is burned off in what is called a beehive and all the energy goes up into the air in smoke. It is very possible, and the technology is there for that sawmill to provide the electricity, that it could be changed from thermal to electrical to provide the entire electrical needs for the Town of Meadow Lake and provide a surplus for use in other regions. Where something like this can be done, they should supply their own needs in terms of energy, and the excess pumped into a central grid system. The province should be the collector of the surplus and distribute it to regions that are not self-sufficient in terms of energy, namely electrical requirements, the other towns and cities throughout the province.

The same should be done on a national scale. Surpluses should be distributed to other regions of the country. In those areas where there is a surplus of market vegetables, grain or energy, after supplying the needs in Canada, the rest should be exported to the international market.

Something else comes to mind, the amount of vegetables imported into this country. At peak times we import about 80 per cent of our vegetables. This may seem like a small matter, but we have the ability to produce those here. If we did that, we would not have to rely on other countries to the extent we do at present.

Canada could become the most self-sufficient country in the world. We have a little over 24 million people. There are thousands of miles from Bonavista to Vancouver Island from the 49th parallel up to the 60th and beyond. People are spread over that area. There are some problems in transporting the commodities to all these people, but it can be done.

In Canada there is a wealth of resources. Even if we only used oil for our energy needs, we could be self-sufficient. However, in some areas alternate energies can be developed. Canada should be self-sufficient in energy by the goal year of 1990. We should have been self-sufficient long before that. However, under the National Energy Program, which has been a flop, the goal is 1990. I do not believe the government will achieve that goal and that we will have energy self-sufficiency or security of energy supplies by then, even though we certainly should have.

This is a very hard time in many parts of our manufacturing sector, mainly central Canada, Ontario and Quebec. There are a great many problems in the shoe and textile industry. That should not be the case. That presents a real problem for the government. When a pair of shoes imported from Brazil or Italy can be purchased for $50 to $70 and a comparable shoe of Canadian manufacture sells for $125, it is hard to convince the consumer to buy the Canadian product. I can appreciate that the government has difficult problems to come to grips with. There is the fine balance of whether to manufacture the product here and place tariffs on imports, which does not give the consumer a break, or whether to cause more unemployment. I am sure there are many arguments in the Liberal caucus on that problem.

Before my time runs out, I would like to talk about some expenditures that could be cut by the federal government which to this point have not served a useful purpose. I know that when they were started, the intentions were good and honourable. The first cut I would suggest would be to abolish the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. That department has held back our aboriginal people, the treaty Indians, for many years. It has not substantially improved the living conditions on Indian reserves. In fact, they have likely deteriorated since Confederation.

In the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development the ratio of government employees to treaty Indians is 33 to one. Some classroom teacher-student ratios are not that good. Some may think the Indian people should be treated like children, and in some cases they have been, but that should stop. There is a flagrant waste of money within that department. I do not lay the entire blame on the federal government, but it is their responsibility.

The department does have to protect some rights, as well as treaties and agreements that have been signed in the past. I suggest the alternative to a large overwhelming Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would be an Indian rights protection office. It could be much smaller. More control could be turned over to the Indian people so that everything that happens in their everyday lives would not be dictated by a department of government.

There are many public employees within the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with good vision for Indian people. They are not at fault. This is part of a system out of control. Those people could find many useful places in society without the frustration of having to work for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I do not totally condemn advertising. However, this is an area where a cut could be made. It could substantially reduce our national debt and our ever-increasing yearly deficits. Government advertising and polling done by the government could be cut to at least half. Hundreds of millions of dollars are spent by this government on advertising, which quite often is of a partisan nature. If it were only done to educate the people of Canada, that would be fine. However, quite often it loses that significance and there is more partisanship than information.

There is something else that can be done to turn this country around. I will be making representations to the Committee on Parliamentary Reform which will be sitting this summer. First, the upper house should be changed from a patronage Senate where members are appointed in a partisan manner to a council of provinces with two or three democratically-elected people from each province. These people would run for re-election in the provincial elections.

This would give some increased control over what happens within government without costing a great deal. In fact, it would likely cost less than the present patronage Senate system. It would overcome the complaints of many Canadians about having representation by population. That has been a destructive force in this country and needs to be changed.

An elected council of the provinces to replace the Senate would give regional representation. It would be a meaningful upper house which could scrutinize the work done in this House. That is a proposal I will be making to the Parliamentary Committee on Regulatory Reform.

I see my time is rapidly running out. I think Members of Parliament need to have more influence and more input into what happens in government. Too often things happen without consultation with Members of Parliament and their constituents. There should be that consultation because we have a large and vast country. My constituency is some 2,000 miles from Ottawa. Many other constituencies in Canada are 3,000 miles, and perhaps more, away from Ottawa. I do not condemn the government for this, but members of the cabinet cannot appreciate all the problems across this very vast land. Many government programs are band-aid programs. I do not always agree with programs of that kind, but if the government is going to use band-aid measures to patch up some of the holes in our economy and to solve other very pressing problems, there should be consultation with local governments, provincial governments and especially Members of Parliament who are democratically elected by their constituents.

Just before I close I would like to pay tribute to my wife Mona and our three children, Bree, Ashala and Nikki. I was talking with them tonight, and they think it is insane that some Members of Parliament have sat here over the summer and not really contributed very much. My children will be going back to school very soon, and I am very anxious to get home and to spend some of the summer with them before they go back to school. I want also to hear what the problems in my constituency are.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would certainly be going home sooner, as he would like to do, if all of us were to make shorter speeches. That is what I will endeavour to do here tonight.

I will make a brief reference to a well-known economist, Ken Galbraith who, in his book "The New Industrial State", wrote the following:

> Like private consumption, any new public service quickly becomes a part of the accustomed standard of living. Once given, support to schools or hospitals or public transportation cannot be readily withdrawn.

It strikes me that that is the situation we face today. This government has provided social programs, economic development programs and defence programs—you name it—and the Canadian people have come to expect the government to deliver these programs. In other words, they have become a part of our accustomed standards and way of life, just as Galbraith told us. If we are to continue giving support to these expectations, then Bill C-125 must be passed.

The combined opposition can keep on talking about briefcases and cook books, but if they deny passage of this bill, they will in essence be saying no to some $7 billion for our old age pensioners; some $2.5 billion for those who receive the guaranteed income supplement; some $250 million for spouses allowance payments; some $2.3 billion for family allowance payments; some $110 million for medical research grants; some $23 million for Indian and northern health services, the ones just deprecated by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish); some $24 million for the administration of our airports across the country; and some $500 million to run VIA Rail. The opposition will be saying no to some $29 million to run the CNR and CN Marine; some $672 million for the war veterans allowance and civilian war allowance benefits; some $600 million for the payment of war veterans pensions; and some $470 million to run our transport system.

The passage of this bill would allow $1.7 million to be used to protect consumers across the country; some $7 million to promote economic development in certain regions; some $2.3 billion for unemployment insurance benefits; some $96 million for fishermen's benefits; some $200 million for direct job creation; some $200 million for employment training; some $4.6 million toward easing the adjustment of immigrants in our country; some $236 million for the efficient use of our energy resources; some $135 million to run Petro-Canada so that we can increase Canada's energy supply; some $540 million to run our security systems, our prisons, the RCMP and the like; some $70 million to keep our federal courts open and running; some $20 million for Canertech, which is the imaginative scheme put forward for renewable energy resources; some $575 million to provide research grants for science and technology; and some $4.5 million to promote and ensure a safe and healthy work place.

This list could go on and on. These are the programs which are fully supported by Canadians, and we do not intend to see them denied. We cannot say no to small business when it comes to the $400 million allocation announced on June 28 in the budget. We cannot say no to home buyers. They need the $300 million to purchase their first homes. We cannot say no to the construction industry, which requires incentives so that it can start building again. We cannot say no to those who seek non-profit and co-operative housing, some 27,500 units, and we cannot say no to those who wish to take advantage of home renovation plans and programs which amount to some $30 million across the country and benefit urban areas where unemployment is the highest.

Our financial needs—our deficit, if hon. members want to call it that—depend on how much money we can collect through taxes and how much we spend on our social programs and policies to run our country. If the economy were strong, we would not have to borrow this money. That fact is clear. However, revenues have decreased; hence, the high deficit. In fact, it has been calculated that $4 of every $5 increase in the deficit is due to lack of funds coming in.

The situation we are facing in Canada is also faced by many other industrialized countries. That situation has caused what is commonly called a world recession here, in the U.S., in West Germany, in Italy, in France and in the U.K. The deficit, therefore, is not because we are spending more money on new things; it is because we want to honour the commitments we have made in the past, and those commitments now cost more.

This is very much unlike what is happening south of the border, where the Reagan administration has chosen to cut social costs. I am sure my hon. friend across the aisle would be prepared to do that, as Tories usually are in difficult times.

Mr. Epp: As you have done.

Mr. Caccia: We do not want to fight the problem of reduced revenues in Canada on the backs of those who benefit from our social services and our social programs. We want to honour our commitments, and that is why we are asking, through Bill C-125, for the approval of the House of Commons to proceed. We need this bill to pay our commitments and to ensure that the standard of living of Canadians is maintained to the best of our ability.

I would like to review briefly some of the arguments presented by the opposition in the course of this debate. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) put forward his arguments on Monday last. He belongs to that great New Democratic Party, which now is undistinguishable from the Tories. The statements made in this debate by members of the New Democratic Party demonstrate that they are running scared in relation to getting elected in the west. They want to camouflage themselves and not appear to be what they ought to be, namely, in favour of progress. They want to appear to be as regressive as possible.

Mr. Blaikie: That is one of the most unsupportable claims you have ever made, Charlie.

Mr. Caccia: The hon. member for Skeena said something rather astonishing. He said that Crown corporation borrowings must be stopped.

Mr. Epp: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: He has found the support of the Conservatives, which proves the link I was trying to establish a moment ago.

I should like to ask the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) if he is aware how many people are employed in the Crown corporations he referred to. Some 147,000 people work in our Crown corporations and another 60,000 are employed by the post office. Some 207,000 count on the subsidies that the hon. member for Skeena would like to deny. VIA Rail, the post office and so on, all operate because of these grants, loans and contributions. Does the hon. member wish to say no to these people as well? After all, it is the people who work in these Crown corporations, Canadian people, who benefit from the subsidies.

Last Friday the hon. member for Skeena said that our borrowed funds must be used wherever possible for long-term job creation and community stability. May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether 207,000 jobs are not long-term job creation? Do they not provide community stability? Of course they do and this is why we need to have this bill. We need to have access to funds to continue to support these programs. These realities cannot be denied.

In his speech on July 19 in the House the hon. member for Skeena said, as reported at page 19460 of Hansard:

> We will cut interest rates.

Later he said:

> By stimulating the economy and providing full employment the NDP would generate $3.6 billion in additional tax revenue. A $2.2 billion tax cut to low and middle income earners through a refundable tax credit—

How would the NDP cut high interest rates? Would they tell us how they would do that? There is dead silence in that corner, Mr. Speaker. I wish they would come forward and tell us how they would get this additional $5.8 billion that the hon. member for Skeena referred to. He stated that the NDP would not cut pensions, UIC payments or medicare programs as he believes the Tories would. How would he maintain all these social programs and still generate an additional $5.8 billion without increasing the deficit? I submit that it is impossible.

A lot has been said during the debate about public accountability. The Tories say that our deficit is unwarranted and that there is waste. They call for a committee to be struck to study the waste so that costs can be reduced. Even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) joined in the fire. I wish those who raise this point would take the time to attend the Public Accounts Committee. This committee operates under the authority of Parliament to do this very thing. Members of the opposition are asked to chair this committee so that the public accounts can be scrutinized impartially. In fact, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) is chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and 20 members from all three parties sit on the committee. It looks over what is spent by the government and the Crown corporations and has the power to study each department and see whether there is waste. So the Tories' suggestion is no suggestion at all; the very committee they ask for already exists.

The opposition has suggested that the $19.6 billion will drive interest rates up or will crowd other borrowers out of the investment market. This is not likely to be the case. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has said that there are two reasons why this country will be able to live with this deficit without causing interest rates to rise. The first is that business is not borrowing or investing so much these days therefore the business community is not making its usual demands on the country's investment pool.

The second reason is that we have a high level of savings in this country. In fact, 13 cents out of every dollar is saved, so there is plenty of money available to be borrowed. What will drive up interest rates are high inflation and high U.S. interest rates. These are the two most important determinants of interest rates in Canada, as well as the uncertainty caused by the high U.S. deficit produced by the Reagan administration.

The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) stated in the House on Tuesday that the Canadian dollar fell in 1975 from $1.06 to 85 cents. He said that for the same year the Japanese yen, the German mark and the Swiss franc—

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. minister would entertain a question?

Mr. Caccia: When I complete my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

In his speech, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap said, "There has been a drop in the value of the Canadian dollar relative to these other countries." The fact is that our dollar is looking better all the time. In the last six weeks, from June 30 until yesterday at noon, the Canadian dollar had risen against the United States dollar by 3.2 per cent. In the past six months the Canadian dollar rose against the Swiss franc by 9 per cent and by 12.4 per cent against the Japanese yen. In both cases the Canadian dollar has climbed continually in the last six months. The Canadian dollar has also risen 8.7 per cent against the Italian currency, 3.3 per cent against the pound sterling, 2.6 per cent against the German mark and 8.5 per cent against the Japanese yen. All of this occurred in the past six months.

As you will have noticed, Mr. Speaker, our dollar is becoming stronger every day. This is a very good sign. Our dollar is strong because, in the words of the Minister of Finance, "— our fundamental strength remains. Canada's resource wealth is undiminished."

To the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap I say this is an indication of the health of our country—a country that will soon be very healthy.

I should like to refer briefly to the concluding remark of the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap, the finance critic of the NDP. As reported at 19529 of Hansard, he said:

> But we in this party feel that there is another way to reduce the deficit. That way is to stimulate the economy to get growth going again in the country, so that revenues start to flow into the government and so we can start taking care of the debt. That is our proposal.

These words could have come from the Liberal benches because that is the objective of the budget. Why on earth, with that kind of concluding statement, did the NDP vote against the budget? They contradict each other with their voting and their statements in the House.

Time is running out, Mr. Speaker, and there are others who wish to participate in the debate. Once we have received the authority to borrow that we are seeking in this bill, we can go ahead and work together to bring about the world of 6 and 5 per cent that the Minister of Finance referred to. By 6 and 5 I refer to the program which was announced in the House on June 28 and which is progressively being adopted throughout the country. Today the Toronto Transit Commission made a public announcement to that effect.

We need to bring down inflation so that interest rates will fall and the deficit will come down. We are counting on the Canadian public to join in the fight to bring the inflation rate down. The 6 per cent world advocated by the Minister of Finance is a strong world. Industry will have money to expand and grow, to hire more people. When more people are working the government will receive more money. It will then be able to reduce its deficits. And here is the good news, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian dollar is getting stronger. It has risen since June 30 and is continuing to rise. Today it closed at 79.59 cents U.S., and this is a very encouraging trend. As well, this afternoon it was announced by the Bank of Canada that the lending rate decreased by half a percentage point to 15.6 per cent; the prime lending rate has fallen accordingly. This is the second time in two weeks that there has been a decrease in interest rates in Canada. Our budget is working, our economic policies are sound, and we look to all Canadians for their support in this endeavour.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. minister would accept a question, I want to ask him whether or not he understood that I was comparing the value of the dollar relative to other currencies over a 12-year period, using 1975 as the benchmark and calling that an indices of 100. Did he understand what I was trying to say?

Mr. Caccia: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I understand him very well because I also have the text here, and he actually went back to June, 1970. However, I would ask him to refer to more recent years, otherwise he could go back 100 years and draw conclusions to suit his purpose. I would rather he looked at the performance of the last six months and then drew conclusions, rather than going back 12 years to suit his own political purposes.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) just said we could go back 100 years. We do not have to go back 100 years, we can look at the government this year: inflation, 11 per cent; deficit $20 billion plus; unemployed, 1.3 million. That is this government's record this year. We do not have to look back 100 years, let us look at it right now. I thought, Mr. Speaker, I would never see the day that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) would look bright in economic terms. I finally saw that tonight. I am glad the Minister of Labour is not taking over the finance portfolio; we would be in even greater trouble than we are today, if that is possible.

Mr. Caccia: I agree with you.

Mr. Epp: I am glad you agree. Labour is the same problem.

What we are facing today, Mr. Speaker, is a bill asking the Canadian taxpayer and this House for authority to borrow and allow the government to finance its $20 billion deficit for one year. That is the issue before the House, nothing else. There is no greater indictment, no greater example of defeat in economic terms, than a government which has to come to Parliament again and ask for more borrowing authority. That is the issue, the issue which Canadians are facing because of the deficit this government has brought upon them. This generation will be forced to take 23 cents out of every federal tax dollar collected to service the debt. Of every federal tax dollar, 23 cents now goes just for interest. If that were reduced, what could we then do with social programs? That is the legacy of this government. Then we hear the Minister of Labour standing up and saying, "our economic policies are working". If you want to bring on disaster, Mr. Speaker, then yes, they are working. He has the unmitigated gall to come here and say to unemployed Canadians that their economic policies are working. There is no greater gall, Mr. Speaker, that anyone could express in this House than that.

What has happened with the deficit? The government came forward with a borrowing authority bill in which not only did they ask for the borrowing authority to finance the $20 billion deficit, but, Mr. Speaker, they wanted to have a little bit more just in case there is an emergency. A slush fund, a $4 billion slush fund. Just in case we have some trouble, fellows, we want $4 billion. Then what happened, Mr. Speaker? The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), in opening the debate for the Official Opposition, said there is no way the government is going to get that money. He moved an amendment at second reading which very clearly pointed out that we would reduce the borrowing authority, and it was reduced by $4 billion. This was the amendment of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition:

"this House holds the opinion that the granting of an authority for the borrowing of a sum greater than that amount which is required to meet the government's needs to the end of the current fiscal year is objectionable in principle and this House therefore declines to give second reading to Bill C-125, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority."

Today, Mr. Speaker, Canadians saw this House at work. They saw the leadership of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition who put to this government that it would not get its $4 billion slush fund. Under the House order passed today the government can come back and ask for an additional $4 billion before the end of March, 1983. But what this party has done, Mr. Speaker, is put this government on notice: if you are serious about restraint, if you are serious about reducing the deficit, if you are serious about reducing the call in the money markets for funds for the government as you are now doing, then do not come back by March 31, 1983 and ask for those $4 billion. Do not come back, do not ask us for more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: The Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) says "oh, come on". I want to tell her that Canadians in her riding today are suffering. Why? Because of the profligacy of this government, that is why, and for no other reason.

The government seems to be very cavalier about $1 billion. Old C. D. Howe once said, "What's a million?", but now they are saying, "What's a billion?". What is a billion dollars, Mr. Speaker? Let us say the present Minister of Finance stood over a big hole—which seems to be the national debt right now—and he was dropping in $20 bills every minute of every day, 24 hours a day, seven days a week. After 95 years, Mr. Speaker, he would still be dropping $20 bills. That is a billion. And this government is asking Canadians to finance another $20 billion deficit, to raise the national debt to something like $135 billion.

Mr. LeBlanc: What would you cut out?

Mr. Epp: Just give me the time; first of all we would cut out this government.

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would entertain a question?

Mr. Epp: Of course, Mr. Speaker, after my speech, and I hope my answer is better than the minister's in question period.

An hon. Member: Her question will be better than yours.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, let us look at this deficit from the perspective of 1968, when this government first came to power. After a depression, two world wars and the building of a country, the total national debt in Canada stood at $17 billion. That was the total national debt. Now, 14 years later the national debt is $145 billion. In fact, the deficit this year is higher than the total accumulated debt after the first 100 years. Surely Canadians can ask whether government has better control in terms of its expenditures.

• (2050)

Members of the House know that the Auditor General, the chief witness before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, has said that spending control has simply gone; it is not there, that government spending is out of control. The government can say whatever it wants, but the verdict of independent people with expertise who looked at the accounts, is that government spending is out of control.

The Minister of Labour said that the deficit was not going to cause Canadian business any great difficulty because business was not competing for moneys. He justified that by saying that business was not in the money market now because it was in a down turn. That is true. But surely the question must be asked why. The answer is that it is because of the three budgets brought in by the Minister of Finance. First, the National Energy Program took away an industry's resources and its ability to give us energy self-sufficiency. The second budget of the Minister of Finance was condemned universally across the country. People were absolutely shocked to learn in the third budget that the deficit was $20 billion and growing. What this government has not been able to instil in Canadians is confidence. It has been unable to instil investor confidence. When the Minister of Labour said that there is no problem, that the government is not going to be able to raise interest rates because only the government will be in the money markets, that is true. But I say to the minister that is hardly a reason or a solution to the economic problems of the day.

This government uses one stock answer when anyone criticizes the deficit. Government members ask, "What will you cut out?" The extrapolation of that argument is this, that any deficit, any spending, any hardship on Canadian taxpayers is justified. If you have a problem, you have one solution. You throw more money at it. The Minister of Labour today literally took us on a cook's tour of the Blue Book of the expenditures of the government. He was saying "Look, we are doing all these wonderful things for Canadians, and therefore, we should continue". But he never answered the question that because of government policies—to a great degree because of government policies—1.3 million Canadians are unemployed. He never addressed the question which the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) mentioned in Toronto yesterday, that is that we could be losing a whole generation of young Canadians because they cannot get into the labour market. I hope the National Training Act works. But I want to tell the minister and members opposite that you can have a training act and an apprenticeship program, but when a company has to cut back employees, who are the first ones to go? In most cases the first ones to go are the ones without experience or those who do not have their journeyman's papers. That is the situation we now face in Canada. A very tough decision will have to be made. No one in public life wants to make that decision. There must be a parliamentary committee with the power to cut expenditures before the fact rather than having the Public Accounts Committee look at expenditures after the fact. The Public Accounts Committee looks at the accounts roughly two years after the expenditures have taken place. But that money has already gone. It is already spent. What we need is a close examination of expenditures before they are made.

The government uses two arguments, first, that it would not be in trouble if only it were getting more revenue, and second, that if the revenue were not dropping, the government would not be in any difficulty. It reminds me of the person who says that he really has no problem balancing his or her own personal books. The only problem is that there is always too much month left at the end of the money. That is literally where this government is at. But when Canadians have difficulty and when they do not have enough money for their expenditures, what choice do they have? What do they do? They can go to the local banker and ask to float a loan. But for how long and how often can they do that? Eventually, what people have to do is to bring expenditures in line with revenue. That is the only avenue they have. They cannot say that they are going to continue spending more money because they know that if they had more revenue they would not have the troubles they have. That is what the government is saying. The government says, "We would really have no problem if we had more revenue." I can say to members opposite that no one would have problems then. The argument being used that it is because there is a drop in revenue and, therefore, the government has a deficit is not the whole picture. You have to address the other half of the equation. The other half is that revenues are down, but how does one reduce the call on money? There is no other solution.

Mr. LeBlanc: Reaganomics.

Mr. Epp: The minister can say whatever he wants, but I simply say to him that Canadians have a problem. The government has a $20 billion deficit this year. How is the Liberal government going to address the problem? The minister does not want to. The Liberals want to talk about more revenue. The whole argument the Liberals use is that if Canadians would only pay more taxes and pay more to the government, there would be no problem.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Epp: That is exactly what the Minister of Labour said. The government is not addressing the other half of the equation. The other half the government is not addressing is where it should reduce its expenditures. Why is the government not addressing that half of the equation? The government is not addressing it because on many occasions it was able to come to power by certain promises. Now it does not have either the political will or the courage to tell Canadians that the government cannot afford certain programs because of the deficit and that the government must reduce its expenditures. So often the federal government uses the argument about provincial deficits. It says that if the provinces were not into the money markets as deeply, the federal government would not have as great a problem either. I went through the provincial expenditures today and I found that only four provinces in Canada have a provincial budget greater than the $4 billion that was cut today from the borrowing authority because of the amendment of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. There are six provinces in Canada that have a smaller provincial budget than the total amount of money that was cut today in the bill. There is something which Canadians possibly do not recall and which they have probably taken for granted, and that is that we have always had a deficit and that governments have always operated on deficits. I have to give this government credit because in the 14 years this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been in power, there was one year the government had a surplus. In 1972 the government had a surplus of $350 million. Therefore, it can be done.

If we take a look at the figures of Statistics Canada, we will see that there are a number of provinces which have surpluses, even now with reduced revenues. For instance, there is Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and then Nova Scotia with a $130 million deficit. Also there is a deficit in New Brunswick. Then we come to Quebec, which I want to mention because we often hear hon. members opposite refer to the large deficit of that province. It is large, but the deficit in Quebec is roughly 10 per cent of its total provincial budget. The deficit of the federal government this year against its total expenditures is 25 per cent, yet we hear them ranting and railing about the province of Quebec and its deficit. In my assessment it is too high, but it is 10 per cent of expenditure, and the deficit of the federal government is 25 per cent of expenditure. If hon. members opposite ran their personal accounts this way, how long would they be in business? If they ran their household budgets this way, how long would they be in business?

I agree with the government when it says there are programs to which the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières) refers as automatic stabilizers. They do ameliorate the shock of the recession to individuals, but I ask the government, when it is asking for the support of Canadians and of the opposition for restraint—and we are supporting Bill C-124, the wage restraint legislation—to show us where it will reduce the deficit, or join us as parliamentarians in examining future expenditures so that we can reduce them before the fact rather than after the fact. Then I believe Canadians would start taking account again of the fact that government is interested in looking after saving and husbanding taxpayers' dollars. At the present time Canadians generally feel that the government knows no limit to spending.

I commend the Hon. Leader of the Opposition for his foresight and for demanding that the borrowing authority be reduced. The government does not need a slush fund. It does not need those extra moneys. I say to the government, "Do not return to the House in four or six months and indicate again that the piggybank is empty; we have no more money, we must borrow some more". We will say, "no" then too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Erola: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I ask the hon. member whether he will answer a question. He suggested that the constituents in my riding have suffered very directly by the spending practices of the government. Is he suggesting that we cut off the $2.5 million which is spent weekly by the government to ensure and protect the incomes of those in my riding?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I am glad of the question.

Mrs. Erola: Then answer it.

Mr. Epp: I will, if the minister gives me some time. I will not do like she does in question period. The government has created such a debt load and such high inflation and it has borrowed money internationally and raised interest rates to such a degree that businessmen and women in that riding and in every riding represented in the House have closed their doors. The government has created unemployment to the tune of 1.3 million Canadians. That is its legacy, that is its legacy.

Mr. Blenkarn: Canadians are paying from 3.5 per cent to 4 per cent more for money than are the Americans. That is why they are out of work, and she does not give a damn.

Mrs. Erola: That is why I give a damn. Answer the question.

Mr. Epp: I have answered the question, and those are the reasons exactly.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in the debate on Bill C-125 to provide supplementary borrowing authority. It was interesting to hear the comments of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). He is usually very articulate. I must say that he was attempting to be articulate tonight. I cannot say that I would agree with some of his assertions or indeed his conclusions, but I enjoyed listening to some of his comments. I think he failed to acknowledge the serious problems in the Canadian economy at the present time.

He, more so than most other hon. members opposite and in that particular party, knows that Canada is in a very severe economic recession. Also he is fully aware that unemployment in Canada is extremely high and that unemployment in other countries is also very high. He should be fully aware that the profits of businesses across Canada are at an all-time low. Therefore, the quick fixes and clichés of the Conservative Party of Canada and of the New Democratic Party are not suitable to present economic circumstances.

I would like tonight to dwell upon some of the expenditures of the Government of Canada in my constituency. Earlier today we heard the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett) allude to the misgivings or the lack of political will of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc). I want to explain to the House, to the galleries and indeed to Canadians in general that there are expenditures under the budget and under the government's economic plan which are taking place in my constituency, which unfortunately has one of the highest, if not the highest, unemployment rates in the country.

Mr. Riis: Resign.

Mr. Dingwall: I will come back to the comment of that hon. member of the New Democratic Party. There are expenditures about which I think Canadians ought to know. They ought to know that there are legitimate expenditures which are needed to provide an economic base for some smaller rural communities across the country.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal used very uncomplimentary language against the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. When I listened to him I could not help but think about the moneys which were provided in my constituency for small craft harbours. I am thinking of the community of South Bar, an area which is very dear to my heart. Since 1947 it has attempted to obtain facilities to improve docking and a new wharf. Nothing had taken place until 1981 when this government provided approximately $350,000.

Before that expenditure was made, the former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson), came with me on a fact-finding tour of some ports. He visited that community along with others. His first impressions were: We have to do something. We have to do something immediately, because for more than 25 years 20 full-time fishermen have been attempting to get a facility which they could use to take in their catch, sell their fish and make a living. Their livelihood does not consist of making in excess of tens or hundreds of thousands of dollars; it is a bare living. I believe that Canadians have a right to hear about expenditures such as those made by the Government of Canada.

I listened with interest to the claims made by hon. members opposite about waste and unnecessary expenses. I agree that where there are unnecessary expenses, and I hope and encourage my government in every way I can to terminate those expenses in every possible manner. But this is one instance where the Government of Canada has injected money into a small rural community which would lay dormant in this tough economic recession if it did not receive this money. While I do not wish to bore members opposite, I can give examples of other expenditures, and I think it is important for the record to show them. For example, in another small rural community of Port Morien, $255,000 has been budgeted for breakwater repairs. In the municipal community of Glace Bay there are more than 60 full-time fishermen who receive about $250,000 for the dredging of the channel.

Mr. Blackburn: Tell us about Sysco.

Mr. Dingwall: I presume that the Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party would advise cutting the expenses of those three communities. What about Barrachois Cove in New Waterford which has been budgeted for $180,000? The town of Louisbourg also has a wharf. Other small communities who have very productive people in them are False Bay Beach, Main-à-Dieu, and Chapel Cove. I repeat that these people are very productive because the opposition occasionally likes to give Canadians the impression that by making these expenditures in these small rural communities the recipients of that money somehow do not deserve it. They suggest that we should make cuts in those areas. I suggest the complete opposite, and I have complete confidence in the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the plans which he has introduced in the recent budget for additional expenditures under small crafts and harbours. I believe that all hon. members, particularly from my province of Nova Scotia, should applaud and encourage the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to make those expenditures because they are very worth while and they add to the recovery of the Canadian economy.

Moneys have also been allotted for fishing vessel subsidies in my constituency. Approximately $318,000 has been budgeted over the last number of years to fishermen who are building boats in my area. I believe this is absolutely essential.

The Cape Breton Development Corporation, which is a Crown corporation in my riding that services all of Cape Breton, employs approximately 4,800 people. If one were to heed the suggestions of the Conservative Party of Canada, I suppose that Crown corporation would be scrapped too. They would want to put it out of existence and place 4,800 miners on the unemployment rolls.

Thank God the Conservatives were only in power for nine months, because while they had trouble making decisions, they did decide in one instance not to support the capital expenditure program of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I am happy to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that my government has honoured all its commitments and is contributing to the capital expenditure program of that Crown corporation.

The Conservative Party of Canada seems to allege that, for some reason, the Crown corporation in that area which has chronic unemployment should not receive any financial assistance. I disagree wholeheartedly with that suggestion. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) is in the House tonight. He has shown very active interest in that corporation. He is aware of the good work that the corporation has done in the past and he is extremely hopeful, as I am, that it will do even better work in the future. I am sure that he would want to join me in encouraging that Crown corporation to strive for the goal of making a profit. All corporations go through trying times in their infancy stage. Certainly, that corporation has had its share of ups and downs. I am hopeful that the corporation will see a turn around in the ensuing years so that the coal mining industry in my constituency will become a very profitable one. The 4,800 miners, those to whom the Conservatives made no commitment in terms of capital expenditure, are very proud people and are working hand in hand with management to achieve that goal.

The New Democratic Party to the left of the Conservative Party made reference to the "Sydney Steel Corporation". Members of that party are famous not only in my constituency—where we will never hear from them again—but across the country for not doing their homework and research. Those members of the NDP make wild, foolish and idiotic statements. The fact is that Sydney Steel Corporation has received funding. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is here tonight. He played a very important role in providing moneys to the Sydney Steel Corporation. We waited, listened to the Government of Nova Scotia and the unions involved who devised a business plan for the modernization of Sydney Steel, and then presented it to the Government of Canada. We approved the business plan in principle and provided in excess of $90 million toward the success of that plan. Therefore, when the NDP talks about a lack of commitment or insufficient funds for Sysco they should realize that the government has provided substantial moneys to that Crown corporation, which is owned by the provincial government. I say with regret that the members of the NDP are wrong as usual, although there are certain hon. members in that party who deserve the title of being honourable and are perhaps correct in their facts from time to time. The fact is that it is necessary for the Government of Canada to provide those expenditures.

However, the Conservative Party could not make up its mind when it was in power nine months ago. Those members did not know which way to turn. I know that they would have turned thumbs down to the steelworkers of industrial Cape Breton. They would not have provided the funding to the Sydney Steel Corporation. They would not have forced the Government of Nova Scotia to be co-operative with the unions in developing a business plan. They would have turned thumbs down.

Another legitimate and reasonable expenditure of the Government of Canada has been the substantial amount provided by Canada Mortgage and Housing to my constituency. Of course, the Conservatives would have slashed that. The Conservatives would say to the municipalities of Dominion, New Waterford, Glace Bay, Cape Breton County and the town of Louisbourg that the money that the government has earmarked for those residents under the RRAP program to make renovations to their homes are somehow not legitimate expenditures. Somehow those Canadians who live in rural areas of chronic unemployment ought not to receive that type of money. My government does not believe in that philosophy. We have provided a substantial amount of money, in excess of $15 million, in fact, which is a very sizeable amount indeed. Wherever the Conservative members stand, and they are all over the map as we know, when they rise in the House to condemn expenditures, they ought to look at them all and clearly tell the people across Canada what they do not want, instead of just generalizing, because the Government of Canada has provided money for legitimate and reasonable expenditures. Take senior citizens' units, for example. Are we to deny accommodation to senior citizens? Are we to do that as a government, as a Parliament? My government has provided 55 new units in the Town of Glace Bay and 16 new units in a community in Richmond County called L'Ardoisé. I think they are sizeable expenditures.

Mrs. Mitchell: Tell us about poverty.

Mr. Dingwall: I do not question the amount, but I become somewhat irritated when the Conservative Party stands and says that the budget, the expenditure plan of the government, is all wrong. Those two communities appreciate the assistance and look forward to receiving additional moneys to build more units for senior citizens. I, for one, as the Member of Parliament for that riding, will continue to work to get additional moneys for units for senior citizens in all municipalities in my constituency. Over a million dollars has been provided for rural and native housing in my constituency. Sizeable amounts of money have been provided under the Canadian Home Insulation Program for 1980-82; in fact, in excess of $1.5 million. Over 5,100 units have benefited from the home insultation program in my constituency. I believe that if hon. members would disregard the political rhetoric that they expound from time to time, they would recognize that that particular program has gone a long way toward meeting one of the objectives of the National Energy Program, that is, conserving energy. Why should Canadians, whether they live in eastern Canada or in western Canada, from such a program not benefit to achieve such a goal? I do not see anything unreasonable or illegitimate about such an expenditure. However, the Conservative Party would lead Canadians to believe that those expenditures, too, are unreasonable.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You brought the west to its knees.

Mr. Dingwall: Of course, the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion has been very instrumental in providing assistance to my constituency. It has provided moneys for a new coal reclamation plant in a community known as Scotch Village, but I guess that if one is a Tory, one of the blue boys—

Mr. Huntington: You built a hotel in Windsor.

Mr. Dingwall: —one does not put money into programs or give any money to create jobs in those small communities across Canada which are suffering greatly from the rough economic situation we are in at the present time.

Concerning the ILAP program, I know hon. members opposite in the New Democratic Party have criticized—

Mr. Deans: Of course. Only where you were wrong.

Mr. Dingwall: —the functioning of that particular program. I think that real question or the real test is to ask the individuals who have benefited from that program whether it has been a success. Yes, there were problems in terms of initially getting off the ground. But it is now functioning and has provided money to create many jobs. As I said, money has been provided for the coal reclamation plant in the community of Scotch Village. Money has been provided for the Haak Mining Equipment Company Limited, which is a manufacturing outlet in my constituency. Sizeable amounts of money have been provided. But I guess that if one is a Tory, one says, "no" to that. One does not put any money into job-creation, none whatsoever. That is the Tory philosophy and practice. That is what the Tories would do for those small communities outside the major urban areas of Ontario and Quebec.

What about the Department of Transport? What expenditures has the government made over the past number of years and, more recently, over the past number of months, to provide economic benefits to my community? It has incurred some very legitimate and necessary expenses. It has provided in excess of $3 million through the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) for renovations and improvements to the airport in my constituency. I think that was legitimate and necessary. I think the employees of that particular airport, and the people who use that facility, know that it was needed and appreciate the fact that the Government of Canada has made that particular expenditure. I applaud the Minister of Transport for finding those funds.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who just left the House, referred to some of the provincial deficits and I agree that some of them are very high. But one thing that comes to mind in terms of provincial governments is the highway strengthening agreement whereby the Government of Canada embarked upon a program with provincial governments to upgrade highways. Some may feel that if all the roads in Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver were paved, we would not have to worry about the rural areas of the country. However, my party is not of that viewpoint. In fact, under the recent agreement signed with the Province of Nova Scotia, my government has provided $7 million to upgrade an existing highway in my constituency, route 104, which is badly in need of repairs. I do not think that expenditure is illegitimate, unreasonable or wasteful. I think it is absolutely necessary. If one were to talk to the residents or business people along that particular highway, or to the truck drivers who utilize it, they would all say that it is a very legitimate expenditure. I know that the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) would agree that it is a legitimate expenditure, as there are rural communities in his riding.

Mr. Crosby: We have them all paved.

Mr. Dingwall: Of course, there is a certain element known as right-wing Tories who are trying to move in on the leader and take over, but I do not know if it will work. I guess we will know in January.

Those expenditures are essential to that community. Of course, the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan)—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A very great man.

Mr. Dingwall: I want to go on record as agreeing with the hon. member, the former minister of energy, mines and resources in the Conservative government, that he is a great minister, and I am glad he has said that tonight. He is a superb individual. He provided moneys to the Glace Bay Miners' Museum. I guess the Tories and the NDP would agree with this one. When the moneys were made available to that museum—

Mrs. Mitchell: We are not like the Tories.

Mr. Dingwall: You are not like the Tories? Well, in a minute I will respond to the hon. member, who says that the NDP are not like the Tories, because both of you are painted with the same brush and you will go down the tubes together on this one.

The moneys were donated to the Glace Bay Miners' Museum by the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan), $500,000, for the reconstruction of the miners' museum which was burnt down. I guess the Conservative Party of Canada will stand here, either tonight or some time later in the debate, and say that that expenditure was no good, that it was not a wise expenditure. I think the NDP would perhaps agree with me that it was a wise expenditure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dingwall: It was a legitimate expenditure and was needed to protect, encourage and promote the cultural values of the mining communities of industrial Cape Breton. The Secretary of State (Mr. Regan) ought to be applauded for that.

• (2130)

The Conservative Party would say no to the senior citizens of this country. They would absolutely freeze them out. We saw that in December 1979 when they tried to perpetrate a budget on this country. They could say that under Health and Welfare Canada moneys provided under the New Horizons Programs is not a legitimate expenditure.

Would they say that the moneys provided to the MacDonald Street complex, the L'Ardoisé Jolly Club, the New Waterford Senior Citizens Club, the Valleyview Senior Citizens, the Daley Heights Senior Citizens, the Mira Manor, and the Donkin Senior Citizens Club are illegitimate expenses, unreasonable and wasteful?

When you listen to the Tory rhetoric, it is absolutely incredible. All they are doing in this debate is standing in their places and fudging the facts. They have no alternatives, no solutions, absolutely nothing.

More expenditures were made under the Health and Welfare New Horizons; the Golden Years Club of Kennedy Drive, the Senior Citizens of Glace Bay, The Bay Side Senior Citizens Club in Port Morien, the Saint Eugene's Catholic Women's League, at Dominion, Miller Manor New Horizons Club in the town of Dominion. All these expenditures were made. I should explain to those in the gallery and to the Canadian people that these expenditures were not enormous sums of money, such as $300,000 or $500,000. They were approximately $2,000 to $3,500. However, the Conservative Party of Canada would say to the Canadian people that expenditures of that nature are unreasonable and wasteful. This government disagrees with that and will continue to support our senior citizens and the New Horizons Program.

In my opening remarks I alluded to the fact that unfortunately my constituency suffers from high unemployment. I guess if you share the view of the Conservative Party, you would cut out unemployment insurance. I happen to agree with the principle of unemployment insurance. I think it is needed. Good economic times have never brought thousands of jobs to my constituency. There are no easy answers to regional disparity, despite what the members of the Conservative Party and NDP try to make us believe.

For example, in terms of providing money to create summer employment, this summer the government has provided in excess of $415,000 under that program for the youth of my constituency.

Mr. Crosby: The Liberal youth of your constituency.

Mr. Dingwall: The hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) would freeze out the youth of this country, saying they do not need that money. Our government's response to that is to provide some moneys.

I wish I could have received much more money. Next year I will work twice as hard to obtain even more money so that all the young people in my constituency will be working. The Conservative Party of Canada would cut that out. They would prefer to see those young people walking the streets, doing absolutely nothing.

Under the Canada Community Development Program, in excess of $4 million has been provided to my constituency. Granted, these are short-term jobs. There is no question of that, but it will provide in excess of 1,300 jobs. That is what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has done through the Canada Community Development Program.

One of the major objectives of this government in 1980 was the decentralization program. Two decentralization moves have occurred, but not in my constituency. I am hoping to get some at some point in time.

Mr. Deans: How much do you want?

Mr. Dingwall: The NDP ask how much do I want. I want to help my people. That is my job. My job is not to collect a salary and then walk away from the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee and not provide any meaningful input. My job is to fight for my constituents to obtain jobs and to assist them as much as I can. We know where the NDP are at.

Two decentralization moves have taken place, the citizenship branch of the Department of Secretary of State and the incomes security branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Both have provided jobs in industrial Cape Breton.

I do not think hon. members are serious when they say that should not happen. That is terrible. It is unbelievable that the Conservative Party would say that decentralization should not take place in an area that has chronic unemployment. The NDP are also against decentralization in an area that has sustained high and chronic unemployment. That is absolutely incredible, absolutely terrible that those two parties would be against decentralization.

We have provided moneys to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for a coalmining research laboratory and a coal liquefaction projection that is under way, a coal water fuel project. All of these projects will involve more than $7 million. They are very wise expenditures, legitimate and necessary. The NDP have clearly stated their position when it comes to job creation. There is no doubt in anyone's mind where they stand. They are like the Tories, talking out of both sides of their mouth.

We have an industry in this country which has to make tough economic decisions. Those decisions will have to be made in the very near future. I refer to the nuclear industry. I can refer to two heavy water plants which years ago were referred to in the media as disasters, a complete financial burden to the taxpayer that would never become productive. One of those heavy water plants is in Glace Bay in my constituency, and one is in Port Hawkesbury. Those two heavy water plants employ 718 people.

The New Democratic Party, the great pretenders so far as the working man is concerned, are also the great pretenders that they want to encourage jobs and have more Canadians working. Where do the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) in particular and the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), stand with regard to the nuclear industry? He said in the House that he agreed with the resolution passed by his party condemning the nuclear industry and proposing that we rid ourselves of it, but he is also on record as saying that if he were in power he would close those two heavy water plants tomorrow and put 718 employees out of work. That is where the NDP stands when it comes to jobs.

Members of the NDP talk out of both sides of their mouths. In the next number of months when decisions have to be made on the future of heavy water plants the workers will have only one party to which they can turn. The Conservative Party is not innocent in this respect either, but if those workers lose their jobs, they will know the New Democratic Party has been leading the lobby and leading the charge. Members of the New Democratic Party are aiding and abetting. Their sole function, particularly in hard economic times like this, is to promote, profit from and live off gloom and doom. That is the role of members of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Riis: You are an embarrassment to this House. You make it embarrassing to be a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Dingwall: In an election campaign anyone can say, "Give more money to Sydney Steel," "Give more money to DEVCO," and "We will increase pensions, not by $35, but by $40". Anyone can do that when not in power. When one does not have responsibility, it is quite easy to do that. We know where the New Democratic Party stands.

The Conservative Party would close heavy water plants too, if it had a chance. Members of the Conservative Party would close them tomorrow. I do not think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) will have a chance to get into power, but that depends on what happens in January and subsequently. The Conservatives do not have one policy. They had a policy convention here not too long ago which produced one resolution: not to have any other resolutions. The Conservatives have no energy policy. They have no policy for senior citizens. They have no policy for DRIE or for job creation. They sit, wait, criticize and live off the gloom and doom they spread in these tough economic times. That is their policy. That is where they are coming from. I think the Canadian people have judged them extremely well. They gave the Conservatives only nine months in office. I doubt that the Conservatives will ever get that opportunity again, but we must think about possibilities—not probabilities—and if elected again, I think they would last even less than nine months.

I have attempted to outline tonight where the New Democratic Party stands on job creation and where the Conservative Party stands on all the major issues. They have no policies or alternatives. I have tried to do this because hon. members opposite have used the time of the House to argue to the Canadian people that somehow all the expenditures contained in the budget and in the expenditure plan of the government are wasteful, irresponsible and illegitimate. I defy a Conservative Member of Parliament or a New Democratic Party Member of Parliament to stand in this House and object to the moneys which are being spent in my constituency.

I see that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is at the back of the chamber. In his opening remarks in this debate he referred to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) as being a designated hitter. According to the warped ideology of the Leader of the Opposition and his warped way of coming to conclusions, the minister has three strikes and he is out. There is only one party which is out. The Progressive Conservative Party of Canada was out on December 13, 1979. There is only one man in this House who will be out, and that will happen in January.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It being 9.45 o'clock, pursuant to order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the bill now before the House.

The question is on the motion of the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Blaker in the chair.

Supplementary Borrowing Authority

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The House in committee of the whole on Bill C-125, an Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

On Clause 2—

Mr. Bussières: Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the profitable negotiations held earlier today and handled so very skillfully by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), I move, seconded by the government House leader and President of the Privy Council:

That Bill C-125 be amended by deleting line 14 on page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"exceeding in the whole, seven billion dollars,"

SMALL BUSINESS

REDUCTION IN INTEREST RATES URGED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, small businesses across Canada are being forced into bankruptcy because of high interest rates. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That the government immediately introduce one part of its budget puffery, that is the plan that will allow a 4 per cent reduction in interest rates for our small businesses.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POTATO INSPECTION CHARGE—DEMAND THAT INCREASE BE ROLLED BACK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On Monday, July 19, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) announced an increase in the inspection charge for potato table stock exports from $6 a carload to eight cents per hundredweight, an increase of 1,200 per cent. Then on Tuesday, July 20, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) announced that the price restraint in the federal public sector will apply to all prices established under federal jurisdiction. Any increase higher than the 6 per cent ceiling which was not implemented before June 28 will be rolled back. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That this House demands that the President of the Treasury Board review this 1,200 per cent increase and apply the 6 per cent limit that is now government policy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MEDICAL CARE

TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF INTRODUCTION IN SASKATCHEWAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Twenty years ago today, July 23, 1962, the Saskatoon Agreement was signed between the Saskatchewan NDP government represented by the late Premier W. C. Lloyd, by Bill Davies, then minister of health, by Allan Blakeney, chief negotiator, and the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Saskatchewan represented by Dr. H. Dalgleish. With this agreement the first universal prepaid compulsory medicare program came into existence in North America.

Today, as the principles of medicare are under attack from many directions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin):

That this House dedicate itself in a new and firm resolution to protect this great social institution and pay tribute to Tommy Douglas, father of medicare, Lord Taylor, arbitrator of the dispute in 1962, and Bob Von Pilis who personally showed me and others the value of the long haul.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BANKS AND BANKING

SUGGESTION INTEREST RATES BE ALLOWED TO FALL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, the Bank of Canada rate drop of 57 basis points yesterday was measly. Over the past three weeks interest rates in the United States have dropped a full 3 per cent while interest rates in Canada have dropped barely one per cent. Our interest rates are now over 4 per cent above American rates. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan):

S.O. 43

That this House direct the Bank of Canada to cease interfering in the money markets and allow our interest rates to fall in accordance with American interest rates so our businesses can enjoy the same interest costs as competing American businesses.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, it is noted that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have met at least three times with the heavyweights from business and labour at the same time as question period was being conducted in the House. We recognize that these meetings are important, but it is the scheduling that we question. Given that there is quite frequently a lack of presence of ministers and of the Prime Minister in the House during question period, as evidenced here today, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That meetings with business and labour leaders be held before a budget is brought in and, second, that those meetings not be held during question period as it is the time when backbenchers ask important questions of the Prime Minister and cabinet ministers, on behalf of their constituents.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PETRO-CANADA

INVESTMENT ABROAD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that Petro-Canada is providing funds for speculation in a foreign country with no guarantee of returns, when the economic situation in this country is in such dire straits, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That the government be condemned for allowing this type of expenditure by a Crown corporation when there are presently 1.5 million Canadians unemployed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

SUGGESTED COMPOSITION OF COMMITTEE TO ADVISE PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has instituted a blue ribbon committee, a stable of $500,000 a year corporate executives from Bell, CPR and Power Corporation, to help force down wage increases, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House demand the establishment of a parallel committee composed of the victims of Liberal economic policies, to include an unemployed steel worker from Cape Breton who cannot keep up with his mortgage payments, a bankrupt businessman from Saskatchewan, a retired public servant from Alberta, a dispossessed dirt farmer from Ontario, a logger from B.C. whose unemployment insurance has run out, plus a delegate from the 100,000 manufacturing workers whose jobs have disappeared forever in the last six months in the province of Quebec, and that this committee be charged with the responsibility of telling the PM what it is really like out there, and be henceforth and forever more known as Canada's black and blue ribbon committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

CONDEMNATION OF COMMITTEE DECISION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that no more witnesses will be permitted to speak to Bill C-124 before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee, effectively muzzling special interest groups, such as women's groups, which will suffer dramatically as a result of the bill, I move seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the government be condemned for making a mockery of the democratic process to which Canadian citizens are entitled and for railroading regressive legislation which directly impinges on the basic rights of workers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DEMAND THAT MINISTER TABLE UNITED STATES REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the Minister of the Environment be instructed by this House to table immediately all of the report he received some two weeks ago from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, which recommended the repopulation of the Love Canada chemical dump site, which would have grave consequences for the Niagara River and Lake Ontario, and that he be censured for hiding this serious document from the eyes of Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

NEW WATER MILL TECHNOLOGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that a new water-mill technology has been produced by a small firm in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, called Nova Energy Limited, under contracts managed by the National Research Council, and whereas this technology, known as the vertical axis water turbine, eliminates the need for dams to produce hydroelectric power, and since the construction of dams has ruined entire river systems, caused the extermination of migratory fish species, changed the weather, and flooded good farm and forest lands, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That this House express its unanimous support for the National Research Council and Nova Energy Limited in this environmental, economic and energy breakthrough, which could well make Canada a world leader in water-mill technology.

I am sure the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) would like to support this motion as well.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY RESPECTING DECISION ON ASSISTANCE FOR MAISLIN TRUCKING COMPANY

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I was told that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce were to be here today. In their absence, unfortunately, I will have to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. My question is a serious one. Has the government decided to aid Maislin Trucking? If so, is that assistance to be direct assistance, a loan guarantee, or a letter of comfort?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am thankful to the hon. member for his reference to an "unfortunate" situation. I am on the committee that is dealing with the Maislin case. No decision has yet been made.

REASONS FOR CONSIDERING ASSISTANCE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Acting Prime Minister. The government is preaching restraint and wants Canadians to go on a crusade of frugality. Can the minister give a short, simple explanation of why any consideration is being given to the Maislin situation, in view of the fact that there are a multitude of service industries across the country that are in dire straits? What incentive is there for them and their managers to try to be efficient and stay above water when it appears the government's criteria are going to be inefficiency and bankruptcy?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I already mentioned that the interest of the government in helping Maislin would be essentially the maintenance of employment in Quebec in particular, and the maintenance of a service between Canada and the United States which, in my view, is rather important in terms of the economic relationship between the two countries. Again, no decisions have yet been made. When a decision is made, favourable or unfavourable, a full explanation will be provided.

INQUIRY RESPECTING POLITICAL PRESSURE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, will the Acting Prime Minister, in his sometimes frank way, please come clean with the House of Commons and the people of Canada and admit that the real reason consideration is being given for this perversion of the ILAP program is political pressure from his political friends?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, a number of companies in Canada—I will not list them—have been helped by the Government of Canada in recent months.

Mr. Nowlan: Services industries?

Mr. Pepin: In all sectors. Therefore I do not see why my friend should conclude, before the decision is made, that it was motivated by unacceptable considerations.

AVIATION INDUSTRY

EUROPEAN AIRBUS NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST THAT SIMILAR ARRANGEMENTS BE MADE WITH BOEING CORPORATION

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I wanted to direct my questions to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In their absence I will direct them to the Acting Prime Minister. Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba have a long history of being involved in the aerospace industry. Despite the personal and corporate actions and decisions to build that industry, in the past Liberal government decisions have in fact seriously jeopardized those developments. I would ask the Acting Prime Minister, with regard to the government's involvement to the extent of $500 million in the Airbus, whether it is offering similar arrangements to Boeing in view of the fact that components for the Boeing 757 and 767 were to be made in Winnipeg as well.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the negotiations between Canada and Airbus Industrie do not mean that Canada is going to isolate itself from other negotiations with United States firms. This negotiation is part of a reassessment of Canada's position in the international air industry which is now going on. My hon. friend should not conclude that we are going to isolate ourselves from the advantages or relationships with the American aircraft industry.

With regard to Winnipeg, I think the record of the government is pretty good. A number of months ago Air Canada, for one, established a major computer facility in Winnipeg. That indicates the recognition of the government that Winnipeg is an important centre in the air industry.

• (1120)

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, I say to the Prime Minister, who has entered the Chamber, that every time Winnipeg has been promised a number of jobs, the number of jobs we have received has always been smaller than the number the government promised.

EFFECT OF AIRBUS TRANSPORTATION ON JOBS IN WINNIPEG

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the involvement with Airbus will in any way jeopardize jobs at Boeing in Winnipeg, where there are two plants. We have already lost 250 jobs. If the government gets involved in the Airbus deal, will the government ensure that the deal in no way will jeopardize jobs in the aerospace industry in Winnipeg?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the objective is indeed to create more jobs. The announcement by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in relation to the Airbus negotiations underlined the importance this deal has for the growth of the air industry in the province of Quebec. However, that again is not exclusive. I have indicated one of the things which has been done in Winnipeg by Air Canada in very recent times. The region of Winnipeg will be entitled to bid on all the contracts Canada has with the United States on the military side, for example, in this particular industry, so there is no thought of depriving Winnipeg of its advantages in terms of its capacity to produce in the air industry.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON PAYMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. A year ago there were 855,000 unemployed Canadians. Today there are over 1.3 million unemployed Canadians, attesting to the sacrifices the working people of Canada have made to the economic policies of this Liberal government. In view of the number of workers who will be on welfare over the next few months and years, is it government policy to lay the blame for economic policy failure on the workers of Canada?

In addition, is the Prime Minister deliberately transferring some of the responsibility of the federal government to the municipalities and provinces, which will have to make welfare payments to the 300,000 to 500,000 who will be on welfare over the next year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the contrary, Madam Speaker. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has been negotiating with the provinces, and even the municipalities concerned, with respect to using some of the job-creation funds provided by the budget to create jobs for these people so that they do not have to go on welfare. The whole purpose of this budgetary measure has been to create jobs to keep people off the welfare rolls.

Mr. Miller: Madam Speaker, there have been many announcements of job-creation programs. There has been speculation that hundreds of thousands of jobs would be created, but in our ridings we have not seen the fruition of those economic policies of the government.

EMPLOYMENT

CREATION OF JOBS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In April, 60,000 more people in Quebec went on welfare, bringing the total in that province alone to over 300,000. I would like the Prime Minister to outline specifically how many jobs have been created in Quebec as a result of the job-creation policies of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I would like the Prime Minister to indicate whether any of those job-creation programs are working.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is asking a statistical question when he asks how many jobs have been created. I would be happy to answer that on the order paper, but surely I do not have to recite in this House figures relating to the great many projects the federal government has facilitated in Quebec. A very recent example was the allocation of a contract to a Quebec company, Bombardier, for the building of subway cars for New York City. That will create thousands of jobs. That was brought about solely by the activities of the Minister of State for International Trade in that area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF BENEFITS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I would like to give the Prime Minister some statistics from my riding. I think many hon. members could do the same with respect to theirs. Ten thousand people in my riding are out of work. A job-creation program called the employment bridging assistance program for forestry workers was promised. We were promised 10,000 jobs in the province of British Columbia. To date in my riding 34 jobs have been created for 10,000 unemployed workers.

• (1125)

Are the Prime Minister and the government prepared to change their economic policies in order to put people back to the meaningful, productive work that is needed in Canada? Failing that, would the Prime Minister consider the 700 people in Port Alberni alone who, in the next two months, are going to be out of unemployment insurance benefits and will have to go on welfare? Will he consider extending UIC benefits for the workers who, up until now, have sacrificed their jobs, and in some cases their homes?

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the case referred to by the hon. member is a matter of concern to the Department of Employment and Immigration, and as for the agreement with British Columbia, the hon. member must be aware that an agreement has been signed with that province and that we have now reached the stage where we can start hiring workers. In fact, in the next few weeks we hope to be able to hire about 400 workers.

The Department of Employment and Immigration is, of course, looking into this situation where people are terminating their unemployment insurance benefits. The minister is aware of all aspects of the situation and hopes that the various job-creation programs announced in the June budget which will provide employment for workers terminating their unemployment insurance benefits, will remedy the situation.

AIRPORTS

STOPPAGE OF LIGHT AIRCRAFT TRAFFIC AT VANCOUVER ON JULY 1

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has he yet received from his officials any explanation for the several hour stoppage of vfr light traffic at Vancouver airport on July 1? This included light planes, helicopters and seaplanes. All traffic was stopped. Has the minister received a report on that incident?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Not yet, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: I am sorry, Madam Speaker. I did not hear whether the minister said yes or no.

Mr. Pepin: I said not yet.

REQUEST INQUIRY BE HELD INTO REASONS FOR STOPPAGE

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): I have a further question for the Minister of Transport, Madam Speaker. The current information in the Vancouver area is to the effect that this happened because air traffic controllers were not available for duty because the Department of Transport refused to pay overtime. I would ask the minister to check into this. Would he also be prepared to tell the House within the next few days whether this incident has been repeated, and if there are difficulties with respect to payments which could cause severe difficulties in the airport area?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it indicates how well controlled the department is, that it does not have the money to spend in a casual fashion on overtime. My department is very tightly held at this time. I understand however—

An hon. Member: What about the Airbus?

Mr. Pepin: It is an indication that there is control on government expenditures.

An hon. Member: What about the Airbus?

Mr. Pepin: My friends on the other side ask for greater control on government expenditures every day, and they should be delighted to witness a demonstration of that fact. Be that as it may, as a general proposition—and I am not familiar with the Vancouver situation—money has been found for overtime and the events which took place in Vancouver should not be repeated.

BANKS AND BANKING

INQUIRY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF TRUST COMPANIES LEGISLATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance responsible for financial institutions. He will recall that less than two years ago, when the finance committee was discussing the Bank Act, he talked a great deal about a new trust companies act that was just down the road. Despite a number of inquiries in the interval we have not seen a line with regard to the trust company proposals. I think it is high time that the minister offered a reply in that connection. What are the plans with regard to the trust companies? Are they still going to be in the limbo of never-never?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his question. Many people with an interest in the trust company sector share the hon. member's concern and would also like to know what action the government intends to take with respect to revising the statutes governing these financial institutions.

I am happy to inform the hon. member that within the next few days, I shall be making public three documents, including draft legislation, a working paper that will define the concepts underlying the draft legislation, and finally, a short summary of the first two documents, the purpose being to give the parties concerned a chance to discuss these documents between now and this fall, and to enable the government to hear their views before making a final decision on its policy for revising the legislation in question.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary. Does the minister intend to lay these documents on the table of the House before the end of the month and before the summer recess , if we finish our work before the end of the month, and will we be receiving these documents or are they going to be distributed more or less at random?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I hope the House will be sitting for a few days yet so that I will have an opportunity to table these documents in the House.

CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS ACT

REQUEST THAT LEGISLATION BE RE-DRAFTED

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and relates to Bill C-10. The minister will know that with the removal of Clauses 114 through 116 of the bill, all we have managed to do is end up making a mess. Therefore, will he consider withdrawing and redrafting this legislation, taking into account the concerns of churches and other religious organizations?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, if the hon. gentleman had allowed the bill to go to committee instead of filibustering it the last time it was before the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: —indeed, appropriate amendments could have been entertained in committee to clarify the situation and allow the churches to be heard.

Mr. Clark: That is a falsehood.

Mr. Epp: You are about as low as they come.

Mr. Ouellet: Unfortunately, the hon. member took a course which prevented us from presenting appropriate amendments.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister knows that one speaker hardly constitutes a filibuster, and I happened to be the first one.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, the minister knows he has already made commitments to universities to change the bill, and he has made commitments to change the bill concerning membership lists. Why will he not do the same thing for churches and religious organizations?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I already undertook to make changes when this bill is before the committee. If the hon. member wants to help the churches, he should allow this bill to go to committee as soon as possible.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MINISTERS' MEETING WITH CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister and some cabinet colleagues met with more labour union leaders. Press reports seem to indicate that there are two positions, the government's position, and the one being advanced by the unions, namely, exchange controls, spending more money, and maybe increasing the deficit if it does not prove to be stimulative. Will the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues continue meeting with the CLC and others, or is there no possibility of reaching an agreement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, on the first part of the question the answer is yes. When we adjourned the meeting yesterday—it was an adjournment and not a breaking off—we did hope to continue discussions. We had, I think, a very important meeting yesterday because we discussed not only the economy but the economic processes quite thoroughly. The CTC recognized very explicitly that the cause of high interest rates in Canada was high interest rates in the United States. That was made very clear in the brief, and they said so very unequivocally. I know the Tory party is not very interested in what the CTC says, but I think the NDP might want to take note of that. Of course the remedy they propose is that we bring in exchange controls so that we can cut ourselves off from the U.S. in so far as the free flow of money is concerned. I think members of the House would know the great difficulties involved in embarking on exchange controls.

I must confess I found it somewhat paradoxical that the CTC would be advising exchange controls—

An hon. Member: CLC.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: —the CLC would be in favour of exchange controls, while it is opposed to price and wage controls.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

INTERAGENCY REPORT ON LOVE CANAL HEALTH HAZARDS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As he knows, or should know, there are increasing levels of dioxin, the most powerful poison known to modern science, leaking into the Great Lakes, particularly Lake Ontario which is the water supply for seven million Canadians and Americans. Right now the Government of Canada is hiding an interagency report in which nine out of the 11 scientists involved confirm that the Love Canal is not safe, thereby creating a serious health hazard for Canadians.

Will the Prime Minister personally look into the reason why the Government of Canada is hiding that report and has done nothing to date to inform Canadians of the position taken by those scientists, and will he endeavour to report back to the House next week on what he finds out about that report?

Mr. Jim Schroder (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, the Minister of the Environment and the Prime Minister view the pollution of the Niagara River and the Great Lakes as a top priority matter, and have voiced their concern to the U.S. in the strongest possible terms. Officials of the minister's department are now looking at this report and in due course we will report to the House.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER MAKE REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Assemblyman Hinchey, Chairman of the New York State Environment and Conservation Committee, is in the Speaker's gallery today, and he informs me that the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the Reagan administration are clearly conspiring, along with Environment Canada, to cover up the health dangers of the Love Canal to both Canadians and Americans.

Will the Prime Minister send a diplomatic note to President Reagan informing him that continued inaction on the Love Canal is at the very least in contravention of the 1978 Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if I understand correctly, the U.S. official who is in the gallery today is accusing Canada and the U.S. of conspiring to cover up. Perhaps I could have him meet with some of the officials of the Department of External Affairs or of the Department of the Environment, because that is a very grave accusation indeed.

Oral Questions

HOUSING

PRESENTATION OF CHEQUE TO HOME BUYER IN EDMONTON

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works, who has been conducting a public relations campaign throughout Canada in regard to the Canadian ownership stimulation plan. He was in Edmonton on Wednesday and presented a cheque for $3,000 to an applicant. Can he indicate to the House what procedure was followed in the selection of this applicant, and did this applicant go through the routine procedure which all other applicants will have to follow when applying for this funding?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. Indeed, I have had the opportunity this week of meeting with five provincial ministers of housing. In addition to speaking about the co-ordination of federal and provincial plans, I took the occasion to highlight the availability of this new plan to young Canadians looking to buy a house for the first time, or to anyone buying a new home, by asking for the opportunity of presenting an actual cheque where the authority has just recently been given to local CMHC offices. I can assure the hon. member that the applicants—there were three presentations, one in Ontario, one in Alberta, and one in British Columbia—applied as did any other applicant, but I would hasten to say that I have learned in the last few days that there have been over 30,000 requests to CMHC offices from coast to coast for this plan. We asked people at random who were close to the city I was visiting for their permission to present cheques to them. They were willing participants, and I indicated that all other people would receive the same treatment.

Mr. Elzinga: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the minister's assurance that this applicant followed the required routine procedure. But it is interesting to note that on Wednesday, when we contacted CMHC in Edmonton, officials there indicated they did not have any application forms, that they had not had any, and would not have any until today or next week at the very earliest. It is obvious that the minister's assurance is not worth very much because the routine procedure was not followed in this case.

PROVISION OF APPLICATION FORMS

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, can the minister assure the House that these application forms will be in CMHC offices across Canada so that all Canadians can apply for grants, not just his Liberal friends?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, of the 30,000 Canadians applying to CMHC offices across Canada, I hope they are all my friends.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Is that a criterion? What a blatant admission of patronage.

Mr. Cosgrove: I do not know what their political affiliation is and I would like to assure the hon. member that political affiliation had no bearing. My recollection is that those who received cheques were employed by some provincial agencies, and they are not Liberal governments. I am confident, by assisting offices and by giving publicity to the grant program, obviously more pressure will be on CMHC to respond as quickly as possible to those 30,000 Canadians. I can assure the hon. gentleman that my intention was to assist CMHC and the proper administration to have them respond as quickly as possible.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION RENT INCREASES—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT APPLY SIX PER CENT GUIDELINE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, could the minister responsible for housing advise the House what the position is with regard to CMHC rent increases? For example, according to today's Montreal Gazette, CMHC increased rents on 1,700 units in the city of Montreal as of July 1 by 19.2 per cent. Does the government intend to force CMHC to roll back these post-budget increases and force CMHC to hold the line within the 6-5 guideline?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I would draw the hon. members's attention to a news release of the President of the Treasury Board dated July 20, in which the position of the government and all agencies under federal jurisdiction is set out. I would assure the hon. member that any agency or department under my responsibility as minister will comply with government policy. I met with CMHC officials this morning and brought this to their attention. I received their assurance that the government policy will be complied with.

DISPOSITION OF VACANT UNITS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister responsible for housing a related question. The Mayor of Toronto is talking of changing the bylaws in that city to allow basement apartments. What does the minister intend to do about the 9,537 units currently held by CMHC, 5,700 of which are in his own province of Ontario? Does the minister intend to offer these to the public, or does he intend to have them stay vacant while Canada has an acute housing shortage?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, at any given time Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has approximately 20,000 units for disposition under the mortgage insurance fund. At any given time in any province, in any city, the corporation is faced with the practical decision of attempting to sell or rent during that interim period. I am not familiar with the particular case to which the hon. member has referred, but I can say generally that is a judgment exercised by local officials in local areas. The objective is to recoup the funds from the sale of the property, and if the market is not advantageous then, in the interim, they rent those properties.

PLIGHT OF UNEMPLOYED HOME OWNERS IN MEETING MORTGAGE PAYMENTS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for housing. It seems that many of the problems, in fact, perhaps the majority of them, that come to our attention these days are centred around housing. The minister has a study that shows in April of this year 22,000 home owners defaulted on mortgage payments. That is an increase of 32 per cent over April last year. The primary reason is not interest rates as much as it is unemployment.

Given that none of the programs the minister has in place in any way address themselves to the difficulties in which people find themselves when they are unemployed and cannot meet their commitment to their mortgage, and in the hope that unemployment is a temporary thing, is there any program which the minister can offer to those people to tide them over or help bridge this temporary problem with which they are faced, that will enable them to keep their family home and in some way enable them to make up their payments?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Madam Speaker, I would draw the hon. member's attention to the change made in the budget of June 28 which addresses specifically the question of the ability of home owners on renewing their mortgages to meet increased payments as a result of increased interest rates on renewals. I would remind the hon. member that the change in the interest deferral plan is one that now permits any family renewing a mortgage, which is 30 per cent above the family income, to a grant of up to $3,000 to assist in that situation.

I would quarrel with the hon. member when he says in his introduction that none of the initiatives of the government through housing address the question of job-creation.

Mr. Deans: I did not say that.

Mr. Cosgrove: On the contrary, the $400 million newly instituted through this budget toward housing specifically addresses job-creation because that will result from the stimulus provided by these programs and will get housing going.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, would it be possible for the House of Commons to have a hearing program established so that the minister might avail himself of it and improve his ability to hear? I did not say there were no programs to create jobs. I said there were no programs to help those people who are not at the point of renewing their mortgages but are unemployed as a result of government programs, government initiatives—the general economic conditions, if you will.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ASSIST UNEMPLOYED HOME OWNERS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, again let me address a question to the minister responsible for housing. What about the people not now at the stage of renewing their mortgage who are unemployed, who are out of unemployment insurance benefits, who have to go on welfare and cannot meet their housing payments and are losing their homes? Is there not some way, and could we not find and develop a program to assist those people during this period of economic downturn so they will not lose their homes and therefore will be able to provide decent shelter for themselves and their families?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I did, indeed, hear. I listened very carefully and understood the question of the hon. member. In fact I am encouraged about his concern for employment. I have said many, many times that I wished that he and his party had demonstrated that concern about employment when, in November, for example, $350 million was directed toward a job-employment program to create rental accommodation in this country—

Mr. Deans: What the hell has that got to do with the question, you nitwit?

Mr. Cosgrove: —to provide rental accommodation to people who are the neediest in this country, and to give 180,000 Canadians jobs.

Mr. Deans: You don't understand that people are losing their homes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

THE TRILATERAL COMMISSION—ROLE AND FUNCTION

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Trilateral Commission, to the best of my knowledge, is an organization consisting of representatives from North America, Europe and Japan. The Canadian membership includes some current parliamentarians, some ex-parliamentarians, other government officials, and corporate executives. Such an organization, by virtue of its secrecy, the selected nature of its membership and its potential influence on government, incurs suspicion as to its aims and motives. Could the minister inform the House of his assessment of the role of this international body, The Trilateral Commission.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, The Trilateral Commission is indeed a private association, but it is one dedicated to bringing together North America, including both Canada and the United States, Japan, and the European community. The Government of Canada has sufficient confidence in its activities and in its intentions that we have made small grants to it over the years to facilitate its functioning. From time to time also members of the government have been prepared to consult with them. I would certainly want to dissipate any suggestion that there is anything unwholesome about the organization. I believe it to be public-spirited. Nevertheless it remains a private organization which establishes its own priorities and its own functioning.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY INTO WESTBANK RESERVE CASE—QUERY RESPECTING LEGAL CONSULTATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice will recall that the other day I asked him whether he or his department had been consulted regarding the decision of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to reject the unanimous recommendation of a committee of the House that there be a public inquiry into the Westbank Indian Reserve question. He will recall that the minister rejected a public inquiry and opted instead for a secret, private inquiry. The Minister of Justice will have had the time to consult with his officials. Was he consulted, or were his legal officers consulted before that decision was taken?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have looked into the question, and it was an administrative decision made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, so there was no need for him to consult with officials of the Department of Justice.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INQUIRY INTO CONSOLIDATED COMPUTERS CASE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question concerns another inquiry or an area in which the Department of Justice acted. The Department of Justice conducted an inquiry into the question of the Canadian people losing $125 million in the Consolidated Computers case. Will the Minister of Justice tell us whether that inquiry looked exclusively into the question of legal culpability?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have given some written answers to the hon. member from Nova Scotia who was working on this file; I have written to him. We have looked into whether there was some criminal problem in this operation, and there was not. We had to ensure that we had the most objective answer possible, so we went outside to get counsel to look into the matter. He made a report on the matter, and I informed the hon. member who asked me the question about it. The Department of Justice has done its work.

Mr. Clark: Since the minister referred to an inquiry into a criminal matter, I take it they looked only into the question of legal culpability.

INDUSTRIAL AND LABOUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

IDENTITY OF INDIVIDUAL ASSESSING APPLICATIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, may I ask the minister responsible for ILAP in the House, at least in so far as it relates to Windsor, whether Mr. John Macdonald Brown is involved in judging ILAP applications and, if so, is this the same John Macdonald Brown who was assigned to ensure that the Consolidated Computers question, on which Canada lost $125 million, would be conducted in an economically viable way? Is this the same man? Is this the person judging ILAP grants? If so, why?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, if I am not mistaken the individual in question is a member of the Enterprise Development Board. He is one of a number of private sector businessmen and officials who carry out the work of the Board.

Mr. Clark: This gentleman has a $125 million track record; that is what he has cost the people of Canada so far.

QUERY RESPECTING MANAGEMENT ABILITIES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, will the minister responsible for ILAP in Windsor tell us whether there has been any inquiry into the management capacity or other capacities of either Mr. Brown or others who were involved in the Consolidated Computers question or—

Mr. Peterson: Don't answer the question, Herb.

Mr. Fisher: You had your chance to stop it. Herb knew how to stop it.

Mr. Clark: —was the report which has been commissioned by the Department of Justice and is being kept secret from Parliament exclusively into legal culpability, and the question of the management ability of the people who lost Canada $125 million was not investigated at all?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the results of inquiries into the Consolidated Computers situation are being taken into account and worked on in the reorganization of various departments. In any event, as has been said before in the House, the situation is one which built up over a period of more than ten years. There was also a series of decisions over a period of ten years. It was a situation which my hon. friend ignored for over nine months, and which this government and I cleaned up.

Mr. Clark: That is a falsehood.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR APPLICATION OF RESTRAINT PROGRAM TO RENTAL POLICY

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. It concerns the National Capital Commission. Perhaps he knows that Local 70125 of the Public Service Alliance of Canada leases an office in the Fraser Building on Queen Street in Ottawa. Just recently they received notification of an increase in rent of 25 per cent, on top of an increase last year of 30 per cent. In light of the minister's answer to the hon. member for St. John's East, would the minister assure the House, so that these people may be assured, that the rental policy of the NCC with respect to commercial, residential and other properties will coincide with the 6 per cent and 5 per cent policy of the government?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I have already given that assurance on two occasions in the House. As I have indicated, the policy of the government was set out in a news release of the President of the Treasury Board dated July 20. Also I have indicated that I have advised all departments and agencies reporting to me, and for which I have responsibility in the House, that they are to comply with the government's policy in this regard.

DISARMAMENT

REQUEST FOR SUPPORT FOR WORLD CAMPAIGN

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister will know that about the only positive movement which came out of the Special Session on Disarmament of the United Nations was the launching of a world disarmament campaign to which several countries have pledged financial support, including Czechoslovakia, Sweden, and Mexico. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to give financial support to such a campaign, launched as it is globally and with access to every country, not by increasing Canadian spending, but by redirecting some of the present and large domestic budget for disaramament education efforts so that Canada can give support to the world disarmament campaign?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question, especially for highlighting the importance of the world disarmament campaign toward which Canada contributed so much at the UNSSOD II session that just ended. In fact the discussion was based upon a Canadian paper. I can tell my hon. friend that I hope to have an announcement concerning his most precise question within a few days.

NEGOTIATIONS ON CRUISE MISSILE TESTING

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, has the federal government yet made a final decision on granting permission for the testing of the Cruise missile in Canada? If the final decision has not yet been made, could the minister indicate to the House the time line for the process of continuing negotiations? Is it the intention of the government to lead those negotiations to a point where there will be a decision in favour of the testing of the American Cruise missile in Canada? The minister will know that that is a very controversial subject and that several surveys have been taken which show that the Canadian public is divided on the question.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, a decision on principle on this matter was reached by the Canadian government last year, that we would enter into negotiations with the United States with a view to having such testing, and also with a view to having a large agreement which covered all forms of weapons testing in Canada, between Canada and the United States. As the hon. member knows, because he was the one who raised the point, we said that we would not proceed with the negotiation of a subagreement concerning the Cruise missile specifically until after UNSSOD II was completed. In fact, not only have we not proceeded with that, the negotiations have not been completed on the over-all umbrella agreement. The negotiations are proceeding and I think it very likely, the issue of principle having been decided, that they will work out satisfactorily.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FRASER—QUESTION OF MR. HUDECKI RESPECTING TRILATERAL COMMISSION

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege is very brief. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki) raised a question with regard to The Trilateral Commission. I know that there was no intention on the part of the hon. member to cast any aspersion on any member of the House, but I am a member of The Trilateral Commission, as is my Liberal colleague, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), and as was the present head of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, Gordon Fairweather.

I rise on this question of privilege to say that I would hope that my hon. friend, when asking the question of the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), is not in any way imputing that any member of the House would belong to an international commission which was in any way a subversive or sinister organization working against the benefit of this country or the free countries in the world.

Madam Speaker: I also hope that such an imputation would not be made. I do not believe it was in that question. Otherwise, the hon. member would have considerable recourse against the hon. member if he had done such a thing.

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the sixteenth report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

[Editor's note: For above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

CONCURRENCE IN SIXTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for London West (Mr. Burghardt), that the sixteenth report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, presented earlier this day, be concurred in.

Madam Speaker: This can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House consent to the presentation of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree that the report be concurred in as read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 3,740, 4,354, 4,357, 4,358 and 4,359.

[Text]

CAST SHIPPING GROUP

Question No. 3,740—Mr. Crosby:

1. Does the Canadian National Railway extend credit to the CAST shipping group in respect of containers and other cargo transported to and from the Port of Montreal or other ports and, if so, what are the terms of the credit?

2. Are the terms extended to the group by the CNR different from the terms of credit extended to other marine transporters and, if so, what are the differences?

3. Is the group indebted to the CNR in respect to the transport of containers and other cargo and, if so, to what extent?

4. Is the group indebted to the CNR or any related company in respect of any service or other matter not involving the transportation of containers or other cargo and, if so, what are the details?

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. Yes. As of the date of the question, the terms of credit were 30 days.

2. The terms of credit referred to in part 1 were the same as those extended to other marine transporters of container traffic.

3. CAST indebtedness to the CNR for transportation services, at February 5, 1982, was $4,677,066.

4. In connection with CNR preference shareholdings in CAST, a dividend in the amount of $2,478,000 was due, but unpaid.

DND—PURCHASE OF SAILING DINGHIES

Question No. 4,354—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did the Department of National Defence place a $284,823 contract with Skene Industries Ltd. for dinghy sailing boats and, if so, how many of the boats does the department now have and how many is the department purchasing for $284,823?

2. Did the department place a $11,600 contract with Queen's University for an "overview" of Canada's northern security and, if so (a) who is conducting the study (b) on what date will the study begin and on what date will it be completed (c) will the study be available to MPs upon completion?

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. The Department of Supply and Services on behalf of the Department of National Defence awarded a $284,823 contract to Skene Industries Ltd. for the purchase of 75 sailing dinghies. The Department of National Defence currently holds 229 sailing dinghies.

2. Yes. The Department of Supply and Services on behalf of the Department of National Defence placed an $11,600 contract with Queen's University for an "overview" of Canada's northern security.

(a) The principal investigator of this study is professor Nils Orvik of the Centre of International Relations.

(b) The study was started in February, 1982, and will be completed on June 30, 1982.

(c) The study will be available to Members of Parliament who express an interest in receiving it.

DND—CONTRACT WITH BARRODALE COMPUTING SERVICES LTD.

Question No. 4,357—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence award a $5,250 contract to Barrodale Computing Services Limited to investigate L1 norm linear prediction methods for discovering sub quantum jumps in squid gradiometer data and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes. The Department of Supply and Services on behalf of the Department of National Defence awarded a $5,250 contract to Barrodale Computing Services Ltd. This contract is for research leading to the development of improved magnetic sensors for Canadian Forces anti-submarine aircraft.

DND—CONTRACT WITH HUMANOID SYSTEMS

Question No. 4,358—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence award a $12,100 contract to Humanoid Systems for the development and delivery of one humanoid for testing purposes and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes. The Department of Supply and Services on behalf of the Department of National Defence awarded a $12,100 contract to Humanoid Systems for the development and delivery of an anthropomorphic dummy (humanoid). The dummy is to be used in the research and development, testing and evaluation of personal protective equipment as a part of the chemical defence program.

DND—CONTRACT WITH CANADAIR LTD.

Question No. 4,359—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence award a $400,000 contract to Canadair Ltd. for "CF-5 aircraft technical investigations" and, if so (a) what kind of technical investigations will be conducted on the aircraft (b) for what purpose are the technical investigations being conducted (c) how many CF-5s does the department have (i) in storage (ii) in operational use and how old are the aircraft?

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes. The Department of Supply and Services on behalf of the Department of National Defence awarded a $400,000 contract to Canadair Ltd. for CF-5 technical investigations over a three-year period to March 31, 1985.

(a) and (b) Technical investigations are conducted whenever design and/or development modifications are considered important for greater efficiency of the aircraft and for flight safety. Current technical investigations concern modification of lubrication fittings on the nose landing gear and modification of the aircraft landing gear control units for field testing. Future investigation will be conducted towards development of a technical order for aircraft battle damage repair. The contract also provides for consultant support to accident investigation.

(c) (i) 15. (ii) 72; ten more aircraft are used for training and test purposes. The CF-5 entered service in 1968.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT (NO. 3)

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)) moved that Bill C-122, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act (No. 3), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to start the debate on second reading of Bill C-122, whose purpose is to provide a nine-month extension for the Small Businesses Loans Act. Before going any further, I would like to mention that I had a number of conversations on the subject with my colleague, the member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) and also with my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, namely the member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) and the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I know that the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), who in the past has always shown an interest in small businesses, is also interested in this bill, as he indicated yesterday when he phoned my office to inquire about some details. My colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party informed me that they agreed with the principle and the purpose of the bill, which is to provide a nine-month extension for the Small Businesses Loans Act. I hope that today, and my colleagues realize this, we shall be able to dispose of all stages of this bill, namely, second reading, Committee of the Whole and third reading, because the act has ceased to exist since June 30 of this year. This means, Mr. Speaker, that the chartered banks and other financial institutions, which during the 21 years that the legislation has been in existence have been accustomed to making loans guaranteed 80 to 100 per cent by the Government of Canada, have agreed for the past weeks to continue operating under the provisions of the former act which expired on June 30, 1982. I personally wrote to the financial institutions and chartered banks, requesting them to extend their operations, mentioning that the government intended to extend the act until the end of March 1983. If the banks and other financial institutions are to go on offering government guaranteed loans to small businesses, it is essential that this bill be passed, and I hope that with the collaboration of my colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party, we shall be able to pass this bill today.

Mr. Speaker, as the House is aware, the government has been regularly reviewing the Small Businesses Loans Act, either to provide a three-year extension or to change the maximum amount of loans admitted under the Small Businesses Loans Act. Hon. members will probably wonder, as did my colleague, the member for Mississauga South, yesterday, why only a nine-month extension? Why not three years, as usual? Mr. Speaker, there are two reasons for this. First of all, we want to administer the Small Businesses Loans Act according to the same schedule we use for the legislation on loans to fishermen and farmers. These two acts, Mr. Speaker, expire or run according to the fiscal year, that is, from April 1 to March 31, and I would like the Small Businesses Loans Act to be administered according to the same calendar, instead of from January to December. My second reason is that, as the House is aware, about two months ago I made public a study on small business financing, which contains a chapter on the Small Businesses Loans Act. I am now setting up an advisory committee, consisting of Canadian businessmen and women, to analyse this study and make recommendations by the end of this year on any additional changes to be made in the Small Businesses Loans Act and in the government's general policy on the financing of small businesses.

That is why I am asking the House today to approve this nine-month extension. I am not now in a position to propose more substantial changes, since I first want to see the recommendations the advisory committee on small businesses will be making between now and the end of this year. Bill C-122 is very straightforward Mr. Speaker, and, in fact, it contains only one paragraph. However, it is a very important piece of legislation, because it amends an act that has far-reaching consequences. Since its first passage in 1961, the impact of the Small Businesses Loans Act has been very substantial and very favourable. In 21 years, nearly 100,000 loans totalling $2.7 billion were authorized under the act. When we realize, Mr. Speaker, that the maximum loan authorized is $100,000, a maximum that has been in effect for only two years, then we can imagine the vast number of businesses that have been assisted under this program.

The main characteristic of the program consists in helping small businesses obtain loans of up to $100,000, with the support of substantial government guarantees. If a business has a gross turnover of $1.5 million or less, it is eligible for improvement or expansion loans with an 80 to 90 per cent guarantee by the Canadian government. For instance, the federal government will guarantee 80 per cent of the value of a loan that will be used to finance the purchase of fixed or movable equipment, including installation costs. If the loan is to be used for the purchase, renovation or construction of new premises or the purchase of land, this guarantee may be as high as 90 per cent and, of course, the loans must be paid back within ten years.

The interest rate applied to guaranteed loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act is also very competitive, which is why considerable use is made by small businesses of this mechanism. In fact, it is one of the attractive aspects of the act, since interest on the loans is 1 per cent above the prime rate, and unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it is very often, if not always, the case that small businesses have trouble getting loans on such favourable terms. Very often, chartered banks or financial institutions charge 2 or 3 per cent above the prime rate on loans to small businesses. Since the act has been in existence for 21 years, I am sure my colleagues are aware of the basic components of the Small Businesses Loans Act, namely, who is eligible, on what terms, what the requirements are for the guarantee, and so forth. There are some aspects of this legislation, however, which I would like to recall for hon. members, because we tend to forget them too easily.

First of all I would like to mention that most Canadian businessmen and women—and I give them credit for it—in spite of the very strong government guarantees which, as I said before, over a period of 20 years have reached up to $2.7 billion, have dutifully met their loan commitments under this act. Requests for payment or request to the government to use the guarantee provided for these loans have represented only .8 per cent of total loans since the act was passed 21 years ago. In other words, the direct cost of application of the legislation has been extremely reasonable.

The second point that I would like to make concerning the Small Businesses Loans Act is that this legislation is a perfect example of government efficiency. Indeed, the administration of the act requires a staff of only six employees, including the support staff and the manager. If we consider, Mr. Speaker, that, last year, these six people approved and administered 12,500 loans totalling $502 million, I believe that it is easy to conclude that this represents a very substantial and efficient performance. My hon. friends on both sides of the House can play a major role by ensuring that this program, which is very popular among small businesses as well as being very important, receives as much publicity as possible. To assist them in this regard, and most Members of Parliament have already used this procedure, I am glad to make available to them and to send on request brochures and pamphlets that explain how to use the program, and I know that most members have made an effort to use this material to inform the business community in their constituencies about this program which gives them relatively easy access to capital because of the government guarantee.

I would also like to say that it is important to pass this legislation immediately because, in addition to the 4 per cent reduction of interest rates announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his budget of June 28, chartered banks, financial institutions, credit unions and Caisses populaires will be able to use the loan guarantee mechanism up to an amount of $100,000 under the Small Businesses Loans Act on the loans they provide and to which the 4 per cent reduction in interest rates will apply. I therefore believe that a combination of these two programs will allow more businesses to go ahead with their plans to invest, modernize their businesses, purchase new equipment, and so on, and I am convinced that all of this will lead to the economic recovery which we all wish for.

I know that by giving approval to this bill, my colleagues will support a very popular piece of legislation which will extend the application of the act, and I can assure all hon. members that the small business sector will continue to make a wider use of this legislation and to benefit from its provisions. I therefore believe that today we have an opportunity, which happens perhaps too rarely in the House of Commons, for all parties to come to an agreement and legislate quickly and efficiently to assist the business community, which is truly the backbone of the Canadian economy. This is why I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will approve this bill quickly, and I would like to thank in advance my colleagues of the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party for their co-operation in this regard.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the minister would accept a question before I proceed with my remarks.

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blenkarn: The minister mentioned the figure of $2.7 billion in loans under this act. The figure in the December 31, 1981 report shows a total for the whole history of the act of $1.961 billion. Have there been $700 million in loans under this act since the beginning of this year?

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I do not have in front of me the annual report of the administration of the Small Businesses Loans Act. The hon. member speaks of $1.961 billion. Unfortunately I do not have the figures for the first four months of this year. The figure provided to me by my officials is the one I mentioned in my speech, $2.7 billion. I will be glad to clarify that during the course of the day.

Mr. Blenkarn: I have a further question for the minister. The minister will appreciate that there has been a mammoth increase in the use of the act, if the minister's figures are anywhere near correct, since the first of the year. Indeed, it is nearly three times more than in previous years. Second, I would point out to the minister that the act has only been effectively used since 1978. Prior to that it was used very little. Can the minister explain why all of a sudden there is such a huge interest in the act?

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, the main reason for the wider use of the act is that prior to 1978 the recommendation in the act was that the interest rate to be applied by financial institutions should be of one below prime. There was not a great enthusiasm on the part of the financial community to apply this act because of that provision.

Following consultation with representative groups of small businesses and financial institutions in 1978, the decision was made to raise the interest rate to one above prime. Since then the financial institutions have been more aggressive in promoting this program. Looking at it in retrospect, considering the utilization of the act, the small business community has profited from it over the last few years.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, this is the third amendment to the Small Businesses Loans Act in this session of Parliament. We started off with Bill C-17 which was cleaned up on June 6, 1980, followed by Bill C-84 which was cleaned up on December 16, 1981, and now we have Bill C-122 before us. Three times during this session of Parliament we have dealt with the Small Businesses Loans Act.

One begins to wonder what is wrong with a ministry which cannot get its act together. Why should the House of Commons in one session of Parliament have to deal with the Small Businesses Loans Act three times? Why could Parliament not do the job once and have it done and over with?

Bill C-122 implies that we must again deal with the Small Businesses Loans Act in this Parliament by March 31, 1983, less than eight months from now. The minister of small business is supposed to have everything in hand. It seems rather strange that he has to come to this House three times to explain that he wants to extend the act for.

The minister has given an explanation of that. Frankly, his explanation does not wash. The minister says it should be brought in line with the fiscal year end. That is no problem. He could have brought it in for the fiscal year end March 31, 1985, 1987 or whenever he wanted it. In other words, there is no problem getting it on a fiscal year end system.

The minister does not need to have the act expire at the end of this fiscal year. It could expire at the end of the fiscal year umpteen years from now. That argument is pretty shallow. The minister knows better than to produce such a shallow argument.

We come back to his concept of a blue ribbon committee. I do not know whether it will be called a little blue ribbon committee or what kind of blue ribbon committee it will be. It is another illustration by a government that refuses to trust Parliament. The minister knows that there are many members in this House who in their career prior to coming here were engaged in small business. A number of members are still heavily involved in small business. While they are not fully employed in those businesses, they certainly have an interest in them.

Throughout the communities in each of our constituencies there are a great number of small businesses. If there is one matter that Members of Parliament know more about than anything else, it is small business, both personal and in their dealings with constituents. However, we have to recruit a paid, presumably, little blue ribbon committee to advise the minister. Therefore, we cannot extend this bill beyond March 31. After all, we have to wait for this committee to report.

I say to the minister that is a pretty shabby answer. If the minister really had wanted to get Parliament and the small business community on his side, he would have taken his financing report concerning small business and directed a reference to a special task force of this House to inquire into what the Government of Canada can do to expedite small business financing. Instead, we wind up with one little bill after another which is really an extension of the same bill with some little alteration. We wind up with a little blue ribbon committee rather than the opportunity to have Parliament get down to brass tacks and see what can be done with regard to small business financing.

There is really no excuse for this. The government has an obligation to use the resources of Parliament. Patronage-oriented committees to advise the minister so that he can stay far away from Members of Parliament and bring in to the House a fait accompli to be rubber-stamped is the wrong way to go.

If the minister wanted to reorganize small business financing, he could have arranged with his colleague the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) to direct the appointment of a special task force to inquire into proposals with respect to small business financing and make recommendations. There is expertise in this House in terms of small business financing. That was an opportunity for this minister to show that Parliament can be trusted.

As I pointed out to the minister in my questions before commencing my remarks, there has been a great use of the Small Businesses Loans Act, starting in 1978 and continuing on through. There has been an exponential growth in the use of this act by small business. One begins to wonder about that because in some senses this bill should not be called the Small Businesses Loans Act. It should be called the small business guarantee act for bankers, because that is what it does.

I noticed the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) smiling when he heard the explanation of the minister as to why the sudden explosion in the use of the Small Businesses Loans Act because of the fact the banks can now charge 1 per cent above prime and get a government guarantee. It is good to get 1 per cent over prime and still get government backing for a loan. That is a pretty good deal for a bank.

I think we should all be concerned about to what extent the Government of Canada will give the credit of the people of Canada to a bank to allow it to charge 1 per cent above prime and somehow say that this is small businesses loans legislation and not what it really is, "bankers' guarantee legislation." In that sense these bills are really hokum because they claim to do something they really do not do at all. Loans are not being made by the government to small businesses in this situation. This is an arrangement whereby the Government of Canada is allowed to guarantee bank loans to small businesses up to $100,000. When we look at it in that sense, we begin to ask ourselves why the government did not trust Parliament and have a task force study the issue. There is really no answer to that. The government does not have its act together concerning small business at all.

The minister mentioned the provisions in the budget which provide for reducing interest rates on certain small business loans by 4 per cent, but that is not before the House. What I would like to be told by the minister or some government spokesman is why those budgetary provisions for relatively low interest abatement for small business are not before the house. This House is likely to adjourn, and some people say the House will not be reconstituted, perhaps, until some time approaching Thanksgiving. We have a promise in the budget respecting interest abatement or interest rebates for small business, but those rebates cannot be made until legislation is passed. Yet we are spending this afternoon debating a bankers' guarantee bill and not really doing anything for small business other than extending this guarantee bill. Why are we extending it only until March 31? The minister gave us a hokum explanation.

There has been very little lost under the Small Businesses Loans Act. Indeed, the lost ratio is less than the lost ratio the banks have suffered on their regular loan portfolios. One begins to wonder, then, why there is a government guarantee on those loans. Why do we need government guarantees when the loan loss performance is better than the regular loan loss performance of banks on regular, ordinary, every day loans in their general portfolios? I would have thought the minister or some representative of the government would be able to give us that rationale this afternoon. It is the kind of rationale a task force of this House would want. It is the kind of thing I would have thought would come from the minister. We have had an inquiry into bank profits. We are likely to be tabling a report in a very short time, and that report will indicate the loan losses by our chartered banks. The loan losses under this legislation are smaller than the regular loan losses determined by that committee.

The best thing we have ever had for small business was the proposal developed by my party under the leadership of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) when he was minister of finance. He prepared and organized something called a Small Business Development Bond. Hon. members will recall that the government accepted the idea in April of 1980. It fooled around with the idea. It said it would never allow it to be implemented. We on this side of the House conducted a bit of a filibuster and forced the minister finally to get some clout in cabinet and to have that Small Business Development Bond program instituted. It ran until December 31, 1981. During the period under that proposal small businesses were able to borrow money at roughly half prime plus 2 per cent. The cash flow costs of loans under that program were 9 per cent or 10 per cent. Small businesses in the country borrowed capital funds amounting to over $2 billion over a nine-month period.

That program worked well. It was a dramatic help to small business. Unfortunately, that program went by the boards. The government's program of 4 per cent interest abatement is just so much air because the government has not enough intestinal honesty or fairness to introduce a bill which indicates where that type of program is going. Nothing will happen. No banks will make any loans. No banks made any loans under the Small Business Development Bond until we as a party on this side of the House forced the matter into the Income Tax Act in specific detail. No bank will lend under the government's 4 per cent-off interest proposal until the details of the proposal are forced into law in an accurate way so that they can be understood.

There seems to be a pattern with this government with respect to small business. The government produces a bill and says, "Yes, we passed another bill for small business, the Small Businesses Loans Act extension; aren't we wonderful fellows?" The minister can put out press releases on this every six, eight, nine or ten months and he can put out press releases on measures taken in the budget, but he has never done anything. This bill is nothing new and really does nothing. It is hokum. We are prepared to let it go through this afternoon, but at the same time we expect some explanation from the government. We expect an explanation from the minister as to where we are going better than the explanation he has given us so far.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling).

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I also rise on a point of order, if I may.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I had not seen the hon. member sit down. I had not expected him to sit down so quickly. I wonder if he might entertain a question.

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might prevail upon my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling). I was sitting behind my normal seat. I have an appointment at two o'clock which will keep me out of the House, and I wonder if the hon. member might consider allowing me the opportunity to speak for 15 minutes before one o'clock. I ask for his good grace in this regard. I recognize he does not have to.

• (1240)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Burlington concurs. The hon. member for Montreal-Laurier (Mr. Berger) also rises to ask a question.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question pertaining to the comments made by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). He asked why the government gave a guarantee when loan loss experience is less than regular loan loss. I wonder if he was not comparing apples and oranges. Was he talking about loans of the same size? I wonder if the regular loan loss experience figures that he has might pertain to loans of several hundred thousand dollars, whereas under this bill we are talking of loans of up to $100,000.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will have an opportunity to make a speech.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I was comparing the loan losses that have taken place under this act with average loan losses on every loan the bank has, including these. These loan losses are less than the average loan losses of the bank. Whether those loans are $1 million or $10 billion or foreign loans does not matter. The loan losses here are less than the loan losses that banks generally have. That has been the experience over the term of the act.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) for allowing me this opportunity to speak. I have a commitment that requires me to leave. I will be back, of course, but I wanted to say a word or two on this bill on behalf of my colleagues. I do not intend to take too long.

The hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) went into the detail of a number of different pieces of legislation that may in one way or another assist small business. Without any disrespect for what he was saying, I thought that in terms of the over-all programs of the government as they apply to small business, we tend to deal with things in a very piecemeal fashion. There are numerous temporary measures available but these do not instil confidence and are not as well used, in normal circumstances, as they should be. They do not provide the service and the benefit that they are intended to provide. This is mainly because the people who take advantage of the reduced interest rates available through the Small Businesses Loans Act or the financial institutions that make the money available are never absolutely sure whether the legislation will be changed or terminated. It is therefore a little difficult for the lender or borrower to take advantage of the legislation in planning the expansion of business.

Someone may think that they would like to expand their business but are not yet to ready to proceed because there is still planning to be done, such as analyses of markets, a review of available machinery, possible change of location and the time it takes to formulate and execute an over-all plan. All of this may take longer than is allowed by the termination date in the bill. They are therefore unable to do much financial planning although that may well be the key element of any expansion. They may decide that business opportunities justify an increase in capacity but they are not yet sure how to make the changes and whether in the short run that increase would be sufficient to pay the cost of the borrowing. If their calculations are made on the basis of the money available under the Small Businesses Loans Act, that means they must go ahead with their plans before the end of March next year. In some cases they may not be able to do this.

I wonder why the minister did not simply extend the bill without a termination date. I heard his explanation that a committee was being set up, but that committee need not interfere with the termination date. The bill could have been extended for an indeterminate period of time. People could then plan and it would give some stability to their planning to know that the money is likely to be available if, as and when they are ready to take advantage of it. This would be of more benefit to them and perhaps the legislation would then be used more widely.

I am always concerned that we may expect people to rush into things. With the present termination date the small business person may feel it necessary to make decisions more quickly than his business justifies. The sensible decision may well be not to expand, if they are not sure that the moneys will be available. That kind of decision will cost us job opportunities and economic development.

I suggest to the minister that he give serious thought to going ahead with the committee to study the problems of small business—although I think these are self-evident—and that he extend the terms of the act without including a termination date. This would allow the business community to feel secure in the knowledge that it would be able to avail itself of the capital that is required when it has had an opportunity to review plans.

We support the change, Mr. Speaker. We hope that it will provide benefits. There would have been no benefit if we had not provided for an extension because the bill had already run out.

I have a varied background, Mr. Speaker, and over the years I have owned two small businesses, either in partnership or outright. Both of them made money. I sold one and gave one away. The problem that very small businesses have at the moment is not that of expansion but of being able to use their productive capacity. The bill will not help in that regard.

The problem with the majority of small businesses is that they are unable to find a market for their product. There is an ever diminishing marketplace for a number of reasons, partly because of the general economic downturn which has resulted in fairly substantial numbers of people becoming unemployed, and partly because of very high interest rates at the consumer level, which range upwards of 22 per cent. If someone is buying on credit they may pay as much as 27 or 28 per cent interest. The difficulty facing the small business person is that the consumer marketplace is small. The cost of the product manufactured or sold increases, the cost of carrying the inventory is going up as a result of interest rates, and the number of people available to purchase the product is going down. Fewer people feel confident enough to spend the money that they have or to assume the additional liability of a major purchase.

I suggest to the minister that, notwithstanding the best intentions on the bill or the fact that I think it has general support in the House, it does not really begin to address the major problems of small business. I am sure that in the ridings of every member of this House—I know it is true in those of the New Democratic Party—every day there are announcements of businesses that are going bankrupt or simply closing their doors, and this does not help. Other than in a few isolated instances it is very difficult to find a great deal of initiative being shown by people in the small business sector towards expansion of their business. After all, who is going to expand their business if their customers are not in a position to buy? I suggest to the minister responsible for small business that he devote not only time to finding ways to help those who require financial assistance to expand, but that he put some conscious effort into finding ways to stimulate the consumer marketplace.

Look at what has happened to the country since we last dealt with this bill. The level of unemployment has gone from 800,000 or 900,000 to in excess of 1.5 million, almost double. Of course, that has impacted most heavily on the small business community. Tens of thousands of people are not eligible for unemployment insurance because they have been unemployed for longer than the act will allow payment to be made. They have had an income reduction so dramatic that they are unable to make purchases, and that impacts primarily on the small business community. To turn a blind eye to that problem is to turn a blind eye to the most serious of all of the problems confronting small business.

I am dismayed when I look at the government's over-all strategy—it is no secret that I disagree with the strategy—because the government has determined, for whatever reason, that it is appropriate to reduce the purchasing power of Canadians even further and restrict their incomes even more. If a person's wage level today is such that he is unable to purchase the things being manufactured, and therefore more and more people are laid off and more and more small businesses are unable to continue in operation, if that is the situation today—and I think it is without question—how will restricting their incomes even further improve things? If you restrict their incomes by legislation or otherwise so that they will have less, how will that improve the situation?

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the minister, that I really do think we in this House are dealing more with the symptoms that we are with the results. We are not dealing with the major issue, but we will support the bill because if it can be of some assistance then, of course, we should. But we in this House have to find a way to deal with the real problems of small business.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the real problems are directly the result of the government's over-all economic policy. It is not a matter of whether or not we should have a Small Businesses Loans Act or a small business development bond. We should have those things, but by themselves they are cosmetic. We must confront the fundamental problem and we will not do that by going home for the summer, much though I think everyone here deserves to do that. But we will not be able to confront the problem by being away until October. I am not preaching for another session, believe me, but I am saying that when I look at this legislation and consider the impact it will have, and when I look at the over-all government economic policy and I consider that it will in itself destroy much of what this is intended to help solve, then I have to think the government is wrongheaded and does not understand. Or, if it does understand, then for some reason which escapes me it has chosen to disregard the current economic difficulties of this country which are—well, I was going to say almost the government's sole responsibility, but I think that is unfair. Certainly there is an impact from what happens outside the country, but the problems are such that, at least in part, it is within the ability of the government to find a solution.

The government has a number of options open to it which could help stimulate the consumer end of the marketplace. By so doing it would make it possible for small business people to generate the revenue necessary to continue to provide the goods and services they can and should be providing.

So while it is clear we support this bill, we do so only because it is one of a number of measures which may be of some marginal assistance. But the over-all problem cannot be solved in this piecemeal way, with a cosmetic effort. The over-all problem rests squarely in the lap of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and I suggest to the minister responsible for small business that it is to the Minister of Finance that he must make his earnest plea. This country and its businesses cannot survive unless we are prepared to change the economic direction the country is taking.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There was a suggestion by the minister that the motion be amended to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Blenkarn: Agreed, after we have finished our speakers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Fine. I just thought this would be a convenient time to put the motion, and the debate can continue on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole rather than on the present motion before us.

Therefore, the motion is amended as follows: Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix), seconded by Mr. Pepin, moves that Bill C-122, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be now read a second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p. m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2:00 p.m.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words on Bill C-122 which will amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. It does so by extending the termination date for loans to be guaranteed from June 30, 1982 to March 31, 1983. The fact that this bill was brought in today, July 23, approximately 23 days after the guarantee of the government for loans has expired, is an indication, at least to me, that the government really does not have too much concern for the small business community. I say that with no reflection on the minister. I believe the minister is an honest person and that he tries to do the very best he can for the small business community under the conditions under which he has to labour.

Let me return to comments made by some other members regarding the rate that small-business men have to pay for the loans they get under the Small Businesses Loans Act. Initially the rate was set by statute. The rate set was below the lowest rate which the banks had for their best accounts. Consequently, hardly anyone could get a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act. In fact, the whole thing used to be quite a joke. We used to ask the minister of finance, who was John Tunrer at the time, "What are we going to do about the Small Businesses Loans Act?" Small businessmen used to go into their banks only to be told that they, the banks, had never heard of the Small Businesses Loans Act. If they were not told that, the bank officials would say that they had to get a hold of head office because they did not know anything about the act at the branch.

The minister of finance would tell us that he was having lunch with the chairman of the Canadian Bankers' Association and that he would mention the problem. I can just imagine the difficulty of small business people getting loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act being discussed between the shrimp cocktail and the double martini. That was just a lot of nonsense. We would ask the minister again and we would hear him ask for the name of the bank and the branch and that he would look into it. At that point we began to flood him with names of branches that were befuddling their customers.

Finally, the criteria for establishing the interest rate were changed and the act was amended. It was decided to take a selection of government bonds and to have the rate equal to the average yield of those bonds. It was rather a complicated formula, but the bottom fell out of the bond market and the rate was lower than ever. The banks complained that it was their money that was being lent and there was no way they would be lending at 1 per cent or 2 per cent below what they gave to their best accounts. The situation fuddled-duddled on for a number of years. Finally, the act was amended and we saw a sudden upsurge of loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act in 1978. That is just a little of the background to the Small Businesses Loans Act, but that game playing has gone on for at least ten or 12 years. In those days the only people who got a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act were the best customers of the bank.

I recall visiting with a small retailer who was well financed, long established and did not need money under the Small Businesses Loans Act. He told me that he had just got a loan under the act. He was very happy, but he was surprised to get it. At the time bank managers were giving out these loans as a kind of prize. The minister of finance had leaned on the banks and they decided they would give out a certain percentage of loans across the country, which goes to show a lot of game playing was going on.

I want to address myself to some other aspects of the Small Businesses Loans Act and perhaps I can make some suggestions to the minister. It is in the small business community that the beginnings of a recovery in our economy will take place. If our economy is going to recover, that is where it will start. Recovery does not commence with megaprojects. I was really astounded to hear the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) say that the government was looking into a $500 million investment in Airbus with some European manufacturers. The recovery will begin with the small business sector of the country.

It is stability of the economy that we require. If we look at it broadly, we will see that usually when the economy turns down most small-business men retain their staff because the most important thing they have is people. Of all the products they have, people are the most important. They have to compete with large enterprises for people. In order to keep their enterprises going they retain people, whether the economy goes up or down. This imparts tremendous stability on the economy of the country.

The government must recognize that there is no shortage of entrepreneurship, innovative ability or inventiveness in the country, but there is a shortage of venture capital to get things going. The Small Businesses Loans Act is too restrictive in terms of capital expenditures.

I have spoken on this matter many times before. I have suggested to the government that at least the Small Businesses Loans Act could be expanded. On March 31, or hopefully before that date, when this matter comes up again, I hope we can broaden it somewhat. For instance, I would like to see the act expanded to allow small-business men to purchase technology or patents which are already in operation. There is a lot of patent technology available for small-business men to purchase and produce in this country. Also I would like to see it arranged that a small business loan could be acquired for the registering of a patent. It is most important that some means or mechanism be found to allow them to do this.

The minister said that he was setting up a committee to study the financing of small businesses. He does not have to do that because there are enough people, as the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) said in this Parliament, such as John Bulloch's progressive organization, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and other small business organizations in the country, who have studied the matter to death. They know how to finance small business; they know what is required.

The difficulty is that the only place where small-business men can go for any kind of term financing today is the banks. They used to be able to go to professional people who had funds available to invest, but that was before the days of the capital gains tax. Now that we have a capital gains tax some of the funds are siphoned off. Today, with the government paying 19.5 per cent on Canada Savings Bonds and such, what is the percentage in taking a flyer on a small business venture or new idea? Investors can put their money into Canada Savings Bonds at 19.5 per cent. There is no risk; they can just sit back and clip coupons. Why take a chance unless there is opportunity for unusual gain?

We must find a mechanism to get money into the small business sector. We should allow innovative individuals and inventors to use the Small Businesses Loans Act to finance some of their research and development, to acquire a patent which is already in place, or to register a patent on their inventions.

Let us take a look at what is imported into the country. It is absolutely amazing. We do not have to start a buy-Canada project or to wave the flag. We should just make facilities available through adjustments in taxation, and we will be amazed at what will happen. Today the Canadian dollar is selling at quite a discount. It is a disaster to some people who are importing; it is an advantage to some people who are exporting. But there is a strategy which can be used. There are various products shipped into the country which can be had on a licensing arrangement. The easiest thing in the world is to go to someone with a product who wants to ship it into Canada. When he looks at the tariffs, the freight rates, the discount on the Canadian dollar and the laid down cost of the product in our market, he suddenly realizes that there will not be a very great sale for the product, but he wants to move into the market perhaps to take advantage of some of the worldwide advertising which would be involved.

I know this method works because I have done it myself. We should go to companies and say that we would like to make their products available in Canada under licence. We could give them the reasons and show them the numbers. But we are not doing this because the required venture capital is just not available.

I am suspicious of committees. The minister floated out the idea that the committee would be studying the financing of small businesses, their problems and so forth. I will be very surprised if anything comes of it. I think it is just a typical bureaucratic manœuvre—here is a problem, everyone is pressing on it, let us put it out to a study group. We will never hear about it again. If we hear something positive from it, I will be the first one to congratulate the minister publicly. I can almost wager that nothing will really happen; it will just be another report.

Mr. Irwin: You have been in opposition for too long.

Mr. Kempling: The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin) says that I have been in opposition too long. I have made more positive suggestions on legislation in the House of Commons than he has in the time he has been here. If he wants to look at them, they are on the record.

Mr. Pepin: Including metric.

Mr. Irwin: You are too busy talking. You do not listen.

Mr. Kempling: I knew this would happen sooner or later.

Mr. Cullen: You can handle it.

Mr. Kempling: I have broad shoulders and can handle it. I am not too concerned about it. The thing I might say about metric is that I was honest in what I said. I have never seen a more dishonest approach taken to this subject matter than the tactics which were used by the government on its introduction of metric. I do not want to talk about metric now because another bill is before the House. On another occasion I intend to lay out the comments of the Minister of Transport and of all his colleagues who misled this Parliament.

Mr. Irwin: Resign.

Mr. Kempling: Just a moment. I will not say that he was dishonest, but I will say that perhaps the thrust of the government of the day was as the minister stated and it was not the intention to make it compulsory. I think that was an honest statement. He went out and said that in all honesty, but down the line the entire game plan changed. Thus, my comments on metric were made in that atmosphere. I do not deny them; I said them. They are on the record. But I have never seen such dishonesty in the representation of those comments as I have seen in some of the letters to the editor which have been quoted broadly across the country. I realize they are using me as a sucker.

• (1420)

Having said that, I want to return to the subject or else you will call me back to it, Mr. Speaker. In 1979 I believe we had the beginnings of a solution to the problems of financing small businesses through the Small Business Development Bond. I would hope that the minister would look into that device again and urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) to introduce something similar to it once again. This is necessary because we need a source of investment capital beyond the banks. It makes no sense simply to tell small-business men to go to the bank and pay their rates. They need another source of funds either through a Small Business Development Bond or some other instrument, as has been suggested by many small business people, so that they can acquire funds through various sources where the interest on those funds is tax free. Small businesses need a device for obtaining funds at a lower rate than is available at banks.

The money is available. It is common knowledge that there is more money on deposit in the chartered banks of this country on a per capita basis than in any other country in the western world. Canadians are very good at saving their money. In times of high inflation as exists today, people are squirreling money away in large amounts. We must find a mechanism to encourage people to withdraw their savings so they can be put to use to employ people and develop services which are so vitally needed in this country.

This country will survive despite our present economic conditions and despite the mismanagement of the government opposite. Our country is too strong to fail. We still have talented people although they have been somewhat disheartened by the conditions we are in. There is no shortage, however, of people with novel ideas and those who are adventurous. I am dismayed, though, at the number of people who say that they would give up on Canada and move to the United States. I urge them to stay and fight the battle because I believe our future is unparalleled.

The engine for the recovery of the economy of Canada is the small business sector. I have talked to small business entrepreneurs and they do not want the government in their pockets or on their backs. They do not want a large bureaucracy which requires the completion of so many forms. I have told the story many times of when I sat in my business office, where I had two large stacks of paper on my desk. One stack consisted of a pile of forms from Statistics Canada. I had to decide whether I would work on that pile or go through the other papers which could possibly yield a profit on which I would pay a tax. I had to make a decision since the pile of paper from Statistics Canada was growing. Since I am a very practical person I went to the local stationery store and ordered a rubber stamp which said "Not Applicable". With the red stamp pad which I purchased I stamped the words "Not Applicable" on that stack of Statistics Canada forms. I opened a file and put my copies in it and sent the originals back to Statistics Canada without even putting a stamp on the envelope.

In due course I received a computerized letter from Statistics Canada which said "We are in receipt of form No."—whatever the number was—"which we understand is"—and they had written in the word "Not Applicable". It was signed with a scribbled signature. We simply put that letter in the file. When the next form came in I again stamped it "Not Applicable" and returned a copy of the letter. Through this process we managed to cut down our Statistics Canada paper over a 14-month period.

I am not suggesting that this is the solution to the problem. I merely give that as an example of what happened and still occurs today. If the minister wishes to form a committee to look for practical solutions, I would suggest that he set up a committee comprised of someone from the Department of National Revenue, an official from Statistics Canada, someone from the Department of Finance as well as representatives from some large accounting firms so that they can devise a simplified accounting system for the small retailer and small-business man. This system would easily allow the small entrepreneur to make use of the statistics that he desires and when he makes his annual return he can supply a form which has the statistics that Statistics Canada require. This would be a step in the right direction and would help small entrepreneurs in the operation of their businesses.

In 1979 my colleague for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) was the minister of state for small business. I will not cast judgment on the present Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) yet since he has some time to go in his job. As I say, I believe he is honest and trying to do a good job in difficult circumstances. The hon. member for Capilano who was the minister in 1979 had a clear understanding of the concept of how to run the small business ministry. I was most heartened to see his approach to small business and encouraged by his receptiveness and understanding of the ideas received from the small business community. In the short time he was in office he set it on a good, straight course.

When the hon. member for Capilano took office he found the affairs of that ministry appalling. The government had been masquerading under the title of small business ministry because it consisted of a minister, a speech writer, a public relations person, a couple of researchers and a secretary. That was the extent of the small business ministry. Obviously, when we would ask questions we would get "nothing" answers from the minister because his department was just window dressing with little substance.

In summary, there is no shortage of entrepreneurs and inventors and innovative people with ideas in this country. However, I am sorry to say that many of them are leaving to go to the United States. I have interviewed a number of these people during the years I have been in Parliament and have listened to the difficulties they have had in trying to obtain money.

For example, I spoke to an entrepreneur in 1978. He came to my office to tell me that he had a very fine mechanical elevating device used in building maintenance. He could not seem to convince anyone in the banking system to advance money to him to begin his venture, so he decided to take his model to a trade show in the United States. He found many interested people there and signed four of them as distributors while taking an order for about 15 of these devices. He returned to his local banker and said, "I have these orders. They are worth a few hundred thousand dollars". The banker said, "They are no good to us as collateral until they are accounts receivable". He would not give him any bridge financing or any funds to build the devices.

This entrepreneur then went back to his distributors in the United States to tell them what happened. Those distributors said, "Come to New York state, we will arrange to have a plant built for you". Therefore, he took this device from Canada to the United States. It is now being produced in the United States and is imported into Canada. This story happens time and time again. I am not blaming the government but I am saying that the engine is there, the ingenuity is there, the businesses are there and the ideas are there. There must be some mechanism to finance those businesses so they can begin to produce and hire people to develop and sell products.

I want to say a final word on research and development because I myself have engaged in a number of R and D projects over the years. What turns off research and development projects is not the lack of ideas, as there are many kinds of ideas, not the lack of engineering ability or anything of that type, but the lack of cash. One day one's comptroller or accountant says, "We have to pay bills and we have a payroll to meet. Now we will have to make a decision. Either you stop that gimmick that you are developing and let us use the money to pay our bills and our payroll, or we cannot continue." That is what really happens. If one knows where to look, one can see all sorts of partially completed ideas which are very good and would have a market, but they are stalled for lack of cash.

I have put this idea forward on a number of occasions and I will state it briefly again. We should allow the small business community, those who have the capacity in the field of manufacturing, to undertake research and development projects and allow them to accumulate funds which they can deduct from their tax payment. We can devise the mechanisms for it, but that money should be specifically set aside for research and development projects. When there is sufficient money, they should be able to draw on that money, just as one can with a registered retirement savings plan. There should be the same concept for research and development. If one has a pretty good idea as to what it will cost to develop somehing, one should be able to draw down the money and get the project under way, knowing that one has the cash to complete it. One should not be able to use that cash for anything other than that research and development project. There should be a linkage mechanism with the Small Businesses Loans Act so that one if one finds oneself in the position where the project is almost complete but a little more money is needed to complete it, one can complete that project and get it out into the marketplace.

That is the sort of thing which must be done and a whole bunch of government grants would not be necessary. All that is needed is to put an administrative mechanism into place to allow that to happen. Whether or not the government holds the R and D money is really beside the point; the administrative details can be worked out. But I tell hon. members that we must have some means whereby the cash is available to complete these projects; otherwise the promoters will leave Canada and go to the United States, Great Britain and to other countries. We will lose those projects and end up importing many of those great ideas back into the country.

I have spoken for about 30 minutes of the time allotted to me in this debate. I know we have agreed to pass this bill in all stages and that there are other hon. members in the House who wish to make a contribution. Therefore, I thank Your Honour for your kind attention to some of the thoughts I have put forward in a positive and not critical sense. I hope some of them have been considered and that they will be explored a little further. Like all my colleagues, I am always available to discuss them in more detail with the minister or members of his staff at any time.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if we listen to the official opposition, there seems to be no end of problems in this country. I would like to say a few words about the need for amending the Small Businesses Loans Act, since Bill C-122, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, is extremely important at this time. First, I should like to say a few words on our past experience, which has in fact been quite good for small businesses, and on the financing situation, to which the member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) was referring earlier when he said that there was a considerable problem in getting lenders to offer loans to small businesses. Well, Mr. Speaker, in 1981, although there were problems, it seems the number of lenders other than chartered banks rose from 762 to 1,286. I do not know whether that could qualify as a problem, but I think there has been a good deal of progress in this area, and since the government is guaranteeing these loans, I believe that lending institutions other than banks will become more and more numerous. I should also like to say a few words about the act's historical background, the amendments made since 1961 regarding eligibility and reasons for application, and certain results which came to light during the last financial year and which were very encouraging.

The Small Businesses Loans Act came into effect in January, 1961, and its initial purpose was to encourage private lenders to provide fixed-term loans for small businesses. The act, which provides the lender with a guarantee against all losses, was initially to be effective for three years and was subsequently renewed at regular intervals. The act now in effect actually expired on June 30 of this year, and as the minister pointed out this morning, the act was to be extended for nine months so that it would expire at the same time as the legislation on loans to farmers and fishermen.

Since 1961, many amendments have been made to the act, and I shall name a few of the more important ones. In 1974, the maximum amount of loans repayable by any borrower was raised from $25,000 to $50,000 to allow for the expansion of the small business sector, an increasingly encouraging factor which required broader credit margins. In 1977, the maximum permissible loan from any lender was raised to $75,000 and the business turnover figure was raised to $1,500,000. In January, 1978, the interest rate formula was amended to allow lenders to charge prime plus 1 per cent. In 1978, responsibility for administering the act was transferred from the Department of Finance to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In 1980, the amount of the loan offered by any lender was raised from $75,000 to $100,000. Mr. Speaker, further changes are expected, since an advisory committee has been formed to review all aspects of this legislation.

Under this legislation all Canadian chartered banks are deemed to be lending institutions. As a result of the amendments made in March, 1970, the scope of the act was enlarged to include credit unions, Caisses populaires, trust companies, insurance companies and finance companies which are eligible and apply for designation by the minister. There have been many changes and those who were eligible were people in manufacturing, wholesale trade, retail trade, service businesses, communications, construction and other fields.

Naturally, there have been changes as well in the reasons why people submit applications, and loans may now be approved for purchasing real estate or movables, improving or modernizing facilities or premises, buying or building accommodation and even acquiring land. This has been a net improvement because the act has evolved with time and, as other members pointed out earlier, it will continue to evolve and to adjust to the needs of the very important small business sector. Particularly in Quebec, people are aware that small businesses play an extremely active role in our economic development and that they create hundreds of jobs. Mr. Speaker, during that short time period, under the Small Business Loans Act, 99,500 loans have been granted so far, for a total value of roughly $2 billion. In 1981 alone, 16,942 loans were approved for a total of $501,000. I have other figures which concern Quebec more particularly.

In 1981, 5,431 loans were approved as compared with 5,188 in 1980, an increase of 4.7 per cent. Even more encouraging is the fact that those loans amounted to $124 million in 1980 and about $147 million in 1981, up 18.8 per cent. This upward trend can be explained by the fact that many more lenders invaded the market to provide assistance to small businesses, particularly since the loans were fully guaranteed by the government, and I think that additional funds will be available for small businesses. As was stated before, I think that the extension of this act and the possibility of amending it further in the future deserve special consideration, particularly in 1982. Like all hon. members, I would be pleased if Bill C-122 were to be adopted as soon as possible so that it can benefit small businesses throughout Canada.

[English]

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not being here, but the previous speaker did end rather more quickly than I was told he would.

I am delighted to speak again on small business. My colleague for Mississsauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) mentioned earlier that we have discussed this act three times during this session. I was hoping there would be an improvement this time. I must admit that when I looked at the loans made under the Small Businesses Loans Act, the majority were under $20,000. Perhaps that is adequate.

Yesterday I was supposed to speak on the closure motion regarding the borrowing authority, the second borrowing authority this year. It is interesting that the numbers are so out of line one with the other when you consider that the small business people create employment in this country, yet we have to put so much into government to keep it going. Perhaps the numbers got switched around and it should have been $11 billion for small business and $1 billion for the government. We did get it down to $7 billion for the government, so that was an accomplishment.

I am amazed at this bill. It is now July 23 and the act ran out on June 30. What is going on in the minister's department that an act would be allowed to run out before new legislation is brought into the House? It does not make sense; there is some incompetence somewhere. Somebody in that department does not care about these matters. In the future when the minister wants an extension, he should bring in a bill ahead of the fact rather than after the fact.

The minister told us today that he had conceived a new small business proposal and that there would be a nine-month gestation period. I do not know what he is going to study. Small business has been thoroughly studied by two small business organizations. Many suggestions have been made in this House of Commons, particularly by my colleague who spoke ahead of me, with regard to an over-all global program for small business. I have spoken at least four times on small business.

The problem with the small business sector of our society is that we continually talk about debt financing. When you get into debt financing at interest rates that small business has had to endure recently, it does not allow small business to expand or to be created. If a person with some savings could get a 20 per cent return by investing in a small business, that would be all right. However, why risk putting money into a small business when you can get 20 per cent from the federal government?

We must address the matter of equity financing. The former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), and I have had discussions in the past on equity financing. We both agree that there has to be equity financing. However, we have a different viewpoint as to how it should be approached. He had a good suggestion, that of bringing the FBDB into equity financing. I object to that because I am worried that it will create a new bureaucracy. Small business does not need any more red tape. However, it may be a beginning.

He suggested that it could be like the CDC where there is private as well as government participation. When it reaches a certain point, you could sell that small business development corporation and it would become a public vehicle held by a number of small investors.

We both acknowledge that we come from a different philosophical base. I would rather see this done with incentives through our tax system. I would like to see some of the incentives that were in the tax system put back in. The small-business man cannot do it with debt financing alone. The average person does not have enough money to set up a business that will sustain itself without outside financing. Where the small-business man really needs help is during the early days of formation when cash flows are not adequate to service the debt. That is the critical period I have spoken about many times.

The minister mentioned today that these loans are principally for expansion, extension of a plant or new plant equipment. I understand why the loan is so small. Not many people are thinking of expansion; they are looking for survival. Today in small business it is a question of survival. An industry cannot be expanded if it is laying off employees and its sales are down. Our problem is that we have not provided proper incentives to people to start industries. Whenever people have had marvellous ideas they take them straight down to New York state, where they receive tax incentives, free plants and tax write-offs for a number of years. That is where our small industry people are going. With the dollar at the price it is today it should be now—today—that we have great incentive programs to get small business going. Small businesses could be doing well right now. With our cheap dollar we could be replacing imports with Canadian manufactured products. These products could replace imports which cannot be sold economically.

I think we have to move a little faster than the gestation period offered by the minister. I ask that he put together a task force of members of the House of Commons. There are many members here who have run their own businesses. I am not talking just about manufacturing businesses. We have storekeepers here and we have farmers who were small-business men. Farmers make up probably the largest single group of small-business men in the country. We have expertise right here and we are not using it. That is one of the weaknesses of this Parliament. Our committee system is far too partisan, and we are not allowed to have the input which would be of benefit to the country.

Let us look at the various programs across the country. There is the SBDC in Ontario. It has not been a great success, but it has been a beginning for venture capital. Why do we not integrate that program with the programs in the other provinces into one over-all global program which would really help this country start manufacturing products rather than exporting raw materials?

I am particularly pleased that we have this type of plan. I was not altogether in favour of the Chrysler and Massey guarantees, but I have to acknowledge that they were economically sensible. They kept people employed. Rather than paying out unemployment insurance benefits, we kept people busy. In the case of Chrysler, I have said many times that if anybody could turn that company around, Lee Iacocca could. He has, and I congratulate him. I give Victor Rice an immense amount of credit for his work with Massey-Ferguson. That man looks like an old man. I thought I had aged since coming to the House of Commons, but he has aged much more in a much shorter period of time. He put his entire body and soul into the survival of Massey-Ferguson and, because that is a very important old Canadian institution, I am glad we have helped it. I think it is very important to help a major Canadian multinational, but I do not believe we are doing enough to help the small-business men of this country produce products.

The minister said he has a very small staff supervising this program. With the expertise of the banks and all the book work done by the banks, how could he justify a large staff? Perhaps all this work could be done through the banks. The banks have great financial professionals to analyse and assess. Surely the minister has as much staff as he requires for the entire program to which he is referring and which is now in its gestation period.

We increased the amount involved in this legislation from $75,000 to $100,000 on one of the last occasions we dealt with this legislation. If we increased the amount to $250,000, that would be a more realistic amount. I acknowledge that the majority of loans under this legislation are under $20,000, but with a loss factor with respect to these loans of eight-tenths of 1 per cent, we could afford to do much more.

I am afraid the minister and many of his colleagues are dreaming of economic recovery. I believe in Canada. The matter is beyond dreams; it is a matter of doing something and getting the show on the road. We do not need any more studies of small business. There have been many case studies of small businesses in Canada. The University of Western Ontario has been doing such studies for some 25 years. We do not need studies, we need action, and we need a comprehensive plan together with tax incentives put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen).

We have a serious problem in Canada. We must get savings out of people's socks and out of banks. Those savings are not producing jobs. Small business creates 66⅔ per cent of the jobs in this country, and we must provide tax incentives to encourage Canadians to invest in their own country and not in government bonds and government treasury bills.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Bill C-122, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, I think it is noteworthy that this legislation will simply extend the termination date for loans to be guaranteed under the Small Businesses Loans Act from June 30, 1982, to March 31, 1983. One has to question why this legislation has not already been passed. One must wonder about the planning of hon. members opposite. It is sloppy mismanagement not to have this legislation passed already when, in reality, the termination date has passed. I do not say this to be critical of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) because I have travelled with the minister on occasion and I commend him for the work he is attempting to do for the small business sector. Unfortunately, he is not getting the support of his colleagues in the cabinet because very little has been done for the small business sector.

I spoke about and dealt with a number of specifics when the piece of legislation referred to by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell) was before the House—that measure was to increase the amount to be made available to the small business sector—so rather than deal with a number of specifics as to how we can directly help the small business sector, what I want to do is deal with the broader situation as it exists in Canada today, because this does have a direct impact on the small business sector.

The small business sector is the greatest employer of all sectors in Canada, other than government. It is sad when we have to look to government as the largest employer in this great country, because the fact is that the small business sector has brought this country to where it is today. It has developed what we have and many of the benefits we enjoy today.

Because of the disastrous economic planning of hon. members opposite, there is rage in Canada today. There is a deep feeling of rage. In many areas it is still latent rage, but when that rage reaches a certain state, I quite frankly fear for the lives of some of the ministers opposite, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I find that frightening, and I honestly hope it will never reach the stage in Canada where individuals would attempt to take out their rage in a destructive way. However, lack of sound economic policy by the present Liberal administration is causing great damage to the lifestyles of Canadians across this great land of ours.

Last Friday I had nine appointments in my constituency office. Of those nine, eight came to my office to express their concern about what is happening in this nation because they themselves were going bankrupt. One individual had a small paint business. Another had a small trucking firm. Another person had just lost his job because the electrical company for which he had been working had gone bankrupt. What are these people to do? How are they to survive? The government is asking individuals to exercise restraint to the tune of 6 per cent next year and 5 per cent the following year. I commend it for that, but the sad part is that it is not willing to exercise the same restraint. Last year, budgetary expenditures increased by 20 per cent and the year prior to that they also increased by 20 per cent. What kind of guidance is that to offer to the Canadian people—asking them to exercise restraint when the government does not do so itself?

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in The Globe and Mail on June 26, 1982, on the theme that recovery has no chance if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I think that is appropriate at the moment when we are dealing with something that relates to the small business community. It indicates where Canada has been brought under the leadership of the Prime Minister and asks us all to consider where we are at the end of 14 years of rule. I say rule rather than government because this cabinet and the Prime Minister have not governed Canada; they have ruled Canada. They have not permitted participatory democracy. Even though our dollar has recently started to rise, it had reached its lowest level ever experienced in our history. The unemployment rate is in excess of 10 per cent.

I have always had a great deal of respect for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), Mr. Speaker, but I find it a little disconcerting to see him laughing when I am talking about individuals losing their livelihood—

Mr. Pepin: It has nothing to do with you. I was laughing at one of your colleagues.

Mr. Elzinga: According to federal estimates, our national debt will reach some $122.7 billion this fiscal year. The cost of servicing this will consume 22 per cent of all federal spending.

On November 12 the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) budgeted for a deficit of $10.5 billion, but in the June budget that deficit was announced as being close to $20 billion. Inflation is running at the rate of 11.8 per cent. The National Energy Program, coupled with the collapse of the many megaprojects, is pushing our goal of energy self-sufficiency out of sight. The National Energy Program and the Foreign Investment Review Agency have sent out clear signals to all foreign investment that it is not welcome in Canada. All we have to do is look at the cash flow difficulties we have experienced. Traditionally, on a yearly basis, we have had a cash outflow of $2 billion, but last year the outflow was in excess of $10 billion. Corporate bankruptcies have increased from under 4,000 in 1977 to a current annual rate of 12,000.

As the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell) said, the largest small business sector in the country is probably the farming sector. Last year farm failures had increased 66 per cent over the previous year. Bankruptcies are continuing at a record pace within the farming sector and in the small business sector. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs reported that 215 farmers were forced out of business by June 30, which is 60 per cent more than in the first half of last year. In fact, there were only 261 farm bankruptices in Canada during all of last year, but if present trends continue, that figure could be surpassed next month. The total net income of the farming sector will be 17 per cent less than it was in 1981.

All this is due to Liberal economic policies such as the National Energy Program launched in October 1980. That program has resulted in Canadians paying 70 cents per gallon more for gasoline and in a potential loss of some 325,000 jobs.

On November 12 the Minister of Finance stumbled into his budget which resulted in the tripling of the number of bankruptcies in the country, in record high unemployment and a record low dollar. Will the budget brought down on June 28 put forest workers back to work? Is it going to help farmers keep their land? Is it going to put the automotive workers back to work? Will megaprojects come onstream again? Will it promote exploration off the east coast? None of these things will come about as a result of the budget brought down in June and nothing that has happened in this House in the last two years has been of benefit to Canadians at all. In fact, the planning has been disastrous.

The Fraser Institute in Vancouver produced a very interesting study of taxation levels. The average Canadian family with a cash income of $22,500 paid income taxes of $3,345 in 1980. Other taxes, ranging from oil and motor vehicle taxes to amusement and property taxes, accounted for an astounding 70 per cent of the average family's total tax bill. Since 1961 the tax bill of the average Canadian family increased by 515 per cent while total family income has only increased 344 per cent. This information is contained in the report of the Fraser Institute in Vancouver.

The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) who has a number of questions on the Order Paper, has given us a clear indication of why taxes have increased. We only have to look at the horror stories of government waste. Many of my colleagues have indicated this to the Chamber in the past, but I believe some incidents bear repetition.

Between March 1, 1980, and May 31, 1981, the government paid some $3.5 million for taxi fares. The largest single bill for any government department was, perhaps appropriately, for Transport Canada whose bill was $422,000. At the current Ottawa taxi rates this would be enough to go around the world 120 times.

Mr. Pepin: I am mystified.

Mr. Elzinga: The Canadian people believe the minister is mystified. All they have to do is to look at the economic management this government has offered them in the past two years. The minister or his department spends $422,000 on taxi fares.

Mr. Pepin: In comparison to what?

• (1510)

Mr. Elzinga: What we are doing is asking the minister why it is necessary to have that expense of some $422,000 for taxi fares.

I am sorry, if the minister would like to speak, I am more than happy to relinquish my time so he might ask a question.

Mr. Pepin: Keep on.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He is just a cynic; do not pay any attention to him.

Mr. Elzinga: Another typical example of government waste occurred between March, 1980, and June, 1981, when the government spent some $16.7 million on telegrams, cables and other wireless communications. The post office itself does not trust the mail as it spent some $260,000. In fiscal 1981-82 11 government departments spent a total of $10.4 million on hospitality; food, booze and entertainment. We would like to have an accounting of that because we feel this is a prime example of government waste and we would like to see it done away with, especially during the economic difficulties facing Canadians.

We hear so often from the other side, Mr. Speaker, that we in the opposition have not offered constructive proposals. Well, it is very easy for us as Conservatives to point back to what we did in that short period of time we were in government. I just might do that later on, but I would like to deal with the report put together by this party after we held hearings across Canada over the November 12 budget.

The report, aptly entitled "They didn't ask us", made a number of recommendations based on a nationwide gathering of thought and ideas as to what we should do as a government. These recommendations are the first step torwards assuring Canadians long-term economic development, and I would like to share them with the House today.

We indicated in the report that the first point would be to restore individual and investor confidence by establishing a climate for growth, development and expansion. We indicated we should withdraw totally the November 12 budget and replace it with an economic plan which would promote job creation and development through private investment. That is exactly the opposite of what this government has done. We indicated that we should get moving on major national projects to stimulate the economy, create jobs and meet urgent national and regional needs. Point four was that we should restore harmonious federal-provincial relationships and ensure adequate federal funding of provincial health, education and other important social programs. We also wish to reform the budget process to ensure that full public discussion of significant tax changes is ensured so that individuals and companies can assess their impact and plan for their implementation.

These recommendations, Mr. Speaker, deliberately did not provide detailed plans or remedies for our economic salvation. Before we can devise specific policies and programs there must be fundamental changes in attitudes and psychology. Co-operatively, we must work together as a government and individuals to discover and implement economic solutions. We would also recognize and create an entrepreneurial culture which would permit our economic strategies to work. We must restore public trust and economic confidence. Without them we will not be able to unleash the initiative of the Canadian people themselves which is needed, as one expert who appeared before the committee put it, "to reintroduce market forces and profitability". Without this change in attitudes and psychology, we ourselves will be defeated in dealing with our economic situation.

When we were in government for that very short period of time, Mr. Speaker, we changed more than the faces of government. We changed the economic philosophy, spirit and direction of the government. This philosophy was borne out by our intention to create new wealth through the private sector and through a series of measures to reduce the deficit and build on provincial and regional strength, rather than fighting with our provincial colleagues. We wanted to develop measures to develop human resources. We adopted a six-point national economic development strategy to provide a structure and foundation for the government's support of economic advancement. Measures undertaken within the perimeters of each of these points serve to highlight the differences between what we stood for as a government and what the governing party, the Liberals, stand for.

Rather than go into any detail I just wish to mention the six areas so that they are on record. The six cornerstones of our policy are: one, an economic partnership; two, a reliance on private enterprise; three, innovation, productivity and investment; four, building on provincial and regional strength; five, economic infrastructures; and six, human resource development.

We had started to take steps in this area during the period of time we were in government, and it is interesting to note that even though we were in reality reducing government spending and the deficit, the Social Policy Planning Board of Canada indicated that our budget was the most socially progressive budget introduced in Canada in the past ten years. We were simply eliminating a great deal of government mismanagement. In addition to that, we were helping those who required help from their federal government. I am more than happy to go into specifics but I know there are a number of members who wish to participate in this debate, so I will just say that our policies reflected our deep belief in the worth of individual Canadians and their ability to develop themselves and also to develop a sound economic policy.

We in Canada enjoy many benefits, more than any other nation in the world. We have an abundance of natural resources, and on a much greater scale we have a great potential for human development, and we in this party wish to see that development occur. Even though I wish we could have served a great deal longer in government, I am thankful we had that period of time so that we could draw a comparison between what we did in government and what is being done now. All we have to do is to look at the record of the present administration to find that they have given us record government spending, record budget deficits, record high unemployment, taxation, inflation and interest rates, and that our dollar has reached a record low level. I ask members opposite: what are you doing to help the pensioner other than limiting the indexation of their pensions? In reality, you are going to reduce the income of those individuals who built this country, and some help that is. I ask the minister responsible for small business what policies he has advocated since he has had this portfolio other than gutting the Small Business Development Bond? I hope the blue ribbon committee set up by the Minister of Finance in his recent budget will come forward with some positive recommendations for this sector which needs help so badly.

We in this House, Mr. Speaker, so often find ourselves philosophically at opposite ends. I would like to share with the House my reasons for believing strongly in the individual initiative of Canadians, the so-called free-enterprise system. It cannot be denied that public opinion has been moulded into an anti-capitalist mentality. John Galbraith, who in my opinion is living proof that economics is an inexact science, has written a book called "Economics and the Public Purpose". He has researched the market arrangements of our economy and says it has given us inadequate housing, a terrible mass transit, poor health care and a host of other miseries. For the first time, to my knowledge, Mr. Galbraith comes out from behind the white cloak of liberalism and openly proclaims that the only answer to our problem is socialism.

Well, he deals in fairy tales, as do our Liberal friends opposite. This system of ours, the so-called free-enterprise system, is gradually shifting to a socialistic state under the leadership of our present Prime Minister. In the 1900s a majority of people lived below what we consider to be the poverty line; two thirds of them lived in substandard housing. Today, Mr. Speaker, the figure is less than 10 per cent. Ninety-five per cent of the people in Canada today have a daily minimum intake of nutrients essential to maintain health. Ninety-nine per cent of Canadian homes have gas or electric kitchen appliances. Ninety-six per cent of homes have TV sets. There are thousands of automobiles and trucks owned by our people, all of them on your street every day when you are in a hurry. Some people will point out that this is evidence of our materialism, but we have been the most generous of people. We have shared our wealth widely among our people, and we support with voluntary contributions various churches, libraries, symphonies, operas and non-private theatres.

If Mr. Galbraith is right, Mr. Speaker, and socialism is the answer, we do not have to theorize about it because we have a concrete example that we can look to for comparison. We can be just like that very great nation, Russia, rich in natural resources, with 250 million capable people and 60 uninterrupted years of socialism. As I say, we could be just like them; all it would require is a little bit of doing. To be like them we would have to cut our pay cheques by 75 per cent, move thousands of workers back to the farms, abandon two thirds of our steelmaking capacity, destroy thousands of TV sets, tear up miles of highway and railroad tracks, junk 19 out of 20 automobiles, knock down 70 per cent of our houses, and rip out 90 per cent of our telephones. Then all we would have to do is to find a capitalist country to sell us wheat on credit so that we would not starve.

That is why I believe in our free-enterprise system and that is why I think we who have the opportunity to serve in Parliament have to offer incentives rather than handouts to our small business sector.

Unless this government opposite comes to grips with the sad state of the economy which is affecting not only our small business sector but our pensioners and home owners, the rage which is evident in Canada is going to break out. As I indicated earlier in my remarks, that rage is going to explode. Quite frankly, it is evident when one enters the Parliament Buildings on a daily basis that the security people in the House of Commons are concerned about the explosion of that rage. One only has to see the Prime Minister entering and the increased number of security staff around him. I would hope that individuals like the Minister of Transport and the minister responsible for small business would react positively to the deep concerns evident right now throughout the population of Canada.

Mr. Jack Shield (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-122, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, really does not address the problems facing small business across Canada. All we are really doing is extending from July 1, 1980, to March 31, 1983, the Small Businesses Loans Act. Instead of bringing legislation forward in this way we should be bringing it in to assist small-business men in a genuine way. The problems facing small business today are due to government economic mismanagement, and it is forcing many businesses and farms into bankruptcy.

I think all members know full well that a farm operation is a small business in the truest sense of the word. In 1981 a record 8,055 businesses were forced to close their doors forever. Business bankruptcies in 1981 were 22 per cent higher than in 1980, and 43 per cent higher than in 1979. That should tell everyone in this House that there is something serious going on in the business community across Canada.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that the individual businessman, the small entrepreneur, the little storekeeper, the barber shop and so on, provide fully 55 per cent of all employment across the country. We become alarmed when General Motors, a very large corporation, has to lay off people. We become alarmed when a mining operation in the northern part of Canada closes down and lays off people. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the underpinning of our whole economic system is the small-business man and the farmer. Yet we can read the statistics supplied by StatsCan into the record time and time again and very little alarm is expressed. What kind of things do we hear? Well, there is a downturn in the economy. There is a problem facing the country. Well, maybe they were not good managers. Maybe they did not work hard enough. Mr. Speaker, I say to you that the small-business men with whom I am acquainted all put in a tremendous amount of effort, time and work in order to make their businesses go. You have to be impressed with the long hours those individuals spend in their businesses to try to make them successful. It might be a small corner grocery store employing four or five people, or it might be a small restaurant employing five or ten people. All of these operations contribute more to the over-all economy of the country than one of the large businesses that we hear is in the midst of a downturn and is laying off personnel. These small businesses are the ones that provide the jobs necessary for our young people to learn what it is like to work when they first start out working after school and on Saturdays. This also applies to the young lady and young man who leave school to go to work. Yet we are not alarmed at the present state of affairs. In 1981 a record 8,055 businesses were forced to close their doors forever. Business bankcruptcies were 22 per cent more numerous than in 1980, and 43 per cent more numerous than in 1979. These are alarming figures.

What do we do to assist the small-business man? What can we do to tell him that we really appreciate his having taken a gamble, putting his investment money into a business and employing five, six or seven people. We really reward the small entrepreneur. How do we do that? The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) brings in a budget that attacks the small remuneration or the perks, if you will, that a small-business man gets. For example, the small-business man, because of this budget, can no longer buy a car in the company name. He cannot put it in the name of this little grocery store, his restaurant or his hardware store because that car is now considered part of his wages. The government does not consider that a man or a woman may have to work 16 or 18 hours a day to make his business operation viable. The government does not stop to consider a team of a husband and wife who work 16 and 18 hours a day and employ three or more other people who have to remit to the government the necessary unemployment insurance deductions, the necessary pension deductions and the necessary income tax deductions. Small business people are collecting tax. They become collectors. But no, the government does not consider that. It does not consider that a businessman is now paying himself the minimum wage in order to survive because he has to pour everything back into his business. Instead, the government thinks that the small-business man might be getting away with driving a pickup truck, that he might use it to get his own mail or he might use it on a Sunday to take his wife and family on a little picnic. Because the businessman is doing that, the government has to watch what he does. The government considers that the businessman and the farmer are ripping off the country by having a tax loophole. The government fails to remember that the small-business man is drawing the minimum wage for himself and his family, on which the government taxes him. The pickup truck becomes imputed, and it is as though it is received as income. That is how we reward the initiative of the individual coming out of school who said that he wants to be independent, go into business and build something for himself. That is what this country was made of. This country was made by those who did not want to work for somebody else but who wanted to get out and do it for themselves.

The same could be said of the farmers. There are many young lads who say, "That is for me. I want to be productive. I want to grow food for the nation and for the world." But what do we do for them? We should bring in a bill that addresses the cost of fuel and fertilizer and recognizes the fact that if these people do not produce, we do not eat. The cost of farm fuels is creeping up to where it takes 40 per cent to 45 per cent of all productions costs. Do hon. members know that 40 per cent to 45 per cent of all farming costs are fuel related, either in tractor fuel, fertilizer, or pesticides? And we wonder why farmers are going bankrupt.

Let us take a look at and put some more statistics on the record. Let us go back to 1981. A record 8,055 businesses went bankrupt and closed their doors forever. That includes farms. In 1982, in the first five months alone there were 4,429 bankruptcies. Already in the first five months, there have been over half as many as for the whole of 1981. That is an increase of 36 per cent over the first five months of 1981. It is an increase of 55 per cent over the first five months of 1980. Those figures are alarming when we consider that over 55 per cent of all the jobs from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver Island to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon are created by small-business men. These are not rich businessmen but small, little fellows.

We are bringing in a bill that will help 5,000 businessmen because we are extending a loan guarantee that is controlled by the bank. The banks says they can give a loan of one per cent above prime on $100,000. The government will guarantee it. Five thousand businessmen will be helped. But that does not help them. They still have to pay above prime for the money they have to borrow, and they will float their inventory.

Why are we not bringing in legislation to extend the Small Business Development Bond which was introduced by the Conservative government, which is now reluctantly being carried forward by the present government to assist businesses going bankrupt? Why is the government not considering extending the Small Business Development Bond to an extent that would allow the small-business man to borrow at half prime plus one or two per cent? This was a tax measure, and all it did was to disallow the small-business man from claiming interest as an expense on his operation. Because the bank was lending money at half prime plus one or two per cent, depending upon the bank, that was brought in as a dividend from the small business and it was taxed at a different rate from that of the bank. We all know the problems the banks are facing today.

Surely it makes no difference to the government if this small business development bond is used for healthy and viable growth of a company. Why is it being used only for businesses on the verge of bankruptcy or with severe financial difficulties? What businessman would want to walk into a bank and say, "I would like a Small Business Development Bond application; I want to apply because I am having serious financial difficulties"? This is not what they want to do. We should have legislation before the House which makes the Small Business Development Bond available to healthy and viable companies, not a piece of legislation which means absolutely nothing. It would be an extension of a program which has been in operation for years and affects at the most 5,000 businesses across the country at any one time. Actually, in Toronto alone there would be 5,000 businesses. I just do not understand.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know the hon. member would not want to mislead the Canadian public. He referred to a figure of 5,000 businesses which had benefited from the program in the past year. The number of loans approved during the past year was 16,942. It was substantially more than 5,000.

Mr. Shields: I said that in Toronto alone there would probably be 5,000 businesses.

Mr. Fennell: Or in Montreal.

Mr. Shields: In Montreal or in Calgary, wherever. Hon. members opposite must recognize that there are more than 16,900 businesses across the country. In the fishing industry alone—and we must consider freshwater and saltwater fishermen as small-business men—there are more than 16,000 businesses. Then we could include farmers and small grocery stores. The point I am trying to make is that there has been a minimal amount of help. Bill C-122 is offering a minimal amount of help.

We should be directing help through the small business development bond. I think the hon. member would probably agree that we are not using the resources we have in the Small Business Development Bond. In fact, the Minister of Finance attacked that bond, thus kicking small-business men. I received at least 14 to 18 telephone calls from small-business men in my constituency who had applications ready for approval under the Small Business Development Bond. When the minister brought in his budget last November, he totally wiped them out, he totally killed them. They could not keep up with interest rates when they went up to 20 per cent and so on. All of them did not go under, but perhaps half of them did.

They are not using their heads in this regard. They have allowed these kinds of things to happen. I should like to refer to small business bankruptcies in the primary industry, which includes farmers. In the first five months of 1980 there were 122 bankruptcies. In the first five months of 1981 there were 183, and in the first five months of 1982 there were 266. It seems to me that in the primary sector, which includes farming and food production, there is a crisis approaching that is not being addressed. We have heard talk about an energy crisis, a currency crisis and so on, but if we lose the primary sector, we do not eat. We cannot eat oil.

Now let me turn to the statistics in terms of small business bankruptcies in the manufacturing sector. In the first five months of 1980, 239 businesses went bankrupt. In the first five months of 1981, there were 240, only one more, and in 1982 they almost doubled to 418. These statistics are alarming.

In the construction industry, 586 small businesses went bankrupt in the first five months of 1980. In the first five months of 1981, they went down by one to 585, and in the first five months of 1982, there were 685 bankruptcies. I hope hon. members find these statistics alarming.

In the first five months of 1980, 195 small businesses in transportation, communications and utilities went bankrupt. In the first five months of 1981, 202 went bankrupt, and in the first five months of 1982 there were 305 small business bankruptcies. As I say, I find these statistics alarming. We are not addressing this problem in the House. Certainly it is not being addressed by the government in Bill C-122, to extend a program which affects 16,000 businesses across the country. It will not do anything for them.

Let me turn to small businesses connected with trade. In the first five months of 1980, 970 businesses went bankrupt; in the first five months of 1981, 1,059 went bankrupt; in the first five months of 1982, 1,374 went bankrupt. The graph is going up and up. What will happen when I stand here next year to talk about the first five months of 1983? We are in serious trouble.

If hon. members opposite accept the proposition that small businesses provide 55 per cent of all jobs across Canada, then they must accept the proposition that we are in serious difficulty. The government is not doing anything to assist small-business men to keep them viable and to keep over 50 per cent of the work force employed. This is to our peril. I do not care what the government wants to do, but it cannot create a Crown corporation like Petro-Canada to look after all shoe repair shops, all groceries stores, all barber shops and all other small businesses in the country. We must keep small-business men healthy and viable. If we do not have a healthy business community within the community as a whole, we do not have a healthy country. Small-business men are the ones to whom the service clubs go. They are the ones who coach minor league hockey teams or peewee ball teams. Hon. members opposite should go out there to see who sponsors such teams. In essence, small-business men determine whether or not we have a healthy Canada.

I would like to turn to small businesses in finance, insurance and real estate. In the first five months of 1980, 107 small businesses in finance, insurance and real estate went bankrupt. In the first five months of 1981, 103 of these small businesses went bankrupt. In the first five months of 1982, 197 small businesses went bankrupt. I guarantee to all hon. members that in the first five months of 1983 in the finance, insurance and real estate field they will see that figure of 197 go up as high as 500.

It is a reflection of what is happening in our economy. The real estate and insurance markets are dropping because people are not buying homes. Nor will they be buying homes with the $3,000 grant such as the one the minister presented to someone in Edmonton. It is baffling how they picked that individual because the forms for the home owner grants are not available in any of the offices. The minister must have picked him out of the blue.

In the service industry there were 646 businesses that went bankrupt in the first five months of 1980. In the first five months of 1981, 892 service industry businesses went bankrupt, which was an increase. In the first five months of 1982, 1,184 businesses went bankrupt. Hon. members become alarmed when they see General Motors, Massey-Ferguson or Sherritt Gordon laying people off, but they fail to remember that 55 per cent of all the jobs in Canada are created by the small business sector.

What is the government doing to help those small businesses? Absolutely nothing. What can we do to help small business? The Canadian Federation of Independent Business has told the government that it is having too many problems dealing with government and its regulations in order to remain viable. That is why that federation approached the government. In personal interviews with 11,800 small and medium businesses which were conducted in the third quarter of 1980, one out of every ten identified government regulations, red tape and paperwork as the most important problem. This concern received the fourth highest response from those 11,800 small businesses. The three concerns which preceded that one were financing and supply, skilled labour and inflation. Financing, supply, skilled labour and inflation are perennial problems in any business.

It appears that these problems are becoming worse despite the efforts of the paper burden controller's office and the good intentions of both levels of government. It is considered a serious problem. Let us review some of the departments that small-business men indicated could greatly assist them. There is the federal sales, customs and excise tax. We can expect taxes to burden the small-business man and take up much of this time, but we should not expect this to happen to the point that it is creating—

Mr. Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I would plead with him that at five minutes to one this afternoon we came to an agreement among all parties that we will deal with all stages of the bill before four o'clock. It is now five to four. I would ask the hon. member if he would be in agreement for us to proceed with the Committee of the Whole stage and then third reading.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how these agreements are arrived at.

Mr. Smith: Through your House leader.

Mr. Shields: Our House leader is not here.

An hon. Member: He is so. So is your whip.

Mr. Shields: With the exception of our Quebec members, the vast majority of those polled said that federal paper work caused more problems in its burden and regulations than the paper work of provincial or municipal governments.

Outside Quebec, the percentage of respondents placing the blame on Ottawa ranged from a low of 62.6 per cent in Saskatchewan to a high of 87.1 per cent in Prince Edward Island. In Quebec, 74.6 per cent felt that the greatest burden was inflicted by the provincial government compared to 25.2 per cent citing the federal level.

While it is not surprising that Revenue Canada's requirements affect the most people, the extent of their impact is dramatic. Forty-six point seven per cent of respondents listed taxation measures as affecting them the most. Most small-business men said that taxation measures affected 46.7 per cent the most.

What are we trying to do to assist the small-business men? Absolutely nothing. We have virtually killed the Small Business Development Bond. it is now only available to those small businesses that are facing dire straits or are ready to go bankrupt. Do you want to hear about the type of paper work that a small-business man is faced with?

Mr. Benjamin: No.

Mr. Shields: They include federal sales, customs and excise tax, manpower training, apprenticeship programs, federal income taxes, unemployment insurance record in employment, federal employee deductions, income tax, UIC and CPP. What about Statistics Canada? If you were a small-business man you would know that the biggest problem and the prime question that he asks is, "Why should I fill these forms out, because no one uses the information that is provided? If they do, I never know, as a small-business man, why they want me to fill out these forms."

The second biggest complaint of the small-business man about filling out government forms concerns the required information, because it is too complex, requiring the small-business man to spend hours and hours to fill out these forms for some bureaucratic department.

The third complaint is that the information required is too costly to provide. In other words, a small-business man spends hours and hours in his job but must take the time, or hire someone, to fill out the forms that a government bureaucracy requires. But one of the most serious problems of all, and I have been on the receiving end of this, is that when one sits down to fill out these forms, very private, pertinent information which should relate only to that company, one finds that it is Statistics Canada that wants it. What guarantee—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields), but pursuant to Standing Order the Chair must now indicate that the time for private members' hour has arrived. However, I understand from various informal discussions that there may be a wish on the part of hon. members to put this bill through all stages. If that is the case, I think it requires only an indication that the House wishes the Chair not to see the clock in terms of private members' hour until such time as the bill is put through all stages.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is there unanimous consent that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blaker in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 1 carry?

On Clause 1—

Mr. Elzinga: I have just one very brief question, and I regret very much that the minister responsible for this legislation has not given it enough priority to even stay in the House for the completion of third reading.

Mr. Deans: Wait a minute. That is not fair.

Mr. Elzinga: But perhaps another cabinet minister who is present could answer my question. It is a very simple one. Specifically, what legislation of a substantial nature has the Minister of State for Small Business introduced which is of benefit to the small business sector other than legislation increasing the amount available for borrowing from $75,000 to $100,000 and pushing forward the termination date of this particular legislation? Has he introduced anything else, or does his record speak for itself?

Mr. Berger: Speaking on behalf of the minister, Mr. Chairman, the small business investment grant was a measure included in last June's budget.

Mr. Elzinga: We have not got the legislation yet.

Mr. Berger: I wanted to correct a point raised earlier by the hon. member for Mississauga South. This grant can apply without any prior legislation under the two loans made under the Small Businesses Loans Act, under the act which we are presently passing, which adds to the urgency of extending this act. The small business investment grant is covered by Treasury Board Vote 5, which is already in effect and, as such, does not need specific legislation since it is a fiscal measure. The expenditure will also have to be approved in supplementary estimates and will need the approval of Treasury Board. But I understand that the Canadian Bankers' Association met with the department and is ready to start extending loans under that budgetary provision. If it is not ready, it will happen by the end of this month.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills. Before going further, I should indicate that there may be an informal agreement to consider all stages of Bill S-29, but for the moment, I will proceed with the necessary details to get us into private members' hour. I will now recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Smith).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Shall all orders preceding No. 76 stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I understand that there is an informal consent to proceed with Bill S-29. Of course, the Chair is in the hands of hon. members, but I will recognize, for that purpose, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I believe, if you seek the consent of the House with regard to Bill S-29, you will find there is an understanding that we deal immediately with all stages of this bill, without debate, and then we will proceed immediately to the private members' bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis).

THE RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DEPOSITING OF INSTRUMENTS AFFECTING ROLLING STOCK

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls) moved that Bill S-29, an act to amend the Railway Act, be now read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee reported, read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): May I bring it to the attention of hon. members that, pursuant to a ruling made in either June or July of 1977, when matters proceed with the unanimous consent of the House and invade the time of the private members' hour, the private members' hour is nonetheless reduced by the amount of time of that invasion. Accordingly, the House will adjourn at five o'clock.

REPRESENTATION ACT, 1980

MEASURE TO STABILIZE REPRESENTATION IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings) moved that Bill C-276, an act to stabilize the representation in the House of Commons, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the time taken away from the private members' hour this afternoon does not really cause me much concern. I will be quite brief.

• (1610)

Because of a problem in my personal timing, this bill is delayed in coming before the House more than it perhaps might have been. I would have preferred to have had this bill brought forward some months ago prior to a bill of a similar nature, Bill C-223, in the name of my friend and colleague for Red Deer (Mr. Towers). However, as I said, it was a timing problem on my part that held it up. As a consequence, I will be very brief.

The subject matter of this bill has been before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I would have hoped that even at this late date I might convince the deputy to the House leader that this subject matter might still go the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The basic contention of the bill is that there is absolutely no reason for increasing the number of members in this House of Commons. I am going to take a moment to read into the record part of the explanation for my bill that will give some background and substantiation for that statement.

I want to point out particularly that in the bill which I mentioned a moment ago in the name of my colleague for Red Deer there is one similarity. We have both asked that the basic benchmark for determining the number of members in the House of Commons that was set some years ago, 75 members of the Province of Quebec, to be increased by four at each subsequent decennial census, not be decreased but held at 75.

The step I have taken beyond that, which is slightly different, is that the 1981 census be ignored in its entirety. Hon. members will know that the results of the 1971 census were not brought into being until 1979 so that the boundaries were not changed until eight years after the census was taken. Given the timing of the census and the timing of the next election, it is possible that new boundaries could be struck prior to the next election. That would have meant there would have been one extremely short Parliament and one long Parliament with these boundaries we now have.

I refer briefly to an excellent column which appeared this week written by Douglas Fisher, the well-known columnist and some time ago member of the New Democratic Party who sat in this House. He points out the relevance of the possible date of the next election and that the redistribution process cannot be completed before December 1984. That is the redistribution process that would follow from the 1981 census.

We would expect that the next election will likely be held in 1984, given the last election in 1980 and the tradition of having elections approximately every four years. However, we need only go back two elections to realize that the Parliament elected in 1974 lasted until 1979. If this Parliament were to sit that long, we could be faced with a redistribution prior to the next election. That is totally unnecessary.

If that were to happen, we would be faced with the accomplished fact of an increase in the number of members in this House. I do not see that. In his speech on his private members' bill and during his appearances before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, my colleague from Red Deer made a number of arguments for holding the House at the present figure or perhaps allowing it to increase by eight or ten seats.

I know that my friend opposite, the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) will speak following me. I am sure he will put on record, as will my colleague from the Brampton area, the fact that they represent ridings that extend far and beyond the 25 per cent over the base that is allowed. They represent ridings that are double the population and more close to the norm that was set as a result of the 1971 census and the procedure that is followed. I hope that my colleague from Mississauga North will tell the House that while handling a constituency of that size is extremely difficult, if given the tools and the staff he would not have a great deal of difficulty.

After all, our colleagues in the United States House of Representatives handle in the order of 400,000 constituents. There are only two senators per state and in those states the size of New York and California, senators deal with constituencies that number in the millions. Therefore, there should be no difficulty in handling a few more thousand.

When the boundaries commission sat in the 1970s, I was quite critical. I felt they missed some of the human side of the boundaries they established. When I appeared before the commission, I asked for a change. I achieved a partial change, but the line they drew on the north side of my constituency goes right through an area that has an affinity with another area. One township north of that line could have been drawn in. There are not more than 200 people living in the entire area of three townships. It is obvious that the lines could have been drawn much better at that time. It would have given me quite a few more constituents. That would not have been a tremendous problem. Instead of the approximately 75,000 I now have, there would have been 85,000 or 95,000. In a typical urban rural riding in eastern Ontario, that does not seem to be a real problem. From the point of view of having a number of constituents, I can see no justification for having this House increase its membership.

There is another point I want to make along this line while I am speaking on this aspect of the bill. Some years ago I was mayor of the city of Belleville. As mayor, I was continually thrown into meetings with my county colleagues. The two counties which I am now proud to represent were Prince Edward and Hastings. As a result, I was always outnumbered. However, if my cause had any justification to it at all, I had absolutely no difficulty in putting my point across.

One of the arguments made by Mr. Fisher, or alluded to—I should not say it is an argument made by him because he does not put a lot of weight behind it—is that because there are only 75,000 people in my constituency, and the constituency of my friend, the hon. member for Mississauga North, has over 150,000, his votes carry only half the weight of mine. I disagree with that argument. Frankly, it seems to me that if my colleague across the way can make his point and get his arguments through the House of Commons, his people are equally well represented, and there is no less weight behind the votes his constituents cast than behind the votes cast by people in the less-populated Prince Edward-Hastings constituency.

I argue very strenuously that this House should not be enlarged. I would not have a problem if the House were enlarged by eight or ten seats. If the evidence given before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections this year by the deputy to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is accurate, then by freezing the representation of Quebec at 75 seats, the House would increase in size by eight or ten seats. I do see that as a problem, but if the size of the House were to grow any larger than that, I feel that would be quite unnecessary.

Surprisingly, this matter has been the subject of letters to the editor in the city of Belleville. It is not a subject matter I thought would have caught the attention of very many people, yet Mr. Sidney Sillitoe, who was a friend for many years, without any discussion with me but, rather, in discussions with others in the city of Belleville, realized that the House would be enlarged because of the decennial census. In letters to the editor people were complaining that this should not happen. So it is that a subject which we would normally have thought would have occupied the minds only of those people within the House of Commons to varying degrees is one which has caught the interest of people within my constituency. If it is there, I am sure it is also in other places.

I want to close by saying once again that I can see absolutely no justification for having the size of this House increased, and I strongly urge members of the government opposite to refer the subject matter of this particular bill to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to allow the committee to deal with it, albeit much later this year.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to make a suggestion to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis). I want to assure the hon. member that I agree wholeheartedly with the thrust of this bill. As a matter of fact, I voted against the legislation which is now forcing our numbers upwards after each census. However, considering that a bill similar to the hon. member's bill was referred to committee and was considered in committee, and considering that we have one member on our side, the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher), who wishes to make a speech on the subject this afternoon, I wonder if the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings would agree, after the hon. member on this side has completed his remarks, to withdraw his bill. That would be one way of finishing off a little earlier this afternoon.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson) for his suggestion, but I think his suggestion might complicate things. After my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) has spoken, there will be some 20 or 25 minutes' debate remaining on the bill, and I think we should let it run its normal course.

Mr. Doug Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I extend my thanks to my colleague, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis), for giving me an opportunity to talk about a very important issue to me personally. I am rising now not to make an official speech but to give my personal opinion based on my own experiences in Mississauga North.

I represent the second most populated riding in Canada. The most populated one, York-Scarborough, is held by a minister, so I suppose I hold the record as an ordinary member.

In 1980, there were 93,000 voters registered in my riding. That is the firmest evidence I have of its size. They were registered voters and, of course, on top of that there are all the children, all the non-citizens and all the people who were missed on the list. The estimate in the newspaper the other day indicated that there are approximately 190,000 people in my riding. On top of that, just to let hon. members know some more details, my constituency is an area of very rapid population expansion. Recently, the city of Mississauga approved three new subdivisions, which will bring a total of 25,000 new homes into my area. Those homes will be added before we have an opportunity to redistribute the riding. Assuming that there will be two or three people living in each of them, I will have a gigantic riding by the time redistribution gets around to me.

I do not care whether we add more members to this House of Commons or whether we do some kind of shuffling, but certainly people in my area are mistreated by this system, and I hope to put that argument forward and to prove my case. It is that opportunity I appreciate today.

There are three electoral problems facing my riding. The first is that the general political workload involved is very, very heavy. I personally have no problem with that. In fact, the opportunities to go to spring festivals, parades, community centres and all sorts of community events help me to break down the anonymity of my riding. The political work is my work. I chose Mississauga to run in, and I am happy to represent the area. I am delighted all that work is there.

There are two radio stations, a very effective cable television station and four neighbourhood newspapers, all of which help me to break down the size of my constituency. We have ongoing neighbourhood and volunteer groups which help me to become known to people and to work on their problems. The political work is my responsibility, but I remind hon. members that on other occasions and in other precedents the workload facing hon. members has been considered a reasonable justification for giving members additional resources. I will come back to that point.

The second problem facing the people in my area is that their individual problems are difficult to communicate to their Member of Parliament. Because my area contains so many people and because of its size it is hard for the people to get in touch with me. When the people do get in touch with me, they have a difficult time making their cases, simply because of the workload. I do not know what happens in the offices of other hon. members, but my office has kept track and has found that in busy periods during the winter it is very common for us to receive 50 telephone calls a day dealing with personal problems. When people telephone me and say, "Doug, you are doing a lousy job", I feel that is an opinion, so I do not include that in that count. However, people telephone me and say, "Doug, I want to get my grandmother into the country. She lives in India and is having a difficult time because of our demands with respect to immigration." That is a problem which requires a great deal of work in order to serve the constituent properly. I take that very personally. I do not think that is a partisan issue. I do not think that is an opinion. That is an obligation on me as a Member of Parliament, and I cannot always carry out my responsibilities fully, simply because of the demands that are made. In my office I maintain two full-time people. We have three telephone lines coming in. Another person works half the week in my office. All of this is paid for out of the budget of the House of Commons, although my riding association makes a contribution because the House of Commons budget cannot cover it all. We keep the office open from nine o'clock until five o'clock every day and there is a telephone answering machine for the evenings and the weekend.

Because we are talking about large ridings we should realize the cost involved. One cannot hope to keep up the work with the resources now available, which are based on the experience of smaller areas.

Finally, we have the important question of representing the voice of our people in government. According to the chief returning officer, the average riding had about 55,000 registered voters in the last election. My riding had 93,000 people. They have a diluted voice in Ottawa, and I am sorry about that. But the one-man one-vote principle has been tested over and over again and is diluted in these circumstances. We heard that effectiveness and hard work by the MP would offset this imbalance. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings made that point, and of course he is right. A good, strong, clear voice will carry a long way. But he overlooked the fact that in politics ultimately it is numbers that count. Two votes are more than one, and in politics the number of votes decides issues. That is an important principle, which is being diluted by the fact that my riding has one member for 93,000 voters while the average riding has one member for 55,000 voters. That represents a dilution of impact in my area.

We have acknowledged the one-man one-vote principle in our processes and we try to come as close as we can to it. The decade-long cycle is too cumbersome and too slow, however. In trying to be absolutely fair and prevent abuse, we create unfairness through delay. I think the ratios could be corrected in one way or another if we acted more quickly.

Let me give an example of this, Mr. Speaker. There was a general census in 1971 which led to the decision on redistributing the electoral boundaries in 1975. Those new boundaries were to come into effect in the next general election. As we all know, however, in 1978 in York-Scarborough a byelection was fought on the basis of the old boundaries. Today, that same area is represented by three Members of Parliament. The process is too slow and cumbersome, Mr. Speaker. In 1978 the voters from what is today Don Valley East, York Centre and York Scarborough all voted in that one byelection.

In 1971, Mississauga was one riding. It was fought and won by my Liberal predecessor, the hon. Tony Abbott in 1974. In 1979 it was split in two, and in 1980 when I fought the election the area was big enough for three ridings. Yet 1979 and 1980 is when the new boundaries came into effect. There is too great a gap between the census and the enactment of the new boundaries, Mr. Speaker. I am concerned that this cycle will be repeated over and over again.

We have had the 1981 census, and the estimates are that it will be 1985 before the new boundaries are applicable. If the normal electoral cycle is followed, that means that the new boundaries will not come into effect until the late 1980s. My area will probably have three ridings and, according to the normal projection, by the late 1980s the population will be big enough to call for four ridings.

I have some suggestions to offer to help deal with this situation, and they are concentrated mainly on the problem of representation on behalf of the ordinary citizen living in a big area like mine. I believe we should recognize the principle that one-man one-vote is not enough. We should also recognize that people make work for politicians. We should put in place a separate category or riding—the big riding, where growth and size are very important.

There is already a geographical precedent. It has been recognized that the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) has special problems and special work because of the vast area he represents. He has been given some extra resources to help him out. I think that is necessary because the geography creates extra work in his case. But people make work in politics too, Mr. Speaker. There are 190,000 people in my riding, each of whom deserves my full attention. Therefore, I should have extra resources as well.

I should like to issue a challenge to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. He is a member of the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services. That committee deals with problems like this. A year ago I wrote to that committee and proposed that extra resources be allocated to people representing huge and expanding ridings. I presented a petition signed by ten Liberal members and I asked that two NDP members and about ten Conservative members also make representations. I was told by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) that those representations were going forward from the Conservatives, and I was told by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) that representations were going forward on behalf of his party. They landed in the hands of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings and a few others and disappeared in a vacuum. I must say that I think it is about time that we had a report on the situation from the committee.

We suggested a very simple procedure, that the regular redistribution be supplemented with extra resources after each election. When enumeration takes place and voters lists are produced, a national average of riding size should be established based on the number of voters rather than on population. Ridings in the top ten per cent size should be allocated money to enable the MP to employ an extra staff person to deal with the burdens of the representation of the larger number of people in those ridings. Unfortunately, nothing has been heard from the committee. I would urge its members, especially the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings whose conscience on this issue is so clear, to give an answer to this proposal soon. I would ask the hon. member to acknowledge at least that people make work and that huge ridings have special demands.

I would be prepared to debate, somewhere else, in philosophical terms, the second question of whether the people in my riding have a diluted voice because they have only one member for so many voters, and so on. It is an important issue which needs to be discussed. I think we all agree that the redistribution procedure, whether it adds extra people or makes a change in the boundaries, could be speeded up.

The third area where I indicated there was a problem was in the area of political representation. I think the cure for political problems and political representation is to encourage the good people of Mississauga North, numerous as they are, to keep on voting Liberal.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be very brief in addressing the bill before us. I would like to say I share the sentiments of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis), if we continue to grow like Topsy. This is what will happen if we do not make some adjustments to the current set-up which would see this House with something like 300, or in excess of 300 members in the next redistribution. I am in somewhat the same position as the hon. member in discussing this, and that reminds me of something which Peter Ustinov said a few years ago. I find myself of two minds on the subject, one more or less in disagreement with the other.

I come from a constituency called Kootenay West which currently has the smallest population of any constituency in British Columbia. It has 500 people less than any other riding in the province. I have 58,000 population, to be exact. If we were to alter the formula in the way envisaged in this bill, we would likely have to add additional population to the riding, and to many other rural or urban ridings than is presently the case, or would be, based on present census figures and the redistribution that will come as a result of it. Under the current regime the riding will have 11,000 less than the next smallest riding, although it will still come above the 25 per cent variable which applies to most constituencies across Canada.

While I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member opposite who has just spoken, it may be that we will have to give increasing consideration over the long haul to servicing those constituencies with significantly larger populations, complicated as that is because of the time lag on the census and redistribution. But we also have to bear in mind the rather unique problems that are faced, and which have been recognized in the past by those of us in rural and rural urban ridings.

My own riding encompases some 13 municipalities. One of my colleagues from Saskatchewan has a combination of 80 Indian bands and municipalities within one constituency. Those kinds of burdens also place additional responsibilities on the members who represent those areas. They are in a sense mini-republics and the consultative mechanisms that have to be put in place in order to keep a semblance of orderly communication between a member and all the component organized parts of his constituency require some additional effort, both quantitatively and quality-wise than I suspect is the case in many urban constituencies. While they may have large numbers of people they are more homogeneous and of one mind on particular subject matters and areas.

Having said all that, I do agree with the hon. member who introduced the bill that the nightmare we can envision happening in this chamber, both physically and how it will affect other workings, is and will be getting worse and worse on the basis of the current formula. I do not think any one of us has the magic answer. It would seem to me that if we do put the kind of formula in place which the hon. member is suggesting, then we must also reconsider the variable formula and 25 per cent variance which is currently allowed as between populations of our various constituencies.

Another matter that needs to be looked at by the committee is further refinement of the redistribution process, even once the formula has been worked out. In the last redistribution within my own area, even though the process we now have is a significant improvement over the mechanism that used to take place a number of years ago in terms of sorting out constituency boundaries, I know of one situation where a community of eight people, the poll of Trout Lake, which has a long continuing historical connection with the remainder of my constituency, was suddenly put into the constituency of Kootenay East-Revelstoke. Kootenay East-Revelstoke is some 100 miles away over gravel and dirt roads. That single poll of only eight people, who could otherwise communicate back and forth with the remainder of the constituency over a distance of 30 miles, are now forced to go 100 miles in order to have anything in common at all with the constituency with which they are a part. Their only established link is that traditionally they have been serviced by the Revelstoke Post Office. This is like a Len Norris cartoon of earlier Vancouver Sun fame; the little old lady who used to cover her eyes and stick a pin in a ballot. I suspect that is the only way that kind of arbitrary decision could have been made in terms of sorting out those boundaries.

We are also left with the situation that there are two time zones within the constituency. The riding is established in this way to take in 500 people who would fit much better into the adjoining constituency. Those anomalies would not be corrected by this bill. In any continuing discussion of redistribution, I think we should be looking at that process and trying to define it a little more delicately.

Basically, I support the intent of the bill before us, as do most of my colleagues. Our overriding concern is that this House should continue to be of a size that is at least somewhat workable, both in terms of quantity and quality, so that we can do the kind of job that is expected of us by all our constituents.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair sees that there are two hon. members who wish to continue with this debate. In order that both members have an opportunity to speak, perhaps they will consider the suggestion of dividing the remaining time between them. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has indicated he will speak very briefly and leave the remaining time for the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau).

Mr. Nickerson: There are three members wishing to speak, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I now note that the hon. member for the Western Arctic wishes to speak as well.

The hon. member for Edmonton West.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank hon. members for their courtesy. I certainly support my colleague, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis). I have sympathy for the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). Years ago I had the most populated riding west of Scarborough, and I got along quite well. True enough, the demands upon the member at that time were not as great.

I think the solution lies partly in what the hon. member is advocating. I do not think the suggestion that every member should be entitled to the same number of staff and so forth is right. It seems to me that the facilities for a member should be geared to a mathematical formula based upon the size of his riding.

There is one thing which the hon. member for Mississauga South fails to realize, and that is that we do have flaws here. Prince Edward Island has four members. The total population of the province is barely over 120,000. There is the same difficulty in New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan. You are not going to get away from disparate numbers in any way. It seems to me that the solution lies in according facilities to a member based upon the population of his constituency.

There is one final point I should like to make. The chamber should have no more than 240 members. There has been an improvement in communications and in facilities compared with what they were when I first came to the House 25 years ago. In fact, they are incomparable. With appropriate staffing facilities, members can look after greater populations. There is no way that the Chamber can accommodate any more members in a practical sense. There is already overpressure on question period, on debating time and in committees. We must resort to silly nonsense, to the point that a member now has five minutes to question witnesses in the committee consideration of Bill C-124. If a witness takes 3.5 minutes to answer, then the time is gone.

We should reduce the number of our committees. We could handle things much better. At the present time the chamber is growing like Topsy, and I must say that the pis-aller solution which was found in the mid-1970s to deal with a totally bad system of redistribution built a Frankenstein into the system.

The contents of this bill should go to committee. I do not think there should be total discouragement of this proposal. I hope hon. members on the government side will agree that the contents of my colleague's bill should go to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

The problems of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) and those who represent coastal constituencies are matters of redistribution. The people at fault are the redistribution commissioners. It is not a question of the number of seats.

Therefore I support this bill. I urge hon. members not to talk it out, but to let its contents go to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization so there will be a full exchange of ideas. This would benefit all members of the House. We have done that time immemorial. These proposals should not be talked out. They should be discussed in greater detail in a committee designed to look after the problems of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau), but perhaps I should first assure the hon. member with gout, who was inquiring, that private members' hour will finish at five o'clock.

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, although it is a beautiful day outside, we are always pleased to take part in the Friday afternoon debate, and I am particularly interested in this one because the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis) would impose a certain restriction on the province of Quebec. The hon. member claims that Bill C-276 is designed to stabilize the representation in the House. I would like to read the act as it is now and then compare it with the amendment of the hon. member. Section 51 of the British North America Act reads as follows, and I quote:

"51. (1) The number of members of the House of Commons and the representation of the provinces therein shall upon the coming into force of this subsection and thereafter on the completion of each decennial census be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following Rules:

1. There shall be assigned to Quebec seventy-five members in the readjustment following the completion of the decennial census taken in the year 1971, and thereafter four additional members in each subsequent readjustment."

Now here is the amendment of the hon. member:

All that portion of subsection 51(1) of the British North America Act, 1867, as enacted by the British North America Act, 1974, that precedes Rule 1 thereof is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"51. (1) The number of members of the House of Commons and the representation of the provinces therein shall upon the completion of each decennial census, commencing with the census taken in the year 1991, be readjusted by the authority, in the manner, and at the time provided by the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, subject and according to the following Rules respecting the relative representation of the provinces:"

He then goes on to say:

Rule 1 of the said subsection is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"1. There shall be assigned to Quebec seventy-five members in each readjustment."

And the words:

—four additional members in each subsequent readjustment—

—are completely omitted.

Mr. Speaker, it would be useful at this stage for me to go back to the time when I was a teacher as well as a notary and that I provide some background in an attempt to explain how the act and the electoral boundaries readjustment process now work. There is a brochure published by the Chief Electoral Officer entitled "Representation in the Federal Parliament" that is available to the public and Canadians would be well advised to write either to their own Member of Parliament or to any other member to obtain this very interesting publication. If I may, I would like this afternoon to tell Canadians what has happened since 1867. I am sure that many people have unfortunately no idea of what has happened. This publication says the following:

Canada owes its legislative body to the British North America Act of 1867. The Upper House, or Senate, was to include 24 members and this representation was to remain the same regardless of shifts in population. On the other hand, the number of members of the House of Commons was determined according to the principle of representation by population. This institution was to have included, "subject to the provisions of this act", 181 members: 82 for Ontario, 65 for Quebec, 19 for Nova Scotia and 15 for New Brunswick. Section 51 of the BNA Act stated that the seats in the House should be redistributed among the provinces after the 1871 census. This redistribution was to follow each decennial census, "by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides". The readjustment rules provided under the act set at 65 the number of seats assigned to Quebec, and the representation of the other provinces was to increase or decrease according to the relative number of their population. The only exception to this form of proportional representation was the one-twentieth rule under which no province could lose seats following redistribution unless the percentage of the total population of the country represented by its own population had decreased by at least 5 per cent during the period between the latest census and the previous one.

The original rules applied from 1871 to 1946, or more than 75 years. The only change made during this period consisted in adding in 1915 the "Senate rule" which provides that a province cannot have fewer seats in the House of Commons than in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, before 1946, no maximum limit was set for the number of seats in the House of Commons. I notice that my time is nearly up, but I would like to close by saying that, in my opinion, maintaining the status quo or the formula provided in the act represents the protection which I believe we need in Quebec. I must say that if there had been a vote, I would have kept to this position and voted against the bill of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis) in spite of his good intentions. It still remains that maintaining the status quo is the best position that a Quebec member can take.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being five o'clock, the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. Next week at this time I will inform the House as to the solution of the mysterious disappearance of 10,000 sheep from the Falkland Islands. In the interim, I wish all hon. members a good weekend. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until Monday, July 26, at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5.02 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE ECONOMY

SUGGESTION THAT GOVERNMENT SHOULD CHANGE ITS POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, business investment is plunging downward in response to dwindling company profits. The National Energy Program, the Foreign Investment Review Agency, and the disastrous MacEachen budgets, with the resultant high interest rate policies, have ravaged the business community in Canada with the obvious result of one and one third million unemployed, thousands of bankruptcies, and the loss of homes by hundreds of families. The latest Gallup poll indicates a mere 14 per cent of Canadians think the government is doing well with the economy. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the government inform the uninformed 14 per cent, who obviously have neither read a paper, listened to a radio, nor watched television, so that they, too, as well as the 86 per cent, will realize just how badly the Liberal government has mishandled the economy, or, better still, that the government immediately change the direction of its present disastrous policies.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR RELATIONS

APPLICATION OF RESTRAINT PROGRAM TO EXISTING WAGE CONTRACTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, equity and fairness are essential for the restraint program to succeed. The staff in the offices of the ministers entered into a contract with the government in June, 1982, and this will run until April, 1983, before the 6 per cent takes over. The Canadian air line employees entered into a three-year contract in September, 1981, and these employees have been advised that their contract will be cancelled and the 6 per cent restraint will take over on September 1, 1982. If this arrangement follows through, it will be making flesh of one and fish of another. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That the government be consistent and permit every contract to run to completion before applying the restraint program.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NICARAGUA—INCURSIONS FROM HONDURAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In the last week there has been an invasion of Nicaragua from Honduras, by forces of former dictator Somoza. Many of these men have been trained in the United States and are now being supplied by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency. Just this weekend the ambassadors of Mexico, Venezuela, France and Honduras in Managua visited the border region of Nicaragua and confirmed the slaughter of civilians by these armed bands. Madam Speaker, I am seriously concerned that this conflict in Nicaragua will soon turn into a regional war. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on behalf of the Canadian government, to contact the government of Honduras to urge that that government take immediate steps to stop all incursions from within Honduras against Nicaragua.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

S.O. 43

MARINE TRANSPORT

CANADIAN HYDROGRAPHIC SERVICE—CHARTING OF BEAUFORT SEA AND NORTHWEST PASSAGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, the development of oil and gas in the Beaufort Sea and Arctic Islands will likely necessitate substantial tanker traffic in Canadian Arctic waters. In order that such shipping can be conducted safely, economically, and without undue risk to the environment, accurate navigation charts will be required. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson):

That this House approves of the work done to date by the Canadian Hydrographic Service and directs the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to complete hydrographic charting of the Beaufort Sea and Northwest Passage with all due dispatch.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TRAVEL BY EMPLOYEES—ISSUANCE OF REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Last week the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) publicly undertook to release a report on the international and domestic air travel of public servants. Last Wednesday I was informed that the report was complete and was awaiting perusal by the minister. Today I am informed that the report is to be referred to the Treasury Board, I assume for necessary rewrite, deletions, added obscurity and obfuscation. This being the case, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That the House unanimously call upon the President of the Treasury Board to come clean today with all the dirty details of public service travel and to stop hiding vouchers and lists of misspent tax dollars due to pressure from his colleagues and the power mandarins of the Ottawa Valley.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

TAXATION OF LIFE INSURANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, Canadians forced to the brink of disaster by the government's continuing high interest rate policy will be forced, as a last resort, to use their life insurance policies in times of financial emergency, and will then have their problems compounded even further by the application of a government tax. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

• (1410)

That since permanent life insurance plays an important and significant part in the social and economic planning of a family, the federal government proposals to tax life insurance should be amended so that old rules would apply to exempt policies and new rules to the new non-exempt policies.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CUSTOMS CLEARANCE OF AUTOMOBILES AT VANCOUVER DOCKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in light of the encouraging announcement last week by the Minister of State, International Trade (Mr. Lumley) that he is now willing to relax his discriminatory and adverserial tactics in delaying the customs clearance of Japanese automobiles destined for Canadian dealers, and in view of the indication the minister gave that he is now prepared to negotiate with our Japanese trading partners in good faith, I move, seconded by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook):

That the minister be directed to extend his maximum efforts in co-operation with his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, toward ensuring the immediate customs clearance of the more than 14,000 automobiles backlogged on Vancouver area docks so that the hundreds of laid-off transportation employees, dock workers and auto dealership employees across Canada can quickly return to their jobs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

EXCISE TAX ON NATURAL GAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, my riding of Simcoe South is home to the nationally-renowned

Holland Marsh black muck market gardens. These food producers are suffering because the federal excise tax on natural gas adds about one-third to their greenhouse heating costs. I have in my possession a letter from Augie Ingratta of Leamington, which indicates that, on a total natural gas bill of $75,336.72, more than $18,100 is for federal excise taxes. I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens):

That whereas the National Energy Program caused the federal excise tax to go from zero to 83 cents per thousand cubic feet, causing an unfair burden on food producers and, consequently consumers, the federal government consider rescinding this tax retroactively in order to lower greenhouse production costs and ultimately consumer food costs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHIPS AND SHIPPING

CANADIAN PACIFIC STAFFING PRACTICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Canadian Pacific ran an advertising campaign last year saying it was proud of its past and proud to be Canadian, whereas CP ships are all registered in Britain and Hong Kong and the company maintains an 82-year-old tradition of staffing its ships with British officers and also employs foreign crews, whereas if CP ships employed Canadian crews it would provide at least 1,500 jobs for Canadian seamen, and whereas the only thing Canadian about CP Shipping is that it continues the 101-year Canadian Pacific tradition of having the government in its pocket and ripping off the Canadian people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this House demand that the Government of Canada institute a marine industrial strategy and that it insist Canadian Pacific immediately repatriate its ships to Canada and employ Canadian crews, or that the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs join with me in initiating an action against CP for false and misleading advertising.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

S.O. 43

PROMOTION OF POTASH SALES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my motion arises out of the fact that potash production in Saskatchewan is down 56 per cent this June over a year ago. Hundreds of workers have been laid off since the election of Dr. Devine and the Conservatives in the April election. In light of the fact that the situation facing workers and communities dependent on the production of potash is now very serious and the new Conservative government of Saskatchewan has not shown the competence of the previous NDP government with respect to finding and developing markets for the province's potash, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

That the federal minister responsible for international trade undertake an aggressive campaign to promote the sale of potash throughout the world.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

PROVISION OF FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Due to the lack of funds in the Farm Credit Corporation 80 per cent of the applicants are being turned away or put on hold. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House requests the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture to act quickly on the government's expressed intention to provide new funds by way of the proposed credit instruments mentioned in the budget and, further, that more aggressive action be taken to implement the powers that the Farm Credit Corporation now has to raise more funds.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

IMPLEMENTATION OF GOVERNMENT LOANS PROGRAM

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Over the weekend the minister said on the CTV program "Question Period" that the program for cheaper loans for home owners, farmers, and small businessmen will be in operation by October, and that he cannot imagine circumstances which would prevent the implementation of this program. Is this statement based on the preliminary reaction of the special consultative committee, or is it based on work that is being done within his department?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not recall saying anything about the month of October. I have noticed in press accounts that that date is put on the time when the program might be implemented. I have not had an opportunity to check the transcript but, in any event, what I said is based upon my own expectations. As I stated on the program, I still cannot imagine circumstances which would put this program off the rails. I have confidence that the committee will find it acceptable or, indeed, if the committee wants to make further recommendations, I believe it will find it to be a program which can be implemented. However, I have not received any report from that committee yet, nor do I have an additional report from my department.

PROJECTIONS OF COST

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. I am sure the minister is aware there has been some discussion in the media about some substantial technical problems relating to the implementation of the program. There is also some question that the projected cost of the program as set out in the budget will be far less than what will be the case once the program is implemented.

I want to ask the minister whether he took these factors fully into account in the answer he gave to my first question and in his comments at the weekend when he made the statement that the program will be implemented in a very short period of time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I did notice at the weekend that concerns raised by unidentified persons as to the operation or feasibility of this program were summarized. I believe that is a healthy process because the purpose of the consultation is to ensure that all the possible technical difficulties are examined and that a way is found to implement the program. I have had no further reports either from the committee or from my department to justify the comments the hon. member quoted.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, it would certainly be helpful to Canadians to know whether the minister takes seriously the concerns which have been expressed, and whether he feels the program will sail through as he indicated at the weekend.

EFFECT ON CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I think the minister must also be aware that there is some serious concern in the financial community that the indexed form of investment will provide formidable competition to Canada Savings Bonds and other forms of savings instruments, none of which have the benefit of this indexed feature. In addition to being considerable competition, it may well push up interest rates on general mortgages on existing houses. If the committee reaches the same conclusion, does the minister intend to reassess the plan, or is he considering changing the form of Canada Savings Bonds to provide an indexed feature on them so that they can compete with the new indexed term deposit?

• (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I note that the hon. member used the expression that these proposed indexed instruments would provide formidable competition. Certainly it is intended that they be attractive so that depositors will move large amounts of funds into such indexed instruments. Unless they are attractive, or indeed strongly competitive, then the plan would be unworkable. Offhand, I do not find that a compelling deficiency in the plan. It seems to me that it must be made attractive to depositors and holders of large amounts of funds in other forms for them to move those funds into indexed instruments.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DEMAND FOR TARIFF CHANGES IN EXCESS OF SIX PER CENT

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance who undoubtedly noticed on the weekend two rather conflicting attitudes. The Prime Minister indicated that he may well use leverage against certain private concerns if they do not abide by the 6 per cent and 5 per cent ceilings. On the other hand, Mr. Lawless, President of CN Rail, indicated that such ceilings would not be binding on his rail operation. He then proceeded to tell the press that he intended to put in place increases related to cost as he saw fit.

Have any members of the government been in touch with CN Rail and asked it to temper its demands, which appear to be in direct defiance of the 6 per cent ceiling on which the Prime Minister indicated he would use leverage to have it accepted by other concerns in the country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not been in touch with CN about their proposed tariff changes but I presume that the hon. member would agree that in a circumstance of this kind the due process provided by the law should be allowed to take place, namely, that any body which has a right to go before the Canadian Transport Commission should be permitted to do so. Once the Canadian Transport Commission makes the decision, if it is above the 6 per cent, then would be the occasion for the government to act. I understand that the CTC, through its general counsel, has stated that the 6 per cent rule would be of persuasive importance to it in reaching its conclusions.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

ATTITUDE TOWARD RESTRAINT PROGRAM

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. He undoubtedly noted that the President of CN Rail, Mr. Lawless, stated "—we don't file on the basis that we must ask permission," meaning filing with the CTC.

Would the Minister of Finance inform the House on one further matter. He is very buddy buddy with Ian Sinclair of CP. Has Mr. Sinclair, or anyone else on behalf of CP, given a firm commitment that that rail organization will abide by the 6 per cent and 5 per cent ceilings with regard to its rates in Canada? Specifically, has Mr. Sinclair given any undertaking that CP will no longer demand that the Crown rate be adjusted upwards? This would mean a 100 per cent hike for the average farmer in this country by 1986, and 2.5 times the present level by 1990.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not discussed these particular questions with Mr. Sinclair. As you know, he has undertaken to chair the private sector six and five committee, made up of businessmen whose job it will be to persuade their colleagues in all sectors of the economy to abide by the six and five.

Mr. Clark: By example?

Mr. MacEachen: I assume that Mr. Sinclair has given his answer by taking over the chairmanship of the committee himself.

• (1425)

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—AID TO VICTIMS OF ISRAELI INVASION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Red Cross has estimated that, as a direct result of the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, there are now more than 200,000 people in need of assistance. The Canadian government more than a month ago provided $1 million in assistance to people in terrible circumstances. Since the need is obviously much greater, will the Government of Canada consider increasing assistance immediately specifically for medical supplies and field hospitals?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member mentioned, a few weeks ago we announced a contribution in the amount of $1 million for rehabilitation relief in terms of food and medical supplies for victims in Lebanon. I am now able to inform the House that we are contributing another $1.4 million, making a total of $2.4 million, which I believe per capita is by far and away the highest contribution in the world. I will investigate how that money is being assigned, but I understand it is being given to relief agencies to be distributed in a way they think most fitting.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to commend the government for its decision increasing aid. I take it from what the minister has said that he will investigate the purposes for which the money is being spent and will inform members of the House about it.

QUERY RESPECTING PROVISION OF HOUSING AND FOOD

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I will follow up my first question by asking the Secretary of State for External Affairs about the government's intention for another kind of specific aid, this time in the form of housing, and in terms of the need for increased supplies of food. Since Canada is one of the world's great producers of food and is also a producer of pre-fabricated and portable housing, will the government take steps to ensure that increased assistance in these two areas of human need are also provided?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the amount that I have announced to this point of $2.4 million is not intended to be our final contribution but is really an interim contribution to deal with this problem. I will certainly examine the most effective uses of any future contributions that we may make. The provision of housing may indeed be a longer-term rehabilitation need rather than a short term need, but I will certainly look into it.

PROVISION OF TEMPORARY SHELTER

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, just for clarification on the question of housing, my question concerns short-term housing needs. Specifically I understand portable shelters of some kind are required by literally thousands of people. Will the minister look into the possibility of Canada supplying additional supplies of temporary shelter?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Madam Speaker.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

HEATING COSTS OF MARRIED PERSONNEL

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. The Department of National Defence has been busy installing fuel metres in some 20,000 married quarters. Effective September the department is going to shift the burden of paying for heating to the service man. As the cost of heating fuels is not restrained by the government, which profits from it, what does the minister plan to do to ensure that his department is not an accomplice in raising the cost of the service man's shelter by more than 6 per cent?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member for Victoria has asked that question. As you know, we have to give advice three months ahead of time of rent increases, and the next occasion will be August 1. The entire question is under study at the moment. As far as logic is concerned, if military people, the armed forces, are to be restrained by the 6 per cent and 5 per cent government policy, logically I cannot see how we can allow an increase in rent of more than 6 per cent.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I am very glad to hear that assurance from the minister.

REQUEST THAT RENTS REFLECT HEATING COSTS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, could the Minister of National Defence give me further assurance, and also assure the House and the service man, that when the service man starts paying his own fuel bills his shelter charges will be reduced not only to reflect the current cost of heating but also to reflect the future large increases in heating fuels which this benevolent government is planning?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, with respect to the policy of charging for utilities according to their use, our energy policy was designed to give initiative to the service man to use utilities carefully, that is, to conserve energy. Therefore I think it is still a good policy, but as far as the question of the hon. member is concerned, I think the same logic applies as in the case of rent increases.

EFFECT OF CONTROL PROGRAM ON WAGE SETTLEMENTS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I should like to return to the Minister of Finance and follow up on the question of the hon. member for York-Peel. From newspaper reports I understand that the minister was in the room with the Prime Minister and Mr. Sinclair when the Prime Minister invited Mr. Sinclair to be head of this blue blood private sector industry committee to help the government out of its difficulties.

How in the world could the public have any credibility in Mr. Sinclair if there were no discussions, not about rates which CP would be charging its customers that might be above the 6 per cent or 5 per cent suggestion of the government, but about contracts already negotiated by CP Rail, and I understand also by CP Air employees, when CN employees, let alone Air Canada ones, will have a negotiated and/or enforced 6 per cent and 5 per cent increase which is far below what CP has already negotiated? Was there any discussion that, as a moral leader in this difficult situation, Mr. Sinclair would go to his people in CP and show another example of leadership by having CP roll back some of the increases?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have every confidence that not only will Mr. Sinclair attempt to persuade others in the country to follow the 6 per cent and 5 per cent, but I am satisfied that he will do likewise in whatever operations for which he has responsibility. The hon. member is aware that this is a matter which specifically has to be dealt with one way or another in the bill now before the standing committee. I believe we ought to wait to see how the committee deals with this problem before we make up our minds finally on whether or not CN and CP are to be treated differently or in the same way.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, that is an interesting answer by the Minister of Finance because I remember when he had some interest in labour matters in the House of Commons. Certainly the minister would agree that rail discussion and negotiation have taken a long time but that there is something called industry-wide bargaining.

EFFECT OF RESTRAINT PROGRAM ON INDUSTRY-WIDE BARGAINING

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, taking Bill C-124 as is, not being a prophet to see how it will come out of the committee, but assuming that it comes out of committee pretty close to the way it went into the committee, would the Minister of Finance not agree that unless there is a substantive change in Bill C-124, there will be a grievous and gross anomaly in negotiated contracts for CN employees and CP employees to the disadvantage of those under the Crown corporation? What will he do about it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the comments of the hon. member make a lot of sense but, before asking a hypothetical question, why does he not wait until the bill is in the House and until we dispose of it? Maybe when the bill is disposed of, all his questions will be satisfied and answered. I cannot anticipate what goes on in that committee, but I believe members of the committee are as keen to resolve these difficulties seen by the hon. member as he is himself. I am quite aware of the joint bargaining which exists in this industry and how important it is that that question be tackled in committee.

AIR TRANSPORT

DEPARTMENT'S TREATMENT OF PRIVATE AIRCRAFT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Recently radio licence fees for private aircraft were doubled. Both landing fees and parking rates have been increased to ridiculous levels, yet on July 1, as the hon. member for Vancouver South pointed out on Friday, the Vancouver airport shut down vfr traffic in the middle of the day. Will the minister agree finally, with my contention that his department is in an adversarial position to general aviation? How else can he explain the harassment of private aircraft?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, recently I had a question on the Vancouver incident of July 1. I indicated that at that time there were problems with respect to overtime payments to air controllers in my department, and I recently indicated that these problems had been resolved. There are not any more of them. On the subject of fees, tariffs, rates and so on which my department charges the Canadian public, these were frozen as of the date of the budget. If my hon. friend knows of any which have been increased, I would like to know. They are not permanently frozen, but we are awaiting more details, as the Minister of Finance just indicated, before we take action on the application of the 6 and 5 per cent rule.

RADIO LICENCE FEES

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, of course the freezing came after the increase in radio licence fees. Our friends in the United States do not even have radio licence fees, nor do they have any ridiculous requirements for such things as 720 channel radios. These regulations are limiting air traffic entering Canada both for business and pleasure. Does the minister not see the damage this is causing? Does he have no control over his department, or does he just not care?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, in order to find out the differences between the Canadian situation and the American one, presumably one would have to study a pretty wide range of services provided by both departments. I have been exposed to questions of this kind—somebody says that in a particular instance my department is charging more than the American department, but then, upon looking at it in more detail, I find that in other sections the Canadian department charges less. The hon. member has an easy way today, with all the expertise at his command, to shoot one particular example and to generalize from it. I beg him to give me a chance to demonstrate that in other instances Canadians are better treated than are the Americans.

EMPLOYMENT

SUGGESTION THAT PUBLIC SERVICE OFFER SIX-MONTH JOBS IN GASPÉ AREA

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. At the beginning of July, a local survey showed that as a result of shutdowns in the paper and copper industry, the riding of Gaspé had an unemployment rate of 60 per cent. Only people employed by the provincial or federal governments had steady jobs. My question is as follows: Last weekend, I met people from my riding who suggested that employment in the public service should be for a six-month period only. At the end of the six months, public servants would be given a taste of the unemployment situation, and the Public Service could hire another team for a subsequent six-month period, so that more Canadians would be able to have steady jobs. I would like to have the minister's opinion of this proposal.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, this is a very constructive proposal. It is quite true that public servants have a degree of job security that does not exist in the private sector. That is one of the reasons why we tabled Bill C-124 in the House.

HOUSING

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION RENTAL UNITS—APPLICATION OF CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I am not easily discouraged, so I will ask the minister responsible for housing a question. Are rental units currently under the auspices of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, that is, managed or owned by CMHC, to be held to a maximum 6 per cent increase this coming year?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I assume that the motivation for the question arises from the announcement of the government on budget evening. The Minister of Finance indicated that the policy referring to the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guidelines would apply to agencies, departments, et cetera, which have control over prices directly. I would refer the hon. member to a news release issued by the President of the Treasury Board, and which is dated July 20. I indicated that Public Works Canada, all agencies reporting through me to Parliament, have agreed to comply with the government policy.

Mr. Deans: That was a very interesting answer.

QUERY RESPECTING LIMITATION ON RENTS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, are rental units that are being managed or owned by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to have rental increases this coming year of no more than 6 per cent?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, to assist the hon. member I would be happy, through one of the pages of the House—

Mr. Deans: Do you know the answer?

Mr. Cosgrove: —to provide a copy of the government policy, to which Canada Mortgage and Housing is subscribing, as I indicated.

MINISTERS' POST-BUDGET VISIT TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and Acting Prime Minister. On Friday, July 16, four of the Acting Prime Minister's colleagues, the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Justice, and the Secretary of State, flew to St. John's, Newfoundland, in a government jet to attempt an impossible task. They said they were going to sell the new federal budget.

They had a press conference at 11.30 and had 250 people whom they invited in to drinks and lunch in the middle of the day at the Holiday Inn, at a cost of $4,700 for that little face-to-face meeting. Is it the government's policy to sell restraint in this manner, by a show of opulence, wealth, and power, with two bars in a Holiday Inn, and glazed salmon, just like the minister's eyes are glazed now. Is this how the minister plans to sell restraint in the government to the Canadian people, or will the government cancel these ostentatious and opulent shows? Will the minister tell us how many of these there will be, and at how many places does the government plan to have such a performance across Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the ostentation and opulence are probably more in the hon. member's mind and imagination than existed at the event which was hosted in St. John's by my colleagues. In any event, if the hon. member is really concerned about restraint as it applies to public expenditures, I think I can assure him that whatever was spent will not be picked up by the Canadian taxpayer.

QUERY RESPECTING PAYMENT FOR RECEPTION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue was asked a question there about the general public's fear that the new budget might not work. He said fear is good as long as it is not paralysing fear. Let me tell you I am paralysed with fear when I look at the Acting Prime Minister.

The press has been told that this $4,700 bill from the Holiday Inn for drinks, glazed salmon, booze, wines, hams and all the rest of it, was paid for by the Liberal Party of Canada. Would the Acting Prime Minister confirm whether or not these bills are to be met by the Liberal Party of Canada? If they are, why are these ministers travelling by government aircraft and who is paying for the aircraft? What is going on? Is this a show of the Liberal Party, or is the public paying for it? Who is paying for it, and why? Would he explain just what is happening and tell the public what the Liberal Party and the government are doing, or is there any way of distinguishing one from the other?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has no business inquiring into the affairs of the Liberal Party. He is entitled to inquire as to whether the taxpayers paid for this particular event. The taxpayers did not.

Mr. Crosbie: Who paid for the aircraft?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member talks about not being impressed by the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Crosbie: Paralysed with fear.

Mr. MacEachen: I suggest that he not become over confident. Every time that happens to him, he falls hard.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

CAPPING OF PENSIONS UNDER CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Does the minister still fully intend to see the remuneration under the Canadian Armed Forces pension plan capped at 6 per cent next year, bearing in mind that last year the receipts and credits to the Canadian Forces superannuation account amounted to $480 million in interest alone, at 5 per cent, and the pay-out to servicemen and beneficiaries was only $280 million? Does the Minister of National Defence feel that it is fair to cap these indexed pensions for which servicemen have been promised full indexing at the cost of living rate—to cap them at 6 per cent, bearing in mind that the pension account is $200 million in surplus for last year when you compare accrued interest with funds paid out to beneficiaries?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, this is a question which will have to be evaluated by the Treasury Board and our department. I think it would only be fair if we succeed in our program of 6 and 5, if the inflation rate goes down to 6 and 5 in one or two years. I think the indexation of pensions has always been subject to our cost of living inflation rates. If they go down to 6 and 5 I think it would only be fair to index these pensions to the rate of inflation at the time.

Mr. Siddon: The minister knows that if this undertaking is carried out, the government will have broken trust with the servicemen of Canada.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CAPPING OF PENSIONS UNDER CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Solicitor General. In the same light, if we look at the Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account we find that contributions by the members of the RCMP amounted to $22.5 million in the last fiscal year, but beneficiaries received only $16 million, and interest accredited to the account amounted to $60 million at a rate of 6 per cent. Is it fair to cap the pensions at a six per cent increase, remembering that members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been promised full cost of living indexing, and recognizing that the pay-outs to the beneficiaries are far short of interest and contributions from serving members of the RCMP?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of Finance has often indicated, we are seeking to establish a 6 and 5 per cent inflation rate for the Canadian economy over the next two years. In the area where the federal government has direct control and can show leadership, we are proposing to do so with the support of the House.

PROGRESS IN ESTABLISHING NEW NATIONAL SECURITY SERVICE

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General. On August 25, I believe it will be a year since Mr. Fred Gibson, Q.C., was appointed head of the planning and transition group to develop a new security and intelligence service. What progress, if any, has been made during this long interval? What can the minister tell the House?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, a considerable study has been done of the problems of national security which were the basis of the McDonald Commission's recommendations. A document is in the process of preparation for me to take to my cabinet colleagues. I am looking forward, in the next few months, to being able to spend a considerable amount of time with them on the consideration of national security matters, and hope that it would be possible some time in the fall to bring forward the government's response to the recommendations.

FUTURE OF EXISTING PERSONNEL

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, have any new guidelines been formulated, even if not publicized, to clarify the role of existing personnel in the force during this transition period, in order to reassure them and the country about their future and to prevent loss of some special expertise?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Yes, Madam Speaker. Mr. Gibson and the commissioner, and the deputy commissioner responsible for national security, have been in constant touch with the members of the security service assuring them of a continued place in the security service and it will be the basis of the new separated security service when one is formed.

USE OF GOVERNMENT LEVERAGE IN APPLICATION OF CONTROL PROGRAM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister will know that the Prime Minister said on Friday, "I would hope that every grant, every accord and every subsidy that the government is paying out of taxpayers' money would be used as leverage to enforce the 6 and 5 provision." Is it the policy of the government that every grant, every accord and every subsidy of the federal government will be used as leverage?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, that is the intention.

PREPARATION OF GUIDELINES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, have guidelines been established, or are they being established?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the cabinet is presently engaged in the process of preparing these guidelines. We have already had discussions. The general principle has been established, and we will be approving these specific guidelines probably this week.

REQUEST THAT GUIDELINES BE PUBLISHED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, will those guidelines be published so that people who are taking advantage of government programs will know in advance of any unstated strings that might be attached to any grants, any accord, any subsidy—any strings attached which are unstated and which are not in accord with the law of the land?

• (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we have not given any consideration to the question of publication, but the Leader of the Opposition will recall that when we did establish certain guidelines for administered prices, the President of the Treasury Board did make these public. I would think that, once we have completed our work, we will give consideration to whether it would be useful to make those criteria or guidelines public.

TIMING OF POLICY APPLICATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, there is enough confusion in the country right now. It would be absolutely incredible and verging on the criminal for the government to have this kind of guideline and not let the people know when they apply for subsidies, accords or grants from the Government of Canada. Let me ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether this new policy will apply retroactively. Will it apply to people who are now in receipt of grants, accords or subsidies from the Government of Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it would be my opinion that it would not be justified to review all former grants which were put forward or put out under particular circumstances. This is a policy which was established in the budget. We are determined, insofar as we can bring it about, to establish a 6 per cent and 5 per cent economy. Where we are giving grants or incentives, we intend to enter into discussions and into negotiations with the recipients, encouraging and persuading them to follow the 6 per cent and 5 per cent rule. That will be our policy and our effort. Nothing will be done in a way which is not in accordance with the 6 per cent and 5 per cent rule, and nothing will be done which is not in accordance with the public interest and the welfare of the Canadian economy.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—GRANTS TO HOME OWNERS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, an interesting aspect of the explanation to this House might revolve around whether the government at one time appointed the chief executive officer of Imperial Oil to advise the government on competition while the company was skinning the country. Again, an explanation of the appointment of Ian Sinclair to the government's blue ribbon committee might be interesting.

However, I would like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he could explain how he proposes to remove the income bias from the urea formaldehyde foam insulation program which would allow upper income families to receive the $5,000 grant while lower income families would be deprived of it by the nature and structure of the program. In order to facilitate movement, I think it would be valuable for the minister to give us some indication of how he thinks that bias might be removed.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, the interpretation of the hon. member is misleading. It is quite clear that the program applies to everyone, irrespective of income. It has been brought to our attention, and it is obvious, that some people might have more difficulty in taking advantage of the program. This weekend, during a meeting with the National Advisory Council, I undertook to find ways to help these people. Indeed, the home owners' representatives who met with me this weekend have indicated that they want to work through a sub-committee of their own in order to address these very questions. Possibly, additional funds could come from the provinces. Now that we know the result of the board of review, we will indeed try to bring the private sector in for some compensation. At the same time, we will explore other federal government programs which could be beneficial to home owners. So, there are a variety of ways by which to help the home owners who have difficulties, but the very first thing which must be done is to pass the legislation now before the House, which would at least entitle every home owner to the possibility of receiving the minimum of $5,000.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I think that this is probably one of the truly momentous occasions when the minister has completely reversed himself, as he now admits that this is the minimum amount to be payable. In case he has slipped, perhaps he can clarify the matter for me.

TIMING OF GRANT PAYMENTS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, the minister is certainly correct when he says the bill should be quickly moved through the House. But is he asking to create a situation, as a result of that legislation, where $5,000 would be immediately mailed out to upper income families who have the money to clear the urea formaldehyde foam out of their homes, while senior citizens who are experiencing health problems and who do not have the money to remove the foam from their homes would be forced to wait until advisory committees, the private sector or other people come up with some money somewhere down the line? Would the minister like me to vote for a program which would give $5,000 to upper-income families and would not give the money to lower-income families in Canada? Would he like that?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member could vote one way or he could vote the other. I will not tell him how to vote. But I am telling him, however, that he has been putting pressure on members of the National Advisory Council who have met with me to try to change their decision unanimously to support the passage of this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Ouellet: Indeed, I would hope that in the coming hours the hon. member will not deny thousands of home owners the opportunity to receive the grants of $5,000 which are available to them. When I refer to the minimum of $5,000 for those who have gone through major expenditures and are spending more than $5,000, I use that expression that, indeed, they will be receiving this amount of money. We are on record as trying to find additional funds from the provinces, from the private sector and, if possible, from the federal government from other programs to help these home owners to get rid of the foam, if that is their desire, and to apply the corrective measures to their homes. I do hope the hon. member will stop bargaining with some of the representatives of the home owners and will indeed support this legislation.

THE ARTS

PREPARATION OF APPLEBAUM-HEBERT COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. The Privy Council Office agenda on Friday listed an extension of the term of employment of the co-chairmen of the federal cultural policy review committee to December 31, 1982. Could the minister tell the House when the final report of that commission is expected, since it was expected in September? If the report is delayed, as the extension would suggest, until some time in November or December, what will that do, in particular, to the minister's broadcasting policy?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, a week or two ago I was advised by the co-chairmen of the review committee, both Mr. Applebaum and Mr. Hebert, that they did not expect to be in a position to make their report public until the end of October. So, I would expect that the report would indeed be made public some time after that date. The extension was granted until the end of December in the event that there were some unforeseen delays in the publication. Obviously, before the government would want to finalize any broadcasting strategy, and I do underline the word "finalize", the government would want to have the benefit of the views of the Applebaum-Hebert Commission.

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. The minister knows that the Canadian Dairy Commission is being investigated by the RCMP. Will the minister tell the House whether or not, when the report comes in, it will be made public and whether it will be government policy to prosecute if, in fact, the report indicates that there have been some bad acts committed by members of the CDC?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I have already told the House that if there had been any wrongdoing by anyone, they would be penalized.

Mr. Thacker: Madam Speaker, the minister has not indicated whether the RCMP report will be made public. That is an important matter.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POWERS OF PROPOSED CANAGREX CORPORATION

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, the minister knows that Crown corporations have enormous power over Canadian citizens, yet he wants to set up still another one, namely, Canagrex, with the power to buy and sell as compared to the power simply to promote and facilitate. Why would the minister be prepared to pass authority from this House to still another Crown corporation which can abuse the rights of all Canadians by favouring certain regions over others?

• (1500)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that when Canagrex was before the committee I accepted an amendment from a member of the New Democratic Party which would make it mandatory for the Auditor General to review in depth the operations of Canagrex each year. I would challenge him to find provincial Crown corporations in the province of Alberta, which have tremendous authority, which are subject to that kind of scrutiny. He intimates, Madam Speaker, that we are creating something different here, that Crown corporations in Saskatchewan, British Columbia or Ontario do not have that kind of authority. They all have that kind of authority. He implies we are trying to create some kind of monster.

I challenge the hon. member to find any private sector company which has not had some faults in its operation. I am not saying and never did say that the Canadian Dairy Commission was perfect. But it has been investigated two or three times and, as I said earlier, if someone has done something wrong there, let them be found, charged, prosecuted, and let them take the consequences.

REPLY OF MR. OUELLET DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of an answer which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) gave not once, but twice. I would like to give him the opportunity of correcting the record if he in fact made an error, as I think he did. It was a very important question.

I refer, Madam Speaker, to the $5,000 sum for which UFFI victims are eligible. I would like to ask the minister to clarify this, if he would. He said twice that the minimum amount available to victims would be $5,000.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because question period is over. If the hon. member needs further clarification, he can get it tomorrow, but that is not a point of order.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I would like to have an opportunity to raise a question of privilege arising out of the remarks of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) during question period. He implied that I had been twisting the arms of the members of the home owners' council to have them change their unanimous decisions of this weekend. I suggest the decisions are not unanimous, that the minister is mistaken, and he has maligned me—

Madam Speaker: Order. That is not a question of privilege either.

WAYS AND MEANS

On the Order: Government Notices of Motions:

July 22, 1982—The Minister of Finance:

That the notices of ways and means motions to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971, tabled in the House on June 28, 1982, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and that the committee shall report its findings thereon no later than September 30, 1982; provided that, if the House is not sitting when the report has been completed, the report may be deposited with the Clerk of the House and shall thereupon be deemed to have been laid upon the Table.

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to section (2) of Standing Order 21, this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under Government Orders later this day, or at the next sitting of the House.

Question No. 4,295—Mr. McKinnon:

1. In (a) 1979 (b) 1980 (c) 1981, how many days did each of Canada's destroyers spend at sea?

2. What percentage of the defence budget, exclusive of training, was manpower related costs for the fiscal year (a) 1979-80 (b) 1980-81 (c) 1981-82 (d) 1982-83?

3. For the same years, what percentage of the defence budget was training related?

4. In terms of new recruits and skilled personnel, what was the percentage of eligibles re-enlisting in (a) the Mobile Command (b) the Maritime Command (c) the Air Command (d) any others for the fiscal year (i) 1978-79 (ii) 1979-80 (iii) 1980-81 (iv) 1981-82?

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. See table below.

2. (a) 1979/80—57.5 per cent
(b) 1980/81—54.9 per cent
(c) 1981/82—54.6 per cent (forecast)
(d) 1982/83—52.0 per cent (estimates)

The above percentages include pay and allowances for both military and civilian personnel, contributions and payments in respect of personnel benefit plans and personnel support such as food and clothing.

3. (a) 1979/80—13.0 per cent
(b) 1980/81—12.6 per cent
(c) 1981/82—12.4 per cent (forecast)
(d) 1982/83—11.9 per cent (estimates)

The above percentages include pay and allowances for military and civilian personnel as well as operations, maintenance and capital expenditures.

4. Since statistical data is not kept on the basis of functional commands, information has been grouped by trades specific to navy, army and air force plus those common to all three environments. The statistics for re-enrolment (after having been released) and re-engagement (after having completed the basic engagement) are listed in tables I and II below.

*A sea day is defined as a period of 24 hours underway, part days being cumulative. For example, a destroyer engaged in daily operations from 0800 until 1600 on three separate days would accumulate one sea day of service.

Note: The destroyers St. Croix, Columbia and Chaudière were not operational during the period.

PROJECTS COSTS EACH YEAR FOR CF-18

Question No. 4,356—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Was the contract payment for the F-18A for 1982-83 $440 million and did the main estimates tabled in February 1982 show a budgeted expenditure of $751 million and, if so, for what purpose is the extra $311 million to be used?

2. What are the projected costs for each year of the contract for the F-18A, broken down into (a) contract payment (b) inflation (c) exchange (d) other expenses?

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Since the main estimates were tabled in February, 1982, some figures had to be adjusted to take into account new data on economic price adjustment and exchange rates. As a result, the 1982/83 budgeted expenditures for the CF-18 program now stand at $802M.

The original contract with McDonnell Douglas Corporation for the supply of 137 aircraft and ancillary equipments called for a fiscal year 1982-83 payment of $440 million. The contract has been amended to cover in part the purchase of a 138th aircraft and necessary engineering changes bringing to $448M the 1982/83 payment schedule.

An economic price adjustment clause obligates either party to reimburse or credit the other yearly for the difference between actual inflation and the 8 per cent contract baseline. Actual inflation in the United States aeronautical sector has been higher than the 8 per cent baseline provided for in the contract and as a consequence, the projected FY 1982-83 payment to the contractor will be approximately $500 million in U.S. dollars.

The difference between the $500 million payment for the aircraft contract and the budgeted expenditure of $802 million is for exchange ($103M) related to the contract payment and other expenses ($199M) for a total of $302 million.

Note 1: Other expenses cover program elements such as spares, aircraft maintenance support equipment, simulators, missiles, infrastructure, engineering changes, training courses and hardware, publications, research and development charges, federal sales tax and program management charges.

2. (a), (b), (c) and (d) The projected contract payments, inflation, exchange premiums and other expenses for each year of the program are as indicated below:

Mr. Smith: I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

[English]

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary if he yet has an answer to question No. 4,344. Some time ago the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said there was a committee of public officials from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development looking into the important question of northern taxation. I have searched high and low in that department and have not been able to find any public official who will admit to being a member of that committee.

It would seem to be a very simple question, and of course it would not be embarrassing to the government at all unless, of course, the minister has misled the House and no such committee exists.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I do not have the question or a progress report in front of me, but I will make an inquiry on behalf of the hon. member.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-92, An Act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport.

Madam Speaker: There are eight motions standing on the notice paper at report stage of Bill C-92. Motions Nos. 1, 3, 7 and 8 should be debated separately and voted on separately. Motions Nos. 2 and 4 should be grouped for debate, and because both motions are concerned with the principle of financial self-sufficiency, a vote on motion No. 2 will dispose of motion No. 4. Motions Nos. 5 and 6 will be debated together and voted on separately.

Mr. Ian Deans (for Mr. Skelly) moved:

Motion No. 1

July 23, 1982—That Bill C-92, an act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be amended in Clause 2 adding immediately after line 17 at page 3 the following:

"(f) shall, where possible, attempt to complement the development of a Canadian marine industrial strategy."

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, this motion follows very closely an amendment we presented in committee which asks that the bill have an additional objective. In committee we had asked that there be a specific statement which encourages Canadian traffic to move through Canadian ports. We thought this was most important because it is common knowledge that there is a good deal of Canadian traffic now going through American ports which should be going through Canadian ports. That was voted down in committee and we asked that it be added.

We now have an amendment from the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) which states that the port policy shall, where possible, attempt to complement the development of the Canadian marine industrial strategy. Members of this House surely know that it is the position of this party, and I would hope of all parties, that the time is long overdue when we must develop our own shipping to a much greater degree. Most of our ships are not built in Canada or manned by Canadians. Quite frequently, of course, it is ships of convenience which come into our ports and carry out goods at very reduced prices.

As part of a marine industrial strategy we feel very strongly that there must be training programs for people who want to get into the shipping industry. If you meet with marine unions and with the people who have had a long history on the docks and in the industry, they are all in their late middle age or older. It is really criminal, Mr. Speaker, that young people in our country are not being trained in the necessary skills for the marine industry. In fact, many of our skilled people come from overseas. It is important that we have a positive program of shipbuilding. Space should be reserved for this in the development of our ports. There should be a real promotion of the shipbuilding industry. No longer do we want to see docks made in Japan with a subsidy from this government and then towed to the port of Vancouver. I support this amendment and I hope other parties will as well.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, the amendment in essence commends the support of everybody in this chamber. However, I have some reservation as to whether this is the proper bill under which it should be debated. In any event, the end sought by the amendment is commendable and should be given serious consideration by this government.

In the last three or four days I have attempted frequently to rise to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) what the Japanese trade officials said to him when he put the specific question, as he alleges, as to who will transport our Canadian natural resources from our country to theirs and other Asian nations. In that case it refers specifically to gas, but there is also the question of coal.

When the government under the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was defeated by the NDP and the reigning Liberal government, the then minister of transport, the distinguished hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), had gone 90 per cent of the way toward the gradual establishment of a merchant marine for Canada. It was then killed. It is dead.

The holier-than-thou attitude of my friends to the left seems to promote the development of a marine strategy for Canada to a very high level. They conveniently forget that just two short years ago the end they are now seeking to achieve would have been accomplished had they not got into bed with my friends across the way. That is just one example. I am sure dozens of members on this side of the House can cite amendments which, had they not got into a holy alliance two years ago, would now be effective. That end will I support without any question. Whatever the amendment in principle means, if it does mean the development of a maritime strategy for this country, it could only be supported and endorsed. Indeed, it has to be supported and endorsed. If it means greater safety, if there is some way we can use ports legislation to create an understanding and awareness of the need for greater safety and greater training, then by all means let us support it.

It is a matter of some regret that the member would use this ports legislation to bring in an amendment that should be dealt with somewhere else. It should be dealt with in direct confrontation with this government over its failure to establish a marine strategy for this country, to re-establish a Canadian merchant marine, to reinforce in the minds of Canadians and in statute the urgency of Canada getting back some of the $4 billion or $5 billion annually that goes offshore to foreign cartels for the movement of our goods and the importation of goods and services. It is bad enough when they are transported directly by water, and even worse when done indirectly through ports in the United States. I will not belabour that point.

In principle, the amendment directs itself to a very worthwhile principle. I am not sure that Bill C-92, to establish a national ports corporation and a series of local port corporations, is the vehicle to do it. However, it gives us an opportunity to shed a little light on what the sponsor of this amendment has been attempting to do in recent weeks. By all means it has that type of general endorsement and support.

The government has been remiss. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) more than any other in this chamber is perfectly aware of missed opportunities. Foreign vessels have been hauling natural resources out of our north such as paper, coal and gas. This is occurring day in and day out. These foreign-owned vessels are crewed by other than Canadians. In terms of wheat, this involves billions. Not a bushel leaves Canada on a Canadian-registered, Canadian-crewed, Canadian-owned vessel. Why not? Thousands of jobs are at stake. It is either an absence of vision or an absence of will.

I suspect it is that we fall prey to the difficulty that occurs from time to time in this chamber. When a good idea is put forward, if it does not come from the government it is rejected. It is amoral to have put aside the work of the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville, who had put in place the steps that would have led to the gradual development of a Canadian merchant marine and, therefore, the resolution of this problem, albeit this government has been preoccupied. However, why it has not put in place in recent years a new national transportation act, I will never understand.

We have 27 horses in front of a vehicle that does not exist. We are entering into a debate that will be over later today. For the most part, hon. members will be pleased when it is over. However, we have in front of us dozens of horses without a vehicle. It is not in tune with the realities of the world today. There is no vehicle to load or to pull. The National Transportation Act is outdated. Its principal opening statement is outdated. It does not meet the needs for the balance of this century.

I support the principle of the amendment. However, I have some doubt as to whether this is the proper place to deal with it. I commend the Johnnys-come-lately to my left for having thought to see some two years after the fact whether they did let the horse out of the barn by failing to close the door.

• (1520)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) is seeking the floor. He was not in his place when the amendment in his name was introduced, and he is deemed to have spoken. Is there the unanimous consent of the House for the hon. member for Comox-Powell River to speak at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I certainly would like to thank my colleagues for allowing me this opportunity to slip through the door and make some comments. I would also like to offer my thanks for the somewhat off-centre support of the previous speaker.

I recognize the job which was done in this sphere by the former minister of state for marine transportation and the former Conservative government. It is unfortunate that when a government is hanged, for whatever reasons, we generally lose some good programs with the bad. I was certainly a strong supporter of the previous government's efforts with regard to this particular matter, and I hope when this amendment is put that the Conservatives, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the Liberal Party support it.

In my speech at second reading of this bill I mentioned that it was extremely important that we provide direction in this legislation to the administrators of ports so that they can begin to develop and enhance linkages with other functions in addition to direct port functions. When there are spin-offs from actions taken by administrators of ports, we should attempt to capture those spin-offs. In the bill we should provide policy guidance for administrators so that they can develop and enhance a marine industrial strategy. If we were to do that, I think we would be moving in a very positive direction.

There should also be policy statements in other legislative initiatives so that there can be linkage between one body and another. I suggest there may well be an opportunity to make that kind of statement in the Canagrex bill. However, suffice it to say that I would like to have an indication from the Minister of Transport that he is willing to accept the basic concept within this amendment.

I would like to cite four examples of why administrative guidance in the bill is necessary. It basically would help to capture tens of thousands of jobs and enormous revenues associated with related or complementary marine industrial activities.

What really brought on this amendment was the recent announcement by Dome Petroleum that it would become involved in shipyard development on the west coast. While seeking support for the Rim gas project, Dome went up and down the west coast telling a number of communities that there would be a shipyard developed and that it would be used to build two of four proposed LNG carriers to carry natural gas to Japan from British Columbia. A year later, last Friday we saw in the newspapers that Dome Petroleum had been given the go ahead by the province of British Columbia, and Dome announced that the marine industrial activities related to this project would accrue to Japan. It was announced that not four carriers would be built, but five, and that all of them would likely be built in Japan. Each of those LNG carriers represents 2.5 million hours of employment. Just the containment system on one of those vessels would put 400 individuals to work for two and a half years. We are giving up an enormous number of jobs, about 2,000, for two and a half years on just that one order.

We must understand that a drydock is part of a port facility. It is part of the interplay and the organic growth between ports and other allied functions. Dome Petroleum decided last year that it wanted to build a drydock for the Beaufort Sea. That project was bid on by a Vancouver company, but Dome decided it would be better built in Japan and those jobs were created offshore. Dome Petroleum is an example of a company into which the federal government is putting tremendous amounts of taxpayers' money, yet Dome is selling off resources at fire sale prices. The industrial spin-offs are going to Japan, basically, and that is wrong.

In the administration and development of ports it is imperative that the administrators be given policy guidance and that benefits be captured for Canadians in the placement and development of other marine activities which enhance or relate to a certain port.

The second example I would like to cite is the case of the port at Prince Rupert. That port involves Federal Commerce and Navigation and the National Harbours Board. Federal Commerce and Navigation will be shipping coal to Japan in four large bulk carriers. Federal Commerce and Navigation, a Canadian company, in conjunction with the National Harbours Board and a number of others, will be developing this project and receiving government funds and assistance. However, on the other side of the coin, two of those four large bulk carriers will be built in Korea and the other two in Belgium. That is absolutely ridiculous in terms of an economic strategy. What has happened, basically, is that the government has given up, or given away by default, tens of thousands of jobs associated with this, plus the revenue which would accrue.

Today in the House and every day for the past week statements have been made by hon. members on all sides of the House which have indicated a sincere commitment. These statements have not been Johnny-come-lately statements. There is tremendous potential in the marine industrial development field and the government must act on it.

CP Ships has to be the most blatant example of contempt for Canadians. Today there was a rather crude attempt to bootleg a question into this House. I wonder how the government can explain the appointment of Ian Sinclair, the chief executive officer of Canadian Pacific, to lead the Canadian economy out of the Liberal wilderness. One of the subsidiaries of CP has 40 ships which it will not register in Canada. These ships carry Canadian goods to and from many parts of the world. About 1,500 to 2,000 jobs are directly associated with those ships. They have British officers and foreign crews. The money they earn from transporting goods is deposited in Bermuda to avoid the payment of tax. To my way of thinking that is absolutely unscrupulous, and to appoint Ian Sinclair as economic adviser lacks any wisdom whatsoever.

We have the same problem with Federal Commerce and Navigation. That company will be involved with Dome in the Arctic Pilot Project. There will be four LNG carriers which will have state of the art equipment. They will have cold-temperature steel and ice-hardened hulls, and they will be working in Arctic areas. If that project goes ahead with those two companies, because of their very poor track records and the absolute vacuum in government policy in this area, the result will be that those four carriers will probably be built in Finland or some other European country.

Just to recap, it is imperative that this government get off its hands and begin to shape and develop a marine industrial strategy. It seems that the government is absolutely oblivious to the fact that important benefits are being given away. The Department of Finance, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Transport are all involved. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is involved, as is the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. All these departments seem to be working at cross-purposes. There does not seem to be a sense of policy direction. Each department has its own goals and, unfortunately, in the competitive building of their empires we wind up with the chaos in the marine industries we have today. We are selling off resources at fire sale prices. Ships to carry Canadian goods are being built in foreign countries.

The proposal we have put forward is a needed change. The previous speaker spoke of the initiatives his government took. This government has taken no taken initiatives, and because of the latest insult by Dome Petroleum to the people of the west coast, we have written to every municipality on the coast of British Columbia asking that they pass resolutions and send telegrams to this government deploring its failure to fill this policy vacuum. We have written to every marine industrial union, every marine operating union and every shipbuilder asking them to pass the same kinds of resolutions and to send them to the Premier of British Columbia and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). We have asked them to appoint representatives who can come together in a meeting to develop a steering committee. We have asked them to form a common front lobbying organization to meet face to face with the Premier of British Columbia and his ministers and bureaucrats—who are in competition within the same government—and to demand action on this issue. Once that is resolved provincially, they should come to Ottawa and confront the Prime Minister with the problem of the loss of jobs in British Columbia and confront these ministers and bureaucrats as well. They will come, because tens of thousands of British Columbians are out of work. They need that employment, Mr. Speaker. The province is roughly $1 billion in the hole. It virtually amounts to negligence to give away those sources of revenue, without even taking into account the revenue that would accrue to Canada as a whole.

It is vitally important to develop a marine industrial strategy to capture those benefits. It is unfortunate that the people who are working and who are busy must expend their resources on such massive efforts to convince governments of what is obvious.

This should be happening in other regions of the country as well. The Atlantic region should be forming a common front organization to lobby the provinces and the federal government. In Quebec by 1983 two shipyards will lay off 2,000 people because the order books are empty beyond that time and they will lose jobs to foreigners. In Ontario there is the same kind of problem. In the House the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) has appealed to the government for action on many occasions. Unfortunately, members on the government side continue to tell us about the office of industrial benefits. The last time they told us about this grand initiative they compared it to the offshore supply office in Great Britain in which thousands of people are involved. And the last time we were told about Canada's initiative, 24 people were involved in projecting this two or three decades into the next century.

The Canada Oil and Gas Act was held up because it is pitifully weak. The manpower procurement section was hopeless, as was the provision to capture the industrial spin-off. Eventually, in order to resolve the impasse, when we realized that the ministers would not strengthen the provisions in the legislation, we settled for their appearing before the committee, in camera, to explain the mechanisms they would use to develop and capture those industrial benefits. They came up with the invention of the office of industrial benefits, but it does not have any direct authority, nor the human or financial resources to carry out a mandate such as is before us today.

If the government chooses to respond to this, I would plead with it not to use those ludicrous examples of government initiative. I implore the government to present a marine industrial strategy, a mechanism by which we can capture the benefits which we are literally giving away by default to the Asians and Europeans.

I urge members of the House to accept the amendment that I have put forward, Mr. Speaker. It does not in any way hamper the thrust of the bill but simply asks the administrators of Canadian ports, whenever possible, to enhance other benefits that result from their activities and to make a slight effort to capture them.

There is another example we could use in order to bring to shore ships owned by Canadian companies but registered in foreign countries and sailed by foreign crews. The United Nations commission on trade and development advocated the adoptions of a resolution by all member nations that would provide for 40 per cent of the exports and imports of a country being carried in its own flagships. The trading partner would carry the other 40 per cent and 20 per cent would be available to itinerant carriers.

If we were to adopt that resolution and insist that our 40 per cent be carried in Canadian bottoms and, if there were no Canadian hulls available, that our trading partners be given our share of the trade for future consideration, then an opportunity would exist to allow those Canadian-owned foreign registered vessels one year's grace to be registered in Canada and carry Canadian crews. After that year of grace, they would then forever hold their peace. They would then be on the lowest priority for any Canadian cargo coming or going to this country. They would have to wait until Canadian registered ships were filled, then the ships of our trading partners, then any others and then their vessels would be eligible.

Unfortunately, the government has not put that policy in position. But if the government would adopt the UNCTAD resolution and insist on a one-year grace period with no taxation benefits and no incentives—either bring the Canadian ships to shore or do not carry Canadian cargoes—there would be a stampede to develop a Canadian merchant fleet.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to say a few words to thank the members of the Committee on Transport and Communications who worked very hard on Bill C-92, and had quite a few meetings in addition to their regular schedule. I therefore wish to express my gratitude.

[English]

In the committee report amendments have been made to nine clauses and sometimes there was more than one amendment per clause. These amendments are often of a technical nature and a few are of a substantive or quasi-substantive nature. For example, the contributions made by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) to Clause 13(32) with respect to the tabling of the annual report and its automatic reference to the standing committee and the automatic reference of ministerial directives to the standing committee are of a rather substantive nature.

I might underline that there are not only government amendments but two are from the New Democratic Party, from the hon. member for Regina West and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), three are from the Progressive Conservative Party, one from the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, and two from the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook).

The government has already indicated that it is prepared to accept the committee report in its entirety as well as a number of amendments which will be introduced at this stage of the proceedings this afternoon.

Nevertheless, I should like to reject the first one, not that the motion is not worthwhile in its attempt to "complement the development of a Canadian marine industrial strategy". That is a very good idea. There is no doubt that any industrial strategy in any sector needs to be complemented. One agrees with that almost from the point of departure—

Mr. Skelly: Then why don't you do it?

Mr. Pepin: I don't think we should spend the afternoon talking only about a deep sea fleet for Canada, which is only one aspect of a marine industrial strategy. I do not think we should become obsessed with this single issue which, though important, is not the main purpose of this afternoon's debate.

As the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) knows, an industrial strategy is not to be found in a single bill; it is to be found in a body of laws, regulations and practices which together constitutes an industrial strategy. This afternoon we are attending to the ports' aspect of this marine industrial strategy. Another day we will deal with coastal trade, another day with customs and another day with other aspects.

Mr. Skelly: We will both be in the Senate by then!

Mr. Pepin: I do not intend to go. This intention is a good one but, as my friend from Dartmouth-Halifax East has said, this is neither the time nor the place for it. I think we should concentrate on the bill at hand.

• (1540)

Another point I want to make is that the debate, which has taken place now over almost ten years, and particularly in the last two years, and the extensive consultations which have taken place, have not been on the deep sea fleet; they have been on ports policy. So my hon. friend is sort of sidetracking the main issue when he brings in this amendment on deep sea shipping. As my hon. friend knows, and he knows a good number of things, some of the ideas he has introduced this afternoon do not enjoy a very wide consensus in Canada today. There is quite a lot of division, particularly in his province, over these matters. So to come in now and introduce this as a major objective of Bill C-92 would be, in my view, divisive. As of now, most of the bill we have in front of us has been received in a mood of conciliation, so I think we should keep it that way. Consequently we on this side, Mr. Speaker, will vote against the motion.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I find myself on the horns of a dilemma with this particular amendment, because if there is anything I dislike doing it is to encourage the "Liberal Party West", the NDP, when they come up with a good idea, because it does encourage them in other socialist thinking. However, the basic wording of the motion is something almost like motherhood, and nobody can disagree with that.

Then I have the dilemma of finding myself almost in agreement with the minister when he says the motion does not belong in the ports bill. I certainly do not want to encourage him either. However, when I look at this amendment and see that it is really one of those motherhood statements to the effect that we should have a marine policy in Canada, I do not think anyone disagrees with that. It is the right idea but is certainly in the wrong place. It has no business whatsoever being in the ports bill.

This bill deals with the administration of a port, but it does lead into any number of things. One of them, of course, is the terrible lack of action by this Liberal government in terms of an over-all ports transportation policy.

As an example, Mr. Speaker, why does the province of British Columbia find it necessary to import all of its liquor stocks for the Liquor Control Board of British Columbia through ports in Texas? I think part of the answer, of course, is perhaps a bit of shrinkage, if I may use that word, which may take place on the docks. Nevertheless, that is legitimate business for the port of Vancouver or Prince Rupert.

Another example: why does a considerable amount of imports bound for Ontario come through the port of Oakland? Very simply, because the American railways have better transportation policies than this government has, and as a result it is cheaper to do it that way than to bring it into Vancouver, employ Canadians and use the Canadian rail system.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) has made a nice statement, but it does not go far enough because it does not deal with the total transportation complex in Canada. For that matter, neither does the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). He is so worried about the flak he is getting over VIA Rail, so worried about trying to maintain his power in terms of the control and operation of the ports in this country, that he really does not have the time to sit down and say, hey, how come this great nation at one point had one of the largest merchant fleets in the world, the fourth largest navy, but today we have difficulty getting a couple of corvettes ready to go to sea? The merchant marine has totally disappeared, at a cost of literally hundreds of thousands of jobs.

The hon. member is absolutely correct when he talks about $6 billion worth of wheat shipped out of Canada in foreign bottoms. I am not suggesting that we do not sell wheat unless it is shipped in a Canadian bottom, but I am suggesting that he is quite correct when he talks about percentages. We are probably the only major exporter in the world which does not have some kind of firm policy and legislation which says: "If you want our wheat, we are delighted to sell it to you, but a percentage"—whether it is 30 per cent, 40 per cent or 60 per cent—"must be transported in Canadian ships." The same thing applies to all other exports from this country. The same thing applies to the vast amount of material we import. A percentage must be in Canadian bottoms. This would revitalize the whole industry right off the bat.

As far as shipbuilding is concerned, when I look at the losses this government has suffered at the expense of the Canadian people in any number of wild schemes—Atomic Energy of Canada for one, where they lose money even if they sell something—surely to goodness there is absolutely no excuse for the literally thousands and thousands of shipyard workers being out of jobs with no hope of getting them. I have seen the shipbuilding ways on the west coast; they are empty and they should not be empty. There is no reason why something should not be built there. There is no reason why shipbuilding in Canada could not become a major industry. The answer I generally get to the question of shipbuilding in Canada is that the Koreans work cheaper, that the Japanese are more efficient with different and better technology in shipbuilding. Whatever happened to Canadian inventiveness, Mr. Speaker? Whatever happened to Canadian gumption? We did it for a lot of years and very efficiently, but we are not doing it now. We should be doing it.

I have talked to any number of sailors who would like to sail on a Canadian ship. The hon. member mentioned the CPR and their 40 ships under flags of convenience. The flag of convenience ships flying the flag of Liberia or Panama are really a blot on Canadian shipping and they deprive Canadians of jobs unnecessarily. I say unnecessarily because, again, although something is just slightly cheaper if done some other way, if you had to do it in the way we are suggesting, through a Canadian ship, then of course you might just have to be considerably more efficient.

I support the hon. member for Comox-Powell River on the thrust of his amendment, but I do not think it belongs in the ports bill. It belongs in a real transportation policy statement, which should also include the railways and their utilization in shipping goods from the ports to their destination. It should include the Great Lakes, and should include an over-all industrial plan of one kind or another. We do not have any such thing. I wonder if there is anyone in the Department of Transport who even thinks about it once in a while. The minister nods his head; he says they think about it once in a while. Get some of their thoughts on paper and bring them back to the House so we can have a good look at them and perhaps develop something, so that eventually we can get these things unified to work in the best interests of all Canadians.

I am supporting the hon. member for Comox-Powell River. I think it is the right idea in the wrong place, but why not? Does it really make any difference? The proposed amendment is meaningless, but why not?

• (1550)

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to belabour the House, I just want to make a few comments on the use of the word "strategy". This word is in common usage by members of the New Democratic Party in calling for a national industrial strategy and in calling for, as the present amendment provides, a Canadian marine industrial strategy. I would like to remind the House that the term "strategy" has to do with the things that are done in the tents of generals. It has not to do with the orderly laying out of a long-range plan which identifies goals, alternative means to reach those goals and the financial and physical wherewithal in order to carry out the pursuit of those objectives.

I am trying to submit that the use of the term "industrial strategy", which many have come to regard as a buzzword because the term appears in every speech made by the New Democratic Party, really creates a picture of conspiring behind closed doors and adapting strategy or plan of attack in order to take the best advantage of your opponent or competitor.

If that is what the NDP is trying to urge by its constant reference to the development of an industrial strategy, then its members are aiding and abetting the government which with every change of cabinet and with every change of economic conditions is creating new strategies. Often they are failed strategies, as we have seen by recent budgets.

What I am about to suggest to the NDP is that its members consider using a term that evokes a positive notion about what we are trying to achieve. In this present amendment, the wording could have been "Canadian marine development plan" rather than an "industrial strategy". We might get much further with that wording because we could then talk about an open public dialogue, with the co-operation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the government, as to what the ingredients and essential elements of that plan might be. We could deal with issues like the recent decision of Dome Petroleum to build an LNG plant near Prince Rupert and trade off deals with the Japanese and others that that would entail. We could talk about whether or not in letting contracts for the development of the new port at Ridley Island we would award contracts for piling pipe to a Japanese company, for the car dumpers to a British company or for the stacker reclaimer equipment to another Japanese company. Both in this House and in committee we could debate the essential ingredients for an industrial development plan and stop playing games and talking about strategizing.

We have heard the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), ever since he was part of a conspiracy group that brought down the former Conservative government, talk about bringing in an industrial development strategy for Canada, but all we have seen is this document put out with the November 12 budget called "Economic Development for the Eighties". We have no specific delineation of objectives, targets and goals. We have not seen a critical and structural analysis of the alternative paths to achieving those goals, or a recommendation as to which would be the favourite path, how those goals could be achieved in terms of financial resources and in terms of the joint role of the private and public sector in pursuing those goals.

I am saying though that we should have a Canadian industrial plan and we should have a marine industrial plan which encompasses the ingredients of port policy. But for the life of me I cannot see how the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) feels that he can goad the government into developing this elusive Canadian industrial strategy by writing it into a piece of legislation. It has to be the consequence of sustained political pressure in this House both in question period and in committee. It will not achieve anything in terms of the goals which the hon. member is seeking by merely writing the words into a piece of legislation.

If the hon. member for Comox-Powell River reads subclauses (a) through (e) of Section 2(3), he will find that they do express the objectives of the national ports policy. We find these subclauses read:

(a) is an effective instrument of support for the achievement of Canadian international trade objectives and of national, regional and local economic and social objectives;

(b) is efficient;

(c) provides accessibility and equitable treatment in the movement of goods and persons to users of Canadian ports;

(d) provides local port corporations with a high degree of autonomy—

Some of the elements of an industrial plan for marine development are already there, and merely adding the words of his motion at the end of the subclause does not add anything of substance to Bill C-92 as presently presented.

If we had a Canadian marine industrial development plan within the context of a larger Canadian industrial development plan, then we would not have to deal with such a situation as the immature tactics of the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Lumley) have created by frustrating the import of Japanese automobiles. We would have long ago negotiated a Canada-Japan trade agreement parallel to the Canada-U.S. auto pact. We would not be playing these childish games with our very important trading partners in Japan and other Pacific countries. We would not have had to bring the Minister of Transport to a dead halt a year ago when he and his officials were dead-set to award contracts for the dredging at Roberts Bank to offshore, foreign firms when, in the final analysis, there was a reputable Canadian dredging company which won the bid after sustained representation by some members of British Columbia before the transport committee.

If we had a Canadian marine industrial development plan we would not have had the situation in 1974 or 1975 when representatives of the NDP government in British Columbia, with which the hon. member for Comox-Powell River enjoys some relationship, went to Stockholm, Sweden to buy a ferry because that government did not have the foresight to provide assistance to the west coast shipbuilding industry to build a ferry in British Columbia. We have hypocritical members in the New Democratic Party talking about Canada first and about an industrial development strategy favouring our shipbuilding industry, but their own friends in British Columbia went to Stockholm, Sweden to buy a large ferry which could have been manufactured in British Columbia using British Columbia labour.

We have had enough of this nonsense of people talking about strategy. Strategizing is exactly what we have been getting for far too long from the government opposite. Everything is done behind closed doors like a coterie of generals in their tents trying to decide how to stand off the enemy hordes. We should start planning out front with the public. We should take a logical and realistic approach to our trade relations with other countries, to our taxation policies, to our Canada first initiatives. We should do that in the context of an open public discussion through a standing committee, together with all Canadians across the country.

I suggest the words of the motion are wrong. The intent is admirable and commendable but the use of the term "strategy" is dead wrong.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I notice in the dictionary that the words "strategy" and "plan" mean the same thing. Might I have unanimous consent to change my motion, if it will remove the commi-pinko connotation of the word "strategy" and thus make my motion appealing to the Conservatives, by using the word "plan" in its place?

Mr. Siddon: Yes, I will agree with that.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimous consent at this point.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I will not take much time in the House to speak on this bill, but coming from the city of Victoria I should point out to the House how people feel about this bill.

First, I might say that we are quite concerned about the power that is going to flow to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) after this bill is passed. He has sufficient powers at the present time and to add to them seems to us unnecessary.

The port of Victoria being a public port, it will under the bill be entitled to a public harbour advisory committee whose role it will be to advise the minister. When the bill was published I wrote and asked the minister about this. Victoria does not have an ordinary harbour. Its harbour is scenic. Victoria's inner harbour is undergoing a lengthy and expensive process of removing a tank farm from the harbour shore. We did that solely because it was unsightly and we did not wish to have it in our harbour. When I think of what we might get in the way of a ministerially-appointed advisory committee, I would worry about it as much as the people around Peggy's Cove would worry if they found out that they were to have a refinery built there or were to start offloading LNG.

However, we have moved, by constant watchfulness of our own interests in Victoria, toward continued beautification of the harbour. For instance, it now has a walkaway around the entire inner harbour on the city side. As I say, this is not an ordinary kind of harbour. The rules made for Vancouver harbour or for Montreal harbour would not apply in Victoria at all. This is of great concern to us. For instance, they wanted to move the coast guard buildings to bring them together on the inner harbour or partly on the outer harbour, I suppose it was. The structure which they planned for that function was simply not acceptable to the people of Victoria. There was so much public outcry against it that the department had to look at it again and eventually come in, with a set of buildings which were acceptable. This is the kind of public participation in port planning which the city of Victoria wants. We know what we want there, but it seems to us that no one else seems to know.

In line with that, I wrote to the minister on March 25. I ended up by writing:

> Your co-operation in ensuring a high level of municipal involvement would be appreciated.

I put that in after I had expressed my concern about the people who would be appointed to the harbour advisory committee.

The answer I received from the minister was not the one I had hoped for, by any means. I would respectfully submit that it may well have been part of a form letter which went to other members with harbours in their constituencies. He wrote:

> Public harbour advisory councils will be made of three to five members, representative of local interests, and selected on the basis of their experience and capacity in port activities. The members shall be appointed by the Minister of Transport, to whom the council will provide its recommendations. Before appointing members, the advice of community leaders and port officials will be sought to ensure an effective council.

We have not had that kind of seeking out of advice from community leaders in Victoria. As far as I know to date, there has been a trip made to Victoria by some officials of the department, but we must have a continuing dialogue between the department and officials in Victoria, that is the municipal council, and the council of Esquimalt. It would be quite likely to cause a great deal of harm if the minister were to appoint people who were not in sympathy with the aims of the city fathers of the city of Victoria and the other municipalities involved.

I had hoped the minister would realize this, carry on negotiations out there and give us some intimation of who he was planning to appoint. If it is to be a bunch of Liberal hacks left over from some of the 78 constituencies which they lost in the west in the last election, then we would be better off without them. If we get that kind of personnel on the committee, believe me, there will be extreme difficulty in the ports bill operating in that particular city.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak for a few moments in connection with the port and harbour of St. John's Newfoundland, while we are considering this bill. First of all, I want to point out that St. John's is one of the ports which comes under the old legislation that is being replaced by the present legislation. There are 14 ports, of which St. John's, Newfoundland, is one. Presumably St. John's, Newfoundland will be expected to become a local ports corporation at some future date if the legislation which we are considering now is passed by the House.

Also I want to point out to the minister that the port of St. John's, Newfoundland, which is a major port in that capital city, has had no major capital expenditures in connection with that facility since 1965. Of course, the expenditures in 1965 were a result of a program commenced by the Diefenbaker administration to improve the harbour facilities in St. John's. If we look at St. John's and then look at other ports in Canada, by comparison huge sums have been spent in these other ports. I am not saying that the spending on these other ports is improper or not needed, but just let me point out that in the port of Saint John, New Brunswick, for example, over the period of the last ten years at least $80 to $90 million has been spent on capital projects.

I could look at all kinds of other ports across the country where I could point to tens and tens of millions of dollars being spent. I could point out the unfairness of what happened with respect to the synchrolift facility in the dockyard of St. John's, Newfoundland where the federal Government of Canada, which owns the dockyard, would not spend $21 million to instal a synchrolift that would make the dockyard viable, a dockyard which it was given free, gratis, in 1949. At the same time it spent double that amount in Halifax to assist in its new shipyard facilities and, of course, the same occurred in Vancouver and other ports. I will skip all that, but the harbour facilities in St. John's have not been improved since 1965.

There was an order in council on January 15, 1981 under which the government assumed responsibility for the long-term debt of the National Harbours Board. I believe it was about $300 million, but the government assumed responsibility for that debt. It relieved the National Harbours Board of interest charges of something like $18.4 million as a result of taking over the debt. Those interest charges and that debt were incurred in other major ports which now have major capital improvements but are debt free.

The result of this action by the government was that these ports are debt free. They had major capital costs which they no longer have. There was no assistance to ports such as St. John's, Newfoundland, that did not have any capital expenditure debt which could be written off at that particular time. The port of St. John's has an operating deficit of about $2 million.

I want to ask the minister whether it is the plan to have the government assume the debts of ports such as St. John's which were not included or received no benefit from the assumption of the debt by order in council on January 15, 1981. For example, what is to happen to the debt of the port of St. John's Newfoundland?

Also I want to ask the minister whether it is the intention to have the port of St. John's, Newfoundland, become a local ports corporation. The legislation suggests that a port cannot become a local ports corporation unless it is found to be financially viable. As I understand it, at the present time the port of St. John's, Newfoundland with the facilities which it now has is not financially viable. Therefore, what is to happen? Is that port to be left in limbo and run directly from Ottawa, from the headquarters of the new ports corporation with its local advisory board, or will it be given the right to a local management and some assistance to obtain the facilities which will enable it to become financially self-supporting?

When the minister has a chance, I would like him to enlighten me on that particular area. The whole justification for this new act is that it will allow for decentralized authority, local port management and operation, rather than the highly centralized control under the present act. For example, St. John's has a purely advisory body at the moment. I think it is called the St. John's port authority board. It is purely advisory. I do not think there is any statutory authority for their offices. Mr. Robert Innes is the chairman of that advisory body, but as far as I know there is no legal basis for his position at all. In any event, they only advise central headquarters. The other members are Mr. Humphries, regional director of the Canadian Coast Guard, Newfoundland region; Michael Walsh, general chairman of the Brotherhood and Railway Clerks Union—there are political appointments—Gerald Tilley, general manager of Carling O'Keefe Breweries of Canada Ltd.; and two others who are well-known Liberals. That does not mean to say that they do not have a contribution to make, but William Callahan was a former Liberal member of the House of Assembly and cabinet minister, and Mr. George Stockley was certainly a Liberal supporter in the past. Mr. Innes himself was a Liberal candidate in my byelection of 1976. God, how long have I been here? It has been too long!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Innes ran against me in the byelection of October 18, 1976, but I was returned on that occasion. It was the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) birthday. I was glad to be the birthday present they returned from St. John's West. I hope to be here when we finally give him the coup de grace when the next election comes.

• (1610)

In any event, Bob Innes was a Liberal candidate. That is not to say that he is not a fine gentleman and not doing a good job, because as far as I know, he is. Even a Liberal can have some virtue. There are some around who have something to be said for them. I do not know what has happened to me today! The spirit of kindliness and consideration has just swept over me. We have been here too long; it is time for this place to adjourn.

In any event, it is an illustration of the weakness of this system that patronage is so much a part of it. Of this six-man advisory council, at least three are certainly publicly identified Liberals, two are ex-candidates and, unfortunately, that does not give the right tone to such an important body. The port of St. John's harbour is very important to our whole economy, and to have the public feel that you must be a Liberal to be appointed to this advisory board and that is the only way you will get there unless we obtain power in the next election—when we do, we will certainly reverse that and put in the merit system. You will have to be a Conservative to merit any appointment then.

But that is a weakness of this system. I would prefer a system where certain bodies have to nominate representatives—and I think this is included in one of the amendments we are coming to—where at least half of the members would be nominated from various users of the port facilities, and the municipality. As I said, I have nothing against these gentlemen and they are doing their best against very high odds.

I also want to suggest to the minister that it is essential when this legislation is passed that the minor ports of Canada, of which St. John's is one in the context of Vancouver, and giant ports like Halifax and Toronto, have representatives on the national board of directors of this new corporation that we are setting up.

It is my understanding that of the 11 directors who will be on the board of this new corporation, three will be port authority chairmen. If this is the case and if I have my facts correct, then I suggest to the minister that he should make sure that these chairmen do not just come from Montreal, Vancouver and Halifax or from the three largest ports, and that, if at all possible, we have at least one from every province. There certainly should be a representative from Newfoundland—I suggest from the Port of St. John's—on the new board of directors of this authority. We have a Newfoundland representative on the board of Air Canada, another good Liberal. He raised funds and did his best to have me defeated in the 1976 byelection. I will do my best to see that he is transferred from Air Canada when we take our rightful place in office. But we do have a representative on the board of Air Canada and a representative on the board of the CNR, and therefore I suggest that it is very important—even more important—for us to have a representative of the province on the new Canada Ports Corporation.

Another point I wanted to make to the minister is that all of the transportation spending in Newfoundland in the last few years has been on modes other than the port of St. John's, which badly needs new facilities. St. John's has been trying to get new container facilities since 1976. It has been seeking $19.6 million, the cost some years ago of contructing the container facilities that are needed, which was turned down by the Treasury Board after my election in the byelection of 1976. I do not know if there is any connection between those two events. In any event, St. John's has been trying since then to obtain funding for this very necessary facility and there has not been any funding.

As the minister knows, there has been a major revitalization program for the railway; I believe it is $77 million. The harbour needs funds as well or it will fall into disuse. The minister has also announced spending of $70 million; $48 million for highways and $20 million for new airstrips on the Labrador coast. All this is necessary but I want to point out to him that it is necessary to spend some money on the port of St. John's, particularly now with the new set-up that is envisaged in this legislation.

I know that we do not have too much time, but while speaking about St. John's, it is extremely important that a freezer facility be constructed at the west end finger pier that would enable the transshipment of fish which are unloaded from one vessel to be stored in the freezer facility and then transferred to another vessel for shipment. This would give the longshoremen at St. John's very badly needed employment. This freezer facility would also enable ships to store cargo when they had to go on the synchrolift to be repaired. This freezer facility is an important issue in St. John's. I hope the minister or this new corporation will see that the necessary steps are taken.

One final point I would like to make while talking about the port of St. John's is that we have 276 registered fishermen in the port of St. John's. Anyone who travels through the narrows, as we call them, through that majestic entrance into St. John's harbour, with Cabot Tower located on Signal Hill and where the first telegraph message was sent across the Atlantic by Marconi at the beginning of the century, will see as they look down below at The Battery the residences of a number of fishermen perched on the rocks of The Battery. When one looks at the other side of the port in the district of St. John's West, Fort Amherst, one will see the homes of other fishermen who are constituents of mine. St. John's is also a fishing port. It is not just a port but a fishing port where we have a major fish plant of National Sea Products Limited. Of course, it is supplied largely by trawlers but they also take inshore fish. There are also other smaller fishing operations in that port.

These fishermen are, at the moment, dispossessed. They do not have any proper facilities in the port of St. John's for landing their fish, and the place where they formerly landed their fish is now being dredged and construction has begun for the new synchrolift. These fishermen do not have proper landing facilities, haul-out equipment and storage facilities, all of which they badly need.

There is now a plan by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to construct a facility at Prosser's Rock, but that even will take two or three years. It will be some time before it comes, a three-year period starting in 1983-84, we are told. The cost will be $4 million to $7 million for wharves and fish landing facilities. In the meantime we have 100 boats, 157 fishermen, 12.5 million pounds of fish that were caught last year from the port of St. John's which has a landed value of $2.5 million. We have workers there who are operating the two fish plants. The facilities for fishermen are badly needed.

We did propose a breakwater and facilities at The Battery but unfortunately the government, when it took over in 1980, stopped the plan that would see this carried out.

We have a number of users in the port of St. John's who have to be looked after. The fishermen are the most neglected of all of those users. I would like the minister, or the new port corporation, to see what they can do to help the Department of Fisheries and Oceans obtain some funds to instal proper facilities for these several hundred Newfoundland fishermen who are so important to the local economy.

Those are my remarks with reference to the port of St. John's. I would like to turn to another subject when we come to a relevant amendment, or to third reading, which I think is of great gravity and importance. It concerns a most deplorable situation in the port of Goose Bay, Labrador. It cannot be allowed to go any further without complete public ventilation. I am not satisfied at all with any steps which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has taken to rectify a situation of gouging the consumers of the Happy Valley-Labrador area of Newfoundland. I will expand on this subject at my next opportunity. If the minister can give me any information on these points, I would appreciate it.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, most of the answers my hon. friend asks for are in the committee proceeding. Indeed, St. John's did not have many debts to be forgiven and consequently did not benefit as much as others did. A certain amount of debt was kept in the books for most of the ports, if not all. With respect to St. John's, it is $1.7 million but in Saint John, New Brunswick, it is $7.2 million. Montreal is $9,470 million, which gives some indication of the principle that was implemented in this situation.

I just want to emphasize the fact that should the port of St. John's ever have needs greater than its financial self-sufficiency can take, all ports, including St. John's, will be entitled to grants from the Canadian government. So, the concept of self-sufficiency, which is an important one, does not mean that if the needs are beyond the financial capacity of the ports for particular projects, the Government of Canada will stay idle.

With regard to the local port corporation, my information is that St. John's is eligible to become one. With regard to the composition of the Canada Ports Corporation, it will be balanced by representation from all regions of Canada, in fairly equal numbers. These were some of the points which were raised.

• (1620)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like to have the attention of the House. The minister had previously spoken. I assume it was with the unanimous consent of the House that he was recognized a second time.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Skelly) negatived.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-92, An Act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 24 and 25 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"the management thereof,"

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Following the decision made earlier this day by the Speaker, motions Nos. 2 and 4 are to be grouped for debate. The Speaker ruled that because both motions are concerned with the principle of financial self-sufficiency, a vote on motion No. 2 would dispose of motion No. 4. Accordingly, I will also put motion No. 4 at this time, for purposes of debate.

Mrs. Mitchell moved:

That Bill C-92, An Act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 8 and 9 at page 11.

She said: Mr. Speaker, the subject of these amendments is economic, financial self-sufficiency in the case of local port corporations, better known as the Liberal policy of "user-pay" which, of course, is a policy which is fully supported by the Conservatives to my right. We are very concerned about these two clauses. I would just like to read for the record how Clause 2, under the objectives of the new port legislation, would read if amended as we propose:

(2) It is further declared that achievement of the objective of the national ports policy requires

(a) the establishment at ports of national or regional significance at which there is demonstrated local interest in the management thereof and that are expected to be financially self-sufficient—

That is the part of the bill with which we are concerned. We are fully in favour of local autonomy for as many ports in Canada as possible. We really do not agree that the whole criterion of financial self-sufficiency should be a prohibition to ports having a decentralized form of administration, having power within the regions to make their own decisions to the greatest possible degree and having their own board which is hopefully representative of the various levels of the region, the local levels of government and so on.

We are also concerned with the rather insidious wording of this clause. I wonder what is meant by "ports that are expected to be financially self-sufficient". Just what does that mean? If we take a look at the 15 ports which are listed as ports which may be eligible to become local port corporations, we find that quite a few of them have not been economically and financially self-sufficient in the past. For the record, I would like to list those 15 ports.

We heard about St. John's, Newfoundland from the hon. member who spoke quite eloquently. I am sure he knows it is not likely to be always financially self-sufficient, yet why should it not have local autonomy under good administrative practices, even if it occasionally does need some form of federal subsidy?

Halifax, Nova Scotia, is another port which I do not believe has been traditionally self-sufficient.

Then there is the port at Saint John, New Brunswick. In committee we heard of the great concern of one of the members, which we would share, that although the federal government has written off the debts of most ports, there is still a considerable debt in that case, and although it came through the province, there should certainly be fair treatment of that port. If it wants to become a local port corporation in the future, why should it not have that right, even if it may require some subsidization at some future time?

Belledune, New Brunswick, is another port. There are also Sept-Iles and Chicoutimi in Quebec. I do not believe those three ports have always been financially self-sufficient in the past. Baie des Ha! Ha! in Quebec has shown a profit, as has Trois Rivières. These two ports have shown a profit and would probably qualify under this specific criterion. The port at Quebec City has not shown a profit, nor has the port at Montreal, which are both very important ports.

Prescott elevator, which handles mostly grain, has shown a profit, and so has Colborne elevator in Ontario, another grain elevator. So those are two which have some source of income.

The port of Churchill, Manitoba is one of the best examples of a very essential port, both from a regional and a national point of view. It operates only part of the year, due to its location, but should certainly have the right to be a real port corporation with local autonomy, under its own local board, even though we know that it will probably not always continue to be financially self-sufficient.

The port of Vancouver is also financially self-sufficient. It has not found that it has had very much power over the funds it has taken in. It has not been ale to reinvest the funds into the kinds of development that are very much needed to upgrade the port, and it has only been allowed up to $50,000 in expenditures, which is not even enough for the improvement of wharfs. However, that port does show a surplus and would be eligible under this legislation, I assume.

In the past Prince Rupert has not always shown a surplus, nor has it always been financially independent. There have been many new developments in Prince Rupert which will undoubtedly increase its income and make it a part of the major development in the northern part of British Columbia.

I wanted to name those 15 ports for the record to show that this legislation is really very unfair. Will ports which cannot become financially self-sufficient be able to qualify under this legislation? We have heard that these 15 ports may be candidates for local port corporations. Of course, we know that one of the reasons at this time which may make them eligible is that the accumulated debt of all 15 national ports was written off by the federal government in 1980. It was approved by order in council on January 15, 1981. This accumulated debt was $742 million. Approximately $500 million went toward principal and $242 million went toward interest.

That is why we are pleased to hear at this particular time that the ports of Canada are in very good condition. It was a very good move to write off outstanding debts so they could have a fresh start as autonomous ports. But what will happen, as shown by our past history? While all 15 ports made a profit last year because of this write-off, it should be pointed out that 10 of the 15 ports ran up deficits over the last two years. This is an indication that these ports will face financial difficulty in the next decade. They cannot be expected to be financially independent all the time. The only ports which did not run a deficit over the two years were Baie des Ha! Ha!, Trois Rivieres, Prescott elevator, Colborne elevator and Vancouver, not very many of the 15 ports. This does not even include the larger ports. Some ports may start off in the black. In a particularly bad year or bad economic era, they may end up with a deficit and require a subsidy from the federal government. Would they lose their status as local port corporations or not be judged reliable enough to get in in the first place?

We object to this policy because it is the user-pay policy. My colleague will speak to this later. The principle of user-pay, in other words financial self-sufficiency, means that ports should be able to finance their operations totally from collected fees and tariffs. This would include any capital expenditures that may be required. I am most familiar with the port of Vancouver. However, most ports require modernization and updating with modern equipment in order to be competitive with each other and the American ports. This will require capital expenditures. A port which must borrow in order to expand will have to pay market interest rates on loans. This could force a port to increase its charges to a level where it is no longer competitive, forcing an undue hardship on any shipper using the port.

The port of Churchill is a good example. How could that port be expected to make up any deficit of its operational cost over income by charging higher rates to users of that port? We must have a port in northern Canada, an outlet to our northern waters. The few users of that northern port should not be expected to bear the additional financial costs of its being in the Arctic region.

Our ports must remain competitive and continue to serve the national interest as well as the interest of our exporters and importers. In order to do this, they should be eligible for some form of federal assistance when it is required. This should be carried out under a strict business arrangement. We fully agree that the port must have efficient and competent management.

If the federal government is putting extra money into a port, perhaps there could be some form of federal supervision. However, that port should not lose all power. In fact, the goal of this bill, which is to make the ports more efficient, would be undermined if we removed the local administration of a port. They cannot be treated like a child and told that they have to come back to big daddy in Ottawa to be looked after, even though there are all kinds of bureaucratic roadblocks, it would cost more money and does not add to efficiency.

Clause 2(a) requires that ports be financially self-sufficient. If this is a required objective, ten of the 15 national ports may not qualify to become local port corporations. The same can hold true of our amendment which is on page 11 and combined in this amendment. It states that the Canada ports corporation can petition for local port corporation status for any port which in the opinion of the Canada Ports Corporation will likely be self-sufficient.

It is not likely over the long term that many ports will be self-sufficient. Does that mean those ports cannot become local port corporations? I am going to be very interested in hearing the Conservative members speak to this. Those members, particularly those from the Vancouver area, have been very quiet about the needs of the less affluent ports in Canada. Those of us from Vancouver fight hard for more financial autonomy for Vancouver. As Members of Parliament we must be equally concerned with a national transportation and marine strategy for ports in other parts of the country.

Smaller ports with limited revenues will not always be able to raise the amount they need to cover their costs through tariffs and fees. If they did that, they would likely lose business. They would have to charge too much. It would not be financially feasible from the customer's point of view. Those ports would find it hard to survive. We need efficient management based on sound regional considerations and a sound national policy for each local port. Efficient management should be the criterion for a port becoming more administratively autonomous.

Efficiency requires a centralized administration. This is best suited to the regional situation. The National Harbours Board has not worked effectively because most decisions were made in Ottawa. Who in Ottawa really knows the immediate needs of ports on our east and west coasts? Rather than central control, there should be local autonomy for the ports, even those not financially independent. However, the federal government should be very concerned about the efficient management of those ports once they become local port corporations.

We object to the term "financial self-sufficiency", which is a requirement for a port to become a local port corporation. This whole bill is supposedly aimed at greater autonomy. It is contradictory. Only four or five ports will be eligible to remain as local port corporations. Also, those ports that have more expenditures than income must not increase their fees and tariffs to the point that it is a user-pay philosophy that is unrealistic. Where the market can accept it, the users should pay. However, that is not the case with all ports in Canada.

That objective is not feasible for certain smaller ports in Canada. We believe the criterion for achieving local port autonomy should be demonstrated efficiency. A port which is essential to the regional and national economy should be eligible for local port corporation status, even if it cannot always be financially self-sufficient. It should not be forced to raise rates beyond what is financially feasible for the region.

I will be very interested to hear from the other parties. We did not have support or consensus in committee on this matter. In a country as large and diverse as Canada and in the context of a national ports policy, it is essential that we be very concerned about smaller ports which cannot always be financially self-sufficient.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon)—Mines and mining—(a) Request for assistance. (b) Labour relations; the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens)—Export Development Corporation—Funds lent to New York Metropolitan Transportation Authority; the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly)—The Constitution—Status of native women—(a) Attendance at constitutional conference. (b) Request that native women be represented.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-92, to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport, and Motions Nos. 2 and 4 (Mrs. Mitchell).

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I think the oration—if I can call it that—of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) demonstrates the complete poverty of ideas in the minds of New Democratic Party members. I have heard nothing more off the point or which indicated more lack of understanding of what the bill is all about than what I heard from the hon. member. I am utterly amazed.

At one point in her speech the hon. member made a statement to the effect that "By golly, these little harbours should be allowed to become local port corporations". The hon. member said that if they had to be financially viable, they could not become local port corporations. With the greatest of respect, I remind the hon. member that there is a Harbour Commissions Act, and if she is suggesting that the Fraser River people or the New Westminster people would like to be local port corporations, I think she should do a little more homework on the subject because, quite frankly, as harbour commissions they have more autonomy than local port corporations and would not want to change. If anything, they should be going the other way.

The hon. member for Vancouver East also referred to the port of Churchill. She says it is going to lose money but should keep operating nonetheless. She said that any harbour in Canada which is losing money should be kept in operation. Surely to goodness the Canadian taxpayer is burdened enough without having to pay taxes to support totally uneconomic operations. I would trust even this government to evaluate any port which is losing money as to how valuable it is to the region or area it serves, and as to what alternatives there are, and perhaps to decide that a port should cease operations if it is losing taxpayers' money when another port can handle the job better, more efficiently and at a profit.

The whole philosophy of members of the NDP that they want to make profitability at ports their fourth or fifth concern disturbs me. Is that not really part of the problem with this country today? Is it not that kind of philosophy which really is the problem with this government? We have a $20 billion deficit. When we study the cause of that deficit, we find that there is money wasted in a number of areas. If a port is not profitable, obviously it is being operated improperly. By that I mean it is trying to do too many things it cannot do because other ports are doing them.

I think this applies more to maritime ports than to west coast ports, but there is some rivalry between Nanaimo, Victoria, Prince Rupert, Vancouver, New Westminster and the Fraser ports. Each of them does what it can do best. Each uses its competitive advantage for whatever business it can attract. These ports do not lose money. However, if one of those small ports were to attempt to attract business which would lose money, according to what I have just heard from the hon. member for Vancouver East, that would be great and should be subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer. I am afraid I cannot accept that philosophy. I see no reason why the Saskatchewan wheat farmer or the Winnipeg shoe store clerk should be paying tax dollars to keep a port operating in a manner by which it does not even break even.

Mr. Fulton: Name the ones you would close, big shot.

Mr. Cook: I think the real answer is that this amendment must be defeated, because if there is anything a port should be doing, it should at least be trying to make a profit. It should try.

Mr. Fulton: You phony.

Mr. Cook: The port of Churchill on Hudson Bay, which is at the end of a long railway, has been a viable port since the thirties. A great deal of grain has been shipped through that port.

Mr. Fulton: Tell us Tory policy, not this malarkey.

Mr. Cook: Could we have a little quiet in the rump down there, Mr. Speaker? It is difficult—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby has the floor.

Mr. Siddon: Ask them to be civil.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect, I am sure the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) will concede the floor to his colleague.

Mr. Siddon: Yes, sir.

Mr. Cook: I want to say a couple of things about the port of Churchill in relation to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver East. If at this moment in time the port of Churchill cannot ship grain on an economic basis and if it cannot take the crops of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, or that portion of them which has always gone through Churchill, and ship them out at a cost which makes sense so that the port can operate at least at the break-even point, then we should close down the port of Churchill and let that grain go through the Great Lakes, where the bulk of it goes anyway. I do not believe the Canadian people are prepared to pay their tax dollars to keep something of that nature going if it has become a totally unviable enterprise. If we could only shut down a good many other government-operated enterprises which do not make profits, we might have—

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if my friend would entertain a question at this point. I think it is quite important.

Mr. Cook: Mr. Speaker, when I am finished I will entertain a question. It will always be then. When we are finished our comments, we will take questions.

I believe the hon. member's question relates to the port of Churchill. If that port is not viable as an enterprise, it should be shut down because I do not believe the taxpayers of all Canada should pay for it. That is straightforward.

Some of the ports in the maritimes compete with each other. Sometimes they do so quite successfully and at other times not so successfully. With the involvement of local port corporations and the Canada Ports Corporation, those ports surely can come to a meeting of minds in terms of doing what they do best and most profitably. This could be done without becoming engaged in hard-nosed competition between, for example, Saint John and Halifax. That would cause them both to lose money. If they compete and both of them make money, we should by all means let them compete; but to suggest that profitability should be about the fifth or six priority for a port in Canada indicates to me a socialist way of thinking whereby profit should never be considered, regardless of the cost to the public.

I will take the hon. member's question now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, my question is about the port of Churchill. If I heard the hon. member correctly, he said that if the port of Churchill cannot ship grain at a profit or break even, it should be closed down. The port of Churchill is a very important port to my part of the country because we ship grain through that port. I wonder if the hon. member was speaking on behalf of the Conservative Party. Is that the philosophy of his party, or it the opinion of the hon. member?

Mr. Cook: Mr. Speaker, the very obvious answer to that is that I am speaking for myself as a representative of all the taxpayers of Canada who would have to subsidize that port. Obviously, there are Conservatives in other parts of Canada who might feel differently about it, but that is a key factor about the Conservative Party: we at least are allowed to speak our minds as individuals with our own viewpoints.

Mr. Nystrom: I have a supplementary question, if I may, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon).

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be somewhat more gentle than my colleague. In looking at the two amendments proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs Mitchell), motions Nos. 2 and 4, I note that motion No. 2 would strike from page 3 of the bill the phrase "and that are expected to be financially self-sufficient" and subsequently that Motion No. 4 would delete the phrase on page 11 of the bill "the port will likely be financially self-sufficient".

Once again the NDP is getting into a great panic about something of little consequence. The wording in the bill does not say that a local port operating as a local port corporation "shall be self-sufficient". Neither on page 3 nor on page 11 does the bill say a local port "shall be". It does not say anywhere in the bill that local ports which run in the red "shall be closed down" or "shall be expected to earn profits or balance their books". It does not say that anywhere. All it says in the bill is that ports will likely be financially self-sufficient or that ports are expected to be financially self-sufficient.

The point is that we have to provide some goals for the local port corporations to pursue. I am sure that the minister and members of the government would agree with that. We are at a time in our history when we have almost $120 billion in gross public debt, $20 billion of additional debt this year and a $17 billion cash requirement which the government supplements by dipping into the pension fund of public service employees for the extra $2 or $3 billion. We are facing a horrendous situation where young people cannot afford mortgages for homes, where businesses are going bankrupt and our industries cannot compete internationally. We have been living too long in a dream world, believing that we could socialize, nationalize and subsidize everything that cannot operate by itself.

If we could restore a degree of local autonomy to the financial management and long-range planning of our ports, they would become more productive. There would be less interference by layers of bureaucracy in Ottawa and the layer that this legislation envisages. If the ports were given a higher degree of local autonomy, they could get on with making decisions, making long-range plans, making investments without being delayed by a lot of the factors that are initiated supposedly in the national interest, but which in fact pull the country down. If our ports were in a more healthy state of competition one with the other, the would produce more volume and more tax revenue to be shared by all Canadians. I think it is high time we recognized that.

The situation is rather like that of a class of 20 students where, instead of the incentive system operating where they would be urged to generate grades in proportion to their ability and effort, at the end of the year the marks of the individual students would be combined and then averaged. Each student would obtain the same average mark, so the achiever who would otherwise have obtained a 85 or 90 per cent grade would receive 64.5 per cent and the sluggard who would have received 48 or 28 per cent, would also get 64.5 per cent. Pretty soon there would be a demoralized class of low achievers or non-achievers.

That is what we are producing in this country. By distributing the benefits, so-called, of effort equally among all, we destroy the basic incentive system that allows our society to prosper and grow.

I submit that if you followed the students in that class of 20 for two or three years, you would find that the average would slip from 64 per cent to 54 per cent to 48 per cent. Pretty soon it would be a failing class and would require a subsidy. Teachers who find that the class average is lower than 50 per cent—I have been a teacher and I know—would say that the incentive system had been destroyed so the marks should be augmented and all pushed above 50 per cent.

That is an exact analogy to the kind of subsidies our colleagues on the left are forever advocating and which destroy the spirit of this country, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) is one of the worst offenders. In committee he showed righteous indignation, wailing and raving that if we asked the ports to be self-sufficient, that was an evil thing. He well knows that our young people cannot find jobs or afford homes today because we are borrowing too heavily. He knows that the CBC is subsidized to the tune of $650 million per year, that Air Canada got a $500 to $600 million transfusion three years ago and now Claude Taylor says they will need another one within a year. The CNR has come back to committee looking for another major subsidy and Petro-Canada is continually dipping into the Canadian taxpayer's pocket to subsidize the so-called initiative that was designed to pursue the national objectives of equity and fairness.

In fact, what we are doing is what the teacher would do to that class of achievers, and that is destroying the desire to achieve. Sooner or later it will be a class of failing students which will have to be subsidized by jacking the marks up so that they can obtain a passable grade. The achiever would be dispirited, and the sluggard would ask why bother as they will pass anyway.

That is exactly the situation in this country today. We are destroying the basic competitive, incentive system. I submit that the present wording of the bill before us incorporates that competitive opportunity for individual ports by encouraging them to operate on a self-sufficient basis. We are not heartless or cold and ruthless in this party. There is no one here who would say we are not in favour of helping where such help would be of benefit to the national interest. But we have seen too much of the slovenly, wasteful extravagance of an ever-diminishing pool of revenue which is only the measure of the over-all effort of individuals operating in a free society. That must be brought to a halt.

I commend the minister for including these clauses in the bill and I am totally against the suggestion that we should put all our national ports on the welfare rolls, as we have put so many Canadians on the welfare rolls.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to reply to the hon. member except to suggest that if he wants a first rate example of vacuous remarks he should read his own speech tomorrow.

The hon. gentleman and the member who preceded him have not looked at the realities of operating transportation facilities in this country. In the history of the country they have never been self-sufficient nor will they become self-sufficient in the long term.

My colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) mentioned the write-offs of debts. Back in 1936, $173 million was written off for local port authorities.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That was a great year.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, the Tories had just finished being in power. In 1977-78 they wrote off another $252 million which was put into equity ownership by the Government of Canada, and a further $475 million was converted to an interest-free loan. Halifax had $54 million written off, Saint John $66 million, Chicoutimi $8.4 million, Quebec $104 million, Three Rivers $4 million—all those were total write-offs, transferred to equity. Interest free loans totalled $475 million, $100 million of which is owed by the port of Vancouver. I do not think any government that was in power would ever call in those debts; if it did, the port of Vancouver would go belly up the next month.

Like other transportation sectors, ports are capital intensive sectors of the economy; they require massive amounts of capital. To follow the user-pay principle to its logical conclusion, you would need cost recovery just to break even. I suspect what would happen is what happened before—the smaller ports would go broke and the bigger ports would run into rate wars with ports in the United States. Then they would be the first to run to the federal government asking to be bailed out, as has happened repeatedly over the decades.

A port, like a street, a sidewalk, a sewer and water system or highway, is a facility that everyone has to use, directly or indirectly; it is a public utility. If user-pay were followed to its logical conclusion, toll booths would be put up every four or five blocks and pedestrians would be charged two bits for walking on the sidewalk. Pedestrians do not pay anything toward the cement; the people who own the property on the street pay taxes. Followed to its logical conclusion you see how ridiculous it is. You can go back to the feudal ages of toll roads where the kings and dukes and the lords charged the peasants to walk, ride a horse or haul their produce down a road which belonged to the king or the lord.

These kings, dukes and lords over here see things like they did in the middle ages: if the port of Churchill cannot break even or make a profit, close it down. I hope the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) is invited to speak to the Churchill chamber of commerce, because I would like him to tell that to them. We will not have to bother, although we are going to tell them anyway.

In a country, Mr. Speaker, of three million square miles and only 25 million people, these birds over here want to compete in a champagne league with a beer operation. There is no way that individual ports, totally autonomous and on their own, can compete with the ports of our neighbour to the south. If you think the U.S. government is going to hold still for any kind of rate cutting or anything like that in Vancouver, you are dreaming in technicolour. If the government thinks that ports on the eastern seaboard of the United States are going to hold still while Halifax, St. John's and Montreal are siphoning off business from them, again it is dreaming. Part of co-operative federalism is that we share in a reasonable and equitable way the cost of providing services which all of us depend on directly and indirectly. That is more true of transportation than almost any other sector of our economy.

For those reasons, running our ports with a so-called businesslike user-pay policy will not succeed. I hope I turn out to be wrong, but I never thought I would live to see the day when Tories would support the user-pay policy of Otto Lang. I did not think the present minister would subscribe to it but he obviously is.

In converting all these debts, Mr. Speaker, we are now hopefully starting off most, if not all, of these ports with a clean slate. There are still some things wrong, and I sympathize a bit with the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), a port which I do not think was treated fairly in the debt rearrangement. That port has to pay interest on 86 per cent of its long-term debt structure compared to 4 per cent for Montreal and zero for Quebec and Vancouver. I hope the hon. member will talk to his friends in North Vancouver-Burnaby about that one.

Let us consider, Mr. Speaker, the unfortunate remarks of the hon. member about Churchill. It is funny that countries with less resources than we have, financial or economic, are able to operate Arctic ports for six to nine months of the year. I am thinking of Norway, Sweden, Finland and Russia, and even some of the ports in the northern islands of Japan. Churchill should be able to operate six or seven months of the year and then it might become a break-even operation. It might even make a buck the odd year. That requires a large capital investment, but the benefits of that investment mean lower grain and potash shipping costs and higher exports through that port will repay the investment. The question is, should that cost be paid only by our export customers? Because if it is, they are not going to buy from us. When the cost of transportation goes up for those kinds of products, you cannot pass it on to your customers. We found that out from bitter experience in the grain trade. But out of the port of Churchill the shipping rates are lower. We get hit in the head sometimes on marine insurance rates, but that port could be and should be at least a six or seven-month-a-year operation.

Just because we buried the old debts, Mr. Speaker, and thereby gave the federal government that much equity in the ports does not mean we can apply user-pay in the future, because ports are so capital intensive. They will be required to be competitive with U.S. ports. Our ports earned only a 2.5 per cent return in 1980, and it is perfectly obvious they will not be able to raise enough capital in the future or they will lose money trying to pay the interest even if interest rates go down. Therefore the requirement in the bill that port corporations be totally self-sufficient is completely unrealistic. It has never worked before and it will not work in the future.

I would like someone to give me a list of ports around the world which are self-sufficient and have had no public investment or government subsidies. I do not care whether it is New York City, Seattle, San Francisco, New Orleans, Galveston or wherever, they have all been heavily subsidized, and you cannot expect one port in Canada to compete with the treasury of the United States or any other country. It will not work and it never has. As I said before, I hope I turn out to be wrong.

This bill is some kind of a compromise. I appreciate that it is an attempt by the government to come up somewhere between complete local autonomy and total government control of the operation. That is what the government is endeavouring to do. Typical of a Liberal government, because Liberals call themselves middle of the road, but that is where all the accidents happen. I do not think it is going to work, and I predict it will not work.

If I am lucky enough to be honoured by my voters to be here four or five years down the road, I predict that whoever is in government will be coming to Parliament with some refinancing or interest-free loans for a number of ports in this country. It is inevitable. If my hon. friend from North Vancouver-Burnaby and my hon. friend from Richmond-South Delta think that Vancouver can, forever and a day, operate on its own, again they are dreaming in technicolour. In fact, if they are so good I presume the new local port authority for Vancouver will want to pay back the $100 million that it owes to the government. I presume they will rush forward with a cheque the next day.

Without public input on behalf of all the people of Canada, Mr. Speaker, the ports I have listed could never have survived let alone grow. That is the reality of transportation in this country, the reality of ports. I suppose I have to give the minister credit; it is an honest attempt to arrive at something in between what was done earlier and what is done now. I wish him well. I hope it succeeds, but I predict it will not.

Mr. Pepin: You are a pessimist.

Mr. Benjamin: The bill does provide for something I presume the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby does not agree with. It provides an opportunity for cross-subsidization within the ports system. This was not possible under the existing National Harbours Board Act which requires special parliamentary approval for each individual port. The Canada Ports Corporation has access to surpluses of profitable ports with which to finance or assist in financing unprofitable ones.

• (1710)

In spite of what the two hon. gentlemen from Vancouver have said I do not think that the people in Vancouver or anyone connected with the Vancouver port want to run the port of Prince Rupert into the ground. In spite of the actions of Liberal governments, I think the people in Montreal really do not want to starve and bankrupt the ports of Churchill, Saint John or Halifax. The nation as a whole has to share in the costs of operating efficient and well run ports with local authorities and with the total national backing in the interests of a whole nation. This must not be done in the interests of some local board of trade or in the interests of one shipper or user, but in the interests of the nation as a whole.

From the list of ports I have in front of me I cannot see any of them that are not in the national interest, whether it is Belledune, Sept-Îles, Prescott, Colbourne, Prince Rupert or Roberts Bank. They are all in the national interest. They all play an important role in the commerce of this nation. But none of them, and I include Vancouver and Montreal, can operate entirely on its own and say to hell with the rest of the country.

In the name of some kind of co-operative federalism—a name that used to be popular some years ago and should be revived—whether it is between governments, whether it is among ports or any other sectors of our economy, I have had enough of this. "Beggar thy neighbour; as long as we are doing all right, to hell with the other guy" is the kind of philosophy we have been getting from these gentlemen to my right and south of the 49th parallel.

User-pay cannot work. In a nation of three million square miles with only 24 million people and dozens of ports, it cannot work. To suggest that the people in a community of one or more different ports, whether it be Churchill or any other are to be told, presumably by a Conservative government, that their port is not making the bucks or breaking even and now they have to get up and walk away from it, throwing the taxpayer's investment out of the window as well as their own, is just not right. It is like a previous minister of transport and the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) abandoning branch lines and telling the farmers who own all the grain elevators that they are supposed to get up and walk away from their investment. User-pay does not work and it will not work.

Mr. Cook: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Out of courtesey to the hon. member I did not want to interrupt his tirade at the time, but at least five times he got the name of my riding incorrectly. I would not want any other member in the immediate area to be confused with the hon. member to whom he was directing his tirade. The correct name of my riding is North Vancouver-Burnaby. If I can bootleg, I would be delighted to go to Churchill to speak to the chamber of commerce or the board of trade.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has already been recognized. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the people in the galleries that they have just witnessed a debate by the Conservatives and by the New Democratic Party. I would now like to demonstrate a typical Liberal solution to this impasse.

I think what the hon. member from the New Democratic Party wants to achieve by her amendment is already in the bill. The purpose of the whole bill is to give a greater degree of autonomy to the National Harbours Board system. The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) identified himself as a teacher. I do not know if I should be following him because my experience has been that of a school principal. However, he made very good arguments and he must have been an excellent teacher in his time. In my view, though, he was a little harsh in his interpretation of the bill.

I think he was correct when he said the hon. member proposes to remove in two places "expected to be financially self-sufficient". Specifically her amendment would remove these words from Clause 2, subclause 2(a). The bill clearly states that the local port corporations are only expected—I underline the word expected, not required—to be self-sufficient. There is this room for flexibility.

The bill contains numerous provisions for assistance, if needed. For example, the Canadian Ports Corporation may transfer money to the local port corporation. The Canadian Ports Corporation may loan money to the local port corporation, an excellent amendment which the committee brought into this bill. The local port corporation may borrow from the government or from outside if this local port corporation after maturing receives Schedule D status. The government may make grants to the local port corporation.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) in her speech asked whether the ports that cannot become financially self-sufficient will be eligible to qualify for local ports status. The answer clearly is yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member listed ten ports which may not qualify for the status, but that is not true; they all qualify. Maybe not immediately, but they all qualify when the people in the local community, the businessmen, the residents, the municipalities and the users demonstrate a genuine interest, a will, a commitment, and maybe some prognosis that eventually the port will become self-sufficient. There may be a need beyond the capacity to pay now, but the projection would have to show that the port could become self-sufficient. However, achieving local port corporation status is already in the bill. I think if the hon. member studies the bill carefully she may even want to withdraw her amendment.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): I am not sure whether you are Mr. Chairman or Mr. Speaker, but whatever you are I am obedient to your wishes. I see that you are Mr. Speaker. I wish to speak for just a couple of moments on the question of whether a port is self-supporting. I have no argument with my colleagues from Vancouver, British Columbia, as to the necessity, if at all possible, of having a port operate to make money, break even or whatever. But when we take a look at what ports are making money, breaking even, doing well or doing less well, then I would like to ensure that they are all being looked at on the same basis.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if the port of St. John's, Newfoundland had the same advantages given to it, the same kind of financial assistance and benefits that are given to the port of Quebec City, the port of Montreal, the port of Halifax or the port of Saint John, New Brunswick—I am not too familiar with the Port of Vancouver—then the port of St. John's, Newfoundland, would be making as much money as those ports, breaking even or whatever.

I am supportive of this bill on the understanding that ports such as St. John's, Newfoundland, which the accountants tell us are not making money, are not breaking even and have to be subsidized, will be treated fairly and put in a position where they can run their own affairs after being put on an equal basis with the other ports of Canada. At the present time, the port of St. John's, Newfoundland, has not been put in that position. I can give, although I do not want to bore the House or delay the bill, a dozen instances where the port of St. John's, Newfoundland, has not been treated in a manner comparable to other places.

I remember looking at a press release issued by one of the government departments which told us that three or four cabinet ministers had been down to Quebec City and that tens of millions of dollars were going to be spent on the port of Quebec City restoring the old dockside, old sheds, or old warehouses. In other words, doing wonderful things for the historic trust kind of thing in the city of Québec. I say that that is great and that I am all for it. I am glad this is being done for Quebec City, but I have not seen any cabinet ministers crawling around the port of St. John's, Newfoundland lashing out the tens of millions to restore the historic sites.

As a matter of fact, next year in St. John's we are having the four hundredth anniversary of the taking of possession of Newfoundland by Sir Humphrey Gilbert on behalf of the British Crown in 1583. It will be 400 years ago next year that the British empire had its commencement in the port of St. John's, Newfoundland. The war memorial is on Duckworth Street facing the harbour. A plan has been developed and there was a competition award. The plan which was approved was done by a young landscape architect from Newfoundland who was just back from university a year or two ago. This young chap, Fred Hann, has done a first-class job. He won this award for the celebrations next year, and now we have to spend certain moneys to develop a proper park, Sir Humphrey Gilbert Park, where Sir Humphrey originally took possession of Newfoundland and began the process which led to the British empire.

It is very hard for the committee to come by any funds. It is awaiting funds from the federal government. We are not talking about millions. We are talking about some hundreds of thousands; certainly not the tens of millions which were lashed into Quebec City. I am all for lashing it into Quebec City as long as it is lashed elsewhere. The committee is waiting to hear from the provincial government as well. The whole cost of the project—and I am going from memory now—is not much above $1 million or $1.5 million to put a proper park and memorial right on the St. John's waterfront in front of the war memorial.

We do not see any great enthusiasm from the government opposite. Perhaps it is because there are two Conservative members representing the city of St. John's, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and myself. We are going to be here for donkeys' years yet. They would not move us with a crowbar. It does not matter whether they starve the city of St. John's and refuse to spend money. Those people will send us back, and if we do not run they will send other Conservatives back. They will add another five in the next election anyway. Newfoundland will return 100 per cent Tories when the next election comes.

Newfoundland cannot wait to get after those four who flew in the other day, the four messengers who went down there to try to get the public to accept the budget. They went to the Holiday Inn and spent $4,700. They wasted Liberal Party funds because the 250 people who were there came out shocked and dumbfounded by such a waste of funds by anybody practising restraint. Their glazed salmon and their glazed ministers had to be flown back to Ottawa half-baked, not only glazed, for a vote on Friday afternoon. They were not even there past 1.45 p.m.

I am getting diverted, but my point is that I have some sympathy for the amendment which has been suggested by the New Democratic Party. On listening to my own colleagues here, of course, they are a great deal sounder and have a hell of a lot more on the ball than NDP speakers. On listening to the parliamentary assistant, I am prepared to accept the assurance that the ports which are not now supposedly making money will be treated fairly and allowed to operate with a great deal of local independence.

The minister is not all that bad a fellow. He does not listen to most of what I tell him. He ignores my correspondence. It takes him months to get back to me. He does not do what I think he should be doing. But over-all he has a huge department with lots of problems. I ask him to keep an eye on ports like St. John's. They have been discriminated against in the past. I want him to know all the details of my synchrolift. My pet peeve is my synchrolift, which was bludgeoned to death by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) who will be bludgeoned himself in Windsor, I hope, when the next election comes.

Anyway, this being summertime and in the spirit of friendship, I do not want to be partisan today. I just want to make sure that the ports that do not have $100 million of debt—and my hon. friend told me that the Vancouver port had $100 million put aside—will be put on the same basis. Let St. John's owe $100 million and put it aside; put them all on the same basis.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 2 (Mrs. Mitchell). I remind the House that the earlier ruling of the Speaker was that a vote upon motion No. 2 would also dispose of motion No. 4.

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Benjamin: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 2 (Mrs. Mitchell) negatived.

Motion No. 4 (Mrs. Mitchell) negatived.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-92, an act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 8 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"not exceeding seven years."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief on this one. I started out in committee fighting for four years because the government had included ten years in the bill. Unfortunately we could not get it down to four years, but I believe the government may be inclined to look upon seven years with some favour as a compromise between the ten years and the four years I would have much preferred.

The purpose of my amendment is that nothing concentrates an executive mind more than the thought of his contract running out and perhaps being replaced, if he has not done a job. I found ten years offensive for the simple reason that it is far too long a time. It is almost a sinecure for somebody to sit in a job for ten years. In addition, I have found that the best business brains or the best executives in North America normally suffer from what is known as the five-year syndrome. If they have worked five years in a particular job, they have normally accomplished everything good that they are going to accomplish, and after that period of time they are on the downhill slant.

I think seven years is too long, but I propose my amendment and hope that it will be agreeable, simply again in order that whoever is heading up the ports corporation can at least be gotten rid of in seven years rather than in ten years if they are not effective.

I might also add that there is nothing in the amendment which means a first-rate man could not be reappointed for an additional seven years.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have just a very brief comment in support of the amendment put forward by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook). If we read the wording of the bill with respect to the appointment of the chairman of the board of the Canada Ports Corporation, we find that that appointment shall be at the pleasure of the governor in council. Earlier in committee there was some discussion as to what the term "at pleasure" would be interpreted to mean. Our understanding now is that that means a new cabinet could make a change in the person appointed to that position if valid cause were found.

The only problem which was raised in committee was that in most cases a subsidiary contract is entered into between the government or the governor in council and the particular individual selected to manage the corporation, and that that contract could bind the government to keeping that person for the full seven-year term, even if political circumstances, health factors or matters bearing on the competence of that person suggest that he should be removed.

I recommend very strongly to the minister and to the House that the practice of entering into subsidiary contracts makes it possible, albeit undesirable in some cases, for an incompetent administrator to remain in place by pointing to the letter of the law as spelled out in the contract or, conversely, expecting a major severance allowance if the governor in council in its wisdom decides that the person should be removed,

I suggest that the government look carefully at some of the major costs to the taxpayers of Canada which have accrued in the past where it has attempted to remove for one reason or another senior people who have been the beneficiaries of subsidiary contracts. By shortening the term of the appointment to seven years as my hon. colleague is recommending, I think we can help to diminish the adverse aspects of prolonged appointments, but we do not eliminate the problems created by these subsidiary contracts.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I will not speak at any length on this motion. We do not disagree with it. Certainly a seven-year term seems appropriate. I do not entirely disagree with a ten-year term provided that there would be a way for making a reappointment. Certainly the operation of a huge system such as our national ports in Canada requires a good deal of experience.

However, my intention in rising was to point out some of the events which took place in this process. I believe it is rather interesting to note that the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) was adamant in committee about this bill, and if you read his speech which he gave in the House you will find he said that he thought that this was the worst bill which could possibly have been presented. Suddenly, from behind the scenes, we have the Liberals and the Conservatives getting into these little backroom deals. We see a little compromise, which was drafted up by the government, shown to the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby, who is a dear friend of the government, and then presented to the House. I just wanted to point out that all is not as it seems. There are a few bedfellows around here who might be crossing the floor.

I must also mention the fact, which is very typical of some hon. members and particularly true of the hon. member who spoke before the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby, that whenever there is a senior position being discussed it is always referred to as "he". The hon. member repeated this throughout our committee experience. Whenever he referred to any of the senior positions in this ports system, it was always "he". Of course, I challenged him several times and said that we needed an affirmative action program in the ports system and a cleansing of the attitude of certain members in the House.

I would also mention that this approach is reinforced in the language of this bill. I know that we cannot deal with that matter today, but we must deal with it at some point because when the language of all these bills is always drafted so that reference is always made to the masculine gender, it reinforces these prejudices and sexist attitudes which assume that a male will always be appointed to these positions. That is all I have to say on this amendment.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is an amusing little debate. I do not think it is earth-shattering but nevertheless it is interesting.

The hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) mentioned the expenditures which the government must incur when it wants to remove a person, male or female, appointed for a ten-year period. That was the point he was concerned about. This could very well happen. It could happen, indeed, that someone does not perform as he was expected to.

Mr. Siddon: Or she.

Mr. Pepin: He or she was expected to. Thank you.

One could also look at it from the other point of view, with respect to the expenditures a government would have to make in order to appoint a person to a senior office which involved only a short period, such as four or five years in this instance. People who accept those jobs do so at the best time of their lives, generally speaking, and if the job does not give them security for a fairly long period of time the government would have to pay them much more than if it were appointing them for a longer period. This is why a compromise was reached "in the backroom", as the NDP implies, because we thought that a ten-year period might be too long and, hopefully, the opposition realized that four or five years might be too short a time. This is how we arrived at seven years. The reason the government accepted seven years was that, interestingly enough, the most recent trend is toward a seven-year tenure as opposed to a ten-year one. There are two or three recent instances where the government has appointed a chairman and presidents for seven years as opposed to the traditional period.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Cook) agreed to.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-92, An act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be amended in Clause 13 by striking out lines 13 to 25 at page 22 and substituting the following therefor:

"34.(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), the revenues of a local port corporation may, after providing for

(a) the cost of collecting such revenues,

(b) the expenses, incurred by the local port corporation in operating and maintaining the port and works and property owned, controlled, administered or managed by the local port corporation under this act,

(c) the principal, interest and other charges incurred in connection with debentures issued or money borrowed by the local port corporation under this act,

(d) any other expenses lawfully incurred by the local port corporation in carrying out its duties and functions under this act; and

(e) such amounts as may be approved by the minister for capital projects be retained by the local port corporation.

(2) The Corporation may borrow, for a period agreed upon by it and a local port corporation, so much of the money administered by the local port corporation as the local port corporation and the corporation, taking into account the capital expenditure program of the local port corporation, consider to be in excess of the amount required for the purposes of the local port corporation.

(3) The Corporation shall, if the Minis-".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: According to the interpretation given by the Speaker earlier this day, motion No. 6 is also to be presented for debate at this time, but the two motions will be voted on separately.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-92, An act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be amended in Clause 13 by striking out lines 45 to 50 at page 22 and lines 1 to 3 at page 23.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Did you say, perhaps inadvertently, that motion No. 6 was also moved by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook), seconded by "Mr. Siddon"?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: According to the documents in my hand, I have read correctly. However, the intention is that Mr. Siddon should move, seconded by Mr. Cook. Is that right?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, that would conform with the Order Paper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The necessary corrections will be made on the record.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I still find the Canada ports bill disastrous. It is a terrible bill which gives the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) absolute and total control of the ports. However, through this amendment, if we can possibly pass it, there will at least be one small shred of local autonomy. I repeat that there will be one minute piece of local autonomy. The key portion, which is in this amendment but which was not in the act, states that a local port corporation will determine its own surplus as a result of this amendment. In the act previous to this amendment everything was determined by either the Canada ports corporation, the senior body or the minister.

It is terribly offensive when there is that kind of absolute power residing in Ottawa and in the hands of the minister. Despite all the government's assurances as to how it will give local autonomy to all the ports, where is it written? It is not written in the act, except in this amendment. At least we cut of the Canada Ports Corporation at the pass. It cannot declare a surplus for a local port corporation by itself. It must have the agreement of the local port corporation for it to be declared a surplus. That is exceedingly important, certainly to the port of Vancouver, and I suspect to many of the other ports. It does give them that little bit more control over their own money which was not in the legislation before this amendment. I wish it could have gone much further.

I still find it offensive that the minister can do any ruddy thing he wants to in terms of a local port corporation or the Canada Ports Corporation. I find it offensive that the minister has the total and absolute authority for all appointments to the boards. It would have been far better had it been set up in such a way that there was local input into these appointments, where the minister had to listen and had to select from people chosen from the local areas. But, no, there is none of that in this bill, either. If one looks at the powers of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) under this Canada ports bill, one will find that he actually has all the local ports corporations and the Canada Ports Corporation under his heel, to do with as he pleases. That is terribly unfortunate for a couple of reasons. One is that if there is a cabinet shuffle this summer, which I would suggest is a possibility, then we will no longer have this Minister of Transport. He will go on to his reward, or to a greater function.

Mr. Pepin: What could that be?

Mr. Cook: That means that when a new minister of transport decides to do something, we will not be able to question him and say, "But you said—" because all that becomes irrelevant because if he is no longer the minister of transport, the new minister of transport will not have to pay attention to any of his great policies.

Mr. Pepin: To please you, I am willing to stay around.

Mr. Cook: I might also add that I now find the marine administrator is switching over as soon as he can get rid of this bill. He will leave as well, and will look after airlines and airports rather than being the marine administrator. So, all the promises and statements that he made will no longer be relevant to this legislation.

I am very suspicious as to what is taking place. The men who make the promises, who have done all the lobbying across the country and who have made such grandiose statements about all the local autonomy which is not written in the bill, will no longer be there if the legislation is passed and comes into force. However, if this amendment is accepted, it will mean one small bit of local autonomy for the ports of this nation in terms of a local port corporation determining whether or not it has a surplus. The Canada Ports Corporation will not be able to say it is a surplus, if this amendment passes, and rip it away from the local port corporation. The two corporations will have to agree that there is a surplus. That, mind you, is still only half the war, because the minister will still have the power, as a minister, to declare some of the funds to the local port corporation as surplus and take them. But that would be a much more dangerous political act than it would have been had the Canada Ports Corporation been empowered simply to decide that the money was surplus.

With this amendment, I have at least attempted to gain that small bit of autonomy for the various local ports corporations across the country, and I sincerely hope they appreciate it.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that I do not believe my hon. friend, the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook), meant to be quite as hard on the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) as he perhaps was, because I know how anxious he is to see this particular amendment adopted. We hope that the government, having given full regard to the deliberations in committee, and the strong concerns that several members of the opposition have brought to committee on this particular issue, will have the wisdom to see that this amendment is desirable and positive and should be supported by the government.

There was much emphasis in committee on subclauses 34 and 36 of Clause 13, those subclauses being amendments to the National Harbours Board Act 1936. There were some rather wild statements, notably coming from my colleagues to the left, that all that the Conservative members from Vancouver wanted was to prop up the port of Vancouver and strip away the revenues and profits from all the neighbouring ports which, in fact, was a total mistruth. We are as concerned as anyone about seeing that the ports of Canada are placed on an economically sound basis and that they succeed and prosper individually and collectively, so that in total their surplus revenues can be contributed to a central fund and redisbursed at a fair market rate on the approval of the local port corporation, redisbursed to help with the development of other ports where additional revenues are needed for their capital purposes.

In speaking to the amendment of the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby, which appears as motion No. 5 on the Order Paper, I should just like to point out that there is considerable difference in the wording of this amendment. Even though, perhaps, some might argue that the mechanics are not all that different, the wording is such as to eliminate what I consider to be a red flag waved at people in areas such as we come from, where there is far too much of this government holding the line and totally disregarding the views of opposition members, whether they be NDP or Conservative. The people we represent resent this terribly, and if Liberal members opposite really want to understand why it is that western Canadians have virtually totally rejected them in recent years, let me tell them that it is because of this notion that no good ideas could ever come from opposition members, from western Canada, from Atlantic Canada or from north of 60d. In fact, we come to the Parliament and to committee to express legitimate views on behalf of those who sent us here. A legitimate view we have expressed with regard to this particular clause is that, given the present wording, it says that the corporation may, with the approval of the minister, require a local port corporation to make a loan. That wording is essentially a red flag, an aggravation to the persons charged with managing the port of Vancouver and doing business with that port and the general populace who benefits by the very welcome presence of that port, as do their counterpart citizens in other parts of the country.

The hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby suggested that the mandatory nature of Subclause 13(34) be somewhat restrained—in fact, removed—whereby the local port corporation would have the final say as to what should or should not be deemed surplus to its requirements. The amendment provides that the revenues of a local port corporation, after meeting local expenses, interest payments and any other expenses, may be retained by the local port corporation. That is in direct contrast to the wording of subclause 34(1), as written, and I am suggesting that if the government really wants the people of the Vancouver area in British Columbia to feel a little better disposed toward it, this would be the kind of amendment which would certainly go a long way toward helping and resolving some of these deep regional differences. We will be prepared to give the government credit where credit is due, if it is prepared to accept the amendment.

To backtrack slightly, I should say that I, too, am philosophically opposed to the creation of more Crown corporations, particularly a double-layered system where there is a parent corporation and a limitless number of subsidiary Crown corporations, as this bill provides, for a number of reasons which will be brought forward in third reading debate. But, to put it in a nutshell, I think we have Crown corporationitis in this country. We have a number of Crown corporations now growing toward 500. There is a definite lack of accountability in many cases. There are no clear-cut terms of reference as to which ones shall have a public interest mandate and be subsidized and which ones shall be expected to operate on a pay-as-you-go basis. There have been all kinds of scandals involving Crown corporations and refuge to the arm's length provision which allows a minister to deny Parliament the kind of detailed scrutiny that it requires of Crown corporations.

In general I find this bill unacceptable, feeling that it can solve all of the problems of the various port authorities by creating, as it tried to do with the Canada Post Corporation, yet another series or family of Crown corporations to facilitate our national harbours. The ports I know best are Vancouver, Roberts Bank and Prince Rupert. I am told by the local officials that the major objective of bringing forward this legislation at this time is to increase the spending limit to allow officials at the local level to make purchases in response to bids received in the tendering process and to increase the ceiling from $50,000 per item to as much as $10 million. That would go a long way toward facilitating some of the management and long-range planning problems of our local ports.

To be fair, this bill provides for a maximum $10 million spending limit where there are competitive Canadian bids for any single item purchased through the Canada Ports Corporation. That is a step in the right direction. It provides that local ports shall have some proportion of that $10 million spending accorded to them on an individual basis.

We have not had confirmed what the actual ceiling will be. Perhaps in his concluding remarks the minister might indicate what, for example in the case of the ports of Vancouver or St. John's, the actual ceiling spending limit will be at this time according to the guidelines and the criteria which the governor in council is presently preparing.

Second, we were told by officials at the port of Vancouver that they wanted to be able to award leases to tenants on National Harbours Board property. Under the provisions of the present act, they had to have those decisions vetted and finally authorized in Ottawa by the minister, in some cases in consultation with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). That created a lot of delays. It held up the ports in maintaining the momentum they needed to remain competitive with their United States counterparts on the west coast of North America and, I am sure, equally on the east coast.

I want to say in that regard that those measures alone could have been accommodated by a straightforward amendment to the National Harbours Act 1936. I am sure members of this House would have facilitated the passage of such simple amendments very quickly.

If that were the only objective of this legislation, there would have been no difficulty with members of this party in ensuring that those spending ceilings and the decision-making authority with respect to leases was properly and fully delegated to the local level of port management. In fact, the wording in subclauses 34 and 36 of Clause 13 in the printed version of the bill suggests a consolidation of power and financial control in Ottawa.

The purpose of the amendment put forward by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby and the separate amendment I put forward as motion No. 6, which would delete entirely subclause 36 is to make it clear that there will in fact be the high degree of local autonomy accorded to the local port corporations, which we heard so much about in committee from the minister and the officials. If it is their intention to accord this degree of financial sovereignty to the local ports, I urge the government to consider seriously the amendments before them.

At second reading debate, the Minister of Transport confirmed to me, as recorded at page 18825 of Hansard, that the surplus funding which is earned at a particular port, the port of Vancouver in that case, will be available on a first-call basis for the development of the port. That was the wording I used. The minister rose in his place and said it will. I repeated the request for confirmation, and the minister said, "Sure".

We had some fun in committee trying to get the minister's officials to agree that he had in fact committed the government to providing surplus funds to the local ports which earns them a first-call basis, within the framework of the central banking function of the nation, and the notion that in the national interest there may be certain cases where loans should be legitimately extended to other ports through the Canada Ports Corporation.

The amendment put forward by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby provides the final out to the governor in council that subclause 3, which ensures that if a port is really and truly selfish and decides it is going to prevent the government from drawing that surplus for other purposes, the minister and the governor in council can intervene and ensure that that does not happen. I think the objectives of the government have been accomplished and the concerns we expressed in committee have been satisfied.

Although it is rare to compliment members of the House, it is a fact that the views of the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby are consistent with the requests of many groups in the Vancouver region, in particular the principals of Vancouver Wharves Limited who have written in support of his initiatives to ensure a higher degree of local autonomy and to fight for these amendments to subclauses 34 and 36.

A subsequent telegram was received from the North Vancouver Chamber of Commerce. It states that it is in support of increased autonomy for the port of Vancouver. In the past it had supported Bill C-92, believing it to be a step in the right direction. However, they stated a number of serious reservations and urged the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby to continue to push forcefully for the amendments which culminate in the amendment he has put forward today as motion No. 5.

I know there is a desire to make an announcement momentarily. I would just like to say in conclusion that the most important request of the city of Vancouver has been for an amendment deleting subclause 36, which is provided for in my motion No. 6. That will take away another red flag where the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the governor in council might be able to threaten expropriation of surplus funds. I urge upon the minister and the government that these two amendments put forward as motions Nos. 5 and 6 be adopted.

DISPOSITION OF BILL C-109

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the House leaders of both opposition parties. It seems there is unanimous consent to the following motion that is related to Bill C-109. Of course, we take for granted that Bill C-92 will be completed tonight after third reading. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) and the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

• (1800)

That the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be empowered to consider urea formaldehyde foam insulation including:

1. The process used to approve the material for use in Canadian homes;

2. The questions raised on the health effects and the nature of the research being conducted or contemplated on these questions;

3. The questions raised on remedial action and the nature of the research being conducted or considered;

4. The question of the number of homes affected, specifically attempting to identify the reasons for the discrepancy between the number of homes estimated and the number registered;

5. The question of use of the foam in schools, public buildings and rental accommodation and recommendations of possible courses of action where remedial action is required;

6. The identification of home owner groups with special needs and recommendations on how these special needs could be met;

7. The report of the Hazardous Products Board of Review on the aforementioned matters;

8. Any changes or additions to the regulations deemed advisable with regard to the aforementioned matters.

That the committee be instructed to report on the aforementioned matters no later than December 1, 1982; and

That notwithstanding any Standing Order or other order, after second reading of Bill C-109, to provide for payments to persons in respect of dwellings insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation, the said bill shall be referred to a committee of the whole and, not later than 9:45 p.m. on Tuesday, July 27, 1982, all questions necessary for the disposal of all remaining stages of the said bill shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

If you seek unanimous consent for this motion, Mr. Speaker, I think you will obtain it, and therefore the order of the day for tomorrow would be Bill C-109.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the minister to propose this motion at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree to the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA PORTS CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-92, to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport, and Motion No. 5 (Mr. Cook) and Motion No. 6 (Mr. Siddon).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before calling it six o'clock, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain).

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.01 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the House rose at six o'clock, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) was recognized.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this bill and its amendments will bring to the attention of Canada the total lack of long-term, co-ordinated national planning for a transportation policy. That is the situation in which we find ourselves today. As I said when the bill was debated on second reading, it will depend entirely on the policies and principles of the government that administers it if the ports are to benefit. And as was pointed out by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook), the present minister will probably administer the bill for some time. I am confident that he will honour his commitment, but I am equally confident that any change in policy reflected by a different minister will negate his present intentions.

We should not lose sight of the fact that this is enabling legislation which leaves control of the ports in the hands of the Department of Transport and the edict of the minister and the policy of the government of the day. That is the basis on which some people in Canada have supported the bill, that is also the weakness which many Canadians fear, and I am amongst that number. We must consider our future potential with regard to our rail system, we are debating how much money should be spent in the long term to transport grain over the Rockies to the markets of the Far East or perhaps even through the Panama canal. In any case it is a long-term and very expensive proposition to put the policy in place.

Should we then relegate some ports, such as Churchill, to a relatively insignificant role under this bill? Unless the government offers some initiatives, the port of Churchill will not play a significant role in the export of grain in the years ahead. The reason for this is that we are at present enchanted with the proposition that ports should make a profit, and if they do not, then as far as this government is concerned, they will be left in the doldrums.

I cite Churchill as an example because as an easterner I see it as a kindred spirit of the ports of eastern Canada. I see it as a port which can be useful, but unless government policy supports it, that use will be minimal. It needs the support of rail transportation and improved handling facilities if a great deal of western grain shipments are to be diverted through it.

Some statements have been made in the House to the effect that if a port cannot pay its way it should be closed. We have to look at the cost to Canada of operating ports under the present policy. Perhaps it would be cheaper to spend a little money to increase Churchill's handling capability for grain than to double track or double tunnel the Rocky mountains in order to push more of that grain westward, along with the sulphur, oil and other raw materials which pass over that range. We need a transportation policy to deal with this.

As I have said in the House over the years, we should be looking for multi-purpose cars, and not solely at the idea of unit trains, to move grain westward. We should look at the possibility of unit trains moving grain eastward to the Atlantic ports and examining what a multi-purpose car could do to reduce the necessity for double tracking through the Rockies. It might be cheaper to move 10 million tonnes of grain through the port of Saint John, the port of Halifax or the port of Churchill than to accommodate the double tracking necessary to move additional amounts of raw materials, both grain and natural resources, through the west. This act has totally overlooked the necessity of a national policy and the net cost of transportation to the Canadian people.

Getting down to the individual ports, we have converted from debt to equity a total of approximately $475,342,000. About $231 million of that applies to the port of Montreal, and $99 million to the port of Vancouver. The others have a miscellaneous amount of debt forgiven, such as St. John's at $382,000. That is not very much, and I do not blame the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) for complaining about the treatment of that port. When we pick up the principal, which is still unpaid and which is the responsibility of the ports, we find that the port of Saint John has a balance of $7,281,000 which it will have to pay. The port of Montreal will have to pay $9,470,000. The port of Montreal has a net income of $18,624,000, which will take care of that $9.5 million it owes presently. But the net income of the port of Saint John is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2 million, with $7 million outstanding. Again, the fairness and equity of the treatment of these two ports is not particularly satisfactory. The port of Vancouver has a net operating income of $17,687,000, with other income of $7,959,000. With that income, the port of Vancouver is in pretty good shape under most circumstances. Then there is the port of Montreal with an operating income of $10,685,000 and other income of $7,939,000, for a net income of $18,624,000. Those ports are very well looked after.

Let us then, Mr. Speaker, take a look at the indebtedness of the port of Halifax and the port of Saint John and compare them with their means. We find that in both ports the balance is not there. I am sorry the minister has left the House, and I appreciate he cannot be here all the time, but the port of Saint John has an operating income of $1,522,000 and other income of $637,000, for a total of $2,159,000 as its operating revenue. That means that the port of Montreal has more cash flow than all the other ports in Eastern Canada and less debt to pay back than the port of Saint John.

Therefore, I am going to repeat my request to the House and the minister to reconsider the position they have taken. The port of Saint John happens to be the only one with debt other than what it owes to the National Harbours Board and the Government of Canada.

I want to read a wire forwarded by the mayor of Saint John to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) at 3.55 p.m., July 8, 1982. It reads as follows:

> Strongly suggest that remaining $22 million loan by Province of New Brunswick to construct Rodney Terminal in Saint John be forgiven and thus allow Port of Saint John to operate the same as other ports under National Harbours Board jurisdiction, prior to new ports policy becoming law.

When I raised this in committee I was told by the minister, that, well, we might have a trade-off. New Brunswick owes us, we owe New Brunswick, let us cancel our debts. Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that and I never proposed that as a way in which $22 million could be paid on behalf of the port of Saint John. That is because when I pick up the report of the National Harbours Board as it relates to the St. Lawrence area I find that they spent, in a single year in the port of Montreal, $16 million on one structure, $19.7 million on another, $3 million on another—

Mr. Pepin: That is money provided by the port of Montreal itself.

Mr. McCain: Well now, this seems to be under the auspices of the National Harbours Board.

Mr. Pepin: That is it.

Mr. McCain: The money which comes from the NHB, until the passage of this act, has been money which belonged to the people of Canada, and they had to vote to spend that money.

Mr. Pepin: But of course the money comes from the port of Montreal, that is a fact.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is really a fair interjection by the minister, and he has been abundantly fair over the years. That remark ignores the fact that the Port of Montreal has received two or three parcels of land as a gift or for the nominal sum of $1, and that land is generating revenue approaching $8 million a year which goes into the cash flow of the port of Montreal. When you compare that with the cash flow of other ports in Eastern Canada, those ports are in a position of disadvantage. When you compare the fact that we are talking about user pay and we have the St. Lawrence Seaway which does not pay its way, and a St. Lawrence River which cannot function without icebreakers, and that is not charged to the port of Montreal or other ports on the St. Lawrence River, and then you add to that the additional pilotage charges which take place over a much more extended area in the St. Lawrence than in any other area in Canada, I submit to you that the port of Montreal and those other ports in the St. Lawrence Valley are getting advantages that no other ports anywhere in Canada get.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: All I ask for, Mr. Speaker, is fair play. And as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Leblanc) sits in his seat and smiles at me, I submit that he and the other members from Atlantic Canada should take up the cudgel because there should be no indebtedness on the part of any port anywhere in Canada to any government in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc: I did not smile at you, don't kid yourself. I was smiling at the hon. minister.

Mr. McCain: You would smile at him because he has really not dealt fairly with the ports of Atlantic Canada. You are a minister and you are a party to it. Along with the other six Liberal members from New Brunswick you have forgotten about New Brunswick, whether it be over Via Rail or the ports of Canada; whether it be the fishing ports or the NHB ports. That member, Mr. Speaker, was associated with the Liberal Party when the port of Saint John had to go begging to the province to get its piers. If it had not got the money from the province, there would be no container terminal and no forest terminal because this government was not prepared to vote the money to put them there.

Mr. LeBlanc: Don't rewrite history.

Mr. McCain: I am not jealous of the port of Montreal; I am just concerned about the inequity. The government forgives $211 million of debt for Montreal and only peanuts, relatively speaking, to the rest of the ports in Canada. You talk about user pay and how the ports must operate on their own cash flow. The port of Montreal has nearly $19 million in cash flow and the port of Saint John has so much less that it is not even funny. In addition, it has a provincial debt which it has to liquidate over a period of time at a rate to be negotiated.

• (2020)

That is not the way it ought to be. The Government of Canada has to take a look at the assorted needs of Canada. It should take a look at the requirements of Newfoundland, of Prince Edward Island, of New Brunswick and at its commitment to the tuna plant in Saint John, New Brunswick. The government's commitment was to extend the harbour if the plant were expanded. We now find that the expansion of the harbour at the Champlain industrial park is under consultation and all the ports of eastern Canada are to be studied by some unknown consultant. The decision as to whether or not the government will keep its word to the tuna plant in St. Andrews depends upon a report of a consultant.

The tuna plant acted in good faith and undertook its expansion which required additional port facilities. I raised this matter in the proceedings of the committee, but I got no answer. I had to find out from external sources, from occasional appointments of mine, who said "I am working on a consulting plan to determine whether money will be spent on the ports" I asked whether the one in the Champlain industrial park was included, and the answer given to me was yes. I mentioned that a commitment had been made by the Government of Canada that if the tuna plant expanded, the harbour facility would be expanded. The answer I received was, "It is under my jurisdiction in a study".

Why the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans supports this bill and this government is beyond my comprehension. I say this as a New Brunswicker. I challenge the minister to be one. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that if he is a good, solid and loyal New Brunswicker the Government of Canada will send a cheque to the port of Saint John to send to the province of New Brunswick so as to put that port at least on a comparable basis of indebtedness. There will not be a search for a change of liabilities. There will be a cheque to relieve that indebtedness which is unique in the ports of Canada. I plead with you as a New Brunswicker, Mr. Minister, to get a cheque for the port of Saint John to pay the province of New Brunswick. You have bullwhipped the province into making the money because you would not spend it in the first place. You have now left the port in a position of indebtedness that is comparable to no other port anywhere in Canada. Let us get equality for New Brunswick and the port of Saint John.

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) entertain a question?

Mr. McCain: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Mitchell: I must say that both in committee and in the House my colleagues and I have been very impressed with the statements made by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte. We are most impressed with his sincerity and concern about ports in New Brunswick and in the Maritimes provinces. But when he spoke earlier about the port of Churchill, I wondered, being quite sympathetic to its financial needs, does he agree with the statement made by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) earlier today when he said, "if Churchill cannot be financially self-sufficient, it should be shut down"?

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, having entertained the question I must have permission to answer it. I have to say that if the hon. member would interpret the remark in the spirit in which it was given in relation to the idea that the ports of Canada have to be self-sustaining, he was challenging the government to close it. He was not saying close the port of Churchill. He wast just challenging the government to close if if it did not pay its way. God knows, we need the port of Churchill as well as the Atlantic ports.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments with respect to the amendment before us. This is an amendment that we can support very strongly. It is one that both opposition parties were repeatedly advocating in committee. It is of particular concern as outlined in a number of documents from the port of Vancouver, but I am sure the matter is of concern to other ports as well, namely that local port corporations to be really autonomous must have control over their own funds to the greatest degree possible.

It is interesting that this motion actually presented by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) replaces six of his previous amendments presented in committee, many of which we would have supported here, and all of which concern local port autonomy. We do feel that the amendment before us fulfils the concerns we had expressed in committee that local port corporations should control their revenues to the greatest degree possible for operating costs, for the cost of borrowing if that should be needed, and for capital projects. I think when we talk about capital projects we have to talk about the short term, the five and six-year plans which have to be budgeted very specifically. We also have to talk about the long-range plans. The port of Vancouver's master plan is one example. We agree that surplus funds which are generated by the port over and above operating costs should be retained by that port for any capital costs. We agree also with the central banking concept. In fact, we had an amendment in committee which spelled this out. Instead of the parent corporation, the Canada Ports Corporation would be able to cream off the excess funds, which it perhaps thought were surplus, for use in the general port system. This should be done only in consulation and with complex approval of the local port corporation.

We would like to see the central banking concept spelled out a little more. We certainly need to see more of the bylaws as well for capital funds that we were told in committee would be available over and above the surplus funds generated by any one port.

Although we support this motion, we do not have complete confidence that we have full information. We will look with great interest at the bylaws when they are ready.

I would like to spend a minute on the first section as it applies to the port of Vancouver. The port of Vancouver has specifically requested a change in the procedure for control of local funds. On June 30, 1982, the mayor of Vancouver forwarded to the committee a statement as follows:

> —Any funds transferred from a local port corporation to the parent Corporation would be treated as if they were deposited in a bank, to earn interest and to be subject to withdrawal by the local port depositor when they are required.

This requirement was achieved. We are very pleased also with the concern that was expressed in a telex just a few days ago. That concern surrounded subclause 36 which reads:

> The Minister and the Minister of Finance may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, require the corporation to pay to the Receiver General as revenues of Canada so much of the money administered by it as the Minister and the Minister of Finance consider to be in excess of the amount required for the purposes of the corporation.

This is of particular concern because surplus funds are needed not only for a five-year plan but also for a 30-year major master plan which is being developed in co-operation with all municipalities and community groups concerned with this port. We feel those two concerns have been dealt with in this amendment. We also agree with subclause 2 that the corporation may borrow excess funds from the local port corporation, excess in this case being defined more specifically as excess funds being determined by mutual agreement between the local port and the Canada Ports Corporation. In previous statements it was really left to the parent corporation to decide this.

I might also say that the Vancouver city council requested an appeal procedure in this bill which has not been included. Perhaps it is not needed now that the local port corporation has been given more say. As I said before, we are not completely convinced. All of this may not be in writing but certainly in principle it appears to be there, along with the central banking concept, with which we agree, provided the moneys are lent and are still designated as being available to the local port corporation.

We were concerned in committee, and are still as concerned as the Official Opposition, about what rate of interest funds would gather when they are borrowed from the local ports corporation for revenues for the total port system of Canada. We advocate the market interest rate as being fair.

Under the second subpoint of this amendment, we believe it is only fair that when ports have income in excess of their immediate needs, these funds should be available to the port system as a whole. This makes sense, just as when a local port needs additional funding from the parent corporation, they should also be able to get this kind of help.

Fairness means that a national ports policy requires sharing and that the funds should be available in a sensible way for reasonable modernization of ports, which is certainly needed in most instances where there is income over and above operating costs.

In short, we would agree with this amendment, but in closing I would mention just for reference purposes some of the things that are being proposed. Again I will use my own riding port, the port of Vancouver, as an example. From the point of view of the short-term port plan, a $51 million program was just approved by the minister for the port of Vancouver. This includes something over $35 million for dredging contracts for expansion of the Roberts Bank coal port. A total of over $11 million will be spent at Vanterm over three years to improve its container crane capacity. At the Lynnterm facility another $3.3 million will be spent to expand and modernize that development. Also it includes a new Burrard Street viaduct to which the federal government contributed over $1 million. Of course we can see that modern and large international ports have many expenditures which have to be covered with funds in excess of those they can generate from their own income.

As to the long-term development of the port, the master plan of Vancouver already highlights the following findings. I will just skim over them to put on the record the very broad kinds of development which will have to be funded over the next 30 years for major development of a very important international port. Air transportation will need to be expanded by the provision of an additional helicopter landing and take-off area. There will have to be an expansion of coal handling facilities within the port area by the provision of additional terminal capability. In the area of coastal shipping, current traffic volumes are expected to level off. This is of increasing significance to all the problems of British Columbia. Continued growth is predicted in commercial fishing for various firms in the port of Vancouver. There will be significant growth in the demand for container handling within the port area. I am sure that this is the case in other major ports of Canada. New cruise ship facilities will replace the temporary facilities, and federal government funds are needed for this development. I think members from my area will admit that additional federal grants are needed for this.

Also it will cost money to provide environmental statutes applicable to the port area. Physical improvements are needed in the areas of excursion boating, forest products handling, general cargo handling and grain products handling. Physical improvements are also needed to expand greatly the grain terminal facilities and railroad capabilities. In the area of hydrocarbons handling, current terminal facilities have significant potential for increased volumes. Substantial growth is predicted in terms of potash handling.

In the area of public recreation, we need major changes in land use around the port. Some community groups are very concerned about this. There must be more access to the port for communities, and there must be a change in some of the present lease arrangements over the next period of long-term planning. There must be upgrading and expansion of the rail system. There are considerable hasards in the port which I have personally witnessed driving around it. Additional marinas are proposed for recreational boating facilities. In terms of road access it is important to have municipal and regional input into planning for the port.

Also I wish to mention sulphur handling and support activities such as those to which my colleague referred when he spoke about the entire marine industrial strategy or plan for marine industrial development, whichever term one chooses to use.

All these things are extremely important in the development of our ports. In the case of the port of Vancouver, they will not only take considerable planning, but will certainly need long-term allocation of funds from those funds generated by the port as well as perhaps from additional loans through the parent corporation. We support this amendment, as I say, and we support it particularly because of the needs of the port of Vancouver.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I want to address myself to the subject of the management of some of our ports in Canada because that, of course, is the topic of the motion now before the House. In particular I refer to the situation at the port of Happy Valley in Goose Bay, Labrador, in my own province. This situation cries out for correction and improvement. I am referring to a port which is administered directly by the Department of Transport. In that port the Government of Canada and its agency, CN Marine, have allowed a situation to arise that cries for correction, a situation which permits a monopoly on all freight going into Goose Bay and on all freight or cargo moving out of Goose Bay by a person who is a well-connected friend of the government.

Let me explain some of the background of this situation. The person I am talking about is Mr. Melvin Woodward who was a Liberal member of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland for the Goose Bay-Happy Valley area for a number of years. He was defeated in 1975. He ran again as the Liberal candidate in the June 1979 election and again in the April 1982 election, and was defeated both times. He is a close political associate of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey). He has been made director of the Bank of Canada appointed by the government opposite. He has been made chairman of the Enterprise Development Board for Newfoundland and Labrador by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). That is just his background.

Until 1980 this same gentleman was the wharfinger at Goose Bay appointed by the Government of Canada. While he was a wharfinger there, he was also in business for himself. One of his businesses was the operation of an oil tanker which delivered oil along the Labrador coast. Since 1973 he has controlled all the stevedoring facilities and services in the Goose Bay-Happy Valley area of Labrador. He was given by the Department of Transport all the sheds and wharfs owned by that department in Goose Bay under a management agreement of 1973. No tenders were called, no lease proposals were called. This particular individual was simply given by the Department of Transport all available sheds and wharfs in the Goose Bay area to use for his own business. In other words, publicly-owned facilities were given to him. For example, Department of Transport shed No. 4 went to Woodward's Limited and sheds Nos. 1, 2 and 5 went to Coastal Shipping Limited. Both companies were owned by the same Melvin Woodward without any tenders being called. In addition, from the year 1969 onward, without any tenders ever being called, this same Melvin Woodward was given the job to do all of the stevedoring for CN Marine in Goose Bay-Happy Valley. The main shipping service to Goose Bay-Happy Valley—not the only service but the main essential one—is CN Marine. This government agency, also without calling tenders, also without calling proposals, has had Mr. Woodward act as its stevedore in the Goose Bay-Happy Valley area and as its agent in that area since 1969.

In addition to this, he controls all of the facilities, he controls the wharves, he controls the sheds. No one has put in a proposal as stevedore because they cannot get the sheds and the use of the wharves which are controlled by Woodward. When you make a complaint that this is the situation, CN Marine will say that it has to deal with Woodward. Nobody else can have access to the wharves or the sheds. When you complain to the Department of Transport it says that it has to deal with Woodward. He is the stevedore for CN Marine. The man is safely covered on all sides.

What is the point I am coming to in connection with all of these arrangements made with this Liberal agent, Mr. Woodward? I wrote to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) about this situation on November 26, 1981, bringing all of this to his attention. The reason I brought this to his attention was that it had been brought to my attention that Mr. Woodward, in addition to being paid by CN Marine for all of these stevedoring services in the Goose Bay-Happy Valley area, was also charging a terminal fee, as he called it, to everyone who receives cargo in the Goose Bay-Happy Valley area. All inbound cargo was subject to this terminal fee for a terminal that is owned by the public, paid for by the public money. This private individual was charging a terminal fee last year of $5.20 for every tonne of cargo that he unloaded as CN Marine's stevedore at Goose Bay. He then charged everyone in the Goose Bay area who shipped cargo out of the area a terminal charge of $5.20 a tonne to put it on board the CN ships he stevedored for, or any other ships.

He does this without any right whatsoever. He does not own the wharves and he does not own the sheds. He has been given them by the government without any tenders ever being called. This Mr. Woodward and his companies are charging this terminal fee of $5.20 a tonne.

Last year, approximately 40,000 tonnes of cargo went into Goose Bay and out during the shipping season, which lasts only some six months because of the ice problems during the period from November until late May each year. In other words, the consumers of the Goose Bay-Happy Valley area were forced to pay over $200,000 unnecessarily in terminal charges to this Liberal agent. The government has put him in a position, with the help of CN Marine, to have a monopoly. He has improperly charged over $200,000 last year in terminal charges made possible by his cozy arrangements with the Liberal Party represented in the Government of Canada and under the instructions—with his background with CN Marine—of the government agency.

Last year, the terminal charge was $5.20 a tonne. This year, the man has the audacity to charge $5.85 a tonne for a terminal fee because of present inflation. In other words, the unjustified fee is up to $5.85 a tonne for every tonne of cargo moved by this gentleman. This year he will charge the consumers of that area in excess of $240,000, to which he is not entitled.

Dealing with the administration of ports, as long as this kind of blatant political partisanship, patronage and corruption is to rule in our courts, we can pass whatever kind of legislation we want because the situation will never be improved. I wrote to the minister on November 26, 1981, and brought this to his attention. I wrote to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) and brought this monopoly situation to his attention. I also wrote to the president of CN and the president of CN Marine to bring it to their attention. After a period of several months I had a reply from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Of course, his reply would only make one laugh if it did not make one cry. He had to concede that there was a monopoly but could not concede that the monopoly is damaging the public for very specious reasons which I do not have time to go into in detail. I would refer to his letter of February 1, 1982, where he said that one of the reasons that the sheds did not go to public tender was that Woodward had the stevedoring contract in Goose Bay and they were consequently leased to Woodward because he was the most likely one to use the sheds for freight distribution. That was the reason the minister gave for giving Mr. Woodward all of those sheds. He should have the sheds because he is going to be doing the stevedoring.

When I went after CN Marine, I had a meeting with Mr. Tingley on May 5, 1981, about this situation. He gave me a different version. He said that CN Marine had to give Woodward the stevedoring contract because he controlled the sheds. Here we have the Government of Canada, through the minister's colleague, saying that it has to give Woodward the sheds and it is not a monopoly because he has the stevedoring contract. Then we have CN Marine saying that it has to give this man stevedoring because he has the sheds. Why can the Department of Transport and CN Marine not get together and call tenders on both of these contracts so that Mr. Woodward is not in a position to be a monopolist and charge what he likes to the consumers of the Happy Valley-Goose Bay area?

Of course, I also got a reply from the minister himself. I believe the reply was dated March 15 and in it he gave all kinds of reasons why this was quite proper and nothing could be done about it. Everything was above board, and of course he did not answer any of the points I made in my letter to him.

Incidentally, I also had a response from CN Marine on January 29, 1982, telling me that CN Marine's responsibility ends when the load is placed on the wharf. CN Marine said, "We are not involved in the setting or collection of terminal and/or delivery charges." In other words, CN Marine does not care how much this man bilks the consumers of the Happy Valley-Goose Bay area. Their responsibility ends when he, their stevedore, takes the cargo from their vessel and puts it on the wharf. Do you know something else? It is not their vessel. It is a vessel supplied by the very same Mr. Woodward. The vessel is called the MV Astron. CN Marine allegedly called for tenders in January of 1981—very short notice to everyone but Mr. Woodward—and manoeuvred the situation so that Mr.

Woodward won the tender to supply the roll-on roll-off vessel that now carries cargo and freight from St. John's to Louisporte to Happy Valley-Goose Bay. Therefore, Mr. Woodward, goes to his own vessel, takes the cargo off his own vessel provided to him through CN Marine, lands it through his own stevedoring services on public wharves which he controls, puts them in public sheds which he has been given control of by the Liberal Party of Canada and then charges a terminal charge of $5.85 a tonne when he delivers it to a consumer or when the consumer comes to get this cargo.

This is a situation that cries for correction. A 20-tonne container landed in St. John's, Newfoundland, will be delivered in any area within a 25 mile radius of the port for $75. That fee covers delivery, picking up the container and returning it to the wharf. But at Goose Bay where Mr. Woodward does all of his work and where no one else can do it since he has the monopoly, if you have your container moved several miles you have to pay $200 plus the terminal charge of $5.85 per tonne to have that container moved. That is three times the fee charged in St. John's and you must pay a terminal charge on top of that. I have been corresponding with the Minister of Transport and other ministers for over a year now but they do nothing about this situation. It is a situation that stinks and cries for correction.

Finally, the people of the Goose Bay-Happy Valley area have caught on. On December 1, 1981, a Goose Bay sales company wrote to Mr. Woodward refusing to pay the terminal fee and asked him how he could justify the charge. They have never heard back from him. On May 12, 1982, 20 business firms in the Goose Bay area wired the Minister of Transport about this situation. They have not heard back from him, as far as I know. At the same time, the minister of northern affairs in the Government of Newfoundland, who is the member for that district, wrote to the minister on May 25, and on January 3, 1982, this year, I wrote to the minister again bringing this whole matter to his attention.

We can pass all the legislation we like in the House, but if this kind of conniving, corruption, patronage and trickery is to go ahead, and if no one will do anything about it, then all the legislation we pass in the House does not matter a tinker's damn. The people of the Goose Bay-Happy Valley area are being skinned alive. They already have a very high cost of living. They are living in the north and in a situation where, for six months a year, they get nothing brought in except by air, and then, when the ice goes and the port opens up, we find this Liberal manufactured monopolist putting the boots to them, charging everything under the sun, using his own vessel, chartered by CN Marine, providing the stevedoring services, using a public service, for which he pays little or no rent, and then charging, on top of everything else, a terminal fee of $5.85 a tonne.

I am putting this on public record and asking for a commission of investigation, an inquiry into this corrupt situation in Goose Bay-Happy Valley. I am asking for that inquiry to go on and to inquire into the whole situation with respect to CN Marine, which is out of the control of this government or of any government. It had never had a public audit until 1979, all its deficits until then being met by the Government of Canada, and the matter now cries out for public investigation. I understand that the Auditor General is taking special pains this year to attempt to find out what is going on with CN Marine and the cozy arrangements into which CN Marine is entering.

What is some other evidence of favouritism for this Mr. Woodward, this director of the Bank of Canada, this chairman of the Enterprise Development Board, this ex-Liberal candidate, this ex-Liberal member of the House of Assembly in Newfoundland, this buddy, this friend, this campaign manager of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey)? They are heart to heart, soul to soul.

What else is going on with Mr. Woodward? He has had the stevedore contracts from 1968, not just from 1969. There was a building, No. S-1291, which was supposed to be removed from the site and the site restored in 1969. Mr. Woodward was given the building and given permission to leave the building on site when another well-known Newfoundlander was minister of transport, so that building is still there on the site. He is supposed to be paying rental of $177.60 a year for land 40 feet by 148 feet from June 1, 1971. He is actually using land measuring 270 feet by 280 feet and should be paying at least $2,268 per annum, which is another act of favouritism shown to this gentleman.

In September, 1974, a 12,000-barrel fuel tank was placed below high water mark adjacent to the main dock. It was supposed to be cut up and removed by the same Mr. Woodward. It is still there. It has not been cut up and it has not been removed. The storage area to the rear of all those sheds are on a Woodward scrapyard. He pays nothing to the government for that privilege. He has stored it, free, on federal property, since August 7, 1980, whenever he wished, despite the fact that in a memo dated November 10, 1978, it is forbidden for scrap to be stored on federal wharves or approaches. The ordinary federal rules of the Department of Transport do not apply to this self-same Mr. Woodward. Why? Because he is a Liberal. Why? Because he is friend, companion and campaign manager for the Minister of National Revenue. So if he piles the scrap on federally-owned land, on approaches to the wharves and behind the sheds, it does not matter.

There is another major aspect, the Astron. I would need much more time to go into the details of this vessel, the Astron, and how Mr. Woodward got the Astron chartered by CN Marine. That vessel is getting the highest charter hire of any vessel of CN at sea, $4,868 a day on a five-year charter, the most generous charter that CN Marine ever gave, supposedly the result of a tender call, but the tender call laid down certain conditions that all others thought applied, or that Woodward knew did not apply. Therefore, he was the only one to tender the kind of vessel which they afterwards said they wanted. Not only is he getting $4,868 a day for charter hire but he is also getting escalation. Last year he received $4,800 a day. This year he receives a daily charter hire of $4,800 a day plus 60.1 per cent of the 1982 cost of living index increase. In other words, the cost of living rose 12 per cent, so he will now receive 60.1 per cent of 12 per cent added on to the $4,800 a day. CN guarantees to use his vessel at least 183 days a year. If it cancels the charter during this five-year period, it must purchase the vessel. Therefore, the vessel in the tender call has said, "Canadian-owned and registered vessel preferred". The vessel is bid and registered in Bermuda. It is foreign-owned. It is not a Canadian vessel. But it does not have to pay pilotage fees. It is given a special arrangement with respect to pilotage fees. Mr. Woodward does not hire CBRT or union crews on this vessel. No, he has his own crews on his vessel, permitted by CN Marine, and he paid his seamen $4.10 an hour last year. That is what the Woodward seamen on this vessel received.

I wrote the minister about all this. I know that my time is up, Mr. Speaker, so I will conclude now. I will never conclude with this issue, though, until it is resolved and investigated and a proper report is made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I wrote the minister about all this, and he sloughed me off. He apparently believed the people whom he sent out to look into this. He told me there was insufficient evidence of improper practices to warrant instructing CN Marine not to go forward with the charter of the vessel, the Astron. The minister took no action to stop that deal going forward. Mr. Minister, this situation cries out for rectification. I do not care if it concerns a Liberal, a Conservative or whoever it is. No person in Canada should be put in this position, to monopolize everything, and then to give the consumers and the ordinary people of Labrador a drubbing and a screwing as this man has been giving them for a number of years, imposing charges that are unwarranted and which have been made possible by the inactivity, if not the active misfeasance, of the government which sits opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief because most of the remarks I wanted to make have already been made by others. I wanted to note that one of the eminent predecessors of the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the late C. D. Howe, was responsible in 1936 for the National Harbours Act that we have today. At that time, the argument in favour of centralization was that the autonomous harbours were riddled with political patronage. I see now that the idea is to go back or revert to the pre-1936 arrangements. We have just seen an illustration of some of the patronage that still exists within the operation of Canadian harbours.

I wanted to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) with respect to the port of Churchill. It seems ludicrous to me that we do not develop that port, instead of allowing the harbour to silt up, and that we do not adequately maintain the railway track. It is a thousand miles shorter, from the Canadian prairies to Europe through the port of Churchill, than it is through the Lakehead and the St. Lawrence. That port should be used to a much greater extent than it is at present.

But the point I really wanted the Minister of Transport to hear was with respect to the possible development of a national harbour. Somewhere along the Arctic coast, facing the Beaufort Sea we should develop a national harbour since a number of vessels are operating in that area and the development is dislocated. One company will go in there and do a little bit of dredging and make temporary harbour facilities in one location. A couple of years later they will move over to another place. Do we not have one central location in that area where we might make a national harbour at some time in the future?

What I am suggesting to the minister is that he request his officials to examine that area, 500 or 600 miles of coast from the Alaskan boundary over to the Paulatuk area and locate potential sites for national harbours in that region. They are very limited. Most of the shore of the Beaufort Sea is very shallow way out into the water. There are only one or two limited sites which would make a good national harbour. I suggest we examine those potential sites and have the lands set aside at this time for the development of a national harbour. I hope that can be done. Those are the few comments I want to make. I will not delay the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) any longer.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments on motions Nos. 5 and 6. Before I comment on motion No. 5, let me say that before the dinner hour the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) referred to the role that Gordon Sinclair, the marine administrator, had played with regard to this bill. I agree with my hon. friend and I emphasize that the role played by Mr. Sinclair was considerable, if not enormous, in the preparation of this bill.

I also want to praise the four musketeers—as usual, there were five—Messrs. McPherson, Boyer, Innes, Simmons and Biron, chairmen respecting the port authorities at Vancouver, Montreal, St. John's, Halifax and Quebec, who served as advisers in the preparation of this bill.

Back to work, the government is willing to accept motion No. 5. There is nothing here that is very different from what was intended. I agree that the final text, which had many authors, is more clear than the one we started with. Subclause 34 of Clause 13 deals with the so-called banker concept. That is the capacity of the Canada Ports Corporation, the maxi corporation, to act as banker for the local port corporation with respect to their excess or surplus funds. This received considerable interest in the committee, I would say excessive. I doubt whether it will be one of the main sources of financing for ports in the future simply because the concept of surplus or excess funds comes in only after the port corporation has foreseen expenditure for the six-year capital budget.

That is a long time. They will need a lot of money to do that. I would think that a port which finds itself in this position might think of reducing its rates or tariffs in order to attract more customers. Therefore, I do not see it as a major feature of this bill. Be that as it may, it has been substantially improved.

I repeat, Motion No. 5 makes it clearer. The first subclause states the principle very well after providing for five items that the local port corporation has to provide for. The key words are, "Be retained by the local port corporation". That is, the funds will be retained by the local port corporation which, as the hon. member said, is the principle. The first call is for the local port corporation. The words that apply in this amendment are taken from Bill C-50 of 1979.

Subclause 2 makes it clear that the loan from the local port corporation to the Canada Ports Corporation is by agreement between the two entities, the national and the local. I grant to my hon. friend that that is an improvement. It is much friendlier in that fashion than in the previous version. In this instance the minister is left out. The minister comes back in in subclause (3). He can require a local port corporation to loan to the Canada Ports Corporation as usual, taking into account the demands of a six-year budget and after consultation with the local port corporation. That is a better draft. Therefore, we will pass it as an interesting improvement of the bill.

It is a similar situation with Motion No. 6, which deals with subclause (36) of Clause 13. Here the right of the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance is affirmed to require the corporation to make a contribution to the Receiver General. Members on the other side did not like that. Because it is not essential to this bill, for the simple reason that that clause is found in the Financial Administration Act, I am not unwilling to depart from it, if such is the wish of the House. However, I want to be very emphatic. There is no change to the reality of it. It is a matter of perception. It is one of the residual powers of the Crown that it can grab money wherever it can grab it. That is expressed in the Financial Administration Act.

The same clause plus is also found in the Harbour Commissions Act. It has never been used. Therefore, this is no great change, and I would not like to present it as such.

As I said in committee, that clause was in the bill because we wanted to accommodate the possibility that the Canada Ports Corporation and local port corporation might move from Schedule C under the Financial Administration Act to Schedule D and then, like CN and Air Canada, they would have to make a contribution to the government by way of dividends. This is the clause in the Financial Administration Act that permits the minister and the government to extract dividends from Schedule D Crown corporations. That was one of the reasons it was there.

I repeat, this is not being taken out. It is found in Section 71(4) of the Financial Administration Act. If I had time I would read it. This is no great change. It is a perception only, as some of my friends opposite have said.

I would like to spend a lot of time on this but I will not do that. I am not entitled to speak for a long time, as is the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). If I did that, I would be considered uncouth, uncivilized and unfriendly. Therefore, I will not. I want to give everyone a chance to speak, including the chairman of the Transport Committee of this House who did such a good job on this bill. I want everyone to have a chance to speak.

I want to say a few words only in reply to the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain). He talked about the need for money in Saint John, New Brunswick. It was interesting to observe that members did not resist the temptation to go regional, an unfortunate characteristic in this country. That does not apply to the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) who is an exception in everything he does.

One of the members from Vancouver talked about the large expenditures in the port of Vancouver. That is all from savings from funds originating in the port of Vancouver. Similarly, expenditures in the port of Montreal are all from savings made in that port. In Halifax, for example, the federal government recently invested $20-some million dollars in Fairview Cove. Similarly, in Saint John it was $29 million. There is a distinction to be drawn between funds originating from the revenues of the local ports and funds originating from federal contributions. Be that as it may, with respect to Saint John I said in the committee that it is not easy for me to forgive that particular debt. First of all, this is not a money bill, and I could not do it in this bill. Second, that debt is the result of a loan by the Government of New Brunswick to the port. In other instances the contributions of the provinces have come to ports by way of grants, so that if we were going to compensate the province of New Brunswick for a loan contribution to the port of Saint John, all the other provinces—and there are many which have made grant contributions to their ports—would come and say, "What the heck; are we going to be penalized because we were more generous, possibly, than the Government of New Brunswick?" My hon. friend should realize that there is a problem here. In the committee I extended myself fully in relation to the concept about which he smiles now, which is an arrangement by which Peter might pay Paul. We are still working at that, even if we do not have the gratitude of the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte.

With respect to the contribution of the hon. member for St. John's West about the Goose Bay terminal, I could go on almost as long as he did.

Mr. Crosbie: I was getting started.

Mr. Pepin: I hesitate to do that, for very good reasons. This is really the equivalent of a vendetta between the Montagues and the Capulets, and I hesitate to put my finger between the tree and the bark. It seems that one of the mistakes Mr. Woodward has made has been to challenge the strength and power of the Crosbies in that particular area, and presumably that is his punishment.

Mr. Crosbie: That is complete junk. It is the public being screwed up there; it has nothing to do with the Crosbies. You are going to regret that.

Mr. Pepin: The information I have is that Coastal Shipping has a bona fide contract with CN Marine, and with respect to the Department of Transport, since 1980—I do not know about the time before that; my hon. friend is possibly right about that—Transport Canada has applied the principle of tendering in renting property. The famous shed 1, shed 2, shed 3 and shed 5—

Mr. Crosbie: They haven't called tenders.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Coastal has a three-year lease now.

Mr. Crosbie: But they have never called tenders for it. They were given it.

Mr. Pepin: The information I have is that this was done on a tendering basis.

Mr. Crosbie: Ten years before that what happened?

Mr. Pepin: I am not talking about ten years before. I am just saying that, contrary—

Mr. Crosbie: No tenders have ever been called.

Mr. Pepin: —to what my hon. friend says, since 1980 the lease has been on a tender basis with Coastal Shipping. In any event, it is slightly different from what the hon. member said on this particular matter. The rental was based on market value as determined by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Crosbie: Market value? Junk. Tell us what the rent is.

Mr. Pepin: That is one opinion. I do not have the detail of what the rent is.

Mr. Crosbie: Of course you don't.

Mr. Pepin: I have written to the hon. member before. My hon. friend referred to that. I will be writing him again after another inquiry, which has been conducted, is completed. I understand that the president of CN Marine, Mr. Armstrong, has already written to the hon. member on this subject. This is what I know on this matter. I am very concerned that justice should be done and justice should be seen to be done, and I will continue my research so that my hon. friend will not have reasons for grievance the way he had tonight.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would entertain a question.

Mr. Pepin: Yes.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister why, in the absence of intelligent ports policy historically, he should now use the Old Testament biblical policy that the sins of the fathers should be visited upon the sons and that the debt should remain the debt of the port of Saint John. If the minister feels that conscience dictates that other provinces should be reimbursed, why not reimburse them all? That is my question.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I have already explained well why it is difficult to forgive the loan made to the port. I explained that well, I thought.

Mr. McCain: Why ask the sons to bear the sins of the fathers in the old biblical sense?

Mr. Pepin: Again, I will repeat that one of the main reasons is that in this particular instance the province of New Brunswick made a loan to the port. In other instances—for example, in Nova Scotia with respect to Fairview Cove—it was a grant or gift. In British Columbia, at Prince Rupert, similarly, it was a gift. We cannot easily pay back New Brunswick for a loan because those provinces which made grants—gifts—would come back and say they deserve the same repayment. I think this is not illogical.

Mr. McCain: You did not answer the question. That's all.

Mr. Pepin: I thought I had, but I will try again next time.

Mr. McCain: Why should the sins of the fathers be visited on the sons on the Old Testament biblical "eye for an eye" basis?

Mr. Pepin: That is not really the intent. In addition to that, the port of Saint John has done rather well. The potash development which has taken place is sponsored by the federal government at the level of $29 million, which is not chicken feed.

Mr. McCain: On a user pay-back basis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There was some discussion in the House earlier as to whether motion No. 5 stands in the name of the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) seconded by the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) or vice versa.

Mr. Siddon: If I might clarify, Mr. Speaker, motion No. 5 stands in the name of the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) as printed in the Order Paper. Motion No. 6 stands in my name, also as printed in the Order Paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thank the hon. member. The question is on motion No. 5. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 5 (Mr. Cook) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The question is now on Motion No. 6. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 6 (Mr. Siddon) agreed to.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-92, to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out line 14 at page 23 and substituting the following therefor:

"cases.

40. The Minister, the Corporation or a local port corporation shall not, by virtue of anything provided by or under this Act, be deemed to have the administration, management or control of any scheduled harbour as defined in section 2 of the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act." "

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will abbreviate my explanation of this motion. Clause 7 of the bill as printed provides:

"9. (1) The Governor in Council may, by order, at any time, on the recommendation of the Minister,

(a) transfer to the Corporation for administration, management and control any harbour, work or property of Canada—

That clause provides a substantial expropriation power to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to enlarge the boundaries and jurisdiction of the Canada Ports Corporation to encompass other ports which are owned by Her Majesty and operated in the name of the Government of Canada. I had hoped—this is reflected in a motion printed on the Order Paper last week—to find a way to exempt harbours that are operating under the Harbour Commissions Act or the Government Harbours and Piers Act, former acts governing the management of these other types of harbours owned by Her Majesty, from any overriding power or expropriation threat by the provisions of Bill C-92. I have been led to believe that the government will find the present motion acceptable. It would exempt harbours operating under the provisions of small craft harbours legislation from any possible threat of expropriation by way of enlarging the head line of ports operated by the Canada Ports Corporation. I only regret that the minister had not seen fit also to provide similar guarantees to protect harbour commission ports because, as we determined through our long committee deliberations, it has been an objective from the outset that if a local port corporation sought to establish harbour commission status or Class D Crown corporation status, that would be permitted. I am afraid that, given the very powerful expropriation provision in Clause 7(9) the minister, in his judgment, could at some time in the future reacquire a harbour commission port and take it into the family of ports operating under the Canada Ports Corporation.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I am led to believe that the government will find this amendment acceptable. It will protect all the small craft harbours in Canada, including the two in my riding, at Ladner and Steveston, from possible acquisition by the Canada Ports Corporation.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the amendment is to establish symmetry between the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act and the Canada Ports Corporation Act so that one cannot infringe upon the other. It is a search for symmetry and we thought it was implied in the spirit of the bill. If my hon. friend wants to spell it out, that is all right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

The motion is carried unanimously.

Motion No. 7 (Mr. Siddon) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The question is on Motion No. 8 in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell).

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East) moved:

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-92, An Act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act, be amended in Clause 15 by striking out lines 20 to 28 at page 23 and substituting the following therefor:

"chairman, a vice-chairman and five other directors.

2.(1) Subject to this section, three of the directors of a local port corporation shall be appointed by the Governor in Council and the remainder shall be appointed by the Governor in Council based on recommendations as follows:

(a) one by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of the province in which the local port corporation is located;

(b) one director by agreement among the councils of all municipalities adjoining the port for which the local port corporation is established;

(c) one by the provincial federation of labour in consultation with the marine and maritime unions; and

(d) one by the agreement of the commercial tenants of the local port corporation."

She said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to this motion so that we know the context in which we are discussing it. In our view this is probably the most important amendment to the bill. Unless we can have the whole concept of local autonomy included in port management, it means nothing. There must be a board that is accountable to the local community as well as able to carry out the responsibility of the national port objectives. We believe it is very important to have a local board for local port corporations. It is important that we not have a patronage board, as was mentioned by a member from Newfoundland, but a sound, democratic board that will be efficient and have expertise in a number of areas.

Our amendment proposes a seven-person board composed of a chairman, a vice-chairperson and five directors. Three of the directors would be appointed by the federal government and, in addition, four members would be appointed by the minister, but the four names could be submitted in four different areas of interest. We feel, for example, that the government of the province in which the port is located should be able to propose one or more names to the minister representing the regional planning interests, the industrial and economic development interests which are of major concern to the province. In a province with coastal regions, the total industry of the province is tied into the port system, so it only makes sense that it should have some say in appointments to the board.

We also propose that municipalities surrounding the particular port should have the right to propose names to the minister. Several names could be suggested of persons expert in port and regional matters and the concerns of the municipalities—not in a vested interest way, because they would represent all municipalities, but in a practical, planning way. They would know the environmental and other concerns of the surrounding municipalities.

We also propose that port users—domestic port users, should be able to name nominees for the consideration of the minister; perhaps one representative from that group. Surely the users of the port should have a voice. They would have a certain expertise to contribute to the board. We also propose a representative from labour—not a representative of one particular union but a representative of labour generally. Names could be submitted through the Canadian Federation of Labour in consultation with the marine unions.

This seemed to us to be a way of conforming to certain structures that are required for Crown corporations but still achieving a balanced approach to the composition of local port boards.

I should like to refer to the objectives that were established and that have been spoken to already. How can we possibly achieve Canadian international trade objectives and represent the concerns of all provinces using a port unless one member of the board has this kind of expertise? In the port of Vancouver, for example, I could see the need for someone tied in with the prairie provinces, with the lumber industry—someone who is knowledgeable about the Pacific rim trade interests.

In our objectives we said that there should be efficiency. That is one criteria of a sound local port corporations policy. This means there should be members on the board with business expertise. We know that the minister will think of these people first. In committee he automatically thought of the chamber of commerce, as did the Conservative Party which would automatically go to that group first. That is fine, let us have a member from the chamber of commerce, but let us also have persons expert in labour relations or who have knowledge of transportation or shipping and of the problems of dock workers.

We said in our objectives that there should be equitable treatment, in the movement of goods and persons, of users of the port. Domestic users should have a voice on the board. They could make a valuable contribution, speaking for all users of the port and for the business community, providing useful advice for policy making as well as the day-to-day operations of the port.

We said in our objectives that the port policy should provide local port corporations with a high degree of autonomy for management and operation of the port. It seems to me just common sense that persons nominated for the board should include some who know something about the surrounding municipalities and communities, as well as the provincial economic development concerns. The official opposition stated in one of its amendments, and we agree, that these should not be elected politicians but persons who have expertise in port matters and in planning in the areas I have mentioned.

It is important that there be co-ordination with other marine activities and with multi-mode types of transportation.

This would no be political patronage of appointees made by the minister in the typical Liberal way that we want. If we are to have autonomy in the local port corporations, the boards must have a broad composition with input from the groups that I have described.

We feel that the process of appointment to the board could be carried out through a procedure that would allow the minister to name the appointees. The minister did not seem to comprehend this is committee. I understand this idea was taken to cabinet and vetoed there. That is not an unexpected action by a Liberal cabinet, of course. The minister would still have certain veto rights, as would cabinet, but he would be able to choose three of the appointees in addition to the four groups that I have mentioned.

I do not really grasp the rationale of his argument when he said that special interests would dominate this kind of board structure. If ever we had special interests, it is under the present and proposed situation where the minister will appoint all the representatives to the board. Why does he think that one provincial representative, for example, would be able to out-vote six others? That is not special interest, that is just one out of seven who would express an interest that the province might have but who would be concerned as well with the port operation generally. The same thing applies to labour. The minister has given lip service to labour in that two local port authorities of the NHB have labour representatives, but there is no assurance that this would be part of the regular structure. If he agrees with it for two local port authorities, why could he not put it in writing as the criterion for the appointment of all boards across the country?

I was interested in a number of amendments proposed by the Conservatives, and we did agree with some of them as I said earlier. We believe the local port board, for example, should be able to elect its own chairperson. Why should that have to be done by the minister and approved by cabinet? In addition, surely a local board would be responsible and competent enough to nominate replacements and have them approved by the minister on their recommendation. It is interesting to note that the Conservatives proposed a system similar to the Harbours Commission when they were talking about the composition of the local advisory board. They wanted to have municipal representation, but I did not see it stated anywhere in their amendments that the province should have the right to some representation on the local board. I was very interested in that inasmuch as it was the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) who pressed very hard in committee to have witnesses come forward. We received a telegram from the Government of British Columbia saying that they do not agree with this bill at all and they wanted to have a B.C. port authority, a whole new authority for the province. We do not agree with that but I think it would make great sense to have the provinces, particularly in the larger ports, have a say and be able to propose at least one person to the board. I was curious as to why the Conservatives did not include this in their amendment.

In the case of the refusal by the minister and the government to consider our amendment, or even to modify it, I can only conclude that it confirms our major concern that the Liberal government still wants to maintain patronage appointments to these new local port boards. If this is the case—certainly there is nothing to indicate that it is not—it seems to me that it undermines the whole concept of autonomy, supposedly the main purpose of this bill. We know the appointees are going to be friends of the Liberals, if not actual party members. We have heard about former Liberal candidates appointed to boards under the present system. As soon as you get a board which is largely a patronage type of board, we will also have them deciding on leases. Certainly a lot of us have concerns about how leases are approved and about the granting of important financial advantages to persons receiving leases of port property.

I do not want to take any more time on this amendment, Mr. Speaker, but it is really a very important one, and I wish the minister would reconsider. I believe that in principle the opposition parties supported this in committee as well, and unless there is a more sound and representative local port board the proposed autonomy will simply not take place.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, just a few brief comments in connection with this particular amendment. It deals basically with the same material for which my party fought very hard in committee and in bargaining with the parliamentary secretary to get some kind of amendment of this nature. I mention in passing that this is not unique. The government will obviously turn down this amendment, not that the minister is opposed that much to it but because his cabinet colleagues booted him out of the room when he tried to suggest it might be reasonable to allow various ports to nominate two or three people from various segments of the population involved with that port. He would then still have the option of making his selection from that group. The minister, of course, was personally totally opposed to having any provincial input, and in the hopes of getting something through which might make sense we dropped it from our amendment. Finally, when we realized the hopelessness of the whole thing, we withdrew our amendment.

I am delighted to see that the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) has at least brought this to the attention of the House, even though it was a futile effort. I support this amendment, and I would support a far better one, but seeing that it is not going to happen anyway I would only warn the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that his appointments to local port corporations and the Canada Ports Corporation are going to be watched very carefully by all port people throughout Canada. The minister is going to be watched very carefully to see whether he has gone the usual Liberal route of pure patronage, or whether he has attempted to find people from the port community, the labour unions or the municipalities, in other words, whether there is a balanced board and one that knows its stuff, or whether it is going to be another group of Liberal party hacks. Rest assured, Sir, that I will be the first one screaming if you appoint the kind of board which you have the absolute dictatorial power to do. That is what we are objecting to and that is why we want this type of amendment. I compliment the hon. member for Vancouver East on bringing this forward so that it can be discussed, at least very briefly.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be short because many of us will not be speaking on third reading if things go as it appears they will this evening.

One of the two very strongly held concerns of members of this party is with respect to providing local autonomy. The other concern has to do with providing a degree of financial independence to the local port corporation, and the minister has graciously accommodated that. I would go so far as to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the minister were prepared to accept at least an undertaking to consult with the regional advisory council, which he will appoint under the provisions of this bill and which was the nature of amendments presented in committee and in fact listed on the Order Paper last week, then I could support this bill, even though I am not terribly happy about creating another family of Crown corporations. I am sure other members may feel that way also because it is like a slap in the face to our constituents to see rehashed, retired or defeated liberal candidates appointed to responsible positions. I recall asking the administrator in committee how these lists were prepared. Was it at departmental level and sent to the minister for selection and decision, or were the lists submitted to the administrator by the political structure for comment? I could gauge by the twindle in the administrator's eye that it was the latter course which was followed. I must say that is a sad commentary on the way we select people for responsible positions where they are entrusted with policy decisions and the over-all management of major Crown corporations such as the proposed Canada Ports Corporation. I cannot support the bill as written, largely because of this remaining deficiency which I would like to have seen rectified. I hope in these final moments the minister might agree to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell). It reflects the concerns of the people in my province and of the government of British Columbia to some degree because they have made it quite clear that they cannot accept the bill in its present form.

• (2140)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few comments so that it will not be said that I did not answer the last question. With respect to Motion No. 8, I disagree with the principle that is introduced which is group representation as opposed to representation by individuals. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) gave us four groups that she would like to see represented: the provinces, the municipalities, labour and tenants. I could name other groups. For instance users—

Mrs. Mitchell: I said users.

Mr. Pepin: —carriers, women, academics and environmental groups. Immediately you have a problem having to decide which groups are going to be selected. There are ten or 15 different groups that can relate to the objectives of a port. I have answered questions in committee as to provincial representation in these matters. But I should underline the fact that there is a new element in that bill. It sets the qualifications of those who will become members of the board. Proven experience and capacity is one of the criteria. As a member said, they have to know their stuff, which is one of the conditions for appointment. They have to be representative of local interests. Generally they have to have residence in the area of the port itself.

In committee I said that I would be looking forward to recommendations and suggestions made by different groups in society. I do not think it would be wise to appoint people to these boards on the basis that they represent this or that particular group.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The question is on Motion No. 8 in the name of the member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion No. 8 (Mrs Mitchell) negatived.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Pepin moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have spent a good many years of my life on this bill. I want to take a few miniutes to speak briefly on third reading. I could discuss many of the claims made in committee and here today but I will resist that temptation. Simply in my opinion, this bill is long past due. It has the support of the vast majority of the people involved in the ports community of Canada. A fair number of amendments have been accepted by the government, some of which in my own opinion make the bill weaker and some make it stronger, but that is the nature of the give and take and compromise of debate.

I believe it is now time to get on with Bill C-92 as amended and have passage of it today. I want to pay tribute to the committee, of which I had the honour to be chairman, for the diligence and the hard work which its member showed. There was a fair amount of partisanship, which one expected in a parliamentary democracy, but there was a maximum sense of public duty displayed by members who served on that committee.

I would like to pay particular tribute to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) who is probably more knowledgeable than any other member in this House on ports policy in Canada. I want to pay tribute also to the member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger). He was the Vice-Chairman of the committee. He chaired several sessions of the committee in my absence due to the death of a member of my family. In addition, I want to pay tribute to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) for his diligence in ensuring that we were all well-informed on the various points in the bill.

The minister attended the committee and gave full and frank answers to the questions presented to him. Finally, I would like to mention the administrator of the Canadian Marine Transportation Administration who spent quite some time in the committee. He was the chief witness. He, with his officials, deserve the commendation of the committee and the gratitude of the people of Canada for the fine job they are doing in administering the marine division.

Having said that, I express the hope that this bill will pass without further delay and that we will have in this country not independent ports but autonomous ports still responsible to the Government of Canada for their actions and, through the Government of Canada, to the people of Canada. I hope that we will have a very healthy and active port community as a result of the passage of Bill C-92 as amended.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. It has taken a long time to push this bill through. I think everyone who served on the committee worked very hard.

I want to state flatly and get it on the record that I will be voting against this bill. I shall be saying no to this bill because of the absolute powers it gives to the minister in practically everything. Perhaps I am wrong. Perhaps I am wrong to distrust a Liberal government that has been riddled with patronage of various kinds. Perhaps I am wrong to distrust civil servants in Ottawa for fear of what they may do in terms of continuing to attempt to run anything out of this centre which is 4,000 miles from my port.

If we can believe what the minister says and if we can believe what the administrator has had to say this bill may work out. But every time I look at the actual document and I try to find where it is written that we have autonomy, I cannot because it is simply not there.

I warned my colleagues and the port users of Vancouver about this bill. Never has there been a time when a member representing the west coast hoped that he was wrong about a bill in Parliament. If I am wrong I will be delighted. If I am right, then this is a terrible bill. One of the first things we will do when we take over the government will be to change this legislation, if the minister uses his autocratic powers and if the minister handles the bill with the vast powers he has. I only hope that I am wrong. But for the record I say that I will be voting a strong and vehement no to this dictatorial piece of legislation with regard to the ports of Canada.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, one of the main objectives of the national ports policy for Canada is to create a port system that is an effective instrument of support for the achievement of Canadian international trade objectives.

Canada is an active trading partner ranking eighth internationally in terms of the value of our exports. Merchandise exports are 25 per cent of our gross national product while our total external trade accounts for nearly one third of our GNP.

In the midst of today's world recession, competition for exports has become a battleground for economic survival. International competition in this environment of uncertainty will test severely Canada's ability to enhance or even maintain its existing trade position. As the battle for world trade advantage becomes fiercer, Canada must strive to have the best ports facilities in the world. Efficient ports can reduce the cost of our products significantly, making them more competitive on world markets.

The ports policy which we are shaping in the House today must be sensitive and respond to changing trade patterns. For example, three years ago, for the first time, our trade across the Pacific exceeded that across the Atlantic. Export market opportunities are shifting away from North America and Europe to Southeast Asia, the Middle East and Latin America.

Last year the special parliamentary committee on a national trading corporation tabled in the House a report entitled, "Canada's Trade Challenge". The bill we are about to pass this evening will provide a very important component in helping Canadians meet Canada's trade challenge.

It became evident 12 years ago that Canada's ports policy was no longer adequate to meet the economic and social needs of the eighties and nineties. Attempts to change the existing legislation to make it more responsive in meeting the needs for greater local and regional involvement in the operations and development of the ports within the NHB system failed.

A special task force of industry representatives and government was formed eight years ago to review Canadian ports policy and make recommendations on changes. The task force laid the foundation of a new policy by developing a series of objectives for the ports system. These objectives are clearly spelled out in Clause 2, subclause 3(1) of the bill. Therefore I will not waste the time of the House by reading the objectives. Taking into account the task force recommendations, new legislation was prepared and brought before the chamber in 1977 as Bill C-61, then again in the same year as Bill C-6, and two years later as Bill C-50. All three bills died on the Order Paper without even reaching second reading.

After being three times a bridesmaid, it is time that Bill C-92 became a bride, led to the altar by the distinguished groom, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). This bride, Bill C-92, is being given away tonight by her father, the administrator of Canadian marine transport administration, Mr. Gordon Sinclair.

Mr. Flis: If anyone deserves to claim the title of father of Bill C-92, the administrator certainly does. His many consultations with all interested parties across Canada on this bill, his information, advice and answers in committee, and his unlimited patience went a long way in bringing Bill C-92 to report stage.

In every wedding party there must be a best man. I would like to bestow this honour upon the chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport. Bill C-92 could have received the same ill fate as past ports bills, but thanks to his fairness to every committee member, regardless of party affiliation, the bill received careful scrutiny and came out of committee a better bill.

As Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, I want to thank the ushers of this wedding party—the hon. members for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook), for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon), for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), and others from the Official Opposition whose questions, clarifications and amendments have brought more clarity and strength to Bill C-92.

Of course, what would we have done without the bridesmaids? The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) kept reminding the committee that there were two sexes in the world. She and her colleague, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) stressed the importance of more decentralized administration—

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hate to take the time of the House, but I really object to the language just used by the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the hon. member objects to those words. I thought I was complimenting the hon. member. If she thinks they are offensive, I will withdraw them.

Also I would like to throw orchids to the hon. members of the Standing Committee on Transport from this side of the House for their dedication in attending committee meetings and for their defence of the bill. I must congratulate them for even voting against the government and with the opposition to pass the opposition motion on the appointment of auditors by local boards.

To complete the wedding party on this bill, I know that all hon. members of the House who served on the transport committee would want me to congratulate the mother of the bride, the clerk of the transport committee, Miss Santosh Sirpaul who was so helpful to all committee members in making certain that our amendments were in order and that the committee proceedings flowed as smoothly as possible.

After 12 years of attempts to improve our ports legislation, I am pleased and indeed honoured that I find myself standing in the House of Commons in the midst of parliamentarians who are providing outstanding leadership today for a better Canada tomorrow.

Mr. Deans: We were going to support the bill until we heard that speech.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my colleague says that we were going to support the bill until we heard that speech. That is not true. We are not going to support the bill. We agree that Bill C-92 is long overdue. In my remarks on June 22 I reviewed the history of the many attempts from 1901 on to establish more local autonomy and more efficiency in the ports system.

The ports policy of Canada is basic to our economic development and to our international trade. It creates jobs. It is essential to industrial development. It affects the quality of our life. Indeed, it is very, very important to all regions of Canada which are located on the waters of our continent. We believe that the ports policy must be efficient and decentralized to reflect regional needs.

The aim of Bill C-92 was to establish local autonomy. We think it has provided more local decentralized administration. There is more control over funds, particularly since the amendment passed today. However, we are not satisfied at all that there really is local autonomy in the true sense of the word. In particular, we are concerned that the board of directors of local port organizations will still be appointed by the minister. It is not a democratic board. There is no assurance that the objectives of Bill C-92 will be carried out because of it.

We in this party believe very strongly that we must also maintain a national ports policy which takes into consideration the needs of all regions—the prairies, to get their grain to port; northern areas, to get lumber and similar resources to port. We must be concerned about smaller ports which may need more federal support in the form of subsidies. Therefore we are concerned that this bill requires financial independence for a port to qualify to have local autonomy. Specifically we agree with the provision of regional advisory councils. It is a good move. It does not establish an authority at the provincial level, but we believe that it provides for the kind of planning that is needed.

There are positives in this bill, but unfortunately the negatives remain and are serious. Our amendment to link a Canadian marines strategy with the objectives was refused. The user-pay policy for ports which has now been established by the Liberals will be implicit in this policy. It could destroy some of the ports which are not able to be financially self-sufficient, and require them to charge fuller fees so that they would not be competitive and might lose customers.

Debts have been written off at this time, but there is no assurance in the future that there will not be ports operating in the red which will need help. Finally, we feel that the local autonomy is tokenism as long as there is central control in Ottawa. We agree with some of our colleagues to the right that there are many things in the bill which appear to be decentralized, but ultimately the control is in the hands of the minister and ultimately in the hands of cabinet.

I join in thanking all hon. members who participated in committee. I commend, particularly, the staff who spent many long hours and were most efficient in performing their duties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise because it is now ten o'clock, but having remained silent all day in spite of many things, there are two comments which could be made, one of which I make without any hesitation whatsoever. There is no parent, no bride and no bridegroom in this. I agree with my colleague from Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) that the sexism in this bill should disappear. However, that is another matter altogether.

• (2200)

If there is a real parentage to this that will measure up to his work and those who put together the National Harbours Board some 45 or 46 years ago, perhaps it is the process, because the process has been seen to work. In many respects I agree with the forcefulness of the representations by my colleagues from Vancouver, and in some respects I disagree with them.

This is a bill that I can support and I agree that the port users in this country by and large can support it. It is a bill that I hope will serve our ports and serve the objectives that have been outlined by a variety of members under different guises and different amendments throughout today. I hope that the bill does in fact serve those ends. Autonomy is something that we can achieve.

When the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) was minister of transport, I believe he was bent in that direction. I pay some tribute to him for having brought the bill to its present state. Had the government moved with respect to Crown corporations, given an indication of where it was going in that area, a lot of the difficulty surrounding this bill might have been shortcircuited. On the other hand, I can only say to the House, to the minister and the marine administrator and his staff that I appreciate their tolerance, understanding and patience. I hope the work they have done in terms of passage of this bill to serve the needs of our importers and exporters is in fact there and can meet the challenge that lies in front of us. I appreciate having had the opportunity to be part of the debate which is now some 10 or 12 years old.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

MINES AND MINING—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE. (B) LABOUR RELATIONS

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, on June 2, 1982, as recorded at page 18018 of Hansard, I directed questions to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the absence of the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) relating to the serious and growing crisis of employment in Canada's mining industry. At that time I pointed out that the current inventory as of early June showed that more than 34,000 mine, mill and smelter workers would be unemployed this summer largely because of announced shut-downs and work curtailments which were announced through the early part of this year.

I point out that if we take into account the multiplier effect to the people in all of these very seriously impacted mining communities across Canada, the people whose livelihood is directly related to the mining industry, we would find more than 160,000 employees across Canada, mostly in towns that are very heavily dependent upon single industries, who will see a major portion of their income impaired for 1982. I asked the Prime Minister to tell us what specific initiatives the government was preparing to take in the face of this serious dilemma and, in fact, what recommendations the hon. Minister of State for Mines had presented to cabinet in order to provide some hope of recovery to Canada's mining industry in the months ahead.

It has often been said that the plight of the industry has resulted from international factors and circumstances. I want to take a few moments tonight to point out that many sectors of our mining industry in Canada are in very seriously devastating circumstances because of domestic factors which cannot be entirely ascribed to international conditions.

Let me refer to a speech by the incoming president of the Mining Association of Canada in late May, who said that the problem of the Canadian minerals industry is not that of a lack of demand for Canadian minerals in foreign markets. He said that the problem is essentially domestic. I would put a lot of credibility in such words from the new president of the mining association. He went on to say that what is needed is determination by the government to restore an environment that encourages mineral development in Canada.

If we look at other observations on the discussion paper put forward by the Minister of State for Mines a few months ago, particularly if we look at the reaction of the Mining Association of Canada under the signature of David Thomas, the previous president, who wrote to the minister on May 29, 1982, we find that there is great alarm about the lopsided inferences on social priorities and the lack of recognition of the serious structural inadequacies in our taxation policy with respect to mining investment and development. Mr. Thomas also pointed out the regrettable fact, and I refer to his letter to the minister, that over the past few years Canada's share of the world market has not been maintained and it should be recognized that if slippage has occurred, it is due not only to changing international conditions of supply and demand of minerals, but also, in no small extent, to the fact that investor confidence in mineral development in Canada stagnated during the seventies as a result of taxation and disputes between the two levels of Canadian government and other related factors.

Since I asked these questions in the House of Commons on June 2, the situation has grown worse. If we do our sums now, we find something in excess of 42,000 mine workers stand to be unemployed by the end of this summer. We should consider that the current serious economic depression really did not gain momentum until after the Easter period. We are now to be forewarned that the lay-offs which were only to cover a period of six weeks or eight weeks through the summer months are now being extended.

If we read the headlines we see, for example, that Cyprus Anvil in the Yukon is in serious trouble, affecting some 1,000 miners and over 40 per cent of the Yukon economy. These unemployed miners are likely to remain unemployed through the winter months if the federal government does not take some action soon. Another headline states, that The North-West Territories exploration activity is down substantially. Another headline is to the effect that the potash mine reopenings are still in doubt. Another headline is to the effect that Hudsons Bay Mining is extending its shutdown and smelter workers may lose their jobs if the strike continues. Another one is to the effect that the investment lull could debilitate the economy well into 1984. Another is to the effect that Inco would reinstitute production halts even if workers returned, and they have returned. Another one states that Ontario uranium mines have shut down.

In conclusion, I would like to say that one of the most seriously impacted areas of our mining industry in northern Ontario is the Timiskaming area, where we have three mines, the Adams mine, the Griffiths mine and the Sherman mine, all supplying the total production to the Canadian steel industry. The other day we learned about the very unfortunate collapse or shutdown of the Defasco mill in Hamilton. The Stelco mill is also supplied from the Adams mine, and we have the serious problems involving the collapse of the northern gas pipeline, and Algoma Steel, which is cutting back severely on its demand for iron ore pellets. We should recognize that the iron ore economy of northern Ontario, in Kirkland Lake and in other areas in the Timiskaming region, is entirely dependent on iron ore production and that, in fact, the downturn is largely due to domestic factors and we cannot blame the world. We must blame the policies, the budgetary initiatives of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the government opposite. I would be very pleased to hear the Minister of State for Mines deny that that is the case.

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to reply to the statements by the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) on the state of the Canadian mining industry. I only wish I had the next 40 minutes to tell him exactly how this government is responding. Unfortunately, I do not.

Since he has painted such a picture of doom and gloom, I believe it is my responsibility to point out to him some of the bright spots that are occurring in Canada. I refer him to the most recent issue of The Northern Miner which states that the Canadian uranium outsells others in the United States market. Canadian producers are winning a large share of the current United States demand for long-term or large quantity uranium contracts.

It goes on to say that during the first six months of this year several major reported sales contracts involved approximately 30 million pounds of uranium. Just over half of the contract, or approximately 15 million pounds, went to non-U.S. companies for uranium to be produced in Canada. The willingness to adjust to the realities of the market is the primary reason that Canadian sellers have been so successful in obtaining new sales commitments.

I would have the hon. member know that the uranium mines in northern Ontario are running at full production. I also refer him to another rather successful spot in the Canadian mining scene, and I refer to the statement that gold keeps glister for Quebec mines.

Let me refer to The Financial Post, which states that the long established gold mining industry of northwestern Quebec centred in this town, aptly named Valley of Gold, is reasonably stable despite the fall in gold prices. This 70-mile wide stretch of the Canadian shield accounts for about one-third of the country's gold production worth about $230 million a year at recent prices and keeps as many as 8,000 people employed directly and indirectly.

It goes on to say that of the ten operating mines visited recently, all but one are making cash profits at the mine site, in some cases quite handsome profits. These ten mines appear more than capable of producing about 520,000 ounces of gold this year, and they employ about 2,000 at their operation, and that is not counting the spin-off that mining generates in services, supplies and transportation industries, creating perhaps another 6,000 jobs. All is not doom and gloom. I would go on to say that the hon. member well knows and refuses to admit that the vast majority of lay-offs in the country is due to a worldwide recession.

He asks, and I am sorry my time is limited, what we are doing. We know how bad the situation is in some areas. Therefore we have in place safety nets such as the Unemployment Insurance Act to maintain income and keep the economy of the community reasonably stable. God knows we are grateful for it, particularly in the area from which I come. We have, under Section 38, created quite a number of jobs. I suggest to the hon. member that he look at what has happened under Section 38.

I also suggest to the hon. member that he take his duties more seriously, as have some members of the New Democratic Party. They have taken the time to come to us to see just how Section 38 can be applied to those areas of the country from which they come. They are now making an intensive effort to see that it works so that miners who are skilled will retain their skills, their dignity and have a decent income to bring home to their families. I suggest to him that he have another look. He derides and laughs at Section 38. I suggest to him that those very mining companies and the presidents to whom he referred as not having much faith in which is happening are the very ones who have been sitting down at the table with me to make it happen. Therefore, I say to him that this government is very concerned and acting very decisively to make things happen in these mining communities.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—FUNDS LENT TO NEW YORK METROPOLITAN TRANSPORTATION AUTHORITY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, the question I would like to have debated this evening arises from the deal signed between the government, through its agency, the Export Development Corporation, and the New York Transit Authority, wherein it is contemplated that over the next 15 years the Government of Canada, through that agency, EDC, will be financing the purchase of certain transit equipment for the city of New York. This will require total borrowing on the part of the Government of Canada of $563 million over 15 years, with a rate of interest of only 9.7 per cent as far as New York is concerned.

If I may, I would like to clarify that because most people can hardly believe we have a government that is so careless and so reckless with its financing for foreign entities that it would literally borrow money at a true cost of 16 per cent today and lend it to an agency such as the New York Transit Authority at 9.7 per cent.

When this deal was announced, the officials with the New York Transit Authority could not believe their good fortune. They could not believe there was a Santa Claus north of the border, in the form of the Government of Canada, which was willing to make a gift to them—it was not even Christmas at the time—of $300 million to be spread over the next 15 years. That is the hard-earned money of Canadians which is being routed by this government into the development of a transit system for the benefit of those who happen to live in New York.

The hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) is in the House this evening. I wish he would familiarize his constituents with the fact that while some of them are losing their homes as a result of 18 per cent, 19 per cent and 20 per cent financing, his government, which triggered the high interest structure in the country to begin with, has now found money to lend to the New York Transit Authority at 9.7 per cent.

The government alleges it will create 20,000 to 25,000 jobs, but let us bear in mind that those 20,000 to 25,000 jobs will be spread over five years, so that in total there will only be 5,000 jobs created per year. However, we then take a new look and find that 40 per cent of the jobs will be created in the United States, so the net number of Canadians who will be employed in an area where unemployment is very high, Quebec, is only 3,000 per year. Translated into job costs per year, that means it will cost the Canadian public $20,000 in interest costs alone to keep those 3,000 employees employed over the next five years.

That is only part of the problem. In making this move, I would say that the government has acted in open defiance of the agreement, to which it is a party, with the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development group of nations in which it was agreed that in future export credits would be limited so that rates would never go below 11.25 per cent. A recent agreement raised that to 12.5 per cent. In any event, it was agreed that in no event would there be loans to support exports of longer than eight and a half years. The government not only is favouring a foreign entity at the expense of Canadians but also violating the very OECD agreement to which it is a party.

If there is this money available to build transit equipment and services for foreign entities, why is it not available in Canada? Why does the Toronto transit authority not have access to 9.7 per cent money if it should decide—which it would love to do—to extend the subway system in Toronto? What about Montreal? Why are the people of Montreal second-class citizens in relation to those in New York? What about Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary or any other major urban area? And what about Ottawa? What is wrong with the citizens of these communities that this government, which loves to talk pompously about its resistance to Americanism, should turn around and favour a city like New York at the expense of comparable cities in Canada?

Is it Canadian technology we are talking about in relation to this wonderful coup—this wonderful contract—the government claims it has got itself into? No, it is Japanese technology. The research and development and the design of this equipment was all done on a licence from Japanese concerns. Not even there do we get any distinct benefit from this billion dollar financing—when interest is included—that the government has committed us to.

We could ask the government's spokesperson, whoever that is—I notice there is only one member left in the House to defend the government—if he was ever consulted about this contract before it was entered into. Was it ever made known to the various poor, unfortunate wretches who happen to be Liberal MPs from the Toronto area, that this is the type of shenanigan the government they so loyally support, intended to get into at the expense of millions of Canadian taxpayers?

At a time when we are facing an estimated deficit of some $25 billion due to mismanagement by the government—a deficit that is, in relative terms, greater than that of any other industrialized nation in the world—the government is not out finding money at 9.7 per cent in order to help the residents of Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa or wherever you like, but is finding 9.7 per cent money to help the residents of New York. Surely some explanation is due, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have the jobs, we have the money, we have the technology, we made the deal and the hon. member complains. He is supposed to be a financial wizard. It is a shame to see him take the polish off his reputation with the dumb argument he has put forward tonight.

Peel County is part of his riding, as it is part of mine. Perhaps we should have this discussion in our riding and not waste the time of this House. I wonder if we should hold a discussion in the head office of Northern Telecom, a company in our mutual municipality which benefits greatly from the kind of export support and export financing the government has given to Bombardier, in this particular instance. If the hon. member had done his homework and checked what was going on with companies in Peel, he would have known that Northern Telecom received export financing of exactly the same sort for jobs, for technology, for income, and for future investment. This kind of support for Northern Telecom was announced within the last couple of weeks.

Perhaps we could have this debate at McDonnell Douglas, a company that has lost deals as a result of predatory financing. Perhaps in our mutual municipality we could hold a debate in the head office of Wardair at Toronto airport, a company that has taken advantage of similar export financing, this time at the hands of the Government of France. In fact, if we were to get our act together, as the hon. member claims we should, then Wardair would have bought aircraft from McDonnell Douglas instead of going to Europe. Why did it go to Europe instead of just up the street to McDonnell Douglas? It was because the kind of financing involved saved Wardair $35 million per year. It bought its new aircraft from a French company, and jobs were lost to Canadian companies because of the kind of reasoning we have just heard from the financial wizard of York-Peel.

Mr. Stevens: Why did you not give these jobs to Toronto?

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member asks why we did not put the jobs in Toronto? I suggest to him that we could walk into Northern Telecom in Peel County and speak to the president of the company and describe the program. This kind of financing offers us jobs, access to technology, financial security for the company and Canadians generally, an opportunity to expand our traditional export markets. This kind of dumb comment from a member, who knows better, who takes a good deal and tries to spoil it with this sort of innuendo and that kind of comment, does not build up our industry or our job situation at all the way he claims.

THE CONSTITUTION—STATUS OF NATIVE WOMEN—ATTENDANCE AT CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE. (B) REQUEST THAT NATIVE WOMEN BE REPRESENTED

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on July 16 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if he would invite representatives of the Native Women's Association of Canada to attend the coming constitutional conference. Because of the long-standing discrimination under the Indian Act against Indian women it is important that they should have direct representation at the conference when it deals with constitutional matters directly affecting aboriginal peoples. In response the Prime Minister said he was inviting representatives of the three national organizations representing the Indian, Inuit and Métis people. He tried to make the case that somehow I was uncomplimentary to these organizations when I said they all had their own legitimate concerns, in pursuit of which the unique problems of Indian women could very easily be overlooked.

The Indian people as a whole, Mr. Speaker, and in particular their leaders, are very nervous about the outcome of the constitutional conference. They are anxious about their rights and what might happen when the federal and provincial governments sit down to horse trade. I believe they have good reason to be concerned, although I still hope the outcome of the talks might be a very positive definition of aboriginal and treaty rights. The struggle to gain that definition will take all the time and energy of these organizations, and it is not insult to say that in doing so the three national organizations I mentioned will not give top priority to solving the problems of Indian women. The fact is that male Indian leaders are no better and no worse at representing women than other male leaders. However, the record of other male leaders in our society has not been good.

This past spring all women in Canada were shocked when they saw how some male parliamentarians joked about the question of violence against women. Many of them remember the shameful way in which the first ministers of the provinces, meeting with the Prime Minister last fall, jetisoned their rights in the constitutional accord. The first ministers threw women's guarantees of equality overboard at the same time as they ditched aboriginal rights. The rights of women and the rights of aboriginal people were discarded as being inconsequential. When we look at the record of some of the male Indian leaders we see that some are very supportive of Indian women and others are not.

But I ask what reason do Indian women have for confidence in the next first ministers' conference unless they have direct representation? As of this spring the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) indicated he had not even begun to sit down with the leaders of the Indian people to discuss how discrimination could be ended. It is true that within three years the new Charter of Rights and Freedoms will not allow the discrimination involved in Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act; that is, unless Section 33 of the Constitution Act is invoked and the government passed a bill saying that Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act applied notwithstanding the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But even when Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act is declared unconstitutional, there is still the question of retroactivity. How are we going to do justice to the hundreds of Indian women and to their children who have already lost their status? There is a great need for all parties to this question—the federal government, the provinces, the Indian organizations and organizations representing Indian women—to sit down at a conference table and thresh out this problem to avoid a hasty or inadequate solution.

A cabinet document dated September 28, 1981, estimated the cost of reinstatement of women who have already lost their status to be in the neighborhood of half a billion dollars, in order that the re-entry of these women into Indian bands would not further impoverish those bands. In addition, there would have to be a program of land entitlement so that population pressures on the land base would not become worse than they already are.

Obviously the government sees some very important federal-provincial implications in this issue. If the matter is going to be discussed at a federal-provincial forum, Indian women should be directly involved. The Native Women's Association of Canada has a mandate to represent Indian, Métis and Inuit women from across Canada. Considering the history of discrimination Indian women have faced, they need to be represented directly at the first ministers' conference. Again I appeal to the government to invite representatives of the Native Women's Association of Canada to sit at that table, and I ask the parliamentary secretary if the government is willing to do so.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to be able to take part in this debate with the hon. member and to provide him with some extra information. I know his concern about this issue is genuine, and I congratulate him for the effort and conscience he has used to bring this issue forward.

Since funding to national and territorial organizations of aboriginal people began in 1980, the federal government has urged these organizations to develop more explicit positions with respect to constitutional issues of particular interest to aboriginal women.

On June 16 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated in this House that he would see whether aboriginal groups would have any suggestions regarding the representation of aboriginal women at the upcoming conference of first ministers on the Constitution. On June 22 the Prime Minister met with representatives of the three national aboriginal organizations. He was informed by one of the co-chair persons of the Inuit Committee on National Issues that their organization would be prepared to allow a spokesperson for aboriginal women to occupy, for part of the conference, one of the seats allocated to represent natives of the Inuit Committee on National Issues. This is a progressive step and hopefully one which will be followed by the Native Council of Canada, representing Métis and non-status Indians, and by the Assembly of First Nations representing status Indians.

The three national organizations are representative of their respective aboriginal peoples, and they should select from among themselves their own representatives at the constitutional conference. It would be inappropriate for the government to select these representatives and even more inappropriate to question whether the aboriginal organizations represent both sexes of their peoples. It is manifestly impossible for the Prime Minister to invite to the constitutional conference every aboriginal organizations with an interest in the Constitution, even though the government might sympathize with their concerns.

As I noted earlier, the Inuit Committee on National Issues has committed itself to allow some time for discussion on women's issues. Let us hope that aboriginal women in Canada can build on this success and obtain from every other aboriginal organization, whether national, provincial or territorial, their agreement to represent more specifically their own interests and concerns.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock in the afternoon.

At 10.35 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

TRAGEDY AT ARCHAMBAULT INSTITUTE—CONDOLENCES TO VICTIMS' FAMILIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas there is great consternation among Canadians regarding the extremely unfortunate incidents that occurred at the Archambault Institute; and whereas all members of this House deplore the horrible attack in which three of the Institute's prison guards were killed, I move, seconded by the member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House convey its deepest sympathy to the families of the officers who died on duty, following the incidents that occurred at the Archambault Institute.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRAGEDY AT ARCHAMBAULT INSTITUTE—CONDOLENCES TO VICTIMS' FAMILIES AND WISHES FOR GOOD HEALTH TO WOUNDED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

I wish to inform my colleagues in the House of a tragic incident that occurred at the Archambault Institute in Sainte-Anne-des-Plaines, which took the lives of three family men who were prison guards at the Institute, namely, Mr. Léandre Leblanc, 60, thirty-five years of service; Mr. Daniel Van Den Abeele, 36, twelve years of service; and Mr. Denis Rivard, 27, six years of service. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) and the member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House deplore the tragic incident that occurred at the Archambault Institute at Sainte-Anne-des-Plaines, that it offer its deepest sympathy to the members of the affected families, that it express its gratitude for the loyal services rendered by the three guards who died on duty, and wish a quick recovery to the three officers who were injured.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WILDLIFE

SUGGESTED MORATORIUM ON REPTILE HUNTING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, Canada has four common reptiles two of which, the bullfrog and the snapping turtle, are becoming endangered due to overhunting. There are no laws to prevent this, and catches ranging up to 6,000 pounds are being taken, with much going to the United States. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the federal Department of Environment take steps to limit catches of Canadian reptiles and study the possibility of putting a moratorium on hunting them for the next five years.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRIAL AND LABOUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

DESIGNATION OF CENTRES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As a result of the general economic downturn due to both product and market decline, and the resultant high unemployment levels in both Salmon Arm and Kamloops, B.C., I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly):

That this House urge the Ministers of Employment and Immigration, Labour, Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion to give consideration to designating the above-named centres for eligibility under the industrial and labour adjustment program.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

CALL FOR RECONSIDERATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, the recent horrible sex slayings in Toronto and now the butchering of prison guards by convicted murderers are brutal, vicious attacks on Canadian society. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House condemns these terrible deeds and that the matter of capital punishment again be considered and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LABATT BREWING COMPANY SPONSORSHIP OF COACHNG PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, the director of Sports Canada states that coaching must be "a professional discipline if athletes are to succeed". Present and future athletes of Canada will be the beneficiaries of a $1 million incentive fund established by Labatt Brewing Company Limited in conjunction with the Canadian Olympic Association in the pursuit of coaching excellence. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the fine and generous example of Labatt Brewing Company be used to encourage others in the private sector to invest in the outstanding talent pool of amateur athletes within Canada so that they might share in the greater success of those athletes in high level national and international competition.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN NEW BRUNSWICK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, Heath-Steele has announced the closure of its mining operation in the Newcastle region of New Brunswick, which will throw about 560 people out of work. In the same region 900 mill workers will be temporarily laid off. The federal government has announced that CFB Chatham will be shut down, forcing another 3,800 out of work.

This government can provide Quebec with $500 million to create jobs for an Airbus deal with France, and can provide hundreds of thousands in subsidies to Quebec for a subway deal with New York. The employees of Chatham are forced out in favour of Bagotville in Quebec. The minister responsible for New Brunswick scrambles into a hole and hides. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the government face up to its responsibilities to all provinces in this nation and cease these obvious acts of discrimination, particularly in favour of another, against New Brunswick.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

DEPLOYMENT OF TRIDENT II MISSILES BY UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Next month the USS Ohio, the world's largest nuclear submarine, will sail down the Juan de Fuca Strait, to be armed with its 24 multiple warhead missiles at Bangor, Washington. Ironically, it is the same month when people around the world will be remembering the horror of the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

In light of the accuracy and the incredible destructive power of the USS Ohio's Trident II missiles, and recognizing the concern and growing opposition of the people of southwestern

British Columbia to the threat the USS Ohio brings to that region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House opposes the deployment of this new generation of nuclear weapons and instructs the Secretary of State for External Affairs to communicate our opposition to the Government of the United States.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL PARKS

RENTS CHARGED TO EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, the policy of the government appears to be "Don't do as I do, do as I say". The government is capping the wages of its own employees and asking industry to keep prices down. In Banff National Park employees' wages are being capped at 6 per cent. At the same time, accommodation rentals are being increased for employees from 15 per cent to 40 per cent, and perhaps even higher. Continual increases in prices induce inflation and make it necessary for employees to bargain for higher wages in order to make ends meet. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Kushner):

That this House urges the government to practise what it preaches and apply the 6 per cent and 5 per cent rule to the increase of all prices under its control, including land and accommodation rentals in Banff, Jasper, and other national parks.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MISS UNIVERSE

CONGRATULATIONS TO CANADIAN TITLIST WINNER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Burghardt (London West): Madam Speaker, I rise to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Canada and, in particular, the city of London, Canada, were honoured last night when Karen Diane Baldwin of London was chosen as Miss Universe, the first Canadian to be so recognized, I move, seconded by the hon. member for London-Middlesex (Mr. Bloomfield):

That this House conveys to Miss Baldwin our congratulations and best wishes for a successful year in her capacity as the new Miss Universe.

Madam Speaker: The House may wish to applaud this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATE LEVELS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada, through directions to the Bank of Canada, is deliberately forcing interest rates in Canada to be at least 4 per cent higher than interest rates in the American market. For example, bankers' acceptance rates yesterday were exactly 5 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States; Euro-dollar rates were 5 per cent lower than the prime rate in Canada; London interbank rates were over 4 per cent lower than the prime rate in Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

• (1415)

That this House condemns the government for deliberately orchestrating interest rate policies in Canada to the detriment of all Canadians by allowing interest rates in Canada to be 4 or 5 per cent higher than elsewhere, and that this House demands that the government direct the Bank of Canada immediately to cease interfering in money markets in Canada so as to allow interest rates in Canada to fall to those levels enjoyed by Americans.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON FEDERAL EXPENDITURES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister will know that—if I could get the Prime Minister's attention—my question is to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Parent: Me or him?

Mr. Clark: Are you the Prime Minister today?

My question to the Prime Minister is based on the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Employment and Immigration who said that Manitoba's willingness to follow the 6 and 5 per cent federal guidelines would affect decisions on federal spending programs in that province. Does that policy apply to all Canadian provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will have to see exactly what the minister said, but certainly the spirit of what has been quoted is one that would apply to all Canadian provinces.

As the Leader of the Opposition, for today and a little while longer, will remember—

Mr. Epp: That's right; then he will be Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: —quite a while longer, I guess—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: No way!

Mr. Trudeau: —will remember, last February I met with the provinces and we attempted to find ways in which we could bring inflation down. I think that the budget which has been endorsed by this House repeatedly is the best way to do it at this stage. We hope the provinces will see that actions along these lines are in the interest of the whole economy.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I thought the Prime Minister was going to summon his courage and call an election, or perhaps just the three byelections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MEDICARE PAYMENTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, on the basis of the federal government's policy of cutting back federal spending in provinces that do not follow the six and five guidelines, let me direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

She will know that the Manitoba government is now negotiating a fee agreement with its physicians which will be in excess of the 6 and 5 per cent guidelines. Does the statement made by the minister yesterday mean that the federal government will refuse or withhold its medicare payments to Manitoba if the fee agreement exceeds 6 and 5 per cent?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, from what I have read in press reports about my colleague's speech, he was discussing a possibility that should be looked into. Provincial negotiations with doctors on health insurance are strictly a provincial matter.

[English]

DEPARTMENTAL POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, let me ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether it is the policy of her department to reduce or withhold medicare payments—transfer payments to provinces that engage in settlements in excess of 6 and 5 per cent. Is that the present policy of her department?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, again, instead of offering constructive suggestions to strengthen medicare, the Leader of the Opposition throws red herrings into the debate. I have repeated often, and will tell him once more and send him copies of the details province by province, the exact increase, including health payments, for each of the coming five years, which average 13.4 per cent per year.

• (1420)

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what we have here is a government policy which is followed by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, not known about by the Prime Minister, and not followed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Everything is as usual.

PAYMENT OF DREE SUBSIDIES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary for the Minister responsible for DREE, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister is aware that since the June 28 budget, the federal government has announced that DREE grants would be awarded to the following manufacturers in the province of Quebec: O. J. Ouellette Inc., Montreal; Alpha-Vico Canada, Farnham; Béton Canfarge, Inc., Sainte-Foy; the Pierre Dionne Company; Siemens Electric Ltd., Pointe Claire; Magotteaux Canada, Cowansville. Will the DREE grants be cancelled if these businesses fail to follow the 6 and 5 per cent guidelines?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we are now preparing guidelines for applying the 6 and 5 per cent policy to grants awarded under government programs, and I do not think the guidelines will apply retroactively. By the way, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for pointing out the good work being done by my department in the province of Quebec.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO FORCE PROVINCES TO COMPLY WITH ITS OBJECTIVES

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister, in order to clarify a point. Not long ago, the Prime Minister of Canada met with his provincial counterparts and invited them to collaborate with the government in trying to resolve a difficult situation of the government's own making.

Today, his colleagues, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Finance, are implying that the provinces will retain their right to receive fiscal transfer payments and grants, provided they abide by the guidelines set up by this government. Since the agreement entered into by the Prime Minister with the provincial first ministers was concerned only with co-operation, could the Prime Minister at least have the decency to tell the House today whether his government really intends to oblige or force the provinces to respect the federal government's guidelines by threatening to cut off grants if they refuse to do so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to subsidies, under agreements entered into between November and February, for programs mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition in his question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the answer is no. Those agreements are final, and as the Minister of National Health and Welfare said earlier, the figures are known. Federal transfer payments to the provinces are going to be increased by 11 and 13 per cent, and we have no intention of reopening those negotiations, nor was this mentioned by the Minister of Employment and Immigration in his speech.

INQUIRY WHETHER PROVINCES WERE INFORMED OF GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Since my question was in the past tense, the Prime Minister answered me in the past tense. If certain provinces were to enter into agreements with the federal government and were entitled to subsidies, would the terms or the objective set by the federal government today with respect to the 6 and 5 per cent ceiling be considered absolute criteria for determining the amount of the subsidy? If so, why did the Prime Minister of Canada not advise his provincial counterparts of this intention which the federal government is indicating today, instead of keeping it a secret from the provincial first ministers when he met them only a few weeks ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member misunderstood my answer.

Mr. La Salle: I understood your answer as far as the future was concerned.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member ought to know that the future has been taken care of in an act of Parliament. These transfer payments made under our financing programs have been in effect since the act was passed and will apply over a period of five years. I fail to see why the hon. member and the Leader of the Opposition are trying to confuse the issue. The government has never indicated that it intended to change that legislation. Here, we have an act of Parliament. What the Minister of Employment and Immigration was referring to, and what I myself referred to in the House, or at least at a press conference on Friday, were federal government spending programs aimed at growth sectors that require assistance in the form of taxpayers' money, and it is our view that, as far as possible, this assistance which is paid by the taxpayers should be subject to the 6 and 5 per cent ceiling. There is no question of repealing acts of Parliament as far as transfer payments to the provincial governments are concerned.

• (1425)

INQUIRY WHETHER SIX PER CENT AND FIVE PER CENT RATES WILL BE OBSERVED

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I think the Prime Minister is quite aware of the fact that his fellow ministers are now talking about putting pressure on the provinces and the private sector, using subsidies and present federal programs as a lever. In other words, if they do not agree with the government's objectives, subsidies granted under government programs might be withheld or reduced. Therefore, I would ask the Prime Minister to tell the House clearly whether he has recommended that his ministers impose the 6 and 5 per cent ceiling as a pre-condition, without considering the fact that these industries are often faced with surplus inventory.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's other questions referred to subsidies for the provinces, and I answered those questions. The hon. member's last question started out with the provinces and ended with industry. I am not sure . . . if he is talking about industry, that is one thing, but if he is talking about the provinces, it is something entirely different. As far as the provinces are concerned, I gave him my answer, the minister gave hers, and the agreements are there in an act of Parliament. As far as the private sector is concerned, the answer is yes. If we are going to spend public funds, we are going to urge the private sector to, go along, as much as possible with—

Mr. La Salle: Urge or oblige?

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member would let me finish, then he will get his answer: to abide by the 6 and 5 per cent guidelines.

FINANCE

CHAIRMAN OF CONTROL PROGRAM PRIVATE SECTOR ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the mid-1970s the chief executive officer for Imperial Oil was appointed by the government to chair a committee to advise the government on competition policy. Subsequently the Bertrand report showed that Imperial Oil and its partners were involved in some extremely nefarious competition policies. In fact, they ripped off the Canadian people to the tune of $12 billion. Presently the government has appointed an economic committee of blue ribbon wizards to advise it on how to lead the country out of its economic wilderness. The chief wizard on the committee is Ian Sinclair.

Mr. Sinclair runs a company that operates directly in conflict to the best economic interests of this country. In this regard I am speaking of CP Ships, which had 40 foreign registered ships, with foreign crews. All the money it earns from that source is being channelled to Bermuda and London, England. Would the minister, under the circumstances, explain how he can accept advice from a group of people whose business practices have so consistently undermined the integrity and strength of the Canadian economy, and would the minister be prepared to replace Mr. Sinclair in favour of someone with a little more concern for the Canadian economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not accept the member's allegations brought forward in his question. The purpose of the private sector six and five committee is not primarily to advise the government. The purpose of the committee is to encourage the private sector to follow the six and five guidelines in its operations, both with respect to wages and with respect to profit margins.

Ian Sinclair has undertaken the chairmanship of that important committee, and I believe that instead of undermining his role we ought to give him every possible encouragement in the important task that he has undertaken. In so far as I am concerned, I am quite thankful that a man of Ian Sinclair's leadership capacity has responded to the call of the government and has undertaken this important work.

• (1430)

Mr. Skelly: I thank the Minister of Finance for that kind offer. I think we would be prepared to stop undermining him if he would stop undermining us.

SHIPBUILDING

PLACEMENT OF ORDERS IN JAPAN BY DOME PETROLEUM

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister some time in 1981, made a commitment to consider and respond to the idea of a marine industrial long-term development plan for the country. Dome Petroleum is ordering offshore, as indicated, five LNG carriers which would provide 12.5 million hours of work. In the province of Quebec 1,500 shipbuilding employees will be laid off in February. In British Columbia there is a tremendous number of unemployed individuals. There is a desperate need for some consistent, coherent activity on the part of the entire government to capture these benefits. Would the Prime Minister be prepared to make an announcement in the House about the activities the government would be willing to take to ensure that Dome does not send these 12.5 million hours of work away to Japan when they are so desperately needed in Quebec and in British Columbia?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated that the normal process is to have a hearing before the National Energy Board. This has not taken place as yet; the government is then called upon to assess the situation and make a decision. We will respect the process provided by the law, and we will respect the law of the land as passed by Parliament.

Mr. Skelly: I guess the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has been reading the Prime Minister's mail, so maybe we could ask him to look at his commitment again.

QUERY RESPECTING MARINE INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I guess my final question is much broader than the terms of reference of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Basically the following companies have chartered foreign vessels to carry Canadian goods. The Norwegians have provided us with a vessel to carry oil into the Arctic for Dome. Also the Norwegians have provided B.C. forest—

Madam Speaker: Order. Really, the hon. member is exaggerating. I would ask him to go directly to his third question and not to repeat the preamble.

Mr. Skelly: On the basis of the broad involvement across many sectors of the resource industry, would the Prime Minister be prepared to provide us with some information as to whether any of these jobs will be available to Canadians through a government statement on a marine industrial strategy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, despite the opposition of the New Democratic Party, last year we passed a bill called the Canada Oil and Gas Act which had very clear provisions requiring the procurement of Canadian goods and services every time this can be done competitively. In our negotiations with oil and gas companies operating in the Canada lands, we have made it a very clear requirement that every opportunity be given to the use of Canadian goods and services. We intend to follow up on this, and various agreements have already been achieved. We have seen a significant increase in the content of Canadian goods and services. This is something the government has done and Parliament has passed, despite the opposition of the New Democratic Party. I think members of the New Democratic Party should reflect a little upon their hypocrisy on this very issue.

PUBLIC WORKS

EFFECT OF RESTRAINT PROGRAM ON GRANTS TO MISSISSAUGA, ONT.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. The minister will know that the city of Mississauga receives considerable grants from the federal government in lieu of taxes for Toronto International Airport. Will those grants be reduced if the city of Mississauga does not confine its employees to the 6 and 5 rule, or what is the standard with respect to those grants?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the legislation dealing with grants in lieu of taxes was recently before Parliament, approximately a year ago. Of course there was no reference in that legislation of strings attached to grants. However, the provision of payment of grants in lieu of taxes is at the discretion of the Crown. Certainly there has been no indication to municipalities that that would be the case. On the other hand, the Minister of Finance indicated yesterday that the issue of leverage was one which the government was considering in a general way and on which the government would report to Parliament at a later date.

REQUEST FOR DESIGNATION OF NIAGARA, ONT.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister knows that the Regional Municipality of Niagara has applied for designation as a designated community geographically under ILAP. The minister indicated in response to my question the other day that he was aware of the concerns of that community and that favourable consideration would likely be given. Will that favourable consideration be conditional upon the implementation of the six and five formula within the region, particularly as it affects local employees?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the decisions on designating a community under ILAP are made by cabinet. As I said to the hon. member's leader earlier in the question period, we are discussing now the exact nature of guidelines with respect to the 6 and 5 per cent program. As soon as final decisions are taken in that regard, we will be announcing them.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

GRANT FOR PEAT PROCESSING PLANT IN SHIPPEGAN, N.B.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as well. As the minister knows, recently Jiffy Products was awarded a DREE grant for the expansion of a peat processing plant in Shippegan, New Brunswick. The incentive grant is for an amount of $1,218,925, a sum which is very badly needed in this depressed and economically floundering section of the province. Will this grant, a grant that is badly needed to boost the economy of the region and to provide employment for 41 people, be withdrawn if the company does not comply with the 6 and 5 per cent guidelines to which the government is holding Canadians ransom? I ask the minister to address himself to the question because the people of northern New Brunswick are suffering drastically from unemployment due to the ineptitude of the government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the hon. member's question about the reasons for economic difficulties in New Brunswick, but I should like to repeat what I said to his leader. I do not envisage any guidelines for the application of federal government programs of support to business being retroactive. Also I would like to thank him, as I thanked his leader, for confirming the constructive activities in support of the economy in the province of New Brunswick by my department.

WELFARE

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN FUNDING IN MANITOBA

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the minister knows, the cost of child care welfare services is shared between federal and provincial governments. If the province of Manitoba decides to increase allowances to foster parents by more than 6 and 5 per cent, will it be in danger of losing its funding under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Madam Speaker.

THE HANDICAPPED AND THE DISABLED

FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO MANITOBA UNDER REHABILITATION PROGRAM

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Department of National Health and Welfare is in a shared cost program with provinces such as Manitoba for the rehabilitation of disabled persons. The Government of Manitoba has said that it will not go along with the six and five. Will the federal government's contributory share to that program be reduced or eliminated? Will disabled people in Manitoba suffer because their government will not go along with the 6 and 5?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, these questions give me an opportunity to practise the English language. This is another red herring thrown at disabled people, this time by a member from Alberta who knows full well that under CAP we will reimburse 50 cents on the dollar of all costs of social services and of welfare. These payments will not be reduced because these are not the programs which feed inflation.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ASSIST IN PROMOTING POTASH SALES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for International Trade. It concerns the decline in the export of potash from Canada. I am sure the minister knows that production was down 56 per cent at the end of June this year over last year, that export sales were down 35 per cent, and that more than 1,000 workers have been laid off in the potash mines in Saskatchewan since the election of the Progressive Conservative government in that province in April.

• (1440)

The minister is aware that the previous provincial government has been trying to establish long-term markets for our potash through an export arm of the Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan. This goal has now been abandoned by the present government in Saskatchewan. Can the minister assure the House that he will intervene to ensure that there will be an aggressive sales policy that will find long-term markets for our potash in other parts of the world?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, obviously I do not want to get into a provincial political debate as alleged by the hon. member, but we are concerned with respect to the export of potash throughout the world. As late as last week, when the President of Brazil and several members of his cabinet came to Ottawa, the Prime Minister and several of our cabinet ministers raised the issue of potash sales to Brazil. At one time we had 40 per cent of the market in Brazil. We are now down to 10 per cent.

As well, the hon. member knows that the chairman of the Export Development Board is the president of Canpotex which is the export arm of the potash industry. He was invited to attend meetings with the Brazilian businessmen as well as with several Brazilian cabinet ministers.

RAILWAYS

POTASH FREIGHT RATES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Transport. I am sure that the minister is also aware of the tremendous decline in potash production in the last few months in Saskatchewan where over a thousand people have been laid off. In order to attempt to stimulate the industry, can the minister assure us that any freight rate increase for potash in the next couple of years will be within the guidelines of 6 per cent and 5 per cent? I ask this because we need that stimulus for the industry.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, that obviously will be the objective of the government, to maintain these rates at the increase indicated in the budget of June 28.

EFFECT OF CONTROL GUIDELINES ON TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. His department purchases training from a number of community colleges across the country, such as Thebatcha College in my constituency. Does the government's new policy enunciated by the minister, and confirmed this afternoon by the Prime Minister, mean that the government will reduce or withdraw funding with respect to those institutions which raise either tuition fees or instructors' salaries by more than the 6 and 5 per cent guidelines?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member finally got around to asking a question as to what was actually said so that we can totally dispel the kind of stories put forward by the Leader of the Opposition and some of his colleagues.

We are simply trying to point out that it is very important at this time for all Canadians, provinces, municipalities and the private sector, to join in the objective and attempts to try to restrain the costs and prices of all goods and services within the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guidelines. As a federal government it is very important that in any discussions we have with any of those different sectors we remind them of how important it is to return the economy to health by establishing those objectives. We will be using the opportunities presented to us to hold those discussions and to have that kind of persuasive reminder which it seems only the members of the opposition have forgotten.

PETRO-CANADA

APPLICATION OF CONTROL PROGRAM TO RATES AND CHARGES

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would like to know what leverage the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is going to exert on Petro-Canada? I understand that under the bill employees of Petro-Canada will be covered by the six and five formula. Are rates and charges of Petro-Canada for its products going to be under the six and five formula?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, Petro-Canada will be in the same situation as any other oil and gas company.

Mr. Clark: What is that?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

APPLICATION OF CONTROL PROGRAM TO CHIEFS AND BANDS

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. All Indian bands receive transfer payments from the government through his department. If chiefs and councils feel that their salaries, or salaries of their employees cannot be met by the six and five formula, will the minister use his leverage by reducing grants or the transfers to these bands, to determine that they will in fact follow the program?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I think there is precious little fear that the Indian chiefs and bands cannot abide by these guidelines.

APPLICATION OF CONTROL PROGRAM TO MARKETING AGENCIES

Hon. John C. Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. I am seeking information and clarification with respect to the application of the 5 per cent and 6 per cent world, particularly as it applies to the three national boards under the supervision of the National Farm Products Marketing Council and the dairy farmers of Canada under the Canadian Dairy Commission. Has the minister sought the approval of the provinces with reference to the application and, if not, why not?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that the price setting ability in the Dairy Commission is under federal jurisdiction and is under discussion at the present time. Their request for assistance for the next year, according to their programming, does not amount to 6 per cent. The formula is being worked on at the present time and we hope it will be announced on August 7. In the production of eggs, eggs were minus four last year. Therefore we are not that concerned about the price setting ability for eggs. For poultry products such as broilers and turkeys, they are under provincial jurisdiction as far as price setting authority is concerned. We have no authority for price fixing there. Each province runs that on its own.

I understand there has been some discussion between the national organizations on how they will work it out. An agreement should be forthcoming very soon, but again I am sure the hon. member knows that even those provincial boards, in the province he and I both come from, signed contracts earlier this year, the vast majority of them at around a 5 per cent increase. If everybody else follows that leadership we have nothing to worry about.

PENITENTIARIES

ARCHAMBAULT INSTITUTION—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF RIOT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Six weeks ago, on June 9, as reported in Hansard, at page 18278, the Solicitor General said:

—I can assure the House that the Correctional Service of Canada is taking all the steps that are appropriate to assure good order in our institutions.

Thirty six hours ago we had a major tragedy at Archambault. In light of the minister's statement in the House six weeks ago, why, in a maximum security institution, were there 200 hardened criminals in the work area, or the recreation area, at one time? Why did they have knives and poison and, according to press reports, molotov cocktails? In view of his statement in the House, what extra precautions did the correctional service in fact take in order to ensure a quiet summer?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, these very tragic developments have been constantly watched by me since they occurred the day before yesterday. I have had a series of reports on matters.

As the hon. member knows, there is an inquiry under way now. I expect to have the results of the inquiry by the inspector general within two weeks. As well, there is an investigation by la Sûreté du Québec, and I understand there will also be an investigation by the local coroner.

In view of that fact I do not think it would be proper or appropriate for me to start giving explanations of why the event took place. I understand, as has been indicated by the spokesman at the institution, that it seemed to have begun with an escape attempt that was botched up. We have no evidence at all to suggest there were festering grievances behind it or anything beyond that. I would like the opportunity to have this investigation completed, to get its results, and then be able to answer questions in the House of the sort the hon. member just asked.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. All previous reports done on the correctional service have had total secrecy. I would like to ask the assurance of the Prime Minister that this will be an open investigation and, more pertinently to the Prime Minister, rather than to the Solicitor General, since the present Solicitor General has had this office in the two years there has been a multimillion dollar riot in Matsqui, prison staff saying that they cannot have confidence in the warden; there has been a major breakout in Edmonton, as well as the entire Olson debacle. Now we have had a major tragedy at Archambault. Why is this man still the Solicitor General?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, in so far as the matter raised—

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Kaplan: —is concerned, I indicated when I appeared before the justice committee that there had been some substantial improvements in the level of order in the institutions. I tabled statistics, which I am prepared to share again with the hon. member, that show that in the last two years there has been a substantial decline in major incidents in the institutions.

Although tragic events occur and human behaviour is not completely predictable, and we are dealing with the most violent, dangerous people in the country, who are incarcerated in these institutions, I think we can show that the Correctional Service of Canada has functioned very well under the circumstances.

• (1450)

I can also remind the hon. member that, throughout the incidents he has described, there has been a high level of concern and security for the surrounding community. For example, in the tragedy which occurred the day before yesterday, at no time was there any danger to the community surrounding the institution. Considering the stress, and the tragedy that was occurring within the walls, a considerable amount of credit can be given to the officers in the Correctional Service of Canada who valiantly performed during the incident.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROVISION OF FUNDS FOR CONNE RIVER INDIANS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This past spring the minister made commitments both to the Conne River Indian people and also to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. He said that if negotiations with the Government of Newfoundland broke down, he would not have much choice but to get money to the Conne River Indian people directly. Negotiations have broken down, the Conne River people are completely without funding, and the minister appears to have welched on his commitment. Could he tell the House what he will do to back up his commitment and to see that the Conne River people get the funds intended for them?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Well, yes, Madam Speaker, but I am sure it is not the hon. member's intention to leave a false impression. The fact, as I hope the hon. member knows, is that the Indians at Conne River are receiving social assistance payments where this is required, the children are receiving an education and so on from the province, which is affording them the same social service benefits and infrastructure as people in the rest of the province. But with respect to our obligations under the agreement, the province has refused to flow the money or do whatever is necessary to trigger our obligations to the Indians of Conne River. To assist with respect to that aspect, I am quite prepared and do intend to meet with the appropriate minister of the Newfoundland government very soon.

Mr. Manly: More than simply meeting with the appropriate minister is required, Madam Speaker.

REGISTRATION UNDER INDIAN ACT

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Justice officials have said that funds cannot be given directly because the Conne River people have never been officially registered as Indians. When will the minister act to give these people their due and register them under the Indian Act? Although the government is not afraid of Newfoundland when it comes to jurisdiction over offshore oil, why does it back down on a question of fundamental human rights for the Indian people?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I have been prepared, as I explained in committee, to be sensitive to the concerns of the provincial government, not because of any fear of the provincial government—quite the contrary—but more on the basis that its assistance is required because it, too, has historically supplied funds in the millions of dollars for the social and economic welfare of the Indian people of Newfoundland. Before I take actions which are against the wishes of that government, I must be careful, because it has indicated that I should seriously consider, as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, one of the alternatives; that is, if I take certain actions of which it does not approve, the province will withdraw all funding to the Indian people. That may be something that the hon. member would like to avoid. I know I would.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT WIDEN CONTACTS WITH PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In light of Mr. Arafat's signed statement Sunday, accepting all U.N. resolutions relating to the Palestinian question, will the Prime Minister now undertake to move toward implementing the recommendations of the 1979 Stanfield report respecting the Middle East, which urged the broadening of contacts with the PLO?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would certainly want to support the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he cautiously saw this alleged statement by Mr. Arafat as an interesting development. At this stage I think we are trying to ascertain what was actually said, and its significance. But I think it would be a very important step forward if the PLO were to recognize the right of the State of Israel to exist, because we think that would be an important step forward in recognition of a homeland for the Palestinian people, which is a position that this government supports.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST HALIBUT QUOTAS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The minister will perhaps remember receiving a letter from me last week concerning potential halibut quotas on the west coast. Can the minister tell us whether the report which has been drafted for him by the advisory group on the west coast with respect to halibut quotas has reached his desk? Can the minister tell this House what those halibut quotas will be and when they will go into effect?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I was advised this morning that the report was on the way, and it will obviously be the subject of discussion by the advisory council. At that time I will be able to answer the hon. member's question. I regret that I have not seen his letter.

Mr. Fraser: I thank the minister for his courtesy.

REQUEST THAT FISHERMEN BE CONSULTED

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): The minister will know, when he checks with his officials, that I have received at least 108 letters from fishermen in the halibut sector on the west coast, complaining very bitterly about the proposed halibut quota. Can the minister tell us whether these people and others who would join with them in these complaints will have a chance to register their concerns with the minister before any final decision is made?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I would presume that these fishermen are represented by their organization at the council. The difficulty in this case is in determining whether there is enough halibut to go beyond those fishermen who are mainly dependent on halibut and whether it can be shared more widely with fishermen with other types of gear who have access to salmon, herring and other species. That is a debate which will be going on for some time, and we will try to come up with the best solution.

TAX ON PROCESSED ETHANE—EFFECT ON PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister knows, Canada's petrochemical industry is in a severe slump. In the province of Alberta alone, some 12 petrochemical plants have either been cancelled or delayed indefinitely. One of the main reasons is the fact that under the National Energy Program, ethane, which is the basic raw product used in the petrochemical industry, is taxed when it is processed for export purposes but, while in its raw form, it is not. This creates an anomaly that militates against the further processing of this raw product.

Representations have been made to the members of cabinet, including the minister himself, by the minister of economic development of the province of Alberta, specifically on April 16. The minister of economic development in the province of Alberta warned the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that this tax treatment could inflict permanent damage upon the petrochemical industry in Alberta and, indeed, in the rest of Canada. Is the minister actively reviewing this tax treatment, and what response has he given to the minister of economic development of the province of Alberta?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I already answered the economic development minister of Alberta on this subject when I told him that a task force headed by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion has been set up to review the situation involving the petrochemical industry. But I want to point out to the hon. member that the tax in question has a very minimal impact indeed on the petrochemical industry. The fact is that the petrochemical industry throughout the whole world is going through very difficult times at present.

The hon. member knows, for instance, that in Japan a very large part of the petrochemical industry closed down, that in the United States the petrochemical industry is going through very difficult times, and that the same thing is happening in Europe. So the problem is related to a situation of declining demand for petrochemical products throughout the whole world, due to the recession. The fact that Canada has an exchange rate advantage is helping our industry to compete in the international markets. However, the tax in question is indeed a very marginal factor in the whole problem. The problem is much wider than the hon. member has indicated.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACT TO REVITALIZE INDUSTRY

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, since the minister believes that the tax treatment under the National Energy Program does not have a major impact, what is he prepared to do to revitalize the petrochemical industry in order to fulfil the commitment he made in October, 1980, under the National Energy Program, when he said that he would be concentrating on the future growth of the petrochemical industry in western Canada, principally in Alberta? He said he hoped this would begin a new era of western diversity. Surely it is because of the National Energy Program that in large part the petrochemical industry is in danger. What is the minister proposing to do to revitalize that very important sector and thereby create jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am afraid that once again my hon. friend has not understood my first answer. There is no National Energy Program in the United States, Japan or Europe, and their petrochemical industry is going through extreme difficulties at the present time, in fact difficulties that are more severe than those being encountered at the present time by the Canadian industry. As I indicated, there is a task force set up under the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion which, at the present time, is examining the whole situation of the petrochemical industry.

Our interest is to have a very bright, vibrant and dynamic petrochemical industry in this country. However, as long as the world is going through the recession that we are going through, there is no point in trying to sell products to people who do not buy. The demand for petrochemicals is down all over the world. What we have to fight for and support are the types of measures that the government has announced to get the Canadian economy on the road to recovery. We hope other economies of the world will follow the same steps.

ACTION BY GOVERNMENT ON REGULATORY REPORTS

Question No. 4,041—Mr. Beatty:

1. What action (a) was taken (b) is currently planned by the government on each recommendation of the (i) second report of the second session of the 30th Parliament from the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments (ii) fourth report of the first session of the 32nd Parliament from the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments (iii) report of the task force on Regulatory Reform (iv) reports of the regulation reference of the Economic Council of Canada?

2. For each recommendation on which action was not taken and is not currently contemplated, what is the reason for the government's inaction?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): The following indicates where action is either being taken or is planned by the government with respect to the recommendations of the following reports:

(i) Second report of the second session of the Thirtieth Parliament from the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments;

(ii) Fourth report of the first session of the Thirty-second Parliament from the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments;

(iii) Report of the Special Committee on Regulatory Reform;

(iv) Interim report of the Economic Council of Canada, Responsible Regulation November, 1979; and

(v) Final report of the Economic Council of Canada, Reforming Regulation 1981.

If action on a matter that was the subject of a recommendation has not been taken and is not currently planned, an explanation is provided.

Most of the recommendations in the reports noted above deal with matters falling within the general area of regulatory reform. As the House has been advised on other occasions, in October, 1980, the government endorsed an initial 18-month work program for regulatory reform which was comprised of 12 projects, each with clearly defined objectives. The government's intention, recognizing that not everything could be achieved or even attempted at one time, was to focus its energies on pursuing a selection of possible reforms that seemed to be both beneficial and achievable within an initial, limited time. The government will review the results and prospects of the program. Recommendations not dealt with in the initial regulatory reform work program will be reviewed again in the course of developing proposals for the next phase of the government's regulatory reform efforts.

With respect to those recommendations of the above named reports dealing with the matter of improved consultation on regulatory matters with the private sector, one of the projects of the current regulatory reform program has as its objective improved private sector consultation. The Office of the Co-ordinator, Regulatory Reform has been working with major regulatory departments to examine existing consultative procedures and techniques to improve the consultative procedures and techniques of federal regulatory departments.

With respect to recommendations on the matter of advance notice of new regulatory initiatives, we are currently assessing the feasibility of implementing regulatory agendas or a consolidated regulatory calendar.

With respect to those recommendations dealing with prepublication of draft regulations and notice and comment procedures, such prepublication, with opportunity for comment by affected interests, is encouraged under the government's regulatory reform program. Prepublication requirements for regulations are increasingly being incorporated in new regulatory statutes. In addition, Chapter 490 of the Administrative Policy Manual, which sets out requirements regarding socio-economic impact analysis of major regulations in the health, safety and fairness area requires prepublication of draft major regulations together with a summary of the analysis that has been prepared. A recent decision of the Treasury Board, incorporated in a new policy directive regarding compliance by federal departments with the GATT agreement on technical barriers to trade, requires that federal regulations incorporating technical specifications (e.g., standards) be subjected to a notice and comment procedure which includes prepublication.

With respect to recommendations dealing with improved ex ante analysis of new regulatory initiatives, we are assessing the feasibility of implementing an RIA (regulatory impact analysis) requirement for new federal regulatory initiatives. The essential objective in this area is to improve the information on the impact of regulatory initiatives that is being provided to decision makers. Work on proposals for an RIA system is continuing under the direction of the Office of the Co-ordinator, Regulatory Reform.

Regarding those recommendations dealing with the matter of parliamentary reform, and particularly parliamentary involvement in the regulatory process to ensure greater accountability for regulatory activities, the position of the government has not changed. The President of the Privy Council has advised the House on past occasions of his intent to initiate the process of examining possible reforms, and specifically those that were the subject of recommendations in the above-noted reports.

We have examined the recommendations dealing with reliance on the consensus process for developing technical specifications and referencing of external standards in legislation. We are actively promoting reliance on the consensus process as well as reliance on the technique of incorporation by reference. A recent decision by Treasury Board, incorporated in a new chapter of the Administrative Policy Manual, encourages federal regulatory departments and agencies subject to the directive to follow these practices.

Those recommendations dealing with accountability and control of, and appointments to regulatory agencies, including questions of the use of government policy directives and cabinet review of agency decisions are the subject of a major project of the current regulatory reform program. A special review group on regulatory reform of Crown agencies, based in the Privy Council Office, has recently completed an assessment of these and other recommendations regarding federal regulatory agencies. The findings of the review group are now being considered.

Support for public interest groups, including the question of provision of core funding, project specific funding, and cost awards by regulatory departments and agencies is also being examined within the regulatory reform program. An inter-departmental task force, headed by the Secretary of State, is examining the role of voluntary organizations and their relationship to the federal government. Issues relevant to interest group support in connection with the federal regulatory process will be covered in the report.

With respect to those recommendations dealing with the matter of reduction of paper burden and records retention provisions, one of the projects of the current regulatory reform program has as its objective implementation of a cabinet decision to standardize and reduce requirements in federal legislation (statutes and regulations) which impose obligations on the private sector to retain records. Work on this project is well advanced. A bill to amend the records retention provisions of seven statutes is nearly completed and should be available for consideration by Parliament in the very near future. Federal departments are also preparing amendments to some 50 regulations for the purpose of further adjusting records retention requirements. Cost savings to the private sector from these changes have been conservatively estimated at $100 million per year.

With respect to those recommendations dealing with ex post evaluation, several projects of the current regulatory reform program are aimed at ensuring ex post evaluation of federal regulatory activities. Government departments have now completed a legislative review in order to identify obsolete and unnecessary statutes. It is my intention to introduce in the House in the near future a bill that will provide for the repeal of 125 obsolete statutes identified through this process. In addition, major federal regulatory departments are now engaged in or have completed an initial review of their regulations in order to weed out obsolete, contradictory, unenforceable or duplicative provisions. This work should be completed prior to the termination of the current regulatory reform program.

The Office of the Comptroller General of Canada has been working with major regulating departments to review departmental program evaluation plans prepared in accordance with the requirements of the government's program evaluation policy. The purpose of this review is to ensure that the plans for the 1982-83 fiscal year comprehensively cover the regulatory activities of each department. The Office of the Comptroller General is reviewing its program evaluation guide and methodology for program evaluation to determine if adjustments should be made to facilitate evaluation of regulatory programs in accordance with the existing Treasury Board policy directive which requires periodic, systematic evaluation of all government activities.

With respect to those recommendations dealing with the matter of improved "service to the public", the federal task force on service to the public is continuing its work on implementing a program of initiatives in this area.

With respect to those recommendations of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments not dealt with above, the Department of Justice is initiating a review of these recommendations as part of a general review of the law and legal policy relating to the use of statutory instruments and delegated legislative authority.

With respect to those recommendations concerning federal economic, social, and common property regulation, these recommendations are being assessed by the Office of the Co-ordinator, Regulatory Reform and by relevant departments and ministries with a view to potential adjustments to current regulatory arrangements.

With respect to all other recommendations of the above named reports, each recommendation will be re-examined in the course of developing new proposals for continued federal efforts in the area of regulatory reform after the termination of the current reform program in June, 1982.

LOANS TO CNR EMPLOYEES

Question No. 4,193—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Were loans made to any employee of Canadian National Railways or its subsidiaries since March, 1980 and, if so, in each case (a) what is the name and title of the employee (b) on what date was the loan taken out and on what date is it due (c) what was the amount of the loan (d) what interest rate is being charged (e) what was the purpose of the loan?

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: (a) to (e) With the exception of special circumstances related solely to company initiated relocation, Canadian National and its subsidiaries do not provide loans to any officers or employees.

Assistance, by means of specific housing loans, has been granted for the acquisition or construction of housing units to meet employees' needs in remote locations where little or no housing was available (e.g. transfers to Northwest Territories and the Yukon) or in situations where employees were being relocated along with the transfer of their work. About 180 such loans aggregating about $3.5 million were made during the relevant period; less than half of those loans will be outstanding by the end of 1982.

Other specific information requested is considered proprietary and of a personal nature.

LOANS TO NAC EMPLOYEES

Question No. 4,201—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Were loans made to any employee of the National Arts Centre Corporation or its subsidiaries since March, 1980 and, if so, in each case (a) what is the name and title of the employee (b) on what date was the loan taken out and on what date is it due (c) what was the amount of the loan (d) what interest rate is being charged (e) what was the purpose of the loan?

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): I am informed by the National Arts Centre Corporation as follows: The National Arts Centre Corporation does not loan money to its employees. However, since March, 1980 it has loaned money, totalling $50,650, to musicians of the NAC orchestra engaged on full-time contracts. Repayment of amounts loaned is effected by deductions from regular fee payments at interest rates consistent with prevailing money market conditions.

The purpose in making such loans is to enable musicians to upgrade the quality of their instruments, which they are required to provide, for the mutual advantage of both the musician and orchestra. Title to instrument purchased in this manner is vested with the corporation until complete retirement of indebtedness.

Other specific information requested is considered proprietary and of a personal nature.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT—CODE OF CONDUCT

Question No. 4,255—Mr. Crosby:

1. Does Fitness and Amateur Sport have written rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behavior for its employees and, if so, are they embodied in a code of conduct or other specific document and is the code or document available to the public?

2. In the five years preceding April 1, 1982, were any employees disciplined by way of suspension, dismissal or otherwise for violations of any rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behaviour for departmental employees and, if so, in each case, what was the name of the employee and the date of the disciplinary action?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): 1. New employees are informed of the existence of the standards of conduct, discipline, which are contained in a chapter of the Personnel Manual which is available to the public upon request.

2. The list below indicates cases of disciplinary action from April, 1977 to March, 1982. To be consistent with the provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act we are not providing names.

COMMITTEE ON TAXATION OF NORTHERN BENEFITS

Question No. 4,344—Mr. Nickerson:

Was an interdepartmental committee established under the lead of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to study the questions of northern taxation and the isolated posts benefits and allowances remission order and, if so (a) what are the names, titles and departmental affiliations of the members of the committee (b) did the committee ever meet?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): (a) Please see below.

(b) The Interdepartmental Committee on Taxation of Northern Benefits held formal meetings on December 11, 1981, January 5, 1982, March 22, 1982 and April 29, 1982. Between the second, third and fourth meetings, there were a number of informal meetings on the topic of the taxation of northern benefits involving, for the most part, committee officials from the Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Energy, Mines and Resources. On May 4, 1982, a meeting of assistant deputy ministers from the departments represented on the committee was held to review and evaluate the work of the committee, which subsequently met again on May 26.

ON-THE-JOB TRAINING PROGRAM

Question No. 4,349—Mr. Parker:

1. What was the total number of men trained on CPR under the on-the-job training program for engineers since December, 1980 and how many were trained at (a) Vancouver (b) Revelstoke (c) Calgary (d) Medicine Hat (e) Moose Jaw (f) Saskatoon (g) Winnipeg?

2. What was the total cost of the manpower program and what was the breakdown per engineer?

3. What formula is used for cost sharing?

4. (a) What was the total cost per trained engineer for training undertaken for CNR Gimli, Manitoba (b) how many graduates and how many failures were there?

5. Does CNR receive assistance under manpower and, if so, in what amount?

6. Has RTC initiated studies as to the effectiveness of CNR and CPR programs and, if so, are the studies available?

7. Has CNR and CPR made use of Manpower policies for training carmen and, if so, in what manner?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission/Department, the management of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Transport Commission as follows: The information requested is available on a fiscal year basis. The data given are for the period from April 1, 1980 to December 31, 1981.

1. The total number of trainees, under industrial training contracts entered into with the CPR for the training of engineers, was 68. All of the training was in Ontario.

2. The total cost to Canada for this training was $221,357. The average cost per engineer trained was $3,255.25.

3. The formula used to calculate the costs to Canada are percentage reimbursements of wage costs incurred by the employer, CPR, during the training period. The applicable percentage for the above-mentioned training is 40 per cent.

4. (a) $8,474.69. (b) To date, 2,622 have graduated and 91 failed.

5. CNR did not receive any assistance in the training of engineers but it has received assistance under the Canada manpower training program in other occupations, with a total cost to Canada of $95,195.

6. No.

7. Neither CNR nor CPR has utilized the manpower program in the training of carmen since April, 1980.

REORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENTS

Question No. 4,364—Mr. Mazankowski:

Since the announcement of the reorganization of the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, how many (a) senior managers (b) other staff in each department have (i) resigned (ii) taken early retirement (iii) been transferred to a government position outside of the three departments?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of External Affairs, Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion as follows:

	(i) Resigned	(ii) Early Retirement	(iii) Transferred to Other Departments
(a) Senior Management
External Affairs	None	None	None
Industry, Trade & Commerce	1	1	3
Regional Economic Expansion	None	None	1
(b) All Other Staff
External Affairs	15	2	21
Industry, Trade & Commerce	37	4	18
Regional Economic Expansion	44	3	31

These personnel changes reflect the normal day to day employee decision to improve or cease his or her career in the public service.

[English]

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council has had any success in finding out why question No. 2,329 is not being answered.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I am currently looking into that matter on behalf of the hon. member, and I am very pleased to do so.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UREA FORMALDEHYDE INSULATION ACT

PROVISION OF ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

The House resumed from Wednesday, June 23, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ouellet that Bill C-109, to provide for payments to persons in respect of dwellings insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation, be read the second time and, pursuant to House Order (p. 19701), referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise briefly this afternoon to comment on Bill C-109, remedial legislation for victims of urea formaldehyde foam insulation. I realize that we are presently at second reading stage where we discuss the bill in principle. I plan to do just that, recognizing that we are all anxious to get this bill into Committee of the Whole where we can go through it clause by clause and raise many of the concerns that we on this side have regarding Bill C-109.

When the bill was first introduced on December 23, 1981 the minister responsible indicated that the government was prepared to set aside $110 million to provide remedial relief to those households suffering with the problems of urea formaldehyde foam insulation. It became clear immediately that the program was hopelessly inadequate. Considering the extent of the problems associated with this type of insulation, at best the program announced by the minister responsible is a band-aid for a very serious wound.

It is important that we see this bill as simply the first step in a very long march toward improving the situation for thousands of Canadians who, through no fault of their own, have found themselves in a situation that is bound to cost them many thousands of dollars and in some instances tens of thousands of dollars.

It is important that as Members of Parliament we do not consider Bill C-109 to be the final step in resolving this problem. It should not be considered the final offer. It is not a fait accompli. Bill C-109 is simply the beginning of a process by which the Government of Canada will make an effort to rectify a situation that has caused anguish to many Canadians.

I want to take a few moments this afternoon to relate to the House an example of how the plight associated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation has caused so much anguish to one of my constituents. The story begins in the city of Vancouver, British Columbia. A woman nearing her retirement had saved to improve her home. The woman had been widowed a number of years earlier. She had worked for many, many years and had saved her money. She placed her money in a fund which would eventually result in an improvement to her modest home in the city of Vancouver.

In the months approaching her retirement she decided to take money out of her bank account and improve the roofing on her modest home, replace the siding with aluminum siding, rewire the whole house, improve the plumbing and lay a new asphalt floor in the carport. I could go on and on, but the point I am trying to make is that here was a single woman about to retire placing all her life's savings into improving her home. She had lived in the home for many, many years, and that was where she planned to spend the remaining part of her life.

It was a comfortable home in the city of Vancouver. In her efforts to improve her home she decided to take advantage of a program the government introduced and to insulate her home thoroughly so that it would be cool in the summertime and snug and warm in the winter. She asked a contractor to instal urea formaldehyde to improve her home.

Needless to say, that was the beginning of the end. No sooner had the foam insulation been installed than she noticed symptoms of ill health. She found she could not breathe properly. Her throat and lungs were irritated. Her eyes began to weep after a short period of time in her home. Within a matter of days she could not stand being inside her modest home and had to move out into the carport. Luckily, it was a Vancouver summer; it was mild. She was able to set up temporary tent-like lodging; I suppose I can call it that. She went into her home to cook and so forth, but she could stay only 15 minutes before she would have to leave again.

Naturally, she went to her physician and inquired about her condition. When the physician found out that urea formaldehyde was the type of insulation she had installed in her home, he very quickly did the appropriate tests and found that this woman was suffering from severe illness directly associated with the urea formaldehyde insulation. The physician said that the only alternative was to remove the urea formaldehyde or move out of the home.

To remove foam insulation requires the expenditure of thousands and thousands of dollars. I suppose for some Canadians that would not cause a serious problem, but for others it creates a hurdle they simply cannot overcome. The woman to whom I have been referring had retired, but she was asked to spend $15,000 to $20,000 to remove the noxious urea formaldehyde foam insulation from her home. She was unable to do so. I believe it was her solicitor who advised her to place her home on the market, sell it, get what money she could out of the home and buy something else or move into an apartment, condominium or town house. This was a very difficult thing for this person to do. This elderly woman had lived in her home for nearly 20 years with her husband and then as a widow. After spending thousands of dollars of her savings to improve the home she was asked to sell it and move into an apartment.

That was very difficult for her to do, but she had no alternative. She placed her home on the market. Needless to say, as soon as prospective home buyers found out that the home was insulated with urea formaldehyde foam, they quickly walked away. They were not interested in purchasing a home with that insulation. By that time it had become extremely infamous because of its problematic nature.

After many, many weeks of attempting to sell her home and living in a carport or boarding with friends who would take her in, an individual came along and said he would be prepared to buy the home simply for the lot and that he would give her a certain number of dollars which would compensate her for the value of the lot. As far as her home was concerned, it would simply have to be bulldozed off the landscape. Can hon. members imagine how that woman must have felt at that point? She had no alternative, so she sold the lot and stood by and watched the new owner of that propery bulldoze her very nice home down and haul it away to the sanitary land fill. I do not suppose one can begin to appreciate the agony and sorrow which would have been attached by that woman to that scene.

However, that was not the worst of it. By that time this woman had spent a considerable period of time with her legal advisers who were, during the process, charging her for their services and for their advice. When she received the money for the lot, she had to pay her solicitors. By the time she paid for the advice given to her and for the lobbying of the federal government which was undertaken, she walked away from what was one of the nicest modest homes in Vancouver. She walked away with her suitcases, her personal belongings and a handful of dollars in her purse. Her entire life's savings had simply been devastated. She had no home, she had nothing, and the interesting part of this, for our purposes here today, is that this was through no fault of her own. She was a totally innocent bystander to this whole process. She now happens to be living in my constituency of Kamloops-Shuswap in a mobile home on which she must pay rental charges based on the income of a senior citizen.

I must say that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) was sympathetic enough to ask me to write the details of this case down and to provide them to him for his consideration. I have done that, and for the minister's consideration I am very appreciative. I expect the example I have used is not a typical example, but I used it to indicate the human tragedy which has been associated with this disastrous urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

This woman came to me and said, "Mr. Riis, what will the government do to assist?" Because this bill was then before the committee, I suggested she might expect $5,000 in compensation. She said, "I have lost tens of thousands, perhaps $150,000, and is all the government going to give me $5,000?"

I said, "Yes, that is the way it looks." She told me that was inappropriate, unfair and unjust. I had to agree that it was for a woman who had lost her entire life's savings and seen her home bulldozed down before her eyes because it was insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation. She could not understand why the government would be so coldhearted and callous and would not have more compassion for people such as her.

I understand that this bill would provide a maximum of $5,000 to an individual after the individual has had the foam insulation removed and presented a certificate to the authorities. I hope the minister will respond to this later this afternoon because, if that is the case, that assumes that people have $5,000 to expend. I should not say $5,000; I suppose it will be $10,000, $15,000, $20,000 or more, and once people have expended those thousands of dollars, the government will see fit to reimburse them with $5,000 maximum. There are many, many Canadians who could not even begin to think about expending $10,000 or $15,000 to remove this foam insulation from their homes. I do not know what the figure would be, but if there are 80,000 people likely to apply, I suspect we are talking about 75,000 people who simply could not begin to consider borrowing an additional $15,000 to $20,000 to improve their homes, especially when nearly two million people are in a state of enforced idleness as a result of unemployment in our country. Many more are operating very close to the limit of their moderate incomes. There are people on fixed incomes and many others who during these difficult economic times are, at best, making a poor living.

As responsible Members of Parliament we have to ask ourselves if it is reasonable to expect Canadians to spend $15,000, $20,000 or $30,000 of their savings to clear up this insulation problem and then look to the government for a $5,000 reimbursement. This has happened to people through no fault of their own; and as a matter of fact, they were given the impression that it was quite a legitimate activity. The government indicated that it was the kind of insulation it wanted people to instal and that it was prepared to support the process through CHIP grants and so on. The offer of a maximum payment of $5,000 as provided in Bill C-109 is not a fair proposition at all.

We also have to address the long-term health problems. I do not suppose there is any member who has not spent time with constituents who have had urea formaldehyde foam insulation installed in their homes. We are all quite aware of the health problems associated with the insulation. As responsible Members of Parliament we have an obligation to see that adequate provisions are included in Bill C-109 for a follow-up on the health of the people involved, particularly those on modest incomes. Perhaps the minister will give his reaction when he has an opportunity to speak. It is likely that 80,000 home owners will claim the maximum $5,000 grant. That means a bill of $400 million. The minister has indicated that he has set aside $110 million, so that leaves a $290 million shortfall. We would all have to accept, of course, that the $5,000 maximum grant is hopelessly inadequate.

On a number of occasions the minister has said that he would give consideration to additional funding that might come from other federal programs, from provincial or industrial sources. Knowing the state of the Canadian economy and the financial plight of provincial governments, I do not think we should hold our breath waiting for them to support an error made by the federal government. It was the federal government's initiative and approval under which the program was implemented and this type of insulation installed.

While we are discussing this bill in principle, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that we consider providing full compensation for those innocent people who now find themselves in a disastrous financial situation through no fault of their own. Anything short of full compensation and an admission that we have erred in putting the policy in place would not be appropriate.

We need also to give consideration to alternate housing for people required to move out of their homes temporarily while adjustments are being made to buildings insulated with urea formaldehyde. We should perhaps consider the vacancies in CMHC funded homes, or beyond that through the auspices of CMHC.

Through CMHC the government could help people who are having difficulty renewing their mortgages because of foam insulation or who are having difficulty selling their homes because of it. I think it is well known that urea formaldehyde insulation does not mean, by definition, that there is a problem in the home, but the name has become associated with the serious problem. People have become very suspicious of it. Any home owners unfortunate enough to have urea formaldehyde insulation in their homes, even if there are no problems, will have a difficult time selling that home or even renegotiating a mortgage. I believe that in some cases there is even difficulty getting insurance on these homes because there has been an increase in the number of fires in such homes—probably by accident, but I suppose this is open to question.

With the greatest respect to my Progressive Conservative colleagues, Mr. Speaker, I must say that some of their public utterances have left me confused and I hope they will clarify them. I have talked with representatives of the urea formaldehyde lobby groups that have been formed in virtually every large and small municipality in the country. They tell me that the Progressive Conservatives have lobbied long and hard to hold up this bill because its provisions are inadequate. Yet when I read the appropriate minutes of the committee, I get the contrary impression—that the Progressive Conservatives are quite anxious to see the bill go through and have co-operated with the government for its rapid passage. I hope I am wrong in this and I hope my friends to my right will clarify the issue. What is their position? Do they plan to vote in favour of the bill in spite of its obvious shortcomings, or will they behave as they did with Bill C-154, when speaker after speaker after speaker rose to rip the legislation apart, bad-mouth the government and then say that, in spite of all the problems and criticisms that they had, they were going to vote for the bill and support the government. I think it is important that my Progressive Conservative colleagues set out their position on the various controversial elements of the bill. Have they abandoned the home owners who have this dreaded insulation problem? I would not want to suggest for a moment that they are hypocrites, although I know other people might use that term.

I appreciate this opportunity to speak, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Hudecki (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, it is a special privilege to speak to the House today on a subject which has some relevance to the profession in which I hold a degree both at the graduate level and at the post-graduate level. Very often in this House subjects that have medical relevance and are important to the welfare of the country as a whole are debated. There are five medical doctors in the House, three on the government side and two on the opposition side. Rather than call on these people who have the experience, training and background to give support and help to clarify issues, over and over again these subjects are left to Members of Parliament who have training in fields other than the medical field and who have without prejudice attempted to define the meaning of these medical problems. But they attempt to exaggerate at times the problems which are presented. They give remedies which are very frequently not at all appropriate to the conditions discussed.

Those of us with a medical background find it very difficult to sit and listen to that type of thing, which very frequently not only misleads the public but over and over again creates unnecessary anxiety and despair. I think it is incumbent on us, when there are critical questions concerning medical problems, that we make sure those who have the background at least be consulted, that the problem is discussed, and that they be given an opportunity to speak on the issue as I am being given that privilege today.

Long before I came into politics, Mr. Speaker, I realized that the politician has a knack of appearing to be knowledgeable and conversant on practically every subject that comes before him. As a surgical consultant in a cerebral palsy ward, I had an opportunity to talk with the Prime Minister of the day, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. Certainly he was a man for whom I had great respect and I have fond memories of his day as Prime Minister. On this occasion I felt I had the opportunity to discuss with, and perhaps even educate, this distinguished parliamentarian on the subject of cerebral palsy. We saw a patient and I started my short harangue, but within about two or three minutes the Prime Minister took over. He told me his thoughts on cerebral palsy, how it should be prevented and treated, and what his experience had been on the subject.

It was then that I was introduced to the technique which is used so frequently in the political field. It is a situation frequently encountered that when subjects of medical interest are discussed, a particular politician will speak at great length and give his version of what should be done. However, my experience has been that it is only when these particular problems relate to the politician himself that he will listen. So again I might say that I am particularly pleased to have this opportunity to talk on this problem.

The problem of urea formaldehyde foam insulation, Mr. Speaker, has had a very major impact on the emotional status, fears and worries of the public. I would like to quote a constituent of mine, a very level-headed, hardworking and dedicated mother in my riding. She says:

> Do those who approved the program feel any remorse at all for what they have done? Do they suggest that we rent a hotel for seven people for six months so we can have our home entirely gutted and rebuilt because we felt that we could help ourselves and conserve at the same time? What is the future of our children and ourselves without the removal of urea formaldehyde foam? Where do we turn, to whom do we turn?

That is from a lady with a large family. Their home is paid for and at no time have they had any symptoms whatsoever. They are proud of the environment and setting in which they are able to raise their children. They have had this house for three years, they knew it was insulated with this foam, but at no time was there any suggestion of any ill effects from that particular type of insulation. Why should a lady of this mental capacity, whose husband is an executive at one of the local plants, suddenly have to be concerned about her residence because of this information which has so flagrantly been spread throughout my constituency and Canada?

Another constituent wrote me:

> —merely because we are not suffering overt symptons healthwise now, nobody knows what the long-term damage may be to one's health . . . cancer does not show up immediately.

Another constituent is worrying, not because there are any particular signs of illness but because of what they hear on the radio, see on television or read in newspapers.

What are the medical facts, Mr. Speaker? I do not intend to go into the administrative aspects of what the government intends to do, but I would like to acquaint you with the medical facts as those who are trained in medicine read, interpret and act on them. Most of us, if we have signs of ill health such as a rash, respiratory problems or gastrointestinal discomfort, will use our common sense and do what we feel is necessary. If that fails to give us the desired result, we go to our family doctor. For the most part, the doctor will either give you directions and support or he will say this is beyond his scope and refer you to an appropriate specialist.

In the Hamilton-Toronto area a colleague of mine, one Michael Newhouse, is a particularly skilful specialist in the fields of allergy and chest physiology. He is a professor of medicine at McMaster University and has written about 60 to 70 papers on the subject of environmental and occupational diseases referable to the respiratory system. I felt I should contact him and discuss his experience in this particular field. First and foremost he indicated that he had no cases referred to him from general practitioners in the Hamilton area with symptoms which could not be explained by causes other than urea formaldehyde foam insulation. He also indicated that there was no increase in cancer cases or any suggestion of concern or worry on the part of those in the field of malignancy research.

He further surveyed the Toronto area. He talked to other specialists who come under the term of respirologists. None of these people had any cases referred to them that could be considered in any way related to insulation. These specialists trained in this field have the equipment, the expertise and the sophisticated support to pick up early changes. Out of a population of approximately 2.5 million people, I think a lack of problems is most significant. That type of information is necessary so as to decide what to do. This doctor has been looking for the particular disability created by formaldehyde insulation. He was not able to find it, and he is continuing his search.

The next question is how toxic is formaldehyde? At this moment in practically every hospital in the country there are doctors and technicians working with formaldehyde. I am referring to pathologists and their technicians. Pathologists deal with diseased organs. The diagnoses they make frequently lead to the form of treatment that will follow. If they decide a lump in the breast is malignant, they may recommend partial amputation of that breast. If they identify tumor cells in a lung it usually means partial removal of the lung. In the course of the pathologist's work, the tissue submitted to him, whether from a surgical operation or from an autopsy, is put into Formalin. Formalin is usually a 40 per cent solution which for the most part is diluted into a 10 per cent solution. Tissues are kept in containers filled with this solution. Every day doctors remove tissues from the containers. For an hour to two and a half hours every day, with the emanation of fumes they cut up the tissues and prepare them for slides. Tissues are stained for study microscopically. For two to three hours every day of their working lives the pathologists and their technicians are exposed to high concentrations of formaldehyde.

What effect has this had on the pathologists and their technicians? In the British Isles a study was carried out on 15,000 of them. The following questions were asked and analysed. Is there a high incidence of cancer in that group compared to doctors working in other fields and compared to the general population? No excess of cancer cases was found in that particular group. Second, do they have any extra respiratory conditions, such as frequency of colds or irritated sinuses? Again, there was no suggestion that this group had any greater number of respiratory infections or diseases compared to the average population and to other doctors. What about longevity? The record showed that this group of people lived longer than the average.

The answers to these questions and this study are not 100 per cent proof that there are no ill-effects from formaldehyde. But certainly a study of 15,000 people working in this type of environment over a number of years and showing no ill-effects—certainly not the effects so widely publicized—must make one think in terms of what is the effect of prolonged exposure to conditions where there is a high concentration of formaldehyde.

Why, then, are we so concerned? Why has this epidemic of fear been visited upon us? A number of factors can be considered, but probably at the back of it all has been some experimental work which has been done in the United States by a doctor in the Chemical Industry Institute of Toxicology in North Carolina. This doctor studied 2,000 rats and mice. The animals were subjected to various levels of formaldehyde six hours a day, five days a week for up two years. Of this group only the rats developed nasal cancer. The number was significant. The experiment was done on a threshold level; that is, the animals were exposed to a certain percentage of formaldehyde. If the formaldehyde concentration was below a certain level, a lesser incidence of nasal cancer was noted. This experimental study was done by an honest researcher and showed that cancer can occur in the nasal lining of mice if they are exposed to a much higher concentration of formaldehyde than is ever found in a normal setting.

This type of cancer can occur in animals and it has some very special characteristics. These characteristics relate to the breathing mechanism of the rat. A young mouse given a pungent or an irritating odour will stop breathing, or its breathing mechanism will diminish. On the other hand, a rat hyperventilates, which means that it breathes more rapidly and in doing so a mechanism comes into play causing considerable irritation of the lining mucosa of the nose. There is an explanation for it. However, it is difficult to say whether this is due to formaldehyde specifically or whether it is due to the irritation of increased breathing of any irritant.

But what correlation is there? Can one extrapolate the findings in animals to human beings? This question has been considered for many years. It has been debated in various scientific circles. The conclusion is that there is very little correlation or linkage between what is found in animals and what is found in human beings as far as the production of cancer is concerned. The American policy is that if some substance produces cancer in an animal over a fixed period, it is decided as a policy that the particular substance will be banned until it can be proven that it will not produce a similar condition in human beings.

During the past three to four years various studies have been conducted. One was conducted in Denmark, one in England to which I have alluded, and three in the United States. They concerned the effects on people working in an environment where there is a high concentration of formaldehyde. In none of them was it possible to find excessive cancer of any kind in the average population, nor was there any particular evidence of nasal cancer. Based upon medical evidence as a result of the work of accepted research workers, there was no direct evidence that human beings exposed to large doses of formaldehyde developed mucosa cancer.

These were not well-controlled experiments. Most human experiments cannot be properly controlled and cannot be taken as scientific fact; but the results of these various studies must be available to average physicians and doctors so that they can advise their patients.

What is formaldehyde? How pervasive is it? Where is it found and in what concentration? Formaldehyde is a component of the human body. There is a certain percentage of formaldehyde in every cell of our bodies. Formaldehyde takes part in the chemical reactions of the body and is therefore one of the chemicals which constitutes our individual cells. It is not a foreign agent. It takes part in various chemical reactions in very minute quantities.

Also it is found externally in a number of items. It is found in plywood, chipboard, acrylic carpeting, various carpet binding agents which are quite extensively used in homes at the present time, car exhaust fumes, and also in very high concentrations in tobacco smoke. As I sit between two female members of the House of Commons in the conference room, whose names I shall not indicate, I feel I am in much more danger absorbing smoke from their cigarettes. Each of them is a chain smoker. I feel this is much more hazardous than living in any home with urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

Mr. Tousignant: I certainly agree with you.

Mr. Hudecki: The gentleman to my right agrees with what I am saying. Certainly smoking is a real hazard.

I should like to refer to some statistics. In 1978-79, 28,000 people in Canada died from smoke-related conditions. In the North American continent 150,000 persons per year die from smoking. Yet the number dying from any cancer which could be related to formaldehyde at the moment, and in light of current knowledge, is exactly zero. These statistics must be kept in mind when we deal with people exposed to formaldehyde and to urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

A study was conducted under government supervision concerning the concentration of formaldehyde in homes with this insulation. In fact, some 2,700 homes were studied. The average concentration of formaldehyde in homes with some form of insulation was .049 ppm. For those homes which had only formaldehyde foam, it was .034 ppm. The interesting fact is that one quarter of the homes without any foam insulation had formaldehyde levels much higher than the average foam-insulated house. It is possible to have high levels of formaldehyde above the acceptable level, yet have no formaldehyde insulation whatsoever.

I am not trying to indicate that people do not respond unfavourably to formaldehyde. Our human body is such that practically any one of us may show a most unusual reaction to any chemical. Those of us who expect to have our teeth fixed under local anesthetic or those of us who require minor repairs under local anesthetic are really at hazard and at risk. We may very well show a massive reaction to local anesthetic. Indeed this happens. Many of us have read of instant deaths occurring in the dental chair or in the emergency room. Certainly there are people who are sensitive, and we call them hypersensitive, to formaldehyde. These people are very, very rare. They are rare enough that they do not justify the problem being publicized as it has been recently. We should not terrify the major portion of our population because there are those among us who react violently to formaldehyde. These people must be diagnosed accurately.

In view of the fact that formaldehyde is so pervasive and is present in so many different areas of the home and in so many commodities in the home, a very careful study must be made to ascertain whether or not sensitivity is due to the insulation or to other causes. If there are other causes, they should be dealt with. If it is related to the home, on the other hand, then appropriate steps must be taken. In some cases the individual should even be moved from the home so that the necessary changes can be made.

It is very difficult to explain why this unfortunate situation has arisen in Canada. Perhaps one of the reasons for this general fear and depression over the situation is that much of the expert information has been blown out of proportion. This information has come from specialists in the field of toxicology, which is the study of different poisons; from the area of clinical ecology, which is the study of the environment; and from many research workers who have accumulated vast amounts of information on this subject. This information should be used constructively so it could cast light on the subject.

I believe that those who are genuinely concerned about this situation should have confidence in the medical practitioners who advise them. Those concerned people should consult with these specialists and have an accurate diagnosis made. Not only do these people who have spent their life in this science understand physical ailments associated with various poisons, but they understand people's personalities and the cause of their depression. They have access to very sophisticated information. Rather than being worried and writing letters to editors, they should be sure that the diagnosis is accurate by having it verified by qualified people. I would suggest to them that they have confidence in their family doctor and consultants. They should rely on the support which is needed in these situations.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, we have been waiting a long time for the government to introduce a fair solution to the UFFI problem. It appears that we are still waiting.

Before I commence my remarks on this bill, I would like to reply to some of the statements made by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hudecki), who related a number of stories about his constituents not being affected by urea formaldehyde. He did not give us any stories about those who had been affected. It appears that he was attempting to have us believe that urea formaldehyde was good for us. I grew up on a farm many years ago when we used a lot of urea formaldehyde to treat grain. At that time we knew that the fumes from urea formaldehyde could make one ill.

At this point there seem to be two doctors in Canada who are willing to back the government's policy on urea formaldehyde. One of those doctors is the member for Hamilton West and the other is Dr. Newhouse, who is also from Hamilton. The hon. member for Hamilton West admitted that he is a Liberal politician and he very categorically stated that no politician should make medical statements under any circumstances. The government has been unwilling to retain the other doctor, Dr. Newhouse, who was willing to back the Liberal government's decision, in order to have his supposed expert opinion put on the record. Consequently, I suggest that we must question the credibility of the statements by the previous speaker.

While I have only a few examples, I note that there are a number of people who have taken a very deep interest in this particular problem and have staked their reputations as doctors to say that there is a problem with the use of urea formaldehyde as insulation. Some of these people include Dr. Albert Nantel from Laval University in Quebec City, and Dr. Kinlock, the city health officer in Vancouver. These doctors have been willing to put the facts in front of Canadians and state their belief that urea formaldehyde is a substance which can adversely affect people's health.

Over the years in Canada Canadians have come to depend on and, to some extent, trust the government to provide an environment where Canadians can make good use of the resources we have. Canadians have come to expect the government to make an effort to provide a standard of living which will enable us to meet our needs and enjoy the comforts of our society. For instance, we have learned that medicare should be and is available and is something that we expect the government to make available to us. It has been suggested recently that the government is gradually withdrawing from this field but most people still believe it is a responsibility of the government. We have also learned to trust the government to provide us with the kind of medical attention that will improve our health.

Therefore, it comes as a shock to have the government recommend an insulation, such as urea formaldehyde, which does anything but improve the state of our health. In this case, the government has created an environment which has made people ill instead of better.

Another expected function of the government has been to provide the opportunity for people to earn enough money to put food on the table. The government has not been very successful in this area either. We have 1.3 million unemployed, or a real unemployment level of almost two million. It is difficult to feed your family when you are unemployed, Mr. Speaker.

Heating a home in Canada is essential. This used to be a minor expense but during the last few years the government has turned it into a major expense, particularly for those people on low incomes or those who are unemployed.

This brings us to the subject of shelter. Canadians have come to consider housing as a right and something which they can expect to acquire during their life. Canadians take good care of their homes because they expect to have them for a lifetime.

The whole idea of Canadians owning their own homes is being undermined by the inability of the government to solve the housing problem. It is being undermined in other ways as well, because the interest rates which home owners are required to pay on mortgages have increased to the extent where many are having difficulty paying them. These people may be the same home owners who have urea formaldehyde within their walls and are trying to get rid of it.

The government has created by its policies a situation in which the rate of inflation is making it impossible for prospective home owners to buy houses. The cost of building has risen so high that many people who could have expected to own a home a number of years ago can no longer do so. Besides that, the costs of maintenance, heating and lighting have gone up to the point at which much more than 25 per cent or 30 per cent of a person's income is spent for shelter, which is not acceptable.

Through the years, people who have bought houses have planned to take care of them, to pay for them, to make them their own. We, as legislators, were sent here to help them do that. Instead, by recommending urea formaldehyde foam insulation and then refusing to do anything about its removal, we are helping them to foul their nests so they can no longer live in them.

There was a time and, I suppose, the time is still here to some extent, when people trusted the government, but that trust in government has been eroded over the last number of years. That trust was built up over generations. If the government said that something could or should be done, we accepted that that was probably correct. After all, those in the House of Commons thought about it, and the final result was supposed to be acceptable to the people of Canada. This government has been tearing down that trust. The treatment of those people with urea formaldehyde foam insulation in their homes is just one more case of the government misleading and then mistreating people.

The problem involving urea formaldehyde foam insulation has gone through a number of phases which have led us to the position we are in today. We started out with an acceptance of the substance by the people of Canada because the government had recommended it and we trusted the government. We therefore decided that urea formaldehyde foam was a good insulator and would be used. Those of us in the country who used urea formaldehyde foam insulation were ignorant of the substance, although some people began to think that there was some reason for complaint. During the first phase there were just a few complaints. During the second phase there were a number of complaints and eventually there was a flood of complaints. However, these people faced a negative reaction from the government, from real estate people and, to some extent, even from the medical profession. People who were bothered by urea formaldehyde foam insulation went to the medical people and were told that it was probably just an irritation, but they went from one doctor to another and from one hospital to another.

By phase three, government agencies were receiving so many complaints that they thought it might be better to do something about it, or to look into the matter. So after being flooded with complaints for a fair length of time, they reacted by setting up technical evaluation facilities for the problem which measured the formaldehyde concentrations in the air and in the walls of houses insulated with the product. Whenever the air concentration was lower than .1 per cent, the home owners were told there was no reason that they should be sick. It did not matter that they were sick. Finally, during phase four, which is really a recent phase, it became quite clear that urea formaldehyde is harmful to health or does affect the health of a large proportion of people who have it in their buildings.

It was then necessary to ask the following questions: Is it possible to protect ourselves from urea formaldehyde foam insulation? What can be done to get rid of it? Can we neutralize it in any way? We have gone through all the possible questions which could be asked, without considering tearing down the buildings. But the final solution, as admitted by the minister and the government, is that the only way to get rid of urea formaldehyde foam insulation is to take it out. The cost of taking it out is the issue in this particular bill.

The discussion today of Bill C-109 is really part of an inquest procedure by which we are finding out how much it will cost to take this insulation out and how much it will cost to replace it with somethig else. Over the years, in the rush to reach energy self-sufficiency, the government made some grievous errors, and the promotion of urea formaldehyde foam insulation was one of them. This insulation was acceptable under the CHIP program and was given government authorization. Many people decided to use it.

What they have paid for in making that choice have been substantial health risks, not only the money they put into it. They received only a small rebate from the energy department of this government. They also paid for it in sharply reduced values for their dwellings. If they put them on the market now the chances are that they will be unable to sell them. They also paid for it in the long battle, which is not yet over, to try to make the government realize that it has a responsibility for putting and allowing unsafe products in the marketplace of Canada—in fact, not only allowing them, but pushing them, recommending them, suggesting them and paying people to use them.

Bill C-109 is therefore another bail-out bill for the government in a long series, the kind of bail-out in which the government opposite specializes. I am certain that the government sees this as a kind of response to the democratic process and an acceptance of the needs of the people. I see it, and the UFFI users see it, as a belated response to a national problem which was created by the government.

We now have the bill before us. First reading was given on April 27 and now, on July 27, we are in second reading stage. The government has not moved very quickly. It will blame that on the NDP. However, let us look at the story.

In December, the problem was major. When the bill was put before the House in April, it was a recognition that something had to be done. But what is going to be done? This bill sets a limit on the disbursement of funds until December 31, 1982. Therefore, the longer it takes the bill to pass, the shorter the time to make payments to those affected by UFFI contaminants. This is another ploy. This ploy has been placed in the bill to try and stampede UFFI victims into taking what the government will give now rather than what may be the evaluation after home owners have looked at the cost of removing it. Putting a limit on time short-circuits the input of many individual members of this House who have UFFI victims in their constituencies.

No one has done more than the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) to bring the problem of foam insulation to the attention of this House and the minister. I might note in passing that when the noted Canadian journalist, George Bain, was writing a book on UFFI, while in Ottawa he visited the hon. member for Comox-Powell River for first-hand information on the problem. We in this caucus have similar confidence in the hon. member. When he tells us that a one-shot grant assistance which the government is proposing to pay UFFI victims is inadequate, we say to the minister: "Show us why and how he is wrong." Is it inadequate or is it not?

The minister may say, and I have heard him say, that victims of UFFI want their money now. We say that members of the minister's own UFFI home owners' council are telling us and other people privately that the amount proposed is inadequate. The minister may say that there may be more money in the future, but from where and from whom? We suggest that once a bill is passed, there will be no further assistance. The government is trying to get the bill through, saying it will pay a maximum of $5,000 and then look around for other money; but the chances of getting it are very slim.

Bill C-109 does not terminate a vcitim's recourse to the courts, but it does give the public a fairly low evaluation of the worth of this kind of suffering. In return for exposing yourself to a health hazard and subjecting your house to the most extreme reconstruction problems, the government of Canada will pay you $5,000. This is a miserly amount.

My experience with government compensation has been somewhat similar. My most recent experience was compensation for the grain and oilseed producers of Canada for the damage they sustained as a result of our ill-conceived and economically catastrophic grains embargo on the Soviet Union. That embargo represented a substantial loss to farmers, particularly western grain farmers. The government said it would pay compensation, just like it says it will pay compensation to UFFI victims today.

The compensation was difficult to calculate, but the government said it would make a fair stab at it. The University of Saskatchewan, the Department of Agriculture and the Library of Parliament all did studies on the situation and came up with a substantial amount of money which represented the cost of the embargo to the farmers. When the studies were completed, there was a variation in the cost, from $81 million up to $150 million and more. In my view it was not enough, just as the $5,000 today is not enough. But that is not the point. The point was that the federal government said it had arrived at that figure with the benefit of a computer model and exhaustive calculations by departmental officials. They reached the $81 million figure, the low side of all the studies.

I asked for those calculations. I placed a question on the Order Paper asking for the relevant calculations. I am still waiting. So far the government has condescended to send me only one document which has anything to do with the problem. It is the same document which was distributed by the government to the press at a briefing when the embargo compensation was announced. I am still no wiser as to what calculations led the government to pay the Canadian farmers $81 million, half the amount it was suggested was required.

I can talk about other situations. The same problem was faced by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) in his dealings with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc). Despite the inquiries, the parliamentary questions, the pressure from the joint committee on statutory regulations, this government releases what it wants to release through a policy of evasion, delay and stonewalling, as it has done with this bill.

This bill establishes what the government says is a maximum level. How does the government justify a $5,000 grant? Do we have any studies, calculations or computer models that will enlighten us on how it reached the $5,000 figure? Will such evidence be tabled in the House? What we need is some kind of natural justice based on facts which can be backed up.

In this particular case, natural justice would be to give the home owner what it costs him to replace the urea formaldehyde foam that he installed at the behest of the government to begin with. I doubt very much whether there is natural justice in this bill or whether home owners will get it from the government, and neither does the hon. member for Comox-Powell River.

I think the UFFI home owner deserves better. UFFI home owners have been very active and co-operative in getting the government to listen to their plight. Of the 30,000 registered at UFFI centres after the program was announced on December 3, 15,000 returned completed forms. They played ball with the bureaucracy at every turn. They played ball with the government and with the bureaucracy put in place by the minister. Now it is the government's turn. Instead, what the government is saying is, "You can have $5,000; take it or leave it." We do not think $5,000 is enough.

I would like to read a small excerpt from the May-June, 1982 Alumni News as follows:

CCA says that all UFFI-affected home owners, including those who didn't insulate under the CHIP program, will be eligible. It is estimated that less than 5 per cent of all affected homes will require an amount as great as the $5,000 grants, but there will be houses where that figure will be exceeded.

Estimates made by reliable construction people in the city of Toronto are that the average cost of replacing urea formaldehyde in a home in Toronto would be approximately $22,000. We did not believe the department in December when the program first came out, and we do not believe it now. A friend of mine who insulated one floor with urea formaldehyde was required to pay something over $10,000 for material alone; he did the work. I think that is a fair estimation of the needs of the people who have to replace this insulation.

What does $5,000 mean to a person who has a problem? Some of the people who have problems are the 15,000 home owners who have registered, as well as the other 15,000 who have urea formaldehyde foam insulation but have not registered. To get that $5,000, a person must spend an average of $22,000. Before a person is eligible to get the $5,000 he must spend that amount. If a person does not have the money, what does he do? He goes out and mortgages his house. To get the $22,000, he must put a mortgage of $17,000 on his house. At present interest rates, $17,000 would cost approximately $260 a month just to pay the interest. The $5,000 grant would pay the interest on the mortgage for a year and a half but nothing off the principal. Two years down the road he is still paying for this $17,000 mortgage; the $5,000 is gone, and there is nothing to show for it except payments of $260 a month for the next 20 years.

But if a person has UFFI in his house, what mortgage company will give him a mortgage? A previous speaker told us what happened to a home owner in Vancouver. She could sell only her lot and had to bulldoze her house away. Consequently, she ended up only with the value of the lot.

I would like to make a couple of other points before I sit down. I do not think we should talk only about the position of the government. I think we should also recognize that the official opposition has not aided in solving this problem.

Mr. Lewis: Come off it.

Mr. Hovdebo: Members of the official opposition failed to put forward any concrete policy which had any effect on the mind of the government or the minister. They have refused to accept the kind of process which is necessary. They have not met with home owners to obtain the understanding they require. They have run away from the situation to the extent that they have not been of any help in reaching a solution to this problem.

Let us look at the bill. The bill has an income barrier. If a person does not have money, he will not be able to take advantage of the $5,000. The bill has a cut-off date which would disqualify as many people—

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Hon. members will know that I do not often rise on questions of privilege or even points of order, but the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) has just said that members of the Conservative Party have not met with people representing organizations who have banded together because of the fact that they have urea formaldehyde in their houses. I am sure the hon. member did not mean that. I have met with these people for many, many months. I know that many other members of the Conservative Party have also done that. I spent all last Sunday afternoon—two days ago—with representatives of groups in my city.

I am sure the hon. member got a little carried away but would not intentionally want to leave the impression that he really believes members of the Conservative Party have ignored this matter or have not been listening to constituents who have come to them, because that is just not the case.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the fact that urea formaldehyde home owners have visited many members of the Conservative Party. I did not intend to say that those members did not see them. What I mean is that after seeing them, members of the Conservative Party did not come forward with the kind of pressure which was necessary to change the mind of this government. I apologize if I left the impression the hon. member mentioned.

This bill has a cut-off date which would disqualify as many as 60,000 people from taking advantage of the program. The bill makes no provision for a long-term medical follow-up. Regardless of what the hon. member for Hamilton West says, most doctors in the country recognize the dangers and possible long-term effects of living in a home insulated with urea formaldehyde.

The bill requires that only one payment be made. There is no allowance for commitments in the future, regardless of the findings of the committee. These are real problems and they need real answers.

We in this party think the government can do a lot better in providing assistance to UFFI victims. That is why my colleagues and I are bringing to light the injustices contained in this bill. The government must deal with them as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak at this stage of the proceedings on this very important bill. I think we shall finally reach today that decisive moment we have all been looking forward to for so many months. If Bill C-109 is passed today on third reading, we shall be releasing total funds of $110 million for use by UFFI victims. I think that is the correct figure, and I am grateful to all the members of this House for their unanimous consent, so that UFFI victims will no longer be penalized. Mr. Speaker, I was impresssed with the speech of our Liberal member who discussed the scientific aspect of the matter, since he himself is an expert in the field, namely Dr. Hudecki. He clearly explained the scientific side and showed us how complex the problem really is. We were aware of the fact, but just the same, I want to appeal to all the members of this House to refrain from playing politics with this question, because it is an excessively complex issue and since it is a scientific problem, we have had to obtain technical data and we have had consultations with various groups. Obviously, before establishing a policy worth $110 million, as a responsible government we had to proceed with a serious analysis, including samples taken from numerous homes, not necessarily in order to reach a final decision but at least to finish the debate in Parliament and enable the people who need assistance to benefit from the $5,000 government grants earmarked for UFFI victims.

With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I shall go over the past history of this product which has aroused considerable concern here in Canada. However, I shall not go beyond the historical confines of the problem, unlike the member who spoke before me, the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), who tied this question in with the unemployment situation and interest rates, blaming the government for all our ills. Instead, during the time I have been allotted I shall go over exactly what has happened since the official announcement under the Canadian Home Insulation Program.

What happened to the program? The CHIP program was announced in 1977 and its purpose was to improve insulation in Canadian homes. I may refer the member for Prince Albert, who was talking about housing conditions in Canada, to the results of several surveys that were published. In fact, regarding satisfaction of Canadians with the quality of housing in Canada, as measured by a survey that was held about two years ago, I previously mentioned this item in the House, when I said that nearly 85 per cent of Canadians were satisfied with housing conditions in Canada. I think it is hard to find countries where the rate of satisfaction with the quality of housing is as high as that. Then, in 1977, as we all know, the Canadian government announced a special Canadian home insulation program, aimed at cutting down on oil consumption, at a time when prices were rising fast. It is clear now that five years ago, the government was being extremely provident, because we know how much home heating oil costs now. At that time, the government set up a home insulation program.

Specifications were set by the Canadian General Standards Board, and some 100 products were suggested or recommended by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for use as insulation. The 100 products suggested or recommended included urea formaldehyde foam. What is the Canadian General Standards Board? Is it a purely governmental organization? Is it a private organization? Not at all! I think that for the benefit of hon. members and the public, I should explain what the Canadian General Standards Board is. It is a committee on which consumers are represented. It also includes members of private industry and representatives of provincial governments. It is a committee that includes, as I have just said, the private sector, various professions and members of the Canadian government. It was this specifications committee which recommended or suggested some 100 products for use as home insulation. It did not say that one particular product was the ideal solution, so that the consumer was given a choice.

The specifications for urea formaldehyde foam were approved by the Standards Council of Canada, and information was published on possible uses of this product. That was in 1977. In 1979, two complaints were registered following possible harm caused by urea formaldehyde. By September of 1980, 100 complaints had been registered. From then on, the government would be taking various steps to protect the consumer. After the 100 complaints in September, 1980, in December of the same year, the Department of National Health and Welfare conducted an investigation into the possible hazards of this product. So at that time, there was some reason for concern, and we proceeded to determine what hazards were involved. The Department of National Health and Welfare took action. That was in December 1980. A report was published, and the product was put on the list of hazardous products. Under the Hazardous Products Act, the product was banned for commercial use. Here again, we see that the government acted very responsibly. However, when the product was put on the list of hazardous products, the private sector appealed the decision in order to be able to go on selling the product. At this point, we may well ask, who was going to pay the legal costs of consumers in the courts? It was, in fact, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which paid the legal costs under the Hazardous Products Act, and the product remains banned. Mr. Speaker, these are just a few historical data which I have recalled to determine whether, as some members of the opposition, and especially the New Democratic Party members, are saying, the government shirked its responsibilities with respect to the use of this product.

So what happened next? There were all kinds of reports and it seems that the use of this product, the manner in which the product was installed, created certain problems. However, not all home owners who used the product are now suffering ill effects as a result. During the debate on second reading of Bill C-109 to provide for payments in respect of dwellings, the member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was, I believe, the spokesman for the official opposition on the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and as reported in Hansard of May 31, at page 17917, he himself used the product and did not have any problems. I shall quote what the member for St. John's East said during the proceedings on second reading:

—I believe the government also has a very serious obligation to tell the House exactly what it feels is its responsibility to those who do not have health problems as a consequence of urea formaldehyde foam insulation, and I am one of them. There is no problem in my home. I do not live there all year round. It is in my constituency, but I have no problem there. Indeed, the insulation has worked very well. It has served me very well, but if I were attempting to sell my home, I would have to state that it has urea formaldehyde foam insulation because that is now a regulation of most real estate companies in the country.

That is another aspect. But then we can both accept the fact that there are home owners who have suffered ill effects and also that we cannot ban the product outright and say that it was 100 per cent harmful. We are aware that there were victims and there still are. If the product was properly installed, according to the specifications, those people or those home owners have solved their insulation problems, and I think the member for St. John's East probably reflects the circumstances of the vast majority of home owners who insulated their homes with this product. But, Mr. Speaker, that does not solve the problem of other Canadians who have been practically enticed to use that product. The New Democratic Party may very well claim that the amount of $110 million is not enough, but then again perhaps $500 million would not be enough either, so in its wisdom the government has to keep in mind the fact that the money comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers and that it must then be redistributed once we are sure that those grants are relatively proportional to the moral responsibility of the government. I will come back to that aspect in a moment.

Of course, some people will echo the New Democratic Party and say that it just is not enough. The fact remains, however, that not one of 30 countries in the rest of the world has agreed to grant $110 million to people who have used this product. Not a single country has agreed to do that, only Canada's Liberal government has accepted that moral obligation because it is aware of the significance of this issue for the victims. Mr. Speaker, I could talk for another hour about cases which I have heard about in my riding from people who came to see me in my office. I have files, including this one whose importance cannot be denied because it is one inch thick, nothing but letters to and from Mr. Guy Chevalier of Sainte-Dorothée who has given me permission to mention his name. This goes to show to what extent members have received representations from people who have been victimized by this product. I think that all members fully grasp the significance of this problem which has made headlines week in and week out, sometimes as a result of publicity, sometimes because of changes in temperature and humidity. But it is a fact that the issue has evolved considerably and we are still unable to say what is the exact cause of this problem and what is the ideal solution. I am sure we all want to help the people who have used this insulation and I think that all members are now fully aware of the situation.

I want to single out and commend all the organizations that have made representations, either to their Member of Parliament or to the minister concerned, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. (Mr. Ouellet). Setting all political considerations aside, I think each one of us ought to make an objective effort to solve this problem which takes a new dimension practically every day. We have physicians in the House as well as on the Health, Welfare and Social Affairs Committee, not to mention engineers and representatives of all disciplines and professions, even lawyers. I do believe we should forget the political aspect and work honestly and objectively with a view to finding an acceptable solution to the problem. Earlier I extended my congratulations to the Federation of the committees of victims of Quebec. I had an opportunity to meet with that group and so did all other members from Quebec. Those people asked us to give them some information about the situation. As a result of that meeting, we were asked to declare the problem of urea formaldehyde "a national emergency situation." Mr. Speaker, I suggest that nobody would hesitate to call that situation a national emergency problem because we have no idea of the extent of the damage. In my riding, the association did urge, and I quote their text word for word:

We urge our Members of Parliament Marcel Roy and Yves Demers as well as the hon. Jeanne Sauvé to bring pressure to bear upon Mr. Ouellet so that he will declare UFFI-insulated houses a "national disaster".

With respect to the first item in the claims of Laval UFFI victims committee, it was agreed, and the minister himself referred to this in the health, welfare and social affairs committee, that we could declare the situation of UFFI-insulated houses a national disaster. Speaking of national disaster, I think it is appropriate to recall that Laval was heavily damaged by floods in the past. In various regions of Canada, people took action under the existing national disaster legislation to estimate the damages, and the provinces shared on a per capita basis with the Canadian government the cost of the damages paid to the victims. Since I have been a Member of Parliament, I believe that legislation was used two or three times by some provinces. We agreed with the first item of their claims that it is a national disaster and we urged them to make similar representations to the provincial members and their ministers because the Canadian government, through the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, did agree to call it a national disaster. I have asked the Laval members of the Parti Québécois to agree as we did that the situation of UFFI-insulated houses be considered as a national disaster. I trust that the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), whom I see over there, will also be able to support the claim put forward by the members of the Quebec federation of committees of UFFI victims, to the effect, that the situation be considered a national disaster; therefore, under the existing legislation, the provinces will contribute on the basis of their population to the amount paid the victims. That was accepted. The second claim was taken from a brief presented to me on June 15.

We require our MPs to vote against the bill unless its regulations are changed.

Well, after several discussions, we did not want to play into the hands of the NDPs, and organize a filibuster talking about unemployment, talking about interest rates and housing conditions, when in fact we should be deciding whether, today or three months from now, we should grant $110 million worth of assistance to UFFI victims.

For our part, this is what we said: "You can oppose this bill if you want to, but you will not have a penny from the Treasury Board before fall when the session is adjourned, while $110 million would be available under this legislation, which would mean $5,000 per housing unit." The minister has stressed several times the flexibility of Bill C-109, saying that the terms of financial assistance will be prescribed by regulation rather than by legislation. You are asked to support this legislation, and then we shall see whether the provinces are willing to co-operate since the minister has stated that the situation may be viewed as a national disaster.

After that meeting, Mr. Speaker—and this shows how objective the committee has been—the following was published in the Contact Laval newspaper on June 30:

UFFI victims satisfied with their meeting with federal MPs.

While no formal commitment was made by the three federal Members of Parliament for Laval, the Laval committee of UFFI victims has said that it is fully satisfied with the results of the meeting it had with its federal representatives last Sunday to look into the situation. The meeting lasted over three hours and followed the sit-in in the office of the Member for Duvernay, Yves Demers. The Laval committee stated that the three Members of Parliament had sympathized with the predicament of its members and that positive results could be expected in the near future in response to the representations made by the Federation of Victims to the minister concerned, the hon. André Ouellet.

"I believe that some progress has been made because of this meeting," stated Mrs. Emilie Morais-Deschênes, who was expressing the views of the committee.

Many questions were discussed during the meeting, including the matter of the bill which Mr. Ouellet plans to introduce in the House of Commons and of the program to decontaminate UFFI-insulated houses.

According to Mrs. Morais-Deschênes, the Laval members of Parliament agreed to ask Mr. Ouellet for amendments to his bill and were interested by the request of the victims to have UFFI-insulated houses declared a national disaster.

The hon. members will note how often this request comes up and how much the federation of UFFI victims insists on having UFFI-insulated houses declared a national disaster. I continue with the article:

"The meeting has had positive results for both sides and I believe that we can look to the future somewhat more optimistically," concluded Mrs. Morais-Deschênes.

All this shows that no one has taken the limelight on this issue. I believe that all members of this House have met their responsibilities and received representations from their constituents, and I think this is one of the reasons why the minister has agreed to make many amendments to his regulations concerning the taking of samples, the amount of $5,000, the clean-up of houses and the possibility of removing the insulation from between the walls of these houses. I believe that the minister has been very flexible because, once again, this is a new problem, a new rapidly changing situation, and our efforts must be sustained because how are we to know what the harmful effects will be in six months. I believe that the government has shown great caution, but before declaring a national disaster, we would need the support of the provinces. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, when appearing before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, made a presentation in which he stated:

As promised when I appeared before your committee on Tuesday, May 11, 1982, you will find enclosed copies of the telex messages which I sent on December 9, 1981, to my provincial counterparts concerning the Urea Formaldehyde Foam Insulation Victims' Assistance Program.

• (1710)

The message dated May 20 was a telex addressed to all the provincial ministers responsible for housing and consumer protection. The particular telex Addressed to Quebec Minister of Housing and Consumer Protection Guy Tardif, referred to a meeting that had taken place in September in Quebec City; through this telex, the content of which I will spare you, the Minister was seeking the provinces' co-operation. When asked whether he had received replies, the minister said that unfortunately he had received none at all. I therefore urge all hon. members of the House, because there are not so many provinces with Liberal governments in Canada, to prevail upon the governments that have the same political philosophy or affiliation as their own to declare a state of national disaster and provide the victims with a certain amount of money to which the $5,000 may be added. The idea would be to co-operate fully, and not to blame the government for this or that. I suggest that the government was responsible in its decisions. And in connection with provincial co-operation I should like to refer to the case of the City of Laval. I quote:

UFFI: Laval offering home-owners a 20 per cent reduction of their assessment.

This is an article that appeared in the Le Devoir on March 30, 1982.

The City of Laval feels that UFFI houses on its territory have lost an average of one-fifth of their commercial value. Le Devoir heard yesterday that 408 houses have been fully reviewed and that their respective owners should receive a new assessment within the next few days.

According to our information, the ratepayer would be left with three possible choices:

If he agrees with the reduction proposed by the city, he would have ten days to let them know. The Laval Assessment Service would then advise the Quebec Land Assessment Review Board (BREF) of the change;

If he feels entitled to further reduction, he should turn down the City's proposal and make personally an application to the BREF before May 1. In this case, he would have to contend with the City's Assessment Service which would defend its new assessment;

And, finally, if the owner preferred to keep his previous assessment which did not take into account the presence of UFFI, he would need only to turn down the city's offer.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a very good illustration of the whole issue. The City of Laval, the second largest city in the province of Quebec, is willing to co-operate with us on this program. How is it that the provincial government chose to ignore the telex the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs had sent on December 9? This is the problem we shall have to solve together. Although I do not intend to pursue this point any further, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention that the department has provided more than $120,000 to several organizations, so that they may keep the government up-to-date on further developments and advise it on the most scientific and practical ways to help these victims, either through National Research Council Canada, the Department of National Health and Welfare, or the recently formed advisory committee to the government, so that no unproperly researched decision may cause further harm. This is why, Mr. Speaker, as a member of this House who has lived through these problems together with other UFFI victims in his own region and who is aware of their impact on them, I feel I am entitled to rejoice at the prospect that relief measures are on their way. I saw crumbling brick walls, houses which were considerably damaged and I agree that in some cases $5,000 is not enough.

I think that the legislation will be passed today for the benefit of all victims and I am pleased that an order of reference to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs has been made by the House. I mentioned that the minister who provided under Bill C-109 some $110 million for the victims of UFFI was flexible and that we would not proceed under the legislation but rather through regulation. Once again to reflect that flexibility, the government has decided and this in response to the member for Prince Albert who suggested that once the bill was passed everything would be over, to make an order of reference and I quote:

That the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be empowered to consider urea formaldehyde foam insulation including:

And the first point is as follows:

1. The process used to approve the material for use in Canadian homes;

2. The question raised on the health effects and the nature of the research being conducted or contemplated on these questions;

3. The questions raised on remedial action and the nature of the research being conducted or considered;

4. The question of the number of homes affected, specifically attempting to identify the reasons for the discrepancy between the number of homes estimated and the number registered;

5. The question of use of the foam in schools, public buildings and rental accommodation and recommendations on possible courses of action where remedial action is required;

6. The identification of home owner groups with special needs and recommendations on how these special needs could be met;

7. The report of the Hazardous Products Board of Review on the aforementioned matters.

I specifically mentioned that committee in my preliminary comments.

8. Any changes or additions to the regulations deemed advisable with regard to the aforementioned matters.

That the committee be instructed to report on the aforementioned matters no later than December 1, 1982;

Mr. Speaker, I have the duty and honour to chair that committee. I have already got in touch with a spokesman for each opposition party in order to hold a first meeting next Thursday to be followed on Tuesday next by a meeting of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization which will be asked to draw up a specific schedule and call up witnesses as soon as possible so that we may notify those wishing to submit a brief to the committee and give them enough time for research. We shall have to sit all through the summer if we want to be ready to table the report on December 1 as requested by the government under the above-mentioned order of reference.

I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that scientific research will be necessary because it is important for the victims of those conditions to be well informed. We will of course ask the provinces for their co-operation and as I said before, by calling the situation a national disaster we hope to get their co-operation thus following the example of the city of Laval assessing its property owners. It is in that context that I will chair the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs which has been empowered today to investigate urea formaldehyde in Canada.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak on Bill C-109. At the outset I would like to express my thanks and appreciation to my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), who has been our party critic on this issue. The hon. member for Comox-Powell River has taken a fair amount of flak on this question because he has insisted upon the best possible deal for UFFI home owners. In spite of the combined pressure from the Liberal and Conservative Parties to rush the bill through as though this were some kind of gift package they were placing under the Christmas tree to surprise people, the hon. member has kept insisting that the people will be surprised, because when they open the package they will find there is nothing there for them. As a matter of fact, the pressure to have the money spent by December 31, 1982, means that by this coming Christmas many UFFI home owners will be sadly disappointed about any hopes they had that this bill will meet their needs.

I believe that the bill coming in at this time emphasizes the slowness of the government in responding to the situation and its slowness in accepting its responsibility. We remember that this program was actively encouraged and promoted by the government. However, when problems arose with this program the government ran for cover and hid. It has been very slow in accepting its responsibility. When it did accept its responsibility it did so in a very halting and inadequate manner.

Perhaps one of the major concerns is that the maximum $5,000, as it was orignally termed, is completely inadequate when one considers that the cost of removal of urea formaldehyde in most urban areas is estimated to be between four and five times that much.

Perhaps the situation faced by UFFI home owners can best be illustrated by reading a letter from a widow who signed herself as "a very disturbed citizen". She sent this letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and I think it outlines better than I or other members can the real situation facing many UFFI home owners. Many find themselves in a similar position. The letter states:

Dear Sir:

Re: Urea Formaldehyde Foam Insulation

As one of many home owners who was encouraged by way of advertising and government grants to upgrade the insulation of my home and being concerned with energy conservation I now find myself in very serious circumstances for having proceeded.

First, I had the attic insulated, then proceeded to check out what type to use in the walls.

Some of the loose fills were reported to settle greatly, were not moisture resistant, did not fill all crevices and would deteriorate if becoming damp.

Foam insulation on the other hand, was supposedly easier to install, more economical and because it was inserted when moist, would fill all cracks and crevices.

However, the polyurethane foam was reported to expand after insertion, thus warping or bulging the walls. A company (Rapco Foam) was highly recommended by Mr. Dalgleish of Winnipeg when guesting on a local radio program.

I contacted the company to check out their insulation. I was told:

It would not settle or expand;

It resisted moisture;

It would enhance the comfort and value of my home;

Its R Value (3½ inches inserted in the wall cavity would increase that of my house by 18.12;

It was chemically stable, and

It was government tested and approved (CHMC approved *SAç8209).

I still have the famous brochures on hand.

The wall insulation was completed April 20, 1978 at a cost of $652. Apparently the most costly $652 I have ever spent! Now I find:

The insulation has toxic effects which can result in severe medical problems.

My house has depreciated 30-40 per cent of its otherwise market value.

It would be most difficult to sell (if a buyer could be found) because real estate and mortgage companies are just not interested!

For those who are financially able to remedy the problem, there is still no guarantee the house will ever return to its previous market value; real estate companies are now asking "does this house have, or has it ever had UFFI?"

A medical doctor has advised that I don't inform the neighbours UFFI is in my house.

If the hazards to the people living in the house are as minimal as government is trying to say, why would it be of concern to neighbours?

She then gives something of her life history, which I think is interesting and relevant in view of the background of many of the people who are suffering because they accepted this government program:

Married in 1949, we had our first child in 1950. In July of 1951 my husband became ill and remained so, passing away in 1965.

It is now 31 years since I became the family supporter. During these years I worked a full-time job, at times a second part-time job, as well as caring for my two children, paying child care for 11½ years (no grandparents, or uncles to lend a hand) and put a down payment on a house.

We never owned a car after 1952—my children and a house were my first priorities. They had music, skating and swimming lessons, both completed grade XII and had further education. Thus they never had time on their hands to become problems to the community. Believe me on a salary of $125 per month in 1951 to $463 per month in 1970, it did not come without strict budgeting and much sacrificing.

As a result of an automobile accident (being a passenger in a car that was hit), since the end of 1970 I have been on a medical disability of under $278 a month (private insurance) and not subject to increase. However I rent a suite to supplement my income, for mortgage, utilities, taxes, repairs and general upkeep. Without the rental income, I could never afford to keep the house.

In August, 1980, I paid off the mortgage—the accomplishment of a lifetime! The increased market value seemed a Godsend; compensation for the previous sacrifice. I was assured of security until I became a senior citizen in 1988, and even after. I could hardly believe it was mine and I had finally accomplished my objective.

I have never applied for any assistance such as UIC or welfare, nor did I have a grant for the insulation. It is absolutely contrary to my upbringing, however, as a result of having my house insulated, and in view of my personal circumstances, I am asking now:

1. The federal government is offering up to $5,000 if the house test indicates gas over .1 PPM and if you can prove medical problems therefrom.

I had skin irritation, kidney (edema) and respiratory conditions previously—the symptoms with thyroid and arthritis are interrelated, thus I cannot prove the UFFI has caused them; however, having had a very bad winter, who is to say it has not greatly increased or aggravated my problems. But, on the surface it would appear I would not qualify for even a portion of the grant.

● (1730)

2. It has been suggested that people with medical problems move. Where to? How can I rent, plus live on $278 a month, and plus my rental income?

3. If I stay in the house, and continue to rent the suite, could I be held responsible if a tenant should have medical problems?

4. I understand estimates to completely remove the UFFI treatment of the 2 *SA& 4d, and restore the walls, perhaps change electrical wiring and boxes if they have been affected, range from $14,000 - 25,000.

I do not have the money for this, nor would I be able to obtain a loan at my income level.

5. It has been well publicized that the Research Council advised against the use of UFFI—then why would the representatives of the people approve its use; and having done so, not accept full responsibility for the results?

6. Once approved federally, companies have to be licensed and/or approved provincially and municipally; then why are the people not protected from false advertising and misrepresentation?

A Rapco Foam brochure given to me in April, 1978 indicates an R Value of 4.35 per inch in summer; 4.80 in winter, "stays dry", "repells moisture;" another indicates its chemically stable and another indicates an R Value of 18.12 (foam only) in a 3½ inch wall cavity.

However, an Energy, Mines and Resources booklet, dated August, 1976 "Keeping The Heat In" contradicts most of the information still being advertised in 1978. The foam had then been derrated by 40% to account for shrinkage; the R Value being 2.5 per inch and, "But may only be applied to walls with no insulation whatsoever".

Rapco was aware my house had some fiber glass insulation.

7. As a bonus, my bathtub was insulated! Recently, I learned UFFI contains corrosive substances, attacks mortar and metal and promotes wood rot. Is my bathtub being corroded? Are the two *SA& fours and joists with wood rot?

8. There is also a question of the toxic effects on NA/SO *in3' recommended for treating wood cavities. The sodium herein could be harmful to edema patients.

I know of one man who said he would never use this on his house as it would be as dangerous as UFFI.

How can any level of government which has approved and/or licensed use of such material and allowed advertising which has been contradicted in 1976 to be distributed in 1978, not be liable to those of us who felt responsible enough to respond to conservation pressures being requested by our government, federally and provincially? How can a $5,000 grant, at most, compensate for 30 years of struggling and erasing the future security of the citizens who respond to the needs of the country? My home was the only asset of real value I've been able to acquire in my lifetime. I await your response as to the amount of assistance your level of government or party would assume in this regard:

—financially, to restore our property to proper market value; obviously $5,000 is completely inadequate.

—Are you prepared to support these home owners in obtaining justice where it is due? Or would you preferably overlook the situation because it happened to someone else?

As children, our parents raised us to be honest, independent and compassionate, to respect the rights of others, respect the law, police, and our country (my only brother was killed overseas in the RCAF, I served in the CWAC). In turn I try to teach my children similarly.

But the many changes in our country in the last few years frighten me; perhaps it is time to realize our greatest fear is the justice, or lack of it, from within.

That letter was signed, "A very disturbed citizen". In it, the widow asked what the different parties were prepared to do on behalf of the UFFI home owners. I am pleased that the critic for our party did not cave in and want to rush this matter through when the provisions are completely inadequate. The position of the Conservative Party, however, falls far short of what is required. It is outlined in a memo distributed by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott). It begins by describing the remedial relief to home owners with UFFI as "woefully inadequate". That is very true. "Woefully inadequate" means that it is inadequate to the point of being filled with woe for the people who are supposed to benefit from it. The Conservative Party realizes this, yet continues to support it. It is filled with woe for the people who are supposed to be benefiting from it because there is nothing in it for a great many of them. Realizing that it was woefully inadequate but that there were possibly some PR advantages, the Conservative Party agreed to give it speedy passage and minimal opposition.

The Conservatives have attacked the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) for trying to hold up the bill and get a decent deal on the matter. In return for giving speedy passage—and every sweetheart deal has two sides—the Conservatives said that they wanted the government to table the regulations which will administer the program. That is very well and good. Second, they requested that a special subcommittee of Parliament be struck immediately after Bill C-109 was passed. My understanding is that the New Democrats had already won that concession, and then the Tories added an amendment which only further explains the concession that the committee be empowered to recommend amendments to Bill C-109 and its regulations and that expert testimony be heard into the whole subject matter of UFFI.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands will permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. Manly: I would be very happy to attempt to answer a question at the end of my speech, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I think he should allow a question at this point.

Mr. Manly: Very well, then. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, I will attempt to answer it now.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member rose in the House to make a speech about the bill. Instead, I have heard nothing but complaints about so-called alleged positions taken by the Progressive Conservative Party. The complaint seems to be that, somehow or other, the Conservative Party is not opposed enough to the substance of this bill or the limitations in it. I must ask the hon. member why, then, if the hon. member is complaining about us having said that we would let this matter get through, did his party unanimously agree yesterday to finish this bill in all three stages tonight? I just do not understand where the hon. member is coming from.

Mr. Manly: The facts are very clear. The Tories have tried to push this legislation through for the last three or four weeks. The hon. member for Comox-Powell River has received a great deal of criticism because he kept insisting that this bill had serious inadequacies and that he was right, and we are still right. We are trying to point out some of the inadequacies of the bill and the fallacies of the Tory opposition.

Mr. Fraser: You agreed to finish the bill off tonight. Now, you cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Manly: If I could just continue with some of my comments, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that all three of these things that the Tories say they won as concessions are all very well, but they give absolutely nothing to the UFFI home owners.

• (1740)

UFFI home owners have been very concerned about this bill. It appears to promise something, but in fact gives them nothing. One of the major problems of the bill is that there is an income bias. The $5,000 will be paid after the UFFI is removed.

As I mentioned already, the cost of removal will be four or five times greater than that. In homes in urban areas across Canada, it is estimated that the cost of the UFFI removal will be between $22,000 and $25,000. This means a great many low and middle-income people will not be able to have the insulation removed from their homes. Therefore, they will not qualify for the program. There is no help for those who need it the most.

Another concern is that more and more evidence is accumulating that UFFI creates long-term problems but that this is a short-term program. The moneys have to be spent by December 31, 1982. The idea of an ongoing committee is fine. It is said to be open ended and flexible, but there is no commitment. Our party would like to see some commitment in addition to flexibility.

I would like to place on record some questions from the president of the British Columbia UFFI home owner's action group, Penny Tilby. She is one of the members who met with the minister over the weekend. They ask that there be further government confirmation of some matters raised where there is diffusion, confusion, contradiction or mistrust. There is a great deal of that.

The minister agreed with the objective of UFFI home owners to hold compensation for removal of UFFI. He agreed to approach companies, provinces and other federal departments for additional assistance. In order to show proof of his sincerity, will the minister amend the regulations now to state that the $5,000 is the minimum and not the maximum? We would like some confirmation that what he said yesterday was not simply a slip of the tongue as it is recorded in Hansard but that it represents a real change in policy.

Second, the minister originally agreed with home owners that Part I formaldehyde gas or proven health problems is not a fair criterion for assistance to UFFI victims. The National Research Council states that there should be removal from all groups as a minimum. After agreeing, the minister went back on his agreement, has not done anything to back up his commitment, and did not change Draft 13. Will he maintain good faith with the advisory council and remove this criterion as he promised?

Third, the minister promised there would be help from other government resources to add to the UFFI assistance program. Will the minister back his personal commitment? For example, will CMHC come to the aid of these people? Will there be help from the Canadian Home Improvement Program to top up the $5,000?

The minister said he would study the question of income bias. Home owners feel that simply to look into this question is not good enough. Will the minister make a commitment now to ensure universal access to the $5,000 assistance so that lower-income Canadians will not be excluded? Will he (a) guarantee contracts for persons who cannot advance $5,000, or (b) will he give the low-income person an interim loan of $5,000?

There are some 1,300 members of the UFFI action group in B.C. On an initial questionnaire, some 10 per cent of the people have replied, and more replies are coming in every day. Of the 10 per cent who replied, 10 per cent said they would be able to scrape up or somehow raise the $5,000 in order to have this money up front, and 71 per cent said they would not be able to. We are talking about a bill that at present will not meet the needs of 71 per cent of those it is supposed to help.

The Manitoba home owners said that 50 per cent of their home owners were on a fixed pension or low income. These people cannot afford this kind of help. It is absolutely essential that the minister make a commitment that he will remove income bias from this $5,000 grant. It is not good enough that he look into the problem. We would like a definite commitment.

Fifth, with regard to the establishment of a committee on health and welfare to continue to study and recommend, the home owners ask whether the minister and the government will guarantee to pay the future medical costs of any proven UFFI-related disease.

These are some of our concerns about this bill which we share with UFFI home owners. With these inadequacies in the bill, we cannot support it. We would like some real commitment on the part of the minister. It is important that there be help for these people. The government has come forward with a package that looks good. It is a package that they can put under the tree. The Tories want to help. We say there is nothing in that package for 70 per cent of the people who need help from the UFFI program. I hope the government will listen to our concerns and take some positive action.

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, may I say first of all, that I am very happy to have the opportunity this afternoon of speaking to Bill C-109. I should also like to congratulate you on your appointment as Deputy Chairman of Committee of the Whole, and your colleague, the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) on his appointment as Assistant Deputy Chairman on this first day in your new duties respectively.

Mr. Speaker, after those few words of congratulations, I must say that I found the speech of the hon. member opposite rather surprising. I thought the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) quite appropriate with regard to some of the comments made by the representative of the NDP about the bill now before the House, when he pointed out that unanimous consent was given by the House to pass the bill at all stages and refer it to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. Moreover, when my hon. colleague for Laval (Mr. Roy) spoke after our colleague of the NDP, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), saying that after that stage, study of the bill would be completed, to my mind the order of reference passed yesterday by the House, that is on July 26, as reported on page 19701 of Hansard, should have been referred to in order to ascertain what would happen to the bill. All that leads me to point out to the House that the bill having been introduced in April, 1982, I wonder why my colleagues of the New Democratic Party should now claim that we want to rush this bill through, that it is not complete, and that it should be discussed further. I wonder about it all the more that when on July 7, I personally proposed a motion, under Standing Order 43, suggesting that the House consider passing the bill through all stages, they refused unanimous consent, thus rejecting the motion as reported on pages 19084-5 of Hansard. Some of the comments made by the Progressive Conservative House leader dealt with the situation of the committee empowered to deal with certain aspects of the matter as a result of passage of the motion yesterday.

This motion was rejected by the New Democratic Party. The same thing occurred on July 8 when I introduced another motion under Standing Order 43 to have the bill go through all stages. A surprising development took place on that same day when the New Democratic Party also introduced a motion under Standing Order 43. They were really on the defensive concerning this bill, I imagine in view of the comments which had been made and the fact that certain English newspapers had even said that they were responsible for delaying this bill. However today when they take this kind of holier-than-thou attitude, we should point out to them that had they agreed at the time, they would have had more time to discuss this bill in the House and they could have shown more foresight as concerns this bill since we are about to adjourn.

I am therefore very glad that we are going through all the stages of Bill C-109 this evening and having the vote at 9.45 since I introduced motions under Standing Order 43 on July 7 and 8, and put some questions to the Minister on February 2 about the UFFI situation, and I also questioned the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) last week, on July 20, about the Lamoureux report. The Minister replied that the report, which will be in a more complete form at a later date because of the illness of one of the Board's members, maintained the ban on the use of UFFI.

Mr. Speaker, UFFI victims will certainly be very happy to learn that the bill will finally be passed this evening following their meetings with members on this side of the House and in most Quebec constituencies; later on these members met with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to make representations and recommendations. I would like to give the background of what has happened ever since the Canadian people and afterwards Parliament were made aware of this situation. Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, on December 23, 1981, the federal Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, announced a federal assistance program for Canadians who had their houses insulated with urea formaldehyde foam. This material was banned in Canada in December 1980 when it was discovered that it could cause health problems. What was important at that time was that the program included free tests, technical advice and nontaxable financial assistance—I believe that this is very important—up to an amount of $5,000 to pay for the work to correct the problem.

The federal government therefore made this announcement on December 23, 1981. While I am explaining what followed to the Canadian people, and especially to Quebecers in my constituency of Lotbinière, I would like to point out that, because of the flexibility and understanding shown by the government in response to the representations made by Members of Parliament, especially those of the Quebec caucus, following their meetings with associations of UFFI victims, changes will be made to the regulations. That is why in my speech this afternoon, and later this evening—because I shall not be able to conclude my speech now in view of the time allotted to me—I would like to tell the House about the changes that will be made in the regulations, because it is mostly through them that the situation will be corrected. In December 1981, the national testing program of 2,400 houses in Canada showed that in nearly 9 out of 10 houses insulated with UFFI, the average level of formaldehyde gas was lower than the acceptable level of 0.1 part per million.

The Department of National Health and Welfare had then decided that a level of 0.1 was acceptable in homes, and it has stood by its decision. What was said in December 1981 was that if this test carried out at the request of the home owner showed a level of formaldehyde gas higher than 0.1 parts per million or if the home owner stated that a lower level was causing medical problems, a certified laboratory would make a complete test of the house. This second test included the analysis of air samples in the house itself and inside the walls and a humidity check inside the walls as well. The government paid for the tests which cost between $400 and $500, except that the home owners would have to pay $100 themselves, which amount would, however, be reimbursed under the government financial assistance program. That was in December 1981.

At that time, the Canadian government was therefore offering to home owners a non-taxable grant of up to $5,000, as I mentioned earlier. As for those whose houses, while insulated with UFFI, showed a level of formaldehyde gas lower than 0.1 parts per million, they also received financial assistance and technical advice if they could prove that a lower level was harmful to their health. The Department of National Health and Welfare was convinced that relatively few people would be affected by levels lower than 0.1 parts per million. This was therefore the situation when the Canadian government made its announcement on December 23. Let us now take a look at the technical aspects of the federal assistance program. I would like to do so before six o'clock to show the Canadian people what changes we have asked the Canadian government to make.

First, there was a universal free test. On request, home owners were to receive a dosimeter to test the level of formaldehyde gas. Second, a complete test was subsidized. If the level of gas shown by the free test was higher than 0.1, a second complete test was to be made. The government paid most of the cost of this test and the home owner's share was $100, which amount would however be reimbursed later on. Third came technical advice. The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation gave home owners technical advice about corrective action to be taken, and the level of financial assistance provided by the government would be based on such advice. Fourth was the matter of financial assistance. Subsidies were paid in cases where the level of formaldehyde gas was higher than 0.1 or when the home owner could produce medical evidence showing health problems related to UFFI at levels lower than 0.1. The amount of the assistance offered was $5,000. The UFFI Centre authorized certain contractors, testing companies and laboratories to carry out the work. Seven, Mr. Speaker, after this corrective action, the government made technical and financial checks to ensure that the work had been thoroughly done and according to standards. This was a very important point, namely that the corrective action would actually be checked. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call it six o'clock. I can proceed at eight o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I assume that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) would like to proceed this evening at eight o'clock. The Chair will therefore recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière at eight o'clock or shortly afterwards.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the House rose at six o'clock, the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) had the floor.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We in the official opposition have been waiting patiently throughout this afternoon, expecting Bill C-109 to move quickly out of second reading stage and into—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is making an argument, hardly a point of order.

DISPOSITION OF BILL C-124

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I have had consultations with the House leaders, and I think I know what the hon. member wants. Perhaps he will be satisfied once I have disposed of the following.

[English]

At this time I would like to have unanimous consent to tell the House the result of those talks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the minister to make a statement at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: First of all, I wish to inform the House that notwithstanding consultations which took place among party representatives, we were unable to reach agreement under the provisions of Standing Order 75A or 75B in respect of the committee stage of Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada. I therefore wish to give notice that, at a future sitting of the House, I shall propose a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 75C, to allocate one additional sitting day to the said stage of the said bill.

Such notice being given, Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in a few moments as soon as the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois) has finished his comments, will be willing to allow consideration of the bill now before the House, namely Bill C-109, to proceed from the second reading stage to consideration in Committee of the Whole. If that is what was worrying my hon. colleague from Hamilton-Wentworth, I can give him and his colleagues the assurance that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will be available in Committee of the Whole in a few minutes, as soon as the member for Lotbinière has finished his remarks.

[English]

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I just want to raise one tiny point with regard to the notice of motion put forward by the government House leader. Having looked into the history of motions under Standing Order 75C, I believe this is the first time the House has ever voted to restrict hearings in committee.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. colleague will agree with me that by inadvertence he did not read the report of 1971 when a motion was made while the House was sitting in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the remarks of the government House leader, not with respect to the motion under Standing Order 75C and the notice thereon but with respect to the bill that is presently before the House, I must say that the Progressive Conservative Party has been ready for some time to deal with this matter at the committee stage. We are anxious to question the minister, as there are a lot of important matters that must be brought out at the committee stage. We regret very much—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, the minister has made a statement with the unanimous consent of the House. If there are further remarks relating to the statement the Chair is prepared to entertain them, and if not, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois).

UREA FORMALDEHYDE INSULATION ACT

PROVISION OF ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) that Bill C-109, to provide for payments to persons in respect of dwellings insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation, be read the second time and, in accordance with the provisions of the order made on Monday, July 26, 1982, be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, when the House took recess at six o'clock, I was dealing with the program announced on December 31, 1981, and mentioned its main points. Following representations made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard), I shall cut short my comments so that we may proceed to third reading since there seems to be an agreement to that effect.

Mr. Speaker, following the announcement made on December 23, 1981, I had the opportunity, along with a number of members, to meet a group from my riding actually called the ACEF of the Bois-Franc area. It was made up of UFFI victims, people from the Victoriaville and Bois-Franc areas, from the Richmond riding and part of the Frontenac riding who had insulated their homes with that foam. Representations were made to the effect that the federal and provincial governments should appropriate funds and provide immediate assistance to UFFI victims associations. We were told that the provincial government should provide human and technical resources as well as medical and legal assistance to UFFI victims. At the meeting held in my riding on January 25, and attended by other federal and provincial Members of Parliament, among others the provincial member for Richmond, Yvon Vallières, those representatives made all kinds of recommendations about urea formaldehyde. Of course, we were then in a position to refer to the program which had been announced in December as well as to the provincial program.

Needless to say those federal and provincial programs were well received, some criticisms were levelled, while some tried to absolve the provincial government from any responsibility. It was then pointed out that the committee which had approved UFFI included members from the Quebec Order of Architects and representatives of Quebec Industrial Research centres. We were also told that the federal government was mostly responsible. Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, following the representations that were made, I was asked as a lawyer whether it would be possible to take legal action and how to go about it. I told those people at the time: "Listen! If you want to sue the federal and provincial governments, go ahead! You ought to fight for your rights!" I think that it is a most legitimate right for them to fight for. They had mentioned the statute of limitation on all proceedings against the federal and provincial governments. They were wondering if the program we had announced on December 23, 1981, could jeopardize their right to take legal action against the Government of Canada and get more than the maximum $5,000 made available to them.

Needless to say, the ACEF people in my own riding, represented mainly by Mr. Richard Leroux, also a representative of the UFFI victims of central Quebec, who works for the ACEF in Victoriaville. We were asked those questions and later on, on February 2, 1982, I directed a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) in connection with this situation, and more specifically, as reported on page 14557 of Hansard for February 2, 1982, I asked the minister whether his discussions with the provinces and especially with Quebec, as well as with the industry were still going on and whether there was a statute of limitation. The minister then replied that his discussions with the provinces and the industry were going on but they were not bringing about the results he had hoped for any more than they are now.

It is unfortunate that in this respect, we have been unable to obtain—we had other communications, Mr. Speaker, but we obtained neither the participation of the provincial governments, nor that of the industry. An important aspect at this time is the statute of limitation; the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs confirmed that any payment made to UFFI home owners would not deprive them of their right to take legal action against both levels of government, and as to the statute of limitation, he assured us that the bill that is now before the Quebec National Assembly would have the same effect on the Government of Canada as on the Quebec government, which means that the statute of limitation under this bill was set on July 1, 1982.

In view of this situation, I must say that I was proud of the reply made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who, in connection with this problem, has made a tremendous contribution. His job has not always been easy, for he has received a great many representations and met many people in his office who have not always been kind to him, but I think that if we have now reached this stage in our study of this bill, following certain changes that have been made at the request of the Quebec caucus, it is due to a great extent to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who has paid particular attention to the remarks made by government members in general and by the 74 members of the Quebec caucus in particular.

Following this most important question I put to him, I was delighted to see that, on April 27, the bill which is before the House this evening was introduced and it covered in fact that matter of $5,000. One thing is extremely important in the bill, and that is Clause 6. The department states that under the terms of this bill, home owners will retain the right to start proceedings against the government if they so wish, even if they avail themselves of the benefits of the program, or receive financial assistance.

This bill gives the government enough leeway to make such changes in the program as could become necessary in the light of new developments or technological breakthroughs. In short, with regard to that situation, the bill having been introduced on May 25, 1982, the flexibility granted by the government with regard to instituting proceedings was discussed, and the government agreed that it would not prevent them even in cases where the complainants had received financial help. I feel that point is extremely important because many of the victims feared that receiving $5,000 would preclude their taking action against anyone as acceptance of the money would be equated with a settlement. Such is not the case, Mr. Speaker, as stipulated in Clause 6 of the bill.

Another important thing occurred on May 25th, 1982. Members of the committee dealing with the matter at the level of the National Advisory Council on UFFI, as advisors to the minister, also announced on that day that $40,000 would be paid out in direct financial assistance to the Quebec Federation of UFFI Associations. That was in keeping with the bill of April 27 which raised the possibility of government flexibility in that respect. Discussions went on after May 25, 1982 and then I had the pleasure of moving under Standing order 43 that the bill be adopted at all stages. Unfortunately it was rejeced, shot down by one of the parties, the New Democratic Party. But eventually I introduced it anew and on that day of July 7 we were given more details, and that is the very important thing I want to tell the House before concluding my remarks. With respect to the bill or the program we had announced on December 23, 1981 and the items I enumerated before six o'clock, we agreed to numerous changes in the regulations so that first of all we would accept applications from all people who had urea formaldehyde foam insulated houses. In other words, all home owners who wanted to take the necessary steps to remove some of the foam from their houses would be eligible for non-taxable financial assistance of up to $5,000.

Every home owner is perfectly free to decide what type of corrective measures he wants to take for his house, and he is also be free to decide to remove the foam if he wants to and the government will retroactively pay for such expenses up to $5,000. That is another aspect of the changes we made in the regulations. The people who have already removed the foam or who are in the process of doing so will also be eligible under this program, provided they can produce the appropriate receipts required under the regulations. That, Mr. Speaker, was announced in a communiqué made public on July 7 by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Some people referred to the costs of the tests and before six o'clock I mentioned the famous $100 cost. Well, we have done away with that $100 charge so as to reduce as much as possible the expenses incurred by home owners. It was decided, Mr. Speaker, to eliminate the $100 required for the exhaustive test. The cheques, which have already been mailed and received, will be returned or the amount refunded.

I see that my colleague for Lévis (Mr. Gourde) is also very happy about this situation. He certainly received many representations from his constituency, as did my colleague from Missisquoi (Mr. Bachand). There were certainly many UFFI victims in their ridings. I can also see that my colleague for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) looks very happy across the aisle. They were all very glad to learn that home owners would no longer have to pay $100 for the test. Moreover, with regard to the additional financial assistance mentioned earlier, this same committee, with the assistance of the UFFI centre, will consider obtaining additional financial assistance from other federal and provincial agencies and the private sector. These were the changes made to the regulations and announced on December 23, 1981. What has brought this matter before the House today is the very important agreement reached yesterday, on July 26, 1982, to go through all stages of this bill today and refer the legislation to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, which will look into the process used to approve the material, the question raised about the effects on health, and so on, as reported in yesterday's Hansard on page 19701. I feel this is very important. The public made representations, the members of the Quebec caucus then made certain recommendations, the announcement was made on December 23, 1981, and we now have this bill before the House and there is also the matter of the regulations. There are now and there will be following the study by the committee very important points to be considered by the victims. I feel that these victims, under the circumstances . . . of course, other sources of financial assistance are possible and this is what the committee will consider—but I think that at this stage, Mr. Speaker, this legislation meets the wishes of the victims themselves and of members on this side of the House. Because of this, Mr. Speaker, I shall have no hesitation in supporting this bill.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in order to provide the House with the time available to go into what should be gone into in Committee of the Whole, and in view of the fact that the minister is here to answer the very important questions that are to be put to him, I suggest you put the question.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments that I would like to make before you put the question with regard to matters relating—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understood that there was unanimous consent to move to Committee of the Whole on this measure, and I think we should do so immediately.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) will be recognized if he wishes to have the floor.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, we will be moving to Committee of the Whole almost immediately, but first there are two or three matters that I want to raise. You know that I have not spoken at any point on this bill, neither previously nor publicly, Mr. Speaker. I think it is important, given that I have a number of constituents within my own personal constituency and within the area immediately adjacent to my constituency, as the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott) well knows, who will be directly affected by the bill. I do not intend to take a long time. I never do, as you know. But I do want to put some matters to the minister that I consider are questions of principle, quite different from questions relating to the clauses. Clauses, important though they are, are not necessarily appropriate ways of dealing with the principles of the bill.

Let me first say to the minister that I must confess some degree of disappointment in the way this matter has been handled. I am not talking about the technical way of handling it but I am talking more about the way the government has approached the problem that has confronted so many people. Without restating the obvious, a large number of Canadians place a great deal of faith in the government, not necessarily in the government of the day, but in government in general. They believe that when the government says something is okay, it has good reason to say that. When the government puts its stamp of approval on a particular measure, it believes that that stamp of approval carries with it the full weight and commitment of the government.

I know a great number of people in Hamilton, and I have received communication from a great number of people from all across the country, who are vitally concerned that in spite of the fact the government encouraged them—and encourage is not too strong a word to use—to take advantage of the urea formaldehyde method of insulating their homes and in spite of the fact the government's stamp of approval appeared on the advertising and that government funding was available to assist them in this task, Canadians across the country were quite rightly led to believe that this was a safe and reasonable way to cut down on their heating costs, protect their families from the environment and to protect their homes.

The difficulty with all of this is that, probably inadvertently—I am prepared to concede that, although without having sufficient knowledge—the government did allow the situation we now have to develop. The government did not know there was a hazard attached to urea formaldehyde. The government, therefore, did not appreciate that the people who were being encouraged to take advantage of it were being encouraged to place their health in jeopardy. We can argue as to the correctness of that statement. Some people believe there is a health hazard, others dispute that. But certainly there is something wrong with the urea formaldehyde method of insulating homes.

The difficulty now arises that if a person cannot trust his government, and if a person cannot trust that the government stamp of approval is indeed worth something, then who can be trusted?

Mr. Lewis: Not you. We have tried that.

Mr. Deans: The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) says not me. Of course, he is entitled to his opinion. There are those who trust him, there are those who do not. I do. I think the hon. member is a very trustworthy person.

Let me come back to my main point. People were encouraged, and in many ways they were financially encouraged, to take advantage of this particular method of insulation. It turns out that it is not a very desirable method. Who then is responsible? Are the people responsible? Was it within the power of the individual's family to research adequately the appropriateness of urea formaldehyde insulation? I do not think there is a member in the House who thinks that any family could ever have undertaken such a task.

Was it within the responsibility of the individual insulator, the person who installed the foam? We all know that people move in and out of those businesses as the occasion arises. I think there is a degree of responsibility upon them, but they too might have assumed that since the government was giving its stamp of approval it was legitimate for them to provide that foam and to put that foam into the homes of families all across the country. You can hardly levy all the blame on those people.

Was it the fault of the manufacturer? In substantial part, yes, it was the fault of the manufacturer. There is no question that there are far too many products made available in this country in particular, and in North America in general, that are not tested as to their hazardous material composition. It is to a large extent the fault of the manufacturer that this product was not properly tested, that all of the potential hazard was not identified, that all of the likely side effects were not found and that adequate safeguards were not introduced. But then, to come back to the point, the government, having the advantage of all the information, all the conventional wisdom, all the testing and all the lab results, still decided that it was proper for the Government of Canada to approve this particular insulation within the insulating program for funding purposes. It is not, therefore, unreasonable to think that even the manufacturer—culpable though the manufacturer is and culpable though he must be held, still has the benefit of saying that, in the final analysis, the government okayed it. It did not have to, but it did.

Now we come to why I insisted upon rising on principle. I know Mr. Speaker has read the bill, and I know that people in Ottawa are vitally concerned about it. Also I know that were you in a position to do so, you would want to place before the House the concerns of the people of Ottawa which have been raised with me, those being that no matter where one turns, in the final analysis the approval or okay was given by the government.

Now, what does the bill do? The bill recognizes that the government was marginally at fault. The government says that, to some extent, it was to blame for this and therefore it will make amends. But how will it make amends? It will do this by ensuring that anyone who does not need assistance will get it.

An hon. Member: How is that?

Mr. Deans: Anyone who does not really need assistance will be able to obtain a grant, but anyone who needs assistance and has no financial backing to enable them to do the job themselves will not get assistance because it is not in the bill.

If one happens to be one of those poor souls in a position of not having sufficient income or being able to obtain a loan and repay it at the exorbitant rates of interest currently being charged, one cannot take advantage of the legislation. If one is retired, living on a meagre pension income, and took the government's view that one ought to insulate one's home, cut down on fuel consumption, and that in order to do that it would be appropriate to put in urea formaldehyde and obtain a government grant, and then one found it was causing a health hazard, there is nothing in the bill for him. If a young family bought an older home and decided that it would be appropriate, in this time of energy conservation, to put in insulation, if they took the government's advice and installed urea formaldehyde and were therefore able to take advantage of the loan grant offered by the government, and if they suddenly discovered that it created intolerable health conditions but their income was not sufficient to enable them to go out and borrow money to have it taken out, this bill does nothing for them.

In this bill up to $5,000 only will be made available if one can borrow the additional $15,000 or $20,000 necessary to take the foam out of one's house. This is the problem with the bill. This is the difficulty with it. This is why we are having so much trouble with it.

The minister says to those people who are now faced with those situations, such as the elderly who cannot afford to take it out, those who may be on pensions because of disabilities and cannot afford to take it out, or those young families who are not required to have an income capability which would enable them to borrow and therefore cannot afford to take it out, that despite the fact the government guaranteed that it was good foam and good insulation and it turned out that the guarantee was wrong, they are now supposed to accept its word. The government says that they are supposed to trust it and perhaps in a year or two, if they live that long, it will try to be of some help. I say to the minister that that is not good enough.

I see the minister smiling. He smiles so kindly. I understand why people are taken in by that very kindly smile, but what is behind it? The minister does not seem to appreciate that the commitment he is making is no commitment at all. I am not suggesting that he does not believe it or that he does not mean it. I think he means it. I think he believes it. I think his commitment is honest. I am not questioning his integrity on this matter. I do not doubt for a moment that, if he had the power, he would like to be of more assistance. But let us take a look at the truth of it.

If the minister had been able to convince his cabinet colleagues that they should have undertaken their full responsibility, he would have done it by now. If he had had the persuasive power to convince the balance of the Treasury Board that there should be more money available for victims of urea formaldehyde who are now feeling the tremendous problems which result from having it as insulation in their homes, or if he had had the power to convince his cabinet colleagues that, given the government's initial inducement to use the product, they therefore had an equivalent responsibility to ensure that no one would suffer as a result of that inducement, he would have done those things by now. If he could not convince his cabinet colleagues over the course of the last year that more money should be found, that the federal government's responsibility was to ensure that that foam was taken out of each and every home where it was causing a problem and that it was, therefore, the government's responsibility to pursue the manufacturer and to recover from the manufacturer whatever was recoverable by way of liability, why should we believe he can convince his colleagues in the future?

If he could not convince the industry of its responsibility until now, why should we believe he can convince the industry between now and some date off in the future?

If he cannot convince the provinces on the basis of the evidence which is currently before us, then why should we believe that he will be able to convince them sometime between now and some obscure date in the future? I see the hon. member for London West (Mr. Burghardt) sitting and nodding his head in agreement, and I understand why.

Mr. McCauley: He is falling asleep.

Mr. Deans: I mean, that is the crux of it. I feel confident that if it were within the power of the minister to dig into his own personal treasury to hand out the necessary funds, he would do it. But we know that is not the case. If the minister has not been able to convince those other participants up to now, what is there in the offing which will bring about a sudden change of heart? What is there in the offing which will bring about a reversal of the opposition which is so strongly held by both the provinces and the industry?

Mr. Ouellet: Wait until Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Deans: If the minister rises and suggests that he is just on the verge of getting those agreements, we can sit another week and off he can go and get them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: If the minister is of a mind to rise and suggest to us that it is just a matter of time and the agreements will be signed, the provinces will participate and the industry will chip in, then why does the government not just simply go the full distance, provide the necessary funding, recover from those people who are just on the verge of providing assistance, put the money back into government coffers and ease the burden on every citizen across the country?

• (2040)

When one stops to think, it is almost unbelievable. The reason I rose to speak tonight, when I had no intention of rising and knowing that you are not able to rise, Mr. Speaker, is that my honest worry is that once the bill is passed, notwithstanding the committees, investigations and all the best intentions of the minister and his cabinet colleagues and all others involved, by the time summer is over and winter sets in around 1982 or 1983, the government's commitment to people who still have UFFI in their homes and are suffering as a result of it will be less than it is today. It will have waned, the same as their commitment in other matters. That is my worry.

When I pass this provision for $5,000—which is not in the bill but the avowed intention according to the minister's statement—that will be it. There will be no more. Whether the government's austerity program is right or wrong is not to be questioned here tonight, but we will probably talk about it on another day. That program will take over and there will be no assistance, and the government, in spite of the best intentions of the minister, will renege on its vague promise of other help. It will say that it has done the best it can. It would like to do more but it cannot because these are tough times for everyone and if you have to die because it did the wrong thing, well, that is tough.

Some hon. Members: Oh, come on.

Mr. Rossi: You are in show business.

Mr. Deans: I am sorry that it bothers some Liberal backbenchers because I understand that Liberal backbenchers tend to get a little aggravated in July and August, but we on this side of the House take the work seriously. We do not care whether or not it is August.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rossi: You are in show business.

Mr. Skelly: Serious business.

Mr. Deans: If that member would care to identify himself and to suggest that publicly, I would demand that he deny it. He knows it to be totally untrue. To say such a thing from obscurity and anonymity of a backbench from where he will never go further is disgusting.

However, I will ignore it considering where it comes from. It does make me want to say a few words more, I will have you know. I had considered stopping at this point, but let me pose two or three more questions to the minister. They relate directly to the principle of the bill. The principle of this bill is to make sure that those who can afford to remove urea formaldehyde from their homes will get $5,000 or less. Those who cannot afford to remove it will get nothing. That is the principle of the bill. It is not a principle which we can support.

I put to the Liberal backbenchers that many of their constituents for whom they are fighting so hard have an average income capacity which will make them unable to take advantage of this legislation because there is nothing in it for them. So do not sit there yapping about why we should get on with things. This is far too important a matter to pass in the blink of an eye.

Let me suggest to the minister that there are some problems with this bill. The minister talks about his leadership and his commitment. I want to ask him some questions which were related to us. They are very relevant to how this matter will ultimately be resolved, if at all. I stress the point, if they will be resolved at all. I honestly do not have much faith in an ultimate resolution which will be satisfactory to anyone who does not qualify today under the bill.

Will the home owners' representatives be invited to participate directly in the negotiations which will take place with the other so-called partners in this problem? Will they be at the negotiating table? Will they be there as spokesmen, or will they simply be allowed to attend?

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have seen a lot of cheap tricks lately. I would draw Mr. Speaker's attention to the member sitting directly behind the present speaker and to the T-shirt she is wearing. I think it is unacceptable in this chamber. I would ask you to rule on this, Mr. Speaker. Is it permissible in this chamber to wear a T-shirt which says "I support UFFI victims?"

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has made his point. The Chair has been called upon to make a ruling that is, shall we say, one of the more delicate ones. The tradition of the House has been to remove the display. In the circumstances, I think that the decorum requirements are such that I will rule that this is not a display.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, you can see that the Conservatives are nit-picking, playing games, and are unconcerned about the problem. For a moment I was worried that they might demand my hon. colleague to take her shirt off.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: Let me continue, Mr. Speaker. I want to talk about the time-frame for a moment. Through you, Mr. speaker, I ask the minister what provisions are there to put in place a full review of the responses obtained within the process that will be undertaken? What time-frame will there be in which to come to ultimate conclusions with regard to that? What assured alternatives will the minister provide today should these projected negotiations to which we are hanging on so much fail to satisfy the objectives for total compensation of the cost of removal?

I think that I am likely speaking for the Conservatives as well; I hope that I am. I think we are all committed to total compensation for the full removal of UFFI. I think that is the stand of most members. However, I worry because there is no guarantee or way of making sure that this will happen. Will the minister respond to the very serious concerns that have been expressed by all the members of the advisory council? Has he committed himself to provide relief to financially deprived victims? What will he do if a senior citizen on fixed income, an unemployed person or a low-income individual is unable to remove the insulation? Where is the commitment to those people? What is the minister prepared to tell us about the government's commitment to ensuring—

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I have been receiving numerous questions from the hon. member which are in the form of a speech. I want to assure him that I am ready to give him answers to all his series of questions. I hope that it will be possible to do so as soon as we reach Committee of the Whole stage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister has made his point.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker says on behalf of myself and, I am sure, on behalf of other colleagues here that the questions which the House leader of the New Democratic Party is asking are questions that we want to ask—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is not making a point of order.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I suggest that there are numerous opportunities to speak in the House today and these questions are certainly valid and could be answered by anyone over there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is not making a point of order.

Mr. Deans: I want to thank the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) for his support in this matter.

• (2050)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) asks the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) if he will accept a question.

Mr. Deans: I have only about five more minutes in which to speak, Mr. Speaker, and then I will be happy to accept any number of questions. I will be very happy to accept any number of questions in about five minutes, and then the hon. member can take the rest of the evening to question me or the minister, depending upon whom it pleases him to question. I probably know more about the answers than the minister does. In fact, so does the hon. member for Vancouver South, probably.

I wanted to go on and say to the hon. member for Vancouver South that I am delighted that he thinks these questions are the appropriate ones. I think he is right. These are questions to which we all want the answers, and we need only ask them once and then we will get the answers.

Considering the problem of access, when the minister responds at the end of second reading, I would like him to state what provision will be put in place, through either an amendment to the bill or through the regulations, to ensure that the victims of UFFI will have access to qualify for the grant of up to $5,000. I think we have all agreed that it is up to $5,000. Yesterday, the minister indicated that that was the minimum amount. I think we all understand now that in fact $5,000 is the maximum amount. The $5,000 is available now only to those with adequate financial resources. How will we ensure in the regulations that people of limited means will have access? How will we—

Mr. Pelletier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deans: I am having trouble tonight. What is the matter with you people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) rises on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) on a point of order.

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, did I understand correctly what you said earlier? You allow us to wear T-shirts in this House? Did I understand you correctly?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes. The hon. member understood correctly.

[English]

Mr. Deans: I seem to be having some difficulty. Just remember, though, that if one happens to be male, one must wear a tie with one's T-shirt.

I want to ask the minister what, if any, provisions we will have in the regulations, or what kind of amendment the minister is prepared to provide which will ensure that those people who have expended their financial resources in the installation of urea formaldehyde foam in the first place will have some additional funding made available to them to cover the difference between the $5,000 grant and the full cost of removal. I do not have to remind the minister, I am sure, that the full cost of removal, at least in metropolitan areas in Toronto—and I suspect it is probably equally true in most metropolitan areas across the country—ranges in the order of some $20,000. That is in large areas. In a brick home—

Mr. Burghardt: That's not true.

Mr. Deans: The hon. member for London West (Mr. Burghardt) says I am wrong. Well, I have been wrong before and I am therefore open to be questioned on that. But the information I have, and I think it is shared by the minister, is that total removal of the insulation from a brick home costs up to $20,000. In fact, I may be wrong on the low side. It may, in fact, cost far more. However, we will not quarrel about that. Even if it costs $10,000, for someone with no money the difference between having an encumbrance of $10,000 and an encumbrance of $20,000 is hardly worth quibbling about tonight, especially when one cannot get a mortgage on one's home because one does not have the income to pay for it.

What I am worried about is not the numbers so much as the principle, because it is to the principle that I am speaking. Therefore, I think it important that we address that principle. There are certain problems which must be addressed, not in private consultation, not in letters and not simply by a nod of the head and a wink of the eye. There are issues which are not directly related to the removal of the urea formaldehyde foam insulation. I know a family extremely well, with whom I have met to discuss this problem. There seems to be no doubt but that urea formaldehyde foam insulation has seriously affected the health of the woman in that household. I use the words "seems to be" because I am not a medical doctor, I do not pretend to be one, and never have. What do we do? What are the provisions to assist those who might suffer acute or long-term health problems which may well be, and which some people claim are, directly related to urea formaldehyde foam insulation? I am being tentative because I am not positive, but there are those who claim there are health problems which are directly related to the use of this particular product.

What about assistance for those whose homes have been structurally damaged as a result of the UFFI? I think that hon. members recognize there is a distinct possibility of structural damage. What about property value losses? I know that the hon. member for London West and other hon. members are aware there are any number of appeals pending and some which have been won concerning property taxes and relief from property taxes. But one must bear in mind that the reason this relief is to be given and therefore paid for by the other property taxpayers in the municipality is that the federal government approved the use of urea formaldehyde foam insulation and encouraged people to take advantage of it. Then, of course, there is a whole range of health questions. I will not go into detail on all the questions, but they are vitally important.

Mr. Skelly: Someone over there wants you to go into detail. I think they said, "Bravo".

Mr. Deans: No, I do not want to abuse the time of the House. However, I do want to say there is a wide range of health-related problems. Where does the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) fit in? Where is the tie in? What is the responsibility of the Ministry of National Health and Welfare? To what extent will the ministry assume financial responsibility for those problems? Let me say to the minister that I can remember, some years ago, battling a case involving asbestosis which was directly related to the operations at Johns-Manville. I remember the battle we had trying to convince people that there was indeed a health hazard in the early years. I have been at this business a long time. In the early years, we had a very serious problem trying to convince doctors and others of the seriousness of the fibers or particles which were in the air within the Johns-Manville plants in the manufacture of asbestos. I know of people who died from lung disease and who could not prove, while they were alive, that they were suffering from a disability which resulted from their employment, and who received no compensation.

I want to say to members in the House: do not cast aside the potential of serious health problems resulting from the continued use of and exposure to urea formalydehyde foam insulation. Do not be as people were ten and 15 years ago when they were blind to the seriousness of the difficulty. For God's sake, do not come back ten years from now and tell us it is very, very unfortunate that we did not know. That is the whole problem.

These are matters which are new to me. They are new to most of us, and we do not fully understand the implications of them. But we require an absolute commitment from the Minister of National Health and Welfare as to the ministry's full participation in and covering the potential and real hazard. It is therefore important that we recognize it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. I now recognize the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser).

Some hon. Members: Filibuster!

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, as belated as it is in the evening, it is certainly a privilege to rise to speak on this bill. I do not doubt that my fellow colleagues in the New Democratic Party feel very strongly that the bill before us tonight is inadequate. In fact, I believe some of our colleagues on the government side feel the bill is inadequate. There was a general understanding many hours ago that each party would be brief in the speeches in the second reading stage in order to get this bill into Committee of the Whole. The reason we wanted to get the bill into Committee of the Whole was so that questions which members have to ask the minister could be asked.

• (2100)

What we have been subjected to in the last 40 minutes is a display of mock words by the New Democratic Party House leader. The purpose of the display was to push this debate on until we reached the point where there was really little time to ask the questions of the minister which the minister already said he is in the House to answer.

Hon. members who have known me for many years know that I have always been on pretty good terms with many of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party. I am not quick to cast aspersions in this House. Anybody watching this performance tonight maybe wondering what is going on. I feel very badly about this. Regretfully, I do not think the House leader of the New Democratic Party has served the people who are suffering from urea formaldehyde by his display tonight which took the last 40 minutes.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is my understanding that on second reading a member is entitled to 40 minutes, entitled to express concerns—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not making a point of order.

Mr. Fraser: I never said that members are not entitled to 40 minutes. I am saying that if this place is to function and when it is clear that members are trying to co-operate to get the debate to the stage where questions that are appropriate to ask are to be asked, and somebody else plays games to stop it, it is inappropriate that they get up—

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I regret the intervention and I will not make another. I wonder if the minister—the member—might accept a question that would clarify the situation.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the difficulty is that my friends in the New Democratic Party are now finding out what it is like to have their little game exposed. They do not like it so they are jumping up and down. They now want to ask the minister a question. They have had hours and hours to ask the minister and they have been careful not to do this.

The House leader of the New Democratic Party posed a lot of questions that all members in the House know have to be posed and answered. However, he did not pose them at a time and in a place where the minister could answer them. That is the game he has been playing.

Earlier the suggestion was made that other members in this chamber are not sincere in their worries about this issue, that somehow or other some members in the House do not care as much about the problems and limitations in the bill as do our friends in the New Democratic Party. Let me say this.

No one would ever accuse my friends in the New Democratic Party of having, nor would they claim to have, a monopoly on wisdom, perspicacity and intelligence. They have never done that. However, they have always claimed a monopoly on virtue, and that is what they have been trying to do tonight.

That is regrettable because I have received hundreds of letters from people in my province on this issue. I have met with people who are suffering from urea formaldehyde. I think that the bill presented by the minister is inadequate and there are some questions that have to be asked.

I will accept an assurance if it is given to me because I accept assurances solemnly given by hon. ladies and gentlemen. I will cut off my speech if my friends in the New Democratic Party will now rise and say that they have had their fun, they tried to make a point and they now want to move into committee of the Whole. If the House leader of the New Democratic Party wants to interrupt me to say that is what they will do, that is fine. However, why should I now sit down and let them get up and make the same speech over again, knowing that what they are going to do is ensure that all of those people across this country who want the answers to the questions that the House leader of the New Democratic Party asked will not be answered? If the New Democratic Party speakers get up after I sit down and carry on making the same kind of speeches, because of the terms of the House order which they agreed to yesterday, it will guarantee that the minister will not be allowed to give any answers in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: That is a game that is being played. My friends in the New Democratic Party have been shouting at me. They always shout when I get upset because I do not usually go after them. I try to get along with them because I am a very patient and tolerant fellow. They are now saying, "Oh, you are supporting the Grits". Isn't that interesting? Let me say this.

I have run in five elections and have been elected in four. If they want to find out the great degree to which I have supported my friends on the Liberal side—there are a lot of them in the House tonight—they can ask them whether I have spent the last ten years supporting them. They can ask some of their colleagues who are no longer sitting because they cannot get elected in the lower mainland of British Columbia whether I have been supporting the Grits.

I see them smiling. I know the answer they will give. Sometimes we get along very well personally, but there is not a member on that side, including the minister, who is ever going to accuse me of unduly supporting the Liberal Party, and they do not expect me to.

What I do not expect are cheap shots from those fellows in the New Democratic Party. I do not expect that from them and I do not have to put up with it. We can just see how sincere the members of the New Democratic Party are. I believe it is fair to let those who have been watching know just what kind of a game they have been playing. I do not know who will rise following me. It may very well be a member of the Conservative Party. It may as well be a member from any other party because time is running out.

I say seriously to the minister that this bill is defective. It does not set out even the so-called $5,000 maximum amount. It is very limited with respect to the amount of money the minister has been able to persuade the Treasury Board to commit to this very urgent and serious problem. We do not have the regulations in front of us, although I understand there are some drafts of regulations. By merely reading the bill we cannot tell what it will do until we see the regulations. However, the minister is here, and we could ask these questions of the minister, if my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party would allow us to get to that stage of our procedure in which we would be allowed to ask questions of the minister. Ordinarily, if there was not a House order made yesterday, I would not care. Members of the New Democratic Party could talk as long as they wanted at second reading. That would be their choice. If they wanted to talk all this week and all next week, they could continue to talk at second reading. If that is what they wanted to do, why did they agree yesterday to a House order which, I think Your Honour would probably rule, makes it mandatory to end all debate on this bill tonight by 9.45? Members of the New Democratic Party cannot have it both ways. The only thing I can conclude is that the New Democratic Party does not want to give hon. members a chance to get up in the House in the special Committee of the Whole for which we have been waiting and ask the minister questions. Not only do I as a Member of Parliament have the right to ask questions, but the minister also has an obligation to try to answer them. There may be government members who would like to ask some questions too. They are entitled to do so. I see some hon. members opposite nodding. I will not continue any further. I am deeply sorry—

Mr. Deans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I think the House leader of the New Democratic Party has thought up another point of order.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has indicated that somehow or other we are abusing debating time. On a point of order I want to ask him if he is aware that it was at my insistence that there was a debate. The Tories were prepared to let the bill go without debate.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, my response to the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party is that if he thinks what he has been playing around with for the past couple of hours is a debate aimed at eliciting any answers, that is a fraud on the public watching this debate.

I do not like this bill for many reasons. I do not like the way this whole problem has been dealt with, but I want to ask some questions. What we are really getting down to is that if the New Democratic Party wants to carry on speaking for the rest of the evening, there will be no questions asked. The whole Committee of the Whole stage will have to be forced through in the last couple of minutes because that is the House order to which the NDP agreed. It will be on the heads of members of the New Democratic Party when we start to get telephone calls in an hour or so from people all across the country asking how the dickens this happened and why we did not get any answers from the government.

Mrs. Mitchell: Talk about the issue.

Mr. Fraser: Members of the New Democratic Party are very jumpy. They come in wearing fancy T-shirts bearing slogans. I do not quite understand why that is suddenly all right for some people to do but not for other people to do—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: —but I do say that there is a serious problem connected with this bill. The bill is not adequate. We do not have the regulations. The minister has an obligation to answer questions, and the intention of members of the New Democratic Party to talk this bill out to the last minute and to depend on the terms of a House order is a cheap fraud on Parliament.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in my opening remarks in this debate on Bill C-109 with regard to urea formaldehyde foam insulation I want to say that I think what we just heard was one of the poorest examples of an elected member. An hon. member stood in the House and almost pleaded with Liberal members to stand up and take their places here so that the debate could swing to the other side of the floor because of some kind of mechanism worked out between the two parties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Parker: Last August I sent out a questionnaire to people in my riding because I was concerned about this matter, and I would like to read that questionnaire into the record as follows:

Urea Formaldehyde Foam Insulation

Do You Have a Problem?

I believe the government is sidestepping its responsibility to Canadians whose homes are contaminated by UFFI. I intend to press for compensation for home owners who are victims of the government's mistake in approving the use of this dangerous substance. I need facts and figures about the extent of the problem in Kootenay East-Revelstoke. If you are affected, please complete the following questionnaire, give it to me when I am in your area, or send it to my office in Ottawa.

I want to talk a little bit about that. At that time the defeated Conservative member decided he should do something. He decided to attend public meetings in my riding to hear about the concerns of the people there. At least he had a little more gumption than members of the Conservative Party here this afternoon. Not one Conservative fought for the full compensation for UFFI victims which this bill does not provide. Shame on the Conservative Party of Canada.

I would like to read into the record some of the answers to my questionnaire. I think it is well worth putting some of them on the record. The following is a letter sent to me from Revelstoke:

Thank you for taking up the cause of those of us who are "stuck" with this problem.

For myself, it is difficult to say whether or not the health problem I have had since about last Christmas is due to the formaldehyde gas or is due to a virus and as I have had a sinus problem for many years . . . for the past nine or ten months I have suffered more severely with it and with recurring muscle and joint pains.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member who has the floor now has considered the possibility that the person about whom he is talking who is getting sick might be getting sick from watching the NDP on television.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of comment and concern the Conservative Party has for people who are suffering from these kinds of problems.

The letter goes on:

From a purely economic point of view those of us with the insulation are at a distinct disadvantage:

(a) We paid income tax on the grant money from the Government.

I do not know whether that has been mentioned yet. People who received grants paid income tax on those grants. The letter continues:

(b) We paid the labour costs to instal the insulation.

(c) Worst of all, no one will buy a house knowing it has been insulated with urea formaldehyde foam—if one wishes to sell it would be necessary to have the foam removed, new insulation put in and, depending on how it would be removed, either the exterior or the interior walls redone.

That is a letter from a widow who needs assistance, and she does not need just $5,000. She needs full compensation and assurances from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) that regulations will be set forth to protect people such as herself. I should like to put on the record a reply from a constituent in Kimberley, British Columbia which reads as follows:

We are both over 70—Last 6 months neither one of us has been well.

These are the things that people are saying. Another reply reads this way:

My husband who is a kidney patient has contracted emphysema.

These are the kinds of replies we are getting. As I toured my riding I visited some of these people. One lady in Kimberley had several small children. The walls of the house had bulged over 12 inches and they were in the process of moving out of the home. They did not know whether anyone was going to pay the expense of their staying somewhere else while they had the testing done on the house. Now the government has the gall to offer $5,000 in compensation and say that perhaps there will be more money later on and perhaps there is some way they will be able to deal with the problems.

As I toured the riding, people asked me when the government will finally recognize that it created a serious problem when it guaranteed to pay for the installation of this insulation. The government gave a lousy $350 grant, which has resulted in as much as $15,000 or $20,000 damage to some homes.

Some people want to sell their home but the real estate agent has told them that they must acknowledge that urea formaldehyde has been used and that the agent must tell the new buyer of this. If that is not done and it is revealed at a later date, the sale could be null and void.

The representative of the Kinsman Club came to see me with a sample of the material, asking that it be tested. It was installed in their hall and they wonder if people are being contaminated. We have heard of problems in the schools as well. I think the government has a responsibility to trace these problems and introduce programs of full compensation in the realization that there could be very serious medical problems.

A house in Revelstoke is very close to the track. All of the sudden the plaster and the gyprock in that home started to crack. The residents became very ill. They began to get nosebleeds, the children were sick and the housewife was more sick than usual. They went to the doctor about their problems. The urea formaldehyde in their home was starting to deteriorate and it was creating the problems.

In most cases the people have mortgages and because of the high interest rates now in effect, they are paying up to the hilt. To ask them to try to raise another $10,000, $15,000 or maybe $20,000 to have urea formaldehyde removed and then the government will reimburse $5,000, is hypocritical.

I do not think the Conservative party has done justice to this House of Commons by not putting up one speaker on this bill, Mr. Speaker. This is a very serious injustice not only to their constituents but to the people of Canada. For them to accuse this party which is trying to get the message out to the country that this is a lot more serious than the government is leading us to believe, is hardly fair.

Those are the kinds of things that are happening, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that it has been a privilege for me to represent Kootenay East-Revelstoke and to have the opportunity to stand up in this House and speak for the people of my riding.

Mr. Friesen: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member would spend some time in the House he would know that we have put up speakers. I am glad that he put in the past tense that he represented the riding because he will not be here next time.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this debate. It is important to point out what has been going on in the House today. Earlier the Conservatives agreed that there would be no House order—that the only House order they would agree to was no debate at all. Then the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) got up and said they wanted time to ask the minister questions. That is completely new. It is interesting that the minister is now back in the lobby dealing with the Conservatives, trying to figure ways of getting them out of this pickle.

I should like to go through the history of the urea foam problem because it is a very serious one. For Parliament to pass a bill that does not deal effectively with the concerns of people who have urea foam in their homes, is inappropriate. There are many people in the country who cannot borrow the $5,000. The cost of taking the foam out of most homes massively exceeds $5,000. On average, contractors' bids in the city of Toronto amount to about $22,000, and for brick homes it is much more.

We have to look at the history of this problem, Mr. Speaker. It was a government that promoted the placement of urea foam in homes. It was installed at home owner's expense but many of them took advantage of the government grant and paid income tax on it.

If you buy a car or a washing machine you have an opportunity to go after the producer if the item turns out to be damaging to your health or if it does not work properly. Because of case law you have a right through the court system to go back to the producer of the item for the cost that you have incurred. In this situation it is a product sponsored by the government which has been demonstrated to be unsafe, so it is important that the government, and the official opposition too come clean and state their positions. The government is offering a very limited program that is only accessible to people who have cash in the bank or who can remortgage their home because they have other assets.

This is completely a class-oriented bill which addresses the wealthier people in the country, not those who are poor, who are on pensions or who would have difficulty refinancing a mortgage.

The question of the value of homes is not addressed in the bill. There are homes in Vancouver, in every city and province in the country that basically are black-listed by the real estate market. People cannot get anything near the price they want for their home, and indeed they should not be able to sell them to unsuspecting buyers.

The consumer has a right, in any legislation brought before the House, to have equal access, but that principle is not contained in this legislation. Perhaps the owners of some wood frame homes in Nova Scotia would benefit from the bill because the cost of removing exterior or interior walls is relatively low. There is a vapour barrier and the insulation can be removed. This is nearly impossible in larger brick dwellings.

We have to look carefully at how the problem evolved, Mr. Speaker. The foam is an insulating material that is injected in liquid form into the wall cavities of buildings and expands in the wall. The problem seems to arise as the material breaks down after installation, releasing one of its components which is formaldehyde gas, into the surrounding atmosphere. Factors such as improper mix, high temperature, improper placement, moisture, humid conditions or associated fungus activity, have accelerated the decomposition process, resulting in increased gas levels in homes.

As has been pointed out by an expert committee that looked into the problem, the gas can cause eye, nose and throat irritation, nosebleeds, headache, coughing, nausea, asthma-like conditions, vomiting and dizziness. It has been related to cancer in laboratory animals, and I intend to deal with that later.

It is estimated at this point that from 80,000 to 100,000 homes are affected. In about 25,000 of those homes material was installed under the provisions of the Canadian Home Insulation Program. When properly installed in the outside walls, with the right mix and good ventilation, the material has frequently not been a problem. In adverse conditions, however, where one of the many factors above come into play, it has been proven to be a very serious problem indeed. Removal has been difficult and costs already have ranged anywhere from $10,000 to $30,000 and above, and it has often proven to be unsatisfactory even after removal. People can be affected and be unaware of the problem.

Let me go back a moment in history, Mr. Speaker, because tonight is one of the last opportunities for Parliament to address itself seriously to this issue. Regardless of whether problems are put to the minister or not we all as Members of Parliament recognize that this legislation cannot be changed tonight. The hon. member for Vancouver South was very eloquent in pointing out that we were putting up speakers and the Conservatives were not. It has been clear for a number of weeks, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative Party was not seriously interested in getting a bill back before this House which addressed the problem in an equal way regardless of the income factor. In 1969 this product was first accepted in this country by CMHC and was used during that period in some states of the U.S., and in Europe since the 1950s. By 1970 CMHC acceptance was withdrawn because of shrinking and instability of the product. The foam simply was not demonstrating itself to be a good insulating factor.

In August, 1977 CMHC reaccepted urea foam as a safe product, and Rapco Ltd., a company partly owned by the Canada Development Corporation, claimed to have solved the shrinking problem, and Rapco has since been a major producer. In September, 1977, the CHIP program was put in place and the foam was approved for use. In August, 1978, Dr.

R. Viau of the Consumer and Corporate Affairs chemical directorate warned of problems and advised caution in its use. Reports of complaints from across Canada of nausea and irritation, etc., started to come in. Dr. Viau stated at that time that the government was aware of the dangers and aware of reports in Europe some ten years earlier which described the problem. He referred to a U.S. report entitled "Urea Formaldehyde Based Foam Insulation—An Assessment" done in 1977. By October 1979 a North Carolina lab test showed a link to cancer in rats at relatively low emission rates. What happens when it is in the walls, Mr. Speaker, is that gradually, due to moisture, the type of vapour barrier and depending on which wall faces sunlight, and so on, you get decomposition of the foam and release of the gas which at low emission rates has been shown, in mammals at least, to be linked to cancer.

In November, 1979, over two years ago, the "Marketplace" program raised the concerns to the Canadian public. That same month the state of Massachusetts banned the sale and use of the foam and moved to have the material removed from all public buildings.

In January, 1980 the final report on lab tests indicated a definite correlation with cancer in rats, and the Department of National Health and Welfare received the report but did not respond. In April, 1980, the province of Saskatchewan began an investigation into the problem. At the same time the Washington hearings on urea foam led to an investigation and a recommendation that a warning be included with each and every contract signed by the U.S. Consumer Products Safety Commission. In September, 1980, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) indicated that a special committee would be formed to study the problem, 11 months after the first reports on the cancer link and two months after the first warning by Consumer and Corporate Affairs officials. On November 24, 1980, the U.S. Consumer Products Safety Commission's report indicated there was a cancer threat to humans. That particular problem, Mr. Speaker, and that particular report has yet to be addressed seriously either by the minister or by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), or for that matter by the Conservative Party in this House. On December 17, health and welfare finally put a temporary ban in place on the foam.

In January, 1981, my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), responded with questions to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, as well as with letters, press releases, travelling across the country and appearing on "As it Happens" on BCTV and any other media outlet which would carry the story. Finally, on April 23, 1981, a permanent ban was put in place.

The Liberals and Conservatives want to go after the New Democrats in the House tonight for saying that for some reason they want to speak about the issue, that for some reason they have some questions which they have organized with the minister and they think, for some reason, that will be useful in dealing with householders or the media. Well, this issue has been before the House and any Canadian can refer to the public record in Hansard and see what kind of questions the Conservatives have put forward and what kind of answers the minister has given. There has been abundant opportunity here, in committee and in public, for both sides to get their answers on the record.

The minister is saying that it is $5,000 minimum, maybe there is going to be more, maybe some will come from the provinces or the municipalities, or maybe some money is just going to drop from somewhere, maybe from other federal programs. If you live in a small home and you have this foam in there and you have had to move out into the backyard and your children have nose irritations and you have emphysema from it and so on, you do not want Members of Parliament sitting here passing legislation which may not even apply to you at all. If you cannot borrow the $5,000, if you cannot remortgage your home, if you cannot sell your home, you are in a position where you have to walk away. Certainly in a democracy such as this, where the government is complacently trying to pass a piece of legislation which does not address the problem, it would be completely appropriate for at least one group of Members of Parliament to stand up in this House and make it clear to Canadians that there is a proper approach to this problem. There has to be an approach which deals with the medical and scientific side, and one which deals with the complete safe removal of this material at the cost of all taxpayers. In the next election the voters can reflect upon the enormity of the government's bungling in getting involved in recommending and helping to pay for the installation of this dangerous product.

All physicians in this country, Mr. Speaker, should be notified of all of the problems with urea foam, and that has not been done. As I said earlier, there are still thousands if not tens of thousands of home owners, residents and renters who are unaware of the fact that the foam is in their walls and that part of the medical problem they are experiencing is directly related to that foam being there. All home owners should be formally notified that they have the material installed in their homes, whether they are owners or renters, as many are suffering without knowing the cause. The government should provide testing facilities in all regions of Canada with programs to provide some level of testing, programs that are set up to monitor it accurately in the medium and long term. This is because the release of the gas into the atmosphere of homes depends upon the amount of moisture in the walls, the temperature, the ventilation, and whether or not doors have been opened and closed a lot. There are a lot of variables and it requires some very accurate testing.

A committee must be established to determine an appropriate compensation mechanism to assist all those who have had the material installed and have a problem. The government's response to the questions in the House prior to April 23, following a great deal of urgency raised on this matter by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River, was to refer the matter to a special investigative committee. I think it is worth while for those home owners who are watching and who want to refer to the public record to know just exactly what this committee had to say. The report says:

> Urea Formaldehyde (UF) foam is prepared on site from the mixture of urea formaldehyde resin, an acidic hardening agent (usually phosphoric acid) and a propellant (usually compressed air). The fresh UF foam contains approximately 75 per cent water by weight. During the curing process of UFFI following installation, formaldehyde gas is released.

● (2140)

> The release of formaldehyde from the foam is a complicated and poorly understood process. Most experts agree that there are continual forward chemical reactions occurring. Formaldehyde molecules may cling to the surface of the foam and cause a vapor pressure in the foam. The presence of the formaldehyde also encourages the forward reaction and retards the reverse reaction (breakdown). Air passing through the foam can sweep the formaldehyde from the foam. Increases in temperature and humidity and the presence of greater amounts of acid in the foam can accelerate the breakdown.
> Installation:
> It would appear that the UFFI gassing problems referred to this committee could indeed relate at least in part, perhaps in large part, to improper installation, improper vapor barriers in foamed houses etc. There is evidence that under controlled conditions the material (UFFI) shrinks and is essentially not a defined and stable product.

Health hazards are associated with living in urea formaldehyde foam insulated homes. This is really the most important point because we are talking about applying a piece of legislation and passing it through the House. We can see the headlines across the country "UFFI bill passes through House of Commons." Everybody can wave their hands in joy. They have access to funds and they can take out the insulation. But this is a great misconception. People who have UFFI in their homes and want to take it out will know that this bill is a sham. It is the general public and the taxpayers who will think that the government created a problem. The government funded the program and supported it, and somehow or other the government has come up with a solution.

It is our job in the opposition, at least of those of us in the New Democratic Party who take the job of opposition at this point seriously, to make it clear to the general public that what is being proposed in Bill C-109 is not a solution. It is a shell game. It affects only a very small portion of the population and only the wealthiest portion of those who have been stuck with this terrible problem.

The report continues:

> Potential and real health problems resulting from exposure to formaldehyde include eye, nose and throat irritation, cough, headache, dizziness and in very high concentrations bronchopneumonia and pulmonary edema. Generally the degree of reactivity depends on formaldehyde concentration and duration of exposure. Prolonged or repeated exposure in those who are predisposed to asthma (airways irritability) may produce asthma or worsen an already existing asthmatic state. Indeed the potential to cause life threatening status asthmaticus exists. Contact with UFFI may cause skin irritation or ultimate sensitization to formaldehyde.

Before going on, I would like to congratulate the home owners across Canada who have organized and worked very hard to try to get all parties in the House to respond to the serious problems they have faced. To all of the UFFI home owners in every province these people have worked their guts out for years, and I would like to thank each of the following: Dr. Penny Tilby, Vancouver, B.C.; Fred Palen and Robert Gahan, Calgary, Alberta; Glen Markowski, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Ed Smee, William Tell and Henry Wakeley, Ontario; Nicole Lamer, Pierre Bergeron, Len Coccolico, Quebec; Carl Wentzell, Garnet Wales and Dan Williams, Newfoundland. These are the real and only heroes of this continuing battle. I am confident that they will continue in the battle to get appropriate legislation and appropriate compensation. The report continues as follows:

> Formaldehyde is principally an irritant, but by combining with human proteins it may produce an immunoreactive hapten protein complex resulting in antibody formation (allergy). To this property, as well as to chemical irritation, are attributed many of the problems of dermatitis and respiratory tract reactivity with bronchospasm.

I do not think I need to go on at too great a length in relation to the terrible problems that have arisen across Canada. But I would like to touch briefly on the detailed evidence of carcinogenicity or cancer that was found in the studies on animals by Doctor L. Golberg and Doctor J. Clary. This same evidence was presented at the Third Chemical Industry Institute of Toxicology Conference on Formaldehyde Toxicity in November, 1980 held at Raleigh, North Carolina.

A risk assessment was undertaken and it is clear to the general public and to any member of this House who wants to read the report of the mutagenicity, the teratogenicity, the epidemiology and the other health considerations that we are dealing with a very serious chemical problem and to try to sweep it under the rug to allow just a fraction of home owners to remove this kind of insulation is not the way to deal with the problem. We have to go to the very root of the problem and remove all this insulation from all the homes where it is going to cause problems.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., pursuant to order made Monday, July 26, 1982, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the bill now before the House.

LOUIS RIEL

REPORT ON POSSIBLE PARDON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of Justice have had a complete and comprehensive study undertaken on the implications of a pardon for Louis Riel. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the government and the minister immediately make that report available to members of this House and the public in order to assist those who are interested.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAELI BOMBING OF BEIRUT—TRIBUTE TO COURAGE OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR AND STAFF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, in light of the bombing in Beirut and the heightened danger to all civilians in the city as a consequence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this House commends the unflinching devotion to duty demonstrated by Canada's ambassador to Lebanon, Mr. Théodore Arcand, and the members of his staff who, despite having to face danger both day and night, have remained at their post to serve as a channel of communications in both directions between the Canadian government and the Lebanese government and also as a means of obtaining information for Canadians about their relatives who may be in Beirut, and further, urges the government to give consideration, because of this response by those stout-hearted Canadians, to proposing their names for an appropriate form of recognition by Canada for their actions.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I think we have all been moved these last few days by the outstanding performance of Canada's ambassador in Lebanon and serving as a means of communication between Canada and Lebanon and reporting to Canada on the very significant and disturbing events which are taking place in that area. I feel it is right that this House should mark, by this motion, its recognition of that performance not only by the ambassador but also by his staff in the performance of their duty.

As one who has lived in Beirut in happier days, I find it very sad that these events should be taking place and that we should be watching the loss of life of Lebanese citizens, and the destruction of buildings. I feel that our ambassador and his staff deserve our highest commendation.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, unfortunately, until this very instant I was not aware that my distinguished colleague and friend would raise this question. However, I cannot let this moment go by without adding a few comments to the words spoken by my distinguished colleague.

Madam Speaker, I am, of course, speaking only for myself, and certainly not in my capacity as chairman of the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and I do not think I am necessarily the spokesman for the Liberal Party of Canada. But I do know that I will be reflecting the views of many of my colleagues from all three parties in the House.

Madam Speaker, I think the time has come for us to realize, and I know many of us do, that we shall finally have to address ourselves to the problem: what are we going to do about the Palestinian question? What is now happening in West Beirut is totally unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1410)

[English]

I want to say, Madam Speaker, that I, too, share the great admiration expressed by my distinguished colleague for Ambassador Théodore Arcand, and I am asking too if the time has not come not only to send a letter of protest. I know how difficult it is to address ourselves to the question in Canada, but our consciences dictate that we should address the question of the Palestinians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, I want to say as a Canadian—and I repeat, as a Canadian—that I profoundly believe that everybody should be allowed to live in peace in the Middle East. You may add in secure boundaries and you may add everything you want, but I must say, Madam, that the Palestinians also have a right to live in the Middle East.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: I am willing to say that the time has come when we should not only send a letter of protest to the Government of Israel for the incident that took place at our embassy and the search of our ambassador's car, but that perhaps the time has come to call our ambassador back from Israel for consultation. That is number one.

Number two, I believe that we should leave to Ambassador Arcand the decision on whether to withdraw from west Beirut for security reasons. He is one of the last ambassadors of the western world, if my information is correct, to carry a flag inside west Beirut, and that is the Canadian flag. That is why my colleague so rightly stood up to say that we are with him in these difficult times in showing the flag of Canada in a very hazardous place indeed.

I should like to add that if we truly believe, as many people in this country do, that we are friends of the state of Israel, that the best way to address ourselves to the important problem is to address the question of what is making things so difficult over there, and that is, what to do in regard to the Palestinians. It is not a question of absolutely taking sides; it is only a question of basic justice.

What is to be done with these people who are not recognized, who surely make a lot of noise, and who are known as the Palestinians, or the PLO? Is it not perhaps time to recognize them and ask people to put pressure on both sides so that they recognize each other's existence—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: —that the PLO recognize the state of Israel and that the state of Israel recognize that there is a group of people known as Palestinians who have a main spokesman? I am not going to waste the time of the House by saying that they are the only spokesmen, but they certainly are—

An hon. Member: Don't talk it out.

Mr. Prud'homme: The hon. member is very impatient. I will sit down, Madam Speaker, because I know some of my colleagues want to address the question. I will leave it to my colleague in another party to join in the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I simply wish to endorse what has been said today. I believe that the feelings of members of the House have been expressed. I should like to go on record as supporting the motion. I hope it passes.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ECONOMY

HOWE INSTITUTE'S REPORT—QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. The C.D. Howe Institute in its latest report has condemned the federal government and has blamed Canada's economic ills on a decade of federal economic mismanagement. It has also dismissed the latest budget as ineffectual, particularly in restoring sagging business and investor confidence. I ask the Minister of Finance what new initiatives his government is considering to address this very central problem which is key to economic recovery and the creation of jobs? Or is the minister and his government simply going to rely upon the restraint program and the threat of imposition of mandatory controls?

• (1415)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I read a good part of the C.D. Howe Institute's report. I do not agree with a good part of it, but I doubt whether the hon. member has read it himself. He must be relying on newspaper reports which I think, at least in part, misrepresented that report. So if the hon. member will quote a bit more from the report, I would like to read a few quotes myself.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, I would be very glad to quote from it where it says:

> The latest budget message is an abysmal stewardship report on the results of past economic policy for which the federal government must take responsibility ... This kind of leadership has placed Canada in a very serious economic predicament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Need I go any further, Madam Speaker?

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT WITHDRAW INTERVENTION IN ECONOMY

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, it would appear, with the federal government prepared to intervene further in the economy and the marketplace, that that is part of the problem which now affects this country, the economic disaster we are experiencing.

Given the fact that the minister and his officials grossly misread the fortunes of Canada's economy as reflected in his latest budget, has he seriously considered the prospect of taking the opposite approach of withdrawing from further government intervention and encroachment? Does he not consider that perhaps that is central to the loss of business and investor confidence in this country? Would he not agree that the government should seriously consider a massive program of de-regulation, and thereby reduce the burden of government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, maybe I should be permitted to read one or two quotations from the document which the hon. member referred to, as follows:

The budget was innovative in the face of the current severe recession—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: How did we get to the recession?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member has not mentioned that quotation.

Mr. Clark: Do you have a better one, Allan?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, I will try another one. Perhaps it will better suit the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. member has been talking about intervention and intrusion by the government into the economy. The document goes on to say:

There has been no increase, and possibly some decline, in the federal government's share of spending in a high-employment, low-inflation Canadian economy.

They go on to say that at the present time productive resources are not being diverted to pay for the deficit. So I believe the hon. member ought to give a balanced account rather than rely upon what I consider to be a misrepresentation of a document which I find offensive in certain sentences.

GOVERNMENT REGULATIONS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance should listen to the question I addressed to him, which deals directly with the matter of sagging business and investor confidence.

If I may be allowed to quote again from the document, at page 5 it says, referring to the budget:

Little was done to restore badly sagging business confidence—

Need I go any further, Madam Speaker?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, please.

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the fact that a large part of the business and investor confidence problem has to do with the massive amount of regulations and red tape which are part and parcel of the Canadian economy, would the minister seriously consider the suggestion of the Canadian Manufacturers Association for a two-year moratorium on further regulations? Would he consider looking at the costs imposed upon the Canadian economy as a result of duplication of services between the two levels of government, the federal and the provincial? Would he look at ways and means of reducing the over-all burden of government, which is hampering business and investor confidence and thereby job opportunities in this country?

• (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member read half a sentence, and then asked the question "Need I read on?" Maybe I should read on. He read "Little was done to restore badly sagging business confidence—" Then he conveniently asked the question "Need I read on?" Why did the hon. member not read on? Why did he not complete the sentence if he were interested in a total report of the views of the C.D. Howe Institute? If he had read on, the sentence would have concluded as follows: "—but some indications of a shift in tone were signalled".

Mr. Clark: A shift in tone? We don't know about the tone but there was certainly a shift.

EDUCATION

INCREASE IN STUDENT LOAN APPLICATIONS

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it relates to the genuine future of this country, namely, the young people of Canada. The Prime Minister will know that as of July 23 more than 53,000 students in Ontario alone have applied for financial help to continue their education. This figure is up 25 per cent because these students cannot find jobs at the college and university level. Many of their parents are also unemployed at this point. What does the government plan other than the very inadequate budget proposals of November and December, last year, and of April and June this year, along with several other announcements? What real announcements is the government going to make to help the youth of this country continue their education?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, many of the hundreds of millions of funds set aside by the budget will be used to create jobs for the unemployed youth of Canada. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has given details of that and he will give more as money is spent.

Mr. Thacker: Madam Speaker, the proposals are totally inadequate. We have an unemployment rate of 10.9 per cent and a youth unemployment rate of over 19 per cent.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT GIVE INCREASED ASSISTANCE

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, a problem has developed with the banks imposing quotas on students. This is because the banks are effectively subsidizing student loans by about 3 per cent or 4 per cent. Something the government could do—and the Prime Minister could make an announcement today in the House, if he just would—is to make up the 3 per cent. It is clearly in our best interests. If the government does not do that, the students will quit university and go on full welfare. Will the government, through the Prime Minister, give a commitment today to increase government assistance toward these subsidized interest loans?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is not only talking about young people but students. I would remind him of the figures that were made public at the time we met with the provinces in February to discuss federal assistance to post-secondary education. He will recall from those figures that, in the last five years, the federal government's share of the operating costs of post-secondary education across Canada had risen from 42 per cent to 58 per cent, whereas the provincial share had fallen from 43 per cent to something in the area of 30 per cent. It is the students who have to pay a higher percentage of the costs along with the federal government. This is in an area of provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, the hon. member should be expressing his concern, which is justified, not to the federal government, which is picking up an increasingly large part of the tab of post-secondary education, but to the provinces that have sorely neglected their duty in that area.

DECLINE IN CONSUMER SPENDING

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. We had another economic report recently. Yesterday the Conference Board of Canada noted that there had been virtual stagnation in the real income of Canadians and, as a consequence, there has been a fall off in consumer spending which has worsened the unemployment situation. Will the government admit that the principal consequence of its budget, with its wage control policy, will be to take even more money out of the economy, to reduce further consumer spending, and therefore to increase unemployment? Will the Prime Minister admit that the budget will worsen the unemployment situation in the country rather than help it?

• (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member during his absence did not take time to study the budget, which was perhaps too complex a document for him. If he did, if he took the time to do that, he would see that the Minister of Finance in his budget did not increase the deficit and did not reduce it either. The deficit, through the operation of the June budget, has not been changed. The money which has been taken out of the economy is being put back into the economy by various ministers precisely to create jobs across the country. That is a perfect expression of what the government intended to do—to take money from those who have incomes and those who have jobs and to use it in order to help create jobs. Therefore it is not as though the government is reducing something. The government is just taking money from those who have it and spending it to give jobs to those who do not.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, before I ask my second question, I want the Prime Minister to know that I took the ten minutes out which were required to read and understand the budget. Even with that ten minutes of attention, one noted that with the increase in taxes on all Canadians, the reduction in pensions and the reduction in family allowances, there will be a major withdrawal of spending from the economy, no matter what the Prime Minister says.

UNEMPLOYMENT FORECAST

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, at the time of the budget the government refused to give us a percentage forecast of unemployment for the coming year. The Conference Board has now told us that in its judgment, in addition to the judgment of the New Democratic Party, unemployment will remain above 10 per cent not only for the rest of this year but all of 1983. Does the Prime Minister agree with this forecast of the Conference Board that it will remain above 10 per cent to the end of 1983? If he does not agree, why not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member says that he took ten minutes to read the budget and concluded that there will be a major withdrawal. I submit that perhaps he needs more than ten minutes to understand what is taking place with this budget.

An hon. Member: He can't concentrate that long.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps that is true.

Money is to be spent over the year by citizens who have incomes and pay taxes. It will be withdrawn from those citizens over the year and spent over the year in order to give jobs to those who do not, in order to give support to those who do not, and in order to create employment opportunities for those who are unemployed. That is the purpose of the budget.

If the hon. member wants to argue that we should have increased the deficit further and injected more funds into the economy, perhaps that would be an unsound economic position but at least it would show that the hon. member had understood the budget. I am afraid he has not, and I must ask him to return to the budget figures.

In so far as the forecast is concerned, I am not in a position to comment on those statistics. First of all, I have not seen them. Second of all, I would be very cautious in predicting any reduction in unemployment because so much of the unemployment is caused by the fact that it is world-wide, that unemployment has gone up by five million over the past year in OECD countries alone, and that many of our trading partners are not in positions, as the hon. member knows, to buy the goods produced by our mines and our industry. Therefore one cannot be certain that, unless there is a world recovery, Canada will surge ahead.

Mr. Broadbent: The point is that we are all aware in the House, as indeed the people of the country are aware, that there are problems outside Canada as well as within our borders. But the point the Conference Board has made, and the point that we in this party have made, is that the budget produced by the Liberal Party of Canada, rather than improving the situation, only worsens it. That is the reality.

REQUEST FOR JOB-CREATION MEASURES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, since we will have, between now and 1983, more than a million and a half Canadians remaining unemployed, and at least another 10,000 companies going bankrupt, according to the Conference Board—not simply according to us—when will the government produce a single measure which will produce an additional job for an unemployed miner, an additional job for an unemployed auto worker, or an additional job for an unemployed construction worker anywhere in the country? When will the government live up to its obligations to the workers of this land?

• (1430)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks when those single measures will be produced. I would point out to him that the measure which is now in committee and which is being reported to the House, today or tomorrow, I believe, will have that precise effect of creating jobs in Canada, because it will bring the cost structure in Canada down to a competitive level. It is important for the hon. member and his party to realize that the OECD figures, the figures of the Conference Board, the figures internationally accepted, indicate that inflation in the OECD countries will be at an average of 7.5 per cent in 1982. In Canada it will be around 11 per cent.

We will not be able to create jobs, nor will we be able to sell our products unless we can bring our inflation down. That is why we want to go from an 11 per cent society to a 6 per cent society. It is because the hon. member is not supporting that, that he is more guilty than the government in creating the kind of conditions which make recovery difficult.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAEL BOMBING OF BEIRUT—CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In Lebanon, Israeli forces have cut off water and electricity to West Beirut. They have launched air attacks against West Beirut, including civilian targets. We are told that the Canadian ambassador's residence has been badly damaged. The Israeli Prime Minister says that he wants an unequivocal commitment for the PLO by Friday that they will leave Beirut.

As far as we can see, Canada has taken no initiatives or actions that might help arrive at a solution in that area. Would the Prime Minister tell the House what actions or initiatives we have taken, if any, other than protesting the destruction of our embassy? Could he tell the House why the Canadian ambassador is remaining in Beirut? Is he involved in important negotiations to help get a solution? Why is he being exposed to further danger there if he is not? Could the Prime Minister tell the House what is happening?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member honestly wants a recital of initiatives I will ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to give the details of those initiatives. I must say that I welcome the hon. member for St. John's West, the opposition spokesman for external affairs. He has at last awakened to the reality of the situation in the Middle East. I think it is pretty shameful that for months we heard questions from both opposition parties about El Salvador, Poland and Afghanistan, but nary a word about the Middle East.

Mr. Broadbent: That is not true. You had better read your Hansard.

Mr. Crosbie: I have asked the Prime Minister a serious question about a serious subject. On June 8 I moved a motion in the House at the same time that he sent a letter about this issue. I am asking him a question about a serious matter affecting the peace of the world. He wants to take some partisan political advantage out of it.

Mr. Clark: As he did in Iran.

REQUEST THAT CANADA UNDERTAKE NEW INITIATIVES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I would like to give the Prime Minister another chance to take a serious attitude about this crisis. Would he tell us what initiatives he has taken? He met with a group, last week, including Mr. Stanfield and ex-ambassador Barton, who urged the Prime Minister to take a more active role in this situation in the Middle East. They appealed to him to do that. They asked for Canadian participation in new initiatives to negotiate a political settlement. Is the Prime Minister prepared to do this, or has he done so? If he has not, will he, and if so, when? The time is running out for the one half million civilian people living in West Beirut. It is time for the Prime Minister, the great international statesman, to act if he is concerned about this and not just about his own political neck here in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we deplore the violence which has taken place in the Beirut area. Both because of this atmosphere of violence and the unprecedented statement over the weekend, which was a combination of a written statement by Mr. Arafat and an oral statement by Representative McCloskey, we took what I believe is a very important initiative in contacting the PLO to try to determine exactly what they meant by that statement. We have their reply. I regret to say that they were not able to confirm that the Arafat declaration represented any change in the PLO policy of non-recognition of Israel. This is a disappointment to us because we had hoped that this statement might open the way to a new series of developments in the Middle East.

In addition, I might say that we have now received a reply from Israel with respect to the bombing of our premises and the inspections of the ambassador's car. They have apologized, and have undertaken to try to ensure these things do not happen again.

PENITENTIARIES

SHOWING OF PORNOGRAPHIC FILMS AND STAGING OF TOPLESS DANCING

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Some time ago I asked him about the practice of showing pornographic films in federal penitentiaries. At that time the parliamentary secretary told me, "I am told such films are shown. I therefore believe that prisoners are treated like people living in remote regions, in any case, in a community which is not like ours, I think that those prisoners should be treated like normal human beings, that is, capable of judging the merits of a film." In fact I thought that the practice had stopped. There is now a report that they are showing these films in Archambault and, I am told, in one of the western penitentiaries as well. There were topless dancers at Archambault.

First, is this report true, and does he agree with the practice of showing these films. Third, does he agree with the former parliamentary secretary that these people should be treated like normal human beings out on the street capable of judging the merits of these films?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, as far as the pornographic films are concerned, pornography is covered by the Criminal Code in Canada. There are censorship boards in virtually every province which pass films to be shown in the provinces. The policy which I have in place in the Correctional Service of Canada on that score is that any film which has passed all of the necessary inspections and can be shown in the community where the prison is located can be shown inside the institution. To do otherwise would involve the Correctional Service of Canada in establishing its own censorship agency with criteria which would probably be dubious if we were to leave it to wardens, and which would vary from one region of the country to the other without any rational basis for distinction.

The conclusion which I have drawn, and I invite the hon. member's comment on it, is to allow the normal censorship process to apply in full measure. So the suggestion that remote regions have different rules or that citizens there are allowed to make judgments that ordinary citizens in the country are not allowed to make about what they see, is without foundation. The same rules apply.

With respect to the topless performance at Archambault, I am looking into it. It is certainly contrary to the policy of the Correctional Service of Canada for any such performance to have taken place. I understand that on one occasion a couple of years ago a group of musicians were playing at Archambault and, contrary to the understanding with the Correctional Service, one of the performers began to undress. I am told by some individuals that the person who was undressing was not stopped by the officials who were present. She should have been stopped but was not stopped. The policy was violated on that occasion. I am looking into the matter further to ensure that pornographic or topless exhibitions do not take place in the institutions.

Mr. Friesen: Naturally, the question is whether the classification regulations are stringent enough and whether the officials are, in fact, following them. I wonder if the Solicitor General can comment on that.

CORONER'S STATEMENT ON CYANIDE DEATHS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question relates to a comment made by the coroner of Montreal, Coroner Laniel. He is quoted as saying:

—he was alarmed by what appeared to be a growing incidence of cyanide use in jails in the Montreal area.

"The number of deaths that have occurred on jail premises where prisoners died by cyanide poisoning is worrying me", he said.

How can the Solicitor General, as the chief security officer in the land, explain the kind of administration in a penitentiary system which would cause the coroner in Montreal to make a statement like that?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, two important changes have taken place in prisons in the last several years that bear on the ability of a staff, however competent, to control contraband. One is the increased access of inmates to employment opportunities inside the prison, but, outside their cells. To an increasing degree inmates are spending less time in their cells and more time in retraining programs of one kind or another within the institutions. There is no getting away from the fact that that increases opportunities for guards, however careful their surveillance, to miss contraband.

The second is a recommendation by the preceding Parliament, in the form of recommendation of the justice committee on penitentiary reform, that open visiting should be increased in the institutions. This means that instead of having to talk to a wife and family through a plate of glass by telephone, inmates can visit them in open visiting areas which have been established in most of our institutions. That has created a very difficult problem. I have come to recognize the difficulty of controlling contraband within the institution. I think an excellent job is done of controlling it, but it has not been totally eliminated.

I read in the newspapers that the use of cyanide was suspected. I want to wait until the investigation is completed to see whether that was the case and whether we can obtain any evidence on how it got in, and whether any further measures can be taken to control it. But I would hesitate and very much regret to move to a situation where inmates were behind bars within their cells full time—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kaplan: —and open visiting was discontinued.

Madam Speaker: Order.

EMPLOYMENT

EMERGENCY FUND FOR CREATION OF JOBS—DEADLINE FOR SUBMITTING PROJECTS

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Today, the minister announced in a press release that a series of direct job-creation programs worth $300 million would be set up by the Canadian government. My question has four parts. When will the constituency allocations be announced? How much has, in fact, been allocated to the province of Quebec? There has been some talk of an emergency fund of $41 million: how will this money be spent? And finally, what will be the deadline for submitting projects under the community development projects program?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in response to the question, I think I should point out, for the interest of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, who asked a question earlier, that, as a result of the announcement today, 57,000 additional new jobs will be created for the workers of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Within the next week or ten days we will be sending the allocations to Members of Parliament for their constituencies. In the case of Members of Parliament the minimum has been raised by 100 per cent to $200,000, and the maximum has been raised to $3 million.

[Translation]

Last year, the province of Quebec received $50 million, and this year, it will be receiving $80 million.

[English]

Finally, we have set aside a special allocation of $41 million, a special response fund, to respond to areas which are hard-hit by lay-offs or where there is a danger of workers being hit by exhaustion of unemployment insurance benefits. We will enlist the co-operation of Members of Parliament to keep us informed of those matters within their ridings. We are committed to working with them to help in direct job-creation programs in hard-hit areas.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—SUPPLYING OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT BY UNITED STATES

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns aid to Central America. The U.S. Congress has imposed a special condition on U.S. aid to El Salvador that substantial progress of human rights and reform programs must be certified by the U.S. President every six months. Yesterday President Reagan gave his certification to continue aid which will include, among other things, $81 million worth of military equipment. This was done even over heavy opposition from the members of the U.S. Senate and clear allegations that the Salvadoran National Police had tortured an official from the Green Cross organization in May. By the way, the Green Cross organization looks after displaced persons within the country. Could the Secretary of State explain to this House what measures he is taking to protest this move by the U.S. President?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is not our role to determine what U.S. policy should be in this situation. Our own view of what is happening in El Salvador is that, as a result of pressure from a number of governments outside and, of course, also because of many people within the country who are working to the same purpose, a decision has been made to continue the land reform movement, which we applaud. At the moment, we are not, ourselves, in the position to give any new development assistance to El Salvador other than that which has been slowly completed as a result of previous commitments, but we would want to encourage the government in its land reform. I can assure the hon. member that we are prepared to protest violations of human rights when and if they occur.

HONDURAS—AIRCRAFT EXPORTS FROM CANADA

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, on a question that relates more directly to the Canadian position, it has been announced that Canada has granted an export permit for three DHC—5D Buffalo aircraft to Honduras. At this particular time, troops are moving back and forth along the border between El Salvador and Honduras. There have been incursions into Nicaragua out of Honduras and military bases in Honduras are supplying soldiers for an attack on Nicaragua. Given those facts, is the Minister prepared to stop those permits until the situation is cleared up?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I will certainly be pleased to look into that situation, but I will remind the hon. member that Buffalo aircraft are not military aircraft, and it is extremely unlikely that a permit to export Buffalo aircraft would have anything to do with the problems which exist in Central America at the present time.

INCREASE IN POTATO INSPECTION FEE—REQUEST FOR ROLLBACK

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Last week Agriculture Canada announced that, effective July 19, there would be an increase in the cost to potato farmers for the charge of table stock inspection for export, from $6 a carload to 8 cents per hundredweight, an increase of 1200 per cent. On July 20 the President of the Treasury Board announced that price restraint in the federal public sector will apply to all prices established under federal jurisdiction, and any increase higher than the 6 per cent ceiling which was not implemented before June 28 will be rolled back. There have been numerous letters and telegrams. Could the minister advise the House and the potato producers of P.E.I. and New Brunswick whether he will allow this 1200 per cent increase, or will he be true to his own words and roll it back to 6 per cent?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, questions involving prices falling within the jurisdiction of a particular ministry should be addressed to the responsible minister in each case; in this case, the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Clark: Is there a policy?

MINISTERS' STATEMENTS

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question will be directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The Minister of Agriculture is announcing one policy of a 1200 per cent increase, and the President of the Treasury Board is announcing an increase of no more than 6 per cent. Will the Prime Minister tell the potato producers of P.E.I. and New Brunswick which minister they are expected to believe?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will take notice of the question.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

COST OF ALL-STAR BASEBALL GAME RECEPTION

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Less than two weeks after the Minister of Finance brought down his budget in which he announced that the average senior citizens of Canada would be expected to accept a cut in their standard of living next year, the Secretary of State, in conjunction with the Minister of State for Small Business threw a lavish party in Montreal, paid for by the taxpayers, for the All-Star baseball game, at which French wine, free liquor, roast beef, lobster, rice and other delicacies were featured. Can the Secretary of State confirm to the House, as has been indicated to the London Free Press by one of his aides, that the cost to the taxpayer for this lavish extravaganza will be $100,000?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, I am unable to confirm any such figure for the hon. member. Through you I can tell him that part of the fact is that for the first time in history the All-Star game between the American and National Leagues was held in Canada, and the meetings of the leagues that are associated with that were attended by a very large number of visitors from outside this country, as is the case with any convention. In such circumstances it is customary to help attract attention, by the federal, provincial and municipal governments extending a degree of hospitality. For instance, the Government of Quebec put on very extensive receptions and buffet dinners before and after the game; the city of Montreal also undertook certain responsibilities.

Through the various Departments of the Government of Canada that were involved, Canada undertook to extend some hospitality, recognizing the presence of 600 foreign journalists; recognizing the presence of leaders of amateur baseball from all of the major baseball countries, as well as Canadian officials, and recognizing the unique opportunity to attract attention to Canada during the height of the tourist season, before the largest television audience that could ever be achieved under such circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: Since the hon. member puts himself forward as being an expert on advertising, perhaps he would want to review the amount of favourable publicity at the destination point for visitors that Canada achieved as a consequence of the publicity we received, without having to buy space or television time. I will undertake to assure the hon. member that the program of providing such hospitality is very good business for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

JUSTIFICATION FOR EXPENDITURE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, now that the Secretary of State, with the support of his Liberal colleagues, has recognized all those people, perhaps he can give some recognition to the taxpayers of Canada who have to foot the bill for this extravaganza.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Is the Secretary of State telling the House and the people of Canada that he threw this party at the taxpayers' expense without having the foggiest idea of what the cost would be, and is he telling the people of Canada that if the figure is, indeed, as his aide suggested, $100,000, that can be justified at a time when the Minister of Finance and his cabinet colleagues are demanding that ordinary Canadians take cuts in their standard of living?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member would be able to understand that if you put on a dinner for a very small convention it is going to cost less than if you put one on for a very big convention. We are coming right back to the point of principle as to whether it is or is not good policy for the Government of Canada, in common with the provincial government, to provide hospitality in such circumstances.

An hon. Member: How much?

Mr. Regan: I can assure the hon. member that, in my view, it is in the interest of the Canadian taxpayers when you can attract to this country something that leaves, as this occasion did, $4 million in direct expenditures in the city of Montreal, plus all the publicity that was achieved; that is very worthwhile.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: I cannot give the hon. member an exact figure because my department was not the only department of government involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order!

ENERGY

BEAUFORT SEA DEVELOPMENT DECISIONS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister knows, the Beaufort Sea environment assessment review has been delayed by Dome, Gulf and Esso by their failure to submit information, and by their dispute over the relative risks of tanker traffic and pipelines in the Arctic. The minister has denied access to funds in the energy envelope to the departments with responsibility in the north, and has now put pressure on his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, to come up with ways of making decisions before the environmental assessment is complete. Will the minister explain to the House how it is possible to make major drilling and production decisions when he has provided "no funds to discharge our own statutory responsibilities"?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As usual, Madam Speaker, the hon. member is in error.

PROTECTION OF ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, as usual, I will be releasing the letter from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the Minister of the Environment at the end of the question period to the press, and perhaps then the Canadian public can make its own decision.

The Minister of the Environment has objected directly to the minister regarding the pressure he has put on him. In particular, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has given $400 million to accelerate exploration in the Mackenzie Delta and $2 billion to assist the oil industry, while at the same time denying a few thousand dollars to intervenors and government departments in order to protect the most fragile environment in the world. The Minister of the Environment says, "we would be remiss to accelerate the review process unduly and then find that the economics of the situation do in fact preclude early development". Does the minister of Energy, Mines and Resources intend to take the advice of his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, or is he going to forge ahead and support the oil industry, regardless of the social and environmental consequences, and regardless of his and his colleagues' statutory responsibilities?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Minister of the Environment and myself are working very closely together, and I support the steps taken by that minister.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

ACCEPTANCE OF APPLICATIONS—EFFECT OF RESTRAINT GUIDELINES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, will the minister responsible for FIRA tell the House whether acceptance of FIRA applications by the federal government will now be conditional upon foreign companies or Canadian subsidiary companies implementing the government's 6 per cent and 5 per cent guidelines?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we have not created any such stipulation. If that is my hon. friend's recommendation, I would be happy to draw it to the attention of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUDGET STATEMENT ON POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, will the Prime Minister tell us whether the statement in the budget in relation to FIRA that "the agency will confine its examination of undertakings to the key elements of the investment proposal" is still believeable, or will there be a new complication added to FIRA; in other words, the condition or leverage of the six and five rule?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the responsible minister just answered that question, that that was not part of FIRA policy, but that he would be happy to study the recommendation of the Leader of the Opposition.

FINANCE

PREPARATION OF RESTRAINT GUIDELINES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this is quite a day. We heard earlier that all those baseball fans came to see Gerry Regan and not the Expos or the All-Stars and that is why we have to pay the tab.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Who did you go to see?

Mr. Clark: I went to see Gary Carter.

Since we have had a clear indication by the Minister of Finance that the 6 - 5 rule is going to be applied to government grants, government subsidies and government agreements, and that guidelines are being prepared which the Minister of Finance thought would be finished this week, I should like to ask him whether those guidelines will be prepared this week, and will they be made public?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I told the Leader of the Opposition earlier in the week that the guidelines would probably, and "probably" was the word I used, be completed this week. That answer still stands, and when they are completed obviously it would be our intention to make them public.

REDUCTION IN SUNCOR TAX PAYMENTS—APPLICATION OF RESTRAINT GUIDELINES

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday he announced a $35.5 million reduction in taxes to Suncor for additional spending for upgrading, efficiency and more production. Did Suncor give any undertaking that it would fulfil the six and five proposition?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am indeed very happy to see Suncor proceeding with a $690 million investment, about half of which will take place in Ontario and the other half in Alberta. In return for the tax concessions granted by the Government of Canada, Suncor has agreed to adhere, within its own operations, both to the federal government's six and five wage guidelines, except for existing contractual obligations, and to the guideline respecting lower price increases during the next two years as the rate of increase in costs goes down and profit margins are restored as a result of the excellent budget presented by the Minister of Finance at the end of June.

PETITIONS

MR. GASS—PROPOSED DISCONTINUANCE OF SATURDAY RURAL MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, this afternoon I have the duty and responsibility to present a petition signed by 1,251 residents of Prince Edward Island. The purpose of the petition is to protest the government's intention to discontinue rural mail delivery on Saturdays, thereby denying 17,450 householders of mail, newspapers and other material, and to close rural post offices on Saturdays, a move which will affect some 25,300 people.

The petitioners hope that in your examination of the petition you will find the petition in order and that you will exercise the discretionary powers vested in the office of the Speaker of the House to allow discussion and referral to committee of this issue at the earliest possible time.

MR. EVANS—POLAND—IMPOSITION OF MARTIAL LAW

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, today I have the honour to present to the House a petition on behalf of over 600 members of the Canadian academic community concerning the imposition of martial law in Poland.

The petition respectfully calls upon the Parliament of Canada to protest the actions of the Polish military council, which are in violation of the 1975 Helsinki Accords, to demand the restoration of civil and human rights in that country and to assist in organizing an international effort of humanitarian assistances to the Polish people.

MR. BLENKARN—LEBANON—ISRAELI ACTS OF AGGRESSION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, today I have the honour and privilege to present a petition to this House and to Your Honour on behalf of several hundred Canadians, asking that this House condemn Israeli actions of aggression against Lebanon, that the Israeli government withdraw from Lebanon and that this House use its efforts to call upon the Government of Canada to supply humanitarian relief and aid in the form of medicine and monetary relief to the devastated population of Lebanon.

My petitioners humbly are bound and will ever pray and ask Your Honour to make sure this petition is referred to the appropriate standing committee.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. FRIESEN—REQUEST EMERGENCY PLANNING ORDERS BE TABLED

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surry-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As Your honour will recall, some weeks ago I raised the matter of the presentation of papers regarding emergency planning orders and an order by this House that the government table those. I have yet to see them, and I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Smith) to indicate to the House when those papers will be forthcoming.

Madam Speaker: Well, I suppose the parliamentary secretary will become conscious and recognize the hon. member's—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: He will be conscious of the hon. member's request.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: He will eventually be aware of the hon. member's request—that is better English—and then he will be able to respond.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand indirectly from the government House leader that there might be a disposition in the House to concur unanimously in the twelfth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. It is my intention to call for concurrence in the thirteenth report, but if there were unanimous agreement with respect to the twelfth report which could be achieved immediately, I think that would have the approval of the House.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, that is correct. The House leader of the Conservative Party raised this matter with me a few days ago, and I reported to him and to my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), that we were willing to agree to the twelfth report of the committee without debate. I have just read a letter the hon. member sent to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Tobin) about the thirteenth report. I thought that was an error because that was never discussed. We are taken by surprise.

We had hoped to be able to deal with Canagrex today rather than at the end of next week. I understand my hon. colleague is now asking for concurrence in the twelfth report without debate. Yes, provided we do not have to debate the thirteenth report.

Mr. Clark: No relation.

Mr. Pinard: The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) says there is no relation. I make the relation.

Mr. Clark: We will debate them all.

Mr. Pinard: I am saying that our consent will be given if we do not have to debate the thirteenth report today. If we have to debate the thirteenth report today, there will be no consent, and we will have to deal with Canagrex some time next week or in the following week.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, if that is the disposition of the President of the Privy Council, would you simply call the motion for concurrence in the thirteenth report, please.

CONCURRENCE IN THIRTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I should like to move that the thirteenth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Tuesday, June 29, 1982, be concurred in.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Beatty: I am disappointed that we so quickly hear "no" on the other side, before we have even had an opportunity to discuss the substance of the thirteenth report of the standing joint committee. The report was unanimously presented to the House of Commons. Members of all parties, both in the Senate and in the House of Commons were unanimous. I regret that the government House leader decided to attach conditions on his approval of the twelfth report. So be it. We will have to deal with the twelfth report at another time.

I believe it is essential, before this House recesses for the summer, that some of these motions for concurrence which stand in my name on behalf of the standing joint committee be called either to receive concurrence or at least so that we can have the opportunity to have a debate in the House of Commons.

Over the years we have found that for a series of motions for concurrence in unanimous committee reports which have sat on the Order Paper in my name, there has been no provision for assurance that the matter will be brought back to the House or no way of assuring support by Parliament for a bipartisan effort by the committee to draw to the attention of Parliament the deficiencies that we feel exist in the statutory instruments we have been asked to examine.

There is no issue that can be more important for Parliament than the question whether the government is acting within the law and whether it has acted in a way consistent with the intent of Parliament. No Member of Parliament and certainly no chairman of a committee could stand by with any propriety, after a committee has found that the government has acted in a way which in the committee's opinion was ultra vires, and simply set that to one side when the minister responsible has written to the committee to say that, as far as he is concerned, he intends to take no action whatsoever.

Either way, as custodians of the public interest we have a responsibility to ensure that the government is held to account and that its actions are within the law. If we do not make sure of that, then no one is protecting the interests of the people of Canada. That is why I think it is essential, before the House considers breaking for the summer, that we look at some of these reports where a parliamentary committee has unanimously found that the government has acted in an improper way and that it should change its pattern of behaviour.

Another point I should stress is that we still do not know whether it is the intention of the government to put an end to this session of Parliament. If the government decides to call an end to this session, these reports will die on the Order Paper. There will be no way of bringing them before Parliament for the discussion and debate that is provided for in the rules of the House of Commons. That is why it is essential that we ensure that these matters are not simply left in limbo indefinitely. It is essential that Parliament consider some of them at this time.

On June 29, on behalf of the standing joint committee, I presented its unanimous report which deals with the regulations made under the Fisheries Act, the Atlantic coast marine plant regulations, SOR 81-363. The committee's concern about these regulations and the predecessor regulations goes back as far as 1979 when we first became aware of some of the problems with them. The act gives to the government the authority to make regulations and to issue permits for the harvesting of Irish moss, among other things, which is used commercially in Canada. That authority is given to the government and it is allowed to put conditions on the permits which are issued.

When we looked at the original regulations we found that they were written in such a way as to allow the government to suspend the right to harvest indefinitely. We found that that was not provided for in the Act of Parliament passed by this House and the Senate. We wrote to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), bringing this to his attention and asking that action be taken to bring the government's regulations and its actions into conformity with the law. I think that is a reasonable request to make.

Ultimately, the government amended the regulations which were of concern. However, it attempted to do indirectly what it could not do directly, that is, to put an indefinite suspension of a right in place through a rewording of the regulations when it realized it could not do so directly. Instead of not specifying a time period in which harvesting would not be allowed, it allowed the suspension to take place from January 1 of the year until December 31 of the year and to renew itself automatically on January 1. The government is using a subterfuge in this instance. It is attempting to do indirectly what would be against the law if it attempted to do it directly.

It might be useful to put on the record the report made by the committee, which is quite brief and explains more succinctly than I can the position taken by the committee. It states as follows:

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, Section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, C.38, your Joint Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses Section 6(a) of the Atlantic Coast Marine Plant Regulations as made by SOR/81-363. In your Committee's judgment this provision is ultra vires Section 34.3(b) of the Fisheries Act. in addition, of Section 6(a) were to be held valid by the courts, your Committee's judgment is that it amounts to an unusual and unexpected use of the power conferred on the Governor-in-Council by Section 34.3(b) of the Fisheries Act.

2. Section 34.2 of the Fisheries Act empowers the Minister to set conditions, of types there defined, in licences issued for the harvesting of marine plants. Section 34.3(a) of the Act empowers the Governor-in-Council to make regulations prohibiting, subject to the conditions of any licence issued by the Minister under Section 34.2, the harvesting of marine plants. Section 34.3(b) of the Act empowers the Governor-in-Council to make regulations prohibiting, notwithstanding the conditions of any licence, the harvesting of marine plants or any class thereof in any area or areas of the coastal waters of Canada for such period or periods as are specified in any such regulation. Section 6(a) of the Regulations under report prohibits the harvesting of Irish moss of the species Chondrus crispus, wire weed or horsetail notwithstanding the conditions of a licence issued by the Minister, during the period "from January 1 to December 31". To stipulate a period from January 1 to December 31 is to make the limitation or prohibition indefinite, or even perpetual, and to reproduce in substance the very provision in the original Section 6(a) to which your Committee objected in its Eighth Report for this Session (Statutory Instrument No. 13). That report was withdrawn when the Minister caused the then Section 6(a) to be revoked.

3. The original form of Section 6(a), as made by SOR/78-867, failed to specify any period at all during which harvesting was prohibited notwithstanding the terms of a licence. The justification for this failure to abide by the requirements of Section 34.3(b) of the Act was that the failure to specify any period amounted to the specification of an indefinite period which complied with the requirement that harvesting be prohibited "for such period or periods as are specified". The line of reasoning that failure to specify any period amounted to the specification of a period, albeit an indefinite one, was rejected by Addy J., in the Federal Court of Canada in Dantex Wollen Co. Inc. v. Minister of Industry, Trade & Commerce [1979] 2 F.C. 585. To specify a period from January 1 to December 31 as has now been done appears to your Committee to be a further attempt to specify an indefinite period in contravention of the statutory requirement to specify "such period or periods" during which marine plants may not be harvested notwithstanding the conditions of a harvesting licence. If your Committee is wrong in its legal conclusion it is of the view that Parliament never intended, in enacting Section 34.3(b), of the Fisheries Act, to allow a licence to be in effect suspended indefinitely and that the attempt to achieve this result by specifying an indefinite period of prohibition amounts to an unusual and unexpected use of power. What Parliament has in contemplation was the imposition of prohibitions of certain duration. It is true that the indefinite period now provided for in Section 6(a) is limited in area. If, however, a power is needed to suspend a licence in a particular area for an indefinite period, Parliament should be asked to grant the power. The Minister has rejected this course as impractical. He has also rejected your Committee's suggestion that the conditions attached to licences be altered so that they specify on their face that they can not be used in the location now specified in Section 6(a) of the Regulations. By rejecting these suggestions the Minister is issuing or continuing in force licences which are in a sense counterfeit. Your Committee regards this as an abuse of Section 34.3(b) of the Fisheries Act.

That was the report I tabled in Parliament on June 29, along with the motion to concur.

I should like to deal with some of the substance of that report, Mr. Speaker. The issue at stake is important as it relates to the role of Parliament in holding the government to account and in ensuring that, where Parliament delegates power to the executive, the government acts in a way which is proper and is within the law. No issue in Canada can be more important than respect for the rule of law. When the government decides that, notwithstanding what the law says, it has the right to take actions which may very well be illegal or, as the committee suggested, to issue licences which are in effect counterfeit, then respect for the law by all Canadians suffers as a result.

This is an issue, Mr. Speaker, which has continued over the course of three Parliaments. It is one which has vexed the committee now since 1979, and it obviously is a concern of the minister as well. We suggested a number of alternatives which could have been considered by the minister. First, he could have considered changing the condition of a licence or amending Section 34(3)(b) of the act. This would have allowed the minister to do what he wanted but in a legal and proper way and within that which Parliament contemplated at the time it passed the legislation. I think that is an essential consideration for us to keep in mind.

We wrote to the minister—the correspondence is appended to various committee reports and is available for members to examine—to make the suggestion on October 23, 1981 and we did not receive a response until March 18, 1982, which reads as follows:

I apologize for the lateness of my reply to your letter of October 23, 1981.

I acknowledge the complaints that the Committee has raised on Section 6(a) and agree that the authority to make this regulation is Section 34.3(b) of the Fisheries Act. As requested by the Committee, I have taken steps to specify a period in which the harvesting of Irish moss, wire weed or horsetail in a specified area is prohibited. This period is deemed necessary for the proper management of this resource.

The concern of the committee, Mr. Speaker, does not relate to the question of policy and whether or not it is necessary from time to time to suspend the right of people to harvest Irish moss. The issue is whether or not the process being followed by the government is legal and within that which was contemplated by Parliament. The minister continues as follows:

The two options you have suggested—changing the conditions of a licence or amending 34.3(b) of the Act are not practical. Consequently, I am not disposed to making further changes to Section 6(a) of the subject Regulations, as with the amendments that have been made by SOR/81-363, Section 6(a) is, in my view, within the parameters of the regulation making authority set out in Section 34.3(b) of the Act.

The critical statement made by the minister was this:

The two options you have suggested . . . are not practical. Consequently, I am not disposed to making further changes—

The issue at stake here is not the convenience of the government, not whether or not it would take time for the government to bring the law into conformity with what it would like it to be. The issue is the rule of law and whether the government has a responsibility to obey the law of the land and to act in the way which Parliament contemplated it should act when Parliament passed the legislation. If the government is dissatisfied with the way Parliament wrote the law, if it believes the wording proposed to and passed by Parliament was defective in some way, if it believes circumstances have changed such that it is necessary to have a change in the law as it stands, then it has the responsibility to come back to Parliament, to put legislation before Parliament and ask Parliament to make an amendment.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the concern of the committee is not with the policy being followed, the question of whether or not the right to harvest during some periods can be suspended; rather it is the question of the process being followed and whether it is in conformity with the rule of law. The committee found that it was not.

It is essential, Mr. Speaker, that we realize what the government was trying to do. Initially what it left out was a procedure whereby no time period was specified for a prohibition. In the finding of a court in a similar case, that meant that the prohibition could be indefinite. In that instance the court found that that was not contemplated by Parliament and consequently was an illegal action as conducted by the government. Then, rather than changing the act to bring it into conformity with what the minister would like it to be, he chose instead to try and find a subterfuge which would achieve the same effect, an indefinite suspension, without having to change the law. What he did was to specify the period from the first day of the year to the last day, automatically renewing itself on New Year's Day for the following year. So in fact we have a period of indefinite suspension.

There is a long-standing principle in law, which has been followed by Parliament in the past, that governments should not attempt to do indirectly what they are forbidden to do directly. It might be instructive to the House if I were to quote briefly from a decision made in a similar case by Mr. Justice Addy of the Federal Court of Canada. The case involved the Dantex Woollen Co. Inc. and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The issue was very similar, having to do with whether or not the government would have the right to suspend people's rights for an indefinite period of time when it was expected that there would be a limitation on the amount of time these rights would be suspended. Mr. Justice Addy deals with it on page 5 of his decision, where he said:

> As to the goods mentioned in item 47, it is clear on the evidence that at no time was their importation, in so far as any order of the Governor in Council is concerned, made subject to any limitation as to extent, quantity or time. The first question which arises is therefore whether, since there is no limitation of the extent to which the goods will be restricted or any limitation as to the period for which the limitation will be imposed, the Governor in Council has failed to exercise the judgment and control which Parliament might have directed him to exercise under the above-mentioned subsection 5(2) of the Act, and whether, as a result of such failure, item 47 might have been improperly and illegally included on the Import Control List and, therefore, not subject to import control. The Applicant argues in other words that, when an item is put on the List pursuant to section 5(2), it is absolutely essential that the order in council state to what extent and for what time or period the importation of the goods in that item is to be limited and that, failing this, the item is to be considered as if it had not been included on the List, because the Governor in Council has not properly limited the importation as required by Parliament.

He goes on to deal with the history of the legislation and then comes back to the issue on page 9, where he says:

> The Governor in Council was not obliged to accept the Board's recommendations following the two enquiries. But to say, as the counsel for the Respondents does, that from the mere fact that no limit as to duration has been mentioned in the order-in-council, one is to imply that the Governor in Council in fact exercised his discretion in favour of the restriction being imposed for an indefinite period, is a completely unacceptable argument: it flies in the face of all of the evidence as to how the List is in fact being administered. Furthermore, if failure to specify a time restriction means an indefinite period, then, failure to specify the extent means either an indefinite extent or amount or an absolute prohibition. Either of these two interpretations would directly contradict the express wording of the last paragraph of section 5(2).
> Finally, where a statute restricts a basic right recognized by common law and is capable of two interpretations, the strict interpretation, that is, an interpretation against the restriction and in favour of the citizen must be given the statute. Since such a rule of interpretation is used against enactments by Parliament, it must apply a fortiori against legislative enactments of the Governor in Council, which complete restrictive legislation.
> Orders-in-council issued pursuant to the Export and Import Permits Act are capable of greatly restricting and limiting the fundamental right of every citizen to fully engage in legitimate trade and business as he may deem fit. Its application in many cases might well remove from an importer, his sole means of livelihood or cause him very considerable losses.

Very clearly, Mr. Speaker, an analogy can be drawn between this and the situation of the harvesting of some marine plants off the east coast. Mr. Justice Addy continues:

> Unlike some legislation such as customs and excise which is intended to provide a more permanent type of protection for local industries and producers, the Export and Import Permits Act, from its tenor, obviously appears to be legislation enacted to permit controls for a limited time and for specific and very limited purposes and by reason of the existence of certain special circumstances and conditions or international commitments or undertakings which outweigh the rights of certain citizens to trade as they wish. Notwithstanding its effects, which are potentially highly restrictive, Parliament has chosen to delegate to the Governor in Council power to legislate in this area by enacting section 5, because of the time ordinarily required to enact detailed regulatory legislation in both Houses of Parliament and because of constantly changing international arrangements and commitments and continually shifting conditions of the international market and of Canadian production and markets. Parliament, however, has also attempted to provide the strict limitations to which I have already referred, on the exercise of that power. Any delegation by the Governor in Council to the Minister of the legislative power to decide for how long and to what extent importation of any goods must be restricted and subject to control, is ultra vires and of no effect.

• (1530)

That was the decision of Mr. Justice Addy of the Federal Court of Canada, Trial Division. We believe, and the committee believes unanimously, on the advice of its counsel, that this decision was directly applicable to the situation that was before us when we considered these harvesting regulations which were proposed by the minister.

The minister appeared to accept that argument. He appeared to agree with the committee that not to specify a time period was ultra vires, otherwise he would not have changed the regulations themselves. He chose instead to proclaim new regulations. But the form that he chose of specifying a period that ran from New Year's Day to New Year's Eve and which renewed itself again on New Year's Day was a means of achieving through the back door what he simply could not achieve through the front door. That is why when the committee looked at this issue it found that what the minister was trying to do was likely ultra vires.

I should stress to members of the House and to members of the public as well who are not aware of the committee's practices that a committee can offer an opinion as it relates to the legality of what the government is doing. In no way is that opinion binding; it is simply an opinion by a parliamentary committee that it feels the government is acting in a way that is illegal, in a way not authorized by law. Ultimately, the only institution that can decide whether or not the government has acted legally is the court.

Through evolution and development of the committee over the years the decision was made by members of the committee, and it was supported by Parliament, that the committee had an obligation to take a look at statutory instruments that were passed from the point of view of vires, of legality, and to offer an opinion, and that the government had the responsibility—and I should stress responsibility—where there was doubt, to bend over backwards to stay within the letter and the spirit of the law. Surely we should expect a standard of behaviour from government, which not only matches that which we expect of people in the private sector, but which surpasses it. Unless the government itself indicates that it has respect for the rule of law, it is impossible for us to expect that ordinary Canadians and institutions in the private sector would share that respect that all of us, as parliamentarians, feel is essential.

One of the reasons we felt it essential that the committee look at the question of vires and one of the reasons why the issue of vires, or legality, has been looked at by similar committees in the Commonwealth is that it is often extremely costly for individuals to go to court when their rights have been infringed upon by a government acting illegally. In addition to that, Parliament has a responsibility to keep an eye on what the government is doing to ensure that, when we delegate authority to the government to act by regulation, it acts in a way that is legal and proper and within the spirit intended by Parliament. If we do not do that, then we have no right to delegate this authority to the government; we are then simply negligent in terms of discharging our responsibility to the people of Canada.

For those two reasons the committee of long standing has taken the position that it had a responsibility to look at the question of vires to ensure that the government was acting in a way that was legal.

In our opinion, making the change in the way the minister did, trying to bring in through the back door something he could not do through the front door, does not make legal what would otherwise be illegal. Again I stress that only the courts would have the authority to make a final decision on that matter. But the minister is not disposed to send this question to the courts for a ruling. For anyone else to take the minister to the court would, of course, be a costly procedure, and it is one which Parliament cannot do. What Parliament can do is to look at it, to get advice from counsel, to seek opinions as broad as possible from people skilled in the law, and to advise Parliament to advise the minister when it believes that the minister and the government are acting in a way that goes beyond the law.

I believe this is a minister who is committed to the rule of law and who would not want to act in a way which could be found to be illegal. Nor would the minister—and I fully accept his sincerity on this—want to take an action which could be demonstrated to be beyond the intent of Parliament at the time Parliament passed legislation. It is not enough to say simply that it is legal, even if one accepts—and we do not—that it was legal. But if it were an action beyond the intent of Parliament, if Parliament had intended that this statute be used in a very different way from the way being used by the minister, then obviously the minister would have a moral responsibility and obligation, as head of a department, as the person charged with the responsibility by Parliament, holding a very important responsibility and trust for the people of Canada, to act within the spirit of what Parliament intended and would not simply try to do an end run on Parliament. Surely if the consent of government and if the consent of the representatives of the people of Canada is to mean anything, the government has a responsibility first to consult fully with Parliament about its intentions and, second, to ensure that Parliament consents to what it is doing.

This is why the committee took the position that we believed that for the government to do indirectly what it could not do directly was beyond the powers which were given to it under the law. Second, that is why we make the decision to report to the House that even if the minister were to go to court and to find that he had acted legally, this sort of indefinite prohibition running for 365 days a year, for 366 days during a leap year, was clearly not something contemplated by Parliament; otherwise Parliament would have written the legislation in a way which made that explicit.

I do not think that it is asking too much to expect the government to bring what is relatively a minor technical amendment before Parliament. I suspect that if the government were to do that and bring the law into conformity with the wishes of Parliament, we would find that Parliament could pass that amendment very quickly.

The argument is often made by ministers of the Crown that it would be very time consuming to be proposing a whole series of amendments to legislation. But, Mr. Speaker, clearly the government has two options that it could consider when a committee has found that the government is acting in a way that is ultra vires and it has recommended that if it wants to act in a particular fashion it could change the law. First, it could introduce the legislation in the Senate. If House time is at a premium, then it is certainly possible for the government to introduce the legislation in the Senate, have the debate take place largely in the Senate and have committee study take place in the Senate, where the time of that House is much less at a premium than it is here. When that consideration has taken place, if the amendment being made is relatively unobjectionable, and in particular if a parliamentary committee with members of all three parties and with representation from both the House of Commons and the Senate have recommended it, and if it has been made at the request of a parliamentary committee, then it is reasonable to expect that the government could likely get speedy passage when the bill came to the House of Commons. That is one option the government could choose if it is concerned that introducing a specific bill on one particular measure in the House of Commons would be consuming too much time in the House.

The other option is that from time to time there are miscellaneous statute law amendment bills. It would be quite possible for the minister to communicate, I believe it would be with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), and to indicate to him that he shares the concern of the parliamentary committee about this particular action, that he accepts that it may be ambiguous, that there is some doubt whether or not it is legal. Or if he wishes to maintain that it is legal, he could indicate that there is doubt in his mind whether or not it was within the intent of Parliament at the time, and that specifically he would like to acquire the consent of Parliament to act that way. The Minister of Justice could include this sort of relatively minor technical adjustment in a miscellaneous statute law amendments bill. These bills by and large get quite speedy passage by the House of Commons and do not tie up the House for a protracted period of time. They enable the government to make some pretty significant changes to the law from time to time.

That brings us to the question as to what I expect and what members of the standing joint committee expect will come of the debate this afternoon. There are a number of options that are possible for the government. It could continue to debate this issue throughout the course of the day. There are a number of members in the House who are interested in doing that. I know that the minister will want to follow me when I complete my remarks and I think members of the House will be looking forward to hearing from him.

Another option which the government could follow is clearly to attempt to seize control of this and to prevent Parliament from coming to a resolution of the matter. That was done once before with one of the committee reports, and it was regrettable because it meant that we were taking away from committees the right to have their unanimous reports debated in Parliament and the right to bring to the attention of Parliament in the case of a standing joint committee actions which we believe could very well be illegal.

The third option is the one which I hope will be followed by the government in this instance. It will expedite proceedings, and I think it will be the most positive course which could be followed by the government. It would be for the minister to say that he continues to maintain his reservations about the question whether or not the regulation was legal or illegal, the question of vires, but that he does accept that there is ambiguity here and that there is some question, at least in the committee's mind, as to whether this was intended by Parliament. He could indicate that he was prepared to recommend to his colleagues that this matter either be introduced in the Senate, to make an amendment to the law as it stands today, or that it be included in the next miscellaneous statutes amendment bill that comes before Parliament.

If that could be done, I think hon. members of the House would be very pleased. We could certainly make much better progress in terms of dealing with this. We have an obligation. I have not often called for concurrence in committee reports which have been made, because of the fact that I recognize it takes the time of the House to do so and often there is very pressing legislation before the House which the people of Canada have the right to expect to be passed. I do so reluctantly in instances where the committee has come to the conclusion that the government has acted particularly in a way which may be illegal or where there is some serious deficiency in a regulation which has been passed. The committee has a very important responsibility placed upon it by Parliament to review statutory instruments from the basis of a series of technical criteria to ensure that the government is discharging its delegated responsibilities in a way that is proper, legal and conducive to respect for the rule of law in Canada.

If the standing joint committee does not discharge its responsibilities, if I as chairman do not discharge my responsibility when the committee makes a report and it appears that there is an impasse between a minister and the committee, and if Parliament itself does not consider a report where the committee has unanimously said it believes the government is acting in a way which is illegal, then we are deficient in discharging our responsibilities on behalf of Canadians and it is impossible for us to expect that Canadians would have respect for Parliament.

Hundreds and hundreds of orders in council and regulations are passed over the course of a year. Each one of them affects the rights of Canadians. Many of them affect the rights of Canadians in a very profound and fundamental way. Many of them affect the ability of people to earn a livelihood. This particular regulation before us today affects the ability of people to earn a livelihood. Where these rights are affected by delegated legislation and Parliament has given a broad grant of authority to the government to act in a particular manner, then Canadians have a right to expect that Parliament will discharge its responsibilities of scrutiny and oversight, hold the government to account, and ask that the government act in a way which is consistent with the rule of law.

I want to give the minister an opportunity to respond. I know hon. members on all sides of the House will be very interested in hearing his response. I hope the conclusion of this debate will be a positive one of which all members of the House and all Canadians can be proud, because we have taken an action to rectify something which, if left undone, would be an example of serious neglect on the part of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): The hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc).

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), as the seconder of the motion, has the right to speak and address the House prior to the minister. If Your Honour wishes a precedent for that, I draw your attention to Hansard of December 11, 1975, at page 9934, wherein the Deputy Speaker ruled that, while the minister might wish to express his view early in the debate:

> I know this report of the committee is a unanimous report and the minister might be anxious perhaps to support the report, I do not know, before any other member rises in criticism of him or the government. I understand his point of view, but in fairness I think I have to recognize, first, the seconder of the motion.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that you should recognize the hon. member for Provencher, the seconder of the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I appreciate the hon. member's comment, but the very essence of debate requires that we alternate from one side of the House to the other, irrespective of the matter just raised by the hon. member. Thus, having recognized the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, he now has the floor.

[Translation]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, since I believe this is the first time you have presided in your new capacity, allow me to congratulate you, on behalf of the members from New Brunswick, upon your election to this prestigious office and this expression of confidence by Parliament.

[English]

I regret that I was only given notice that this issue would be coming up for discussion today at one o'clock. I especially regret that the legal adviser to my department who has been dealing with this matter is moving to another department and that in fact he is away from Ottawa. I have had very little time, considering the fact that I was here in question period, to try to prepare for this. I will not say that mine is a legal argument because I read somewhere that the man who acts as his own legal adviser has a fool for a client, or words to that effect, and I would not have that naiveté, especially since the members of the committee are lawyers and I have heard their debates on two occasions in the past year.

The problem of regulating the fishery is recognized as one where we are, as the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) indicated, really affecting the livelihood of people. Occasionally I have told some of my officials that in fact we are in people's pockets, because when we regulate for reasons of conservation, when we allocate between gear types, types of fleets and types of boats, we are in fact affecting the livelihood and income of fishermen.

The regulations affecting marine plants are fairly recent. In fact, they have been the subject of considerable complication, as I am informed by the lawyers in my department. I recognize that the committee was concerned. We went the way we felt we could in attempting to meet the committee's concern by putting in a time definition.

The hon. member who spoke before me indicated that they did not accept this approach, which in fact was suggested by the legal advisers of my department. Although I have to say that I oppose concurrence in this report, I do it with regret because of the excellent suggestion of the hon. member who led the debate. His suggestion that we should approach these changes or these corrections, if corrections are required in the law, through a mechanism like debate in the Senate or an omnibus bill approach to what I might describe as housecleaning or housekeeping changes in the law, is one which recommends itself to me.

I might say very simply to the House that for some time I have been wanting to present amendments to the Fisheries Act. The House recognizes, as did the hon. member, that every minister who would like to make adjustments for new situations which arise realizes—and I am thinking of the amendments of 1977 which were adopted unanimously by the House, major amendments in habitat protection and in conservation of the fishery—that we reopen the act as infrequently as possible because we are competing with some 28 to 30 other departments of government which also say that they have urgent legislation to discuss.

In light of that suggestion and the fact that the committee was unanimous in its report, I would like to think that we could have found a solution. In fact, today I suggested to the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe that perhaps we could delay the discussion by a day and have some talks among ourselves so that we may find a way to prevent rejection of the committee report and agree to discuss it for some time in order to find a method to act within the law if we are not doing so, which is what we all want.

I find myself in a bind because I am advised by a legal adviser in my department that to accept the committee's approach would cause considerable impact on a number of areas in the fishery where we are trying to administer the fishery in terms of conservation through some rather complex and difficult regulations. If we were to accept the report of the committee, the impact on those regulations would cause us very considerable difficulty. Therefore, I find myself having to reject concurrence in the report although I have taken a very positive approach to these issues where we are all trying to achieve good conservation and management. We may differ occasionally on the techniques and methods to achieve this, but we certainly do not differ on the intention of the Fisheries Act, which is to conserve the species for the enjoyment of our future generations.

I am quite open to the possibility of the House finding a way to accept the third option of the hon. member to try to find a solution to the problem through further discussions. However, if it comes down to the crunch, I am afraid that due to the implications for other regulations in the fishery I have to recommend that we vote against it. As I said before, it is with some regret because I found the atmosphere of the committee quite non-partisan. The committee was trying to be helpful to departments which were led by people like myself who are not lawyers, but who are trying to do their job.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, as the seconder to the concurrence motion moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), I would like to put a few comments on the record regarding the motion. Initially, I want to thank the hon. member for Wellington-Duffering-Simcoe not only for the lucid manner in which he again demonstrated to the House his grasp of the subject matter in the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, but also for his attempts in the House time after time to make the government and the bureaucracy more accountable to members of the House and, through us, more accountable to Canadians generally. I believe all of us have been impressed with the manner in which he has approached his work in the committee, co-chairing it with a member from the other place.

Before I get into the body of my comments I want to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker. It is my first opportunity to do so since you have taken your position of presiding over the affairs of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: In his response to the mover of the concurrence motion, the minister raised the dilemma in which a minister finds himself in terms of fulfilling the responsibilities of administration in a department and having the necessary legislative and regulatory authority to fulfil that responsibility, on the one hand, and fulfilling as well the intentions of the House of Commons which are, of course, embodied in legislation that govern the minister's responsibilities in his administration. I think that those of us who have occupied those chairs and have had that responsibility have faced that frustration of how to find time in the House to open up an act, because when so doing it takes up so much time of the House that not only can the amendments not take place, but you become involved in so many other areas that even the limited intention is eventually lost as well.

I recall that when I was Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development there was a strong attitude expressed in the House and throughout the country generally that the discriminatory clauses of the Indian Act should be amended, especially Section 12(1)(b) which discriminates against Indian women. Our government made a commitment to amend that section of the act, and while other sections in the Indian Act needed amendment, we felt it was pressing that Section 12(1)(b) be amended quickly. However, we found there was not enough time in the House to bring that matter before it to get that section in particular amended.

Since that time history now shows that not only has the act still not been amended even though we passed the Charter of Rights, but we have also found that for the first time in Canada's history it has had an issue brought before the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations. Canadians, through the House and its legislative process, have been found to be discriminating against Indian women by that international forum.

The minister's statement about that frustration, conundrum or dilemma is very valid. I also appreciated the suggestion by the minister that a mechanism is needed in terms of finding House time whereby what is referred to commonly as housekeeping amendments can, in fact, be brought forward.

I intend to address that subject in my comments today as I support the concurrence motion, especially as it relates to parliamentary reform. I think that it is one of the questions that should be addressed by the special committee which has been struck to consider parliamentary reform when it sits again in the early fall of this year.

What is important for members of the House to understand is what is meant by the concurrence motion. This is the thirteenth report of the committee in which it specifically looked at the Fisheries Act and Section 34, subsection (2) and whether the regulations flowing from that section were in violation of or ultra vires the legislation passed in the House. The issue might be seen as an unimportant one by some. It concerns the harvesting of marine plants. Obviously, it is important to those involved in that enterprise. Some might ask why it is necessarily an issue which a committee, co-chaired by my colleague for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe, should take the time to study both in the committee and the House. It is an important issue and I intend to use another example to show Canadians that the work the committee does is vitally important.

You will recall that a year ago, Mr. Speaker, during the Christmas recess of the House, the government passed an emergency planning order. That was also done by the regulatory process. That issue has created a great amount of concern in many parts of Canada as to whether that type of planning order has not gone beyond the regulatory scope of government or whether that matter should have been brought to the House of Commons and debated in the form of legislation. You will recall that during the FLQ crisis in 1970, at which time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) used the War Measures Act, he said that from then on he would bring in special legislation which would not be as draconian as the War Measures Act in order to deal with issues of a domestic nature.

Returning to the thirteenth report of the committee, the committee was looking at the Fisheries Act which has empowered the minister to set conditions for the issuance of licences for the harvesting of marine plants. But as well the committee pointed out that the conditions had to have a specified period of time. That was where the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments took issue with the regulations passed.

• (1600)

In an attempt to get around that difficulty, the minister did put in a time-frame, namely, from January 1 to December 31. I do not think it takes too much imagination to recognize that that takes care of an entire year, and if no date as to year is set out, it means that the licence will not be issued because the omission has taken care of every day of every year. While in a very narrow sense it might be argued by the minister that he did give a specified time-frame, the effect of so doing was such that it did not change the issue which the committee was examining. So it is that issue with which we are dealing today.

Considering the manner in which this matter could be addressed, the committee said in its report:

If your Committee is wrong in its legal conclusion it is of the view that Parliament never intended, in enacting Section 34.3(b), of the Fisheries Act, to allow a licence to be in effect suspended indefinitely and that the attempt to achieve this result by specifying an indefinite period of prohibition amounts to an unusual and unexpected use of power.

The committee has been very positive, and I think that has been the understanding of hon. members in general. Not only has it been the watchdog of Parliament in seeing that regulations are in keeping with legislation passed and within the spirit of such legislation, but the committee also went on to offer certain remedies or recommendations to the minister, and obviously did not accept the remedy which the minister thought would satisfy, at least in the narrow, technical sense, the wishes of the committee. The committee went on to state in its report:

If, however, a power is needed to suspend a licence in a particular area for an indefinite period, Parliament should be asked to grant the power. The minister has rejected this course as impractical.

Today in the House the minister again rejected it as impractical, because it means that he must open the act. It means that he must find time in the House of Commons to open up the prior Fisheries Act. He knows, I know and hon. members of the House in general understand that once one opens the act, anything relating to fisheries can be debated. Maybe that is also an area which we should be examining in the parliamentary committee. I see that the assistant to the Privy Council is here and he also sits on the special committee on parliamentary reform. We should perhaps examine how to pass housekeeping legislation.

The minister found it impractical and he has given his reasons, but the fact remains that even though that difficulty remains, it still did not satisfy the committee. The committee, in its positive way, went on to state that the minister:

—has also rejected your Committee's suggestion that the conditions attached to licences be altered so that they specify on their face that they can not be used in the location now specified in Section 6(a) of the Regulations.

There was another remedy given, that if one could get at the problem from the point of time, then possibly one could bring in regulations which would have changed the operation in view of the licences which were being issued. However, I think the committee makes its conclusions very pointedly when it states:

By rejecting these suggestions the Minister is issuing or continuing in force licences which are in a sense counterfeit. Your Committee regards this as an abuse of Section 34.3(b) of the Fisheries Act.

It is the responsibility of the minister to issue licences which are valid. He has the responsibility to issue licences which are within the legislation and within regulations which are not in violation of the legislation. That has not been done.

I take some hope from the minister's positive comments today that he is also looking for a solution. However, I think this question goes beyond the narrow confines of the Fisheries Act. This is a larger question which is twofold. One is the question of legality. Parliament must at all times operate within the confines of the law. The law gives power, but the law also confines. It is the responsibility of every minister and every hon. member in the House of Commons to consider that. In fact, I suggest that is why the committee was established in the first place. I do not want to impute any motives and I am not, but in any act the regulations can be seen to be ultra vires the legislation. That is why Parliament has seen fit to form the committee, in order that those conundrums or difficulties, if they develop, can be brought to the light of day and changed.

I also consider legislation which has taken a longer period of time to prepare. I call to mind the changes to the Immigration Act. Hon. members will recall that there was a controversial issue and changes to the Immigration Act were found necessary. We all recognized that. The government at the time was not sure of the best manner in which to approach it, so it introduced a green paper. I know there were some skeptics concerning the green paper approach and whether or not it would lead to good legislation or to any legislation at all, but after an extensive debate on the subject of the green paper in Ottawa, that committee hit the road. It was one of the most interesting experiences I had in the House because we very quickly found that every immigration issue seemed to be brought before the committee. There were times when we needed police escort out of certain Canadian cities because of the anger generated by the government's immigration policy. But we did give a majority report. Most members on both sides of the House agreed with the thrust of the report. Out of that report, the Immigration Act was then finally brought forward.

The point I am trying to make is that when the committee handed in its report—the legislation had gone to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration at that time—it was interesting to note that the members who had been through this long process of legislation-making, who were well-informed as to the issues, could look at a specific clause and very quickly realize the likely effect of such a clause. I forget how many amendments were brought forward at that time, but I know that the members of that committee from this party brought forward some 95 amendments. Many of them were approved. To this day, I still believe the reason was that there was a good spirit in that committee in trying to develop the best legislation, the best immigration policy we could.

But there was one lack even in that process. All of us recognized that while the Immigration Act brought forward intentions or gave general guidelines and rules as to how immigration would be administered in Canada, the nitty-gritty of that Immigration Act involved the regulations which would be promulgated by the government, flowing out of the act. Despite our expertise in the committee, we had no ability to persuade the government to state how those regulations might first be promulgated and then interpreted in view of the legislation.

In fairness to the government, and I want to be fair, it did bring in some draft regulations. It was possibly the first time the government brought in draft regulations and tried to show that, while they were not complete regulations, that was the manner in which the regulations would flow, and we were able to see whether they were in conformity with the legislation before us.

When we look at parliamentary reform one of the questions we have to answer is, is it not now practical that, for a large amount of legislation before us which requires technical regulation, draft regulations should accompany the legislation? I know it would put more pressure on the ministers and on the departments to produce those regulations in order to have the package much more complete than sometimes is the case now with legislation. However, I do think this would avoid some of the difficulties which the committee, which my hon. friend co-chaired, now has to examine.

In addition, I want to point out that regulations—and I think this is a view commonly held in the country—are very often more onerous than the legislation itself. One finds this especially in the business community. A seemingly innocuous and short piece of legislation often seems to cause the flow of a plethora of regulation, or what has been referred to as the paper burden. No one is more aware of this paper burden than those in our business community. In fact, a committee was struck by the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Lapointe) to reduce that paper burden. That paper burden is a direct result of regulations that flow from the legislation. Not only must the regulations be legal, they must also be within the spirit of the legislation that is passed.

We recognize very quickly that my colleague, as he speaks in the House on this issue, has developed a technical expertise in an area which many Members of Parliament might find tedious. he has taken his responsibility very seriously and is always guided by one rule, namely, the rule of law.

This takes me to the last point I want to make this afternoon, which is this. I believe the parliamentary reform committee has a very important role to fulfil, and that is to look at the global picture in this House of Commons regarding how legislation is passed. I agree with members opposite, and they might be surprised at this, that some legislation takes too long. It is sometimes because of that length of time and the fear that other legislation might take as long that housekeeping matters do not come before us. I have found that within the parliamentary reform committee there is a spirit of co-operation with an attempt to solve this dilemma, both from the government's point of view and the point of view of the opposition. This is a sentiment that I think was also expressed by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc).

I concur with the report, Mr. Speaker, and I commend the committee members for the manner in which they have approached the matter. I say to the government that we all recognize that regulations must both be within the spirit of the legislation and conform to the legislation in terms of law. The committee has found that this is not the case in respect of the Fisheries Act, and I recommend to the minister, as did my hon. friend, that he find a remedy other than the one he has tried, the one of which the committee did not approve.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to add a few comments to this debate on concurrence in the thirteenth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. That report refers to an issue about which I have been concerned for many years.

I have had the courtesy of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) over the years on matters I have brought to his attention. He has always been very courteous in receiving me, listening to me and agreeing with the justice of a point of view.

One of the things we are struggling with in Canadian society today is the movement of the balance of power away from the House of Commons and the elected Members of Parliament, including ministers, to the bureaucracy. The type of regulation we are dealing with in this debate today on the motion for concurrence in the thirteenth report is at the heart of this issue. I have always thought that a person involved in widely diverse activities, operating under the rule of law, which my colleague the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) so ably put forward in his opening speech, should be free from the arbitrary interference by government or its officials. This debate today and this thirteenth report deal with that essential issue. I am sure I am not the only member sitting in this House as an elected Member of Parliament from a constituency in Canada who has seen all too many examples over the years, examples increasing in severity, of the arbitrary decision-making process by public servants, officials and inspectors that interfere with a persons's right under the rule of law.

We are moving into a legalistic type of society in this country in which the regulations coming through orders in council from government number some 3,500 per year. All too often law-abiding citizens and people who want to do what is right find themselves at odds with the law and outside what they believe to be the normal logical process.

I have had the occasion to be very courteously received on many occasions by the minister since I have been a member, and I thank him for that courtesy, in respect of the problems of my constituents, those people involved with fisheries and the environment on the west coast. The minister has been sympathetic toward the arbitrary nature of the decision-making process and the interference that has too often been the habit on the part of fisheries officials. We are really dealing with the freedom to choose and make a decision under laws as they are understood by the average Canadian. We are getting ourselves into such a complicated and legalistic type of world that no one any longer has that decision-making base.

I have recently been to the minister and he knows I am very concerned regarding matters of the environment. He knows I do not want to see the environment abused and that I am a very concerned Member of Parliament in terms of protecting biological species, particularly those pertaining to fisheries. I have also had to go to his department and ask why an arbitrary decision, under the specific type of regulation that is being discussed here in the thirteenth report, can be made when scientists both within the department and in the university system agree that there is no threat to the habitat. I have asked why someone in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans can say, "No, you may not proceed with a pilot project because, because—".

It does not stand up to the learned opinion of scientists in that circumstance that someone should have the arbitrary power to say, "You may not proceed with a pilot project", and I refer specifically to two species of seaweed on the Pacific coast. One is an annual which clears out with the flow of water and the seasons out there annually. They are saying, "No, you cannot harvest that because that might interfere with some unknown factor within the fishery habitat." The other one is a biannual which grows in different stages as it comes up to the surface. What they were asking to harvest was something like 5,000 tonnes a year for a pilot project in order to develop a major breakthrough which had happened at the Simon Fraser University. Canadian scientists had finally been able to take this species of kelp and isolate into commercial chemical processes six, seven or eight different marketable components and compounds from that kelp. Years of work have gone into this, and the minister's officials will advise him that the science behind this is of a very high order. Very capable people are involved, and they just seek a pilot project, which in no way can endanger any of the species, in order to get some kind of delivery going with respect to this process of isolating compounds from this biannual species of seaweed.

The federal department is saying: "No, we don't think you can proceed until some other report which was started by the province of British Columbia can be delivered and we can study it." Why the department really is saying no is that if this pilot project is successful and it is desired to move beyond the 5,000 tonnes harvest, the department does not know how far down the line the project will go.

However, I can say right now that because of these arbitrary powers, not held by scientists in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans but by other officials, the season for 1983, the harvest of 5,000 tonnes of kelp species to put into this pilot project and the chemistry of isolating these seven or eight compounds, will be lost for another whole year. This is a Canadian technology, for which we have paid by way of grants from the federal government and the provincial government to our universities, which will be lost. Perhaps it will come about in 1984 or 1985, or maybe the scientist responsible for this breakthrough will just take it out of the country to somewhere else where it can become viable. This type of arbitrary power held by officials in the department seriously concerns and troubles me.

I am sorry the minister has to be in the position today of speaking against concurrence in this report because my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe, has given him a couple valid suggestions, which I believe the minister acknowledged in his remarks. He said that the matter of this type of regulation and the amendment of the section within the statute could be dealt with by the Senate as an initiative so that it would not take up special House time for which he is competing with 29 or 30 other departments. We understand that, but we would like to appeal to the minister today that there be a miscellaneous statutes amendment bill brought forward. Surely this type of request brought forward in a unanimous report of a very responsible and important committee of this House can be responded to in such a way that, as an elected Member of Parliament, as I am, the minister can start to represent the people at large, protect their freedom of choice, protect their ability and right to make decisions under the basic rule of law of the land and start, as a Member of Parliament, pushing back the arbitrary powers that are being given to the public service as a result of the avalanche of legislation that is coming down.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans probably has more of a socialist mind-set than I. I am a Member of Parliament who is very concerned that because of all the regulation we have and because of the type of matter being addressed in the thirteenth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments—specifically this issue—we as elected representatives are failing the people who sent us here.

In the tug-of-war going on in the standing committee addressing orders and procedures of the House of Commons, which my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), just mentioned, I believe it was Professor John Stewart, one of our witnesses, who said that as we tug back and forth in the struggle for power, surely it is up to every single Member of Parliament to make sure that the knot moves toward the House of Commons and Parliament and away from bureaucracy. I think the minister will have to agree that that is a struggle which is very important. It is the struggle on which this debate today hinges.

That is why I stand and appeal to the reasonableness of this minister. I cannot refer to the reasonableness of all his colleagues, but I certainly can refer to that of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I appeal to him to consider seriously the suggestions the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe has given him. I ask that the minister hear my appeal on behalf of the people of Canada. My goodness, surely as elected members we have a responsibility to protect the rule of law. We have put it into some jeopardy and confusion with our new Constitution. We will probably spend a decade or so sorting that out in the courts of our land. But surely as elected Members of Parliament believing in the representative democratic system this House delivers, we can start protecting the people at large and those interested in certain specific activities within this country from the overuse and abuse of the arbitrary powers we have given to the public service of this country. Let us pull that knot back into the House and let the minister give a second thought to, or have a second look at, his apparent gentle opposition to concurrence in measures of this nature, because I think this is becoming an issue of very serious concern to many people in Canada who perhaps cannot explain themselves.

Perhaps I am not doing a good enough job for the minister, but this is a matter which keeps me on my feet and keeps me working pretty hard because I am afraid we are losing our freedom of choice as we move to more and more state control over our lives and as we move more and more to a sub-government which is removed from the checks and balances we should be demanding and protecting in this House of Commons. We are incorporating Crown corporations with agency of Her Majesty status, and these powers mean that these corporations we create do not have to conform to the laws of the provinces and do not have to conform to the laws of the federal government. They have the guarantee of the federal government in their borrowings. They are really outside the normal flow and balance of life.

I believe the debate today is an important one. It is true that the debate is on a very narrow issue within an act but, nevertheless, it is at the heart of our freedom to choose and our right to be protected from the arbitrary powers or the unnecessary use and overuse of arbitrary powers by too many civil servants today.

I have seen a sense of possessiveness which exists within the Department of Fisheries and Oceans which really troubles me. In other words, instead of the fisheries belonging to the people of Canada, the fisheries and the work of protecting the fisheries and harvesting seems to be more and more the personal property of either the state or the servants serving state organizations.

I know of a person who put half a million dollars into a fish hatchery under an agreement with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans whereby the eggs for that fish hatchery were purchased from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. After that investment was made, release and capture rights were denied, so the young fish brought out of the hatchery were put into pens out in the salt water and fed with feed which had to be brought in in pellet form from the United States. I have seen harassment of that individual to the point where he has lost his health and his money. His operation did have a chance. Had there been a spirit of co-operation from officials in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, it could have gone a long way to providing more protein to the people of Canada and the world. It troubles me that this sense of possessiveness exists today. I see it in the seaweed harvest operations that are interfering with and postponing a very valuable pilot project.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I urge the minister to sift out of my remarks the serious concern that I feel about these arbitrary powers and, in the tug-of-war between the bureaucracy and the people of Canada through their elected representatives, move that knot back into the House of Commons and thus bring a sense of service back to our civil servants rather than the sense of power which, in the realm of human nature, we all have the tendency to abuse.

That is the fundamental message I wanted to deliver to the minister, Mr. Speaker. I know he is a very reasonable person, so maybe he will sift out of my comments some reason that would make him change his mind and not debate against concurrence of this very important report.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak in support of concurrence in this report. I should like to add to the kind words of some members who have already spoken about the excellent work done by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) as co-chairman of the committee. With his co-chairman from the other place, he put a lot of hours and effort into making the committee work.

The thirteenth report of this committee focuses primarily on Section 34(2) and some of the problems involved. It has been fairly clear that either the intention of Parliament in regard to that section was not followed or that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, or the minister, has been creating regulations and making use of that part of the act in a way that was not intended by Parliament. This could jeopardize the livelihood of some fishermen or legality of some of the permits that have been issued or rescinded in many areas of the country.

I should like to touch on a matter which has been before the committee for the past 15 months, and that is the Alice Arm tailing deposit regulations, SOR 79-345. I bring this matter up because of some peculiar circumstances that have arisen since a split vote was recorded—and it is only the second vote taken in the 11 years of the committee. I think it is important to put on the record some of the events surrounding that vote so that many of the groups that have been following the issue know exactly what happened.

During the year that documents were going back and forth between the committee and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), the minister appeared before the committee with his legal counsel. Many hours were spent examining a great deal of data on two principal points that the committee was concerned about, and that is whether proper notice was given in relation to these regulations and whether there was an unusual and unexpected use of power. The vote taken by the committee was to the effect that there was an unusual and unexpected use of power. I think it is important for the minister to respond to the events that followed, since he has indicated that he is going to debate against concurrence in the report.

This report is important in a functional way in that it aims to make certain that the minister and his department abide by legislation created by this House. It seems to me that there is responsibility on a minister to follow through when the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments comes to a unanimous or consensual position on regulations.

In regard to the Alice Arm tailing deposit regulations, what has occurred is a very unusual state of affairs in that the committee voted there was an unusual and unexpected use of power. In the following days after the lawyers had written the report, it became clear that various government members were involved in what can only be described as an abuse of the committee—a kind of political blackmail that should not be used against committees. The parliamentary secretary made it clear to the co-chairmen of the committee and to the steering committee that, should the vote that was taken to report the unusual and unexpected use of power by the minister to Parliament today go ahead, then the Liberal members would simply march in a bunch of backbenchers and vote the report down. This would have been the first time that had ever occurred in the long history of that committee and it would have seriously abused the committee's ability to come up with the consensual reports that are necessary.

What the other members of the committee and I agreed to was that we would stand the vote. Essentially this meant that the vote that was taken would continue to stand, but that the formal report which would have come before Parliament today would not come forward.

Since that time it has become clear that for various reasons other parties decided they were going to interpret what the committee did in different ways. The co-chairman from the other place decided to send out a letter regarding the issue. I should like to read portions of that letter into the record because I think it is important that people who have followed this issue for so long have an opportunity to know exactly what happened regarding all the evidence that was taken, from the time the vote was taken in committee censuring the minister to the kind of blackmail that was used against the committee to put the report forward, to the kind of statements that are being made to the public. The co-chairman of the committee from the other place, Senator Godfrey, wrote to a Miss Dorothy Potts of Project North in Victoria, B.C. as follows:

—you stated "that at its June 30th meeting, the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments confirmed its earlier decision that the above named Regulations constituted an unusual and unexpected use of the powers conferred on the Governor in Council by Section 33(4)(b) and (13) of the Fisheries Act." I now understand why you made such a statement because it has been drawn to my attention that Mr. Jim Fulton, MP in the House of Commons on July 5, 1982, said that "last week the joint Standing Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments unanimously upheld the censure of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) for unusual and unexpected use of power in pushing through the Alice Arm tailing deposit regulations."

This statement by Mr. Fulton is not in accordance with the understanding reached at the Committee meeting on June 29. At a meeting of the Committee on June 3, 1982 (of which I am enclosing a copy of the proceedings herewith), the Alice Arm matter was extensively discussed, and the members of the Committee voted 4 to 3 that the Committee "report to their respective Houses that the making of SOR/79-345-Alice Arm Tailing Deposit Regulations-amounts to an unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the Fisheries Act."

In fact, that is what occurred and it is on the record of the committee. The report was supposed to come before the House today for debate. As I pointed out to you, Mr. Speaker, through the actions of the government it could not come before Parliament, and now these people are interpreting what occurred in the committee in ways that are not in accordance with the facts. The co-chairman continued:

The four members who voted in the 'affirmative' were Messrs. Baker, Hnatyshyn and Kempling—all Conservatives, and Mr. Fulton, an NDP. The three voting against the Resolution were Senator Hicks, Mr. Ken Robinson and myself—all Liberals. The Committee has always operated on a strictly non-partisan basis. In the eight-year history of the Committee, we have had only two votes, having otherwise always being able to operate on a consensus basis. If I remember correctly, this is the only time in the history of the Committee where there was a vote which was split on party lines, although I am not suggesting the Committee members were motivated by partisan considerations.

I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the committee heard evidence for over a year on the Alice Arm regulations. It was only at the end of that year that a vote was finally taken and it caused this split. The letter goes on to say:

You will note in the evidence on page 28, the statement that the Committee's Counsel, Mr. Graham Eglington, made that "I would presume, in my position as counsel to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, neither to express a decided view as to whether a regulation is a proper and reasonable use of power." You will note that I stated we would be delighted to have his opinion as to whether it was an unusual and unexpected use of powers, but as to whether we accepted his opinion was another matter entirely.

Possibly because of this remark, Mr. Eglington did, some days later, provide the Committee with an opinion, a copy of which I am enclosing herewith, which disagreed with Mr. Bernier's opinion referred to in the evidence. I should point out that Mr. Eglington has been Counsel to the Committee since its inception. After carefully considering Mr. Eglington's opinion, I came to the conclusion that if we had had Mr. Eglington's opinion before the vote was taken, the Conservative members of the Committee might well have not voted in favour of the motion and that the matter should be reconsidered by the Committee.

That is simply not the case, Mr. Speaker. I was present at a number of meetings where it was made clear that the Conservative members were not intending to change their vote in this matter. It seems passing strange to me that a co-chairman would take the opportunity of writing a letter to the public to make such an allegation. After all, a vote by members of the House is clearly of their own volition. The letter goes on:

In the meantime, a draft report to Parliament in accordance with the original motion had been prepared and distributed, which was to be formally voted upon at a further meeting of the Committee. I was informed that in view of Mr. Eglington's opinion, the Liberal members of the Committee, who were not present when the original vote was taken, would be present when the report was voted upon and would vote against the report, thus reversing the original decision.

The record seems to have slipped over time from the writer's memory, Mr. Speaker, in that the decision to come in and try and bully the committee was taken before Mr. Eglington wrote the legal opinion. Obviously the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was going to be embarrassed by the reporting of this to Parliament and he decided to take action before that legal opinion was written. The letter goes on:

After some prior negotiation, a meeting of the Steering Committee of the Committee, attended by Mr. Fulton, was held at which an agreement was reached by way of compromise as to how the matter should be dealt with by the Committee, which was subsequently agreed to by the Liberal members of the Committee not present when the vote was originally taken. I am enclosing herewith copies of the pages from the typewritten transcript of the meeting held that afternoon of the Committee where it was agreed not to make a report to the House of Commons as was provided for in the original resolution passed by the Committee and, in fact, let the whole matter stand as it was at the present time. As you can see, in no way can this be interpreted, or was it intended (and my Co-Chairman, Hon. Perrin Beatty, MP agrees with me as to this), to be that the Committee "unanimously upheld the censure of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) for unusual and unexpected use of power through the Alice Arm Tailing Deposit Regulations."

I should say in closing that the Committee was considering this matter from a highly technical point of view under its terms of reference, and was not presuming to pass on the merits of the dispute.

There are a number of interesting things which flow from that letter, Mr. Speaker, and I would hope the minister will take the time to respond. On May 28, 1981 Senator Godfrey wrote this letter to the minister and on page 2 he had the following to say:

It is apparent to the Committee that the prohibition imposed by Parliament in section 33(2) of the Act and the general rules set out in the Metal Mining Liquid Effluent Regulations will be of little value if special regimes come to be established to allow particular mining operations to dump tailings and effluents in enormous quantities. That such a situation might arise would seem to be altogether at odds with Parliament's purpose as expressed in section 33 of the Act. Consequently, the Committee must assess the Alice Arm Tailings Deposit Regulations carefully. It is clearly not the case that any or every exercise of power to set special standards or dumping limits is an unusual or unexpected use of power. What the Committee must address itself to is whether or not the deposits allowed in this case go beyond or are inconsistent with what reasonable men would consider to be anticipated under section 33. The general limits set out in the Metal Mining Liquid Effluent Regulations have clearly been drastically exceeded. There has been no mere accommodation of a minor problem, or even of an existing mine. Rather, there has been an accommodation of a mining venture which it appears to the Committee might have been deliberately planned so that a special regime inconsistent with the general prohibition of section 33(2) of the Act and with the standards and concentrations set out in the Metal Mining Liquid Effluent Regulations would be essential. This might be thought to come dangerously close to treating section 33(4) of the Act as a carte blanche to allow unlimited, unconfined and unrestricted dumping of toxic materials.

The Committee is also troubled by the effect that the latitude being allowed the Amax Kitsault Mine may have on the sentencing of those convicted of breach of section 33 of the Act or of exceeding the limits set out in the Metal Mining Liquid Effluent Regulations. Courts may be reluctant to impose sentences of any real deterrent value when defence counsel can point to dumping limits of the dimensions sanctioned in the case of the Kitsault Mine.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a letter from the co-chairman of the committee to the minister. A number of peculiar problems arose as we were taking evidence at the committee, in correspondence back and forth with the minister, and on more than one occasion the minister provided incorrect, misleading or in some cases perhaps something worse in terms of the information before the committee. On a couple of occasions that caused considerable alarm to the people most directly affected, that being the Nishga people.

On one occasion the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans provided a letter to the committee which indicated that counsel to the committee agreed with counsel to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. That is not in fact correct, Mr. Speaker. I took the time in one of our recent committee meetings to question counsel to the committee on that very point and there was an interesting response. On page 66:29 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, I asked the following questions:

MR. FULTON: Under paragraph 8, on page 2, you indicate that counsel have never given an opinion as to whether the regulations are proper and reasonable. On page 2, at the bottom of Mr. LeBlanc's letter, he says, and I quote:

I would like to emphasize that in the view of the legal advisors consulted, including your own, the Alice Arm Tailings Deposit Regulations are a proper and reasonable use of this power.

MR. EGLINGTON: That is precisely what I was dealing with. I have never given that opinion—

So, Mr. Speaker, here we have the minister saying that he is not going to concur in the thirteenth report of the standing joint committee despite the fact that all parties by consensus have agreed that there were certain uses of his powers which were either unusual, unexpected or in some way not what Parliament had intended. We also have the minister providing to the committee information which was completely inaccurate—on more than one occasion—making it very difficult for members of the committee to deal with the information provided by the minister. I am saying that I am not surprised that the minister does not concur. He does not seem to have that great an understanding or feeling for the importance of committees or the parliamentary process.

Mr. Eglington went on to say:

—and despite Senator Godfrey's invitation, I do not think that in nine years I have ever given an opinion as to whether the use of the power was proper or reasonable. That is not one of the committee's criteria, and I would never deal with it.

That brings me to an interesting point, Mr. Speaker, in that this same counsel provided, not publicly so that we could debate it but in a private sort of way, a legal opinion which has been put to great use by Liberal members. It seems passing strange to me that, after the vote is taken and a decision made to report to Parliament, all of a sudden all of these other complexities come into play; the government members suddenly decide they are going to blackmail the committee: "If you try and report, we will come and vote it down", and all those kinds of things. Then after the decision is made to let the vote stand, the co-chairman from the other place, who I cannot cross-examine in this House or even debate with, sends out a letter publicly saying that the decision to let the vote stand is not what it means. Clearly the vote censured the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It was a four to three vote, a majority vote, and this is a democracy, so the majority rules. It was obviously an embarrassment to the minister. He put various and sundry other powers into play that, in my view, have seriously and perhaps for some time to come damaged the credibility and the viability of that committee in the eyes of many Canadians.

There were some comments made on the letter of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans by counsel to the committee that I think should be put on the record. The minister has decided not to concur in relation to the problems that have evolved under the Fisheries Act. Some of the problems are very serious. The first comment by counsel reads as follows:

The "parameters of the concept 'unusual and unexpected use of the power' as it applies to the Alice Arm Tailings Deposit Regulations" are not for Mr. LeBlanc to state or to restate. They are for the Committee to determine.

The committee determined that they were an unusual and unexpected use of power. The second comment is as follows:

That a detailed legislative scheme for a regulation is set out in subsection (13) of Section 33 only means that the Alice Arm Tailings Deposit Regulations, being in conformity with it, are intra vires.

That means within the law. They were legally created but not created in a way that was expected by members of this House when they made changes to the Fisheries Act and gave various powers to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and governor in council. The second comment continues:

A regulation conforming to its enabling power, however detailed, is not for that reason alone an expected and usual use of that power. Whether an enabling power has been used in an unusual and unexpected way goes to the purpose for which it has been used or to the consequences of its use, and not to whether the resulting regulations is intra vires or ultra vires. Similarly, the fact that a regulatory power has been used in the only way it may be, lawfully, and in accordance with its detailed scheme, is in no way conclusive of whether the use made of the power is unusual or unexpected.

What the committee was deciding was not whether or not the creation of the Alice Arm tailings deposit regulations in the middle of the 1979 federal election was legal or not; that question was not for the committee to decide. We had a number of other criteria that we were there to scrutinize.

Counsel goes on:

Since section 33(4) and (13) envisaged exceptions to the fundamental rule of Section 33, an exception is not of itself unusual. That the statute envisages exceptions being made does not mean that every exception is usual or expected. That an exception has been made, and deposits made in conformity with it, is irrelevant to the issue of unusual and unexpected use of power. The statement that there is no breach of the statutory rule of Section 33(2) goes to vires only. M. LeBlanc avers that the Alice Arm Tailings Deposit Regulations constitute exactly the procedure Parliament envisaged would be exercised when it enacted Section 33(2), (4) and (13). The parliamentary record would seem to negate this proposition and to point to quite other uses for Subsections (4) and (13) of Section 33. That a court, being required to ignore the parliamentary record, must govern itself by the words of subsections (4) and (13) in determining vires does not mean that the Committee cannot make reference to that record in determining what is the use to which subsections (4) and (13) might usually be expected to be put.

That is really the point and it is the point in relation to what the other speakers have touched upon. The committee heard various experts, officials, the minister and others say that the section was there and Parliament had various expectations of its use. The committee ruled after hearing lengthy evidence from the minister, his counsel and any witnesses the government side wanted to produce that it was an unusual and unexpected use of power and that they have in fact taken unusual steps to try and bully the committee and the public into believing that something other than what happened in the committee occurred. Counsel goes on:

That there has always been a prohibition on depositing deleterious substances, and a power of exemption, is only partially relevant. What is important is the nature and purpose of exemption. The particularized power which is now given to the Governor in Council is so substantially different from a blanket power in the Minister to "exempt ... stream or streams" as to be of only marginal use, at best, in assessing the uses to which the present powers can be put without becoming unusual or unexpected ones. Parliament has seen fit to resile to a very great extent from the old blanket power. It must have had some limiting purpose in mind. And, by reference to the parliamentary record one gains an understanding of that purpose: to beef up the prohibition and to allow exceptions to accommodate conflicting regulatory standards and to accommodate existing plants.

This is precisely the point. In 1977 when the metal mining liquid effluent regulations were brought in, they brought in very specific delimitations for the amount of various substances and the total quantity that could be dumped into any water system in Canada. For the minister to have used the sections he used, to put out SOR/79-345 was, as the committee ruled, an unusual and unexpected use of power for the simple reason that there was an existing regime under which the regulations could have been made. For the minister to have gone outside of that only comes clear when you realize that the amounts that the minister wanted to allow Amax Corporation to dump was 8,000 times what was allowed under the existing regulations.

It is a very serious matter. I would hope that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will respond to it in this House because the committee has ruled on it. Through various tricks and various forms of chicanery he has managed to hold the report from coming before the House. The reason I stepped back from forcing the issue was that I felt it would be an abuse of the committee. But instead I have discovered that the abuse of the committee has carried on despite the fact that I backed off from it.

Counsel continues:

The first five paragraphs of Mr. LeBlanc's letter are characterized as "legal arguments." Indeed they are, and, as such, they are not germane to the issue of the Committee's criterion 4.

Whether the use of the powers granted by Section 33 (13) to the Governor in Council (not to the Minister) is a proper and reasonable use is not a matter exclusively for the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

That was the argument put forward by some government members on the committee, that is, that we should be looking at the issue in another committee. Counsel's comments continue:

It is a matter which bears upon the Committee's criterion 4. This Committee may not consider whether it is desirable to exempt new mining ventures, or old ones for that matter, from the regulations of general application. Nor may it consider whether it is desirable to exempt the particular Amax mine at Kitsault. But what it can, and must, consider is whether the use of Section 33(4) and (13) for this last mentioned purpose is a use and that can or should be characterized as unusual or unexpected. In this consideration the Committee may very well wish to consider whether the use made of Section 33(13) in these particular regulations is a proper and reasonable use.

There was a definitive recommendation of the senior counsel to the committee and that is precisely what the committee did. It took a vote on that point. The comments continue:

Mr. Bernier and I have never given an opinion as to whether the Alice Arm Tailings Deposit Regulations are a "proper and reasonable use"—

This is despite the fact that the minister and his counsel said they did. They said they never did, and they said that before the committee. These comments continue:

—of the powers conferred by Section 33(13). I have repeatedly advised that the Regulations are intra vires that subsection, that is to say, that they constitute a lawful use of those powers. I would presume, in my position as counsel to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, neither to express a decided view as to whether a regulation is a proper and reasonable use of power nor to foreclose the Committee's own judgment as to whether a regulation is an unusual or unexpemted use of power.

I could put a great deal more information on the record but there are other members who want to speak and there is not a lot of time left. However, I want to speak forcefully for myself and for members of my party in support of concurrence in this report and to encourage the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to take the necessary steps to bring the Alice Arm tailings deposit regulations before this House so that proper regulations can be debated and properly scrutinized in relation to the specific instances raised by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe. They should not be held outside the purview of this Parliament simply because the minister does not want to concur.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to the comments made today by a number of speakers, but in particular to those made by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

First I would like to respond to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). I appreciate the tone of his comments. They were constructive in nature and I can assure him that much of what he said was heard with an open mind and by people opposite who recognize that there is a great deal of merit in many of his comments.

At this point I would simply say to the hon. member opposite on the question of the harvesting of kelp that indeed the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is as eager as anyone else to ensure that, where possible, commercial harvesting of the resources of the sea takes place for the benefit of the people of the country. For example, in that particular instance, the very possibility, as remote as it may or may not be, that such an action could disrupt the food chain of a very important species in British Columbia makes us quite reluctant to proceed quickly and easily with the decision to go ahead.

On the question of the recommendations of the standing committee in its report today, I should like to say to the hon. member that we look with great interest at them. The question of making changes is a very difficult one. It is not easy to amend arbitrarily and quickly the Fisheries Act, which makes us reluctant to do so, but we are looking at the committee recommendations. We are looking at ways to improve the existing system and to improve accountability which could and should, perhaps in some instances if only from a visible public point of view, exist in the system.

Having made those brief comments, I want to focus my attention on the comments of the hon. member for Skeena, although it was not originally my intention to do so. At the outset I want to say that his comments today were, from the point of view of the committee and its report, totally irrelevant. He knows that and hon. members of the House know that.

Further, I want to say that selected recollections of committee meetings, selected readings or quotations from letters of various members of the committee or from the minutes of the committee itself, and subjective interpretation of what the committee meant in making certain decisions, such as the decision not to proceed with its report to the House of Commons on the question of Alice Arm, make very interesting entertainment in the House and, no doubt, serve the political objectives of the hon. member for Skeena, but they do not reveal the truth. I repeat that they do not reveal the truth. In fact, in my personal view they do just the opposite. They present a totally misleading picture of what in fact occurred over the last few months with respect to the particular question of Alice Arm and the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

I would imagine that all members of the committee, those present and those not present in the House of Commons, would want to stand at the first opportunity to defend themselves against the charges by the hon. member for Skeena. I must say that I consider them to be scurrilous charges because he used myself as a particular example to show that somehow the committee was, to use his word, blackmailed, intimidated or bullied by one lowly rookie parliamentary secretary. He suggested that somehow I had this great ability and power—and I must say that I am almost pleased he would attribute to me such great ability—to intimidate the committee. Equally I am surprised that he would have the audacity to suggest that members opposite of long experience and ability in the House of Commons would be so easily intimidated by a man such as myself.

I know I do not need to say much more. I expect that hon. members opposite will defend themselves, but it was an absolutely ridiculous charge to suggest that the committee had been blackmailed carte blanche and had whimpered to all corners of the House, quietly withdrawing and pulling back its horns.

What took place with respect to Alice Arm is quite a different story. I should like to quote, because I think it is quite important, from a letter which was written recently.

An hon. Member: I thought you said that it was totally irrelevant.

Mr. Tobin: Well, it is relevant in the sense that this particular member has been slandered in my view and in the sense that hon. members of the Conservative Party have been seriously slandered. The very suggestion that members opposite were somehow open to blackmail is a serious slander which I think must be dealt with in the House. It cannot stand unchallenged.

I should like to refer to a letter which was written recently by the co-chairman of the committee, John M. Godfrey, to Dorothy Potts, Project North, British Columbia, in which he refuted the public statements of the hon. member for Skeena, and I am told that this letter is concurred in by the other co-chairman of the committee who sits across from me now. He explained to the honourable lady that he was surprised to receive her letter, that the committee at its June 29 meeting had not reconfirmed a motion of censure, which had not in fact taken place, and that that was not the intention nor the understanding of the members of the committee as a whole.

I should like also to quote from the minutes of that meeting. I want to quote the hon. member opposite who is a co-chairman of the committee, as well as the comments of the hon. member for Skeena who was present at the meeting. The co-chairman said:

> As members of the committee will recall, we looked at the whole issue of Alice Arm some weeks ago and made the decision that—on a divided vote, which was quite uncommon for this committee—the exercise of power—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member would like to withdraw the word "slanderous", as he will find on page 7777 of Hansard for August 8, 1960, that it is an unparliamentary word.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, in the interest of ensuring that the statements of this particular member are answered thoroughly, I will withdraw anything which will allow me to get on with delivering the truth in this House of Commons.

As I was saying, the co-chairman said at that time:

—by the minister was an unusual and unexpected exercise of power, and we made the decision that we would report to the House. Since that time, it has become apparent to members of the steering committee that there exists within the committee a wide divergence of opinion on the whole issue; that it would be impossible for us to reach the sort of consensus that would be necessary for us if we were to make a report, and the steering committee in meeting today came to the agreement to recommend to the full committee that the matter not be pursued but be let stand at the point that it is at the present time.

The co-chairman said that the committee had taken a decision in the steering committee not to proceed to report to the House. That is not a reaffirmation of a motion; that is a decision to let matters stand at that point. This is my understanding from members of the committee, but unfortunately it is not the understanding in the case being put before the House today, and I must say falsely so in my opinion, by the hon. member for Skeena.

We then see that the other co-chairman concurs in the opinion of the member opposite. Now I should like to quote Mr. Fulton himself at that meeting.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Tobin: I apologize for using his name. Not 30 seconds later during that same discussion, the hon. member for Skeena said:

It seems to me that it has been either seven or nine times that the matter has been heard before the committee.

He thanked the committee for allowing him to raise it, and then said:

I think it has been a most useful exercise, and I certainly concur with what was discussed at the steering committee and I certainly concur with both your remarks, that it would not be, in my view, useful to the committee to force the issue beyond this point.

Those were the comments of the hon. member on the day in question. The story which he weaved today with selected quotations and readings, the strands which he pulled from here, there and everywhere, was an attempt to indicate that there was some kind of blackmail. That was his word. I do not know whether it is unparliamentary. I did not bother to rise and challenge him at the time. What is fascinating for me is not that he would make the charge that I tried to blackmail the committee, but that he would accuse his own colleagues with whom he sat in that committee of being receptive to that kind of an attempt. If justice were being done in the House today, we would call the hon. member to attention to atone for his sins.

Let me simply say that for some time the hon. member for Skeena has used the House, in my personal opinion, by way of motions under Standing Order 43 and he has used the committee to suit his own political objectives and to try to weave a fairy tale to suit those political objectives. What is interesting is that as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and as a member who regularly and loyally attends fishery committees, I have never once seen the hon. member for Skeena. If he is truly interested in this issue, and it is a fisheries department issue, why have I not seen him attend one fisheries committee and ask to have this matter raised or debated in the fisheries committee of the House of Commons?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. That is flatly untrue. I am sure the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will confirm the fact that I have questioned him before the fisheries committee on this very issue.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. colleague was perhaps fighting the wars of Newfoundland on one occasion when the hon. member for Skeena was present. But I would like to say that the hon. member for Skeena was noticed on that day, but never seen again.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister has reinforced the point I am trying to make. While the hon. member should be interested in a decision of this nature because it is his responsibility to question and be concerned about these decisions—I certainly do not condemn that because I have great admiration for any member who is concerned about his area and the welfare of his constituents—I cannot respect—and this is what I find continually frustrating about the hon. member—the fact that he does not hesitate again and again to weave a fairy tale to suit his own purposes.

I would now officially and publicly, before the people of Canada, invite the hon. member to come to the chairman of the fisheries committee and to me as parliamentary secretary to organize a time when we can have this item debated. I extend this invitation to him if he is seriously concerned about getting at the facts and if he wants to reassure his constituents, which should be his concern. I am sure the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would be prepared to come to such a meeting. I am sure that we could bring a panel of experts together to discuss this matter. I am making the invitation to him. I am amazed that he has not had the courtesy to make that simple request.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would like to tell the people of Canada right now why his department will not release any of the documents on the Alice Arm tailings deposit regulations. They are hiding 186 of them. They have been on the Order Paper for more than a year. Let us get at the truth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I should inform the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) that that is hardly a point of order. That is debate. The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Tobin: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, those kinds of selected comments and readings and quotes again, in my view, are a very nefarious point. The hon. member knows that there may be 147 or 187 internal documents. He also knows that the environmental committee which was formed to look into this matter consists of scientists from the University of British Columbia who are very respected experts in their field. They have already reported to the minister on this matter and are now working on this whole question. These are the kind of people I am prepared to make available—people from his own home province who are recognized country-wide—for his cross-examination—

Mr. Fulton: How about the information?

Mr. Tobin: —if the hon. member is serious about dealing with this matter in a responsible and mature way. Having made those comments, I will give the floor to members opposite.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, when I heard the exchange at three o'clock this afternoon I was motivated to stand and speak on this motion for concurrence. when I was first elected to the House of Commons in May of 1979 I had the good fortune to have a conversation with one of our more eminent parliamentarians, Ged Baldwin. He told me that as a new Member of Parliament one of the essential and constructive learning experiences I could gain for myself was to become a member of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. It was excellent advice because it certainly taught me, as a new Member of Parliament, about the opportunities inherent in legislation as well as the difficulties and dangers which are inherent in legislation.

I think I will remember my first day in that committee to my dying day. At that time we were handed for our committee work a stack of papers which was about 18 inches thick. Each sheet dealt with a separate order in council or regulation that had been passed by the government. The very first item to be dealt with concerned the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, which is the topic of this thirteenth report today. I was shocked by the consequences involved in that regulation. The impact of that initial regulation on the top sheet of that pile was that a fisheries officer anywhere in this great country of ours could announce over a citizen's band radio, one time only, that a piece of fishing tackle, for example, was illegal. It is instant law made by one individual, not by the Parliament of Canada. Anyone who is caught breaking that brand new law which is announced over a citizen's band radio only once could lose their tackle and be subject to fines. That was the first regulation on that pile of paper. It was the result of behind the scenes negotiations between the committee on regulations and other statutory instruments and the minister and his officials.

Being a member of that committee has taught me that an important part of this parliamentary democracy is to have a committee which concentrates on the laws and regulations which are passed by Parliament, the governor in council and the cabinet. It forms an important part of the process.

While I was sitting in my place at three o'clock, the member who is co-chairman of this joint committee stood on a point of order to suggest to the House that there was concurrence in the twelfth report. The government House leader then stood and said, "You can have concurrence in the twelfth report as long as you will not debate the thirteenth report". That concerned me. I am concerned when I hear a member of that cabinet say that if we give up our right to freedom of speech in the House he will do certain things.

I have in front of me the twelfth report. Do you know what the subject matter of the twelfth report is? It asks this democratic Parliament to give the committee on regulations and other statutory instruments the legal authority to examine every piece of legislation, every regulation, with a view to determining whether or not it runs contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights or the Canadian Bill of Rights. We have a committee of this Parliament seeking unanimous concurrence of the House to examine every piece of legislation and every regulation to determine whether or not it contravenes our Charter of Rights and our Canadian Bill of Rights. We have the government House leader standing in the chamber to say that the only way we can have that right in our committee is to relinquish the right to freedom of speech and to talk about the thirteenth report.

That was an incredible and very disturbing decision by the government House leader. Unless we are willing to give up our right to discuss a fisheries report, we cannot have the right, as parliamentarians, to examine a piece of legislation in committee to see whether or not it contravenes the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I hope that the backbenchers on the government side will go to their next caucus and, in private, behind closed doors if necessary, talk to the members of their cabinet and tell them that an important principle is at stake here.

Before this Parliament ends for the summer, the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments must be given the right in law to examine the legislation and regulations from the perspective of whether or not they contravene the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Failure to concur in that recommendation is to deny the struggle which all of us have been carrying out in this chamber for a considerable period of time in order to work out a system which would protect democracy and the rights of individuals. It is not a horse-tradable commodity. It is not something that can only pass this House if we give up our right to freedom of speech on a fisheries bill. I hope that the backbenchers opposite will bring pressure to bear on the cabinet concerning this issue to see that the twelfth report is passed.

Why do we have a Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments? We have a committee of that kind because parliamentary democracy needs the protection which it can give to the Canadian people. Today we have a classic example in this House of why Canadians need the protection which a committee of this kind provides. In this thirteenth report, we have before us the unanimous conclusion of 15 members from the Senate and the House of Commons that, in law, it seems likely that the cabinet has exceeded the authority granted it by Parliament. We have the unanimous conclusion of 15 members that even if it has not exceeded that in law, it has exceeded the intent of the legislation, and the co-chairman of the committee, in the first speech this afternoon, laid this out.

Fifteen members of the House of Commons and the Senate, from all three parties, sat down and spent considerable time with witnesses on these particular regulations and they have reached their conclusion unanimously. There is the protection to bring to the attention of the Canadian people and to hon. members of this Chamber the fact that cabinet is exceeding its authority. When we consider that a cabinet passes something in the order of 4,000 orders in council each year, that involves a lot of protection. To look at those 4,000 orders in council with the kind of thoroughness which each of them deserves is a gigantic task, but a necessary task.

The thirteenth report says to this House that this is a bad regulation in law and in its thrust. It runs counter to the intent of Parliament. We heard the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) speak today, and when we have the opportunity to read Hansard tomorrow we will find that the minister started by saying, "I have only had a couple of hours in which to prepare for this debate and I really feel handicapped because my legal expert is leaving my department and, in fact, is out of town". I commend the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for that honesty, but I bring to the attention of the House and to the Canadian people what lies behind those remarks. It is a clear-cut illustration of the dependency of ministers on the bureaucracy. The minister feels handicapped—

Mr. LeBlanc: I said I wasn't a lawyer, that's all.

Mr. Kempling: That's not a handicap.

Mr. Hawkes: —because of the weight of his own work schedule, the lack of preparation and the absence of a bureaucrat.

The regulation at issue today comes to us as an order in council. What does an order in council mean? It supposedly means that an entire cabinet met, examined and found it to be a good one. But remember that almost 4,000 are passed every year. Is it realistic to assume that the members of the cabinet look at each and every one of those 4,000 proposed regulations with the kind of care and attention that they deserve? I suggest to your Honour that it is not a reasonable expectation. It is not an accurate expectation. I suggest that the proof of that was evident in this chamber today.

The minister responsible for the department under which this regulation was issued felt a little nervous or a sense of disquiet about having to defend it because of his lack of time for preparation and the lack of a bureaucrat. I suggest that that is the common existence of a minister: many things to do, too little time, and quite frequently too little background to examine thoroughly a proposed piece of legislation and its consequences. The only protection for the citizens of Canada is to use this place the way it was intended to be used, as a parliamentary democracy, a house of commoners in which each member is equal. The system would allow it, but it is only allowable if the cabinet is forced, by all the other members in the House, to make the system operate in that fashion. It is only when the cabinet is threatened with lack of support by half the members of this House that a cabinet can be brought to heel. It is an obligation of those who are elected in a parliamentary democracy to perform that function and to make that threat when necessary.

Report number thirteen of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is probably not the most important report ever to come before us in the history of this place, but it is an example of what has been going wrong for the better part of a decade or longer, and it is an opportunity for the government to signal a change in direction, that from this moment on it intends to listen to the elected Members of Parliament and benefit from the wisdom of that collectivity and that in future the legislation which is produced out of this House and the regulations which are produced out of cabinet will be subjected to the scrutiny which the collective wisdom of this House can provide.

That is the essence of our parliamentary democracy, and I suggest to hon. members who want to think that through a little more that they would be well advised to read the speech on parliamentary reform made in this House the day after the bells stopped ringing by the leader of our party, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). That was a speech from the heart and from the experience of the only living former Prime Minister of this country. He spoke of the need for reform of this institution and some of its structures and rules. More importantly he spoke of the need for reform of ideas. If we were to adopt his thrust and attitude we would not be standing here today in this House debating this report, because the cabinet would accept seriously the wisdom of Members of Parliament and act on the basis of that wisdom.

I thank you for the opportunity of speaking, Mr. Speaker. I should like to go on at greater length but I know there are others who want to take part in the debate and I think I have made my point.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I see that I have an audience behind the curtains. I should like to add some comments to the discussion that has been taking place on this thirteenth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I should say at the outset that until the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) spoke I thought this debate was on a very high level. I felt that members who participated were concerned about the matter contained in the report and that, in fact, we welcomed the comments of the minister because we believe he truly wants to see this matter resolved. Then the hon. member for Skeena spoke. As a member of the committee which presented this report I would suggest that an analysis of what the member said would indicate that he would have you believe those on the committee were blackmailed, coerced, intimidated or bullied into writing the report and making a certain recommendation. That, of course, is not at all the case.

It is a real pleasure to be a member of this committee because its work is carried on in a non-partisan way. There is a free flow of ideas back and forth. We do not have to vote but rather arrive at a consensus of opinion. The reason the committee decided not to condemn the minister again was that we could not reach a clear consensus but had a strong feeling that the minister was really trying to resolve the problem. We think he is a pretty honest guy though we may disagree with some of his politics. That is another matter. We agree with him on this issue and feel he is trying to make an honest effort. As a result we felt there was no need to condemn, censure or blame him, or to make partisan comments on the subject matter. We believe it will be resolved in due course.

My colleague the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) presented his usual brilliant analysis of the report before us. He read a large part of it into the record. The minister then responded. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe said in simple terms that what we are dealing with here is whether the government can do indirectly what it cannot do directly.

The minister said that his concern—and this says something about the humanity of the man—is that these regulations affect people and their livelihood. That is really what we are talking about here. We are dealing with the abuse of people by the bureaucracy. I do not suggest that abuse is necessarily intentional, but situations arise as a result of regulations over which we have no control.

My colleague the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) suggested that perhaps what we should do in reforming the affairs of this House is to carry out an examination not only of the statutes but the regulations at the same time. This is done in other jurisdictions and I see no reason why it cannot be done here.

Having regard to a mechanism to amend the regulations, let me say that in the short time I have been in this House we have dealt with two or three large omnibus bills dealing with a whole series of regulations in statutes that had to be changed and amended. I see no reason why that could not become part of the practice of this House, taking place once a year before the House rises. If that sort of practice could be followed, I think probably there would be an all-party agreement on such an initiative. I am sure my colleagues to my left would look at this idea very seriously.

Let me draw a parallel to this abuse through the arbitrary power of the government and its officials who are responsible for the drafting of regulations. Let me give you an example of how this power can be used to destroy people, and how, as the minister has said, the regulations affect people and their livelihood. I want to refer to the case of a gentleman in Toronto who, admittedly, is far from that matter concerning Irish moss, wire weed, horsetail and the like. However, he suffered abuse as a result of the arbitrary imposition of regulations.

This gentleman operated a manufacturing business. He had an agreement with the Department of Manpower and Immigration in relation to a training program as a manufacturer of bicycles. He held an excise tax licence as a manufacturer. He was classed by Statistics Canada as a manufacturer and was listed as a manufacturer by the province of Ontario. He imported machinery through the machinery board of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce duty-free as a manufacturer.

One day a man from National Revenue, a customs appraiser, walked into his place of business and said he was not a manufacturer but rather was an assembler. My friend asked if the appraiser could show him in regulations or statutes the definitions of an assembler and a manufacturer. The official replied that he could not do that because it was the subject of an interdepartmental memo between deputy ministers. My friend asked for a copy of that memo and was told it was confidential. This was a catch-22 situation. The result was that this dominion customs appraiser levied a tariff of 17.5 per cent on the products this man was importing, and presented him with a bill for $335,000. The man put together approximately $250,000 and paid that amount. He said, "I don't know where I am going to get the rest, but I am going to go to Ottawa and appeal."

• (1740)

He them came here and spoke to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) and a variety of officials but got nowhere. He just could not get to first base. The result was that the bank withdrew its support from his operation and he went into receivership. In spite of the fact that all his competitors were importing the same components as he was duty-free, he had to pay 17.5 per cent. That made him non-competitive and he went bankrupt. He lost his business.

I might say that he had a year's business sold in advance. He had 200 employees at his plant. He was turning out 200 bicycles a day. It was a going concern, but he went down the tube.

When he lost his home, he lost every asset which could be claimed, and finally he appealed to the Tariff Board, which is part of the Department of National Revenue. Twenty-four months later the Tariff Board ruled that the government had neither the regulatory or the statutory authority to impose the 17.5 per cent duty on this gentleman. Six months after that he received a cheque for about $250,000, but no interest. His money was gone for two and a half years but no interest came back to him. In the meantime, he was bankrupt. The money went to the receiver in bankruptcy and was disbursed among the creditors.

Just as an aside, when I began to look into this matter, I went to the Tariff Board and asked for a copy of its report. Strangely, the Tariff Board said it could not let me have the report. The Tariff Board referred me to a private stenographic service which had prepared the minutes. I called that service, which wanted $725 for a copy of the report. The service charged so much per word and I could not buy just the English version. I had to buy the English and the French versions. I went to the Library of Parliament and asked if the Library could obtain a copy of the report. I felt something was being covered up. The Library could not get a copy of the report from the Tariff Board.

Finally, I called the Tariff Board secretary and said I would raise this subject on the floor of the House of Commons and "Do I get a copy or don't I?" The Tariff Board is an agency of the Government of Canada, and this was an out-in-the-open public hearing. I asked why the report was being withheld and why I could not read it. I had a copy within half an hour. The Tariff Board sent it over to my office by messenger. I read the report through and obtained a lot of detail.

I put all this on the record because I wanted to illustrate an actual case of abuse of regulation, abuse of power or indiscriminate and arbitrary use of power by an official not backed up by regulatory or statutory authority of any kind which absolutely ruined a man's business.

One might ask whether it was a very large business. Before the business went into manufacturing, it was earning net profits of about $400,000 a year and paying taxes on that to the government. A tax-producing operation was destroyed through the arbitrary use of power. Two hundred people were thrown out of work. Those people had to collect unemployment insurance benefits and so forth. All this revolves around the definition of whether something is manufacturing or producing and how those terms are defined in the mind of an official.

We should not allow arbitrary decisions like these to be made. Somehow we as members of this House have to find a mechanism. I am sure in a co-operative way we can find a mechanism whereby these matters can be dealt with, amendments can be made and some process can be found which would allow matters such as this to be handled, aired and resolved to the benefit of all concerned.

I believe one of my colleagues wishes to make a further contribution, and I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I think this has been a very important debate this afternoon. Some people might look on it as academic and rather esoteric or peculiar to the rules and the way business is normally conducted in this House, but the hon. member from Calgary who spoke ably made the point that what we are really talking about is the essence of the democratic system.

It is heartening to those of us who have had the opportunity to be here this afternoon that, by and large, the tone of this debate has been at quite a high level. The parliamentary secretary who spoke made reference to this and I think it is worth noting. I suppose the one exception I must make—and I find this sad—is the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton). The hon. member did not really use the opportunity this afternoon to make a contribution to the debate at a level which might be considered a high level. I find that unfortunate.

I have been at meetings of this committee—not as many as I would have liked, but a few—and I think it is a very useful and necessary committee of this House. When we have a chance to debate an issue such as this, I think it is important that we use the opportunity to discuss the real issues in as non-partisan a way as possible so that we have an atmosphere which brings out the best in the members who attend.

Government today is a very large operation. We have a saying in the cattle business that when we buy feed for livestock, the best is only half good enough, if we are to get performance from our livestock. In many ways that is true in this House. If we send the best representatives possible to the House, that is only half good enough in terms of getting what we need out of this place. If our system is not conducive to getting the best from Members of Parliament and if hon. members do not use the opportunities they have to put forward their best in debates such as this, we are all losers. When I say "we" I mean this chamber and the people we represent. I think everybody loses.

It is important that we keep some of those considerations in mind because government is very large today and becomes so involved with us on a day-to-day basis that it is very difficult for this place to do the best job it possibly can. As government governs more, the people who elected us have less an less say about what we do, because as government has more and more to do, almost by definition it has to delegate and set up boards, tribunals and regulatory bodies to enforce the regulations which are made.

The hon. member who preceded me made the point that he does not see why we could not more often have regulations attached to acts. I agree with him totally. As a new member I have seen that only once, and that was with respect to the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act. That was so long ago that I cannot even remember the number of the bill, but I think it was passed some two years ago. At the committee stage we had a chance to look at some of the regulations which would accompany that legislation. That was a very useful exercise because it gave the parliamentarians who would be passing the law a chance to look at the regulations which would flow from it. I see the chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport here today, and I know he would agree with me that it was a very useful exercise to look at the regulations at the same time as we looked at the bill, because we had a chance to discuss how the regulations would be enforced by the Department of Transport.

I do not see why that cannot be done more often, which brings me to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. It seems to me that it is the job of that committee to look at regulations and other instruments we use to enforce laws passed in this House. The number of orders in council we have has been referred to several times this afternoon. Orders in council are in addition to all the regulations passed and those which accompany bills which we pass. There are 3,500, 3,700 or 4,000 orders in council. I think we have passed 125 or 129 bills in this session. That amounts to a tremendous number of pieces of legislation and regulations passed each year or, in the case of bills, passed each session. If individual members are to do their job, then they must have an opportunity to assess how some of these regulations will affect people when the bills are passed. The hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) gave an example of this earlier.

In some ways we seem to have turned the responsibility placed in us by our electors over to officials. This is a contradiction of the old English system of law and the sense that the people who make the laws should be separated from the people who enforce them. But it sometimes happens that the people in the department who draft the regulations are in a position to interpret those same regulations. This is a contradiction in terms, like having the people who make the laws—the parliamentarians—enforcing the laws. We see that in the case of the Department of National Revenue and in some ways in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

In his response the minister did not actually say that he would not concur in this report. I do not want to use the word excuse, although perhaps it is the appropriate word to characterize his response when he said he thought it would take up the time of the House, that there were other things going on and that he was worried about how an amendment to the act would affect the time of the House. That is what the House is for, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that if an amendment were brought forward that would make the act easier to administer and easier for people to understand, the opposition would pass it very quickly.

The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) made the point that this could be done with the bill to amend miscellaneous statutes. If there were discussions beforehand and everyone was familiar with the amendments proposed by the government, then I am sure that in the interests of fairness and expediency the opposition would pass several of the amendments very quickly. Actually, Mr. Speaker, that is what the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments was trying to do.

The thirteenth report of this joint committee of the House and the Senate was passed unanimously, Mr. Speaker. It is interesting that the government has set up a special committee to examine changes in the rules and procedures of the House. We all know that there are things that could be done to improve our procedures. I think that without even changing the Standing Orders, without changing the time limit on speeches and a lot of other things, we could achieve a great deal if there were a better attitude in the House. The government could demonstrate a change of attitude by concurring in this report from such a prestigious committee. I see no reason why it should not be accepted by the government almost automatically; in fact, I think there should be a compulsion on the government to comply with it as quickly as possible.

The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) spoke on that matter and made the point that if the government took its job seriously and made sure that backbenchers on both sides of the House had a chance to do their job effectively, that would ensure that they know how regulations affect people and whether they express the intent of a bill. After such an examination was completed and if there was a unanimous report, what would be wrong with accepting it automatically? After all, the job of parliamentarians is to look at such things, and that is exactly what this committee has done.

This is a large country geographically and in the number of regions it contains, Mr. Speaker. When laws are passed and regulations are formulated to enforce them, it can hardly be expected that they will affect people uniformly from coast to coast. This makes it all the more necessary to have a committee such as this one assess the things that have been included in the thirteenth report.

The debate this afternoon has been useful but it is unfortunate that such discussion is necessary when common sense should deal with the matter effectively. Not only do we have problems with the amount of regulations and the number of orders in council passed by government officials, but too often in the area of foreign trade government officials are responsible for negotiating trade concessions, tariffs, etc. We are a trading nation, as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is well aware. We have problems with the Americans on the east coast. Surely this is an area in which parliamentarians should be more involved. Rather than having the executive appoint officials to negotiate international trade agreements, I would like to see parliamentary committees and individual members become more involved.

In the interests of time and not wanting to talk the motion out, Mr. Speaker, I will close by saying that I hope the exercise this afternoon has been useful to the government and that it will see fit to concur as quickly as possible in the thirteenth report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion (Mr. Beatty) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock and with the consent of the House, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

TOURISM

OMISSION OF THREE MARITIME PROVINCES FROM PROMOTIONAL RECORDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, if you dial 215 563-1708 you will reach the Canadian government office of tourism in Philadelphia. Then a recording will provide you with the toll free numbers for travel information in Nova Scotia, Quebec or Ontario. There is no mention of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick or Newfoundland. If the purpose of this recording is to advise American tourists about vacation destinations in eastern Canada, then the provinces of P.E.I., New Brunswick and Newfoundland should be mentioned. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House instruct the minister responsible for tourism to give CGOT officials a lesson in Canadian geography by advising them that there are three other provinces in eastern Canada, namely, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, and Newfoundland.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the member to move this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PIPELINES

NORMAN WELLS-ZAMA LAKE—PRECONSTRUCTION WORK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, despite repeated calls from the people of the Mackenzie District to allow preconstruction work to start on the Norman Wells-Zama Lake pipeline so that local people can take advantage of the jobs and business opportunities, something that will not take place if the NEB schedule is adhered to, the government refuses to sanction work this winter. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That Interprovincial Pipelines Ltd. be authorized to start preconstruction work on the Norman Wells-Zama Lake pipeline forthwith.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the member to move this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

CALL FOR ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, housing starts in Canada during the second quarter this year were half of those during the same quarter a year ago. Starts during the first half of the year were only 62,293. Despite this, the minister responsible for housing says he still expects total starts to reach 180,000, a figure most experts feel is vastly overinflated, while they predict starts will not exceed 150,000. I move, seconded by the member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the minister responsible for housing impress upon his colleagues in cabinet the need for immediate positive measures to be taken to aid the unsound housing industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the member to move this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COST OF PARTY TO WELCOME FIRST CF-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Yesterday, in order to make the first CF-18 feel welcome and wanted when it rolled off the assembly line, two Hercules transport aircraft and one executive jet carried some 90 DND and government officials from Ottawa to St. Louis, Missouri, for a party; as well, another Hercules carried the Air Command Band from Winnipeg to St. Louis. In light of this blatant waste of tens of thousands of taxpayers' dollars at a time when the government is supposed to be slashing waste and is restricting pay increases to, among others, Armed Forces members, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

S.O. 43

That this House instruct the President of the Treasury Board to take the Minister of National Defence aside, slap his wrist and give him a lesson in responsible spending.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the member to move this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

DEMAND FOR REINSTATEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, two convicted murderers who should have died after their first murder and who were serving life sentences in Archambault have struck again: as a result, three more productive Canadians are dead—butchered in cold blood. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That this House urge the government to reinstate capital punishment for persons convicted beyond a shadow of a doubt of killing another human being.

How many more innocent persons are going to die before this government will take action?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the member to move this motion?

EMPLOYMENT

DIRECT JOB CREATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, today's Toronto Star reports that Liberal Members of Parliament are being instructed to spread cheery stories of good economic news to counter the growing stories of economic disaster which Liberal policies have produced for millions of Canadians. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House inform the Minister of Employment and Immigration that the minister's announcement of a $300 million job-creation package is devoted 97 per cent to ridings held by Liberal Members of Parliament; that the minister and this unworthy Liberal government be informed that this type of blatant patronage spells bad news for democracy in Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the member to move this motion?

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORT ON AIR TRAVEL BY OFFICIALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that senior CBC executives are flying off next month to Cape Canaveral to watch the Anik launching on the sunny beaches of Florida, despite the fact that they will not be able to get within one half mile of the launch and may in fact have to watch it on television; in view of the fact that these flights are not defensible when the budgets for research and station operations for the CBC are being cut to the bone across Canada; and since there are communities in Canada such as Atlin which could receive CBC radio for a cost comparable to that of these flights—and surely the right to radio signals is more important than a pork-barrel trip to Florida—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That the President of the Treasury Board release the report on domestic and international air travel of public servants immediately, since it has been completed and in his office for over a week now, and that he introduce guidelines that are sufficiently strict to stop flights that are not of urgent necessity, and to design guidelines that will make it clear that letters and the telephone are to be used for communication, and wherever reasonably possible the railroad or bus lines are to be used to attend meetings.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSAL THAT HOUSE OBSERVE MINUTE OF SILENCE FOR WAR VICTIMS IN BEIRUT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a proposal similar to the one made by the member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko), who tried, unsuccessfully, to obtain the unanimous consent of the House. I think it is shocking that some hon. members should waste their time and energy on defending the comforts and conveniences of this House and fighting against wage restraint, while thousands of innocent people, children who could be our own, and teenagers and women are being struck down as a result of military attacks among civilized people, as is presently the case in Beirut. All conventional warfare is cruel, whether it takes place at the front or on the battlefield. But this is happening in the middle of a city, and children are being traumatized and perhaps crippled for the rest of their lives. I think this is absolutely barbaric. I therefore wish to propose to my colleagues, and I hope to obtain the unanimous consent of the House, that at the end of the oral question period, the House observe one minute of silence to express its respect for, and especially its sympathy with these innocent victims, a minute during which we should reflect on ways of assisting and comforting them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion by the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE MINISTRY

CALL FOR REPLACEMENT OF MINISTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, the C.D. Howe Institute, in a departure from its normal political reticence, has said that the main problem in Canada since the early 1970s has been federal leadership mismanagement of the economy. The latest budget is described as an "abysmal stewardship report", and Institute fears that Canada may have "reached a point where it is impossible for its leaders to secure the co-operation needed to make a positive response to the country's economic predicament". The commentary continued that "in a non-governmental organization such performance would lead to a replacement of its leadership". Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis):

That the Liberal Party replace its leadership, and the government retire wornout cabinet ministers by introducing fresh faces with new economic policies to give a positive direction to the country and hope to the Canadian people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the member to move this motion?

LOUIS RIEL

PROPOSAL THAT POSTHUMOUS PARDON BE GRANTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I wish publicly to thank all those Members of Parliament and Senators who responded affirmatively to my letter to grant Louis Riel a posthumous pardon. Many MPs, from all three parties, consider such action appropriate to remove a blot from the Canadian system of justice and at the same time view with compassion the difficulties experienced by our political leaders during the early formation of the integral parts of our nation. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I again move, seconded by the two original seconders, the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) and the hon. member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner), and I do this with greater certainty that members from all parties wish to support this motion:

That this House grant Louis Riel a posthumous pardon for the crime of high treason.

EMPLOYMENT

DIRECT JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—DESIGNATION OF ELIGIBLE CONSTITUENCIES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister, I will put my question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peterson: Where is Joe Clark?

Mr. Smith: Where is Crosbie and where is Nielsen?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Miss MacDonald: Obviously Liberal members opposite do not like having it pointed out that their cabinet ministers are away. But I will proceed by putting my question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Yesterday the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced a job-creation package. He designated 33 constituencies for what he called "development component". What does the government mean by development component in dollar terms? Also, would the minister explain how it is that 32 out of 33 constituencies so designated are represented by Liberal members, even though there is high unemployment in many other parts of the country?

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member's question referred to the 33 constituencies that were designated, the hon. member ought to know that these constituencies were designated on the basis of a 12 per cent labour surplus throughout the country. The constituencies are located in the Maritimes, and obviously, the hon. member is not talking about her colleague from St. John's West, whose constituency was necessarily part of this group. The government wants to alleviate the extremely high rate of unemployment in these constituencies, and I may point out that the 12 per cent rate will be applied next year and perhaps other constituencies will also be designated as part of this group.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I see that the minister has now come into the House so that we do not have to have a backbencher answering a question on a major expenditure program of the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: The minister will know that the selection of these constituencies is not based on the unemployment figures that are put out monthly by Statistics Canada; they are based on a formula that is drawn up in his office.

CONSTITUENCY ALLOCATIONS FOR JOB CREATION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): My supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Will he guarantee that the constituency allocations for job creation to be announced next week will be significantly higher, greater than the amounts allocated last year in those constituencies where there has been a substantial recent increase in unemployment, such as areas in northern Ontario and the interior of British Columbia?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it appears to me, hearing the answer given by the parliamentary secretary, that he showed far more intelligence and sensitivity to the plight of the unemployed than was displayed in the question put forward by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: I would say that the kind of arrogance displayed in her preamble just showed how serious the hon. member is in asking respectable questions of members on this side.

The formula is very clearly outlined. We take the labour surplus rates as they apply to every constituency. Furthermore a factor has been built into the calculations to take into account deterioration of unemployment in those areas. For instance, the province of British Columbia will be receiving three times the amount of employment money that it received last year, and as far as I can recall there is not one Liberal elected as yet in that province.

An hon. Member: There never will be, either.

• (1420)

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that with the way he is going with regard to unemployment there will not be any Liberals elected in British Columbia or in many other parts of the country, if he and the Prime Minister have the courage to go to the country and put their policies to the test.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

QUERY RESPECTING NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED WITHOUT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister has said in his announcement that the special response feature of the program will be most useful to those people who will have their unemployment insurance benefits exhausted. Will he now give us the estimate of those Canadians whose unemployment insurance benefits will be exhausted during the coming fall and winter months? So far he has refused to do so, but he must now have an estimate of that group of Canadians since he has attached a $41 million figure to it.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think it is worth pointing out, again in response to the hon. member who seems to be trying to indicate that we are not concerned about the plight of the unemployed in the country—

Miss MacDonald: The million and a half.

Mr. Axworthy: —that it was her government when it was in power that cancelled all direct employment programs of the Government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Axworthy: If we had followed through with the position taken by that government, there would be no programs of any kind for the unemployed of Canada. The fact of the matter is that what we are trying to do by establishing the special response fund is to be prepared and to take into account the kinds of concerns which people have, rather than ignoring them, as obviously her government did when it was in power.

FORMULA USED IN ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO CONSTITUENCIES

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Would the minister explain to the House why the additional funds under the development component of the program he announced yesterday would be allocated on the basis of some kind of inexplicable labour surplus formula and not on the basis of the real unemployment rate, averaged over the last number of years, as supplied by Statistics Canada? While he is at it, perhaps he could tell us who devised this hairy-scary formula which provides funding for only Liberal constituencies?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would not necessarily expect the hon. member to understand the concept of labour surplus rates which has been used in the country for generations and for decades. It simply means that that is a formula which is applied because it is the one that can be allocated on a constituency basis and one which affects every single member of the House regardless of party. They receive an allocation based upon their constituencies, and that is why we used the labour surplus formula. I would be very glad to try to spell it out for the hon. member in a clear explanation so that he will not continue in his own confusion.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps the minister might try to explain it to those constituencies where there is high unemployment such as St. John's East, which will receive no funding and has a concentration of 40 per cent student unemployment right now.

CANADA COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM FUNDING

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, while the minister is on his feet, perhaps he could explain how it is that the Canada Community Development Program in the past year provided an average of $540,000 for 148 Liberal constituencies, $188,000 for 101 Conservative constituencies, and $162,000 for 33 NDP constituencies?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: If the old pork-barrel is not alive and well, perhaps he could explain just exactly what is at work here.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for St. John's East is once again demonstrating how insensitive the Conservative Party is to the economic reality of the country. That reality is that there are many regions of this country where there is continuing, chronic high unemployment. Many of them happen to be centred in the eastern part of the country. Because they know the Liberal Party respects and responds to the concerns of those who are unemployed and those who are poor, that is the basis by which they elect Liberals and by which we allocate the funds, according to those who have the greatest need.

ENERGY

SUNCOR CORPORATION—APPLICATION OF GOVERNMENT RESTRAINT PROGRAM

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday we learned that the Suncor Corporation in Canada will not only receive $35.5 million in tax cuts as a benefit from the people of Canada, but the company also announced a new pricing policy, namely, that while its workers' salaries will be held down to 6 per cent increases, it will be permitted to have profits—that is to say prices—at historic levels.

Will the Minister admit that with this announcement of the first agreement with a private sector firm under the new controls program, the Government of Canada is now making its policy clear that while workers' incomes will be held down in Canada to increases not exceeding 6 per cent, the Government of Canada will permit corporations to attain historic profit levels and therefore historic price increases?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not agree with the reasoning put forward by the hon. member.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister cannot get away with that kind of an answer. We want an announcement and clarification of government policy.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON PRICES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell the House of Commons and the people of Canada what the government policy is with respect to prices? Is the government going to permit corporations to go well beyond the 6 per cent price increase, and will it be saying to them, in that context, that they can have what the government is calling historic profit levels? If it is the latter, who is to decide what those profit levels are? Is each company to be setting its own definition and, if not, who is?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Leader of the New Democratic Party takes objection to an investment of $690 million, half of which is in southern Ontario and half in Alberta. I have negotiated with the company on this particular subject for over a year. Following the budget of last June 28 we have added a condition to the tax concession put forward in order to reach this agreement. We have added the requirement that the company adheres, within its own operations, to the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guidelines.

As far as prices are concerned, the company has also agreed that it will keep its prices in line in terms of the reduction in costs that will result from lower wage increases than may have otherwise taken place, and bearing in mind also the historic profit situation of the company.

As far as the general question is concerned, the Minister of Finance has indicated in the House that he expected to be able to have a release soon which would spell out the government's position both in regard to wages and prices, in relation to companies having dealings with the Government of Canada.

COMPANY PROFIT MARGINS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, so far, since this inequitable program was introduced, we have learned that Bell telephone rates will not be held down to 6 per cent increases, that rent increases for pensioners will not be held down by CMHC, and that oil price increases will go well beyond 6 per cent. Yet this government has the nerve to tell the working men and women in this country that their wages have to be held down to 6 per cent. That is completely unjust, and every Canadian knows it. When can we expect to get a clear statement from the government on what private sector firms will be permitted in terms of price increases? Will they be allowed to maintain historic profit margins, which means historic price increases and, if so, who is to determine the criteria of what an historic profit margin is to be?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, again I am surprised that the Leader of the New Democratic Party would rather have people unemployed than being employed, with the possibility of having wage increases to the extent of 6 per cent and 5 per cent over the next two years.

Mr. Broadbent: What sheer hypocrisy!

• (1430)

Mr. Lalonde: The hypocrisy to which the Leader of the New Democratic Party refer is the hypocrisy of his own party on this whole issue. His party has been talking out of both sides of its mouth consistently on this issue.

As far as CMHC is concerned, the hon. member has made a statement without knowing the facts. There has been no decision. As far as Bell Canada is concerned, the Leader of the New Democratic Party has made a statement without knowing the facts, because there has been no decision made in that regard. I invite him to wait for the decisions and then make his judgments on what the situation will really be.

DIRECT JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—EFFECT ON FORESTRY UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In light of the latest statistics published by the Council of Forest Industries of British Columbia which indicate that over half the industry is down and over half the forest workers in British Columbia are unemployed, and in light of the fact that these statistics are even worse in the rest of the country, can the minister tell me what the new program he announced just yesterday, which has an emphasis on areas with more chronic unemployment, will do to help the forest industry in British Columbia and the rest of the country?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the program we have is obviously not designed for just one sector of the industry. As we well know, the enormous downturn in employment in the forest industry is caused by the drying up of international markets, and particularly by the enormous reduction in housing construction in the United States where about 80 per cent of our lumber products are sold. What we are trying to do through the measures announced in the job-creation program yesterday is allocate those measures to areas where there are chronic and continuing high unemployment rates, which is the definition we apply to development areas, but we are also applying substantially large amounts of job creation money to those areas which have recently been hit by downturns or layoffs.

As I pointed out in answer to a previous question, the allocation to the hon. member's province of British Columbia has tripled in one year in order to respond to the very serious problems faced by workers in those industries, and it is our hope that that substantial addition of job-creation money in that province and in other areas will be of assistance to workers in that industry.

FOREST-RENEWAL PROGRAM

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the difficulties the minister has described have very deleterious effects not only on the industry and tens of thousands of workers but also on regions, municipalities, towns and cities which base their whole economies on forest-related industries. Included are small towns and whole regions in central and northern British Columbia as well as in the rest of the country. A previous program the minister undertook was intended to help this sector as well as the fishing and mining industries. The forest-renewal program has now been recognized as an object failure. Does the minister still have any faith in this program and, if so, would he be prepared to sit down with industrial leaders to discuss ways and means to take the bureaucrats and the red tape out of the system so that at least some workers can be employed in the crucial wood-converting industries in a way which would make an investment in the future of our country?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the application of Section 38 programs is not a failure but is now going ahead. It was only a week ago Monday that I was in British Columbia and met with members of both the management side of the forest industry as well as officials of the woodworkers' unions to determine how we could work and co-ordinate our activities and efforts in a combined enterprise under Section 38. They have committed themselves to co-operate with me. We are working on the details and, because this program must be delivered, in large part, through the offices of the provincial government, we are now attempting to get the provincial government to undertake further actions to expand and further develop projects under Section 38. Some 16 projects have been approved under that program, and people already going to work on those projects. It is our hope, because of these meetings and because we are coming together under this new program, that we will still be able to expand employment opportunities substantially under Section 38.

DIRECT JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—APPLICATION IN SOUTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I wonder if he understands that a solid manufacturing base is necessary if this country is to offer meaningful employment rather than just temporary employment, and that this manufacturing base is situated mostly in southern Ontario and is experiencing massive unemployment. For example, in Hamilton, Ontario, unemployment in the last year alone has increased by over 100 per cent.

Why have these sectors and these cities been ignored in the minister's new assistance programs? More important, why have they been ignored by incentive programs? Why are the programs designated by ridings rather then by cities or regions? Finally, what does the minister and the government intend to do with all the newly unemployed people in southern Ontario in cities like Hamilton and Dunnville and other areas in southern Ontario hardest hit by unemployment?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. member's question simply is not correct. The fact of the matter is that we do very much recognize the problems affecting the manufacturing areas of the southern part of Ontario, parts of Quebec and other areas where the manufacturing industry is most active. In my own department alone we have introduced a work-sharing program under which over 3,700 agreements have been signed. This has averted close to 60,000 lay-offs, many of them in Ontario and Quebec, and kept manufacturing plants open. I think this demonstrates very clearly the measures we are taking in those areas to try to help that part of the country in this very difficult time.

However, the major commitment is being made through contracts being signed in export markets to provide further work. Major assistance is being given by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the automobile industry under ILAP to provide further incentives. The automobile industry is now beginning to regain its health.

I do not have sufficient time to refer to all the measures we have taken; however, I can assure the hon. member that not only is this government responsive, but it is also undertaking a wide range of programs to help industries in the region to which the hon. member refers, during this very difficult recession.

MINES AND MINING

SERVICE OF EVICTION NOTICES ON HOME RENTERS IN ELSA, Y.T.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member for Yukon is not here this afternoon to bring the concern to which I will refer in my question to the attention of the House. However, in his absence I would like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Mines.

Many of the residents of the town of Elsa, Yukon, have lived in company houses for more than 35 years, but they will be evicted from their homes on August 31 because of the temporary closure of the United Keno Hill mines. Also 200 employees and their families could be affected. Could the minister inform the House what steps her department is taking to avoid another Uranium City-like evacuation of Elsa, since most of the employees have indicated that they wish to remain in their home community? Specifically, is the minister's task force on one-industry towns prepared to visit Elsa—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I invite the hon. member to go to his point.

Mr. Hovdebo: Is the minister's task force on one-industry towns prepared to visit the townsite and make recommendations so that temporary mine closure does not mean the expulsion of these people from Elsa?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to respond to the hon. member's question because this is a problem that is very typical of one-industry towns across the north.

The task force has completed its visits, unfortunately, and is now preparing its report, so it will no longer be making visits to areas, but I will be happy to refer this problem to the task force. In the meantime, I suggest to the hon. member that he examine the make-work projects we have under way, and perhaps we can design one to provide the kind of job creation that is necessary in this town.

I remind the hon. member that the reason for the reduction in the work force under the stand-by system is that the price of silver has dropped to $8, and production costs must be accounted for. A $13.50 price is absolutely essential if production is to continue. In the meantime, I suggest that he sit down with our officials to design a program which would keep some of those people working in the community. We would be happy to assist him.

• (1440)

REQUEST THAT ACTION BE TAKEN TO PREVENT EVICTIONS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I too, would call the attention of the minister to the announcement by her seat mate that $300 million spent for employment projects includes $41 million for "direct job-creation funds over the fall and winter to communities which experience sudden lay-offs". Will the Minister of State for Mines take the responsibility for co-ordination of efforts by her seat mate and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to ensure that these people are not evicted from their homes, that they will also have work which will last them the winter, and that they will get a fair share of that $41 million?

Mrs. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Yes, Mr. Speaker, they will get their fair share, but I would like to call upon the hon. member for Yukon and ask for his assurance of co-operation in this matter as well.

EMPLOYMENT

INQUIRY WHETHER QUEBEC WILL BE ELIGIBLE FOR DIRECT JOB CREATION PROGRAM

Mr. Normand Lapointe (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In the June 28 budget, a fund of $300 million was set aside for direct job creation. My question is this: will the Government of Canada be able to include Quebec municipalities in the program, since the federal government needs the Quebec government's consent to help the municipalities. Therefore, will the municipalities be able to apply for the Canada Community Development Program?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the government of the province of Quebec is preventing municipalities from receiving funds from the federal government for job creation. I am trying to get the Quebec government to change its position, but meanwhile, nothing can be done.

DIRECT JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—POSITION OF NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, my question, which is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, concerns the discriminatory direct job-creation program. I would like to point out that in this program about which we are asking questions, there is nothing for Ontario. Therefore, would the minister explain to the House why, in northern Ontario, no special funds were allocated, where there is currently the same percentage of unemployed in the native, disabled and youth groups, and plant and mine shutdowns, as in the chosen constituencies?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, once again a member of the Conservative opposition is showing that he does not want to become confused by the facts. The fact is that the province of Ontario, under the program announced yesterday, will be receiving over $37 million, which is double its allocation of last year. When the hon. member says that the province of Ontario will be receiving nothing, he is obviously not considering the facts.

In addition, those constituencies in northern Ontario will also be included in the special allocation that we give to native groups and organizations to undertake a number of major housing and resource projects. Again, those funds are over and above the normal constituency allocation. But I would suggest, as I said in the House yesterday, that it would probably be much sounder and wiser for members of the opposition to wait until they have actually received letters from me detailing how much they will receive per constituency before they start speculating on the matter, a week in advance.

DESIGNATION OF COUNTIES IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question, which is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, deals with the announcement yesterday of the Canada Community Development Project funding which, in New Brunswick, only went to those constituencies which are held by Liberals. The fact is that the executive assistant to the minister said that the designated basis will be a 12 per cent surplus in manpower, and the minister himself has stated that this is the government's response to sensitivity and the plight of the unemployed in those regions. The minister will know that in New Brunswick, the counties of York, Sunbury and Queens, as well as Albert County, all have surpluses of manpower in excess of that of Madawaska and Victoria counties. Will the minister tell me and the people how he will demonstrate his sensitivity to the people in those counties who are so obviously the recipients of this blatant pork-barrelling policy which the government has now implemented?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, once again I think the hon. members of the opposition are beginning to count up the numbers before they are even informed as to how much will be given to their individual constituencies. Those constituencies mentioned by the hon. member will be receiving a substantial increase in their allocations. What we are trying to do through the development stream of that program is to take a four-year average of labour surplus rates, which denotes those areas which have had chronic, long-term unemployment, and apply the development concept so that they can break that cycle, for heaven's sake, and move into an area where they can begin to develop long-term, permanent employment. It in no way prevents, inhibits or changes the continuing allocation per riding which will go to every other constituency in the country, which has generally been increased by almost double what it was last year. In many cases it has gone up much further than that, based on the deterioration of the unemployment rate. But we are using the measurement of a labour surplus rate—

An hon. Member: You are using a pork-barrel rate.

Mr. Axworthy: —which was properly registered in employment centres over a four-year average in order to make that determination. I would only say to members of the opposition that, rather than engaging in this kind of baiting, what they should be considering is how they can put their efforts to work in their ridings to help the unemployed.

DESIGNATION OF COMMUNITIES IN ALBERTA

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The national energy policy totally destroyed the local economies of Bonnyville, Grande Prairie, Swan Hills, Beaver Lodge, Drayton Valley, Two Hills, Vermilion, Lloydminster, Brooks and Nisku, all communities in Alberta. Recognizing that there is to be an increase in the CCDP funding to each constituency, would the minister consider targeting those communities devastated by the national energy policy under the development component of his announcement yesterday?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is too learned and wise a member of this House to try to pass off that particular premise. As he well knows, the changes in the energy industry are worldwide in their impact, and—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: —the United States of America, which does not have the kind of enlightened energy policy that we brought in, is facing an even more substantial downturn in its industry at the present time. But what we are prepàred to do through our employment programs is to take a look at those areas, regions and communities in the country which are facing downturns in their economic or industrial base and try to provide additional assistance to them.

The reason we kept the additional $41 million in reserve was to provide a special response fund so that we could respond to those areas which are facing both immediate problems and need that kind of assistance. I would obviously be very glad, as I have been in the past, to talk to the hon. member for Athabasca concerning the problems in his riding.

INDUSTRY

STEEL COMPANY LAY-OFFS IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the present projected lay-offs for the Interprovincial Steel and Pipe Company in western Canada are now approaching 1,000, and since the minister met with the company and the union which made a number of recommendations to him, and since they informed him that just for Saskatchewan alone the lay-offs in Regina mean 2,000 more direct and indirect jobs, which is equivalent to 54,000 lay-offs in Ontario and Quebec, can the minister tell us what he will do in response to the recommendations made to him by the company and by the union, and when will he meet with them again to deliver that response?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, recently I had a very useful meeting with the management and representatives of the workers of Ipsco in Regina, and I have been working in conjunction with other departments on the points in their brief. A number of the points deal with matters of energy policy and tariff policy and, as I said to them, I hope to be meeting with representatives of both management and the union before too long to discuss a response to their brief.

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF TARIFF REDUCTIONS FROM STEEL IMPORTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, Ipsco and three other Canadian companies have already filed suit against South Korea, South Africa, Belgium and Luxembourg for anti-dumping practices. Since the government failed to make any representations to those countries before our steel industry was damaged, while it is cosying up to the military dictator from South Korea who will visit this country shortly, will it make representations, demands upon, or present ultimatums to the President of South Korea to the effect that that country will no longer receive a 6 per cent tariff reduction for its steel products that are brought into Canada, and will the same condition be made to apply to all other countries that are dumping in Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to draw the hon. member's representations to the attention of the Minister of Finance. With respect to the anti-dumping investigation, I am sure the officials of my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, will want to pursue that matter as vigorously and actively as possible.

DIRECT JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—AVAILABILITY OF APPLICATION FORMS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday the minister announced a $300 million direct employment program for the coming winter. In view of the urgency of providing these jobs during the fall and winter months, and the time that is required by Indian bands and municipalities to prepare applications for the community development program, can the minister tell us when application forms will be made available and how soon the projects will be able to start this fall?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, application forms will be available by the middle of August. We hope to have all the applications in on the termination date, September 30, and after that the projects would start immediately upon approval. I should point out to the hon. member that in the case of native bands and organizations, we are prepared to accept early applications so that we can get the projects started during the building season. If he would bring those applications to my attention, we will respond accordingly.

NECESSITY FOR LEGISLATION TO GOVERN LIVESTOCK SALES

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture regarding the need for prompt payment in Canada's total livestock industry. I am sure the minister will be acutely aware of the need for this in the aftermath of the McIntyre sale yard collapse in southwestern Ontario that has had repercussions all over western Canada, as have other failures. Can the minister indicate if he is now preparing some badly needed federal legislation that will require prompt payment of all Canadian livestock accounts throughout the country?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the bankruptcy he refers to took place in southwestern Ontario. One of my constituents was a very heavy loser in that bankruptcy. We are looking at ways and means of overcoming this. I am sure the hon. member remembers that when the Bank Act was amended, strong representations were made that we should not go that far but should only amend it to protect farmers or producers when a processor or meat packer went bankrupt. It appears now that the amendment should have been much broader. The hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex suggested a broader amendment to the Bank Act at that time, and he is making representations again along the same lines as the hon. member opposite.

I understand that the effects of this bankruptcy are widespread and not confined to southwestern Ontario but extend to the province of Alberta and other parts of Canada as well.

PETRO-CANADA

COMPATIBILITY OF POLICY WITH INCOME-CONTROL PROGRAM

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Considering the fact that the minister supported the plan to restrict wage increases to 6 and 5 per cent, I wonder whether he is aware that on the basis of government recommendations regarding controls, Petro-Canada is recommending rent increases of 25 per cent for its dealers. If so, could he inform the House how he intends to prove that the corporation's policy is compatible with the government's objectives?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the guidelines for Crown corporations, including Petro-Canada, are that during the next two years, salaries of corporation employees may not be increased by more than 6 and 5 per cent. As for the point raised directly by the hon. member for Joliette, I must say that I am not aware of the existence of the increases to which he is referring. If he has any specific cases to refer to my attention, I should be happy to forward them to the corporation, and I would then ask the corporation's administrators to submit a report, which I will be happy to divulge to the hon. member.

EMPLOYMENT

DIRECT JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—POSITION OF NEW BRUNSWICK GOVERNMENT

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration and it is supplementary to the question of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal who finally showed his true colours. In devising the program, did the minister hold any discussions with the Government of New Brunswick to try to persuade it to supplement his very positive response, or are we to continue to see that government just wring its hands and shed crocodile tears, as did the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, for those areas of chronic high unemployment?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that it is our hope and intention that, at this time of very serious difficulty in the Canadian economy, we can recruit and enlist the co-operation of the provincial governments. Not many of them have been too forthcoming in their efforts thus far. It is important to continue to try to bring them on board so that not only can we respond to the immediate employment problems in New Brunswick but also come to grips with the longer-term issue of restraining inflationary pressures in order to bring interest rates down, and thereby provide a base for long-term job creation in Canada.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

DELAY IN APPOINTING CANADIAN COMMISSIONER

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The minister must be aware of the need for a strong Canadian voice on the International Joint Commission when such crucial issues as the clean-up of the Great Lakes, the controversial ice boom in Lake Erie, and other water issues involving the boundary between Canada and the United States are being discussed. There are three American commissioners on the IJC and at present only two representing Canada. How long must this 20-month delay continue before the third Canadian position on the IJC is filled? How much longer must we wait?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I agree that this is an important appointment that has to be made. I regret the delay that has taken place, and I hope the appointment will be made soon.

EMPLOYMENT

DIRECT JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—SELECTION OF RIDINGS ELIGIBLE FOR DEVELOPMENT COMPONENT

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration regarding the development component of his recently announced program which is, as I understand it, the component intended to deal with long-term solutions to chronic unemployment.

Is it just a coincidence that of the 33 ridings that qualify for that component, 32 are represented by Liberals? Is it just a coincidence that of the ridings that qualify, more than half are represented by parliamentary secretaries and ministers, or is the minister finally coming clean with Canadians about the cause and effect relationship between how you vote and what you get, to the effect that the longer you vote Liberal, the poorer you become?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if there is any correlation at all between those figures, it simply shows that the people in Canada who are most in need know which party to vote for because it will best respond to their needs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—SUGGESTION PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION INVESTIGATE SITUATION

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder if the minister would consider establishing a three-member all-party group to travel to Beirut in the very near future to discuss with our ambassador, and all the involved parties in the very serious situation in Lebanon, the nature of the kind of responses that the Canadian government and the Canadian Parliament could make in this situation, and report back to the minister and the House.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think I could not take such a proposal as a serious way of responding to the problems of the Middle East at the present time. There is no lack of knowledge of the facts. We are well acquainted with the facts. The problems are amongst the parties in the Middle East. The United States is conducting mediation efforts with respect to the problem in Beirut itself. Most countries of the world feel that we are better advised to await the resolution of that problem before proceeding with initiatives with respect to the longer-term problems of the Middle East.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

PRESENTATION OF ELEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, further to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, March 18, 1981, the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence formed the subcommittee on Canada's Relations with Latin America and the Caribbean. Pursuant to the same Order of Reference, your committee previously tabled an interim report on December 8 of last year. Your committee has continued its consideration of this subject, and, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, as Chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, of tabling, in both official languages, the committee's eleventh report which deals specifically with the Caribbean and Central America.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra) moved that the first report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, presented to the House on Friday, July 18, 1980 be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is somewhat of an historic debate today. I am sorry to see that the former chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), has left the House because what I am going to say today and what others may contribute will be very important to the progress of the power which Parliament can exercise over the affairs of the country.

I say it is an historic debate because it is the first debate, in my ten years in this House, on a motion to concur in a report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. We have had many reports. In fact, during this session I have tabled 16 reports as chairman. Some have been concurred in without debate. Three were substantial reports containing specific recommendations. Some took the form of a housekeeping report where, unfortunately, we had to come back to the House for a motion and concurrence to cover some expenses—minor at that—of the committee in sending representatives to conferences in other parts of Canada.

It is also historic, Mr. Speaker, in that it gives an opportunity for this House to carry out a recommendation contained in a booklet called "Improving Accountability: Canadian Public Accounts Committees and Legislative Auditors". This was a study done by Mr. John J. Kelly and Hugh R. Hanson, sponsored by the Canadian Comprehensive Auditing Foundation of which the former Auditor General of Canada, Mr. J. J. MacDonell, is chairman. This report contains some 69 recommendations applying to public accounts committees, legislatures, etc., and I think it is important for this debate that I read recommendation No. 33, which is as follows:

> Legislatures set aside time to debate the reports of public accounts committees at least annually.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, this will be the first of many debates on reports of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

I should also refer to the other changes which have occurred in the operation of the Public Accounts Committee over the ten years I have been a member of this House and that committee. In the early days the committee was very restricted in the research it could do. In fact, it did not even have a full-time research officer and members met with the chairman to determine what subjects would be followed. The committee then held its meetings and we took the Auditor General's report after it was referred to us because it was not an automatic procedure in those days; we had to wait for a reference from a minister in the House. Evidence was heard and eventually, toward the end of the session, the clerk of the committee sat down and wrote an extensive, if not exhaustive, report which touched on every aspect of the evidence heard by the committee. That report was tabled in the House and it contained no recommendations. It was never debated or, as far as I know, even acted upon.

Today, Mr. Speaker, the committee has two full-time research officers provided by the Library of Parliament. One of them is a chartered accountant who has served the committee long and well; the other is an economist who has served the committee for less time but just as well.

We examine each Auditor General's report now, Mr. Speaker, as soon as it is tabled in the House, because we have an automatic reference under the Standing Orders of this House. After consultation with the Auditor General we decide which parts of that report are going to be considered the most important and which will therefore be considered and examined in detail by the committee.

That is a very important step because the Auditor General has pointed out instances to the committee where his office has spent $1 million worth of time conducting an audit and the results of that audit never get examined by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. That is not to say that the committee is not interested in things the Auditor General says. But it is obvious that the Auditor General's report is so extensive and the committee's time is so limited that we have to choose the highlights of the Auditor General's report. Because we cannot see it all, we have good research staff and we have a plan of action so we know what we are going to study and approximately when we are going to study it, we are in a position to make much more effective reports to the House of Commons.

It is interesting to note that the report we are debating today was tabled in the House on July 18, 1980, just over two years ago. The committee has considered that its reports should have some attention from the House. We have follow-up procedures so that if we do not get support from the government, then we go back to the departments about which we made recommendations. We follow up to see what has happened, to see whether the government has acted on the recommendations or whether the departments have acted on the recommendations of the committee.

As a consequence, we have specific recommendations now and I am pleased to say that I get a letter from the President of the Treasury Board after each report is tabled. He gives his initial views on how he sees this report of the committee. He also lets us know what might be happening to overcome some of the problems which the committee has seen.

I said earlier that I was sorry the President of the Treasury Board is not here because I am going to make some references to what he has said about some of our reports. I am sorry, too, because the first report of this committee in the Thirty-second Parliament covered material that was examined by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts during the Thirty-first Parliament when the present President of the Treasury Board was chairman of the Public Accounts Committee.

Before I go on to the recommendations in the report, I should say that the progress of the committee has come about through the efforts of a number of chairmen who were very active and responsible for many of the innovations to which I am referring today. As a matter of fact, I am the first chartered accountant that has ever been chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. My predecessor, the present President of the Treasury Board, is a lawyer, as is the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) who was chairman a little earlier. The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), a former chairman, is a business executive. We have had other business people as chairman. When I first came here a merchant, the former member for Wellington, was the chairman of the committee. The committee has come a long way.

The topic of the report for which we are asking concurrence today includes SPICE. I do not know if that means a spicy debate, allthough we hope so, but SPICE is one of the acronyms that has been developed recently. It stands for "Study of Procedures in Cost Effectiveness".

Anyone who hears about SPICE in the House of Commons might well ask what is SPICE and what does it do? Only a few months after his appointment in July, 1973 as Auditor General, James Macdonell announced the appointment of the independent review committee on the office of the Auditor General of Canada. That committee was comprised of two prominent chartered accountants and one prominent lawyer. It became known as the Wilson committee. It was named after the chairman, the late J. R. M. Wilson, a Fellow of the Institute of Chartered Accountants.

That committee reported in March, 1975. Among other things, referring to the Auditor General's report of 1978, the Wilson committee in 1975 said that government auditors should advise legislatures whether funds they grant to the administrative arms of government have been properly used. I think at that point we should say that value for money auditing was born. The Wilson committee also said that the Auditor General should take due account of economy and efficiency in conducting his examination of expenditures.

I think we can probably say that that was the beginning of economy, efficiency and effectiveness; the "three E's", as they are now known. The report also called for new legislation to provide specific authority for the Auditor General to report cases where, in his opinion, value for money has not been obtained through the government's expenditure of public funds. That is a very important forerunner to what we have today.

The Wilson committee also addressed the effectiveness of programs and said that Parliament's expectations in legislation are not always readily discernible, nor are the results achieved always measurable with reliable techniques. The audit office, the committee concluded, should take a great interest in the progress of effectiveness measurement. Those observations going back to 1975 became the foundation for what we know today as comprehensive auditing.

Two and a half years after the Wilson report was tabled we got from the Government of Canada a bill known as the Auditor General Act, 1976-77. This was proclaimed on August 1, 1977. The basis of that act was that it set out the legislative foundation of value for money auditing, and the Auditor General was required by this legislation to report to Parliament "anything that he considers to be of significance and of a nature that should be brought to the attention of the House of Commons, including any cases in which he has observed that money has been expended without due regard to economy or efficiency; or satisfactory procedures have not been established to measure and report the effectiveness of the program where such procedures could appropriately and reasonably be implemented".

At about that time the "three R's" became the "three E's"; that is economy, efficiency and effectiveness. In those three headings the word "economy" refers to the terms and conditions under which the government acquires human and material resources. An economical operation acquires these resources in appropriate quality and quantity at the lowest cost. Efficiency refers to the relationship between goods or services produced and resources used to produce them. An efficient operation produces the maximum output for any given set of resource inputs. Effectiveness concerns the extent to which a program achieves its goals or other intended effects.

I think there is many a slip between what the estimates committees of the House approve in the programs and what has been expended after the fact. Through these tools of comprehensive auditing, that is what we want to hear from the Auditor General of Canada.

While the Auditor General Act was simmering prior to its passage in August, 1977 the Auditor General in September, 1976 initiated a special project within his own office, and SPICE, the study of procedures in cost effectiveness, was born. Again I refer to the annual report of the Auditor General for 1978. The first objective of SPICE was to compile information on the state of the art of management and control systems in the public sector in terms of economy, efficiency and effectiveness. The second objective was to assess and report on existing procedures for planning, measuring and controlling activities in the Public Service of Canada in the interests of economy, efficiency and effectiveness. The third objective was to recommend to the office of the Auditor General how this new mandate should be exercised in the future.

• (1520)

The SPICE project was extremely thorough, extremely technical and extremely complex. By August, 1978 some 52 value for money audits had begun. One of the significant features of the SPICE methodological contribution was its emphasis upon value for money in the audit process. Part of SPICE was an examination of the planning process for capital acquisition projects.

At pages 42 and 43 of the same report, the audit conclusions read as follows:

Based on 13 SPICE audits completed to date, the capital acquisition process does not come up to a reasonable standard of "due regard for economy."

In his audit findings the Auditor General said:

Our examinations show that good practices that have emerged from many years of project management experience often were not followed in the planning and acquisition of capital assets.

There were many examples, and the committee studied a number of them. The most noticeable feature of the operation of capital acquisition projects was cost overruns on the very projects which were examined. On the ones that were examined, total costs had increased by 148 per cent over budget. Now, 148 per cent is a very significant increase because it is an increase of more than double. In other words, the original estimate of the costs of these projects which were examined was $281.6 million. By the time they were finished, it had escalated to $699.7 million, an increase of 148 per cent, or more than double the actual budgeted amounts.

Many projects take years to complete and cost overruns are commonplace, but they are not discovered until it is too late to do anything about them. The Standing Committee on Public Accounts has lamented this often. Hon. members on all sides know very well that by the time the committee examines some fault, particularly with cost overruns, the culprit, if we can call him that, has gone. I am referring to the responsible public official who helped or caused the overrun to occur. He is no longer in the job, perhaps he has been promoted to something grander, and it is impossible to find a culprit in many cases.

In 1979, during the Thirty-first Parliament, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts heard testimony on audits which were completed in 1977 and on projects which reached back into the early 1970s. Often capital acquisition projects carry on over a period of quite a few years. In fact, there is one here dealing with Fraser River flood protection which was originally approved in 1968, and when it was finally completed in 1978, ten years later, the costs had more than tripled from $18 million to $60 million.

Questions on what happened at the time of the failure of the system often went unanswered because the managers had moved on to different positions, other jobs, and the committee found that some decisions had been made without written record. When we are dealing with millions of taxpayers' dollars, we must be particularly detailed in dealing with these expenditures, and authorizations must be meticulously obtained.

When the committee found that many decisions to expend money had been made without any written record, indeed it realized that it was a serious flaw. Major projects had been undertaken without complete information being available to those responsible for making decisions. Therefore, the committee made a number of recommendations in its first report, which was presented just over two years ago. I want to refer to those recommendations, particularly the ones which refer to the SPICE study, in the hope of improvement in government accountability to Parliament. Its first recommendation was that:

—a Special Committee of the House of Commons be established to review those ongoing projects which have projected cost overruns;—

I know the President of the Treasury Board is concerned about cost overruns. He keeps telling us that he is, but in the two years since this recommendation was made we have not seen the establishment of a special committee of the House of Commons to review ongoing projects with projected overruns. The projection of cost overruns comes at a time when, if the committee got hold of it, an estoppel could be made and the bleeding would be stopped.

The commitment to all capital projects underway at the time this recommendation was made was well in excess of $10 billion. Evidence and testimony before the committee indicated that current projects suffered from significant weaknesses in management control and might have been subjected to substantial cost overruns. Well, we are awaiting that.

The second recommendation was that:

—the Auditor General use more often his power to make special reports so that your Committee is able more often to examine current issues;—

I should like to mention the frustrations of hon. members of the House who are called upon to examine matters that are very old and untimely. For one thing, the Auditor General might take many months to do his work. When he reports to the House, usually around November, some of his work in the report is a year old by the time it is tabled because it was completed immediately after the report of the previous year. Usually the audit is examining something which happened a year or so before the actual audit work. This was a very important matter. All of us were successful in having a change in the Auditor General Act; the Auditor General was able to report special items of concern to him to the House. It was determined by the committee that it could serve its intended role more appropriately if the Auditor General were to use more often his power to make special reports.

That recommendation was not directed to the government or to the President of the Treasury Board. It was directed to the Auditor General. I must inform the House that the Auditor General has never seen fit to use his special power of reporting special items to the House. I was told by the former Auditor General of one instance wherein he came very close to making a special report to the House. But the present Auditor General and his legal advisers are of the opinion that this power granted by the Auditor General Act is not sufficiently strong to allow the Auditor General to use that power in the manner recommended by the standing committee.

I am pleased to say that the President of the Treasury Board has agreed. I also understand that the government has agreed, and that as soon as it is convenient it will be agreed among all parties that the Auditor General Act be amended to give proper legal encouragement to the Auditor General to make more frequent reports to the House of Commons.

I might also say that the Auditor General sees some benefit in making three, four, five or six reports to the House of Commons in the period of a year because it would mean that the committees to which the reports would be referred would be looking at current material.

I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) across the floor. He should know that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts is looking with a very interested eye at the recent report of the Auditor General on the Canadian Dairy Commission. As soon as the wheels can be put in motion, we will be taking a look at that. One benefit is that we do not have to wait for a reference because, as soon as the Auditor General tables a report in the House, it is automatically referred to committee.

Returning to the recommendations, the third one was that:

—all effectiveness evaluations, including methodology and findings, be tabled in the House of Commons within 60 days of their completion and that the Standing Orders of the House of Commons be amended to refer the evaluation reports automatically and permanently to the appropriate standing committees;—

• (1530)

We recognized, Mr. Speaker, that we were not the only committee that would be interested in expenditures and therefore we left it open in that recommendation to have other appropriate committees get references like that. I am not aware of any of these reports that have been tabled within 60 days of their completion or referred to any other committees, including our own.

The final recommendation in this section on SPICE was that:

—annual reports of departments contain non-technical summaries of effectiveness evaluations to highlight the impact of government programs.

The difficulty with a committee such as ours which is not necessarily familiar with certain technical areas is that we wanted to have a non-technical summary of effectiveness evaluations so that the committee could make a proper assessment.

Going on to the capital projects, the committee made a number of specific recommendations there, too.

The first was that before final approval is given to capital acquisition projects in excess of $10 million, deputy heads of departments and heads of agencies be required to certify in writing to the Treasury Board that all established procedures set out by the Treasury Board have been followed and, in particular, that the proposal is supported by accurate and complete documentation.

I have already referred to some expenditures being approved without proper written documentation at all and it was often told to the committee that they could not do anything about that overexpenditure because the person who approved it in the first place had not followed the proper procedures. To eliminate that problem and practice, the committee thinks very seriously that these certifications should be achieved in writing. That is an internal document to the Treasury Board, and Treasury Board should want that kind of documentation before the government sets out to spend great chunks of money.

The second recommendation on capital projects was that greater effort be made to find and retain competent project managers and that the individual performance of project managers be recognized in their compensation and in their career progression.

The problem that came to light there was that some civil servants, some bureaucrats, were placed in positions of responsibility for which they were not competent, simply put. One of the reasons given for the lack of competence was that the positions did not carry an adequate level of compensation to attract competent people.

The third recommendation, again on the capital projects, is that the Auditor General have access to all relevant information other than political input furnished to a minister and to cabinet.

The Auditor General found when he was making his examinations that certain doors were closed to him as far as obtaining information that he should have in order to determine whether an expenditure met with the authorizations or with the regulations. The committee recognized that cabinet might have some special political input which they would not want members of the public or members of the opposition to have access to and, recognizing that, the committee allowed that all relevant information other than political input should be available to the Auditor General. That is especially important now when the Auditor General is required to comment on a comprehensive basis on economy, efficiency and effectiveness.

The next recommendation was that guidelines be established to ensure that decisions taken by departmental officials on the basis of political authority be supported by written instructions.

It is interesting that there may be some spoken political reason for doing a certain thing, such as putting a bridge somewhere or paving a certain road or spending money in a certain way, that evaporates unless it is put into writing. It evaporates at a time when the examination is to take place of that particular expenditure.

The next recommendation was that cost estimates for capital projects and analyses be expressed in constant and current dollars. The problem with our current rates of inflation, which have been going on for a decade or more now, and with relating dollars to capital projects which go on for a decade or so, or nearly a decade, is that the dollars that we end up with are not in the same measure as the dollars that were originally estimated to be expended. It was felt that only by expressing the estimates in constant and current dollars could any intelligent analysis be made of whether the project was being handled efficiently or not.

There was another section of this first report which dealt with program evaluation and there were three recommendations there. The first was that the government give high priority to evaluation work, that the positions currently authorized for planning and evaluation functions be devoted more to program evaluation, and that over a period of five years equal emphasis and effort be given to effectiveness evaluation and planning. That was expanded on a little bit in paragraph 23 of the report, as follows:

—in 1975, approximately 3,500 person-years were identified with the "Planning and Evaluation" function—

You would think that 3,500 people were enough to get proper planning and evaluation, but that number of 3,500 included 267 senior executive positions. Unfortunately, the testimony also revealed that, among 23 departments, only 131 person-years were devoted to program evaluation, and 62 of those person-years were in one department. Hence the recommendation, Mr. Speaker.

The second recommendation on program evaluation was that technical reports of effectiveness evaluation be available for critical review and comment, and in particular the committee encourages review in learned journals in order to focus the informed commentary of the academic community on the technology of evaluation research.

I do not feel as competent as some other members of the committee to comment on the critical review and the technical jargon in some of the evaluation reports, but I will allow that recommendation to stand on its own.

The third and last one in the program evaluation section was that recipients of program funds be required to execute an agreement stating that they will comply with reasonable requests for information for purposes of evaluation research.

That was to overcome problems of non-co-operation. The Auditor General and the government in fact found that many bodies that got grants were unwilling to co-operate to provide information that evaluation people needed when it came time to try to evaluate the programs and to see whether one should in fact be spending money in that way.

Probably the most important of the recommendations is the one contained in this paragraph, and that is that the committee requests that the government respond to the recommendations in this report by March 31, 1981, in order that Parliament be informed of developments in the accountability process of the government to Parliament. If we cannot get responsibility and accountability back into the House of Commons, there is no way that the members who are elected to look after business affairs for the taxpayers are going to be able to do their job properly.

This report was tabled in July of 1980 and a response in something like eight and one-half months was requested. We did have a response, to be fair, but we have not had the action that we need, in spite of statements by the President of the Treasury Board on behalf of the government that action was taking place, and in spite of letters to me. I want to read a couple of paragraphs of what the minister said. First of all, in 1980, referring to this very report of the standing committee tabled in the House on July 18, 1980, the minister said this:

I have discussed its contents with my officials both in the Treasury Board and in the Office of the Comptroller General, and I am pleased to say that we consider the committee's recommendations positive and helpful. Moreover, as President of the Treasury Board, I find it gratifying to see the committee's explicit recognition of our collective concern for improved management processes.

Perhaps the minister has been in his portfolio for too long, because it is nearly two years since he wrote that. At the time he wrote it he was very intimately familiar with the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and what it had recommended or was going to recommend, as well as with what the committee had heard during his tenure as chairman. In that same letter he went on to say:

It has always been my view, and it still is, that consideration of cost over-runs falls properly within the jurisdiction of the Public Accounts Committee.

It is nice to hear that from the minister. In that same paragraph he continues:

I have been concerned, however, and I still am, that by virtue of its linkage to the Auditor General's report, much of the committee's information deals mainly with the past.

I have already dealt with that complaint. He goes on:

I do, therefore, support efforts to provide more current information to parliamentarians on the matter of project management, with a view to strengthening existing methods of parliamentary scrutiny and control.

In this letter the minister stated in black and white nearly two years ago that he agrees with all the recommendations. But something has happened. The minister may have lost his power, interest or influence—we do not know—but we are not getting the results. That is why it is so important that the House consider this report today.

Lest members opposite think that I am overstating the case of the interest of the minister, I would read two sentences from another letter that the minister wrote to me as chairman on February 6, 1981. That was four months after the first letter I referred to. We had filed our second report to the House by then. In this letter he said:

—I want to assure you of Treasury Board's continuing interest in the efforts of your committee by initiating an approach to regularize our response to PAC reports.

In other words, he is going to write me to thank me and say what a nice job the committee has done every time we file a report. He goes on to say this, which I think is a telling sentence:

Although I cannot view the second report of the PAC as a positive and helpful contribution as I did the first report, I want to assure you of Treasury Board's continuing interest in the recommendations which your committee makes to Parliament.

In other words, the minister is paying lip service to the recommendations in the second report, although he indicates that he does not like it as much as the first report. He reiterates his support in the first letter by the words "as I did the first report" in the second letter. He had not changed his mind too much in those four months.

What the House deserves to know now—I hope we will get some answers from the government—is what will the government do about these recommendations, so many of which are still outstanding. During our further examinations in the Public Accounts Committee, we will be re-examining some of our recommendations. We have a very good follow-up procedure and we will be asking for some of these answers in committee. I think it is fair, however, that the House, having heard these strong words from the minister, should now concur in this motion and in what the minister has said. The government knows from the Treasury Board that the President of the Treasury Board is losing his battle. As I say, I do not know if he is losing it in the Privy Council Office or in cabinet, but it is obvious that the President of the Treasury Board needs the help of the House. I appeal very strongly to members in the House from all sides to give the House the strength of its concurrence in the recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious and regrettable that the official opposition is using the same stalling tactic today that it used yesterday to prevent the House from dealing with Bill C-85, the Canagrex bill, which is a badly needed piece of legislation. To allow the House to deal with this legislation rather than drone on about a two-year-old report, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson), pursuant to Standing Order 24:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Smith), which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion (Mr. Smith) agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)—Penitentiaries—Showing of pornographic films and staging of topless dancing. (b) Coroner's statement on cyanide deaths; the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight)—Canadian Wheat Board—Query respecting application of 6 per cent rule to two-price system. (b) Announcement in Senate; the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Energy—Funding for oil exploration in Senegal. (b) Machinery auction sale.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all regulations of the Canada Post Corporation pertaining to the receipt of mail by persons living in towns who are not entitled to postal delivery at their residences.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should allay the fears of any nervous members of the official opposition by saying that there will not be an attempt this afternoon to pass any measure in five minutes. In fact, if I may refer to that particular instance, I can only say to those who are interested that the measure at which criticism has been levelled concerning the length of time that it was actually in the House was debated on the floor of the House on many occasions over a period of many years. It was actually in the committee for committee study on at least two occasions and, in fact, was even in third reading on the floor of the House. I relay that information to those who referred to the passage of a measure in five minutes. In fact, it was ten years and many hours of debate before that particular measure eventually found its way into the Senate. As I understand it, that particular measure, Bill C-201, is already in its fourth day of debate in the Senate.

I will now turn to the subject at hand, which is the Canada Post Corporation. I brought this subject up as a result of a rather unusual incident. I want to go back to a question I put on the Order Paper some eight years ago, in 1974, to which the answer I got was:

The Canada Post Office is currently reviewing its lock box policy. All relevant factors concerning lock box service are being examined. It is important to note, however, that current Post Office policy provides for General Delivery service at no charge for persons living in areas where there is no delivery of mail.

I raised the point because I live in an area where there is no delivery of mail. I am one of the many individuals in this country who has to go to the post office in order to obtain his mail.

• (1710)

A letter signed by the president of Canada Post, Mr. Michael Warren, in March, 1982, states:

—my senior officials in retail marketing are currently undertaking a comprehensive review of the Corporation's post office box program.

That is interesting. In 1974, I read the same answer. It was still being studied in 1982. What brought the subject to my attention again this year? I will read a letter which I wrote to Mr. Michael Warren, president of Canada Post, on January 27 of this year. I said:

For years I have complained that I have to pay for a post office box which saves the Post Office money. In Hudson, we do not have postal delivery, and the boxes serve as a very convenient means for sorting the mail.

If everyone in Hudson were to abandon their box and request their mail at the counter, it would be necessary to hire at least two additional employees.

Because you save the salaries of both postmen for delivery and office personnel, I see no reason why you should charge me for a box which is for your convenience.

What precipitated that letter was a little bill I received from the post office requesting me to pay the sum of $12. That is not too much, Mr. Speaker, but nevertheless it was $12. So I wrote to the local postmaster and said:

Your card has been received advising me that I must pay you $12 for my post office box. Please note that henceforth mail will be picked up at the counter.

Then a very interesting thing happened. I have lived in the same house for some 35 years, with the same address, the same street number and so on. The post office then asked my wife to sign a document which it called a "Change of Address Card" and to pay $1.50 to the post office. My wife, in disbelief, paid over the sum of $1.50. So I wrote to the president of Canada Post again and this time I said:

It is my opinion that the Post Office owes me $1.50 extracted from my wife for an unnecessary change of address card, because I have not changed my address in the last 35 years.

Mr. Darling: Did you get your money back?

Mr. Herbert: No, so far no luck. In February I then put a motion to the House under Standing Order 43 and suggested that the post office cease and desist these "usurious charges" for change of address cards and so on.

Just to be sure of myself, I also put a question on the Order Paper, No. 4,030, asking under what conditions the post office can refuse to surrender mail to a properly identified person when the mail bears the full residential address of the individual requesting the mail. The response was "I am informed by the Canada Post Corporation as follows, under the following conditions: prohibitory order, postage due unpaid, letters in customs, and non-mailable matter under the prohibited mail regulations." Obviously, it did not include any mail directly addressed to me. I am supposed to get it free of charge.

Two local residents of Hudson, Mrs. Margaret Clarke and Mrs. Bette Thomas, also wrote to the president of the post office at that time and asked him a couple of questions. They asked, "Who is suddenly responsible for imposing these changes in a system which has been working satisfactorily without them? Have you thought of the consequences if everyone opts for general delivery at the post office?" The cost to deliver mail to individual residents in 1979—again the answer to a question on the Order Paper—was $73 per annum. Obviously, in 1982 we are talking about a figure of approximately $100. Thus, anyone who is not entitled to receive his mail at his residence, like we who live in Hudson, is saving the post office $100 per annum.

Now, there is no charge for mail delivered to an apartment box, for example. The post office decided to get back at us in a rather ingenious fashion. Listen while I read a letter which I wrote to the president of the Canada Post Corporation on July 14, 1982. I said:

> Last week, my wife advised me that she had been asked to sign a document at the Post Office and then pay $1.50 a month in order to receive our mail.

This was at the counter, mind you. I went on to say:

> I told her NOT to sign, and NOT to pay.
> Today, a blind resident of Hudson who collects his mail at the counter has reported a similar extortion attempt at the Hudson Post Office.

I used the word "extortion". Imagine, a blind resident who cannot use the post office box and who has been obliged, for all the years I have been in the House, to pick up his mail at the counter, is now asked to pay $1.50 a month for that privilege!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Herbert: The response from the president was that there were some overzealous employees and that there is now no problem.

Mr. Guilbault: Six and five would cure that.

Mr. Herbert: If one decides to pick up one's mail at the counter, there are several factors involved, of course. First of all, if one picks up one's mail at the counter, then the employees must have some distribution system on site in order to sort the mail. The post office boxes themselves are a very effective means of sorting. The employees can sort all day every day. There is no pressure on them. If the counter service is heavy, they can leave sorting for a while and I find this, of course, to be a great convenience for the post office. If people decide to pick up their mail at the counter, then it is obvious that some sorting mechanism will have to be provided within the post office.

However, there is another little fly in the ointment here. That is what made me mad. I was waiting for my own householder to be delivered, and I send out about 40,000 every three months. I use the one that I receive at my own address as a check on the distribution, but it did not arrive. I inquired and I was told, "Oh, that is because you get your mail at the counter; that is general delivery". I asked, "What difference does that make? Am I not entitled to get one of my own mailers and is everyone else who picks up at the counter not entitled to get one of my mailers?" I was told, "What we do with the ones that are left over is to leave them in a stack at the side and if we think about it, we pass one across the counter; but, of course, we do not want to give anyone more than one." I understood that. I was told, "So in your case we thought that maybe you had already received one and that is why we did not include one in your mail." The point is that these are not distributed on a regular basis. The post office does not automatically distribute them. I know it is not first class mail. But my mailer, and this applies to all the rest of the mail which is put in the post office for distribution to all householders, is not distributed on a formal basis. It is very haphazard. We may or may not receive it, depending upon the day or the time we pick up our mail.

I should point out, also in answer to a question on the Order Paper, that there are some two million Canadians who do not receive either door-to-door or rural roadside mail delivery service. That amounts to something under 10 per cent of our population. Post offices boxes in use in this country number something just over 1.5 million. Persons receiving their mail by general delivery amount to something under half a million. However, of the post office boxes, one must make another subdivision because in the figures in answer to a question it was shown that 834,000 of these boxes are for individuals who are not entitled to residential delivery service. In other words, approximately half of these people are not entitled to residential delivery and half choose to have a box as a convenience.

I understand the deficit at the post office this year will exceed $400 million. By the time the figures are in, the chances are we will be talking about half a billion dollars. There are some 60,000 employees of the post office, and it is interesting that of the total post office cost 72 per cent is for personnel costs and benefits, including all labour and wage-related items. Therefore, theoretically the post office should be very interested in means by which it can cut down its staff. But it certainly will not cut its staff; it will increase its staff if there is an increasing number of persons like me who get fed up with what we consider unnecessary increases in charges for post office boxes and decide to pick up their mail at the counter.

It is also interesting—and, I think, relevant—to look at the breakdown of the use of the post office. Eighty per cent of mail is business mail and, of the remaining 20 per cent, 8 per cent of total mail is mail from individuals to individuals and 12 per cent is from individuals to business. In other words, even the 12 per cent of mail from individuals to business is business-related. I suppose in the main it is people paying their bills. However, only 8 per cent of all mail is from individuals to individuals, and when people complain about mail, the complaints are mostly about that aspect of the service. I suggest we recognize that 80 per cent—or 92 per cent, if we include all business-related mail—is in effect a subsidy to business and should be looked on as such.

There is one other small item I think should be put on the record because I find it somewhat amusing. It might be of interest to hon. members that it costs the post office 55 cents to sell one dollar's worth of postage stamps. I find that figure to be quite extraordinary; nevertheless, that is the answer to question No. 271. If a machine is used, the cost is reduced to 30 cents on every dollar's worth of postage stamps sold. I suppose we could use more machines, but I sincerely question the 55 cents on the dollar cost to sell postage stamps.

What is all this about? I suggest there should be a little more thought on the part of post office personnel. They should realize that the more than 800,000 people in this country who are not entitled to mail delivery to our residences have for years gone to our local post offices to pick up our mail without question. We have saved the post office a very considerable sum of money which otherwise would have been spent on postal delivery. I have suggested that we should pay purely a nominal sum for the post office boxes we use in post offices. A study has been going on—and it continues—since 1974. I will not at this moment suggest the extreme. I have suggested before in this House that perhaps we should abolish residential delivery entirely. That probably will bring some squawks! However, there are many of us who use local post office boxes. We have been saving the post office money and should no longer be penalized by what I consider to be picayune attempts to pick up a dollar here and a dollar there. I sincerely request that the study to which I have referred concludes, in 1982, that we be left in peace, as we were before, to pay our $6 a year for the privilege of using a box and that it be left at that. I ask that the post office leave us alone to lead our lives in a normal, peaceful fashion.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, we have just witnessed a very graphic demonstration of the impotence of members of the government party in persuading both the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation and that monster we unleashed as recently as a few short months ago upon the unsuspecting public. We have heard some tales of woe from the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), who has indicated that he had to pay $1.50 for a change of address card and that he was obliged to pay $12 for the rental of a post box. Having regard to the wording of his motion, the hon. member might have drawn some very significant matters to the attention of the House, but he did not do that.

In the riding of York North there is an impending battle dealing with the pending regulations under the Canada Post Corporation Act between the Markham Hydro Commission and the corporation. It seems that the Markham Hydro Commission, in its wisdom and desire to save users money, has decided to incorporate the process of both reading a meter and at the same time rendering an account with respect to that meter to the householder. Canada Post Corporation believes that will deprive the corporation of substantial sums of money, and that is absolutely true. In the event the process adopted by the Markham Hydro Commission is effective, one can expect that every hydro commission in the country will adopt the process. The Markham Hydro Commission has an ingenious device which permits the meter reader to tabulate the exact cost of energy consumed and leave a copy of that calculation with the householder while doing his job. Technically, the post office says, that constitutes the delivery of a letter, over which it has a monopoly. There can be no letter delivered, except in the event that three times the normal postage rate is paid and except through the services—loosely referred to—of the Canada Post Corporation.

This raises some rather interesting prospects. As I was thinking about the process employed by this ingenious utility corporation, I thought about a neighbour going to visit a friend across the way, finding his friend away from his house, taking out a pen and paper and leaving a note on the door saying: "I called for you, but you weren't home. Please call me." Conceivably that is a letter, as Canada Post Corporation would like it defined, and the perpetrator of that horrible offence, having delivered a letter without using the services of the Canada Post Corporation, is subject to a fine. To think that this House permitted that kind of loose interpretation to slip into a piece of legislation passed by this House is an abomination. Every time I had an opportunity when dealing with that issue—and recognizing the problem that bill created—I drew it to the attention of the House.

Originally the minister now responsible for the Canada Post Corporation, who at that time was the postmaster general, made two statements in the House. I do not have them in front of me, but Hansard will confirm them. On one occasion he said it was perfectly all right if utilities wished to use the services of someone who might deliver bills because he fully recognized that it was less expensive to do it in that fashion. Later he changed his mind and said it was illegal for utilities to use that service. It was apparent from the wording of the statute that it would be illegal.

The process employed initially by the Markham Hydro Commission, however, is a deviation from that illegality, I submit, because what it is is a situation in which no one is being sent out for the purpose of delivering something prepared in another place. The person who actually performs the reading of the meter, which is a service completely unrelated to a letter in any form or fashion, at the same time makes a note, and that note is to be used for two purposes. The first is the purpose of indicating to his headquarters or office the amount of energy consumed. He knows the rate to be charged and, on his calculator, he determines what that is. As a convenience to the householder he tells the householder—as though the householder had come out and said to the meter reader, "Tell me what you have found"—"I have found that you have used this much energy, but you yourself may confirm it if you read the meter yourself, having regard to bills you have received in the past, and I will tell you what that energy consumption multiplied by the energy rate is going to cost you". He gives them those figures and as a matter of convenience gives them on the spot, in such a way that they can be used as a form of reference.

These are important issues which should be dealt with in this House, not the issue of whether $1.50 or $12 is being charged for the rental of a post box. To deal with the issue of post boxes, I submit you must first deal with the matter of access to those boxes, which is far and beyond the considerations raised in this motion.

The post boxes are kept under lock and key. Thousands of people in my riding would like to use them, but unfortunately there is a limited number of boxes. The riding of York North falls in the category where home mail delivery is not available throughout the entire region, so the issue is when can people gain access to the boxes? The answer is, so long as the post office is open. This creates a problem that in the past has given rise to complaints from constituents who were not able to get boxes because they were not available and constituents who had to stand in line for half an hour at a time, at inconvenient times, because the wickets are not fully manned. This inconvenience to the public has been overlooked. These are the issues to which we should direct our attention, Mr. Speaker.

The concerns that must be dealt with as they relate to the economy in the conduct of business by utility companies, must be paramount in the minds of Members of Parliament asked by the government to restrain demands. The restraint in demands by the utility companies is illustrated by the desire to seek out economical ways to service customers. Because of the functioning of the Canada Post Corporation, that is done through a system such as I have just described.

I raise these issues because the regulations will be approved or rejected by the government. They are in the process of being drafted, and I feel that they are being drafted in a fashion that will preclude the functioning of utility companies as I have described it. That kind of draftsmanship does more disservice to a principal of objectives in this House, which is to cut costs to consumers for services rendered, not only by this government and provincial governments but by municipal corporations and their agencies.

Unfortunately there are no ministers in the House at the moment, Mr. Speaker, but I urge the members of the government who are present to urge the ministers to look seriously at this problem, particularly in light of the alleged government program to keep costs, in addition to salaries, at a level which will not exceed a growth of 6 per cent for the following year.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this motion presented by the hon. member on the other side I should like to refer to a number of items, complaints and oddities that occur in some of the rural areas that result from the post office service and regulations. It might be helpful to read parts of some letters I have received which will outline the problems more clearly. The first letter, addressed to the Postmaster General, comes from Slocan, British Columbia and reads in part as follows:

> Sir: Recently there has been a drastic increase in postal rates. Now I have been informed of another harsh increase, namely for rental of my postal box.
> I strongly protest these outrageous increases without a vast improvement in service. Both increases are unjust and the latter appears to be discriminatory.
>
> I, as well as many other residents in this particular rural area along Hwy. 6, must travel several miles, at extra expense, to collect my mail at the post office in Slocan. We are outside the village limits but do not have rural delivery.
>
> I am told that petitions for such delivery have been submitted in the past, with no results.
>
> In this age of statistics and inspectors why should a time-consuming petition be necessary? Your policies should be examined and revised.
> Should there be a charge for box rental in the first place? Urban dwellers receive door-to-door delivery by letter carriers. Is the cost proportionate? We have a right to equal service for equal cost. The cost of a set of keys for a box should be adequate. We already pay that additional cost.
> Are we being penalized for our preference of environment?
>
> Another grievance is the antiquated policy of the Post Office in refusing payment by cheque for box rentals. Since we have no choice, this causes another expensive inconvenience, especially during winter months. In this area the banking establishments are a considerable distance away. I see no reason why the local grocery store should be expected to provide this service. If I am required to make such payment, I demand that I be allowed to submit a cheque.
>
> I might add that the hours of access to the postal boxes have been curtailed to little more than the Post Office business hours. Access to the wickets is always denied during sorting of the mail—another inconvenience.
>
> An additional insult is the fact that I am required to purchase a 30-cent stamp in order to inform you of these injustices.
> I trust you will give these predicaments your immediate attention. I await your early reply.

That is just one example, but it deals directly with some of the problems in a rural area which were discussed by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). There are other complaints dealing with post boxes and group boxes. The request being made is totally understandable and gives us an opportunity to raise some of the grievances in ways other than we do normally, either by dealing with the appropriate minister or now, of course, directly with the Canada Post Corporation, wherever possible.

In the past few months I think that most members will have found the administration of the Canada Post Corporation to be very receptive and to be working as effectively as is possible in a new regime. All of us are going to have to be on our toes when it comes to redrafting the regulations and definitions in an attempt to ensure that some of the current peculiarities are straightened out.

The hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) pointed out to me that, in an area that encompasses part of his constituency and part of mine in the lower Kootenay Lake area, group boxes were being installed by the local post office but that there were some problems with them. People who have subscriptions to magazines and newspapers found that group boxes do not provide any cover so some of the newspapers and magazines were received wet and in an unreadable condition. A constituent who was not satisfied with the group box went to the local post office and asked for his former box back in the central post office because he had never requested the change to a group box. He was then told he would either take what he was given or his rates would be doubled. That is adding insult to injury. Again, his is not an isolated case. He has paid his money and then is told he has to take his chances when he thought he knew what he was getting in the first place. That is totally unjust, and surely the cost factor to the post office is not such that people should be treated in quite that way.

• (1740)

A member—I think it was the previous speaker from the Conservative Party—mentioned a number of issues relating to the ability of the post office to finance, especially during its current transitory phase, some of the improvements which many of us demand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am well aware, first, that we are coming to the end of the session; second, that it is the middle of the summer; and third, that it is private members' hour. Still and all, I do not think we ought to put aside completely the rule of relevance. Perhaps it is wise that on some occasions members should be reminded of it.

I want to assure the hon. member that, given the circumstances I just mentioned, I am not going to apply the rule very stringently. However, I do suggest that if he examines the motion he will see the words:

—the receipt of mail by persons living in towns who are not entitled to postal delivery at their residences.

I would also want to indicate to the hon. member that because I was rather busy with other matters I did not pay careful attention to the preceding speaker, the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble), but I will pay careful attention to the next hon. member to follow. For the sake of the rule of relevance I would ask the hon. member if he could try to address himself to the motion.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that I talked about anything other than the problems of people in rural areas who receive their mail either through group boxes or post office boxes, and I have not dwelled at all on those who receive their mail by way of home delivery, which is quite different in some respects from what both the previous speakers spoke about. Perhaps I have been wandering in some areas, but I do not see a distinction at all between what I have been saying and the rule of relevance. However, I will bear it in mind so that I do not stray too much in the future.

In many of the responses which I have received from the post office corporation, and I am sure other members have as well, one of the major points raised regarding prospective improvements is that "we will continue to respond to changing community needs with mail delivery best suited to local conditions as the resources of the corporation permit". Because of the importance of having the corporation spend its money as wisely as possible, I think a number of us have been more than a little taken aback at recent plans, for instance, by the post office to spend some $200,000 in advertising. We are talking of approximately a $400 million deficit, which others have said may grow to $500 million, but nevertheless what is this $200,000 to advertise? I think most people, at least in the area I represent, are quite aware of the limitations on service and they realize that it is going to take some time to improve. They do not need to be told that things are improving; if there is an improvement in service they will see it very quickly and I am sure some of them will even inform us. Some of them have already because they have been heartened by the little progress they have seen in the improvement of delivery which has taken place over the last few months.

There is another matter which touches upon the ability of the post office to finance some of the requested improvements, and it has relevance to a bill currently before the House. Last Friday I asked in the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates a question of a gentleman appearing before that committee in another capacity but who is a director of the Canada Post Corporation. It had to do with the implications of Bill C-124 and its effect on the post office corporation. Because it does affect the financial ability, as he saw it, of that corporation to provide some of the increased services people are demanding, including the hon. member who sponsored the motion before us, I do indeed think it is relevant to the matter at hand. The answer of Mr. Lang was as follows:

I think Bill Findlay from the letter carriers can probably supplement anything I am about to say. I have been working closely with all the unions in the Crown corporation and the Post Office before it became a Crown corporation, and since it became a Crown corporation I have been one of the labour directors on the Canada Post Corporation. So I do have some familiarity with the Post Office.

Let me say that throughout the transition to Crown corporation status, and since it has become a Crown corporation, all the unions have been working closely under the umbrella of the congress in meeting with the president of that Crown corporation and in looking at all areas of that Crown corporation's activities. I would even go so far as to having real input and making amendments to the long-range corporate strategy on service, financial self-sufficiency, and labour relations. The unions are having a real impact on that corporation in trying to turn it around.

Let me be quite frank with you. Since this bill has come down, it has not only thrown into question all the objectives of Canada Post Corporation, because the five-year plan which had been drawn up and the financial targets which are to be met are now all thrown into jeopardy, both on the receipt side and on the expenditure side—it is very, very doubtful whether the Crown corporation, if the government pursues its Bill C-124, particularly on the price increase side but also on the labour relations side, is going to be able to meet its financial commitments or the financial stringencies this government has placed on it. In other words, if it cannot meet them, what it is going to mean, in my opinion, as a director, is that the Crown corporation is going to have a larger deficit, and that is going to have to come out of general revenue.

I think that points out another danger in areas that we will be dealing with in the days immediately to come, which will put further roadblocks in the way of all those members who have been attempting for months, many for years, to get better service not only in the rural areas but also in urban areas, particularly in western Canada, who have been waiting for ungodly lengths of time for an extension of home delivery. Certainly they have some benefits of urban residents, but they do not have the benefit of a modernized postal service. We certainly hope that whatever is done in the future, if we are successful in assisting those who are trying to modernize the post office, we can bring about some of the improvements to service which I and many others have been asking for. For example, in Kamloops, areas such as Aberdeen Heights and Dufferin are totally urban in design and density, yet they have been unable to receive door-to-door delivery for many years. The entire district of Salmon Arm, which is a highly urban area with a population in excess of 15,000, has again been waiting for years for door-to-door delivery. It seems to be unfair. In Calgary, Alberta, some areas have finally got home delivery. But we still have many urban areas that are still unable to get that kind of service.

I have one final problem that I want to bring to the attention of the House. It concerns communities which have postal box delivery. Often addressed mail does not have the box number included and the mail is not delivered, but returned. In smaller communities this problem is even more evident. There seems to be no reason why post office officials who know the people in the community very well refuse to deliver mail to the boxes simply because the mail does not have the box number on it. We know that regulations require that all details are to be listed on mail. But in the absence of a list or directory of persons and their box numbers, it seems silly that the only time post office officials are allowed by the regulations to forward mail to boxes without an indication of the box number on the item is when it emanates from outside of Canada.

The excuse used by the post office, although it is not in the regulations, is that it cannot publish such a directory of names and box numbers because it would be contrary to the privacy section of the Human Rights Act. But if someone wants to have an unlisted box number, why can that not be allowed? A person can have an unlisted telephone number. If someone wants to have an unlisted box number, why can a person not make that request to the post office in the same way a person does for a telephone? You simply stipulate to the telephone company that you do not want your name and number listed. Why can that not be done for a post office box number? Why that is permissible under the Human Rights Act for a telephone and not for a post office box is beyond me, and it is beyond the comprehension of many of the people I serve and, I am sure, of many people across Canada. There are many anomalies and oddities in the regulations for which no one seems to be able to find a sensible basis. I do hope that in the very near future many of these things can be straightened out and we can get on with our jobs.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to express a few points of view today with respect to the Canada Post Corporation. You will recall that making Canada Post Corporation a Crown corporation was supposed to solve many administrative ills. The government engaged a high-powered guy—

Mr. Darling: A high-priced one.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): —to take it over, to straighten out problems dealing with such things as mail delivery in towns. However, I have not seen much improvement. I support the motion made by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). I even find myself in agreement with the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) who spoke this afternoon. I never thought I would live to see the day I would agree with him, but I do today. I agree that Canada Post Corporation should be limited not only to the 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases in rates but I say Canada Post should not get a penny more from the public until it has shown that it has its house in order and it is not squandering public funds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It is time there was some order in the post office. As a matter of fact, I have come to the conclusion that the administration of Canada Post Corporation is perhaps the most arrogant group that one could find anywhere in the world. There is a problem in my own home community. For three weeks, since the postmistress resigned, I have been trying to find out what is going on. I might just as well be talking to the man in the moon because my telephone calls are never returned. When I telephone to make an inquiry I am always told that everybody is at a meeting, or they are out or up or down, but never there. One wonders how is one supposed to get answers when no one is ever there. It seems to me that when somebody who represents a constituency in this country calls a Crown corporation, one should have the right to expect a reply and not be completely ignored. I know that Canada Post does not have much time for Members of Parliament. After all, we are a pretty lowly species. I suppose people in Canada Post read the press and find out just how lowly we are and unworthy of discussion. But in any event, when I call Canada Post, I expect to get replies.

There is one thing of which I want to assure the public and members of the House who are having problems with Canada Post, and that is that Section 33(2) of the Canada Post Corporation Act, formerly known as Bill C-42, states that every annual report made before Parliament pursuant to subsection (1) stands permanently referred to such standing committee of Parliament as is established for the purpose of reviewing matters relating to transportation.

It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that, by the grace of my colleagues on the Standing Committee on Transport I am the chairman of that committee. One day Canada Post will at least have to conform with the law and its report will come before the Standing Committee on Transport. For once Canada Post officials will have to answer questions put to it. If I am still chairman of that committee, I am quite prepared to state here and now that the hon. member for Vaudreuil will be able to obtain answers to his questions. I will ensure as well that other members of the House who have been unable to get responses from Canada Post will also get their questions answered. That is the reason the act states that representatives of Canada Post must come before a committee of Parliament to justify the annual report of Canada Post Corporation. That is a wide reference. At that time we can find out about persons living in towns who are not entitled to delivery at their residence and why certain district directors in this country—who more properly should be called district disrupters—have the authority in their minds to determine that rural areas, entitled to rural delivery within one-quarter mile of the Post Office, can be declared by their whims and wishes to be incorporated villages. The justification a district director gave to the press was that everyone knows the village is a village because there are road signs saying "This is Millerton". It happens to be my home community so I know that it is not an incorporated village, but that does not seem to make any difference. The district director decides. What he decides, because he gets his mandate from God, obviously, has to be right.

If these people decide to move the post office in the middle of the night, that is fine, too. Canada Post officials do not have to notify the people. They can write notices to every person on a particular delivery route telling them that as of such and such a date the address will be changed. There will be a new postal code and the whole bit. When that is challenged and an explanation is demanded, the answer given is, "We have no idea how that letter got written." Despite the fact the letter was signed, that is the answer we get. You are told, "It was all a mistake, it should never have been written." Maybe the postal corporation should pull in some of their people and give them a course in honesty and truthfulness. Maybe the president of the corporation should spend a little less time in meetings and a little more time talking to people. Maybe he should have his people answering phone calls. Maybe he should see that they are in once in a while. If some of these things were done, maybe we would have some service. But until we get that service, the post office should not go to the people of Canada looking for any more funds.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the motion which is before the House this afternoon presented by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). I have had a great interest in the post office for some years as a member of our own party's committee on that subject. I can appreciate the hon. member's concern with respect to the charge made for postal boxes. In my area of Parry Sound-Muskoka there are a great many municipalities, yet only one town in the whole riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka, the town of Parry Sound, has mail delivery. All the rest have post offices, both small and large. I have had a great many complaints in recent years concerning increases of 100 per cent on all boxes. A great many people—and of course many of them are not in good financial positions—are very unhappy about it. There has also been a good many complaints from people who live in rural areas where there is mail delivery, but for some reason or other—and this is a small percentage of the population—they would prefer to have their mail delivered to post boxes and to purchase post boxes. Of course they are assessed a 100 per cent surcharge over the regular rate because rural mail is available to them. I feel that this is an injustice.

May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thank the hon. member for recognizing the time. Before calling it six o'clock, it has been brought to my attention that last Friday I indicated to hon. members I would attempt to produce a solution to the question concerning the mysterious disappearance from the Falkland Islands. That solution has been found. It is called, "war brides".

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.02 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANAGREX

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-85 to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): As hon. members are aware, there are 14 motions standing on the notice paper at the report stage of Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada.

Motions Nos. 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12 should be debated together with a vote on motion No. 6, disposing of Motions Nos. 1 and 8; and a vote on motion No. 7, disposing of Motions Nos. 9, 10, 11 and 12.

Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) gives the Chair some misgiving concerning its procedural acceptability in that it is attempting to introduce a new definition in Clause 2 by way of an amendment of a substantive nature. Therefore, I refer the hon. member to Beauchesne's Citation 773(10) and to Mr. Speaker Lamoureux's ruling on May 21, 1970, when he said:

> . . . amendments of a substantive or declaratory nature should not be proposed to an interpretation clause. If such amendments were accepted, the clause would not then be an interpretation clause. I am sure hon. members realize the difficulty of accepting substantive amendments or proposals under the general classification of interpretation. I suggest to hon. members with respect that that is not the place to make proposed amendments or motions which are of a substantive nature.

Therefore, I must rule that Motion No. 2 is not acceptable. However, the hon. member, if he so wishes, may present his arguments in favour of the motion at the appropriate time.

Motions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 should be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 13 and 14 should be debated and voted on separately.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, be amended by striking out the long title at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"An act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote and facilitate the export of agricultural and food products from Canada".

• (2010)

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (for Mr. Schellenberger) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 13 and 14 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"purposes of promoting and facilitating the export".

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 20 to 23 at page 9, lines 3 to 8 and lines 14 to 22 at page 10.

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out line 28 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"(c) promote or facilitate trade in"

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, be amended in Clause 14 by striking out lines 9 to 37 at page 12.

Mr. Bill McKnight moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, be amended in Clause 16 by striking out line 3 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"grex intends to use for its".

Motion No. 11

That Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, be amended in Clause 16 by striking out lines 6 and 7 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"grex with respect to any loan or".

Motion No. 12

That Bill C-85, an act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, be amended in Clause 16 by striking out lines 11 and 12 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"purpose of any loan or guarantee entered".

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I make an inquiry with respect to your ruling that my Motion No. 2 has been declared unsatisfactory or not acceptable? Am I to understand that Mr. Speaker has ruled that at an appropriate time—I think that was the expression Mr. Speaker used—I may be able to present certain arguments in support of the acceptability of my motion? Am I to understand that I can do this at some later date?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): The hon. member has understood correctly. I might repeat that what I said was that Motion No. 2, because of the precedent quoted, is not acceptable in the opinion of the Chair. However, the hon. member, if he so wishes, may present his arguments in favour of the motion at the appropriate time. I would take "appropriate" to mean once we have disposed of the grouping of Clauses Nos. 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is before us tonight deals exclusively with agriculture. During the time I have been in the House it is one of the rare times that we have had an opportunity to discuss agriculture.

Many people may wonder why agriculture is important since many of the available figures which are widely used indicate that there is something less than 5 per cent of the population which is engaged in farming. Therefore, some may wonder why a bill which concerns agriculture may be important. I see here the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and a fair number of government members. Their presence here I think is important because it demonstrates that they also believe that agriculture is important.

The reason why agriculture is so important in Canada is precisely that less than 5 per cent of the population is engaged in that industry. If there were up to 20 per cent, or as many as 50 per cent of the population engaged in farming, such as in India, we would not have the time to enjoy all the amenities which we take for granted in this country. We would not be able to have a 40-hour work week or paid vacations or enjoy a standard of living which we have come to expect and take for granted.

I am also pleased that the Canagrex bill has attracted the attention of the media because this bill is worthy of some media attention, a fact which in turn may attract the attention of the rest of the country.

Too frequently we take the efficiency of our agricultural industry in this country for granted. We take it for granted that we can depend on the agricultural industry. For example, I do not think any of us have been to a store where we could not purchase a loaf of bread, milk or vegetables and fruits which are out of season. Very often farmers or businessmen go to shops to order supplies only to find that they are on back-order or have to be manufactured and shipped to the shop. This just does not happen with respect to our agricultural commodities which we call staples and what we see as necessities in our country. Therefore, I suggest that agriculture has been doing a good job for Canadians.

In addition, I think this bill is important because it addresses the export performance of the agricultural industry. We are all aware of the hard economic times we have been going through in which interest rates have been causing severe problems for small business and farmers. The one bright spot in the economy, probably the brightest, is the fact that agricultural exports from Canada continue to earn record amounts of foreign currency. Not only is agriculture important for our domestic wellbeing in providing us with a high standard of living, it is also important with respect to our foreign exchange. Every day in question period we are told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and we are told time and again by the governor of the Bank of Canada that we have to protect the value of the Canadian dollar because if we let it fall our imports will cost more money. This includes imports of food such as oranges from Florida, and other fruit and fresh vegetables from California. As our dollar falls in value it makes those imports more expensive, which adversely affects the value of the Canadian dollar and adds to our interest rates.

To counter this reaction we are told that we must raise interest rates. I suggest one method for protecting the Canadian dollar without the necessity of raising interest rates to attract money into Canada which we have to repay is simply to sell those commodities which we produce. That is precisely what agriculture has been doing. I submit that it has been doing a good job here as well.

This bill basically deals with agricultural exports. I think that many of us justifiably feel that Canadian companies and producers have generally been doing a good job in maintaining exports. Certainly, the government has a role to play in the export field. The reason for my amendment is that many people feel that the government should not be directly involved in exports. Many of us feel that the government does have a role to play in helping not only agricultural exports but all exports of Canadian produced commodities. But I would submit that that role should be primarily to keep Canadian producers as productive and therefore as competitive as possible with foreign countries. Our chief agricultural competitor, as we all know, is the U.S. It should be this government's main job in terms of agricultural exports to see that the Canadian farmer is able to compete on a favourable basis as far as costs of production, interest rates, fuel prices, trading arrangements, and tariff and non-tariff barriers with the Americans.

We are dealing with a very important topic here this evening. Just to quote the figures, the total agricultural industry produced something like $17 billion worth of goods last year. That is a lot of money. Of those goods, we exported a great amount. We also imported some, but if one takes the amount of goods exported out of the country and subtract that from the goods that we imported, one finds that agricultural exports were still in a $4 billion surplus position. That is a very important factor in relation to our foreign exchange, keeping our dollar competitive and keeping us competitive with the Americans.

To discuss the bill in somewhat general terms, since the amendment before us this evening is to the long title, our basic concern on this side is with the buy and sell provisions of the measure, with the provision which will allow Canagrex, if passed in its present form, to engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada. The bill is presently entitled, "An Act to establish a corporation called Canagrex, to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada". The motion would simply remove the words "and engage" from the long title, which would then read, "An act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote and facilitate the export of agricultural and food products from Canada".

We need the promotional aspects of this bill and some of the other things that the bill would provide. For instance, we would welcome the additional financing and credit guarantees that it would provide. If one looks at the list of amendments that we have proposed from this side, one will find that the majority of them express a concern over the buy and sell provisions of the bill. They are related to Clause 14 of the bill which would give this Crown corporation the power to become really involved through joint ventures and even to go as far as becoming engaged in the actual production of food in this country.

The government has a responsibility and a legitimate role to play with regard to exports. Among them would be the promotion of agricultural goods around the world. It also has a role to play with regard to credit guarantees when dealing with certain foreign countries where the risk may be great. The government may have a role to play in assisting private enterprise which is in the business of exporting agricultural products where the risk may be such that the private enterprise company could not stand the loss of a sale to a part of the world where credit may be a bit shaky. The government could assume some of that risk and assist in providing guarantees of credit.

Another area which is somewhat similar would involve export insurance, and I think the government has a legitimate role to play here. The fourth area which is implicit in the bill, and which we welcome, deals with the long-term and short-term assessment and analysis of the demand by foreign countries for certain agricultural goods produced in Canada. Many of these things are presently being done. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a very extensive program involving four or five areas to which I have just referred. In terms of the long-term supply and market demand and analysis of what is going on in other parts of the world, it would indicate to Canadian exporters where they should be looking. We do have trade commissioners in some 70 countries, the list of which I have in my hand. We do maintain commercial offices in our embassies, literally around the world. Just to name few of them, they include Algeria, Costa Rica, The Ivory Coast, Kenya, Morocco, Jamaica, Nigeria, Korea, Kuwait, Mexico, New Zealand and Pakistan.

The assessment of the witnesses we heard before the Agriculture Committee in relation to this bill was that those commercial attachés and embassies around the world can be given much credit because they have been doing a good job. In addition, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has several programs, and I will outline a couple of them this evening. There is the Promotional Projects Program and its short title, or abbreviation, is the PPP. The department states that "the main objective of the Promotional Projects Program of the Department of Inquiry, Trade and Commerce is to promote the export of Canadian products and services". That would include Canadian agricultural products. The program consists of a number of sponsored promotions designed to meet particular requirements, and these include trade fairs abroad, trade commissions, in-store promotions, incoming trade delegations and buyer programs. That is precisely the kind of program from which agricultural exports can benefit.

I am told that these forms of assistance vary from project to project, where the government cost-shares travel arrangements for people who want to travel to potential markets and assess them on a first-hand basis. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce also assists people who are involved in actual sales ventures in other countries. Eligibility in such that the company involved must be established and operating in Canada and that the products which are being exported must be at least 60 per cent manufactured in Canada. Since agricultural products would be 100 per cent manufactured in Canada, those producers would have no problem meeting the criteria. In addition, the Export Development Corporation has a program providing export credit insurance. The purpose of this is to insure Canadian firms against non-payment when Canadian goods and services are sold abroad. Agricultural commodities qualify.

The Export Development Corporation also provides long term export loans. It provides sureties and related insurance for performance and foreign investment guarantees, insuring Canadians against loss of their investments abroad by reason of political actions. Those are some of the things which are presently being done by the government, and we must applaud it for that. Again, from what we have been told in committee, the people in the business of exporting agricultural commodities have made good use of that service, by and large. In addition, in March of this year, a news item in "Trade News", which was sent to my office, stated that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce had set up a new program under the EDC, specifically aimed at food, called PEMD Food, the Program for Export Market Development, specifically for food. This program was intended to cover the costs of people interested in developing export markets so that they could visit new markets, identify export potential and allow them to participate in trade fairs in order to bring potential foreign buyers to Canada and to allow for formal bidding on specific projects outside Canada. "Trade News" stated on page 3:

• (2030)

Normally, approved costs will be shared on a 50/50 basis by the department. These costs include personnel costs, travel costs, special costs such as booth space, rentals, consultant and professional fees. The contributions are generally repayable—

This is interesting.

—if the project is successful and results in new export sales. Repayment may be waived in cases where the applicant is not a sales organization and where sales are not generated as a direct result of the project.

The promotional and export guarantees and the market intelligence which is provided for in this bill is now being provided by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce generally under its mandate but, more specifically, under a new program which has just been established by that department called the "Program for Export Market Development (Food)". Those of us who have followed this bill through committee really question why the government needs to set up another Crown corporation to compete with existing government programs already in operation.

The mention of Crown corporations brings another point to mind. This government has a penchant for setting up Crown corporations, to the extent that I do not think anyone really knows how many Crown corporations are in existence. We question why we need another Crown corporation to get involved and to compete with government departments already in the field when there are so many other Crown corporations already in existence and when we are having problems in terms of exercising proper financial control over many of those Crown corporations.

There are some very serious questions to be asked about this bill and particularly about the provisions in the bill which allow the government to get involved directly or engage in buying and selling agricultural commodities.

Let me deal with what I think should be the main responsibility of the government in terms of maintaining agricultural exports. Surely the main objective and the main preoccupation of the government should be keeping agricultural production in this country competitive. I submit—and I think I would be backed up by literally every farmer in the country—that this government, and particularly this minister, have been absolute flops at keeping Canadian agricultural producers competitive with producers around the world.

Let me compare our situation with that of our main competitor south of the border. I challenge the minister to do so. I know he will speak after me and ramble and make a lot of noise but, as usual, probably without making a lot of sense. He should look at hard facts about American producers. If he did that, he would realize that American farmers have access to financing at rates of interest lower than those paid by Canadian farmers. Many of us in this House have raised the issue with the minister and with the Minister of Finance of how we could use some American programs as examples of how to bring about lower financing costs for Canadian farmers. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fisher) sitting beside the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). It is interesting that he is here tonight. I have had discussions with that gentleman about some of the programs the Americans have in place. Those programs allow American farmers to compete more favourably with us. I had discussions with the parliamentary secretary's predecessor, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), about how we could do these things, but this government is not disposed to looking at measures which would allow Canadian farmers to remain competitive with their American counterparts.

Any farmer right across the country will tell us that the number one problem he faces is not grasshoppers or climate, whether it be lack of rainfall or hailstorms. It is not even the marketing of his commodity, what he can grow or what he can get for it, although price is a problem. The main problem Canadian farmers face now is high interest rates. I think the government should look at that problem very seriously and look also at some of the suggestions the opposition has been making. If the minister would care to talk to some farmers, he would learn that many of them now follow the weekly interest rate setting process which goes on at the Bank of Canada as regularly as they follow weather forecasts and the markets, because interest rates are now more of a determining factor in how long farmers will stay in business than the weather or the markets. Interest rates are very important. If the minister wanted to be fair about it and wanted to be serious, he would realize that the Americans have access to rates of interest which are lower than those paid by Canadian farmers. I submit that if we are to have increased agricultural exports, the first responsibility of this government is to make us competitive as far as interest rates are concerned.

The second thing we could do to make us competitive would be to do something about the fuel prices farmers pay. Several of us on this side of the House have raised this issue with the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance with regard to the excise tax, the federal tax on fuels used for production of farm goods. We have all received letters from greenhouse operators. We all know the effect fuel prices have on the cost of agricultural production. American farmers are paying less for fuel than Canadian farmers. If the government were serious about doing something to keep us competitive on export markets, I think it would look seriously at reducing the excise tax on farm fuels. The federal government now takes between 40 cents and 60 cents a gallon on farm fuels. Many of us can remember buying fuel for half that amount. When I first started farming some 25 years ago, fuel cost 18 cents, 19 cents or 20 cents a gallon. Now the federal government is taking two times and three times that much per gallon just for excise tax.

That is only part of the story because as the federal government taxes natural gas, that shows up in increased prices for fertilizers.

In many ways Canadian farmers who consume petroleum products have the worst of both worlds. Canadian consumers generally pay very high prices for petroleum products. We are told increased prices are supposed to guarantee domestic supply, but at the same time this government is increasing its tax take on a gallon of fuel, and this is driving the domestic oil industry out of the country. When I say we have the worst of both worlds, I mean we not only are experiencing high prices but at the same time we are also driving Canadian production down. It seems to me that the government has a responsibility to keep us competitive.

There are several other factors we could talk about in relation to keeping Canadian agriculture competitive in order to maintain our export advantage and to maintain our export markets. One factor is the way this government represents agricultural commodities when it negotiates trade and trade barriers with our trading partners. I think the last round of tariff negotiations in Geneva concluded in 1979, some three years ago. I submit that our agricultural commodities were badly represented by this government. We need only look at the guarantees we gave our trading partners respecting beef imports into this country. Let me talk specifically about the beef industry. We were negotiated into a position where the meat import law we have passed in this session is meaningless because no one stood up for Canadian agriculture at Geneva. If the government is serious about agricultural exports, it should do a better job of going to bat for Canadian agriculture as far as trade barriers are concerned.

We have an initial price for wheat which is set at $4.75 a bushel, which means that when the producer delivers a bushel of No. 1 red spring wheat, he gets something in the neighbourhood of $4.35 to $4.40 a bushel, once freight is taken off and allowance is made for a bit of dockage and shrinkage. In the European Economic Community wheat sells for about $9 a bushel. When we send a bushel of wheat to the European Economic Community to compete with the product there, a levy or excise tax is imposed which brings the price of our grain up to the level set by the European Economic Community. If this government were serious about doing something for agriculture, it could do something in this area. It could make some mileage there and help us export our products to other countries.

I can say the same things about Japan. Japan is very anxious to get certain kinds of agricultural exports from Canada. We know the Japanese are very competitive, ambitious and hard-working people, and we give them credit for that, but they are also very skilful in negotiating the best deal possible for their producers. Japan is very anxious to buy raw rapeseed, but does not particularly want to buy our rapeseed oil. If they buy the raw rapeseed, that provides jobs for the crushers in Japan. There is about a tenfold difference between the value of raw rapeseed oil and rapeseed oil. In other words, the Japanese buy from us about ten times as much raw rapeseed as refined oil. Of course that is good business for them because it means jobs for the crushers in Japan to turn the raw rapeseed into rapeseed oil. It does nothing to provide jobs for the processing industry in Canada, however. If the government seriously wants to increase agricultural exports that is an area where it could take some action.

We question why the government now wants to become directly involved in trading. Indeed, with the history of government generally, one would wonder why people want them to become involved in anything. As governments become larger and larger, the people who vote have less and less control over them. Members of Parliament are asked to decide many, many things with one vote. Another Crown corporation is going to make it tougher for us to control government and see that it does a good job for the taxpayers who foot the bill.

One way in which the government could do something about keeping this country competitive in exports is by establishing a stabilization plan for beef. Last December the minister spoke about this, and the agriculture committee offered to hold an in camera meeting if he wanted to discuss it. That is eight or nine months ago, and we have not heard anything about it since. If the government wants a competitive beef industry in this country, it should ensure that there is uniformity in pricing from coast to coast. When the provincial treasuries of each province bid against each other in order to maintain their beef industry, it is apparent that this is not good for the long-range prospects of a national beef industry.

Whether the minister likes it or not, the beef industry is of major importance in this country. It is important to agriculture because it is a large consumer of feed grains. A stabilization plan with uniformity of pricing from coast to coast would keep it competitive. Fortunately, the beef industry has a long history in this country, so I do not think that even the minister, in the ten years he has been in office, could destroy it. It is more credit to the beef industry if it survives, however, than to the minister.

I find it strange that the government wants to become involved in exporting some of these commodities without fulfilling its obligations at home to keep them competitive. I could make the same comments about a stabilization plan for hogs. There should be a national plan along the same lines as a beef stabilization plan, but no leadership has been shown by the federal government.

In April the Farm Credit Corporation Act, Bill C-88, was amended to allow the corporation to borrow funds by any means with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance. We have not seen any results from that as yet. There is a new head of the Farm Credit Corporation, and we give him credit—no pun intended—for the qualifications he brings to the job, and we wish him well in it. I would urge him to do what he has to do posthaste, however, because agricultural producers are facing very serious financial problems. An export Crown corporation would be meaningless if all our producers were out of business. The minister needs to do his homework and see that the provisions of Bill C-88 are implemented so that additional funds are made available to producers as quickly as possible.

I should like to deal with the minister's attitude toward the buy and sell and "engage in" provisions of the bill, Mr. Speaker. It has been said, and I will repeat it, that some of the functions set out in the bill are already being carried out by one or more government agencies or departments, so it seems that the government must want this bill in order that it may become more directly involved in the export of agricultural commodities. In fact, at committee the minister said so—in a very crude fashion which I found rather unfortunate. I will try to refine and clean up what he said, which was to the effect that unless Canagrex is allowed to engage in the export of agricultural commodities it would be as useless as what I will call the mammary glands on a boar pig. I think this points to the government's deliberate intention to become directly involved in farming and the agricultural industry. We do not need that, Mr. Speaker.

By setting up a Crown corporation to promote and provide credit facilities, the government will provide competition for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is interesting that we could not persuade the Minister of Agriculture to allow the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to send its witnesses to the committee to set out how the provisions of this bill would compete or complement Canagrex. One would think that if the government were interested in providing services to taxpayers at the least possible cost, it should co-ordinate the efforts of the different departments to this end. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a plan which pertains specifically to food, yet we did not have the opportunity of examining that program in committee and comparing it with the one that is proposed in this bill. I think we should be able to co-ordinate the programs to get the best value for our tax dollars.

Other problems came to light in committee. For instance, there are several commercial attaches with our embassies around the world who are strictly concerned with agriculture. I have to give credit to the former minister of agriculture in the Clark government, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise). In his brief tenure in office he increased the number of agricultural attaches with a view to accomplishing some of the things this bill sets out to do. I have to give him a lot of credit for that because when he proceeded as quickly as he did, he showed he was interested in agriculture, that it was a priority and he was interested in getting the job done. But if we have a situation where Canagrex, in its present form as a Crown corporation, would be competing with the private sector for agriculture exports and an agricultural attaché in Mexico City found a market for some white beans or navy beans, you would wonder where that information would go. Would it be made available as openly and freely to the private sector as it would be to the Crown corporation? You would think there would certainly be in some ways a conflict of interest there. That issue was raised several times in committee and is one which needs to be examined very closely because, by and large, the private sector has been doing a very good job as far as exports are concerned. There are several export firms in Canada competing with each other for export markets, but they can only compete fairly if every one of them has access to the same kind of information. Anyone who knows anything about marketing, particularly farm commodities, knows that if you go into a marketing situation and you are not equipped with all the information, then you are very much at a disadvantage.

It seems to me that in a situation where Canagrex was operating as a competitor to the private sector and there was information available from a federal government source, there would be some possibility at least of that information being made available more readily to the Crown corporation than to the private sector. I find that a very disturbing kind of question and dilemma which is associated with this bill. It is disturbing from the point of view that the private sector is in business to make a profit and they pay taxes on that profit. Those taxes fund the government. So you could find yourself in a situation where the government was using taxes derived from the private sector to take unfair advantage in the marketplace. It is a very serious question which needs to be answered and it was not answered to my satisfaction and that of most of the members on this side, in the extensive airing the bill had in committee. So if the government is really interested in proceeding with this bill and doing what is right for Canadian agriculture, I would certainly urge it to accept not only this amendment but the rest of the amendments you grouped together, Mr. Speaker. I believe they were Nos. 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11. They all have to do with the buying and selling as far as the Crown corporation is concerned. That would certainly signal to the agricultural community that the government is not as interested as it was in getting directly involved in the export of their products.

There are some other amendments, Mr. Speaker, having to do with better management, a sunset clause, a better accounting system as far as reporting back to the House is concerned, and those kinds of things. But the main objection we have to the bill is the fact that it will allow the government, because of the widespread powers in Clause 14, to willy-nilly get into the agricultural commodity export business. Let me sum up by saying I think the government has a responsibility to Canadian agriculture. By and large, as far as the export of agricultural commodities is concerned, I think it has been doing a fairly good job, but I submit the main responsibility it has is to create and maintain a healthy economic climate at home so that our producers can remain competitive. After all, the thing that is going to sell our agricultural products is price. If we can remain competitive and offer an assured supply at a fair price, that is basically what is needed to maintain and increase our agricultural exports. That should be the main preoccupation of this government and this minister.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this bill tonight. I also appreciate following the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) who always seems to present his agruments in such a reasonable fashion.

After a couple of hundred years of the existence of agriculture in Canada we have a nation which is very dependent on agriculture and where it is still a major industry. But over that period of time things have changed considerably from a basic approach of survival where the farmer raised what he could for himself and helped to keep his neighbour alive by selling or trading with him, to that point where agriculture is a major part of the Canadian economy. It has become one of the most important factors in our world trade. For example, our exports of agricultural products in the period from 1971 to 1975 were about $3 billion. By 1980 they reached $7.8 billion, and have of course increased since then. That represents an increase of about 261 per cent. It is also very important to note that our surplus of agricultural products exported over those imported is more than $2.7 billion. Compare that with our over-all surplus and our balance of trade for 1980 of $5.25 billion. Agricultural products represented over 50 per cent of the total trade surplus, while accounting for only 10 per cent of our total trade in dollars. That is a pretty good record which the agricultural industry has built up over the years.

The bill, Mr. Speaker, is an attempt by the government to increase that expansion still further. However, I have some worries about this bill and the approach the government has taken to agriculture. The government does not deal with some of the real concerns of the farmers, concerns which every member of this House recognizes and is aware of. Indirectly, possibly, the development of a corporation to increase farm exports would really be worthwhile. But it is interesting to note that this bill has taken a long time to get through this House. First reading was on December 8, 1981. Second reading started on January 25, 1982, and we are now only at the report stage. Part of the reason for this situation is that the official opposition have spent a lot of time on this bill in committee, in fact approximately six months. This is a little surprising when you look at the initial support the official opposition gave to the bill. For example, I will quote from a speech by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) who said, speaking of the bill on January 25:

> I welcome it because it is at least an indication that this government at long last is showing some interest for the time being in the promotion of agriculture or the sale of agricultural products. I wonder why it took some ten months, from February to December, to prepare this legislation when farm organizations and farm leaders have been requesting this type of scheme for at least five or six years. I can recall my first introduction to the Canagrex concept when it was brought to the attention of our caucus back in 1973.

He goes on to say:

> It should also be noted that even the February 20 announcement came one year after the 1980 election, and in that campaign Canagrex formed a very integral and important part of the Liberal Party's agricultural platform. If this government had acted upon this promise a year and a half ago and had given priority to increasing agricultural exports, then our agricultural industry might not be experiencing the same severe economic distress which plagues it today.

That is a very concise statement indicating the kind of support that we need for some form of push to be given to exports if we are going to increase our agriculture structure by exports.

Part of the reason for this delay was also caused by the rather antiquated procedures by which bills are brought into the House and are passed by it. For instance, if the official opposition and even members of the government had had the opportunity to make suggestions to this bill before it was drafted, I am sure that it would not have taken nearly as long to get through committee stage. The only weapon the opposition has in changing a bill is, I suppose, delay. It is very unfortunate because that is exactly what the official opposition did. The bill was delayed by the official opposition to make amendments which may have been unnecessary had this House had the opportunity to make some contribution to the drafting of the bill rather than leaving it to the bureaucrats.

Since I have been here I have found that bureaucrats seldom have a real insight into what members want in a bill. I am not speaking only of members of the opposition but of members of the government as well. The official opposition has concentrated its attack on the ability of Canagrex to take an effective part in agriculture. The actual sale of goods or the ability to stockpile, if you wish, to purchase and to sell certain products might have a detrimental effect on agriculture. That is the basis of the official opposition's position.

The official opposition has also suggested that it does not want such a corporation to be able to dictate prices, establish quotas and so on. There is some inconsistency in the position of the official opposition. It shows up again in a speech made by the hon. member for Elgin who said:

> One of the major problems facing Canagrex will be its effectiveness in view of its very limited budget and staff.

He went on to say:

> However, with these massive reductions from the minister's own personal assessment of minimum standards for Canagrex, I wonder whether the corporation will be able to perform adequately the role laid out for it in Bill C-85.

The danger expressed by the hon. member in that speech is that Canagrex is not big enough. Since that time, we have had a number of approaches by the opposition. We have heard them say that Canagrex is too big or that it might get too big.

Again, a whole area of concern, not only of the official opposition but of members of the government and members of my party is the accountability of Crown corporations. This is not limited only to Canagrex but to all Crown corporations. Here I must give the official opposition a great deal of credit because its members stuck to the point. If we had been able to take part in drafting this bill, we may not have had to go through weeks of meetings concerning it.

As I said, members of the official opposition stuck to the point and, along with members of the government and members of my party, we have been able to create through this bill a corporation which will be the most accountable of all Crown corporations, certainly of federal Crown corporations. A lot of provincial corporations need this kind of accountability.

I want to go through just a couple of the clauses in the bill which point out the accountability. First let me refer to Clause 14. this is a somewhat controversial clause as you can see from the number of amendments put forward, Mr. Speaker. Those members who were in the committee hearings will recognize that it continually caused controversy because it lays out the powers and purposes of the corporation. Within it, in its present form, it has several limiting clauses which make it impossible for Canagrex to strike out on its own. It also limits the purchasing of property so that it can only make purchases for certain uses.

These clauses were proposed, or at least forced to some extent, by the official opposition. It should be noted that Clause 14 (1) makes provision for the credit union system to be part of the financial structure of Canagrex. We thank the minister for this concession which was welcomed by the credit union system in Canada. Second, Clause 29 provides financial controls which has the corporation report to the minister and have its account audited by the Auditor General. It further allows the Auditor General to proceed with a comprehensive audit when he deems it necessary. This would guarantee a referral not only to the Auditor General if he makes that decision, but to the minister, eventually to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, and then back to Parliament. This is much more accountability than is required by any other Crown corporation in the federal structure, and there are some 400 of them. Lately the need for such accountability has been well pointed out, highlighted rather thoroughly, and underlined by a rather damaging report which was tabled not too long ago by the Auditor General in his partial comprehensive audit of the Canadian Dairy Commission. I think it might be interesting to make some comparisons between Canagrex and the Canadian Dairy Commission.

In order to be fair to Canagrex, I suppose I should review a bit of what happened to the Canadian Dairy Commission since it began. It has been subjected to three investigations on aspects of its operations in the past 19 months. There has been a report from Mr. Justice Gibson, an arbitration report from Mr. David Kates and a comprehensive audit by the Auditor General. These are the kinds of things which can happen to a Crown corporation if it does not have built into it the kind of accountability and security which I hope will be built into Canagrex.

Essentially these reports said the same thing about the operations of the Canadian Dairy Commission, namely, that there was little in the way of effective management for operating procedures to ensure that the Canadian Dairy Commission performs effectively. In the drafting of the Canagrex bill some of these things were taken care of by the very fact that they will have to be referred to the Auditor General and then back to the minister.

Our party supports orderly marketing. We want supply management to work well where it has been established, but we have some difficulty supporting the workings of an agency which has performed as badly as the Canadian Dairy Commission. If we are to have the kind of agency that we can accept, we must be sure that it will have the kind of accountability that makes it work well.

I should like to refer to three other sections of the act. Clause 31 requires that the corporation operate according to a three-year plan. Clause 40 requires an annual report which will be referred to the minister and then to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. Clause 41 requires that the act will be referred to the House for review after five years. I hope these sections will make this particular agency much more acceptable and much more accountable to Parliament.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the hon. member surprises me by the shortness of his speech. I did not expect him to quit so soon, so I was reading some documents at my desk.

I am amazed by some of the things which have been said about the corporation we are proposing—Canagrex. The hon. member who just finished speaking referred to the fact that it was mentioned many years ago. As he pointed out, we in our party used it as part of our party platform in two different election campaigns. It was not hidden from the public. As late as this evening, I have been told, certain individuals on the news said that Canagrex would have a monopoly. I say that is an untruth and a falsehood. There is no way that it could possibly have a monopoly even in the first instance and, even more so, since the amendments were made in committee by members on different sides of the House. They suggested that we amend it so that it can only enter into a venture when requested to do so. I do not understand how these people can say the things which they said as late as this evening on public electronic media broadcasting. I say, "Shame on them" for what they are saying because they know darned well that it is not true.

Mr. Mayer: What is not true?

Mr. Whelan: There are no monopoly powers granted under the Canagrex act. The hon. member knows it as well as I do, and they know it as well as I do. But they have planted the fear in people's minds that farmers will not be able to sell anything at all unless it is sold through Canagrex. I say that that is an outright falsehood, and they know that it is an outright falsehood, as far as that goes. They are guilty of a misdemeanour.

Mr. Mayer: You do not even know what a misdemeanour is.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I was as docile as I could be while they were talking. I cannot understand why they are a little aroused now. I am putting some of the facts on the record.

An hon. Member: Why don't you go back to reading?

Mr. Whelan: Perhaps I will refer to a letter which I was reading earlier. It reads:

Dear Mr. Whelan:

Thank you for the strength you bring to the cabinet and the government of our great country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: You wrote it yourself.

Mr. Whelan: It is a very short letter. It continues:

I sincerely pray that you may overflow with God's wisdom and strength as you continue to wholeheartedly serve Canadians.

It is from a man way out in Vancouver, British Columbia. I could read thousands of letters like it, if hon. members opposite want me to.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I receive many good letters about what I am doing and what the government is doing in Canada. I will read from another one. This is from Walter E. Kroeker in Manitoba. He wrote:

Let me assure you that there was a full appreciation of your efforts in Arostook County. It would have warmed your heart to imagine all these growers as your constituents!

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you know where that county is. It is in potato country not very far from your constituency. They were saying what a great job I was doing on behalf of Canadian potato growers, and that it was making it impossible for the United States to compete with potato growers in Canada. That huge, big country could not compete with Canada because of what we have done for potato growers. He ends up his letter, Walter does—and he is an old friend of mine but of a different political faith, I believe—by saying:

I would respectfully urge that there be no new programs for potato growers, and especially, no stabilization programs. Not included in this recommendation are assistance efforts directed toward offshore exports only, such as Potatoes Canada and, when operational, Canagrex.

That is what Walter wants. Walter is a former president of the Canadian Horticultural Council of Canada. He is a very successful entrepreneur in potato production and in other kinds of agricultural production in the province of Manitoba. He is very active in the broadcasting field, the seed production field, etc. He is one of the most knowledgeable men in all of Manitoba. I am sure the hon. member who led off this discussion would virtually agree with that. That is the kind of letter Walter wrote me. I say, "Wonderful", thank you, Walter". He has a member who sits right across from me who is his brother-in-law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: When the hon. member talks about the United States, I am sure he is aware of that great big country and its great big trading and enterprising system. They have the amended law 480 to give them tremendous powers to dump their products.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) has asked several questions in the House about what we will do if the United States Secretary of Agriculture uses law 480 and the powers which he has. He is worried about it, and he has every reason to be worried about the powers which they have under law 480. They can buy and sell. They can establish facilities in other countries for processing of any product they want. They can do that in their great free-enterprise system in the United States.

What have they done with the Webb-Pomerene bill? United States legislators voted in 1916 giving power to establish a cartel to determine price. They enacted the law, which has never been used since 1916, but the government of the United States of America saw fit to put it into practice now and to give them a cartel over poultry.

None of our marketing boards have such a thing. None of the provisions we are proposing in the Canagrex Act would even suggest such a thing, and it makes me so mad that they go to the extremes that they do to say that we are giving cartel powers, that we are giving authority to have monopoly in Canagrex.

I am almost tempted to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is a damn lie, but I would not go so far as to say that. It is just an untruth, that is all, a very bad untruth.

I am most surprised by the amendments that have been put forth by the opposition members in relation to the Canagrex legislation. The fact of the matter is that the bill has gone through a gruelling four months of debate. As the hon. member for Price Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) said, it was introduced in December, and was four months in standing committee, during which time more than 30 organizations and companies came forward with their comments and criticisms. And there were a lot of them. Many were legitimate and we paid attention to many of them. We reviewed all the presentations that were made to the committee. Acting on constructive suggestions that we heard during those hearings, we made a number of important amendments to the original bill. In fact, 11 of the 14 amendments approved by the all-party committee are substantive and the other three deal with language.

Among the amendments that have already been made to this bill is one brought in by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) which is three pages long. It does what the hon. member for Prince Albert says, that is to make sure there can be no vested interest by the directors or the management of this board. It is a direct replica of part of a bill that they introduced when they were the government of Canada, and I agreed to that.

I agreed also to the amendments of the hon. member for Prince Albert whereby the Auditor General would make a review every year. I do not know if he knows this, Mr. Speaker, but it is the first time in the world that that will be done. No other Crown corporation in the world is automatically subject to a complete review every year.

So they say we are building a huge monster. The fact is that it is subject to scrutiny as is no other Crown corporation in any province, in any federal system, in any democracy in the world. I have readily agreed to that, to show how sincere I am, to make sure it is going to run right, yet they said, "Who is this fellow Whelan?" I challenge you to find anything with which I have had anything to do before or since I came to this House that was run badly, and if we found it to be so that we did not do something about it. My record is pretty darn good and I am proud of it, as far as that goes. I have dealt with big corporations, little corporations, etc., much more than those who would criticize me and hide behind somebody else. Some of them are in the House tonight, I am told, and I was looking to see where they are. They are supporting some of the worst marketing systems in the world and leading a revolution against Canagrex—for what? I will touch on that later.

As I said, we have made these amendments, we have made these concessions, we have leaned over backwards to make sure that we guaranteed that we were not creating any kind of a monster.

As Canagrex is now constructed in the bill, we have a potent tool to assist in expanding exports and at the same time we have numerous safeguards for both the private sector and the taxpayer.

Of the 14 amendments we have before us, only one is a government amendment, and it is merely a language change, a correction. Nine of the remaining 13 amendments are identical to the ones proposed by the Conservatives in committee, which gave rise to the extensive amendments that we have agreed to.

As their spokesman indicated on July 8, the amendments were dealt with in a fair manner. Eight of the opposition's amendments are aimed at taking away Canagrex's power to engage in exports when requested to do so. I will deal with those amendments as a group, but first I would like to speak to the other five amendments which would have us do the following things: exclude beef from Canagrex's realm of operation, and you, Mr. Speaker, have already made the ruling on that, and you were going to allow the mover of that amendment to raise his objections at the proper time; restrict the president or a director to no more than two terms of office; force the publication of the directors' salaries and expenses; impose a sunset clause.

The hon. member who led off the discussion today says that what they needed was stabilization for beef. He said there has been no offer of leadership in this. Let him come with me to my office and I will show him the presentation that we made in 1978 to the provinces, Mr. Speaker, 100 per cent of income insurance for all products. Who objected to that? Several of the provinces did. The Canadian Cattlemen's Association did; the Canadian Federation of Agriculture did, because they said it was too good, it was too lucrative, and today, in 1982, they are asking for basically the same thing that they turned down in 1978. One hundred per cent of income insurance I offered them. They said, "You will have no controls over production, you will have farmers producing like you cannot imagine if you have that kind of system." I thought it was a pretty good system. I had cabinet approval. When the hon. member for Elgin was minister of agriculture, he withdrew it. He said it was going to be too costly.

They want me to go ahead with a program like the one in Alberta, and Alberta has lots of money. They are putting into the beef industry in that one province this year, as the minister of agriculture told me at our provincial federal ministers' meeting several days ago, $158 million. That is that great, free enterprise, productive system? Mr. Speaker, that is a form of welfare. I cannot imagine them taking welfare for such a productive, efficient entity, and it is a very efficient, productive entity. There is none any better in the whole world. They do not have that system in the United States, no way do they have that system. They do not even have the stabilization program that we have, that many people say is obsolete at the present time. I just say that about the programs that we have in Canada, as was pointed out in the hearings both in Boise, Idaho, and in Bangor, Maine, about the potato programs that we have that are too good.

You know, Mr. Speaker—well I will not ask you to make comments, because I know you cannot in your present position, but I know you could, and I know you would if you could, I should say.

I will speak on the last point first. It is on Motion No. 14. A sunset clause is what they call it. In effect it presumes that Canagrex is guilty unless proven innocent and puts the corporation to death at the end of five years unless it is rescued through extraordinary measures. I understand that the intent of the sunset clause is to ensure that the government carries no deadwood, that it only maintains agencies that are proven effective. I believe we have answered that concern through the amendment that we put forth in Clause 41. In that clause we agreed that after five years Canagrex's operation should be brought before the Standing Committee on Agriculture for report and full review. This is a much more meaningful process than the sunset clause. It will provide for an effective scrutiny of the agency, but it also presumes that Canagrex as a business will continue to function.

Tell me, Mr. Speaker, how could we attract top people to the agency if they had to assume that that agency would not be around after 1987? How could we get some highly skilled persons to move, say, from Alberta, a province that has been very successful at exporting and whose organization has the power to buy and sell? They said they were not successful until they were granted in Alberta the power to buy and sell?

While I am talking about Alberta, maybe we should put on the record how many Crown corporations they have in Alberta. They have 18. Many of them have the power to buy and sell. They even have an airline, they have a trust company, they have many Crown corporations.

Mr. Mayer: Would the minister accept a very brief short question?

Mr. Whelan: When I am finished, with pleasure.

• (2130)

I just finished mentioning all the successful Crown corporations which the province of Alberta has. There is the Alberta treasury branches, and I could give you a whole list. I am amazed at the number there are in Alberta. As well, look at the amount of land Alberta has leased to farmers—state-owned land that is farmed. There are millions of acres under that kind of program. No one says that Alberta is grabbing all the land. No one says anything like that. For instance, that was not said when I met the new premier of agriculture in Saskatchewan. How many Crown corporations do they have in Saskatchewan? They have 24. I asked the minister if he was going to get rid of those Crown corporations that he has the power to buy and sell. He laughed. He said, "Not if they are making money. Not if they are being run well." I will bet you that they will not get rid of one, because if you look at the records, those corporations are all doing pretty well. I can go as far east as we can go, to Newfoundland. How many Crown corporations do they have in Newfoundland? They have 37. The minister of agriculture for Newfoundland told me in Halifax that his government is creating three new ones to assist the agriculture industry in Newfoundland. They have the power to buy and sell. He said, "I do not see very much wrong with what you are doing. I do not really see anything wrong."

When the members from Alberta in particular really study their Crown corporations, they will see that they have imagined that I am creating something that is different from what is there. Your own livestock people have admitted that they could not be successful until they have the power to buy and sell. When they appeared before the committee they admitted the difficulties they had with the present federal program to assist them in exporting live cattle to Mexico. They could not do it. I even became involved in the issue with IT & C as a minister trying to assist them. We could not assist them, but we will under Canagrex.

I will not list all the Crown corporations, but a quick review of the list shows that the provinces have over 200. It is true that we have Crown corporations in the federal system, but certainly there are Crown corporations as well in the provincial system. I just have to mention Ontario Hydro, for instance, which is a monster which has the power to expropriate, buy and sell and do everthing else.

Agricultural development is a long-term process. It is not the kind of thing that lends itself to the quick and dirty kind of atmosphere that the sunset clause would create within the Canagrex office. That clause means you could walk in and kill them at the end of five years, no matter how successful they are. However, if the committee finds that Canagrex is ineffective when a five-year review is conducted, the committee could recommend its demise.

The next amendment I would like to discuss is motion No. 2 which would delete beef cattle and the beef products from Canagrex's possible realm of operation.

Mr. McKnight: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. minister but I believe he is addressing an amendment that has been ruled out of order by the Chair.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) said that he would bring it up later. The hon. member who led off the discussion spoke about everything. There is nothing in the bill about gasoline, taxes or anything else. He was involved in everything. He talked about just everything I ever did or said. I had my hearing aid turned off but I even heard some of what he said. I was told that I did not miss much either.

I would like to quote from a letter which I received from the Canadian Hereford Association in January. It says:

> We look forward to utilizing the services of Canagrex to help us expand our international markets.

I have also heard from many other smaller organizations and firms in the beef business who have expressed their support for Canagrex. They seem more than satisfied, especially since we made the amendments, that we will not just go in and gobble them up like some have suggested. That was never our intention. Every one of those members knows that. That is true for those sitting in the gallery who also may have some concerns. Instead of selling products, they are trying to stock beef and have a little organization to sell it. Some of them are sitting in the gallery. I know who they are, I know what they are doing here. They are lobbying for their own hide.

It is because some people see themselves as the good guy having a shoot-out with the bad guy government that they allow themselves to overlook the concerns of many of the country's beef producers simply because they do not share their prejudice against governments. Do not forget that Canagrex's services are voluntary. As I said several times, they are not compulsory, but those hon. members believe that if they say it loud and clear enough people will believe them. They have implanted this in people's minds.

I was on a hot-line show which ran as far north as Edmonton to as far south as Calgary. A young farmer said to me on that show, "I will not be able to sell anything unless I sell it through you." That is what those members have them believing. I cannot understand how any good Member of Parliament could ever try to create that kind of thought in a person's mind. We have made the amendments which allowed for voluntary action and provided for joint ventures, but these hon. members were still saying it as late as today. Some of you know that. You know that it is wrong, too.

Mr. Mayer: Name one member who said it.

Mr. Whelan: I am amazed that members would say things like that. The services are voluntary. Its services can only be used in relation to export markets in co-operation with or at the request of governments. Those members have farmers believing that if they want to sell a calf they have to do it through Canagrex, through the local butcher. That is garbage. These services can only be used in relation to export markets, as I said, in co-operation with or at the request of governments, Canadian companies, co-operatives, marketing boards, associations or other Canadian enterprises or individuals carrying on business in Canada. Is there something wrong with that? Those people who use the trade services now like them because they are relatively free. We get involved in many trade promotion programs and they take part in them. It costs the Department of Agriculture money, but we are very proud of the trade promotion we work on with IT & C. We want to expand upon it. We do not want to be stymied when it comes time to make a deal, and they cannot do so or they will not because there are not the necessary guarantees, and they cannot be provided that kind of guarantee under any legislation which exists at the present time unless they try to combine three or four measures. Even that combination cannot always accomplish the final contract which is needed.

Motions Nos. 3 and 4 would restrict the tenure of the president and the directors to two terms. I wonder if the opposition would care to make the same restriction apply to Members of Parliament?

Mr. Deans: Yes.

Mr. Whelan: Some are suggesting that we go to the Republican system. I heard that comment even without my hearing aid. I believe the democratic process to be very good, as far as I am concerned. Some of us continue to come back here, regardless of what the opposition says.

Obviously, the reason we would not want to place the two term restriction on the directors is that we would prevent ourselves from keeping valuable people on the board. At the same time, the three-year or five-year term gives the government an opportunity to replace people who are not measuring up to what we expect. I am sure that is what hon. members would want. I would just add that in a field as vast as the international agri-food trade, the more experience a person has, the more valuable he will be to Canagrex and to Canada. It would be foolish to dump them just because they had served their terms.

Motion No. 5, dealing with publishing the director's salaries and expenses, is something that the board itself would have to decide.

The eight remaining amendments were dealt with extensively in committee and they add up to one thing: stripping Canagrex of its power to engage in exports when so requested. They would restrict Canagrex basically to providing marketing information, promotion, credit and grants. Those services are important, but they must be part of a total package that includes the ability to engage in exports when necessary in the limited circumstances set out in the amended bill. Without that ability, Canagrex will not be seen as an active, potent partner of the Canadian agricultural industry as we want it to be.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has some strong views. I would like to quote from a letter dated July 27 from the President of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. It states:

• (2140)

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture board of directors meeting today has reviewed its position regarding the Canagrex legislation in light of the amendment to the bill as reported in the agricultural committee report and reaffirms the position previously indicated to the government in the agriculture committee. To repeat, the CFA, in its early submission, made it clear that the whole purpose of Canagrex is to have an operational agency that can, in appropriate ways, engage in export activities as agent, broker, participant in joint ventures, and it is desired by the governments of some importing countries as an exporter. The CFA still strongly supports that position. The other authorities as provided in Bill C-85 are also important but do not in themselves constitute an adequate basis for action by Canagrex. The CFA has made it clear that Canagrex must approach its work on a go-slow basis while it gains experience, must operate co-operatively and not competitively with co-operatives, the private trade and producer boards and organizations, and must avoid—

It is a big word. They do not want bureaucratization.

Mr. Prud'homme: Next time don't write that, okay?

Mr. Whelan: It is a very long word and that is a quote by a farmer. It goes on to state:

The CFA also reiterates its strongly held position that the majority of the board of directors be representatives of producer organizations.

Mr. Hargrave: Who signed that?

Mr. Whelan: Glenn Flaten, the President of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. He is from Saskatchewan.

The important thing to remember in this whole question is that in committee we had unanimous support for an amendment stating that Canagrex will only become involved in buying and selling products in co-operation with or at the request of other governments, Canadian companies or Canadian producer organizations. Canagrex cannot go out into the market on its own initiative. It was never the intention to have Canagrex engage directly in farming or processing, and this is assured by another amendment to Clause 14 as approved by the committee. Why in the world would it want to be involved in that? That is what I cannot understand. It would only be involved as part of joint ventures with the private trade. Private trade has been requesting that for many years, even before I was Minister of Agriculture. It wanted more assistance for those perishable products in which they are dealing, the sale of which on the world market involves a tremendous risk.

Let us consider some of the other provisions of the amended bill which further ensures that the private trade will benefit as a result of Canagrex. The most obvious fact is that most of the people on the board of directors will be supplied and selected from the private sector. They will understand exactly what kind of assistance is needed to maximize this country's export of agri-food products and they will be subject to strict conflict of interest rules, as I already said. These rules are contained in the amendment put forward in the committee, and I searched it, by the hon. member for Elgin and are contained in the amended bill. If one checks the legislation on the books in any province, or in the federal system, one will probably find only one other bill which has that amendment providing for the strict conflict of interest rules. Furthermore, this will be backed up by a policy advisory committee of people from all over Canada. Never has there been such preparation or thought behind a bill to ensure that all suspicions would be alleviated. I would put the operation of Canagrex against the operation of any private company, any co-operative or any marketing board because of these amendments which were made, and I accepted some of them from the members of the opposition who said I was stubborn, I would not bend, I would not listen—

Mr. McKnight: You never did.

Mr. Whelan: —I would not accept any of the motions. I would advise hon. members that I accepted them, because I can well remember the night when I said I would accept this and I would accept that. I thought the hon. member for Elgin had the whole committee convinced that we were ready to bring the bill into the House and give it swift and speedy passage, because many people in the part of Canada from which he comes are 100 per cent behind Canagrex.

Mr. McKnight: They are getting further behind, too.

Mr. Whelan: The public is protected through a number of means. Perhaps the main one is that Canagrex must submit annually a revised three-year corporate plan. I ask hon. members, what other Crown corporation can one think of that does that?

Mr. Mazankowski: VIA Rail.

Mr. Whelan: We have been checking to find out how many do. There are very few which must do that kind of thing, which is binding, which will form the basis for its strategy and its budget for the year. A summary of the corporate plan will be made in public but, of course, yearly details must be kept confidential because they are in competition with other companies in the world. There are few government agencies that are subject to such stringent safeguards and restrictions. I think one can probably count them on the fingers of one hand. With the amendment I have made, I believe the Canagrex legislation is well balanced in terms of its modified purposes, powers, checks and its operations. I believe we can go no further without crippling Canagrex unfairly.

I urge the House to defeat the 13 amendments proposed by the opposition at report stage. As I said earlier, these points have been extensively debated during committee, and their constructive aspects have already resulted in extensive amendments which were approved by the committee.

I would ask that the House approve the government's one amendment, Motion No. 13, which is simply a language change. In short, to succeed in its job of reinforcing its role as a partner in export capabilities of Canada and the food industry, Canagrex must have the flexibility spelled out in the amended bill. So, we should go over the facts and the history and consider the power which I mentioned in the country with which we have the most similarity, the United States of America, and what it is doing at the present time. Right now we are living with deep concern about what the United States will do with its dairy industry. Four, five or six years ago, when we spoke with the United States about meeting with the countries involved in surplus industrial dairy production competing on the world market, and we asked to have a meeting, two former secretaries of agriculture in the United States said, "There is no need for such a meeting because we will never have a surplus of industrial dairy products." Because of the subsidization program in their country, without any control overproduction, it is costing $2.5 million a day, or over $2 billion annually. In a report given in Fredericton on Monday of this week, a USDA official said that it could cost the United States much more than that and that they do not know what to do. After speaking with Secretary Black, we felt that the United States could cut the price. It was his idea to cut the price to farmers and they would cut production. But because of cheap feed grain prices and its subsidization program, the producers turned on their dairy production like one cannot imagine. There are over 500,000 tonnes of surplus industrial milk products. Secretary Black told me, "We do not intend to dump it on the world market to hurt any of our trading partners". I do not know what he will be forced to do. In the United States there will be an election in the fall and there are many rural ridings at stake. If one reads the proceedings of Congress and the Senate, one finds that they did not cut the price of the dairy farmers in the United States. They held it at the status quo and they are looking at the matter again. It is not expected that there will be any changes in the price of dairy products until after the New Year in 1983.

We have discussed trade, stabilization and prices. The hon. member mentioned prices for gasoline and we have made a comparison of prices for gasoline and for diesel fuel. There is not much difference in prices in the various areas of Canada and the United States. Some are just about even. Some are a little higher, but there is not the tremendous difference hon. members opposite seem to try to put across in this House at different times in questions and so forth. We have the facts and figures. They are long and detailed. Hon. members opposite talk about the tax on gasoline. Let them check and see where that revenue goes. That added increase in costs goes to refineries, provincial governments and the federal government. The actual federal tax on gasoline and diesel fuel in Canada is very small indeed.

• (2150)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Neil: Sixty cents a gallon.

Mr. Whelan: Hon. members opposite know full well that taxing is a different system than the sharing of revenue.

Mr. Mazankowski: A tax is a tax.

Mr. Whelan: The table I have shows a breakdown of consumer prices for gasoline components including provincial sales tax, federal tax, royalties and taxes on crude oil, the petroleum compensation charge and payments to the oil industry.

Mr. Mazankowski: Canadian ownership charge.

Mr. Whelan: We can give a complete breakdown of prices and taxes. The federal excise tax of 1.5 cents per litre is levied only on gasoline. It is rebated to all commercial users, including farmers, and there is no federal excise tax on diesel fuel, heating fuel or propane. I am talking about federal excise tax because that is what hon. members opposite keep referring to.

Mr. Mazankowski: We are talking about federal tax.

Mr. Whelan: When we are talking about royalties and taxes on crude oil, that is a different thing. The producing provinces levy royalties and taxes on crude oil at the point the oil is sold or transferred to refineries. These taxes are estimated at 5.36 cents per litre for gasoline and can be regarded as being the same for farm fuel.

Mr. Mazankowski: A tax is a tax, and you know it.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member knows full well that the provinces and the industry are taking the biggest share.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is not right.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member knows that full well, and he also knows full well that somebody must be taking a bigger rip-off in the United States when Americans pay a comparable price but do not have the same taxing system. Who is making the profit? There is not much difference in the price producers pay for their product.

Mr. Mazankowski: We pay Alberta only $25 a barrel for oil. Where is the difference?

Mr. Whelan: The average price paid by farmers for gasoline ranges from a low of 29.1 cents per litre in Alberta to a high of 34.8 cents per litre in British Columbia. These estimates exclude the federal excise tax and provincial sales tax, with the exception of the 2.4 cents per litre levied in British Columbia. That is the only province which levies that kind of tax on fuel used for agricultural production. The average price paid by farmers for diesel fuel varies from 28.8 cents per litre in Alberta to 35.2 cents per litre in British Columbia, which is the highest of all.

Mr. Mayer: What do they do in North Dakota?

Mr. Whelan: I have a whole list which I will make available to anyone who wants to make a comparison of the costs farmers—

Mr. Mazankowski: It is deceitful.

Mr. Whelan: —pay in different regions in the United States and in different regions in Canada, but I can tell hon. members that there is not much difference. There may be a difference of one cent here or a cent there, but there is not much difference in the costs producers are paying.

Mr. Mazankowski: What about the wellhead price?

Mr. Whelan: What the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is really saying is that in the United States some companies must be making tremendous profits because they are charging farmers the same. The difference is in the taxing system, if hon. members want to call it that. We have a revenue system which ensures we have greater ownership of our energy industry in Canada. The vast majority of the people of Canada, whether in the east or in the west, go along with that kind of program, and the hon. member knows that.

Canagrex is a corporation about which we have talked for a long time and needed for a long time to help make our agricultural exports what we all want them to be and what we all say we want them to be. We have one disagreement, and that is with respect to the power to buy, sell, own and so forth. There are many, many Crown corporations, provincial and federal.

Mr. Mazankowski: Too many.

Mr. Kempling: You don't need any more.

Mr. Whelan: Crown corporations in provinces from which hon. members on all sides come have these same powers. I do not hear hon. members condemning them for having that kind of authority right in their own backyards, but they condemn me for wanting this little farm organization called Canagrex to do a certain job. Hon. members opposite should read the minutes of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I was amazed today to hear about what a good job we are doing for agriculture. Mr. Speaker, you have been here long enough to have heard questions like "Why aren't you selling more?" Hon. members opposite have said that if it was not for wheat, we would have a great trade imbalance in Canada. Where are we selling all the other products? Hon. members opposite condemn the government and this minister when we try to do something to improve trade and assist entrepreneurs and private industry people so that they can compete with other countries in the world and have some kind of organization that assists them one way or another. Our people tell us continuously we cannot compete because we do not have the same guarantees and we do not have the same security.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not want to interrupt the minister's speech because he was enjoying himself so much during its delivery. However, knowing the minister as I do, I am sure he would not want to leave any inaccuracies on the record or mislead the House. He made some reference to the rationalization of stabilization across the country. He knows that was on the agenda of the provincial ministers' conference in 1978, and it was also on the agenda in 1979 when I was minister. The minister indicated he had a financial commitment from the Treasury Board. He is absolutely correct. Where the inaccuracy occurred was in an indication that when I was minister I withdrew support. That is not correct. That is inaccurate. The minister knows there was no more support for that type of program in 1979 than there was in 1978. The people who were against that program were against it for the reasons the minister mentioned tonight. He is absolutely correct. In addition, only about two of the ten ministers representing the provinces supported the plan; thus the reason for the discontinuation of that program.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is the minister rising on the same point of order, if it is a point of order?

Mr. Whelan: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think my memory is pretty good. I am going by the record. When the hon. member was minister I do not believe he shredded any of the decisions he made or the transcripts of any of the discussions in which he was involved. If I have read the record correctly, he was the minister of agriculture at the time it was decided to withdraw the program. According to the notes I have seen, the reason was the cost of the program. I will do some double-checking and, if I find that I am wrong, I will readily apologize.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I have only two or three minutes left to me, and in that short time I would like to make several points. I was prepared to make a very reasoned and, I think, reasonable argument and comment on the bill before us tonight. It is very difficult to be reasonable following the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). We have been treated to another vintage ministerial outburst which would well qualify the minister for any acting award, but it had very little to do with the important issue before us and the serious concern we on this side of the House have about some of the measures proposed in this bill.

The first point which should be made is that although the minister did not refer to a "damned lie" because that would have been an unparliamentary thing to say, he did comment on 17 different associations—which are too numerous to mention in the short time I have—which have very serious concerns. They represented themselves in the news media in much the same way the minister often does, and brought forward a very reasoned position on the bill.

The second point I would like to make before calling it ten o'clock is that people who read Hansard or are watching today should be reminded of the comments of the minister in the House in response to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) several days ago. The minister was responding to questions about promises he made regarding the prices of fuels and capital gains tax exemptions for farmers. He made promises to the agricultural community and to the Canadian public during the last election campaign. When responding to the hon. member for Vegreville, the minister said:

> —I do not know what research the hon. member is using for all those statements that I made, because if he is reading speeches I gave during the election campaign, those were not prepared . . . . They were made in the heat of debate, you could almost say off the cuff, but there isn't any cuff there!

One hon. member said:

> What is on your shoes?

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House deemed to have been moved under Standing Order 40.

PENITENTIARIES—SHOWING OF PORNOGRAPHIC FILMS AND STAGING OF TOPLESS DANCING. (B) CORONER'S STATEMENT ON CYANIDE DEATHS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, in the past few days the country has been shocked by newspaper accounts of what happened in the penitentiary at Archambault and the tragedy visited upon the families of some guards who worked there. What happened to the guards, and the long-term agony the families have to face as a result of what has happened to their loved ones who worked at the prison, is indeed a tragedy. What is also of concern is the question this tragedy raises in the minds of the public across Canada.

As I told the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) in the House yesterday, we were informed by press reports that sometimes it is the practice to allow prisoners at Archambault to view pornographic films—at what level of pornography we do not know—and that in at least one of these showings topless dancers performed.

Serious questions have been raised in this House and across the country about how the prisons are being run and whether the objective of the prison authorities is to provide security for all Canadians. The Solicitor General denied yesterday that prisoners are being allowed to see these kinds of films. But, Mr. Speaker, why would the guards who work at the prison issue a statement to the press which the Solicitor General said is not true? What is in it for the guards who have to go to work next day? If they have been saying things to the press that are not true, then they have to face the administration which has, in effect, been libelled by them. Why would they issue a false statement in this case?

This points to a double problem. If the films are shown, and the allegations are correct that they are shown because the administration is afraid of the reaction of the prisoners if they are refused, there are two problems. First of all, what is the effect of those films on the prison population? Just this evening I spoke to a psychologist about this and he said that the fantasizing in the minds of those prisoners would be uncontrollable. If they are then released to society, what is to stop them from acting in the vicious manner they have seen in the film?

The second problem is that if the allegations of the guards are correct and the administration is allowing the films to be shown because they are afraid of the reaction from the prisoners if they are not, then who is running the prisons? Who is making the choices? Who is calling the shots?

The Solicitor General also said yesterday, in answer to my question, that the policy of the correctional system is to follow the classifications made by the film censors. Presumably films are classified because the public has a right to be alerted about the destructiveness of some of them. The public ought to enjoy that right, so the classifications are identified in the movie ads. If some are classified as being harmful to our general society, society can accept responsibility for its decisions. If it is possibly harmful to those people, is it not logical to assume that it is even more harmful to a group of people who are in prison because they cannot handle life in a normal society? We are in fact not dealing with a segment of normal society.

The minister says those films are shown according to classification, but what assurance does he have that those classifications are being followed in the showing of those films? How does he know whether the authorities in the prison system are clearly following the classifications issued by the officer in that particular province? Are the regulations being adhered to?

If the classification prohibits viewing under certain circumstances, and those circumstances are very limited because those films happen to be very damaging, is it not reasonable to assume that those very regulations could be met by this society? For example, if a classification officer decides a film can be shown only to a stag club because it is that kind of film and should not be shown in mixed company or to the general public, does it not follow that the segment of the population within the prison would qualify as meeting the requirements of that particular classification, as happened in the B.C. Penitentiary about three years ago?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order.

Mr. Friesen: Just this one comment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order.

Mr. Friesen: I call upon the minister to do a study across Canada of the correctional system to make sure that the regulations are being adhered to.

[Translation]

Mr. Alain Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the following answer to that question.

[English]

The policy in general is to permit inmates to view only films that are approved for public showing by the film classification boards in the provinces in which the institutions are located. This is in keeping with the rule of law that an inmate continues to enjoy all his rights, just like a free citizen, except those taken away by law or by the nature of his confinement.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the CSC acknowledges its responsibility with respect to both the security of the institution and the protection of the neighbouring community. It also takes the appropriate measures to make sure that the films shown in the institutions are consistent with the acceptable standards of the community and that they are censored by the film classification board of the province where the institution is located. Still, even after that important stage, the director general or the institution warden may decide not to show any film whatsoever if, in his opinion, it might disrupt order in the institution.

Before allowing the screening of a film that has not been censored by the film classification board, the warden must see and approve the film. In keeping with its policy, the department does not allow the screening of pornographic films or shows given by erotic dancers in penitentiaries. Indeed, the Solicitor General did make some comments on such a show a few years ago. The authorities had not in any way approved the show, but they felt at the time that any intervention might have compromised the safety of the artists.

As to the remarks of Coroner Maurice Laniel about the increasing use of cyanide in suicide attempts, I would simply point out that never in a federal institution has an inmate committed suicide that way. We hope that the report of the inspector general will reveal how the inmates were able to obtain the cyanide, and we would be well advised to await his findings before deciding what measures should be taken to prevent such incidents.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—QUERY RESPECTING APPLICATION OF SIX PER CENT RULE TO TWO-PRICE SYSTEM. (B) ANNOUNCEMENT IN SENATE

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I take part tonight in the adjournment debate as a consequence of a question I asked on July 21, 1982, of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) in his responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board. It had to do with the government's proposed 6 per cent and 5 per cent guidelines. Having regard to the two-price system for domestic grain I asked whether the 6 per cent applies this coming year and the 5 per cent the following year to the increases that would be needed to assist the producers of grain in Canada to meet some of their costs. The minister told me at that time that he was unable to answer the question.

I went on to ask if the minister's assistant in the Senate had been mistaken when he told Senator Roblin that the 6 per cent rule would apply because the mechanism was already in place and that the rule should be continued.

The need for an increase in the price for domestic grain in Canada is very evident. When the two-price system for domestic grain started two years ago, the price was established at a floor of $5 and a maximum of $7 a bushel for No. 1 Canadian Red Spring wheat. In the last two years we have had an increase in the cost of input of between 23 per cent and 25 per cent. That increase will bring the floor price to $6.25 a bushel and the maximum price will go to $8.50 from $7.50 a bushel. These increases are less than adequate to meet the projected 35 per cent plus decrease in income for agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan, which produces about 50 per cent of the cereal grains grown in Canada.

I asked my question because the two-price system expires on July 31, 1982, two days from this evening. On at least three occasions the minister has been asked whether the price will be increased, whether it will remain the same and what are his intentions. On each occasion the minister has replied that he was unable to answer the question. I think it is incumbent upon the minister and the government to make known to the producers of grain in western Canada, the area where the two-price system applies, and what the government's intentions are for the next two years.

The two-price wheat system which was implemented back in 1975 has undergone many changes. Every time there has been a change there has been an increase, because the cost of production has been recognized. The increase in 1979 was made in the middle of the crop year. That increase was made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) in his responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board. It was granted because the cost of production was recognized and the producers were to receive the benefit of a domestic price for wheat.

I hope the parliamentary secretary who answers this evening will be able to announce what the domestic price will be in the coming crop year under the two-price system. Unless the announcement has been held off to give the domestic millers and the consumers of domestic grains in Canada an opportunity to stockpile the grain, to the detriment of the producers, I cannot understand why the announcement cannot be made tonight. If they are being given the opportunity to stockpile, I think it is wrong. It is against the interests of the producers of grain, and it is against the best interests of this government. I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to make an announcement tonight that the two-price wheat system will be increased from the present floor of $5 to a floor of approximately $6.20, and that the ceiling will be raised to approximately $8.50 as required by the cost of inputs necessary to produce grain.

• (2215)

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity in answering the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) to describe the two-price wheat system, in order to explain the context within which the government is assessing the application of its administered prices policy on the price of domestic wheat.

Since December 1978, wheat sold for human consumption in Canada has been priced within minimum and maximum limits set by regulation. Since August 1980, these price limits have been, as the hon. member already mentioned tonight, between $5 and $7 per bushel for No. 1 Canadian Red Spring wheat. But he did not point out that for Durum the same minimum applies but there is no maximum. I was wondering what prices he would give for Durum at the minimum and maximum. The actual price within these limits is set by the Canadian Wheat Board on the basis of prevailing export prices.

The rationale underlying this mechanism is to provide protection for both producers and consumers from wide price fluctuations. I would contend that the system is serving its purpose adequately.

When the current limits were set in August 1980, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board undertook to review them in two years. Consequently, as the hon. member noted, they are now under review but do not, as he said, expire on July 31, 1982. They continue until replaced by new limits. I would like to make that correction. It can be seen that the manner in which the administered prices guidelines would apply is not immediately obvious. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board offered some thoughtful comments in the other place on July 7. Perhaps the hon. member would like to indicate how he would propose to deal with this question. He dealt with suggested prices, but not of various kinds of wheat.

In any event, I am confident that the review will yield a fair and equitable solution which will be announced in due course.

ENERGY—FUNDING FOR OIL EXPLORATION IN SENEGAL. (B) MACHINERY AUCTION SALE

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all congratulate you on your elevation to your very lofty position. I know you will serve the House and the country very well and with distinction.

The policies of the federal government have caused a major disaster in the exploration and servicing sector of Canada's oil industry. The National Energy Program, combined with the economic policies of the government, has served to drive business upon business associated with the exploration and service industry into financial ruin and bankruptcy. For many who have spent a lifetime of work in building up these businesses, it leaves nothing more than bitter memories of their hard work, sacrifice and dedication in trying to make their businesses a success. There is anger and bitterness over the failure of so many companies associated with this industry. There is anger and bitterness directed toward the government, which is the most destructive and deceitful government that has ever served Canadians.

There are many examples I could highlight this evening, but I want to single out one which is really the substance of the questions I posed on July 9, as reported on pages 19175 and 19176 of Hansard. It concerns the liquidation sale of two firms in Lloydminster, Alberta, namely, Midway Oilfield Services and Weldex Machine. These two companies were doing very well. They were well-established and well-managed. They had been in business for years, and during the period of 1979—1980, prior to the implementation of the National Energy Program, they were doing very well. The businesses were humming; 150 jobs were involved in their operations. In about February, 1982, the effects of the National Energy Program and of the economy served to bring these two businesses into very serious difficulty, and they were forced into receivership. The government refused to fundamentally alter its National Energy Program, which, and I suggest most people agree, has been one of the major contributing factors to the current recession.

By July, 1982, these two companies were forced to liquidate through an auction sale. On July 6 and July 7 in Lloydminster, Alberta, there was a huge auction sale to dispose of all assets of the two companies. I might say that the assets were worth in excess of $3.5 to $4 million. They sold at a public, unreserved auction sale for something in the order of 30 cents to 50 cents on the dollar.

Who came up to buy this equipment? It was mainly Americans who bought up the excess surplus equipment. The sale of that equipment was forced as a result of the bankruptcies. The Americans come up with their premium dollars, buy this equipment and take it back to the United States and put it to work. In this case, 150 jobs have gone down the drain.

I could mention another company in Lloydminster as well; Universal Industries which was in the business of building pumps, tanks and other ancillary pieces of equipment associated with the oil service industry. In 1981 that company employed about 350 people. Today the number is down to 200. The firm has gone into receivership, and it will be lucky if it survives. If it does survive, it will probably end up with 100 people, at best.

I could cite many examples. One has only to pick up the Edmonton Journal and look at the sheriff's sales, the receivership auction sales, bankruptcy auctions, unreserved public auctions—I could go on, page upon page.

Two years ago, prior to the National Energy Program, the oil industry in this country was humming, there were some 500 rigs working in western Canada, either drilling, in transit, or in the process of being set up. Today there are less than 100; and when we look at the record we find that some 20,000 jobs have been lost.

The reason I pose the question is that in spite of all this we are spending money looking for oil in other countries. For example, we are spending money looking for oil in Jamaica, in Senegal, in Tanzania, in Bangladesh, in Pakistan and in Kenya while we are destroying our own industry right here in this country.

One should consider this great organization called Petro-Can. It has $250 million to spend looking for oil in foreign countries. I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to explain to my constituents why and how he could justify, in the face of these companies going bankrupt, during these economic difficulties, this time of recession, this time of restraint, the expenditure of this kind of money looking for oil which would add to the self-sufficiency of other countries rather than our own.

Specifically, I asked how he could justify Canada spending the sum of $16.9 million in aid to look for oil in Senegal. That is not all. A Jamaican deal that has been signed, and there is an upcoming deal with Tanzania for $25 million which is to be signed. There is another project worth $21 million. None of these deals will bring any return to Canada, and the oil will all belong to the foreign countries.

The policies of this government are closing companies here, and destroying our oil industry. This government is trying to make a great name for ourselves in the international world. The people in my area do not understand the reason for the double standard.

I learned in just the last couple of days that the federal government is going to bail out Maislin Transport. That is the first service industry I know of that is going to be bailed out by this government. This government is prepared to bail out Massey; it is prepared to bail out Chrysler; it is prepared to bail out Dome; it is prepared to bail out any of those companies which are friends of the government. It is prepared to provide grants and subsidies to those areas served by Liberal cabinet ministers while it deliberately destroys a once viable industry in western Canada. This must stop, Mr. Speaker. We must stop this blatant political patronage. We must stop this lunatic destruction. I can tell you, sir, I am convinced that this will only stop when this Liberal government is turfed out. Then we can get some sanity and order back in the country again.

• (2225)

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I join with my hon. colleague for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) in extending best wishes to you on being elevated to the Chair. I am as certain as he that you will do a very admirable job.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) made it very clear that such assistance to developing countries was not detracting in any way from the extensive and increasing support being given Canada's own oil industry through recently passed legislation and long-standing commitments. I need not remind the hon. member that just recently the Government of Canada provided, under the National Energy Program, in excess of $2 billion toward the oil and gas industry. This, coupled with the $5 billion provided by the Government of Alberta, makes a total of $7 billion in terms of tax concessions to the oil and gas industry which, I might add, is primarily located in western Canada.

In reference to the question raised by the hon. member with respect to money or assistance which is being provided to developing countries, I should say to him and his party that the economies of many developing countries are being seriously affected by the price they must pay for imported oil. Non-oil developing countries as a group have had current account deficits every year since the Arab oil embargo of 1973, and the group deficit has grown from $11 billion in that year to $68 billion in 1980. This, of course, has much reduced their ability to use scarce foreign exchange to purchase other goods needed for economic development. Numerous international meetings and reports in recent years have recognized the threat which rising energy import bills pose for economic development and for the success of development assistance programs, including Canada's.

In 1980, the World Bank reported that "the sharp rise in the cost of energy in recent years has underlined the urgent need to expand domestic energy production in developing countries that are dependent on imports."

Ironically, developing countries have known oil and gas resources, or promising possibilities for discovery. Typically, however, the countries involved, like the one referred to by the hon. member, lack both funds and expertise, and the multinational oil companies, which have both, have tended to concentrate their efforts in industrialized or established oil exporting countries. Recognizing this, the Government of Canada has established the Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation to assist developing countries to reduce or eliminate their dependence on imported oil by using Canadian technology and expertise for oil and gas exploration and directly related activities.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas there are more than nine million young Canadians between the ages of 15 and 35 years, whereas they need and want jobs to secure their futures, and whereas the government has known they were in the system and should have created a business climate so that they could secure their futures, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Liberal cabinet, the Liberal backbenchers and the Liberal Party of Canada stand condemned for not maintaining a business climate so that these young Canadians might have jobs; but instead have policies such as the National Energy Program and a budget socialist philosophy which have in fact taken jobs away from young Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

STATEMENT MADE BY MR. COOK ON PORT OF CHURCHILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that the Conservative member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) said Monday that, and I quote, "We should close down the Port of Churchill and let that grain go through the Great Lakes—," thus illustrating the Conservative insensitivity to the prairie economy and the effects on our farmers of such an action, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo):

That the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby be granted the Jack Murta Award for the Conservative member most proficient at Churchill-bashing.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTION THAT ADVISER TO PRIME MINISTER SHOULD RESIGN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I rise also under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns Michael Kirby, the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) eminence grise and his second senior adviser. In view of the fact that Mr. Kirby was appointed with much fanfare to head a task force to solve the problems of the Atlantic fishery and then to become deputy minister of fisheries, and in view of his recent admission that he would never have agreed to take on the task force if he had known how complicated the fisheries field is, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House commend Mr. Kirby's frankness as the first completely honest admission of failure of the Liberal government; and that the Prime Minister allow Mr. Kirby to withdraw gracefully from a task too onerous for him—in other words, let Mr. Kirby off the hook—so to speak.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

ENTRY OF WOMEN TO TRAINING PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43. In June the largest increase in unemployment was amongst females aged 15 to 24, an increase of some 21,000. This group could benefit greatly from training and retraining programs, and yet of 31,000 trainees enrolled in the government's non-traditional occupation training programs, only 2,000 are women. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

S.O. 43

That this House urge the government to take immediate steps to remodel its present inadequate training and retraining programs drastically to ensure that young women in Canada have every opportunity to acquire the skills necessary for available jobs.

HOUSING

CALL FOR REDUCTION IN MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Amidst a considerable amount of fanfare the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) announced a $3,000 grant program for home buyers. Fewer than 10 per cent of those eligible for this program thought the incentive enough to make any inquiry at all about it and only 251 Canadians actually applied. Of that number only 33 applications have been processed during the one month this program has been operational. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the government give Canadians some credit for their intelligence by dropping the gimmicks and getting on with a program that would provide the only meaningful incentive to home buyers, that is, a reduction in current mortgage interest rates.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DEMAND THAT BYELECTIONS BE HELD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion for which I am sure there will be unanimous consent. Noting that Canadians in three constituencies, namely, Timiskaming, Broadview-Greenwood, and Leeds-Grenville, have been without representation in the House of Commons for many months; and noting that during this period, people in these areas have experienced lay-offs, mine closures, housing problems and other difficulties directly involving federal government responsibility, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That this House instructs the Prime Minister to live up to his moral responsibilities by calling byelections to take place in these constituencies on a date no later than September 30, 1982.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE MINISTRY

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF SENATOR ARGUE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Because of the continued inability of the Minister of Transport's assistant in the other place, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board Senator Argue, to acquire for grain producers a return over their costs of production, and because of the minister's assistant's own words to the effect that he is a "retread" and the criteria for his ministerial appointment was because "he was able to sit up and take nourishment," I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the transport minister's assistant in the other place be allowed to return to being a flat tire and spend his leisure time taking nourishment.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

GRAIN

DECLINE IN PRICE OF RYE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Last year the rye growers in southern Ontario received some $4 a bushel for their product. This year the market not only started at a depressed price of $3 a bushel, which was reduced to some $2.89 a bushel in the last sales, but this past week when farmers took their rye to the brokers they were told it could not be taken at any price. Surely the government could have foreseen this failure in the rye market and could have informed the producers beforehand and thus prevented the possibility of disking these crops under and taking losses in the tens of thousands of dollars. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the government take immediate steps to rectify this unacceptable problem in Canada's agricultural industry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF CARS MANUFACTURED IN SOVIET UNION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since the Liberal government is continuing a policy of harassing west coast importers of Japanese cars, thereby threatening employment of importers, truckers, longshoremen, auto dealers and salesmen, ostensibly to protect the jobs of those in the auto industry in central Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That the Minister of State for International Trade explain to this House how it is that Lada cars, made in the Soviet Union, seem to have no difficulty coming into Canada, even though they may be guilty of dumping and are thereby taking jobs away from central Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

TRANSPORT

MAISLIN TRUCKING COMPANY—INQUIRY RESPECTING DECISION ON GOVERNMENT LOAN

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Maislin Trucking Company is in trouble because poor management made wrong decisions, buying companies in the United States in the face of deregulation, and it will continue to lose money. There are a total of approximately 67,000 trucking jobs in Ontario and Quebec. Any federal money will not increase that number one bit. It will not increase the GNP, but it will increase animosity in the United States where legislation is under way to prevent further take-overs. In light of this, is the Minister of Transport prepared to announce whether or not cabinet has approved a massive loan to its Liberal friends at Maislin and, if so, under what conditions?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we have been discussing with Maislin the basis for an offer of a loan guarantee—not a loan—to assist the company to restructure on the basis of it agreeing to certain conditions, including involvement in the six and five per cent guideline program. When matters are at a final and definitive stage, I will be happy to make an announcement.

Mr. Ellis: The guarantee about which we have been talking will cost at least five times per job that which was spent for guarantees to Massey and Chrysler. No one has seen a financial statement for Maislin for at least the last 18 months.

AVAILABILITY OF ASSISTANCE FOR OTHER TRUCKING COMPANIES

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, is the minister now open to proposals from trucking companies in other parts of Canada? I can assure him that that amount of money would guarantee at least 7,000 jobs in other well-managed trucking companies in eastern Canada which may be eager to buy Maislin on the open market but do not have the political clout of the Bronfmans and other Liberal friends in Montreal.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I would be happy to bring to the attention of my colleagues the situation of companies that are in similar restructuring difficulties. If the hon. member has specific companies which he wants to bring to my attention, I would be happy to receive the information about them.

REASONS FOR GRANTING ASSISTANCE TO MAISLIN COMPANY

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, finally I would like to ask the minister, if indeed it is true, that only one job out of four in the Maislin corporation is in Canada and that in fact, in giving this guarantee to Maislin, they are rewarding a company for its ineptitude, and giving it a further financial edge by forcing its unions into a six and five agreement, whereas other companies in Canada are not being forced that way.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, my information is that half of the jobs of the company, some 2,000 of them, are in Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Out of 4,000.

Mr. Gray: Some 2,000 out of the total 4,000 are in Canada. If the company and its employees are respecting the six and five guidelines, surely that is something my hon. friend would encourage, not just for them but for other trucking companies, in light of the support by himself and his party for the guidelines program as exemplified by their votes in the House.

FINANCE

REQUEST GOVERNMENT LOWER INTEREST RATES BY SIX PER CENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I would like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Finance. Despite a recent and minimal lowering of prime interest rates by Canadian chartered banks, the level of interest rates in the country is still far too high. Thousands of Canadians are still expected to lose their homes because of the astronomical cost of renewing their mortgages; thousands of businesses are still going bankrupt, causing the loss of thousands of jobs. The minister, through his June budget, asked all Canadians to get behind his 6 per cent solution. In light of the continuing damage to our economy by high interest rates, would the minister consider applying his solution to these rates and having them immediately lowered by the much touted 6 per cent?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that one of the major objectives contained in the budget is aimed at bringing about a substantial drop in interest rates, and urging all Canadians to join their efforts in reducing inflation down to six and five per cent within the next two years.

Until this joint effort has produced tangible results, the government will implement transitional measures to help home buyers, farmers and small businesses. The purpose of these measures is to reduce interest rate levels and to provide financial assistance for those who want to buy homes. However, we must be patient and persevere in this joint effort if we are to bring down inflation and put our economy on the road to recovery. If we do, interest rates will go down as well. Meanwhile, Canadians can take advantage of the measures introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his last budget to help the people of this country get through the difficult period that lies between us and an improved economy.

REQUEST FOR JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS IN SMALL COMMUNITIES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, the minister is well aware of the thousands of Canadians, almost half of them in Ontario alone, who have recently been told they will be laid off, or have already been laid off. Massive group lay-offs gain media attention because they involve a large number of workers employed by big businesses in major centres, but not those being laid off by smaller firms in rural areas where the unemployment situation is even more critical.

The situation in my own riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka is a good example of the magnitude of this disaster. In a one week period this past month, 800 more people were registered for unemployment benefits than during the same time a year previously, which is an increase that has had a devastating effect on the entire nation, when considered across the country. Is the minister preparing to implement employment programs which would be of benefit to smaller communities across the country where the plight of the 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work is more deeply felt?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think the point raised by the hon. member in which he refers to the many lay offs taking place is actually related to a much broader issue I mentioned earlier, which implies that we must fight inflation, improve our productivity, and be more competitive on all markets. The hon. member was asking for ad hoc job-creation programs to help those who are currently unemployed to find work. These programs already exist. In fact, they were announced this week by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Millions of dollars are being spent on job-creation programs, and if the hon. member makes this information available to his constituents, they will be able to take advantage of these programs which will help them get through this very difficult period for all Canadians.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER SET DATE FOR BYELECTIONS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Canadians who live in the constituencies of Timiskaming, Broadview-Greenwood and Leeds-Grenville have been denied political representation in the House of Commons for many months. Considering that Canadians in these areas, as well as elsewhere in the country, have been experiencing record levels of lay-offs, problems with mining shutdowns, housing problems, not to mention other difficulties directly involving federal responsibility, will the Prime Minister now live up to his moral responsibility and name the date for byelections in these three constituencies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will do so within the time provided for in the law.

RIGHT TO REPRESENTATION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, would the Prime Minister explain to the members of the House of Commons and, more important, to the Canadians living in these areas who have a great deal of difficulty in coping with the problems of the Canadian economy, why he will not give them the right at least to have an elected Member of Parliament, from whatever party happens to win those byelections, in the House fighting on their behalf and doing a job for them? What moral right does the Prime Minister have to deny them their representation in the House of Commons?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member wants me to explain to him why the law says what it says.

Mr. Broadbent: No, that is not the question.

Mr. Trudeau: I am telling the hon. member that I will comply with the law with regard to byelections. That is my answer.

MORAL OBLIGATION TO PEOPLE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the law of Canada permits people to lie to one another, but that does not make it morally acceptable. The law of Canada does indeed permit the Prime Minister to wait many months to call a byelection, and he knows he can set it for many months after that date. We are not interested in the precise question of what is legally permitted to the Prime Minister. We want him to live up to his moral obligations to those people, and their right to have representation in the House of Commons. Therefore I ask him will he not give them the right to elect a member to this House to do work on their behalf, work that they need done in these difficult economic times?

• (1125)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the House of Commons had made the same distinction between morality and legality as the hon. member seems to be making—

Mr. Broadbent: Pretty basic.

Mr. Trudeau: —he would then be suggesting that the members of the House of Commons acted immorally at the time, by providing a certain delay. If the House of Commons felt that a shorter time was morally right, I am sure its members would have voted for a shorter time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MOVEMENT OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS FROM HALIFAX TO QUEBEC CITY

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of National Defence. This seems to be pork-barrel week in the House of Commons. Can the acting minister inform the House what tactical or strategic reasons have convinced the Government of Canada to move Naval Reserve Headquarters from Halifax to Quebec City?

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I would be pleased to take notice of the question and provide the hon. member with an answer.

Miss MacDonald: That's not good enough.

Mr. McKinnon: This was surely an important decision and must have been discussed in cabinet. I can hardly accept the fact that the Acting Minister of National Defence knows nothing about it.

REASONS FOR RELOCATION TO QUEBEC CITY

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): All our reserve headquarters are located on a functional basis. For instance, Air Command has Reserve Air headquarters in Winnipeg. The headquarters of our reserve army is co-located with Mobile Command at St. Hubert. What on earth could the Government of Canada be thinking about, to disrupt this functional system by moving the Naval Reserve Headquarters from Halifax to Quebec City? If the Minister of Veterans Affairs is unable to answer this, perhaps the Prime Minister would answer.

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have indicated that I will be pleased to take notice of the question and provide the hon. member with an answer.

GOVERNMENT DECISION ON MOVEMENT OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, it poses a great difficulty to the opposition that the Minister of National Defence is not in the House to answer this important question. The acting minister has no knowledge of it, so I will address my question to the Prime Minister. Will he, on behalf of his cabinet colleagues, deny that the government intends to move Naval Reserve Headquarters from the City of Halifax to Quebec City in order to increase the presence of the Canadian navy in the Province of Quebec? Is that plan afoot? Will that happen? Will he admit it, or will he deny it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Defence is attending graduation ceremonies at Canadian Forces Base Moose Jaw, in Saskatchewan. He is a very regular attendant in the House. I think the acting minister was quite correct in saying that he would take notice on the minister's behalf. The question will be answered on the first day that minister returns.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER ACT ON ISSUE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): I think, Madam Speaker, that the Prime Minister of Canada knows the traditional history of the City of Halifax in the Province of Nova Scotia in relation to Canada's naval force. We have just had a $500 million expansion of the dockyard in Halifax. We have always associated the Canadian Navy with the east coast and the City of Halifax. Will he now undertake not to do anything drastic with respect to removal of Canadian naval facilities and resources from the City of Halifax in the Province of Nova Scotia to the Province of Quebec, purely for the purpose of increasing the presence of the Canadian Navy in the Province of Quebec to satisfy the demands of persons in that province, and not in connection with National Defence or with our role in NATO?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I repeat that the question will be properly answered by the minister, but I would want to make it quite clear that the minister never acts in an arbitrary sense, just because, as the hon. member says, some Member of Parliament asks him to do a certain thing. I am sure that if he has made any decision in that area he will have made it after a very extensive consultation and with the support of the Armed Forces themselves.

GRAIN

LEVELS OF ADVANCE PAYMENTS

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport on increasing the levels of financial limits under the Prairie Grains Advance Payments Act. I had prior discussion with the minister, prior correspondence, and have given him notice of the question. Is the minister now in a position to announce that the levels will be increased, bearing in mind that the last time they were increased was in 1975, and also bearing in mind that if those levels could be increased it would give some help to hard-pressed prairie farmers who are in a cash-short position, so that when the new crop comes off they will be in a position to pay their bills, which not only will benefit themselves but the whole western economy?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member before, there was a preliminary discussion of that possibility in one of the cabinet committees. It was decided to put this issue in the wider context of western grain policies. Consequently, I will not be in a position to confirm or deny the possibility of increasing the maximum until some time in the fall.

In the meantime, I would like to underline the fact that today is the last day of the crop year. I would also underline the fact that Canada has done extremely well in the last year. Almost all records with regard to types of grain and ports have been broken. Therefore, there is a compensation for the lower price in the fact that the quantities in this crop year have been extremely high.

POSSIBLE BENEFITS TO WESTERN COMMUNITIES

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, what the minister says is true. I submit to him that the reason we have these record levels of exports is as a result of many of the things put in place by the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mayer: Also, it is small comfort to prairie farmers that, even though there is an increase in exports, they are being paid less per bushel.

Let me point out to the minister a couple of matters he should take into consideration when talking about increasing the levels of cash advances. First, he will know that the Canadian Wheat Board borrows money at prime minus one quarter per cent. That is something he should consider when he is looking at whether to raise the cash advance levels. As an economist, he will know that for a very few million dollars he can put money into circulation to roughly 150,000 Canadian farmers. That would benefit virtually every community in western Canada, as well as having a ripple effect throughout the whole economy. I ask the minister to consider those points seriously and give us a reply on whether he will use those arguments to convince cabinet to raise the cash advance levels.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will consider those arguments, and others. On the subject of grain performance, I would underline the fact that in the last several months Canada has signed four long-term grain agreements with the U.S.S.R., China, Algeria, and recently with Brazil. This is a great year indeed. Something else that is rather interesting is that a number of spot sales have been made, for example, to China, made possible by our capacity to deliver very rapidly the grain being ordered. That again indicates the importance of the transportation system in Canada, the primary objective in the western innovations that we are pursuing at this time.

HOUSING

STATUS OF CANADIAN HOME OWNERSHIP STIMULATION PLAN

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (London-Middlesex): Madam Speaker, the new program known as the Canada Home Ownership Stimulation Plan was announced approximately one month ago. Will the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation give this House an update on the status of the program, and an indication of how many Canadians are availing themselves of the $3,000 grant made available to buyers of new homes or to first-time buyers of existing homes?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as the Minister of State for Finance indicated, $300 million was set out in the budget for this program to assist young Canadians. I am very pleased to report that, as of yesterday, 100,053 people had inquired about the plan, 51,941 had received application forms, 5,735 had returned the application forms, 2,641 had been approved, and 2,139 cheques were issued in the space of two weeks, helping the industry, creating jobs, and helping young Canadians find accommodation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EMPLOYMENT

QUERY RESPECTING JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and his parliamentary secretary, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. On Wednesday, the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced a total job-creation package which, at most, may provide 57,000 low-paying jobs; and only 14 per cent of the funds—the special response feature—will be partially used to help those who have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits.

Considering that some half million Canadians will run out of unemployment insurance and go on welfare this year due to the long-term stagnation caused by Liberal policies, and that Wednesday's measures will constitute less than a 6 per cent solution to their problem of long-term unemployment and expired benefits, what additional non-political programs is the government prepared to pursue in order to provide productive jobs to these jobless Canadians all across Canada, and not just in Liberal ridings?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration is well aware of the situation. He has the matter under study and will undoubtedly be able to give a reply to the hon. member in the House very soon.

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question should properly go to the Prime Minister. Yesterday we learned that much of the allocation of employment funds will be to Liberal ridings, mostly in eastern Canada. Now we have evidence of a politically directed allocation of employment fund opportunities in ridings within western Canada as well.

I have information from officers within Employment Canada, for instance, that, "The Prime Minister's office has been providing projects. They have to be approved by Lloyd Axworthy. There are no regional allocations." I would like to ask the Prime Minister, in relation to the immediate employment stimulation program, why are funds being directed by Liberal Senators in British Columbia, and Saskatchewan, and why is program direction coming from the Prime Minister's office instead of using the accountable, both financially and politically, process of local advisory boards, which would save money for the taxpayers and provide more jobs and more bang for the buck?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that this is one of the most accountable systems ever introduced in this country. Every Member of Parliament has a choice either to appoint an advisory committee or to do otherwise. The scheme is implemented along similar principles, and I am very surprised that the hon. member would attempt to discredit the program at this stage.

FORESTRY

CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA AGREEMENT

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. It concerns the Canada-Nova Scotia forestry agreement. As the minister is aware, it expired at the end of March. Is the minister now in a position to tell the House when we can anticipate this agreement being renewed, and when he expects it to be signed?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, the agreement which was worked out with the Province of Nova Scotia has been affirmed by the cabinet. I hope to have it signed as soon as possible. I want to thank the hon. member for the work she has put into moving us toward this objective.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INCREASE IN FARMERS' COSTS—REQUEST THAT SELLING PRICE BE INCREASED

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport in his capacity as the Canadian Wheat Board minister. Last night in reply to a question that I asked, his parliamentary secretary stated that the policy of the government, as it was last evening, is to continue with the minimum of $5 a bushel and maximum $7 for domestic Red Spring wheat for human consumption and a minimum of $5 for durum. That is what the parliamentary secretary said last night. If that is true, can the minister advise why he has not taken into account the 25 per cent increase in the cost of input in the last two years, 1980 to this year, and why he would not increase the domestic price for grain in Canada by that amount of 25 per cent because of the cost farmers are facing as a result of grain selling below the cost of production? This should be very simple and rudimentary for the government to perform.

• (1140)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am quite sure that my parliamentary secretary also said that a review of this particular subject is going on. In the meantime, we are continuing with the range that exists in the act now. This is under review and we probably will have an announcement to make in the future on the subject.

RAILWAYS

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF GILSON REPORT

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister is aware that we are going into a new crop year on August 1, and that farmers are selling grain below the cost of production. He spoke of large wheat sales, but farmers cannot make more money by increasing volume when they lose money on every bushel they sell. We assume that the minister intends to implement a 45 per cent increase in the next three years in the cost of transportation for western grain. In this House he assured us that by the end of July he would announce the government's policy regarding the Gilson report. Today is July 30. Is the minister prepared to make the government's position on the Gilson report public, or is he going to wait, as I suggested he would, until the House has adjourned so that he will then be safe from the attacks that the opposition plans to mount?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I expect that the House will be sitting in the coming days. The Cabinet has reviewed the Gilson report and will be in a position early next week to give the first response to it.

METRIC CONVERSION

COMPULSORY ASPECT OF LAW ON ADVERTISING

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice I will direct my question to the Acting Attorney General or to whomever can speak for justice on the government benches.

In view of the fact that the government dropped charges against Mrs. Zoritza Kasparian of Calgary because she had violated Section 7 of the Weights and Measures Act, which says that she was not allowed to advertise her carpets in imperial measure, and in view of the variety of positions taken by the government on the Kasparian case, what advice will the Department of Justice be giving to the Metric Commission with respect to Section 7? Will it be to modify or remove altogether the compulsory aspect of this law which forces metric advertising only?

Mr. Jim Peterson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, this is an issue which has been discussed by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Discussions are going on with the industry at the moment, as the hon. member opposite is aware. The charge under Section 7 of the Weights and Measures Act was withdrawn because of technical problems that were being encountered in the specific circumstances. Accordingly, we feel that it is appropriate to undertake further consultations with a view to clarifying Section 7 of the Weights and Measures Act and the regulations, and in order to make them more precise so that Canadians can better understand their rights and obligations under these provisions.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, quite obviously the government could not make Section 7 stick. If it is unenforceable we can only assume that any further prosecutions will be held in abeyance until Section 7 is cleared up.

REQUEST THAT MEASUREMENTS BE PERMITTED IN BOTH IMPERIAL AND METRIC SYSTEMS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might put a question to the Prime Minister in a more general vein. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is now carrying on discussions with the industry and is reviewing the regulations pertaining to metric. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the government will consider a tandem system of measurement in both imperial and metric, for packaging? This is particularly important when we see the devastating effects being experienced by farmers with their crops when they are forced to interpret metric only measurements.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is no doubt aware that when we announced the introduction of metric scales in retail food merchandising, we also said that for two years, in all communities where metric scales were to be introduced, prices would be posted for both metric and imperial weights. Now, I have not looked into this, and I would have to check with my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, on the feasibility of using the hon. member's suggestion for a tandem system of measurement in both imperial and metric. I shall look into the feasibility of the hon. member's proposal.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

ELIMINATION OF SATURDAY RURAL DELIVERY SERVICE

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for Canada Post Corporation perhaps an acting minister could answer my question.

The Corporation was established not only to reduce the dependency on the taxpayers of Canada but also to improve service to Canadians who use the mail. In the first year we had an unbelievable increase in postal rates and an unacceptable definition of the term letter, which tightened up the monopoly. Now we are told there will be a reduction in service, that being the removal of Saturday rural delivery. There is something wrong in "Warrenville", Madam Speaker.

Will the minister tell the House whether the problem lies with the Crown corporation or with the deficit reduction program laid down by the government? Could he also tell us what steps are being taken to correct the situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, this kind of question is always rather difficult to answer. All the members of this House would agree that the government should reduce its spending and should try to operate as much as possible on a cost-recovery basis. On the other hand, we realize that the Canada Post Corporation has a deficit that is increasing from year to year, and yet, when the Corporation suggests how it could bring down its deficit, hon. members ask the Corporation not to drop the service in question. Madam Speaker, I myself come from a rural area where we have Saturday mail delivery, and I think that people in rural areas are prepared, like other Canadians, to accept a five-day delivery system, as is the case for most Canadians living in cities. I do not think this is tantamount to depriving Canadians of essential services.

[English]

Mr. Bradley: Madam Speaker, we see again why this is called question period, and not question and answer period.

REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE STUDY REDUCTION IN SERVICE

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Since there is in excess of $400 million of taxpayers' money going to the Crown corporation this year, could the Prime Minister assure Canadians that there will be no reduction in mail service in this country until the implications of such reduction are studied by a committee of the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will do what the responsible minister would do, and undertake to refer the hon. member's representations to the Crown corporation for consideration.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF LOAN GUARANTEES TO NEW BRUNSWICK COMPANIES

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

An hon. Member: Announcement!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, we have the usual rash judgment from hon. members opposite.

In view of the government's apparent willingness to provide a loan guarantee to Maislin Transport whose Canadian employees, according to my information, number closer to 700 than 2,000, can I now offer companies in my constituency that are facing bankruptcy an assurance of loan guarantees from the Government of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, one of the programs of this government that has been in place for many years is the Enterprise Development Program. One of its components is to make loan guarantee assistance available on a last resort basis to help in the restructuring of companies in difficulty, in order to assist them to return to long-term viability.

I would be very happy to have my hon. friend, in his usual efficient and hard-working manner on behalf of his constituents, bring cases to my attention which may qualify under the rules so that we can discuss them at the level of ministers.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON BUSINESS WORKING CAPITAL

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will direct my question to the Minister of State for Finance. The question concerns the liquidity position of Canadian enterprise and commerce. Since the last quarter of 1980 the Minister of State for Finance will be aware of the serious problem faced by Canadian business, the loss of working capital, loss of cash flow, and loss of equity position. He will know that the consequence of this has been 400,000 fewer jobs in that period of time.

Is the minister aware of this critical situation, and of what will happen if interest rates continue high, and is he aware of the vulnerability of Canadian business and Canadian jobs in this situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the situation described by the hon. member is another consequence of the present recession. I would like to draw the hon. member's attention to an important document that was tabled with the budget in June and is now being analysed by a group of businessmen and experts. As soon as the committee has finished its assessment and made its recommendations to the Minister of Finance, and as soon as a decision is made, it will be possible to provide funds at reasonable interest rates and thus make cash available to Canadian enterprises. This would certainly help alleviate the difficult liquidity position referred to by the hon. member.

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT RESTRAINT PROGRAM ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, I understand the documents presented by the Minister of Finance with his budget statement and the proposals to be examined by the blue ribbon committee suggest that the lowering of interest rates for business, farmers, and home owners will be by way of government grants to pay down the interest rates. Will the Minister of State for Finance tell us what sort of leverage the government will have by lowering interest rates in this way?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member must have read a very brief summary of the document that was published and which provides an in-depth analysis of proposals for reducing interest rates by subtracting the component due to inflation. I would ask the hon. member to re-read the document carefully, and he will realize that there is no question of grants but of a formula for adjusting the taxation system so that it applies to the interest paid, minus the component due to inflation.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

TESTING OF AIR-LAUNCHED CRUISE MISSILE

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if it is still government policy to flight test the air-launched Cruise missile, or whether the fact that the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks, START, have more or less gotten under way has caused the government to reconsider its earlier decision to flight test the missile?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, the START talks have been adjourned for the summer, I believe until September. We are more interested in the INF talks. Unless they show very substantial signs of succeeding, Madam Speaker, we still want to continue with our plans.

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I think the Prime Minister would know that the air-launched Cruise missile is to be part of the U.S. strategic force, not the European nuclear force. That would be the ground-launched Cruise missile. Because that is the case, and because we hope the START talks will resume in the fall, I would like to know whether the Prime Minister will therefore consider our not becoming involved in testing the air-launched Cruise missile, in line with his own suggestion at UNSSOD II that the real problem is that technological advances are going on ahead of reduction talks?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not want to disagree with the hon. member because the answer would be the same anyhow. The Pershing II and the Cruise are part of the INF arsenal, and the ones which would be tested in Canada would be regulated under the INF talks. The answer would be the same in both cases, that until progress has been made at the START talks or the INF talks we have no cause to change our policy. I made that quite clear in my speech at UNSSOD. The Soviet negotiators should not assume we are going to change our minds unless they themselves are prepared to talk seriously about the INF missiles.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—PARTICIPATION IN POSSIBLE PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Recognizing the carnage and death of thousands of Lebanese, Palestinians, Syrians and Israelis in Lebanon, what is Canada's position regarding either an ad hoc or UN multilateral disengagement force? Is the Canadian government currently engaged, directly or indirectly, in bilateral discussions or negotiations through the UN regarding the establishment of and the participation by Canada in such a force?

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we have not been asked to participate in a peacekeeping force but, as Mr. Danson, the former Minister of Defence, has said, we virtually invented peacekeeping, and if we are asked, if the parties agree, and if it is constructive, we will participate.

HOMELAND FOR PALESTINIANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, will the Prime Minister tell us what the government's current position is regarding Palestinian rights to national self-determination and security through the establishment of a homeland for the Palestinians?

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I would not use the word "self-determination" that the hon. member has used, but I think Canadians would want us to show the same compassion to Palestinians that we have traditionally shown to Israelis. Therefore, we do support a homeland for Palestinians. I think Canadians would want this government to do that, and that is what this government is doing.

HOUSING

PROVINCIAL RENT REVIEW BOARD INCREASES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. In the last few days there have been meetings between the Government of Canada and the mayors of various Canadian cities. Are there any meetings planned with provincial governments particularly with respect to rent review programs? I have in mind my own province where rent review boards are now granting rent increases of 15 per cent, 20 per cent, 35 per cent and 40 per cent, at a time when the Government of Canada is trying to bring us to the six and five world. These two things are incompatible. Is it the minister's intention to initiate such meetings with the appropriate provincial ministry wherever it is applicable, and particularly in Ontario?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, as the representatives of the municipalities indicated after the meeting with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance yesterday, there are many areas, probably most, under which municipalities have to respond to provincial legislation and they cannot act independently. Rent controls are obviously a matter which impinges upon municipal operations through their housing authorities, but it is under the authority of the province because, under the Constitution, they have responsibility in that area.

As I have indicated, Madam Speaker, where the federal government has any operational impact we have announced that rent increases will be kept within six and five, such as projects under CMHC control. In that area, where we have the option, we are adopting the six and five rule. Where the provinces have jurisdiction, they will have to make up their own minds. I have talked to a half dozen of the provincial ministers, and I hope to conclude that in the next few weeks in discussions with other ministers. However, as I say, we are doing what we are able to do under the jurisdiction available to us.

REQUEST THAT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETING BE CONVENED

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the minister a direct question. Is it his intention to convene a federal-provincial meeting with provincial housing ministers to look into the question of rising rents for people who are going to become more and more affected by curtailment of income? I would hope the answer to that question will be yes, because those people are being impinged upon as a result of rent review cases and landlords increasing rents. Surely that must be stoppted if there is to be any justice in the six and five program?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I just indicated to the hon. member that I have already met with six of the provincial ministers of housing and I intend to meet with the balance in the next few weeks. We discussed many items right across the board. In so far as the federal responsibility is concerned, and the leeway that we have, CMHC has indicated that rents will not increase above the six and five mandate. In order to achieve that, as you know, the six and five applies to the wages of people employed by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There are ways in which the federal government has demonstrated we can act to protect people in those rental projects. We hope that the example of the federal government will be followed and adopted by the provinces and by municipal corporations.

CANADA MORTGAGE RENEWAL PLAN

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister responsible for housing. The only response by the government for those 500,000 Canadians facing mortgage renewal apparently has been the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan, which would provide grants of up to $3,000 for those whose mortgage interest payments exceed 30 per cent of gross income. The minister knows, or should know, that CMHC is currently receiving approximately 60 applications a day. CMHC has its hands tied because the government has failed to give legislative action to this proposal in the budget of last June. Does the minister intend to bring in the necessary amendment to the National Housing Act so this very important part of the government's response to the housing crisis can become operative immediately?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, there are a number of changes in the plan, for example, the opportunity to provide grants rather than deferred interest. The extension of the program for an additional year requires legislation which was supported by the hon. member and his party this year, but that will have to be done when the act is returned to the House in the fall. I assume from the thrust of the hon. member's question that the response of the opposition to this very serious problem will be a lot faster than it was last year when it took us three months to get approval for that plan.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NYSTROM—REPORT STAGE AMENDMENT TO BILL C-124

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, this morning under Standing Order 17, I gave you notice of a question of privilege that I wished to raise. I want to say at the outset that I think you are aware that I raise questions of privilege very rarely in the House. I do so now only because I feel that our privileges collectively as private Members of Parliament, and my privileges as a Member of Parliament, have been affected by a motion that appears on today's Order Paper.

I was very careful to spend some time this morning reading Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms as to what a question of privilege means concerning the work of Members of Parliament. On page 11 of Beauchesne we find Citation 16, which reads:

> Parliamentary privilege is the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions—

I will not quote any more but Beauchesne refers to the fact that privileges also refer to the services of Members of Parliament being unimpeded. In other words, we have the right as Members of Parliament to provide services to our constituents unimpeded.

My question of privilege, and I will not get into the arguments on a substantive basis, arises out of Motion No. 3 to amend Bill C-124, appearing on today's Order Paper. I will paraphrase the motion. It says that the salaries of members' staff—in other words, the staff of Members of Parliament, both the parliamentary staff here in Ottawa and our staff in the constituencies—will, when the bill is passed, be rolled back. Bill C-124 treats this staff radically different from the public servants in our country who will not have their salaries rolled back but will have their salaries limited to a 6 per cent increase next year.

If we are to serve our constituents well and if we are to do what we have been elected to do—I assure you this is not a partisan issue—we have to depend to a great extent on our staff and their morale is very important. If we are to keep our staff, it is very important that their salaries not be rolled back; otherwise certain of our staff will leave. If we are to attract good staff, it is important their salaries be at an adequate level.

You are aware, Madam Speaker, that on March 31, 1982, the staff of Members of Parliament received a salary increase of 11 per cent.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nystrom: Just one moment, please, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I think I would have to reverse that and say to the hon. member "Just one moment, please." My impression is that the hon. member is debating the motion which is going to come up for debate later this day. He does not have a question of privilege but a matter of debate. I invite the hon. member to debate the issue when the motion is called precisely for that purpose.

I have listened to the hon. member and I have not been able to detect a trace of a question of privilege in what he has said. It is quite obvious to me that he is debating the motion. Of course, the hon. member has the right to debate that matter, and I hope he will when the motion is called.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, if I may, I would like to refer you to Beauchesne, in particular pages 11, 12, 13 and 14, under the definition of "Privilege". I will not waste the time of the House to quote in detail, but I want to say to you that I believe the staff we have play a very essential part in helping Members of Parliament with their constituency work and in performing their duties.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am grateful to the hon. member for not quoting the whole definition of a question of privilege to me. I had that in mind when I said to the hon. member that I felt he was debating the motion.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS CONCERNING REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION OF TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES LEGISLATION

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table in the House a set of documents on the revision and consolidation of the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act. The documents include a draft revision of the legislation, a working paper and a summary of those two documents.

Madam Speaker, I feel that the information I am tabling will provide an excellent opportunity for all parties concerned to make their views known to the government before a final decision on policy is made.

PETITIONS

MR. SARGEANT—TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILES ON CANADIAN SOIL

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians who are opposed to the testing of the U.S. Cruise missile on Canadian soil. These people ask that the government scrap its plans to test this missile since such testing indicates a willingness on the part of the Canadian government to support the insane arms race that is currently being waged by the superpowers. The petition also asks that Canada be declared a nuclear-free zone.

This petition, Madam Speaker, also has the support of 3,650 residents of Manitoba who have signed cards opposing Cruise missile testing and advocating a declaration of Canada as a nuclear-free zone. These cards are being delivered to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) right now. It is my hope and the hope of the petitioners that he will heed their call.

MR. COOPER—RECONSIDERATION OF BILL C-53

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, today I have the honour to present to the House a petition on behalf of people in my constituency concerning Bill C-53. The petition respectfully calls upon Parliament to retain prohibitions on spouses charging one another with sexual assault, that the age of consent not be lowered, that the law continue to prohibit acts of gross indecency and that there be a class of sexual assault or rape retained.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNT

Question No. 2,379—Mr. Knowles:

1. Does the actuarial report on the Public Service Superannuation Account (PSSA) as at December 31, 1972 state there were 256,958 contributors to the PSSA on December 31, 1972 and does the report as at December 31, 1977 state there were 246,059 contributors on January 1, 1973 and, if so, by what amount were the actuarial liabilities of the PSSA reduced as a result of the reduction of 10,899 contributors from the rolls on January 1, 1973?

2. (a) What annual rate of salary increases resulting from promotions did the actuarial report as at December 31, 1972 assume would be received by PSSA contributors (b) what annual rate of such salary increases did PSSA contributors receive during the period January 1, 1973 to December 31, 1977 (c) what annual rate of such salary increases does the actuarial report as at December 31, 1977 assume will be received by PSSA contributors?

3. (a) What was the average age at which the actuarial report as at December 31, 1972 assumed PSSA contributors would retire in the future (b) what were the average ages at which PSSA contributors retired for each year during the period January 1, 1973 to December 31, 1977 (c) what is the average age at which the actuarial report as at December 31, 1977 assumes that PSSA contributors will retire in the future?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): 1. While there appeared to be a reduction of 10,899 reported active contributors as at January 1, 1973, there was also an increase of 668 in the number of reported pensioners. For purposes of the report as at December 31, 1977, it was estimated that as a result of the reported change in the number of contributors the liabilities may have been reduced by about $176 million. However, this figure is extremely difficult to estimate and the true figure may have been very much less. There would have been practically no change in the actuarial liabilities for the 668 cases whose status may be assumed to have merely changed as at January 1, 1973. If, in addition, the remaining 10,231 cases could be assumed to be employees whose service terminated before January 1, 1973, but who were included in the 1972 valuation, the implicit reduction in the actuarial liabilities as at January 1, 1973 might have been of the order of only $8 million or 0.16 per cent of the estimated total 1972 liabilities.

2. (a) Promotional salary increases assumed for purposes of the 1972 actuarial report were in accordance with the following table:

Age	Males	Females	Age	Males	Females
18	0.385	0.396
19	0.401	0.412

(b) Information on promotional salary increases actually received during the five years ending December 31, 1977 is not available. However, studies carried out in connection with the 1977 report indicated the following progression of salaries from age to age.

Age	Males			Age	Females
20	$1,000			20	$1,000
25	1,396			25	1,233
30	1,750	$1,000		30	1,497	$1,000

65	2,344	1,340	1,119	65	2,322	1,551	1,194

(c) Promotional salary increases assumed for purposes of the 1977 report for females were the same as for the 1972 report (see 2(a) above) and for males were in accordance with the following table:

Age	Males	Age	Males	Age	Males	Age	Males	Age	Males
18	.357
19	.390
20	.424	30	.742	40	.888	50	.948	60	.984

29	.715	39	.880	49	.943	59	.981	69	.999
								70	1.000

3. (a) The rates of retirement and mortality assumed for purposes of the 1972 report produce probable average ages of retirement of 63.75 for males and 63.83 for females.

(b) Actual average ages at retirement

1973-74	62.9
1974-75	62.5
1975-76	62.4
1976-77	62.2
1977-78	62.3

(c) The rates of retirement and mortality assumed for purposes of the 1977 report produce probable average ages of retirement of 62.24 for males and 62.29 for females.

Question No. 2,380—Mr. Knowles:

1. Does the actuarial report on the Public Service Superannuation Account (PSSA) as at December 31, 1977 show a deficit of $61.5 million in the valuation balance sheet of the PSSA as at December 31, 1977?

2. What would be the deficit in the sheet as at December 31, 1977 if the 1977 PSSA actuarial report had examined the PSSA in accordance (a) with the assumptions used in the actuarial report as at December 31, 1972 (b) with the 1972 PSSA actuarial report assumptions of 0-0-4 per cent for annual inflation, salary revision increases, and interest rates respectively and in accordance with the 1977 actuarial report assumptions for all other factors (c) with economic assumptions of (i) 0-0-3½ per cent (ii) 0-2½-3½ per cent for annual inflation, salary revision increases, and interest rates respectively (d) with an assumption of 3 per cent annual inflation, 5½ per cent annual salary revision increases, but with an annual interest rate assumption of (i) 6½ per cent during the period PSSA participants are employed in the public service and are eligible to receive public service salary revision increases (ii) 3½ per cent during the period PSSA participants are no longer eligible to receive public service salary revision increases, that is 3½ per cent on the liabilities in respect of current and future beneficiaries calculated so that employer contributions made in respect of former contributors who have taken a return of contributions and the unreturned interest earnings in respect of the employee-employer contributions of these former contributors are assigned between actively employed contributors and beneficiaries according to the proportion of liabilities in the PSSA as between actively employed contributors and beneficiaries?

3. What would be the deficit in the sheet as at December 31, 1977 if adoption of the 3 per cent inflation scenario contained in the 1977 PSSA actuarial report, namely adoption of economic assumptions of 3-5½-6½ per cent for annual inflation, salary revision increases, and interest rates respectively, had been accompanied by an amendment to the PSS Act providing that the first 3 per cent of annual indexing of PSSA benefits paid on December 31, 1977 and thereafter would henceforth be paid out of the PSSA and would be regarded as PSS Act benefits?

4. What is the employer contribution rate, expressed as a percentage of the effective employee contribution rate to the PSSA, that would be required to provide all PSS Act benefits in respect of current service if the actuarial examination of the PSSA as at December 31, 1977 had been carried out in accordance with the assumptions and conditions described in parts 2 and 3?

5. What is the amount that would have to be credited to the PSSA on December 31, 1977 to reduce the employer contribution rate by 10 per cent of the effective employee contribution rate to the PSSA to finance all PSS Act benefits in respect of current service after December 31, 1977 under the scenarios described in parts 2 and 3?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): 1. Yes.

2. (a) $713 million. (b) $1,002 million. (c) (i) $1,906 million. (ii) $2,908* million (includes $909 million for accrued supplementary retirement benefits). (d) $3,884 million (includes $1,124 million for indexed accrued supplementary retirement benefits).

*For comparability with 2(d), notional assets were valued at 3.5 per cent which increased them by $4,166 million. This was partially offset by a reserve of $2,710 million for salary increases of the same size as implicitly included in 2(d), i.e., providing for increases until 1983 greater than the basic 5.5 per cent assumed in 2(d).

3. $3,884 million (includes $1,124 million for indexed accrued supplementary retirement benefit).

4. Employer contribution rates expressed as percentage of effective employee contribution rate.

Assumptions as for	Employer Multiple*
2(a) above	105 per cent
2(b) above	115 per cent
2(c)(i) above	140 per cent
2(c)(ii) above	170 per cent
2(d) and 3 above	150 per cent

*These figures are subject to modification when CPP/QPP contribution rates are increased above 3.6 per cent of contributory earnings.

For purposes of consistency between 2(c)(ii) and 2(d) and 3, it was assumed that employees contribute to the public service superannuation account a total of 7.5 per cent of salary less CPP/QPP contributions (i.e., including the 1 per cent supplementary retirement benefit contribution) and that all benefits are paid out of the account.

5. There does not appear to be any way to determine an amount equivalent to a reduction in the employer contribution rate the indefinite future.

Question No. 2,381—Mr. Knowles:

1. What would be the deficit or surplus in the valuation balance sheet of the Public Service Superannuation Account (PSSA) if the actuarial report as at December 31, 1977 had used economic assumptions of 0-2½-3½ per cent for annual inflation, salary revision increases, and interest rates respectively?

2. What would be the deficit or surplus in the sheet as at December 31, 1977 if the 1977 PSSA actuarial report had examined the PSSA in accordance with (a) economic assumptions of 6-8½-9½ per cent for annual inflation, salary revision increases, and interest rates respectively (b) an assumption of 6 per cent annual inflation, 8½ per cent annual salary revision increases, and an annual interest rate assumption of (i) 9½ per cent during the period PSSA participants are employed in the public service and are eligible to receive public service salary revision increases (ii) 3½ per cent during the period PSSA participants are no longer eligible to receive public service salary revision increases, that is 3½ per cent on the liabilities in respect of current and future beneficiaries calculated so that employer contributions made in respect of former contributors who have taken a return of contributions and the unreturned interest earnings in respect of the employee-employer contributions of these former contributors are assigned between actively employed contributors and beneficiaries according to the proportion of liabilities in the PSSA as between actively employed contributors and beneficiaries (c) economic assumptions of 6-8½-9½ per cent for annual inflation, salary revision increases, and interest rates respectively and if the PSS Act were amended to provide that the first 6 per cent of annual indexing of PSSA benefits paid on December 31, 1977 and thereafter would henceforth be paid out of the PSSA and would be regarded as PSS Act benefits?

3. What is the employer contribution rate, expressed as a percentage of the effective employee contribution rate to the PSSA, that would be required to provide all PSS Act benefits in respect of current service if the actuarial examination of the PSSA as at December 31, 1977 had been carried out in accordance with the assumptions and conditions described in parts 1 and 2?

4. What is the amount that would have to be credited to the PSSA on December 31, 1977 to reduce the employer contribution rate by 10 per cent of the effective employee contribution rate to the PSSA to finance all PSS Act benefits in respect of current service after December 31, 1977 under the scenarios described in parts 1 and 2?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): 1. $2,908* million deficit (includes accrued supplementary retirement benefits).

2. (a) $1,281* million surplus (PSSA only). (b) and (c) $4,141* million deficit (includes indexed accrued supplementary retirement benefits).

*For consistency and comparability, notional assets in each case were valued at the assumed rate of interest. Moreover, the actuarial liabilities include reserves for salary increases until 1983, such that 1 and 2(b) and (c) may be compared with question 2,380 part 2(d), and 2(a) with question 2,380 part 1.

The premium included in the value of notional assets and the special reserve in each case were as follows:

	Premium on Assets	Special Reserve
1. above	$4166 million	$2710 million
2. (a)	$879 million discount	($2 million)
2. (b) and (c)	$879 million discount	$15 million

3. Employer contribution rates expressed as percentage of effective employee contributions.

Assumptions as for	Employer Multiple*
1. above	170 per cent
2. (a) above	65 per cent
2. (b) and (c) above	130 per cent

*These figures are subject to modification when CPP/QPP contribution rates are increased above 3.6 per cent of contributory earnings.

For comparability with question 2,380 part 2(c)(ii) and 2(d) and 3, it was assumed that employees contribute to the public service superannuation account a total of 7.5 per cent of salary less CPP/QPP contributions (i.e., including the 1 per cent supplementary retirement benefit contribution) and that all benefits are paid out of the account.

Order Paper Questions

4. There does not appear to be any way to determine an amount equivalent to a reduction in the employer contribution rate into the indefinite future.

Question No. 2,382—Mr. Knowles:

1. What would be the deficit or surplus in the valuation balance sheet of the Public Service Superannuation Account (PSSA) if the actuarial report as at December 31, 1977 had used economic assumptions of 0-2-3 per cent for annual inflation, salary increases arising from both promotions and salary revisions, and interest rates respectively?

2. What would be the deficit or surplus in the sheet as at December 31, 1977 if the 1977 PSSA actuarial report had examined the PSSA in accordance with (a) economic assumptions of 3½-5½-6½ per cent for annual inflation, salary increases arising from both promotions and salary revisions, and interest rates respectively (b) an assumption of 3½ per cent annual inflation, 5½ per cent annual salary increases arising from both promotions and salary revisions, and an annual interest rate assumption of (i) 6½ per cent during the period PSSA participants are employed in the public service and are eligible to receive public service promotions and salary revision increases (ii) 3 per cent during the period PSSA participants are no longer eligible to receive public service promotions and salary revision increases, that is 3 per cent on the PSSA liabilities in respect of current and future beneficiaries calculated so that employer contributions made in respect of former contributors who have taken a return of contributions and the unreturned interest earnings in respect of the employee-employer contributions of these former contributors are assigned between actively employed contributors and beneficiaries according to the proportion of liabilities in the PSSA as between actively employed contributors and beneficiaries (c) economic assumptions of 3½-5½-6½ per cent for annual inflation, salary increases arising from both promotions and salary revisions, and interest rates respectively and if the PSS Act were amended to provide that the first 3½ per cent of annual indexing of PSSA benefits paid on December 31, 1977 and thereafter would henceforth be paid out of the PSSA and would be regarded as PSS Act benefits?

3. What is the employer contribution rate, expressed as a percentage of the effective employee contribution rate to the PSSA, that would be required to provide all PSS Act benefits in respect of current service if the actuarial examination of the PSSA as at December 31, 1977 had been carried out in accordance with the assumptions and conditions described in parts 1 and 2?

4. What is the amount that would have to be credited to the PSSA on December 31, 1977 to reduce the employer contribution rate by 10 per cent of the effective employee contribution rate to the PSSA to finance all PSS Act benefits in respect of current service after December 31, 1977 under the scenarios described in parts 1 and 2?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): 1. $3,589* million deficit (includes accrued supplementary retirement benefits).

2. (a) $312* million surplus (PSSA only). (b) and (c) $4,252* million deficit (includes indexed accrued supplementary retirement benefits).

*For consistency and comparability, notional assets in each case were valued at the assumed rate of interest. Moreover, the actuarial liabilities include reserves for salary increases until 1983, such that 1 and 2(b) and (c) may be compared with question 2,380 part 2(d), and 2(a) with question 2,380 part 1.

The premium included in the value of notional assets and the special reserve in each case were as follows:

	Premium on Assets	Special Reserve
1. above	$4795 million	$3169 million
2. (a)	$1166 million	$1305 million
2. (b) and (c)	$1166 million	$1539 million

3. Employer contribution rates expressed as percentage of effective employee contributions.

Assumptions as for	Employer Multiple*
1. above	185 per cent
2. (a) above	90 per cent
2. (b) and (c) above	125 per cent

*These figures are subject to modification when CPP/QPP contribution rates are increased above 3.6 per cent of contributory earnings.

For comparability with question 2,380 part 2(c)(ii) and 2(d) and 3, it was assumed that employees contribute to the public service superannuation account a total of 7.5 per cent of salary less CPP/QPP contributions (i.e., including the 1 per cent supplementary retirement benefit contribution) and that all benefits are paid out of the account.

4. There does not appear to be any way to determine an amount equivalent to a reduction in the employer contribution rate into the indefinite future.

Note: The assumptions underlying the figures in respect of part 2 and the corresponding part 3 do not include the usual provision for promotional salary increases.

Question No. 2,383—Mr. Knowles:

1. What would be the deficit or surplus in the valuation balance sheet of the Public Service Superannuation Account (PSSA) as at December 31, 1977 if the 1977 PSSA actuarial report had examined the PSSA in accordance with (a) economic assumptions of 6½-8½-9½ per cent for annual inflation, salary increases arising from both promotions and salary revisions, and interest rates respectively (b) an assumption of 6½ per cent annual inflation, 8½ per cent annual salary increases arising from both promotions and salary revisions, and an annual interest rate assumption of (i) 9½ per cent during the period PSSA participants are employed in the public service and are eligible to receive public service promotions and salary revision increases (ii) 3 per cent during the period PSSA participants are no longer eligible to receive public service promotions and salary revision increases, that is 3 per cent during the period following their employment in the public service when they and their survivors are entitled to immediate and deferred PSS Act benefits calculated so that employer contributions made in respect of former contributors who have taken a return of contributions and the unreturned interest earnings in respect of the employee-employer contributions of these former contributors are assigned between actively employed contributors and beneficiaries according to the proportion of liabilities in the PSSA as between actively employed contributors and beneficiaries (c) economic assumptions of 6½-8½-9½ per cent for annual inflation, salary increases arising from both promotions and salary revisions, and interest rates respectively and if the PSS Act were amended to provide that the first 6½ per cent of annual indexing of PSSA benefits paid on December 31, 1977 and thereafter would henceforth be paid out of the PSSA and would be regarded as PSS Act benefits?

2. What is the employer contribution rate, expressed as a percentage of the effective employee contribution rate to the PSSA, that would be required to provide all PSS Act benefits in respect of current service if the actuarial examination of the PSSA as at December 31, 1977 had been carried out in accordance with the assumptions and conditions described in part 1?

3. What is the amount that would have to be credited to the PSSA on December 31, 1977 to reduce the employer contribution rate by 10 per cent of the effective employee contribution rate to the PSSA to finance all PSS Act benefits in respect of current service after December 31, 1977 under the scenarios described in part 1?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): 1. (a) $1,365* million surplus (PSSA only). (b) and (c) $4,585* million deficit (includes indexed accrued supplementary retirement benefits).

*For consistency and comparability, notional assets in each case were valued at the assumed rate of interest. Moreover, the actuarial liabilities include reserves for salary increases until 1983, such that 1(a) may be compared with question 2,380 part 1, and 2(a) with question 2,380 (part 2(d)).

The premium included in the value of notional assets and the special reserve in each case were as follows:

	Premium on Assets	Special Reserve
1 (a) above	$879 million discount	$218 million
1 (b) and (c) above	$879 million discount	$347 million

2. Employer contribution rates expressed as percentage of effective employee contributions.

Assumptions as for	Employer Multiple*
1 (a) above	45 per cent
1 (b) and (c) above	110 per cent

*These figures are subject to modification when CPP/QPP contribution rates are increased above 3.6 per cent of contributory earnings.

For comparability with question 2,380 part 2(c)(ii) and 2(d) and 3, it was assumed that employees contribute to the public service superannuation account a total of 7.5 per cent of salary less CPP/QPP contributions (i.e., including the 1 per cent supplementary retirement benefit contribution) and that all benefits are paid out of the account.

3. There does not appear to be any way to determine an amount equivalent to a reduction in the employer contribution rate into the indefinite future.

Note: The assumptions underlying these figures do not include the usual provision for promotional salary increases.

SECOND CONFERENCE ON LATIN AMERICAN WOMEN

Question No. 3,697—Mr. Gamble:

1. With reference to the Second Conference on Latin American Women held in Winnipeg on November 28 and 29, 1981 funded by the Department of the Secretary of State, who attended and, in each case, what was his/her organizational affiliation?

2. Who applied for the conference grant and what were their organizational affiliations?

3. What was the amount of the grant?

4. Was the grant for the total cost of the conference and, if not, what were the other sources of funding and the amounts involved?

5. (a) Which conferees were from foreign countries and, in each case, which country (b) on what basis were visas granted to foreign conferees?

6. Were any persons attending Cuban and, if so, had they fled Communist tyranny or were they spokespersons for the Communist government of that country?

7. Were any persons attending from El Salvador and, if so, were they supporters or opponents of the anti-Communist government of El Salvador?

8. Were any persons attending of Chilean background and, if so, were they supporters of the current anti-Communist government or of the former Allende Marxist government of Chile?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Secretary of State and the Department of External Affairs as follows:

1. As this conference was not organized by the government, the names of individuals attending the conference are not known to the Secretary of State and the Department of External Affairs. However, organizations invited to participate at the conference were as follows: Provincial Council of Women, Manitoba; Young Women Canadian Association, Winnipeg; Canadian Advisory Council of Women, Winnipeg; Manitoba Provincial Council of Women; Manitoba Federation of Labour, Equal Opportunity Committee; Manitoba Action Committee on the Status of Women; Chilean Canadian Cultural Centre, Women's Committee, Winnipeg; Manitoba Council for International Cooperation; International Centre, Winnipeg; Match Internation, Winnipeg; Oxfam, Winnipeg; Chilean Information Centre, Winnipeg; Committee of Solidarity with Latin America, Winnipeg; Unitarian Church, Winnipeg; Nellie McClung Theatre, Winnipeg; New Democratic Party, Status on Women Committee, Winnipeg; Voice of Women, Winnipeg; Association of United Ukranian Canadians, Women's Branch 224, Winnipeg; Congress of Canadian Women, Winnipeg; Manitoba Peace Council; Pregnancy Information Centre, Women Health Clinic, Winnipeg; Community Task Force on Material and Child Health, Winnipeg; Central America Solidarity Committee, Winnipeg; Indian Metis Friendship Centre, Winnipeg; United Church, Winnipeg Presbitery; Canadian Catholic Organization for Development and Peace, Winnipeg; United Jewish People Organization, Winnipeg; Women's Bureau, Manitoba Department of Labour; Red River Community College, Women's Coordinator, Winnipeg; Lombard Jaycees, Winnipeg; Women and the Law, Winnipeg; National Farmers' Union, Winnipeg; Menonite Central Committee, Winnipeg; Manitoba Metis Federation; Metis Women's Association, Winnipeg; Women Employment Service, Winnipeg; United Nation Association, Winnipeg; Religious Society of Friends, Winnipeg; La Ligue des Femmes, Montréal; Conseil de la Paix du Québec; Calgary Chilean Association; Voice of Women, Calgary Branch; Voice of Women, Toronto Branch; Voice of Women, B.C. Branch; The Catholic Church of Saskatoon; Learning Centre of Quebec; Solidarity with Democratic Chile Committee, Toronto; Toronto Chilean Association; Regina Chilean Association; Saskatoon Chilean Association; Edmonton Chilean Association; Montreal Chilean Association; Vancouver Chilean Association.

2. Mrs. Elizabeth Willcock, executive director of the Citizenship Council of Manitoba, applied for the grant. The Citizenship Council of Manitoba is affiliated with the Citizenship Federation of Canada.

3. The amount of the grant was for $4,650.

4. The amount was for partial assistance only. The remaining costs of $3,410 were assumed by the Chilean Canadian Cultural Centre, Women's Committee, Winnipeg.

5. (a), 6, 7 and 8. See answer to part 1.

5. (b) All those who attended from outside of Canada would have been admitted to Canada according to the criteria set out in the Immigration Act and regulations.

REYE'S SYNDROME

Question No. 4,170—Mr. Mitges:

1. Is the Minister of National Health and Welfare aware of the medical report recently released by the Center For Disease Control in the United States that links the occurrence of Reye's Syndrome in small children who receive aspirin or ASA when suffering from influenza or other viral diseases?

2. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare or any of its agencies currently undertaking studies of its own to verify those already undertaken in the United States and (a) if so, what is the status of the studies (b) if not, on what date will the department begin the studies?

3. Is the department or any of its agencies aware of any other study or studies beyond the results recently released by the center that has linked Reye's Syndrome and the use of aspirin or ASA in small children suffering from influenza or other viral diseases and, if so, will the minister make the reports available to the public?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is aware of the report released by the Centre for Disease Control in the United States. This report describes an association between ASA use and the occurrence of Reye's Syndrome, but it does not claim a causal relationship between the two.

2. (a) and (b) No. The Department of National Health and Welfare is not carrying out any new studies at this time. It is however in constant contact with the Canadian Paediatric Society, The American Academy of Pediatrics and The Food and Drug Administration and monitors their activities in the follow-up of the Reye's Syndrome problem. The U.S. Secretary of Health and Human Resources has directed the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to plan an educational campaign to parents and doctors and to look into means to label ASA products with a warning. The Health Protection Branch is consulting with the Canadian Paediatric Society in respect of information to be provided to the public. The Health Protection Branch is also exploring the feasibility of co-operating with the provinces in the development of a uniform system of reporting and monitoring cases of Reye's Syndrome across Canada.

As well, other aspects of studies on Reye's Syndrome are being carried out by investigators supported by the Medical Research Council (MRC). MRC has provided funds in 1982-83 to Dr. S. H. S. Lee and Dr. K. R. Rozee of the Department of Microbiology, Dalhousie University, Halifax, for a research project entitled "Viral pathogenesis: the role of interferon and other factors". Part of this research is concerned with the role that emulsifiers commonly found in the environment may play in the development of Reye's Syndrome.

3. Neither the Department of National Health and Welfare nor the Medical Research Council are aware of any new studies. However further information on Reye's Syndrome cases which occurred in Ohio has been published recently in the The Lancet (January 23, 1982). Also a report by the National Institute of Health Consensus Committee on the Diagnosis and Treatment of Reye's Syndrome as published in The Journal of The American Medical Association (November 27, 1981). Both these journals are widely read by Canadian physicians.

ELDORADO AVIATION LIMITED—LOANS TO EMPLOYEES

Question No. 4,195—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Were loans made to any employee of Eldorado Aviation Limited or its subsidiaries since March, 1980 and, if so, in each case (a) what is the name and title of the employee (b) on what date was the loan taken out and on what date is it due (c) what was the amount of the loan (d) what interest rate is being charged (e) what was the purpose of the loan?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Eldorado Aviation Limited reports as follows: The requested information is considered to be of a managerial and administrative nature between Eldorado Aviation Limited and the corporation's employees and, therefore, cannot be released to the public.

ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED—LOANS TO EMPLOYEES

Question No. 4,196—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Were loans made to any employee of Eldorado Nuclear Limited or its subsidiaries since March, 1980 and, if so, in each case (a) what is the name and title of the employee (b) on what date was the loan taken out and on what date is it due (c) what was the amount of the loan (d) what interest rate is being charged (e) what was the purpose of the loan?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Eldorado Nuclear Limited reports as follows: The requested information is considered to be of a managerial and administrative nature between Eldorado Nuclear Limited and the corporation's employees and, therefore, cannot be released to the public.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—CODE OF CONDUCT

Question No. 4,248—Mr. Crosby:

1. Does the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have written rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behavior for employees of the department and, if so, are they embodied in a code of conduct or other specific document and is the code or document available to the public?

2. In the five years preceding April 1, 1982, were any employees of the department disciplined by way of suspension, dismissal or otherwise for violations of any rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behaviour for departmental employees and, if so, in each case, what was the name of the employee and the date of the disciplinary action?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs does not have a code of conduct per se. The department issued, in 1974, "Instruction on Employee Ethics" covering subjects of: conflict of interest, confidentiality and release of information, public appearances, statements and publishing, acceptance of gifts, entertainment and other forms of hospitality, political activity and employee organization activities. These guidelines are given to every new employee on his/her first day of work and are available to the public upon request.

In addition, the departmental Personnel Management Manual which is readily available to all employees provides information on hours of work, leave, holidays, discipline, termination of employment, and employee performance review and appraisal. Information on standard of conduct is also provided in the Treasury Board Administration Policy Manual for subjects such as contracting for services, travel and removal regulations, etc.

2. The department keeps records of disciplinary measures taken for two years only. To be consistent with the provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act we are not providing names.

The following list indicates all suspensions that have occurred from January 1, 1980 to March 31, 1982. There has been no discharge during that period.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—CODE OF CONDUCT

Question No. 4,261—Mr. Crosby:

1. Does the Department of National Health and Welfare have written rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behavior for employees of the department and, if so, are they embodied in a code of conduct or other specific document and is the code or document available to the public?

2. In the five years preceding April 1, 1982, were any employees of the department disciplined by way of suspension, dismissal or otherwise for violations of any rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behaviour for departmental employees and, if so, in each case, what was the name of the employee and the date of the disciplinary action?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes, written rules are embodied in a document entitled "Conflict of Interest Guidelines", provided to all employees during orientation, and this document is available to the public.

2. In accordance with departmental discipline procedures and the provisions of most collective agreements, records of disciplinary action are destroyed after two years have elapsed since the disciplinary action was taken, provided that no further disciplinary action was recorded during this period.

In view of the above mentioned requirements, departmental records reflect 112 disciplinary sanctions imposed in the five years preceding April 1, 1982.

COMPLAINTS LODGED AGAINST RCMP

Question No. 4,311—Mr. Robinson (Burnaby):

Since September 30, 1979, how many complaints were lodged against the RCMP at its complaints section and how many were (a) disposed of informally (b) found to be substantiated?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Total complaints reported from October 1, 1979 to December 31, 1981 were 5,150.

(a) Out of the 5,150 complaints

(i) 2,708 (53 per cent) were informally resolved. (Informal resolution relates to minor complaints which could be resolved to the satisfaction of the complainant in an informal manner at the local level without conducting a full investigation).

(ii) 2,442 (47 per cent) were formally resolved. (Formal resolution relates to any public complaint of a serious nature including those which could not be informally resolved and therefore required a thorough service and/or criminal investigation).

(b) Out of the 5,150 complaints

(i) 1,075 (21 per cent) were substantiated. The allegations were supported by sufficient evidence and this category includes complaints of a minor as well as those of a serious nature).

(ii) 722 (14 per cent) were unsubstantiated. (There was insufficient evidence to prove or disprove the allegation(s) or the complaint was withdrawn or not proceeded with).

(iii) 3,353 (65 per cent) were unfounded. (The allegation(s) did not occur or the member(s) acted lawfully or properly).

Statistics from January 1, 1982 to May 1, 1982 are not available.

"UNDERSTANDING CANADA"

Question No. 4,390—Mr. Hawkes:

1. Did the Department of External Affairs supply funds at any time to a United States publishing firm to print a book entitled "Understanding Canada" to be used in American universities to encourage the study of Canada and, if so (a) what was the cost (b) what were the names and nationalities of the persons contracted to produce the manuscript and what amount did it cost the Canadian taxpayer for their services?

2. Was a Mr. Norman London, Academic Relations Officer at the Canadian Embassy in Washington, D.C., involved in the project and, if so, what was his function and did he ever receive a grant at any time from any department?

3. Was the Department of External Affairs involved in any transaction at any time to sell the copyright for the book to the Association for Canadian Studies in the United States and, if so (a) for what amount was it sold (b) was any money supplied to the association at any time by any department in the form of grants or gifts?

4. Does the department have any plans to revise and translate the book into foreign languages for an upcoming high school edition and, if so (a) what amount will this venture cost the Canadian taxpayer (b) who authorized such a plan and what were the names of all persons involved in this undertaking?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Department of External Affairs did not supply any funds to a United States publishing firm for the printing of this book. As for the payments made to U.S. academics who were contracted to prepare the manuscript, please see reply to question 4,318 answered June 17, 1982.

2. Mr. London, who joined the staff of the Embassy in August, 1980, has not been involved in this particular project.

3. (a) Please see reply to question 4,318 answered June 17, 1982. (b) The Association for Canadian Studies in the United States receives from time to time grants from the department under the latter's mandate to promote the teaching and research about Canada in institutions of higher learning abroad.

4. No.

[English]

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

[English]

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. First of all, I should like to thank the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council for providing so quickly an answer to a matter which I brought to his attention earlier this week. He did it in one day; that must be a record.

That experience prompts me to ask something else of him. He will undoubtedly be aware that under Section 9 of the Canadian National Railways Act, 1961, respecting the line from Grimshaw to Great Slave Lake, it is a requirement of the government to table in the House the annual financial statements of that company. This is normally done with respect to financial statements from the preceding calendar year either in April, May, or occasionally in June. It is now the end of July, 1982 and the financial statement for 1981 has not yet been tabled. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary would be good enough to look into this matter.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, needless to say, I am intimately familiar with that act and, I will be happy to look into the matter on the hon. member's behalf.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Madam Speaker: As hon. members are aware, there are 18 motions standing on the notice paper at the report stage of Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada.

Motion No. 1, standing in the name of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy), gives the Chair some misgivings as to its procedural acceptability. The long title sets out, in general terms, the purposes of the bill and should be amended only if and when amendments of substance are made to the bill which would necessitate as a consequence changes to that title. For the benefit of the hon. member, I refer him to page 465 of May's which reads in part:

Both the long title and the short title are amended, if amendments to the bill made it necessary.

And not the other way around. This is further substantiated by Citation 780(1) of Beauchesne's which reads as follows:

The title may be amended if the bill has been so altered as to necessitate such an amendment.

Unless the hon. member wishes to present argument on this point later, I intend to rule motion No. 1 as not acceptable.

Motions Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6 and 7 should be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: Motion No. 3 should be voted separately, and a vote on motion No. 5 will also dispose of motions Nos. 2, 6 and 7.

Motion No. 4 should be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 8, 9, 10 and 11 should be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: The question will first be put on motion No. 9 and an affirmative vote on that motion will dispose of motions No. 8, 10 and 11; and a negative vote on motion No. 9 will necessitate the question being put separately on motions Nos. 8, 10 and 11.

Motions Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 should be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: An affirmative vote on motion No. 12 disposes of motion No. 13; a negative vote on motion No. 12 necessitates the question being put on motion No. 13; motion No. 14 should be voted on separately; and an affirmative vote on motion No. 15 disposes of motion No. 16, with a negative vote necessitating the question being put on motion No. 16.

Motions Nos. 17 and 18 should be debated and voted on separately.

Before recognizing the hon. member for Churchill, I should like to say to the House that Bill C-124 was reprinted with an error, that is to say, it was reprinted as it was; it did not include a change which was made subsequently. Clause 6 should read in line 44 at page 5 as follows:

Section 4, be entitled to the merit increases, incremented increases or—

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-124, An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 7 to 11 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"'compensation' means wage rates and benefits directly related thereto, other than pension and paid maternity benefits, but does not include the monetary value of hours of work, leave entitlements, leave for union activities, standards of discipline or any other working conditions;"

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-124, An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended in Clause 2 by adding immediately after line 11 at page 2 the following:

"(3) The following provisions apply, notwithstanding anything in this Part that is inconsistent therewith:

(a) every person referred to in paragraph 3(2)(a) and every research staff member of a political party that is represented in Parliament on the day this Act is assented to shall, as of the day this Act is assented to, be entitled to receive, in lieu of the wage rate to which he would, but for this paragraph, be entitled, a wage rate equal to the product of the wage rate to which that person was entitled on March 31, 1982 and one hundred and six per cent;

(b) wage rates in effect under paragraph (a) shall continue in force for the twelve month period immediately following the day this Act is assented to;

(c) wage rates continued in force under paragraph (b) shall not be increased by more than five per cent for the twelve month period immediately following the period referred to in paragraph (b); and

(d) every compensation plan to which paragraphs (a) to (c) apply shall be extended for a period of twenty-four months from the day this Act is assented to and the terms and conditions of the compensation plan, other than wages rates, shall continue in force without change for the period for which the compensation plan is extended, subject to such changes as the Treasury Board may authorize where it deems it appropriate."

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-124, An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended by striking out Clause 4.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-124, An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 24 to 34 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"four months from the day immediately following the day on which the compensation plan would, but for this section, expire, where no increase in wage rates is to occur under the compensation plan on or after June 29, 1982."

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-124, An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended by striking out Clause 6.

He said: Madam Speaker, I believe you did not call motion No. 4.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is to be voted on separately.

Mr. Murphy: I apologize, Madam Speaker; it was my error.

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Murphy: My error seems to make some people happy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I realize the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) has been recognized, but I should like to interrupt him for a moment and to indicate to hon. members that there are available copies of Madam Speaker's ruling with respect to the various motions. I am not sure whether hon. members have copies of it on their desks.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Then I ask the pages to distribute photocopies of Madam Speaker's ruling in both official languages to hon. members.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in the report stage debate of Bill C-124. I should like to commence my remarks by referring to an article which appeared in yesterday's edition of The Citizen. Of course, I am referring to the fact that the research bureau of the Liberal Party of Canada is starting what it calls "the good news syndrome". The bureau is providing good news to be disseminated by Liberal Members of Parliament and senators across the country in their householders and through other mechanisms, so that people do not realize the current problems facing Canada. This means that the Liberal government will be able to minimize the problems facing Canadians. In other words, to quote Charles Dickens, "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times—". The Liberal government wishes to focus on the best of times so that Canadians will forget the very real problems which they face.

In the newspaper article I found something else which reminded me of Dickens. I am referring to a quotation of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in response to an interview by Mr. Ben Tierney and Aileen McCabe, wherein he said:

> I would reject controls. And I wouldn't allow my PMO to be issuing rumours that they were coming in while I was saying that they weren't. I think that controls wont't work.

Now I should like to turn to what the Leader of the Opposition had to say concerning the budget. He said:

> We are relieved that it is beginning to accept that government spending is a major cause of current economic problems . . . it is a step in the right direction.

Earlier I referred to "A Tale of Two Cities" because in this city we are getting two tales from the Leader of the Opposition. In fact, we have witnessed that same approach during the debate on Bill C-124 and its many amendments which are in front of us at the present time. Conservative members at the end of second reading debate voted, with the exception of one, with the government on this piece of legislation.

• (1220)

In committee the hon. members of the Conservative Party time after time pointed out the very glaring errors that are in this bill, yet they talk about voting for this bill. I have just pointed out that the leader of that party has two completely opposing positions on wage controls. What are we to believe?

In regard to the substance of the amendments that we have before us at this time, we have suggested amending Clause 2, the definition of compensation. Let me quote from motion No. 2:

> 'compensation' means wage rates and benefits directly related thereto, other than pension and paid maternity benefits, but does not include the monetary value of hours of work, leave entitlements, leave for union activities, standards of discipline or any other working conditions;—

The purpose of that specific amendment is to make sure that when this bill is put into force, as I presume the government and the opposition party will make sure this bill is passed, people are still able to negotiate for paid maternity leave; that they are still able to negotiate for pensions which will affect those individuals who will be going on pensions in the near future, not for two years but for the rest of their lives.

We believe that in this particular instance of paid maternity leave and pensions that this government, and hopefully the opposition party who supports the government on this bill, will recognize the very serious problem that would exist in this country if people are prevented from negotiating pension increases and if people are prevented from negotiating paid maternity leave as a result of this clause as it now stands.

The rest of that amendment basically provides that people be able to negotiate on standards of discipline and on other working conditions, and that the monetary value of leave entitlements, leave for union activities, etc., would not be included in the six and five regime that the government wants imposed on this country. So it is an amendment to clarify that compensation is basically the wage rates and the major fiscal benefits of the compensation plan.

With the present definition as proposed by the government we are afraid we could have a situation where the union wants to negotiate for two of their members to be off to investigate health and safety provisions, that these people could be booked off to do this very vital role of making sure that the workplace is safe, that union people are educated about workplace safety and that as few lives as possible are lost, but under the provisions of this bill it is possible that any attempt to negotiate leave provisions would be considered part of the six and five regime. Therefore, workers would lose even the six and five per cent increases allowed under this bill if they wanted to have some of their union representatives working on health and safety.

So this is a very constructive amendment which I hope the government and the official opposition will accept, because if this bill is, in reality, an attempt to keep down wages and hopefully fight inflation through that method, then a definition of this sort is a constructive definition, a definition which would only increase the good working relationships between union and business and union and government in this country and, as I mentioned earlier, to allow for paid maternity benefits without hurting the financial situation of other workers in that same barganing unit.

The position of the government, I understand, is that they will now allow, although I am not sure how they are going to allow—I cannot see that in the amendment they propose—paid maternity benefits, that that can now be negotiated through some mechanism. Again, I am not sure what that mechanism is, because the bill and the government amendments do not clarify what they intend to do to allow for collective negotiations.

If the government does allow for collective negotiations in some manner of speaking, then we do not want to see paid maternity benefits included as part of the 6 per cent and the 5 per cent benefits that workers are entitled to or are restricted to under this legislation. We do not believe that paid maternity leave could only be given if all of the workers are to suffer as a result of that.

We believe it is a benefit which Canadian women are entitled to. It is a motion which we have suggested not only at this stage but at the committee stage. We certainly believe in paid maternity benefits, but we do insist that the government exclude that from the six and five regime.

Other amendments that are proposed by us to be debated at this time include amendments 5, 6 and 7. In amendment 5 we are saying that we strike out Clause 4, and in amendment 6 we are modifying Clause 4 if we do not get our way on motion No. 5.

We do not like Clause 4 for a very major reason. Clause 4 allows the government to break its word with government employees. The government has signed collective agreements for 9 per cent, 10 per cent and 11 per cent increases, not much more, because government workers are getting less money and less increases than those workers in the private sector. But this bill provides that the government can ignore the agreement that it signed with its workers for 9 per cent, 10 per cent or 11 per cent increases, that the government can break those contracts that the government itself negotiated and signed and impose a 6 per cent and 5 per cent regime over a two-year period, despite the fact that the government basically gave its word by signing a collective agreement that people would be entitled to 9 per cent or 10 per cent increases.

Yet this is the same government that says it must not break the agreement it has signed with the provinces and with some oil companies to allow them to have increases of approximately 31 per cent in energy prices over the next 18 months. So on the one hand, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and other ministers of the Crown in this Liberal government have said that they must honour agreements with the provinces, that they must honour agreements with the oil companies; on the other hand, they are saying they have no moral obligation to honour agreements with their own employees.

The government has stated through the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and through this piece of legislation that it wants the co-operation of all sectors of the Canadian economy, including business, the provinces, government workers and private sector workers. How can the government even pretend to expect co-operation when it breaks the collective agreements that it has already signed with its employees, or agreements which Crown corporations like CN have already agreed to with its workers, and when it breaks agreements by way of amendments it introduced in committee that private sector railways have signed with their workers?

Certainly the municipalities, the provinces, small and large businesses and workers generally want to see the government get the Canadian economy back on the right track again. All Canadians, wherever they come from in Canada, want to see the government improve our economic situation which is still in difficulty, despite the good-news bad-news atmosphere the government is now pretending exists. While the government pretends there is good news about economic recovery, it is not so.

I would like to refer to a Gallup Poll which was recently conducted. This poll asked, "Which of the following do you consider to be the best way to cure Canada's economic problems?" The response was that 42 per cent favoured job-creation, 37.1 per cent said lower interest rates, 6.4 per cent indicated greater public controls over investment, and 6.8 per cent said public sector wage controls. In other words, 80 per cent of Canadians believe that job-creation and lower interest rates are the way to solve the problems that we face, while only 6.8 per cent of those polled believe in a program such as that introduced by the government. Canadians do not believe that this program will work, I do not believe it will work, nor do members of my caucus.

One must wonder what the real intent of this bill is. During second reading of this bill I referred to a government document which was leaked to our party over a year ago. In that document from which I quoted it said that wage control programs would be a public relations effort by the government and that these controls would probably not work. It would have the advantage, however, of giving the appearance that the government was concerned about correcting Canada's economic problems.

That facade is what concerns our party about this bill and that is the reason for our proposed amendments. We are concerned that the government is conducting a public relations program which it has admitted in its own document is not likely to work. The government has indicated in its own document that it would be a public relations program which would give the appearance that it is doing something. That is not acceptable. Over 80 per cent of Canadians who want the government to take action on job-creation and lower interest rates do not find this program acceptable.

The government should have been implementing programs for job-creation and lowering interest rates last month instead of having us discuss this during the hot month of July and now into the month of August. It should have introduced some concrete economic planning instead of giving us this public relations job.

As I mentioned earlier, the government has primarily asked under this proposal to be allowed to break its faith with its employees. How can it expect its employees' co-operation under those circumstances? After all the witnesses which the government allowed to appear before the committee, the government then included 36,000 more workers under this proposal as a result of the amendment stage of this bill. While some of the representatives of those workers did appear initially, they were not allowed to appear after the government made that proposal. Initially, only workers in Crown corporations such as CN were affected. Their representatives made some presentations to the committee but when a further 36,000 members of those unions were brought under these controls, the members of the committee did not allow other groups to come back. Not only did the government refuse permission for union representatives to attend and explain how unions under the Canada Labour Code can be included under this bill, but government members on that committee would not allow their own Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) to appear and explain his responsibilities as Minister of Labour to workers under his jurisdiction under the laws of Canada and how they would be affected.

That was the position of the government majority on that committee. That same government majority refused to allow different groups to appear before the committee on ten different occasions. I moved motions asking for the minister responsible for the status of women to be allowed to appear and explain how this bill would affect negotiations on issues of concern to women and how it would affect the large wage disparity between the basic group of women workers and the top echelon which is primarily composed of males. The minister responsible for the status of women met with the national action committee on the status of women who told her that they were concerned about some major problems inherent in this bill. However, nothing came of those representations. The minister responsible for the status of women should have been invited to attend before the committee to explain some of the difficulties with this bill, but the Liberal majority on the committee would not permit it.

Mr. Ian Sinclair, head of the private sector six and five community, who is president of Canadian Pacific, has now had his workers affected by these provisions with the good graces of the government. Those workers are now on a mandatory program of 6 per cent and 5 per cent, with the blessings of the government. The Liberal government has paid off Mr. Sinclair quite royally. He is now preaching the gospel of this crusade. He is receiving the attention of the press as he explains why everyone should have a voluntary 6 and 5 program. Immediately after Mr. Sinclair endorsed that program, the government placed CP workers under the mandatory provisions of this bill. This bill is entitled "An act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada". The government has now included the private sector and Mr. Sinclair has benefited from it as a result.

• (1240)

We believe that that person who met with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), and a number of their cabinet colleagues, to convince them that this program, which is necessary in his eyes and to his pocketbook, will perform a great public service in relation to the six and five rule. That person should have been invited to speak to the committee to explain why the six and five program would work, why all the private sector companies would allow it to work and how they would participate. But again, the Liberal majority defeated the motion by the New Democratic Party to have Mr. Sinclair appear before the committee.

Bell Canada has said that it will not go along with restricting its prices to 6 per cent and 5 per cent, although it has already restricted the wages of its middle management workers. If Bell Canada is to restrict its wages but refuses to restrict its prices and instead asks for a 25 per cent increase in the telephone rates in the province where it operates, its president, Mr. de Grandpré, who earns $650,000 a year, should appear before the committee to explain why he was quoted a saying he wanted mandatory wage controls for the public sector after meeting with the Prime Minister. He does not want price controls for his own company, but he wants to be able to lower the wages of his own employees. However, he does not want to lower his own wage of $650,000 a year. Again, the Liberal majority on that committee would not allow such witnesses to appear. I will not go through the list. I did mention earlier that I moved motions relating to ten different groups, including the Public Service Commission, the Business Council on National Issues, which of course took credit for suggesting this program to the government, the Letter Carriers Union of Canada, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the National Union of Provincial Government Employees. We requested that all those groups be asked to appear, both those in business and in labour, to explain their positions.

It is interesting that the government has suggested that this program would set guidelines for the crusade, that the government would put in wage controls on the public sector, that it wanted the provinces and the private sector to follow suit, and wanted the unions to accept them, but would not even let the representatives of the National Union of Provincial Government Employees come forward to discuss the bill. If this bill is really more than a PR program, as the government would call it, and if it is really the hallmark of the crusade, as the President of the Treasury Board calls it, and if it is to be followed in other sectors of Canada, then we should have been allowed to hear from the representatives of the groups which are supposed to join in, if not with enthusiasm, at least with co-operation.

We will not be voting for the bill. We suggested that a number of clauses be deleted from the bill. We have also proposed amendments to improve the bill, about which I will be speaking later. Although we oppose the bill and will vote against it, we believe it is our responsibility, as Members of Parliament, to try to take away some of the very harsh provisions contained in the bill. If we do not succeed in doing that, we have an equal responsibility to try to modify the legislation so that people can negotiate for pension increases.

As I have said earlier, if one cannot negotiate pension increases now, or if one is restricted to 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases in one's salary, a person who retires at the end of the two-year period will not only suffer for two years, but for the rest of his life. Inflation may increase by 10 per cent, 11 per cent or 12 per cent over the next 15 to 20 years. We do not like it and we certainly wish it were not true, but it may happen. If workers' wages increase by only 6 per cent and 5 per cent because of the provisions of the bill and the decisions of the government, if they cannot negotiate better pension plans, as there are areas which are fairly weak or have some substantial holes in them at the present time, then these people will be punished for longer than two years. If they join in the government's crusade over the next two years, they will make a sacrifice for the rest of their lives, a sacrifice which they will never be able to overcome because of the way in which the bill is presented. Our caucus has proposed amendments to ensure that pensions can be negotiated and that the pensions of those who are approaching retirement age will be calculated as if their wages had risen with the cost of living and not merely by 6 per cent, because we know that the cost of living will rise much more than 6 per cent.

We have also proposed amendments dealing with maternity leave. That is not a matter which should be included in the six and five program, but it should be a basic human right to help women workers and their families achieve some equality and to provide more hope in the workplace.

We will be speaking again to the various specific amendments which are before us, but I am worried about the whole purpose of the bill since the government has stated that it is a bill which is basically a public relations program. We are worried that the government, despite yesterday's announcement, will really not allow for collective bargaining because, according to the President of the Treasury Board, the motion to provide collective bargaining and negotiation to proceed in some rational manner basically states that the government will determine whether or not it will exempt certain groups of employees from the provisions, of the act.

I do not know how the government can pretend that that type of amending clause will allow workers the right to negotiate. That clause would seem to indicate that the government, in its benign, so-called wisdom, will determine whether or not the workers in certain unions, such as CN, may negotiate with their employers. It will also decide whether or not workers in any of the other Crown corporations may negotiate with their employers. It will decide whether or not government workers can negotiate with the government. To be quite honest, that is not a power which should be entrusted to this government.

The whole purpose of passing legislation in the House of Commons is to ensure that rights are clearly spelled out. I am not talking about rights of government. I am talking about the rights of unions and companies. If the government really wants negotiations to proceed in some normal pattern, and even if it wants to keep the 6 and 5 per cent limitations in place—and we do not like those limits—and allow for collective bargaining on either monetary or non-monetary items, it should say that in this bill.

Do not just give us a namby-pamby amendment which says that the government, if it so chooses, will decide whether you can negotiate. That is not restoring collective bargaining. That does not let unions, individuals and companies retain the rights and obligations they presently have under the Canada labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The great Liberal so-called amendment to restore negotiations and collective bargaining is nothing but a refinement of this public relations job. Every so often the government throws in the towel on one amendment or another, an amendment to this clause or that clause. There is a string attached to that towel, because it comes right back to the government as soon as you look at the details of what the government has done.

There has been great press throughout the country yesterday and today saying, "Good, the government will let people negotiate again; isn't that wonderful?" The government has finally seen the wisdom of members of the New Democratic Party and some members of the Conservative Party, not all of course. We are not sure where the Leader of the Opposition stands; he is on both sides as usual.

There has been great press, great public relations for the government, but then you look at the amendment. When you look at the clause you find there is nothing there. It is strictly up to the government to decide who can negotiate and who cannot. It does not even say on what grounds the government made that decision. I presume that if it is a union which supports the Liberal Party, it will have a better chance of being able to negotiate. If it is a company which supports the Liberal government, I suspect the workers will not get the right to negotiate. Fifty thousands dollars a year can buy a lot of support from that party and that government.

Even if I was not cynical, and I must admit that I am, I believe the problem is that the government has no real commitment to negotiate. This government has no real understanding of workers' rights, no real appreciation of the fact that for the vast majority of collective agreements in this country there has been a peaceful resolution through the negotiation process. This government is cynical. The minister responsible for this bill has a history of union-bashing. He has appeared in front of all sorts of groups, basically business groups such as the Conference Board, saying you cannot allow designations, that the government must have more power to designate.

The minister has gone in front of the Conference Board and said that all levels of government—and I quoted him in committee—have been too soft on the unions and it is time we did something about it. He certainly did do something about it. The minister, his fellow ministers in cabinet and Liberal backbenchers had better not pretend that this is a bill to solve the economic problems of Canada, because that is not true. The Leader of the Opposition had better not say that this is a step in the right direction one day and the next day reject controls because he does not think they will work. He and the members of his party had better not pretend that this program is going to solve the economic conditions that Canadians face. The cabinet, the President of the Treasury Board, Liberal backbenchers and the vast majority of the Conservative Party had better not pretend in their speeches or in their votes in this House that they are out to solve the problems of Canada. They are out to assist some members of the Liberal cabinet and some senior officials in the Liberal back rooms. They are out to ensure that the public relations job sells.

I hope that the Conservative critics, and I see all three in the chamber, will speak about the real problems with this bill. I hope that they will convince their leader to speak out of only one side of his mouth for the next few days. If the three members here cannot convince their caucus, I hope that they can convince their members that this bill is a PR job and that the Conservative Party is being sucked into that PR job. It is doing a wonderful job of convincing Canadians that this is a Liberal-Conservative coalition. It is out to bash workers, to break collective agreements that this government has already signed. It wants to outlaw collective bargaining in this country. That is what is happening.

I hope that in the next few days, instead of introducing amendments which are a PR job, that do not give the right to negotiate and do not allow real increases or benefits for pregnant women, this government will reject the PR approach. I hope it will look at the 80 per cent of Canadians who believe that job creation and lower interest rates are the way to solve the problems that Canada faces.

That is what Canadians believe, our leader believes and our caucus believes. Only 6.8 per cent of Canadians believe that the program which the government and the official opposition are supporting will work. They want something to solve the economic problems that Canada faces. They want to see this government do something concrete, not just another PR job.

That is why we sat here throughout July after the government introduced this bill at the end of June, and will be sitting here some time into August. It it because this bill is not only unfair and allows the government to break its word with its workers, but it will do nothing to help Canadians pay their mortgages. It will not help Canadians keep their small businesses. It will not help those Canadians who have to leave the resource communities in northern Canada because they have lost their jobs or their homes. It will not improve the economic situation or solve the personal hardships faced by Canadians.

That is the reality of this bill. That is why we cannot support it and will do everything we can to make sure the bill does not pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair will obviously recognize the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), but it is one minute to one. He might want to start his remarks at two o'clock, rather than now.

Mr. Johnston: I will call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the House rose at one o'clock the hon. President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) was about to rise and cut my salary! Over the lunch hour I gave some consideration to what might be done about that, but in recognition of the impartiality of the Chair and with some misgivings, the Chair again recognizes the minister.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the amendments to Bill C-124 which were grouped by the Speaker and ruled upon earlier. I listened with interest to the comments of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) who, I suggest, restated much of what we heard in committee.

I should like to speak briefly to one point that he made, however. He emphasized and re-emphasized that in his opinion and in the opinion of his caucus and party, the program would not work. I should like infer from that that if he thought the program would work, he would support it. We on this side of the House and I believe many members on the other side believe that this program will work. Not only do we believe it will work, but we are dedicated to making it work. That is the spirit I should like to see among our friends in the New Democratic Party.

The hon. member also made a few cynical remarks—perhaps they were not cynical—about some of the major companies such as CPR and others, which I find difficult to accept when we know full well the liaison that exists between that party and Mr. McDermott. I should like to hear from the hon. member for Churchill and from Mr. McDermott. I should like to know what the hon. member for Churchill thinks about this program. I should like him to stand up before some of his constituents and explain why it is necessary that this program work in the interests of all Canadians.

Not only do I say that we are convinced the program will work, but clearly it is already working. I have seen a list, which I do not have with me, of company after company after company which has said it is going to abide by the program, I have been the reaction of other provincial Premiers. I have seen what happened in British Columbia just this week, and so has the hon. member for Churchill. We have seen what happened in New Brunswick. We have even seen the statements of some union leaders who have been supportive of a restraint package of this kind.

Bill C-124 is intended to provide compensation restraint mainly in that part of the economy directly under the control of the Government of Canada, either in its capacity as employer or in its capacity as owner. Such a measure recognizes the need to exercise restraint in a time of considerable fiscal difficulty. More importantly, it recognizes the need to provide a strong, clear signal to the economy in general that this element of our cost structure must be restrained. It must be restrained if we are to reduce inflation and maintain our competitive trade advantage.

Bill C-124 is a very serious measure placed before the House by the government only after considerable and thorough deliberation. It is a measure designed to restrain compensation only in those organizations to which it applies.

• (1410)

At the same time, as I will point out in the course of these brief remarks, it is not a one-sided measure. Bill C-124 will limit compensation increases over the two years of its application, yet it does contain provisions allowing wage rate increases to take place. It does restrict bargaining and the right to strike; however, except for parliamentarians and some others who will be affected by an amendment which I will be moving, it does not reduce wage rates or take away terms and conditions already in place on June 29, 1982. It goes further by ensuring that those terms and conditions which were freely arrived at between the parties through the collective bargaining system will be continued, thereby ensuring the continuing functioning during the course of the program of many important aspects of union-management relationships.

During the course of the examination of the bill in the House, during the proceedings before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and as a result of representations by both labour and management, several important changes have been proposed which would improve the functioning of the bill. I would like to take this opportunity to thank all those who have made representations to us, and I include members of this chamber. They have been particularly valuable in formulating proposals for changes to the bill. I would particularly like to commend the members of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and its chairman, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), for their diligent, thorough and expeditious examination of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: In the course of various exchanges, Mr. Speaker, much has been made of those provisions of Bill C-124 which restrain collective bargaining during the term of its application. In response to that we introduced at committee stage an amendment to Clause 7 which provides that the parties to a collective agreement may amend the non-monetary terms of that agreement by mutual consent. This will allow the parties to make changes to such important areas as safety and health, grievance procedures, and so on; any non-monetary items which may be desirable to change during the course of the program.

The bill does restrict collective bargaining during the course of its application, but even such an august body as the International Labour Organization has recognized the necessity to do so under certain circumstances. In ILO Principles, Standards and Procedures concerning Freedom of Association, (ILO Geneva-77), at page 15 the following statement is made:

—the (ILO) supervisory bodies have not ignored the serious problems that may arise in certain circumstances in the economic field, and they have accordingly stated that it would be difficult to lay down an absolute rule concerning voluntary collective bargaining because, under certain circumstances, governments might feel that the economic position of their countries called at certain times for stabilization measures during the application of which it would not be possible for wage rates to be fixed freely through the medium of collective bargaining. Nevertheless, any such restriction should be imposed as an exceptional measure and only to the extent that is necessary, without exceeding a reasonable period, and it should be accompanied by adequate safeguards to protect worker's living standards.

Bill C-124, Mr. Speaker, when tested against that statement of the ILO, meets all of those conditions. It is being imposed as an exceptional measure. The restrictions imposed are only to the extent necessitated by the economy. The program has a two-year definite term of application and contains safeguards to protect workers' living standards and to maintain other important terms and conditions. The bill is an extraordinary measure necessitated by the extraordinary times in which we find ourselves, but it ensures a return to normal practices.

Suspension of the right to strike has been strongly criticized. Such criticism comes at a time when Canada has had for many years a very high rate of days lost due to strikes. For each of the last four years, man-days lost due to strikes have exceeded 825 per 1,000 employees. This places us in the unenviable position of being among the world leaders in this regard. Canada's rate was more than twice that of the United States in the years 1979 and 1980. This is taking place at a time when productivity is seriously low. Curiously, even today we see strikes taking place in industries which can ill afford them; strikes taking place where work is available but the strike itself is restricting activity; strikes taking place where there is and can be little economic benefit to the employees engaged in the strike.

Both myself and all other members of this party and this government, Mr. Speaker, recognize the importance of the right of employees to withdraw their services in our labour relations system. However, in listening to the criticism levied against this aspect of Bill C-124, it is almost as if the right to strike has become the raison d'être of labour relations in this country. I suggest to this House, Mr. Speaker, that surely employer-employee relations have a higher purpose.

Bill C-124 already imposes strict restrictions on the process of collective bargaining, and some are promoting a form of compulsory arbitration in this bill. Those who promote that notion are in reality suggesting that in addition to those restrictions, with which they profess to agree in terms of restraint, we should further impose on the system a process of compulsory arbitration. Such an imposition would apply to corporations and unions where it does not now exist and where it is regarded with considerable disdain by both unions and management. Not only that, the proposals, such as one we will be looking at, would impose arbitration of items which are not even subject to arbitration under the relevant provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

It would be ideal, Mr. Speaker, if we Canadians as a people were prepared to restrict our demands for wage rate increases to levels compatible with increases in productivity in this country. That has not happened. We hear the NDP saying: "Let us continue collective bargaining. You, government, set the limits on wage rate increases if, in your judgment, they are needed". Labour says: "Don't ask us to agree to them." Some members of this House, including members opposite, have said: "Yes, we can agree with the need for restraint. We can even agree with the limitations proposed in Bill C-124. But at the same time we should allow free collective bargaining to take place within those limitations".

Mr. Speaker, we have determined the limits; Bill C-124 provides that. Already it is providing a positive example to other sector right across this country. By the amendment to Clause 7 introduced at committee stage we have provided that parties to collective agreements may amend non-monetary terms and conditions of their collective agreements. This obviously allows for collective bargaining in those areas. It is limited, to be sure, but some collective bargaining in these very important areas of health, safety and others can take place.

A further amendment which we will be looking at, Mr. Speaker, will introduce possibilities with respect to collective bargaining under this program, and I will deal with that amendment at some length when the time comes for debate on that particular clause. At least, I hope I will have that opportunity. I see the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), and I was heartened to see her comments to the effect that this is an amendment which should help workers at the lower end of the wage scale. She is also quoted as saying:

—I think it will give much more equity within the six-five limit.

It certainly gives the union the opportunity to bargain on behalf of their employees. It restores that aspect of collective bargaining and that's what we wanted.

She is quoted as going on to say:

—the amendment could allow lower-paid workers above-ceiling increases if others within their bargaining group accept lower raises.

Generally speaking, I am pleased that the hon. member has adopted a positive approach towards the amendments we have tabled. The provisions contained in this bill set limits, and within those limits employers and employees have the right to bargain and the government has the right to release them from the application of the law. But as I say, we will be addressing that particular amendment in due course.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I urge all members of this House to support the overall thrust of this bill and to recognize the extent to which collective bargaining is being preserved and protected by the amendments which have been introduced.

• (1420)

In this group of amendments which we are presently considering is motion No. 3. I must say that it is with some regret that I have proposed this amendment, which was in response to repeated requests and admonishments from the Conservative Party, more particularly from the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Going back several weeks, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said that ministerial staff should be singled out for a particular kind of treatment, which is discriminatory, because they alone, of all political appointees, would be subject to this kind of treatment. The treatment would have the effect of putting them under the program at a time when no other groups in comparable circumstances would go under the program.

I pointed out in this House and I pointed out in committee that ministerial staff received a wage rate increase—we do not know what individuals received—determined at 10 per cent in a decision of the Treasury Board on May 13. Their year runs from April 1 to March 31. They go into the six per cent and five per cent program, as the law is presently drafted, in the spring of next year, as every other group does. But the group with which they work and who are members of the parliamentary precinct in ministers' offices are, of course, parliamentary staff, also all political appointees, staff of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), staff of the Tory research bureau, staff of the NDP research bureau and the staff of Liberal Party research bureau.

Mr. Deans: We do not want you to do it, so don't include us in it.

Mr. Johnston: All of these people are part of this major component. The latter group received a wage increase of 11 per cent. I did not hear the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton say much about that. Nevertheless, when questioned on that subject with respect to an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton before the committee earlier this week, I said that I would be prepared to look at a fair amendment, fair in the sense that it would treat everybody in the same circumstances the same way.

Mr. Deans: This is not fair, Don.

Mr. Johnston: This amendment has been put forward to treat everybody in the same circumstances in the same way. Unfortunately, that way will require a rollback to 6 per cent for that entire group of employees, in the same manner that Members of Parliament, ministers and senators have, in effect, been rolled back.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Johnston: If the proposed amendment is adopted, it will come into effect at the time this bill receives assent. Political appointees under this amendment will be treated the same way. It is not only the logical extension of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is worse if you know what you are saying.

Mr. Johnston: —it is a necessary corollary of what the hon. member has put forward.

I also take this opportunity to inform the House that there have been consultations among the representatives of the parties and that it has not been possible to reach any agreement under the provisions at the report stage and third reading stage of Bill C-124, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada.

Mr. Deans: It isn't any wonder. You keep changing the bill. It is not even the same bill that you brought in.

Mr. Johnston: Therefore, I wish to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that at the next sitting of the House I shall propose a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 75C, to allocate one sitting day to each of the said stages of the said bill.

Mr. Murphy: A holiday rush again.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to the first matter in which my name was used in the House with respect to the authorship of motion No. 3. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I want to tell my dear friend, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), that I have heard cheap shots before and I have heard viciousness before, but when it is laced with untruthfulness it becomes intolerable.

I have to say to the minister that he had better read motion No. 3 again. When he reads motion No. 3 again he will find that what the government has done to the staff of Members of Parliament, who are employees of the House of Commons, is not to equate them with Members of Parliament; it is, in fact, to make their situation different and less, in quantitative terms, than that of Members of Parliament. I do not have the figures with me, but we have worked at those figures and I know that is true.

I want the House to know, I want the employees of the House to know and I want the public to know what the situation is. The position of this party has been, is and will be that the staff of Members of the House of Commons, and ministerial staff were to be treated equally with the public service, that staff of Members of the House of Commons and ministerial staff were not to be treated differently.

This amendment—and I ask members of the House of Commons to read it—treats the staff of the House of Commons differently. In fact, it puts them on a rate term comparison in a position inferior to the staff of Members of Parliament. I want my friends to go to their offices and explain that to their staff later on. When it is explained to their staff, I want them to show the staff motion No. 3 and that it stands in the name of the President of the Treasury Board, who has tried to make a cheap political point on the backs of the staff of the Members of the House of Commons.

That is what I want to tell him. It is the Johnston amendment. It is the cheap Johnston amendment that is at stake here; let us make no mistake about it. I hope that the President of the Treasury Board before this debate is over will have the guts, the integrity and the intestinal fortitude to admit that he made a fool of himself. He has used hardworking people in this House of Commons to make a cheap political point and I hope that he will withdraw that stupidity and inequity from the statute books of this country. That is what I want him to do. I hope that the backbenchers of his own party will realize what it is.

The Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) has the figures in front of him now. They were given to him by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie). I hope he will join in a request to remove an inequity.

Mr. Fleming: The inequity started with your amendment.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want to turn to the bill at hand. I am sorry the debate had to start off on that foot. This debate and the problems facing the country have, I think, been dealt with in this House of Commons with a reasonably equal hand on those counts. I believe that most Canadians are worried to death about the situation in which the country finds itself. Most Canadians are not interested in cheap political shots at the expense of the country or the people in it. Most Canadians do not want to see particular groups of people penalized and certainly they do not want to see groups within groups doubly penalized.

That is the view of most Canadians. They are worried about the country. As they worry about the country, they are joined by others who have commented on how we got to this state. The C.D. Howe Institute, in its blistering commentary a few days ago, reported:

> Canada's primary problem has been mismanagement of its economic affairs since the early 1970s by its federal leadership.

This commentary says that Canada may well have reached a point where it is impossible for its leaders to secure the co-operation needed to make a positive response to the country's economic predicament.

• (1430)

When the minister says that people believe or hope that this program will work—and even those who say it will not work hope it will work—I say that whether we believe or hope the program will work, it must work if we are to advance ourselves. Therefore, it has to be given an opportunity to work. Public servants are no different from anyone else. When it comes to belief in their country, they are not second-class citizens. Public servants as a group are prepared to participate in what the minister called a crusade a week or so ago. I say to government members that when they say that, they do not want to look over their shoulders and see the empty ranks behind them.

This is why I asked a question today in the House of Commons about what the government intends to do in its relationship with the provinces in terms of ever-increasing rents which tenants will have to pay while salaries become limited. This is why the meeting with municipal mayors yesterday was important. Every segment of society will have to join in if it is to work, not for the government, but for the country. That is the position which this party takes as we enter this debate. People are hoping against hope that it will work. That is the important aspect.

Let me deal with another matter which I think is important to us, important to the country, important to peace and important to establishing a basis for understanding in Canada. One thing which concerned me about Bill C-124 when it came out was its absolute assault on the collective bargaining process. There are some people in Canada who look upon that process as having only one ending; it can only end in a strike. Well, it does not always end in a strike. An interesting thing about public service bargaining is that there is a choice. These employees have an opportunity to choose the arbitration route or the conciliation-strike route. The statistics indicate that it is still the arbitration route which the largest number of public servants chooses to go because they want their disputes settled, and they want them settled peacefully. No one likes these things hanging over their heads. But I worry about a trend of more and more choosing the conciliation-strike route because of some narrowness in the grounds upon which matters can be arbitrated.

What worried me about Bill C-124 was that there seemed to be a fear on the part of the government that public servants were salivating in anticipation of going out on strike. That is not the case at all. I thought Bill C-124 was an assault on collective bargaining, but the minister and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) are correct that, after hearing the evidence from all sources which came before the committee and after hearing the pleas of members of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, so admirably chaired by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), the government decided to relent and give some flexibility.

What concerns us about the flexibility is that it is still within the right of government to say whether or not any discussions can begin at all. I do not think that is fair, balanced or reasonable. This is why there appears on the Order Paper an amendment in the name of the hon. member for Rosedale which we will discuss in detail a little later. It would preserve the right to bargain collectively for monetary and non-monetary issues. It would ensure that whatever the result of that bargaining would be, the costs thereof would not exceed 6 per cent in one year or 5 per cent in the other, to give effect to the question of restraint.

It would allow, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) worried about the other day in the House, some flexibility so that there could be some adjustments between lower and higher incomes of people within the Public Service of Canada. But our amendment goes a step further. It says that it is not enough just to make a statement about it, that there ought to be some way in which a dispute could be resolved. It says that of course there should be no strike within the period of two years. Of course there should not be. I do not think Canadians would tolerate it; they certainly would not like it. I think a large part of the public service would not like it either. There must be some way in which disputes can be resolved, so it provides a system of compulsory arbitration to settle within the cap of 6 and 5 per cent and to allow that flexibility.

It is important that the House, in the course of its deliberations, look carefully at the amendment. It will guarantee where essential—because everyone talks about essential services—that the services carry on and not be stopped by frustrations which build up from time to time in legitimate labour-management relations. It will guarantee, even in areas which are considered by some to be non-essential, that disputes will be settled. I believe it is important that disputes be settled.

The most striking testimony which the committee heard was that of Dr. Carl Beigie of the C.D. Howe Institute. He arrested members of the committee, not only by painting the depths of the problems faced by the country, but also in terms of their attitude toward the bill, by the faith and conviction which he had in the strength of the country and its people. He did not make any excuse for bad government, but he said that in a country which has suffered under bad leadership something had to be done. He believed that there was sufficient strength in the Canadian people that they were prepared to rally around such an attempt.

He also said something that was important from the point of view of the people who are subject to Bill C-124. He said that it was unnecessary for the government to do away with collective bargaining. Collective bargaining just does not mean that an employee make a request of an employer, and that the employer can decide whether or not the request will be granted or whether the request will even be entertained. Collective bargaining means a discussion in good faith, hopefully leading to resolution. In the context of our amendment, it also means that in the event there is no absolute resolution—and recognizing the necessity the 6 per cent and 5 per cent, which for the purposes of this bill we are not debating—there can be some resolution of the difficulties.

I urge upon my colleagues in the House that in the long term, if the program works—and God knows everyone hopes it will work—it will result in a much better atmosphere and will not leave a residue of resentment behind it. This program not only covers, public servants under the authority and jurisdiction of the President of the Treasury Board, but it covers employees of Crown corporations and employees of private companies for the first time. That is a venture-out which none of us want to have go awry. All of us want to have available the ways to resolve difficulties.

It is important not just to make a statement that collective bargaining is a good thing, but for the House to demonstrate by the way it handles the debate and votes on the amendment that collective bargaining is a good thing, and that appropriate settlement of disputes can take place under this bill. The amendment that we have put forward in the best of faith, I believe, is one way that can be accomplished with the compulsory arbitration aspect with respect to any disputes.

• (1440)

I think I have placed the position of our party fairly and squarely before the House. There is going to be further debate on many of these amendments. The position of the party is that we must begin the process of restraint. We hope others will follow the lead that is going to be taken by the public service. The public service is unhappy that its members are in the vanguard; they are prepared to accept that they are in the vanguard, but they want to make sure that some others come along too. The government has a duty to those they ask to lead to ensure that others do come along too.

As Dr. Beigie said in the course of his testimony, this is not something to save the government; this is not something to save the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—God knows he should have gone long ago; this is something to begin the process of saving the country.

That is the approach. We hope it works, but that is the approach this government has chosen and time will tell whether they are successful or not.

In any event, Sir, I ask the government to consider the amendments with respect to collective bargaining and the fairness of the position they have taken with respect to the staff of Members of Parliament and ministerial staff, because I think that is a gross indecency that they have committed.

I want the government to know that we are watching, that Canada is watching, the public service is watching; and looking over their shoulders to make sure that others have followed. Because if they have not, then this program will have failed.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-124 and specifically Clauses 2, 4, 5 and 7. I want to start off, if I may, by referring to a letter that I wrote to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) with regard to the budget that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) was so pleased to announce that British Columbia is bringing in. I would like the people to know the hardships that it has created, so I am going to refer to part of a letter that I wrote on May 31, 1982:

I am writing to express my concern over recent events at one of the hospitals in my constituency. Because of the recent budget in the Province of British Columbia, the Cranbrook and District Hospital has been forced to lay off 35 full and part time employees. This will mean the loss of 20 acute care beds and four staff positions, with the loss of no beds, in the extended care area.

Prior to British Columbia's April budget the acute care area of the hospital was already being used at 113 per cent of capacity. In the extended care area, these cuts will leave only 30 staff in total for 50 patients.

Those are the kinds of ramifications that come about when limits are put on the kinds of services that must be provided. I want to say to the members of the Conservative Party and to the members of the Liberal Party, the government, that while they may feel that this has tremendous effects and could have some ramifications towards bringing the economy back, it is going to have some very, very serious effects on social programs and on labour relations in Canada.

I want to refer to that a little bit also, Mr. Speaker. We were forced out of this House by closure so as to bring the bill into committee. This bill sat in committee for exactly one week and one day for debate and for witnesses to come forward. There was a lot of input that came forward, but when specific changes are being made that are going to affect Part III, Part IV and Part V of the Canada Labour Code, I believe it is important that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) come before that committee. I insisted so at the committee, I insisted so when the motion was made, and I insisted so after the motion was made that they continue on with clause by clause study.

What did the government do? They put the Minister of Labour under wraps; they sent him away and hid him. they did not want to have his officers come before that committee, the mediation officers, the labour relations officers, to be questioned. But the minister must be questioned if we are to have some kind of peace and order across Canada. You do not just automatically take free collective bargaining rights away from over half a million people and designate them individually. It is not only deceitful, it is cruel and unfair. Before that was done the Minister of Labour should have come to the committee. His department head should have been there and we should have been discussing the kinds of problems that we are going to face across Canada.

Another minister who should have been before that committee is the minister in charge of the affirmative action program. Much has been said in this House with regard to equality for women and increasing their opportunities in the workplace. In fact, the Minister of Labour and the minister responsible for the status of women stated in Toronto less than two months ago that if the private sector did not start to recognize the problems with regard to women in the workplace, they may have to look at compulsion in this area.

This bill is poorly drafted. It has taken away whatever opportunities these people would have had to try to upgrade facilities and bring about some of the much needed changes that would bring about equality in the workplace, that would have given some sort of fair bargaining process.

I want to talk for a moment about the employees of the Members of the House of Commons. They do not belong to a union. They cannot belong to a union in the House. They are not protected in any way. Many of their salaries are low, and for this government to single them out I think is morally wrong and something should be done about it.

The bill was poorly and hastily drafted. I am almost certain that there was virtually no input from the Department of Labour or the Minister of Labour, or he would have been before that committee and given us some reasons for what they are trying to do.

Ian Sinclair, the chairman of CP Investments, is heading a committee of businessmen and expounding the virtues of the wage control program. I want to say as a member of this House that we have watched Ian Sinclair manipulate his company. We saw the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) dance to his tune when they wanted to take some of the railway systems off. We saw the government take over responsibility for the losing operation of VIA Rail. I have seen the estimates and the costs produced. They are not satisfied to present a bill for 12 months of the year of their operation. They submit an extra billing; 13 months they charge, and they show their extra billing on that thirteenth month bill. Is Mr. Sinclair prepared to withdraw charges like that in the interest of restoring the economy?

We now have the President of the Treasury Board dancing to Mr. Sinclair's tune and including his company under the guidelines. That is quite an award to give the chairman of CP Investments. He no longer has to worry about bargaining for the next two years. In fact, there will be rollbacks which will provide him with large sums of money which had previously been committed. The effect of this bill is to steal money from the pockets of Canadian workers to pay for the mismanagement of this government.

This summer, or early this fall, it will be the time for the Minister of Transport to dance to the tune when Ian Sinclair comes forward to ask for changes to the Crowsnest agreement. It will then be the farmers' turn to pay the price. We can see it coming. It will come as sure as we are standing in this House. But we will be here to defend them and to examine the company's activities, which has received taxation agreements which will prolong its tax schemes. The company has received grants from the government. The government has the gall to have him head a committee without ever having the opportunity to bring him before the committee so that we could question him on his views. This is an example of what is happening in our country, and I say it is deceitful for the government to be telling Canadians that it will designate over 500,000 people in Canada to have their wages controlled in order to bring down inflation.

I would like to refer to a statement made by a former President of the United States, Mr. Carter. Two years ago, after announcing civil service pay increases, Mr. Carter said: "A President must balance economic consideration against the fact that federal employees face the same kind of problem with inflation as other citizens. In doing so, I have concluded that the dedication of these loyal public servants deserves no less relief than we would allow for other workers."

Surely our governments must recognize that civil servants are falling behind and have been falling behind for years. To attack civil servants and make them scapegoats for a new economic policy of the Government of Canada is morally wrong and unfair.

I would like to say a few words about the long-term employees who have paid into a pension scheme. Their pensions will generally be based on the average of their salaries for the last five years. This means that someone aged 63 who will possibly be receiving a pension in the next two or three years will, as a result of these guidelines, only receive wage increases to the extent dictated by the government. This employee will receive a pension for all of his pension years based on his average salary over the last five years. When he leaves the workforce he will be spending the rest of his life living on a pension which was determined by this government's restraint bill. That is an example of the unfairness which has been caused by the government and the hardship it will create.

The railway system in our country is essential. An essential part of the system has workers working hundreds of miles away from their homes. These workers must be able to enjoy a labour relationship based on co-operation. If that co-operation and confidence does not exist, the result is a confrontation between the workers and management. The Canadian government does not need that confrontation now. We need co-operation between businesses, workers and all levels of government. This cannot be achieved with the confrontation attitudes of this bill.

This bill was hastily drafted. From what I have read in the bill, I suggest it will do nothing to bring down inflation. For years the President of the Treasury Board has been attempting to smash the public sector trade union movement. He has been trying to remove the very few bargaining rights that the unions have and destroy the very system they have to try to improve their lot. We have heard about what happens to union members when they step out of line. They are fired with virtually no chance to come back. Many employees have no trade union behind them to do their bargaining because the government has disallowed it. For example, I have seen members of the janitorial service in the House of Commons, who have worked as long as 12 years, being banished to the basement for some time because they did not toe the line of the administration. Shame on the Government of Canada to allow incidents like that to happen. Shame on the government for attempting to push through the House in less than a week a bill which will directly affect more than half a million workers across Canada.

The government did not allow the Minister of Labour or any other ministers to come before the committee. This Liberal government is one of the most blatant dictatorships of any government this country has ever had. We will have to live with it.

For a moment I would like to talk about the Conservative party. How can it be so conciliatory? I cannot understand why the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) would meet with railway workers in advance to say that they will express their concerns and attempt to have them dealt with in the bill. All that has happened is that CP workers have been added to the misery of other workers. Those Conservative members have also played the tune of Ian Sinclair. The corporate elite has reached those members and has told the Conservative Party to get into line and follow the attitude of the corporate elite. That is what is happening.

The workers do not have an opportunity to defend themselves. They have not had an opportunity to explain what hardships they are facing. Less than a year ago, 70,000 workers came to Ottawa to demonstrate against the high interest rate policy and show what it is doing to them. Many of these workers cannot make their payments now and will be facing renewed mortgages at increased rates. When these new expenditures take place these workers will be held to a 6 per cent increase. If they are unable to make their payments now they will not be able to do so under these guidelines unless the government takes quick action to reduce interest rates to a more acceptable level. This is particularly true of those who are paying mortgages and trying to keep their homes.

A small businessman in my riding approached me to tell me of the problems he was facing due to the inventory of stock remaining on his shelves. Small businesses are having difficulty staying in business and others are going bankrupt. According to the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the government will take over $500 million out of the pockets of consumers. Will this create new jobs?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Parker: Show me how. We have already been told that the government would have received 20 per cent more revenue in the form of income tax had it not cut wages. One and a half million unemployed are drawing unemployment benefits. Is there anything productive about that? It would seem to me that we should have a bill which will invest in the workers of Canada, bring them back to work and make them more productive. If we cannot even so much as bring them to those areas, surely to goodness we could do it with our environment, our lakes and our lumber industry by putting in roads. It would make much more economic sense than to give handouts in the form of unemployment insurance benefits.

• (1500)

Mr. Lapierre: Job-creation programs.

Mr. Parker: "Job-creation programs", my friend says. My goodness, we have a million and a half unemployed and the hon. member tells us that the government is creating job-producing programs.

Mr. Lapierre: Yes.

Mr. Parker: I have not seen any real, productive job programs from the government in all the time that I have been in the House.

Mr. Kelly: Well, you haven't been here very long. You're part of the vote against 60,000 jobs.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, not only have the Liberals denied me the right to be heard in committee and denied witnesses the right to come before it, but now they also want to interrupt my twenty minutes in the House.

In closing I want to say that the workers of Canada will recognize what this government has done. This government will rue the day that it did not call upon those in the trade union movement, the business groups and the working people of Canada to come together to discuss the situation. Instead of bringing in confrontation legislation of this kind, the government should have accepted its responsibility and brought in the business sector, the communities, the provinces and the workers of Canada to deal with our problems in a truly constructive way. Legislation such as this will not produce the results needed for this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in rising today to speak to report stage of the bill, it might be worthwhile if I reminded the House of exactly what we were talking about when the bill was in second reading stage. The reason for doing so is that over the past number of days, while we have been dealing with specific amendments to the bill, much of the understanding of the principles involved has been obscured. As we come to the close of the discussion on the bill, it might be worthwhile to remind ourselves of what those principles were, how they fared during the committee stage and how it appears they will fare throughout the report stage and third reading.

There are two principles in this bill. There were two principles at first reading, two at second reading and there are still two principles. The first is the principle of restraint. During second reading I had the opportunity, as did many others in the House, to indicate, to all who were willing to listen, my views concerning whether or not it is necessary to have restraint in the economic life of the country at this time. Our party believes that there needs to be restraint at this time. We do not believe that that is all that needs to be done, either by people in the country or by the government, but it is one part of the solution. Anyone who sat throughout the committee hearings and heard economists of all stripes testify would have confirmation of one's belief in the necessity of restraint. That is why our party supports the first principle of the bill, that is, the principle of restraint.

There are some who do not believe that restraint is necessary. There are some who believe that economic growth can continue in the manner it has for the past 25 years. That is absolutely, 100 per cent wrong. The economic view held by those who argued that we can continue without the inclusion of restraint provisions as part of a package of recovery is clearly now in disrepute. Economists who offer that view and people who believe in it are fooling themselves. In my view it is irresponsible for any political party to argue in 1982 that we can have economic recovery without the inclusion of restraint as part of the package of that recovery.

The second principle involved was the principle of collective bargaining. There are some who believe that we can have restraint without collective bargaining. That is the view of the government. There are some who believe we should have collective bargaining without restraint. That is the view of the New Democratic Party. Throughout the committee hearings, our whole endeavour was to arrive at a situation whereby the country could get what it needs, that is, a program of economic recovery involving restraint, while preserving a collective bargaining system which has protected the rights of people, particularly those with low income, for many years, and ensuring that those who depend on those rights can continue to depend on them throughout the two-year period of restraint.

That is why, in posing our amendment with respect to collective bargaining, we set forth the enact way in which the government ought to have gone. In a moment I will discuss why I believe the government did not take that route, although it was the most reasonable one. It makes sense to people. The amendment, as written in the Order Paper, would first of all preserve the 6 per cent and 5 per cent restraint on total compensation. It would preserve the principle of restraint. In that context, we agree with the government. Second, our amendment would have precluded the exercise of strikes during a two year period because, in our view, the program deserves the opportunity for success without the disruption caused by strikes in the public service. Quite frankly, the government has as much power as it needs because the recent Supreme Court decision gives the power to the federal government to determine what is essential and to deny the operation of the right to strike in essential services. However, since the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) sought, at every turn of the road, to bring up the bogey man of the right to strike, we agreed, and I proposed an amendment in a motion which would preclude the right to strike, with arbitration in its place. The government voted against that. Our amendment would not only have preserved the restraint of 6 per cent and 5 per cent and would not only have precluded the right to strike for the operation of the two year program, but it would also have allowed for collective bargaining when issues remained unresolved and in dispute. It would also have permitted arbitration in order to deal with unresolved issues.

That was an excellent amendment. Any fool could go along with restraint and not worry about the protection of the rights of people through collective bargaining and any fool could go along with collective bargaining while not worrying about restraint. It takes real skill, hard work and attention to detail to know that there can be both. The government should have a restraint program, not only one affecting the public service, but one which is also a beacon to other people, leading the way to restraint while not destroying 50 years of collective bargaining tradition. By adoption of that amendment, and the government still has the chance, it can do that.

That brings me to the operation of the committee. I would say at the outset that the committee was chaired by the hon.

member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). The only reason I raise that point is that although he is a Liberal member, he did an excellent job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: The other Liberal members are so little used to receiving compliments these days that I want simply to pay my respects to the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier for his chairmanship of the committee. There it ends, because the government's actions throughout the whole of the committee hearing were appalling. For the first time in the history of this country, we were dealing with the removal of peoples' rights to collective bargaining. No matter how you felt on that issue, there should have been the courtesy to the committee, the members of this House, the public and certainly the people affected, for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) to have been there. We asked for the Minister of Labour to attend. It was indicated he could not attend on the Friday or Thursday because he was in Toronto. He did not ask if he could attend at another time.

• (1510)

We waited until the middle of the week. When we knew he was in Ottawa, indeed a half hour earlier in the House of Commons, again we extended an invitation. It should be noted that the Minister of Labour did not come to the committee at any time.

Anybody who argues that is was not his business, that it was the responsibility of the President of the Treasury Board, does not understand how the collective bargaining process works in this country. The Minister of Labour is responsible for the Canada Labour Code. There were rights of people under the Canada Labour Code taken away in a half hour without even a comment from the Minister of Labour.

I know the Minister of Labour. I know he would have attended had the government allowed him. That is the truth of the matter. The government made sure the Minister of Labour would not attend because he would have wanted to say, "Don't do this, look for the compromise that allows collective bargaining to be in place while at the same time you seek restraint." That is what he would have done, but not the perverse government that he serves.

Second, we sought from the President of the Treasury Board the reason why collective bargaining was going to be suspended for the public service. We heard from his officials and himself. Check the record. The reason was that it was going to be inconvenient for the staff to administer collective bargaining while at the same time administering the new bill. Terrific. That is when most of us knew that the government was about far more things than simply restraint.

Third, the amendment came from the President of the Treasury Board to deal with members' staff. It has been some time since I have seen anything quite that mean and quite that low. The government says that it was pushed into it. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) indicated that the salaries of ministers' staff were increased before the six and five arm came down. Therefore, they wanted to retaliate. How did they retaliate? They took people who worked for Members of Parliament and ministers, somewhere in the order of about 2,000 people, at least 70 per cent of whom earn in the area of $22,000, $21,000 and less, no more than that. In fact, if members check their offices they will find people who earn $19,000, $18,000, $15,000, $14,000 or $12,000. These are low-income people. Most of them are women. Many of them have family responsibilities. What kind of position are they in now? Had the President of the Treasury Board brought in an amendment to put them under the same restraints as those imposed on public servants, that would at least have been fair. If the government did not want to do that and wanted to teach us a lesson, why did it not give them the same treatment as that accorded to Members of Parliament?

Under this whole program we now have a category of people who are low income, with family responsibilities, mostly women. Not only are they going to get less out of this than the public servants, but they will get less than the Members of Parliament. They are in the lowest categories. The government did that because it wanted to get back at the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. That is meanness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: When members opposite go back to their offices and finally figure it out, they will all be on to the President of the Treasury Board on Monday telling him to try to fix it up, telling him he does not understand. When they do understand, they will be as angry as I am.

Fourth, in every process of the committee and daily as they add more amendments, whether they hurt people or not, what we have is a problem of a government that is making policy on the run. It does not think anything out any more, it just does it. There is going to be a day of reckoning. People know when the government is not thinking things out. They know when they are being hurt. They know when things are not there.

Somebody in the New Democratic Party said, what about restraint? The people in this country know the need for restraint. Indeed, for the past three or four years most people in this country began to exercise their own personal restraint. They did it in their kitchens, bedrooms, houses, the things they do and the things they have to cut back on. They know that in their own personal ways, in a thousand ways they could think of, they have restrained themselves in order to cope with the cost of living. The government is not inventing restraint. People invented it. The government is trying to catch up. It is the making of policy on the run that is causing these inequities.

I hope that members will take one last look before they vote on amendment No. 9, which allows a restraint program and still keeps in place the collective bargaining process. Anybody who wants restraint without the right of collective bargaining can go with the government. If you want collective bargaining without restraint, you can go with the NDP. If you want to have both, operating at least with some semblance of fairness, then support this amendment.

Every member of the House should look at amendment No. 3, go back to his staff and explain why it is that a group of 1,500 to 2,000, mostly women, mostly low-income people, are now being restrained more than the public service and more than Members of Parliament. It is simply because we have a government that no longer has policies. It is simply trying to catch up with the rest of the world, trying to deal with a policy which reflects the fact that it had no policies for the past four or five years. The problem is that they are now hurting people in putting through a program of restraint.

I wish in many ways that I did not have to support this bill, but I know the important thing is a restraint program. I wish in my heart I could say no to that government because it is so inequitable in terms of its application.

One last thing. The New Democratic Party, which stands up for no restraint, does not understand the people who elected them, does not understand the people who live and work hard in this country. It does not understand that all the people who support the program of restraint are ordinary people who know that if we are to have recovery, everybody has to pitch in. Some day the New Democratic Party will understand that, but their ignorance does not justify the government. The government should act more equitably, and I wish they would.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a few words to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) with regard to this bill in an area where he knows I have had considerable concern from the time the bill was first introduced.

I listened very carefully to what my colleagues, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) have had to say. They made it very plain that within the context of this bill, we accept the need for restraint as being a fundamental principle. We have also urged, over and over again, the need for equity; the need for the restoration of the collective bargaining system within the global figures that the minister has imposed in the restraint program.

I have a special interest in the equity in this bill, Mr. Speaker, and I have expressed it on many occasions both in the House and in committee. That interest is in how the bill will impact on women in the public service and other areas that it affects.

The minister referred to my reaction to what was proposed last evening in one of his amendments. My reaction came in response to a press statement the minister issued earlier in the day in which he said that he was going to restore certain aspects of the collective bargaining system on monetary measures; in other words, that he would allow the public service, "to work out through their own arrangements in respect of new compensation packages, as long as the 6 per cent and 5 per cent limits are respected".

It is true that I welcomed that when I read the press release but I had not realized the intent of the amendment on the Order Paper. I took the words in the press release at face value and I hoped what was stated in it would mean exactly what it said. I interpreted it to mean that people within the various categories would be able to negotiate their compensation packages, no matter what they were, as long as the over-all figures of 6 and 5 per cent for that category were retained; that within that limit, people at the lower end of the salary scale could perhaps receive a 9 per cent increase if those at the upper end received a 2 per cent increase. I accepted that that was what was meant. I now have severe doubts that it was.

As I said at the time, this was a way in which those at the lower end of the salary scale could still improve their position. As I have pointed out time and time again, in the public service a great number of people at the lower end of the salary scale are women.

Statistics show that 39 per cent of the total number of men in the civil service earn $23,000 and under, while 79 per cent of the total number of women in the public service earn $23,000 and under. That is a tremendous difference, Mr. Speaker, and it is the kind of inequity that I hope will continue to be corrected during the time that the bill is in effect.

I see inequity of salaries in the public service as part of an ongoing pattern of this government. Women receive far less pay than men. Women receive far less attention in all the Liberal government's programs than do men. As with other programs, the intention of this bill with regard to women is to put them in a worse position than they were before and to keep them there. The government is forever postponing programs that would improve the lot of women.

One of the major questions before us at the present time is pension reform. The people who would benefit most from pension reform are women. The people who are locked into poverty in their old age are women. For over a year the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has been promising a green paper on pension reform. She promised it last fall, last winter, last spring, this month—each time it has been postponed—until August, until the autumn. I sometimes wonder if we will ever see the green paper on pension reform. That makes the lot of women worse, Mr. Speaker.

The government's affirmative action programs bear examination, Mr. Speaker. The President of the Treasury Board referred to the improvement in the lot of women in the public service, saying that a great deal is being done through affirmative action programs. Again, the statistics show that five years ago, in 1977, in the upper echelons of the public service, in the senior executive bracket, there were 1,156 men and 38 women; in 1981 there were 1,532 men and 68 women. In those four years, in the upper echelons of the senior executive level, an additional 376 men had moved into that category but only 30 women.

At the lower end of the scale, the support category, the statistics show that of those on the lowest incomes in 1977, 52,833 were men and 58,730 were women; in 1981, 46,328 were men and 59,965 were women. In other words, at the lowest end of the scale there had been an increase in the number of women in the public service; some 1,235 had been added to the lowest category. But there was a drop in the number of men in that category of 6,505.

The affirmative action program is simply a joke, Mr. Speaker. The status of women in the public service has not improved at all over the years. I say again to the President of the Treasury Board that this is another example of the way the Liberal government ignores the needs of women in this day and age.

Today in question period I mentioned that in the training programs the government is putting into effect in the non-traditional areas, there are 31,000 men presently enrolled and 2,000 women. Again, this is continuing discrimination against women. Whether it happens to be with regard to pensions, affirmative action programs or retraining, there is always this continuing discrimination against women by the government.

What we have seen in the clause of the bill before us for debate today, motion No. 3 introduced by the President of the Treasury Board, is not only the latest but is the most vindictive example of the government's total lack of regard for the status of women in this country. It is the meanest, most vindictive move I have ever seen. It is spiteful. The President of the Treasury Board is taking his spite out on a group of women who are relatively low paid, who do not have the protection of the public service, who do not have tenure and who have no security of employment. He moves in against those people, and who are they? The great majority of them are women. I would ask him to look at the office staff of any Member of Parliament in this building; he will find that the majority of staff are not men, they are women.

• (1530)

Once again the government has deliberately decided to move against women.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: It has moved against women in its failure to enact pension reform and in its total disregard of affirmative action programs. It has moved against women in its retraining programs, and by putting forward this particularly vindictive amendment, which the President of the Treasury Board has initiated in order to get even, to take out his spite and indulge the lowest and meanest characteristics any individual can have. I would think, Mr. Speaker, that the President of the Treasury Board, who should have some regard for the work of the staff around here, should not be putting them in this category, an action by the minister which is even more punitive than anything else he has considered introducing with regard to any group of employees, no matter where. The office staff of Members of Parliament are women, low paid and without security, and he has moved vindictively to put them in the lowest category that he can possibly find. He ought to be downright ashamed of himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I have great doubts about any wage restraint program being fully successful without a restraint program on prices as well. If prices continue to rise and the workers have no right to bargain, how will they live? It is a simple matter; if wages are frozen and prices are not, them someone is going to suffer. It may be the families of those workers. Therefore, I am urging the government to make sure that prices are restrained as well as wages. If that is done, then I think the program will be reasonably satisfactory. Most workers, Mr. Speaker, want the right to buy the things their families need. If they are able to do so on their wages, there is little difficulty. However, if they are unable to make both ends meet, then they would want the same thing you and I would want, that is, more wages. It is really as simple as that.

I want to bring to the attention of the hon. minister a particular case in that regard. I have been endeavouring to get the eye of the Speaker in the last several days during question period, but without success. That is understandable because an awful lot of people want to ask questions. However, it fits right into this particular debate anyway. The government is restraining the wages of employees in the Banff National Park. I do not think any of those employees are asking to be exempted, not at all, but at the same time that restraint is being applied they are being assessed an increase in rent by the government. It is a different department but the same government. I would like to bring to the attention of the government that this is a case where the government can practise what it preaches and set an example for outside industry. If the workers are going to have a 6 per cent restraint program—and it appears they will under this program—then surely the government should also restrain the rental increases. There can be no better example of a responsible government; there will be no better example of irresponsibility if the government insists on the 15 per cent to 35 per cent rental increase while at the same time restraining wage increases by 6 per cent.

This is the second increase in rental accommodation these workers have had this year. There was a $100 increase in January and there will be another $100 increase on August 1, a couple of days from now. With the 6 per cent restraint program they just cannot make both ends meet. So the minister should roll back the rental increase to comply with the six and five restraint program. I emphasize that this matter is entirely under the control of the government. These people are not complaining about the 6 per cent wage restraint, and if the government rolls the rental increase back to 6 per cent I do not think there will be one complaint out of the entire Banff area and all of the employees. It would be a wonderful example to the rest of Canada that the government practises what it preaches.

The second point I want to raise with regard to this particular debate is the fact that in a restraint program what we are really doing is asking workers in the public sector to share some of their wages with those who are not working. I do not think anyone objects to that when it is put in that particular way. After all, most of us want to share and would share anything we had with someone who was hungry and came to our door. It is when inequities show up that people are really bothered.

I want to bring an inequity to the attention of the hon. President of the Treasury Board in the hope that he will see that it is corrected. For example, the contract of staff in ministers' offices will remain in full force and effect until April 1, 1983. I checked that with the minister's office and I was told that is correct.

Mr. Pepin: And two years of restraint after.

Mr. Taylor: However, the contract made with the Canadian Airlines Employees' Association, CALEA, in September, 1981, is due to expire in September, 1983. The inequity is that while the contract with the staff in the offices of ministers will remain in full force and effect until April 1, 1983, the contract with CALEA will be cancelled effective September 1, 1982.

• (1540)

Where is the fairness in that type of thing? If there is going to be a recognition of collective bargaining, and I hope there will be, surely if a contract has been worked out with both sides and duly signed, it would be much fairer if it were permitted to run to completion before applying the 6 per cent guideline. This probably would not apply to very many, but it is fairness that I am interested in. Certainly CALEA has every right to complain. Its three-year contract is going to be cancelled in September, 1982, whereas the contract of the office staff of ministers will run until April 1, 1983.

The minister should clean up these inequities that irritate people if he really wants full support for his restraint program. The two cases I have mentioned are not difficult to handle. I think they are clearcut. I cannot see why the minister would have any difficulty with them. Both cases are based on fairness and equity. Surely that is what we want to have in our public service.

The third point I want to mention is one that I raised a couple of weeks ago in the House. It concerns the indexation capping of pensions of retired civil servants, members of the armed forces and members of the RCMP. I shall not go into detail because we have dealt with the matter during question period and also during the adjournment debate. I would suggest that if we want equity and fairness, we should not be capping this indexation of pensions for retired civil servants, members of the armed forces and members of the RCMP. In the first place, I question the authority of the government to do so. These people contributed 6.5 per cent into the regular pension fund and a further 1 per cent for the purpose of indexing. They had no choice. Most would have contributed if they had had a choice in any event. This money was deducted from their salaries. Because they had this pension and the indexing to go with it, many did not bother taking out other pension schemes. They relied on the government to keep its word.

I strongly recommend to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) that this indexation capping be cancelled entirely. We must not try to take from the retired civil servants, who now have no voice nor any union to speak for them, part of their income when their average income is only in the vicinity of $8,000. They are not in the $30,000 or $50,000 class. They are not in the $100,000 or the $500,000 class, as Ian Sinclair is; they are down in the lower echelons. I would think that the government would want to make sure that these retired civil servants will have enough to live on. We should keep our faith with those people who have worked for the country, many in the armed forces and RCMP who risked their lives serving this country in the hope that eventually they would be able to retire on a reasonable pension.

I have mentioned only three cases but they involve thousands of people. Everyone has a sense of fairness and equity. All I ask of the President of the Treasury Board is to consider the fairness of this measure with respect to the three classes of people that I have mentioned. I hope that he will accede to my request.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in the short time I have this afternoon I would like to gloss over very briefly three of the items discussed today. The first is the Baker amendment, accurately and honestly described as such.

Mr. Murphy: Cheap shot.

Miss MacDonald: Whose name is at the bottom?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Motion No 3 is not the Baker amendment. Motion No. 3 is an amendment that stands in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston).

Miss MacDonald: Shame on him.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): When staff of the Members of Parliament find out the cheap trick that has been played on them, they will call it the Johnston amendment.

Mr. Crombie: It is the Johnston amendment.

Mr. Fleming: You started this whole business.

Mr. Kelly: Mr. Speaker, certainly there is no question about his name being on the legal title.

Miss MacDonald: You bet your life there isn't a doubt.

Mr. Kelly: But there is also no question about who the spiritual father of this amendment is. There is no question whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: The government's ploy is to go after the women.

Mr. Kelly: Mr. Speaker, could you give me some assistance? Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kelly: One of the delightful aspects of this afternoon's debate is to see the official opposition wriggling like worms on a hook fashioned by themselves earlier in the debate on preceding days.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We see the worm.

Mr. Kelly: Let us take the accusation that by introducing this amendment we are taking a cheap shot at that party and at one gentleman in particular. For a moment let us dignify that rebuttal as being intellectually honest.

Miss MacDonald: You are not honest about anything, intellectually or otherwise.

Mr. Kelly: As a preface to my remarks I point out that hearing members of that party accusing us of taking cheap shots rings somewhat hollow since it is the members of the Conservative Party that have raised the cheap shot to an art form in this House.

I assume that the hon. member and his colleagues argue that we have misrepresented his position on this aspect of Bill C-124.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I argue that you are cheap. Cheap Johnston joins you.

Mr. Kelly: Have we misrepresented the position of that gentleman or that party in this particular topic?

Miss MacDonald: Indeed, you have.

Mr. Kelly: If you do not want to take my word for it, Mr. Speaker, if you think I may be involved personally in cheap shots, let me refer to what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said, as reported in Hansard for July 9, 1982, at page 19187.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Quit while you are ahead.

Mr. Kelly: Let me read into the record what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said in the House when he first raised this issue, an issue he is now trying to sidestep because it is coming back to haunt him. When the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was talking about salary increases of exempt staff—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Of ministers.

Mr. Kelly: —of Liberal ministers, we find this in Hansard:

> Roll it back. Be direct, be honest, treat everyone the same, as my friend from Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) says.

What is there in this bill that contradicts the sentiments expressed by the hon. member in the debate in this House on July 9? Nothing whatsoever.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member could tell us whether or not he has read motion No. 3. If he has read motion No. 3 he will see that there is a gross inequity in it. It is plain to anyone who can read.

• (1550)

Mr. Kelly: I have read the motion. I have read it very carefully. It is on the basis of that reading that I would like to continue my assessment of that party's position and my analysis of this particular issue.

Let me just see whether I can turn around the debate and change the perspectives, to show if in fact that party in this debate is misrepresenting our position on the issue. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said that motion No. 3 applies to all House of Commons staff. Of course that is wrong; it does not apply to all staff of the House of Commons. It does not apply to committee clerks. It does not apply to library staff. It does not apply to the translators. It does not apply to anyone outside the staffs of members of the House of Commons. I hope that anyone reading Hansard, reading or seeing a media account of the statement uttered earlier in the day by the hon. member, wherein he said that this applies to all House of Commons staff, will realize that it was an inaccurate, distorted and unfair representation.

Miss MacDonald: All you want to get is the majority of women. The hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mr. Kelly) is always trying to do something to get at women.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is even more discriminatory than he thought.

Mr. Kelly: I do not want to be contentious in this debate. I just want to be honest. That is all that any member has to bring to a debate in the House—his honesty. But we do not get it often. It is interesting to see how the other side responds when we catch them in a mistake or an error which they made earlier in a debate. Sometimes I wish they had the courage to admit that they made a mistake or to admit that they made an error in debates such as this one.

The second accusation of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was that this amendment created a very special category of workers on the hill who have been singled out for a vicious, mean—

Miss MacDonald: Spiteful.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are beginning to understand.

Mr. Kelly: —and unnecessary attack by the government.

Let me take a look at the principle which underlies this particular amendment and at the principle which underlies the position of the party opposite to see whether in fact its accusations accurately and honestly describe the amendment as it stands on the Order Paper. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, in questions raised in the House and in deliberations before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, argued that the exempt staff of ministers of the Crown should not have been allowed the increases given to them prior to the budget which was brought down on June 28. In other words, he said that we should take this small group of people, this small group of Liberal workers, and apply special rules to them.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Now we are getting to it.

Mr. Kelly: He suggested that they should not be treated like everyone else and that we should amend that proposed law of the land in a particular way which would exempt that very small group of people. He claimed that that singling out of a small group of people from one particular party represents justice.

Well, does it? Is it fair to take a small group of workers and say that the law should not apply to them, that they must be singled out for particularly harsh measures? I think that is unfair. If one is to be a person of principle or a party of principle, then one must argue that all members of political staff on the Hill, in the House of Commons and presumably in the Senate, whether ministerial or non-ministerial, whether Liberal, Conservative or NDP, should be treated in the same way. If we concede and agree that we should not single out a small group within a larger group for special attention but we should apply the change to all members of the group, then we have to recognize the legitimacy of this motion and support it in the debates and votes of the House. To do otherwise would be mischievous.

I do not want to imply that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has been mischievous. I am just pointing out to him that if he is the man of principle that he claims he and members of his party are—and that is the way we accept him in this chamber—surely he should recognize that the law must not apply to only a tiny group inside a larger one, but it must apply to all members of the group.

Although he has not spoken on behalf of this amendment, I hope, being a man of principle, that he will later vote in support of it when we come to vote on these issues next week. We are not attempting to take this larger group and treat them any differently from other public servants in Ottawa and across the country. We are not creating artificial and arbitrary distinctions in the way in which these two groups will be treated by Bill C-124. Every person who comes under Bill C-124 will at one time or another go into the six and five program and will come out of it after two years. I do not think the hon. gentleman will deny that. That is accurate, that is true.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Kelly: After I finish. I would like to continue with my remarks now.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You will not face a question.

An hon. Member: It is his right.

Mr. Kelly: When there are two groups which will be going in and out of the six and five restraint program over a two year period, the only difference—

Miss MacDonald: That is where you have made your mistake.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You do not know the bill.

Mr. Kelly: The only difference between those two groups is when they go into the program and when they come out. That is the only distinction one could legitimately raise that we created between these two groups. All we are saying in the bill is that this group of political workers will go into the six and five world of restraint earlier than most of their colleagues in the public service—that is all it says—and this means that that group of political workers come out of the six and five restraint program earlier than their colleagues in the public service. There is no other distinction, and frankly I do not think it is worth the hubbub created by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Bosley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the parliamentary secretary care to show the House where in motion No. 3 the staff ever get a 6 per cent increase? They never do.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Perhaps I can assist in the resolution of the problem by calling it four o'clock.

It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Shall all items preceding No. 3 stand by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CHARITABLE GIFTS

The House resumed from Monday, June 9, 1980, consideration of the motion of Mr. Roche:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act in order to give individual taxpayers the option of claimming charitable gifts as deductions from taxable income or of deducting fifty per cent of the value of charitable gifts from income tax payable, and amending the present $100 standard tax deduction for medical and charitable purposes to apply only to medical expenses.

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all members should welcome the opportunity provided by this notice of motion to debate this question. We are all agreed on the importance and the value of the contribution which voluntary charitable organizations make to our society.

The issue before the House today is in what way and to what extent should governments be assisting this effort through provisions of the Income Tax Act. The extent of such governmental assistance through the tax system is already substantial. The figures for 1979 show that more than $500 million in tax revenues were forgone in the form of tax allowances by the federal government and, of course, by the nine provinces, the personal tax levies of which are linked to the federal tax law under tax collection agreements.

We are, of course, familiar with the fact that Quebec, which levies its own income tax, also grants a similar deduction for charitable donations. This represents a substantial proportion, perhaps as much as one third of total contributions by individuals and businesses to these charities.

I should like to explain that the present income tax system has two provisions relating to charitable donations. First, an individual who has donated more than $100 in charitable givings may deduct the total of those donations from income in computing income tax. The claim must be accompanied of course by individual receipts. The deduction cannot exceed 20 per cent of net income for the year, although any excess may be carried forward and deducted in the following year. This 20 per cent ceiling is a limiting factor for a very few taxpayers only.

Second, the tax system allows a flat $100 deduction from income for taxpayers whose combined charitable donations and claimable medical expenses do not exceed $100. For all practical purposes, this standard $100 deduction is relevant to charitable donation alone. This is because taxpayers may claim deductions for medical expenses only when these expenses exceed 3 per cent of net income, and only a relatively small percentage of taxpayers qualify for such medical expense deductions. This is an important factor when we come to consider one of the proposals in the motion relating to the $100 standard deduction.

I suggest there are three principal considerations to be borne in mind in discussing what whould best be done on this issue.

First, the government should provide some incentive for charitable giving, and not just any incentive, regardless of cost. There is not much point in granting a $10 tax incentive in order to generate a $5 charitable gift.

Second, the incentive should prefereably be an equitable one. This means that donors at different income levels should receive equal incentive benefits for donations of equal size.

Let me note that these first two considerations are the base and have been put forward as the basic objectives outlined by the national voluntary organizations in their submission to the Canadian government.

Third, in this period of fiscal restraint, hon. members must be very concerned at what will be the impact on our budgetary deficit of any new tax provision.

It is on that last point that we run into the most serious problem with the proposal before us. It is estimated by the Department of Finance that to implement these suggested changes would cost more than $500 million in forgone revenues in addition to the current tax incentive costs. In effect, we are being asked to double the level of fiscal support for charitable giving.

Such an increase of half a billion dollars in the over-all deficit position of governments cannot be justified under the present circumstances, if fiscal restraint is to have any meaning at all. Admittedly it can be argued that the proposed changes could provide some additional incentive for charitable giving, and ensure some more equity in our tax arrangements. These are worthwhile objectives, but I suggest we will have to look at the price tag.

We have on this side of the House been deeply concerned, as everyone else has, by the grave growth of problems in the economic situations throughout the world. We have seen that this has brought about a kind of fiscal problem because when you have a recession in the world, when you have a recessionary economy, then naturally your businesses will not flourish, they will not make as much profit, individuals will not be as well employed, they will not be making as large a salary, and therefore the income that is derived is smaller, and the revenues for the government therefore will become smaller.

One of the major byproducts of this, as we have seen, is that in the new budget a large part of the increase in our deficit has come from the need to provide increased unemployment insurance and also which is very important, we find there is a reduction in the size of the income that is derived. We are receiving a smaller income into the federal treasuries, less revenue. Some of us perhaps are aware of the fact that there are two ways to make money, one is to earn it and the other is to save it. When less money is coming in it is just as bad as if you were spending more money. That is the practical problem.

This proposal before us now means an addition to the half billion dollars that the government is already forgiving or providing as a tax incentive to the people of Canada. In other words, the Canadian tax system provides relief of approximately one half billion dollars now to the taxpayers who can use these funds as they contribute to charitable causes and charitable donations. This one half billion dollars less, is something which already is being used as an incentive by the federal government to bring private contributions to charitable organizations. That is a contribution, which means one-half billion dollars less money to the treasury.

Now, the new proposal which we have in this resolution is something with which I greatly sympathize. But what I have to point out, in order to recognize responsibly what it means, is that the figures that have been estimated by the finance department to be the costs would add another one-half billion dollars of tax forgiveness. That means that one-half billion dollars less would be going into the federal treasury. That would mean, in effect, a total subsidy of $1 billion.

I do not feel too concerned about this fact for a number of reasons which I would like to explain. I must say, however, that I do find there is some sad inconsistency when members of the opposition rise daily during question period to call for additional spending by the government on programs to relieve the hardship suffered by Canadians because of the economic problems which exist today in Canada and the world. As those members rise to speak daily, they call for greater government relief, which means spending more money but, on the other hand, these same members or their colleagues rise on another day to criticize the government for the fact that it has projected a high fiscal deficit for the year. Indeed, one can see that if they were to be consistent they would do either one or the other. You can hardly call for more spending which increases the deficit and at the same time criticize the government for the large deficit which exists.

This particular resolution is an example of the kind of worthwhile project that might be suggested but which would cost money. If it were a project that were suggested during affluent times, when there was a growing gross national product, it would be easier to understand that it could be implemented. However, at a time when we are calling for restraint, this suggestion creates some difficulty for us.

This means that we have to ask ourselves why the official opposition cannot get its act together. I would call upon those members to find a more integrated or rationalized policy through which they could provide a consistent approach. If I were to look at it in a less than kind manner, I might suggest that it might be good politics for the official opposition to plead for more spending to help those who are hurting while calling for restraint to please those who know that we cannot just throw money away to solve our problems at this time. In that way, maybe it is thought they can get the best of both worlds.

In some ways perhaps the NDP can be considered to be more consistent since they call incessantly for increasing spending without calling for the same restraints at the same time.

We on this side of the House know that the buck stops with us. It is a tragedy that we cannot spend more on programs to reduce the suffering of Canadians because we have to exercise restraint. We see a similar policy being carried out in many other countries at the present time. We see this policy in western European countries and in the United States.

No one could be more aware than I of the importance of charitable donations. No one could be more sensitive or feel more sympathetic than I to the objectives expressed in this resolution. I support the ideas proposed in this motion, but nevertheless I must assume the responsibility of pointing out that it will cost a price. I must also point out that at this particular juncture in our economic recovery in Canada, it is not exactly a most welcome time for such a change.

Why do I feel sympathetic to the proposals in this motion? I feel that if responsible voluntary groups receive more money they can make better use of the money than if the government had to spend it. If all things are equal, if a program must be carried out, I feel that it can be carried out with greater personal devotion, commitment and dedication by a responsible charitable or voluntary organization than it can be by a federal, provincial, or any government. Therefore, I am quite persuaded that if a program must be carried out, I would much rather contribute the money, in terms of using less money to be spent with greater effectiveness, to the organization in question than contribute to the treasuries of an impersonal government.

I believe that dedicated workers can achieve more than bureaucrats, not because bureaucrats are heartless people but because the very system tends to defeat the ability to create that sense of commitment and devotion through its largeness and impersonality. The same is not true of a voluntary organization.

Having worked as the national director of the League of Human Rights of B'nai Brith, which is a charitable organization, I had an opportunity to experience this at first hand. With respect to some of the programs which we conducted with voluntary help, I know that it costs the province 26 times in paid employee time to conduct the same kind of institutional or educational conference. We could do it for less because we had dedicated volunteers who contributed endless amounts of time, overtime and effort to the cause as well as facilities which were already available in terms of overhead. In other words, there were contributions in kind, contributions in terms of employee commitment and volunteer commitment. Without that volunteer commitment the province had to pay 26 times more for the program than it cost the organization.

Not only have I seen this as someone who has administered a national charitable institution, I see the same things in my riding. I have seen that non-profit charitable organizations can do far more with the same amount of money.

For this reason I think governments tend quite correctly, to give grants to such organizations because they know it will be handled more efficiently and provide greater flexibility when carried out by non-profit charitable organizations. For example, there is the Italian-Canadian Benevolent Corporation which was able, through its personal attention to human feelings, to create an amazing and unique type of senior citizens' program in a setting which would be familiar to the origins of those people. They provided an atmosphere for people in their old age which enabled them to feel that they were in an environment which had flowers and fountains similar to what they had in their country of origin. In that sense, one can find that in the voluntary work of an organization which understands the people for whom it is working, which understands the needs of those people when it was constructing the residence known as Villa Columbo. The same situation is true so far as the new apartments it is constructing are concerned. The same thing could be said for St. Hilda's Towers. A second tower is now being completed for older adults. It has been created to provide a community feeling for those people, a feeling which they could not experience in an impersonal, if you will, bureaucratic or government institution.

The applicaton of voluntary assistance, work and dedication of this type demonstrates part of Canada's way of life. I simply want to say that from my own personal experience and from what I see in my riding, when I look at the Baycrest Centre for geriatric care and a number of other places which are run by volunteers, I believe that the money given to them is more sympathetically and carefully spent than if it were given to a bureaucracy. On the one hand, if money has to be spent it is better to provide that incentive and to contribute to voluntary institutions and the voluntary sector. Consequently, the Income Tax Act should be amended to provide that incentive. On the other hand, we have to take into account what it would mean to take $500 million more out of the federal treasury if we are not going to spend it anyway. I suggest they will not spend it in any way right now.

In conclusion if I were able to be encouraging about what we should do here, in the future, I would say that a committee of Members of Parliament should consider, study and discuss how the Income Tax Act can be adjusted so that it will be more equitable in the field of charitable contributions, a committee which would make realistic suggestions in terms of our restraint program, yet provide encouragement to that sector of our society which can do the job more effectively than the federal government or, for that matter, the provincial and municipal governments.

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I encourage the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) to follow up on his last proposal. He may wish to refer to the records of the House and to the proposal put forward by the Clark government to establish a task force on voluntarism. He may wish to encourage the government that he supports to move in the direction of that proposal. It is indeed timely of the government to agree to enter into today's debate on how it might come to support the role of the voluntary sector in Canadian society.

In entering this debate, I want to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche), on making such a well-marshalled defence of the motion he originally tabled here in the House on June 9, 1980, so that hon. members have felt that today's continuation of the debate is not only warranted but that it is a motion which they can genuinely and generally, in a non-partisan way, advocate on all sides of the House. I look forward, as do Canada's over three million volunteers, to a signal from the government that it has used these intervening two years to develop a comprehensive framework for the early implementation of tax changes embodied in the motion. I hope that the government is not totally preoccupied with the familiar arguments we have heard echoed from the Department of Finance.

It is important to recall the intent with which this motion was originally introduced. The hon. member for Edmonton South said:

[Translation]

The purpose of the motion that I am bringing before the House today is to help voluntary organizations make a greater contribution to the quality of life in Canada. Specifically, I am urging the government to amend the Income Tax Act; first, to remove the standard $100 deduction for charitable donations and, second, to replace the standard deduction with a 50 per cent tax credit along with the option of continuing to deduct charitable contributions from taxable income if it is in the taxpayer's interest to do so.

[English]

We note that spokespersons from the government side have often spoken of their appreciation of the irreplaceable contribution made by Canada's voluntary sector. What they have never done, however, is to indicate the concrete ways in which the government they support can provide much needed incentives to Canadian taxpayers for the increase in charitable contributions.

The tax reforms spelled out in this motion were first advocated by the national voluntary organizations, a coalition representing over 120 large and small Canadian agencies. Known widely as the give-and-take proposal, and the type of bulletin I have in my hand has gone into all members' offices, these reforms are the product of years of expert research and extensive consultation with Canadian volunteers, as well as negotiations with officials from the Department of Finance, National Revenue, and the Secretary of State.

The most recent results of this ongoing research-negotiation process indicate confirmation of the original national voluntary organizations' position, that is, if the give and take proposal had been implemented in 1980, as the hon. member for Edmonton South suggested, federal and provincial governments would have saved money. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the recently published results of Statistics Canada's 1980 audit of returns provided to Revenue Canada by all registered charities provide government-funded evidence. It is time the government incorporated this evidence into its policy and its thinking rather than continuing to parrot the type of comment we have just heard.

Indeed the chief statistician of Statistics Canada, Dr. Martin B. Wilk, has indicated this in writing to the N.V.O. in a memorandum of June 16, this year:

Since, in 1980, the total cost of the charitable deduction system was $762 million, it appears that the contention the N.V.O. have been making for three years, (that the government could switch to a 50 per cent tax credit at no additional cost), is correct.

Government supporters are quite right in pointing out that as these reforms are implemented, the cost to the government in forgone revenues will increase. Experience with the implementation of the tax changes affecting donations to political parties has shown that it takes up to six years for a behavioural change in the patterns of taxpayer contributions to become evident. Current estimates indicate that it will take up to five years, after implementation, for the cost of give and take reforms to be known. At that point the cost to government in forgone revenues, which concerned the hon. member, will be $1 for every $2 going directly to charity.

The last time this motion was before the House, over two years ago, government spokespersons complained about the cost of implementing this motion. Indeed, the then parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) said:

—at a time when we are worrying about reducing our present federal deficit, we should not be thinking about adding another half billion dollars to the combined federal-provincial deficits.

The same member made a similar complaint during the November 24, 1980, debate of my private member's motion to:

—provide volunteer agencies with financial aid to support their communications and fund-raising activities, so that a greater portion of available funds could be freed for their intended charitable uses.

And again, in the June 5, 1981, debate on my private member's Bill C-233, an act to encourage the role of the voluntary sector in Canadian society, another government spokesperson complained that:

—we must not always depend upon the government. Charities already have available to them various mechanisms to obtain assistance.

As you see, the government has long maintained that acceptance and implementation of the reforms as put forward in the motion before us again today are too expensive because of an apparent worsening of the federal deficit position.

I believe that the new information available from the Statistics Canada research, from the work of the national voluntary organizations and from the important investigations carried on in our universities, such as the contribution made by Professor Douglas McCready in the Department of Business and Economics at Wilfrid Laurier University, clearly demonstrate a new direction which the government would be well advised to follow.

Let us for a moment consider the ultimate costs to governments in forgone revenues resulting from the implementation of the give and take proposal, about which we have just heard a litany, and the cost to the federal treasury relating to large scale, multi-million dollar job creation schemes, familiar under this government.

Let me ask the government and its supporters to think of the voluntary sector as an engine for employment creation. Let us begin to think of this motion's tax reforms as a mechanism for government investment in creating jobs during record unemployment, instead of thinking in terms of increased government spending, which hon. members opposite are quite right in saying we can ill afford given the current disastrous deficit levels.

Unfortunately, this government has never measured the employment capacity of the voluntary sector. We have been waiting since January 1981 for a strategy on the voluntary sector. It was promised by the previous secretary of state, reiterated by the present Secretary of State (Mr. Regan), but is yet to see the light of day.

To my surprise this government has never developed a mechanism to begin measuring the number or type of employment opportunities created by the voluntary sector. This is so despite the fact that there are 47,000 charitable agencies, units, if you will, presently active in this country. I invite hon. members to compare this total with the fact that there are only 31,000 manufacturing units operating in Canada. The government has never bothered to measure the contribution made by the voluntary sector to Canada's gross national product. While it is difficult to be sure of the number of jobs provided by charitable agencies, it is quite clear that this is an extremely labour-intensive sector. High technology is too expensive. These are people at work, often in their two's, four's and six's. Not only that, the vast majority of those employed by charitable agencies are women, youth, handicapped persons, low-income and laid-off workers, the very segments of our population currently experiencing such tragic unemployment levels and alienation.

Let me make another reflection on why this government ought to reconsider its definition. Think for a moment of the voluntary sector and its ability to train and retrain. This has always been an essential feature of the voluntary sector as it seeks to meet the changing social needs of our society. Women learn skills which help them to bridge the re-entry phase in joining or returning to the work force. Our youth receive initial training and skills which they ultimately put to use in the challenging employment of serving their fellow Canadians. There is no parallel for the training of young people that is inherent in the voluntary sector.

In terms of cost effectiveness, this training and retraining aspect surely deserves the attention of a minister of finance anxious to deal with the deficit and a minister of employment and immigration anxious to somehow equip and motivate Canadians. For example, the professionals who now support the irreplaceable services across this country of the YMCA were in their youth in large part initially trained by the same voluntary agency.

What I am asking the government to do in support of the very positive and manageable motion brought forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton South, is to consider the charitable tax credit before us as an employment creation tool in terms of its present strategy. Here is a sector which has enormous potential to employ those target groups about whose current unemployment we are all so concerned. At the same time as these people find gainful employment, they will be filling the gap left behind by the government's withdrawal and threatened cutback of many of the social services which can no longer be financially supported. I encourage the government, and I invite the parliamentary secretary in any response that he may make, to reflect upon the changes of the last two years since this bill was introduced. I urge him to rethink the relationship between the Canadian taxpayer and his society, between the old-style big government social spending schemes and the proven record of our voluntary sector. I urge the government to set free through the early acceptance of this mechanism the nation's voluntary and charitable agencies in order that in a time of deep national crisis, the morale, sense of purpose and sense of belonging which is unique to those three million Canadian volunteers may be fully employed from the Atlantic to the Pacific in this land.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be brief. I want to talk about some of the implications for the tax system in this proposal. My colleague from Shefford, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Lapierre), has some comments to make about the give-and-take idea and the proposals of the national voluntary organizations. Therefore, I will be quick.

First, this is a worthy idea to study. It is certainly deserving of our continued support to see if it will indeed fly as a good idea. We have to make a balance between the needs of a voluntary society and the need to avoid dependence on the tax system. I think the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) will agree with that.

I would like to suggest some of the complexities in this whole area that he has not raised. These are quite apart from the matters of voluntary activity or the question of merits of the individual groups which would benefit from an expanded tax credit.

Last November during the tax changes introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), a debate arose about the use of the tax system to create incentives similar to this one. Should we use deductions in the tax system to create incentives or should we use the tax system simply to finance government? That is a very important point.

When the minister introduced his changes last November, he did two things. He removed some of the prior incentives in the tax system. He also reduced the marginal tax rate. He returned the savings to the taxpayer. In many cases those were very substantial savings.

When we develop tax incentives, as we found both last November and in our experiences following last November, we also develop an encouragement for people to use those incentives for purposes beyond which they were originally debated and designed. We create incentives for all kinds of activities in one area at the exclusion of other areas. We develop a very complicated set of encouragements in the tax system to channel money to avoid taxes, to shelter money from taxes rather than to simply encourage the worthwile behaviour, in this case the voluntary activity.

Some of the changes introduced last November affected business activity or personal activity. They were all considered by various taxpayers to be worthy deductions. In each case there were people ready to defend those deductions. However, the fundamental point is that those deductions had created incentives for taxpayers to shelter income from the tax man. Sometimes those shelters were not the ones that had originally been designed or intended.

The government has asked people to remember some very simple principles about tax incentives. Tax incentives are tax expenditures. Take as an example ten people living on a desert island. If in this heavenly example it costs $100 to operate the desert island, each of those ten people would pay $10 toward the operation of that island. If one person came along with a desired goal and talked the others into giving him an exemption, then everyone else would have to pick up that person's share of the burden. Where everyone had previously been paying $10 each, they would now have to pay $11 and change to operate the island. If we add a few zeroes to my example the point is the same for the finances of the Government of Canada. If we start to give people more and more exemptions from their tax, then the rest of the country has to pick up the slack. In many cases people are able to take advantage of shelters in a way the rest of us would not approve of; they are able to find a channel into a tax shelter that the rest of us would not accept, yet we are paying for that extra burden.

It is not enough to say that we should give exemptions because these are worthy volunteer organizations. We have to come back to a more basic point and ask whether it is possible for taxpayers to use these exemptions in a way that genuine volunteers would not accept or whether it is better to avoid the problem altogether and put out the money in the form of a grant, instead of using the tax system which looks so easy but in fact is practical and easy for a lot of people, not just for the intended beneficiary.

Perhaps it would be better to give a grant the way we do under the New Horizons program, where a group of people put their minds to a project and design something that fits our goals and then gets a grant for it. We could then justify to our friends across the way and to the general public that expenditure of their money. We could say that one group came within the acceptable limits, that another group was subject to audit and that yet another group did not misspend the money. We could give that kind of assurance to Canadian taxpayers.

It is easy to say that tax incentives should be used and that volunteer groups should get some recognition from the government. I think I would agree generally with hon. members on that, but I question the method of using tax incentives.

In the desert island example, if ten people pay $100 and suddenly there are just nine people who have to find the $100, then they have to pay $11 instead of $10 and we have to justify to the nine why the tenth should be exempt. We have to make sure that we do not set up a special route where people can slip money in and hide it from the tax man.

I started out by saying that there are really two questions to answer, Mr. Speaker: how do we encourage voluntarism and how do we avoid dependence on the tax system. I hope the hon. member for Waterloo will turn his mind to the question of tax incentive versus grants. I think that question has to be answered. It is a pretty fundamental issue of public accountability, and taxpayers can go down our list of expenditures and see what we have put their money into. Hon. members, like the hon. member for Waterloo, can ask about the wisdom of each expenditure. He could not do that if we had tax incentives buried in the tax system, but he could do so with a grant system. I wonder if the grant system is not better because of that openness.

There are some other limits to the suggestion which I think the hon. member has not discussed with us, and I hope he will give us better answers than he has so far.

In 1979, $500 million was forgone in tax revenues under the $100 standard deduction or, alternatively, under the receipted reductions. That is a lot of money, Mr. Speaker. It is a very respectable amount of support for voluntarism across the country. According to my information it represents about $1 in every $3 that Canadian people give to charitable organizations. If we start with these facts we realize the enormous support the government is giving as an incentive toward charitable donations. If we were to follow the scheme proposed in the motion, we would spend another $500 million annually, according to the information I was given. That $500 million would be offset, to a degree, by the kinds of considerations that the hon. member has recommended. I think we have to address ourselves to that during the period of financial restraint.

If we follow the tax incentive idea rather than a system of grants, we should also look at the problem of tax deductions or tax credits. It seems to me that a tax deduction tends to assist higher income people while a tax credit will encourage both lower and higher income people to make a contribution. It may be more equitable and more of an encouragement.

We also have to look at how we handle the medical aspects of the current flat $100 medical and charitable deduction. If we just made that a $100 medical deduction it could cost us up to $250 million annually. I do not know if we want to encourage that during a time of restraint.

Those are specific concerns that the Department of Finance has about the proposal, Mr. Speaker. We do not offer them to be a wet blanket or to ruin the proposal, but they have not been answered. There is still the problem of using a grant or tax incentive and how either is to be paid for.

I think the hon. member, who keeps thinking about these issues and presenting new ideas in a positive and inventive fashion, should be congratulated. I hope he will give us some answers to these technical questions.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by strongly endorsing the proposition that Canada needs a national policy on voluntarism. Part of that consideration should be a review of the income tax provisions relating to contributions to charities and volunteer organizations in Canada. I congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) who brought this resolution before us for debate. It deals specifically with the income tax provision that is now in force and recommends what so many volunteer organizations have endorsed as a new provision known as the give-and-take provision.

I want to deal specifically with the proposition outlined in the motion presented by the hon. member for Edmonton South and discussed by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean). First of all I should like to deal with the current provision and indicate how unfair it has become.

I am sure that hon. members are aware that the Income Tax Act provides a tax benefit in relation to charitable donations. Approximately 88 per cent of Canadian taxpayers took advantage of that $100 deduction for charitable donations and medical expenses, whether or not they contributed any of it to charity, according to the last statistics available to me. This fact has become known over the years. It has been the subject of research and scientific inquiry, and we know that in fact 88 per cent of taxpayers who claim the $100 deduction do not donate that money or any substantial part of it to volunteer organizations. Statistics indicate that only about 20 per cent of those dollars are donated.

So we have established the fact that this deduction is not working to the benefit of voluntary organizations and charities in Canada. In addition, we have had this figure of $100 in force for almost two decades. We know, with the inflation rate we have experienced, that a proper amount by today's standards would be probably in excess of $500. So when members of the government party stand in this House and say this is a worthwhile proposition they are being less than candid because they know the deduction is not being used to benefit charities; secondly, the amount permitted is tremendously out of line given the inflation we have experienced over the last number of years. The government has to come to grips with this problem because what is at stake is the tremendous effort made by voluntary organizations across Canada, and I want to deal very briefly with that in the time remaining to me.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that my information comes from the Committee of National Voluntary Organizations which represents approximately 130 voluntary organizations across Canada. That committee pointed out in a report to a special committee of the PC Party on the budget and the economy that the total number of Canadians to participate in voluntary work approached three million, and that is a very substantial number. That group contributed approximately 373 million working hours, the equivalent of 218,000 person-years of voluntary labour. That represents $3.5 billion in wages forgone.

So when we talk about the volunteer movement in Canada, we are talking about a very substantial economic force and one to which the government ought to give full credit. It would give that credit, Mr. Speaker, by supporting the volunteer movement and recognizing the difficulties present in legislation and by moving to make those changes in the manner proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton South, and endorsed by organizations such as the Canadian Council on Social Development and the committee of National Voluntary Organizations.

Let me deal very briefly, Mr. Speaker, with the give-and-take proposals which were endorsed in a 1977 report by the Canadian Council on Social Development entitled "Toward a National Policy on Voluntarism". First of all, the whole purpose of the give-and-take proposition is that we remove the $100 deduction and replace it with a tax credit whereby a contributor will receive 50 cents for every dollar contributed, up to a limit of probably 20 per cent of his taxable income. Of course, if the contributor wants to take advantage of the existing provision to contribute 20 per cent of his net income to charity, he can do that but it would only apply to persons with incomes in excess of $50,000. We know that most Canadians do not have an income in that range, so what we have to do is to get ordinary Canadians contributing to these organizations. We are not going to do that with the current provision because in fact it is regressive, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and his officials know it. Not only does it not encourage contributions, it in fact discourages contributions.

We know from the debate so far, Mr. Speaker, that there are probably 50,000 volunteer organizations and charities registered under the Income Tax Act. As I said, they represent millions of Canadians. But here we are as the legislators for all Canadians actively discouraging contributions to these organizations. That is a shame not only on Parliament but particularly on the government.

I want to take the opportunity to place on the record the remarks of the chairman of the Committee of National Voluntary Organizations who pointed out the political difficulty these organizations face because they are non-partisan in nature and they suffer as a result. Their point is not always brought forward, which is simply a request for fair treatment and the development of a national policy on voluntarism to correct this unfair treatment. We have heard in the debate so far references to restraint and the need to curb government spending, but the fact of the matter is the contribution made by these organizations is a very positive one and it must be encouraged in a period of restraint. I am thinking particularly of organizations like post-secondary schools, universities and hospitals across Canada which will be faced with cutbacks in government funding. Universities, for example, receive almost 85 per cent of their funding from governments, and the other 15 per cent has to come from student fees and the private sector. We all know that students cannot afford substantial increases, in fact any increases, in tuition fees. Where will the additional funds come from? They have to come from individuals willing to support universities in this time of need. That applies not only to universities but to hospitals and a number of other institutions which receive their funding from government and are now facing cutbacks. So when we talk about voluntary organizations, we are not only talking about organizations like the Royal Canadian Legion, 500,000 strong, which has contributed so much to volunteer services, or the voluntary firemen; we are now talking about institutions like universities and hospitals.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that the parliamentary secretary wants to make a contribution, but my experience has been that I never received any benefit from the Liberal Party in this House in the matter of speaking in debate, and I think the previous speaker on that side overshot his time. So I will tell the parliamentary secretary something about the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan) and voluntarism in this country. I have here a picture of the Secretary of State, and you know what he is doing? He is presenting a cheque for $7,800 to the Nova Scotia Volunteer Week Committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: Do you know what that $7,800 was used for? I have the return right here in my hand; it was used to pay a $3,600 salary to the wife of the deputy clerk of the Privy Council. That is how they use charity funds. Take that message back to the Secretary of State. Take that message of how he abuses the charity and voluntary organizations in Canada, and come back some other time to the House of Commons to explain your stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being five o'clock, the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until Monday, August 2, at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

APPLICATION OF WAGE RESTRAINT PROGRAM TO STAFF OF MEMBERS AND SENATORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. One thousand and twenty-five women and 247 men who make up the staff of MPs and Senators are to become the latest victims of the government's unjust society. The government amendment introduced last Friday to the wage restraint legislation, Bill C-124, treats staff members, who have no security or tenure, more harshly than it treats public servants or even members of this House. Therefore I move, seconded by all members of the official opposition:

That the government immediately amend the legislation before us in Bill C-124 so that its provisions take effect for the staffs of MPs and Senators on the expiry of their present salary arrangements as they will for all employees in the public service, and that the staffs of MPs and Senators not be singled out for punitive action by the government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

INCREASE IN RENTS FOR GRANVILLE ISLAND MARKET LEASES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Granville Island Market is operated in trust for CMHC. Since July 1 the merchants are operating without leases because CMHC has multiplied the rents by 100 per cent and 200 per cent on one-year lease renewals with no options to renew. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That this House demand of the minister responsible for CMHC that he remove the climate of instability within the business community of Granville Island and that his corporation live within the 6 and 5 guideline his government is imposing on others.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF SUNSET LAWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Canadians are finally realizing that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is galloping us down the slippery slope to complete socialism. The energy minister for the British government, Mr. Nigel Lawson, is quoted as saying that this fall or winter when that government sells off its state-owned oil company to the private sector, "It will be the biggest new issue that the London Stock Exchange has ever seen." The British government will sell 51 per cent to the public. Hurrah for the mother of democracy!

At a time when other governments—Britain and the U.S. are notable examples—are selling off state enterprises, Socialist Liberal Canada is adding to the total of more money-losing Crown corporations. Whereas privatization means more competition, lower prices to the consumer, badly needed injections of cash for government, a smaller bureaucracy, and a larger stake for Canadians in their country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the government immediately embrace sunset laws and make the average Canadian a true partner by stock offerings in various of the 480 Crown agencies. Petro-Canada would be a significant first step in tipping the balance back to the private sector. If it's ours, make it ours.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SUGGESTED STRENGTHENING OF POWERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my motion arises out of the fact the recession has hit Canada harder than most other industrialized nations. Underlying this, and the inability of the Canadian government to respond properly to this economic crisis, is the fact that we have a degree of foreign ownership in Canada which is higher than any other industrialized nation would permit. Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That in order that the Canadian government has the means to protect and nurture our nation's economy, measures be taken to strengthen the Foreign Investment Review Act rather than weaken it, as has been proposed in the June budget.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

CALL FOR REVIEW AND RESTRAINT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) heavy-handed threat to provincial governments and businesses dealing with the federal government to toe the 6-5 benchmark, or else, is pure and simple blackmail and, in effect, constitutes back door, extra-legal extensions of his austerity program. Many Canadian businesses have gone under; others have cut management and workers' salaries. But favourites of the government in a Liberal stronghold are not required to trim fat. Favourite son treatment and preferential loans are assured. Therefore, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That if the government is serious about the 6 per cent society it hopes to create, it review and slash its own runaway spending and cease its huge payouts to Liberal Party golden-haired businesses.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

PERMISSION SOUGHT TO USE IMPERIAL AND METRIC MEASUREMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, Canada's push toward metric has been unnecessary and costly for farmers, as well as exceedingly frustrating. Now it is resulting in expensive crop losses and possible environmental hazards because of major mistakes in chemical formulations given in the new metric books and pamphlets. For example, a loss of 200 acres of dead alfalfa was reported in the weekend news. Under imperial measures farmers could spot such errors which often are typographical, but the strange metric language makes this almost impossible. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That manufacturers and processors be permitted to include imperial as well as metric measurements and instructions on their product labels and books.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

LACK OF TRAINED PERSONNEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, for several years Canadians have pointed with pride to their high technology industry. To be told now that the industry could suffer permanent damage because of a shortage of highly-skilled people in our domestic supply is simply inexcusable. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration launch a massive national training program to match people with jobs, using innovative training and retraining methods so that this only growth industry in our country need not apply for offshore help.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

DEVELOPMENT OF FEDERAL LAND IN EAST BURNABY, B.C.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the residents of East Burnaby are very strongly opposed to the building of the proposed Stormont-Newcombe Freeway connector, which would cause serious disruption to a quiet residential neighbourhood, and in view of the fact that the Stormont-Newcombe connector can only be built through federal land on the George Derby Hospital property with the consent of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly):

That this House, while agreeing that surplus federal lands should be returned to the municipality of Burnaby, strongly urge the federal Minister of Public Works to oppose any plan for development of the George Derby lands which would permit the construction of the Stormont-Newcombe exchange through East Burnaby.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

HEALTH

SUGGESTED STUDY OF ILLNESS RELATED TO UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, scientific studies have shown that, as unemployment rises, we can expect an increase in prison admissions and physical and mental health problems in Canada. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to provide the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs with the necessary reference to allow it to inquire and report to Paliament on appropriate measures for the identification, prevention and treatment of such persons undergoing physical and mental problems related to unemployment.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

AMENDMENT AFFECTING STAFF OF LEGISLATORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, since in report stage debate Friday on Bill C-124 the government introduced an amendment rolling back wage increases already granted to employees of Members of Parliament and Senators, since this amendment would treat these low-paid workers differently from other groups of workers affected by the bill, and since it is called the "Baker" amendment by Liberal members of the House in honour of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and the "Johnston" amendment by the Conservatives in honour of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker):

That the House give these hon. members the opportunity to denounce their unwanted offspring and allow them, with unanimous consent, to introduce a Johnston-Baker amendment to allow affected employees the right to retain the salaries already granted.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EFFECT OF EXCISE TAX ON FOOD COSTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, whereas the excise tax increases the cost of production of foods produced on farms, and the price becomes more and more inflationary as the said foods move from farms to consumers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That this House implores the government to recognize the damage this aspect of the national energy policy is doing to this country and rescind the said tax at once. This would be a splendid start if the government really wants to reduce inflation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, whereas the first Monday in August is a holiday celebrated by most employees in the country, and whereas the employees of the House of Commons would have received a holiday for the first Monday in August had the House not sat today, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson):

TRANSPORT

MAISLIN TRUCKING COMPANY—GOVERNMENT LOAN GUARANTEE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement late Friday afternoon, in almost a furtive way, that Maislin trucking was going to be bailed out by the government to the tune of a $34 million loan guarantee, I would ask the Prime Minister, as the leader of this land who is trying to get Canadians to go on a crusade of frugality, and who is trying to show restraint in government spending, does this type of government action not make a complete mockery of the government's present attempts at restraint when the government is, in effect, bailing out a near bankrupt company.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I suppose that that is a question of judgment and the hon. member has already expressed his views, as did another member of his party, on Friday, I believe. But in the view of this government, since this company had plans for recovery which were judged to be acceptable and plausible by the banks and the government, it was important to try to give them assistance. It is always a difficult judgment in cases like this. I noticed to my recollection, that the Tory party did not criticize when we guaranteed Chrysler, when it was near bankruptcy, and that appears to have been a fairly good gamble. They did not criticize when we supported Massey-Ferguson. I am just a bit puzzled why they criticize when we give assistance to Maislin.

Mr. Nowlan: Perhaps to help educate the Prime Minister, if one could, on why there is some concern about this extraordinary assistance to the Maislin Company, the two examples the Prime Minister named were two that are presently covered under the ILAP program of assistance to the manufacturing and processing industries. This is assistance in a brand new field, to a service industry.

QUERY RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO SERVICE INDUSTRIES

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is again to the Prime Minister. To show leadership, it is now to be taken by any other business concern in this country, especially the service industries which are just keeping their heads above water, that it is perhaps better for them to go under water and apply for assistance than to make rigorous judgments and sacrifices that the Prime Minister is asking for, or should they come to Ottawa to see some of their political friends to get assistance? That is the reason for the concern here.

What incentives are there for the managers in other service industries across this country to try to sacrifice and show restraint, when this company, because of poor management, taking over an American concern and going into debt many millions of dollars, is able to be bailed out?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the House knows that in the budgets of June and November, there were forms of assistance to smaller enterprises in difficulty. That was the definition which applied—when small businesses were in difficulty they could apply for the bond for special assistance under the budget. As I replied in my first answer, we also look at larger enterprises, particularly when they are key to a whole region and when there are many jobs to be saved. We not only try to assist the small and medium-sized enterprises, we also look at the larger enterprises, as in the case of Chrysler, Massey-Ferguson and Maislin.

• (1420)

QUERY RESPECTING SOURCE OF REPRESENTATIONS TO GOVERNMENT

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I am a little hesitant to ask my supplementary question, but I will ask it very directly of the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister really trying to fool anybody, that if it had not been for Charles Bronfman and other political leaders close to the Prime Minister in Montreal, Maislin would not have received help?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I think the question itself is unfair. I can assure the hon. member that—

Mr. Nowlan: What about the All-Star game in Montreal?

Mr. Trudeau: —in so far as I know, Mr. Bronfman has made no representations, nor have his associates, to members of this government. They certainly have made no representations to me with regard to Maislin. I do not know why the hon. member is giving them credit for that.

Mr. Nowlan: What about the All-Star game in Montreal?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I would like to hear the supplementary about the All-Star game. I am not sure about its relevancy, but let us hear the question if the hon. member does not want to deal only in innuendoes.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Nowlan: Well, if Madam Speaker will allow me, I will put the question. Were you and Mr. Bronfman together at the All-Star game in Montreal when this matter was discussed?

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: I did not hear the question.

Mr. Trudeau: If you will allow the question, I will try to answer.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

TIMING OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF ASSISTANCE TO MAISLIN

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On Friday last, in answer to a direct question from me with regard to Maislin Industries, the minister stated that no decision had been made at that point. The minister said, "When matters are at a final and definitive stage, I will be happy to make an announcement." Will the minister now tell the House what developments took place between noon and five o'clock on Friday to make him happy before the announcement was made?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, late in the afternoon, shortly before my announcement, there was an acceptance of the conditional offer referred to in my press release, and that led to my decision to make the announcement.

PURCHASING OF CANADIAN EQUIPMENT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. In the past Maislin Industries have not been particularly good corporate citizens in that they tend to purchase as much of their equipment as possible outside Canada.

Mr. Clark: Like Petro-Canada.

Mr. Ellis: Does the agreement for the loan guarantee carry with it any strings requiring Maislin to buy Canadian, or is that ignored also, just as the fact that the majority of the guaranteed $34 million will end up in the United States is also ignored?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I do not accept the hon. member's premise. It is my understanding that the loans to be guaranteed by the government will be loans made by the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. With respect to the matter of purchasing and sourcing, these are areas which we are still exploring with the company. But I can say there is one matter of Canadian sourcing and Canadian supply which my hon. friend has completely forgotten to mention, and that is the supply of 2,000 Canadian jobs. He does not think it is important. We do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

SUNCOR CORPORATION—DEFINITION OF HISTORICAL PROFIT MARGINS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister will probably recall that on Tuesday last, in a statement issued by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with regard to Suncor, it was stated that the company has also committed itself to supporting federal wage guidelines of 6 per cent and 5 per cent and—this is the part with which I want to deal—will limit increases of prices not subject to the energy agreement with Alberta to levels that are consistent with the lower rates of interest and costs and restoration of historical profit margins.

On the weekend, Leonard Good, the director general in the federal Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, said that he simply did not know the implications of this statement in terms of its legality or monitoring, or in deciding the definition of "historical profit margins." Since it is the Minister of Finance who will have to decide what historical profit margins are, and given that this is the first in a whole series of what I suspect will be attempts by companies to restore what they consider to be historical profit margins, what is the definition that the government intends to apply to the term "historical profit margins?"

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have not seen the quote that is attributed to Mr. Good in terms of the commitment given by Suncor. It has been spelled out in a press release and, as my hon. friend has indicated, the government will follow the evolution of prices. We have not introduced a system of price controls any more than we have instituted a system of wage controls of a general nature. We have asked for the voluntary co-operation of industry, of the private sector and of the unions.

• (1425)

In this particular instance, the company has volunteered to adhere to the wage guidelines which the government has imposed upon itself. It has also volunteered to keep its price increases to a minimum level, bearing in mind the factors to which the hon. member has referred. We are operating on the basis of a voluntary commitment system. We will examine how the company behaves as time goes on, under this voluntary commitment. I remind the hon. member that the government has not introduced a system of wage and price controls in the Canadian economy.

BENCHMARK TO BE USED IN ESTABLISHING HISTORICAL PROFIT MARGINS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I put to the minister that it says quite clearly the company has committed itself that it will limit increases in prices, those outside the energy agreement, to something it calls the "restoration of historical profit margins." In order to get the assistance from the government, the company obviously felt it had to make a commitment. What will the government use as its benchmark to establish historical profit margins? Would the minister consider the six-year average 1976 to 1981? Would that be a suitable benchmark for historical profit margins?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, this is a matter that will be examined as the situation evolves. This is a voluntary commitment given by the company in exchange for a special contribution for the realization of a very important project that will generate several thousand jobs in Ontario and throughout Canada. We are going to work on this basis through the cooperation of the industry and, I hope, the unions. This is the way the program is going to be implemented.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, it is quite clear that the senior officials in the minister's own department do not know how to deal with that particular phrase. The government is not prepared to accept voluntary restraint for its employees or, for that matter, employees of Members of Parliament. The company believes it has made a commitment. Given the six-year average from 1976 to 1981 for profits in refining and marketing, those areas that fall outside the energy agreement, the average was $51 million per year. In 1980 and 1981 the average was more than twice that amount. Is the government prepared to demand from Suncor that it go back to the five or six-year average of $51 million from the $100 million to $115 million that it received in 1980 and 1981?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that the government will not rely on a single year to establish such a reference. Second, we certainly would not use the highest year, which was 1981, as a reference point. One would have to look at an extended period of time. This matter is going to be examined and discussed with the company.

SMALL BUSINESS

APPLICATION OF GOVERNMENT RESTRAINT CRITERIA TO LOANS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It is prompted by the loan guarantee to the Maislin Trucking Company and the condition of the 6-5 regime. A week ago in this House we passed the Small Businesses Loans Act. The minister is aware that that gives a preferential rate of interest, and this government or any other government guarantees the loans to qualified small-business men. In light of the Maislin precedent, does the minister envisage that when the bank allows a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act which the government guarantees, the 6-5 regime will apply there? Will it also apply to the small business development bond and to the 4 per cent subsidy? Does the minister envisage that as a result of the criteria?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, it is not apparent in what capacity the hon. member for Cambridge addresses this question to me as President of the Treasury Board. Neither of the issues to which he makes reference come within the jurisdiction of the Board. Perhaps he might care to address a supplementary to some other minister.

• (1430)

APPLICATION OF RESTRAINT PROGRAM TO BUSINESSES RECEIVING GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has said that he wants businessmen and others in the country who receive grants or government assistance to abide by the 6-5 guidelines. A week ago last Friday we passed in this House a bill respecting the Small Businesses Loans Act whereby there is a guarantee by this government to pay the banks in the event of default by small-business men who receive loans. Does the Prime Minister envisage that the 6-5 guidelines will apply to small businesses in circumstances under which loans made by banks are guaranteed by the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of the substance of the question, but I would be happy to consider the hon. member's question as a representation and look into it.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. By guaranteeing a loan to Maislin the government assumes a contingent liability. In relation to any Crown corporation or private company for which the government carries a contingent liability on its books, is it the policy of the government that the 6-5 guidelines apply to the beneficiary of that contingent liability? The question is as simple as that.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if there are additional cases similar to Maislin, obviously it will be the intention of the government to seek similar assurance with respect to the 6-5 guidelines. The hon. member has asked a question about a law passed by Parliament establishing the conditions under which certain funds are available to small businesses. If hon. members are suggesting that in those cases we ought to add another condition that the 6-5 be applied, that is something to which I would give consideration. I would do so, however, somewhat hesitantly.

APPLICATION OF GUIDELINES

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, then is it the policy of the government that any existing contingent liability prior to the budget is not affected by the 6-5 guidelines? Hon. members are not asking for anything. We are trying to find out whether the 6-5 guidelines are to be made applicable to a private or public group or corporation which benefits by virtue of any contingent liability assumed by the government once the government assumes the contingent liability. I believe the minister can answer that because he is being prompted by the Prime Minister.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the answer I gave earlier is the precise answer I want to give to the second question, because it covers the whole matter fully.

Mr. Clark: You don't know. You don't have a policy.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MOVEMENT OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS FROM HALIFAX TO QUEBEC CITY—REQUEST THAT MINISTER MAKE STATEMENT

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. On Friday last the CBC questioned the minister concerning the projected move of the headquarters of the naval reserves from Halifax to Quebec City. The minister replied at that time that, if the move was decided upon, he would make an announcement at the appropriate time and place. There are many parliamentarians who believe that the appropriate place for ministers to make announcements on policy is in the House of Commons. Will the minister be making a statement on motions today on this subject?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madame Speaker, as far as I am concerned, I do not think that is the proper way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the former minister of national defence knows perfectly well that achieving fair and equitable francophone participation in the Canadian Navy is an issue that has been discussed for a number of years in navy circles. The civilian officials of my department asked me about this when I became Minister of National Defence in 1980, and at that time I asked the department's military authorities to make a study of the matter and make appropriate recommendations on how to achieve a fairer and more equitable participation of francophones in the Navy. They approached the issue in various ways and made a number of suggestions, and I think it is now an administrative decision that is up to the Department of National Defence and the Commander of the Canadian Maritime Force. Once they have decided what is to be done, we shall make a joint announcement at the appropriate time.

[English]

REASONS FOR RELOCATION

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the minister knows that studies were undertaken and recommendations recently made offering him six different courses. In evidence given to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence the president of the Naval Officers Association recommended—and officers of the minister's own staff have recommended—that an additional two units be placed in the province of Quebec. This would require six regular personnel per unit, and new jobs would be created. Is the truth of the matter that the existing 60 jobs to be moved from Halifax to Quebec City are the real reason the minister is going through with this move, which will lead to nothing but inefficiency in the naval service?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, this question has been addressed by my department at the administrative level. My department has a solution. It has been proposed to me, I have accepted it, and they have decided to make the announcement of these—

Mr. Clark: "They" have? You are the minister.

Mr. Lamontagne: I am the minister, but I do not play politics with defence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE MANUFACTURED CARS—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for International Trade. Several weeks ago the minister indicated that he had eased entry of Japanese auto imports into the country as a gesture of good will toward the Japanese in trade negotiations. I wonder if the minister could inform the House as to the development of these negotiations or any positive things which may have occurred since this gesture of good will.

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, I know how interested the hon. member and other hon. members are regarding a solution to the problem with respect to Japan and the car issue. Our officials left for Tokyo during the weekend, and it is hoped that within a week we will be able to resolve this issue.

AMENDMENT AFFECTING WAGES OF LEGISLATORS' STAFFS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. On Friday last the minister gave notice that he intends actually to cut the pay of staffs of Members of Parliament and senators, 80 per cent of whom are women. These staffs are denied free collective bargaining rights and, in many instances, are certainly not overpaid. In view of the fact that this sleazy, shameful move, which constitutes nothing less than playing cheap politics on the backs of hard-working parliamentary staff members, puts this group of employees in a worse position than any other employees in the country, including Members of Parliament and senators, will the minister explain this shameful betrayal of our employees, and will be reconsider this shabby scapegoating amendment?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I think the accusation is somewhat exaggerated. If I may take a moment, let me explain why this amendment was judged to be necessary. Hon. members may recall that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, supported by the hon. member for Perth and the hon. member for Peterborough, accused the government of treating ministerial exempt staff with undue favour by providing a 10 per cent raise which was decided May 13. When I look at Hansard, I see that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said on July 5:

—why does he—

He was referring to me.

—not do the honourable thing and roll them all back so that the exempt staff will stand in exactly the same position as public servants?

In fact, exempt staff did stand in exactly the same position as public servants, but to a degree the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton apparently was successful in misleading the country and independent observers into thinking some favouritism had been granted.

It is absolutely fundamental to the credibility of this program that the government be perceived as dealing harshly with Members of Parliament, with itself, and with others. Thanks to the efforts of the opposition, that has become virtually impossible in the present circumstances, and hence it is with some regret—but, nevertheless, judged to be necessary—that we put all political appointees, in keeping with the request of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, on the same footing.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The minister has broken the solemn promise he made to this House on July 9 when he said there would be no reductions in wages and salaries for anyone other than Members of Parliament and senators. The minister stated, in reply to representations made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, that he would not make ministerial staffs, as he put it, "particular sacrificial lambs." How can the minister stand before us with any sense of equity or fairness and say he intends to make this particular group of employees the victims of his game of political one-upmanship with the Conservative Party? Will the minister now stop trying to score cheap political points on the backs of the staffs of Members of Parliament and senators?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, we are not talking about political points. We are talking about a national assault on inflation, with the federal government taking the lead.

• (1440)

Because of accusations that have been made which, on their face and on the facts, are false, a number of observers such as the Ottawa Citizen last week, a respected newspaper in this country, wrote that:

Another example of its bankruptcy—

Speaking of the government—

—came when Liberal MPs defeated a Tory effort to have cabinet aides' salaries cut back to the 6 per cent guideline, along with public servants.

Clearly, even the editorial staff of the Ottawa Citizen was misled by the statements coming from the member for Nepean-Carleton. Not only that, they refer to 11 per cent, but the next day, I should point out, there was an apology in the newspaper pointing out that the figure was 10 per cent. So there is no effort here at all to take advantage or to score cheap political points.

What is important is that the government be perceived as taking the lead and that it not be accused falsely by members of the opposition. It is with regret that I introduced this amendment, but in the circumstances it is clearly necessary if the public has the impression that political appointees were enjoying some special benefit.

QUERY RESPECTING ADVICE GIVEN TO MINISTER

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, if there is an assault on anything it is on honesty. That is the first assault. The second is on the staff of Members of Parliament who work in this House.

The government has never taken my advice on anything in the ten years I have been here, and it has not taken it now. I want to ask the minister what highly paid, politically appointed member of his exempt staff advised such a stupid, harsh, vindictive move as the government just put forward in its amendment in this House?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I mark the unctuous tones in which the hon. member addresses this issue. As my parliamentary secretary indicated last week, the hon. member is the spiritual father of this whole affair. Let me quote the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton as reported at page 18984 of Hansard as follows:

—why does the President of the Treasury Board not do the honourable thing? Rather than defending the indefensible increases for political staff, the appointees of himself and his colleagues, why does he not do the honourable thing and roll them all back so that the exempt staff will stand in exactly the same position as public servants?

He asked for an amendment to roll back the salaries of exempt staff. He proposed an amendment before committee to roll back salaries of exempt staff. The exempt staff of ministers stand on exactly the same footing as all political appointees—

Mr. Clark: That is another falsehood.

Mr. Johnston: —of parliamentarians in this House and in the Senate, and in the office of the Leader of the Opposition and in the caucus bureaus. If we are to play the hair-shirt role, Madam Speaker, I suggest we all play it, and that the hon. member stop speaking out of both sides of his mouth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST THAT MINISTER RESIGN

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that the exempt staff is not the same as the staff in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They have higher salaries and the protection of an entrée into the Public Service of Canada. In other words, they are different. More than that, they are just the pets of the government and it wanted to protect them when it was found with its hand in the cookie jar.

If the minister is going to accept my advice, will he accept this piece of advice, that is, resign, and let them put someone competent in his position?

Hon. Donald. J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I take it that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is asking me to follow his example when he resigned as House leader. I have no intention of resigning, the Prime Minister and God willing!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: One has not been introduced to the other.

Mr. Johnston: I feel that in the circumstances we have done the logical if not, perhaps, unfortunate thing in the circumstances. These circumstances have been created by the kind of argument just put forward by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. Now, all of a sudden, exempt staff are different in some way from parliamentary staff.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Johnston: Is a secretary working in a minister's office who is on an exempt staff budget different from a secretary working at the next desk on a parliamentary budget? I would ask the hon. member to explain that conundrum to the House.

AGRICULTURE

INCREASE IN POTATO INSPECTION FEE—REQUEST FOR ROLLBACK

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the President of the Treasury Board. As the 1200 per cent increase in the charge for table stock potato inspection for export was implemented on July 19, and as the minister announced that any increases higher than 6 per cent which were not implemented before June 28 would be rolled back, would he advise the House if this 1200 per cent increase will be rolled back to 6 per cent?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, finally we have a sensible and reasonable question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: A directive was issued by Treasury Board to all ministers withdrawing the delegated authority to assign any kind of increase for goods and services to the government in excess of 6 per cent. I have not looked at the specific details. The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of this question. It would seem to me on its face that this is one of the increases that should be rolled back.

TRANSPORT

APPLICATION OF RESTRAINT PROGRAM TO CANADIAN NATIONAL FREIGHT AND FERRY RATES

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission has inquired of CN Rail if the 6 per cent maximum guideline will apply to rail freight traffic. CN Rail responded by advising that, since it had not received any specific directives from the federal government, it would continue to price its rail services to reflect normal market factors while attempting to recover, as much as it can, the cost increases due to inflation.

Could the minister advise the House whether directives will be issued to CN Rail to limit their price increase to 6 per cent, and also will a directive be issued to CN Marine which is in charge of the ferries between P.E.I. and New Brunswick advising that a 6 per cent increase is the maximum?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, each situation is a special one. The role of the CTC is different with respect to air fares, and with respect to rail rates, for example. The present attitude is to look at each of those in particular and decide on the basis of special circumstances, if any.

Oral Questions

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

CONTRACT FOR MAINTENANCE OF CF-18 AIRCRAFT ENGINES

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. A contract is being put out for bids for the maintenance of the CF-404 engine for the new F-18 aircraft. The word in the marketplace is that Air Canada and CP Air are to be allowed to bid for the maintenance of these engines. Is that true and, if so, why are they being allowed to bid on this contract?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for the question. The matter is under serious consideration. There has been a request both by Air Canada and CP Air that they be permitted to offer their facilities to provide repair and overhaul for the CF-404 engine. My department is very interested in seeking the best possible return for taxpayers' dollars. We are considering very seriously whether Air Canada and CP Air would be permitted to bid on the contract.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF FAIR COMPETITION

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, what kind of assurances can the minister give Orenda Engines and Rolls-Royce, the two companies that have been overhauling and keeping these engines up to date for the armed forces over the years? What kind of assurances can he give them that the competition will be fair, because of the facilities that Air Canada and CP Air have at the present time?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, when the offer was made by Air Canada and by CP Air to participate in the bidding, one of the major considerations, of course, was fairness. That is still one of the major considerations. My officials have been directed to analyse what the bidding criteria will be in order to ensure that there is absolute fairness in the bidding process for all participants and in the eventual selection of a successful bidder.

ENERGY

AWARDING OF DRILLING PERMITS OFF SABLE ISLAND

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question that relates to the fairness of the bidding process and it is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It concerns the awarding of drilling permits off Sable Island to Petro-Canada and others, with no competitive bidding being allowed. The minister has said:

• (1450)

It was quite clear in our view that no one else could have come forward with a better bid.

Would the minister be prepared to publish the evidence which allowed him to deny other companies the right to bid on this matter?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to refer the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to the fact that we had the full support and agreement of the Government of Nova Scotia in this particular decision.

This decision means a $500 million investment in offshore drilling by Canadian oil and gas companies which include not only Petro-Canada but Husky Oil and Bow Valley. This deal means the companies concerned will spend that money in the space of the next three years, and that at the end of the second year the companies will relinquish 75 per cent of the lands they prefer not to keep to the government. In addition, the companies gave extremely strong commitments to Canadian content for goods and services. It was quite clear, in our judgment, that no other bid could come near to this.

Mr. Andre: How do you know?

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the reference is concerned about which the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is asking, I would be pleased to send him a copy of the Canada Oil and Gas Act which includes the option for the minister to issue licences to competitors or bidders directly. I would also be pleased to send him a copy of the agreement which clearly indicates that this is an exceptionally good deal for the people of Nova Scotia and for the people of Canada, as has been stated by the Premier of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister has declined to publish his reasons for refusing competitive bidding. We are aware of the act. What we were not aware of was that the minister was going to abuse it so quickly.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, it is now the policy of the government that drilling permits will be issued without competitive bidding, or is this case involving Petro-Canada a special one?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have not refused to give the reasons. I said to the hon. member that he should read the act which was passed by this Parliament. It states quite specifically that there are two options open to the government.

Mr. Huntington: He knows the act. Answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: One is through bids and the other is through direct issuance. My intention is to follow generally the practice of open bidding except in rare circumstances.

As far as the reasons for this particular case are concerned, I again would invite the right hon. member to read the agreement reached by the government with the companies and I think he will, as did the Premier of Nova Scotia, conclude that indeed this was a very, very good deal for Canada.

LOCATION OF MARINE SUPPLY BASE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, one of the conditions accepted by the consortium is to spend $1 million to study the feasibility of building a marine supply base somewhere in Nova Scotia. Will the minister tell us whether one of the locations being considered is in the constituency of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. MacEachen: I hope so.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, certainly one of the sites being used is Mulgrave where, as a matter of fact, Petro-Canada is going to have its supply base to start. The consortium, and Petro-Canada in particular, is going to carry out the study over the next year, and a decision will be announced in due time.

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this deal smells, and it deserves to be investigated by a committee of the Parliament of this country. Would the minister allow, in the interest of all of the facts being known, an all-party committee of this House to investigate all aspects of the issuance of these permits without bids, including allowing the committee to examine, in confidence if necessary, all oral and all written undertakings between the government and representatives of the consortium? Will the minister let Parliament look into this deal?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, Mulgrave is the site that was chosen by Petro-Canada on its own.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: It happens to be the site closest to the drilling site. This decision has been made by Petro-Canada on its own.

Mr. Andre: If you believe that, I have some land in Florida for you.

Mr. Lalonde: I might tell the hon. member that, if he finds that this deal smells, the Leader of the Opposition stinks.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Epp: You have risen to new lows.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF POLAR BEAR PASS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indians Affairs and Northern Development. Last Friday the minister hand delivered a fatal blow to Polar Bear Pass, one of the 140 ecological sites north of 60 that have been identified by the United Nations International Environmental Program. That fatal blow was the government's decision to allow oil and gas exploration in this sensitive ecological area. Since the minister has clearly not paid attention to the government's own environmental advisory council report on the threat to wildlife in the north from oil and gas exploration, will he take immediate steps to declare Polar Bear Pass a full ecological site and establish other such areas in the north?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Madam Speaker, I was in that area within the last two or three days. We have declared an ecological site there with the approval of many people. I believe the news report upon which the hon. member has founded his question is erroneous. We are not giving Panarctic permission to drill. We are not approving drilling in the Polar Bear Pass. In fact we have been negotiating with Panarctic over some years to relinquish all of the claims that have existed heretofore.

REQUEST THAT DRILLING LICENCES BE RESCINDED

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, is the minister saying that Panarctic has not been granted any licence to drill in the Polar Bear area? If that is correct, fine. If it is not correct, will the minister make sure that licences to drill for either oil or gas will be rescinded in view of the fact that Panarctic has a very bad track record in polluting the north and leaving all kinds of drilling garbage around the sites.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I do not think the hon. member listened to my answer to his first question, unless he wanted to make somewhat of a speech by way of a second question. I already indicated the relinquishing of any pre-existing claims by Panarctic in the area is being negotiated, we think successfully.

BOMBING OF BEIRUT—INQUIRY WHETHER CANADA PROTESTED TO ISRAEL

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Following the latest bombings carried out by Israel over Beirut, which I can only qualify today as being totally unacceptable, could the minister tell us whether he has lodged a protest with the Israel authorities and whether he will be expressing his sympathy with the Lebanese and Palestinian people?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have, in fact, decided to protest again to Israel, and I have also announced I am recommending that the Canadian ambassador and his staff leave West Beirut, for their own safety and also to safeguard Canadian interests.

MAISLIN TRUCKING COMPANY—APPLICATION OF GOVERNMENT RESTRAINT PROGRAM TO EMPLOYEES

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. There have been several estimates of the number of employees employed by Maislin Transport. The hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi has mentioned 770. We have heard 1,000 and 2,000. But what we do know is that there are at least 4,500 employees of Maislin Transport. Does the 6-5 restraint regime apply to the American employees of Maislin Transport?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the commitment of Maislin applies to its Canadian employees.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONVENING OF FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Prime Minister. Section 37 of the Canada Act requires the convening of a first ministers' conference within one year of the proclamation of the Constitution, making the effective date April 17. Has the Prime Minister contacted the provinces concerning acceptable dates for that first ministers' conference, and is he considering February, 1983, for that conference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not corresponded directly with the premiers on that particular date, but I have discussed with the native leaders optimal dates. February and March are dates they have suggested. I have instructed my officials to contact their opposite numbers in the provinces to see if there would be agreement on that. I have not yet had a report.

• (1500)

CONFERENCE AGENDA

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Prime Minister. As he knows, Section 37 requires that at least one agenda item be on the table for that first ministers' conference, namely, the definition and inclusion of aboriginal rights in Canada's Constitution. Is he seeing that first ministers' conference as fulfilling that responsibility only, or is he considering other agenda items? If so, what might they be?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it would be my intention to consider the addition of other items in a subsequent or precedent conference, both of them back-to-back, if the premiers are agreeable to discussing other items. As the hon. member pointed out, the Canada Act obliges us to have a meeting on that one subject. There is no obligation on the other subjects, but I am open to discussion on any other items which the premiers would want to see put on the agenda.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—RECALL OF AMBASSADOR

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he say whether or not the Canadian ambassador is being recalled from Beirut because he has requested his own recall, or are we simply removing a source of acute embarrassment to Israel by this recall?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I had left the decision to the ambassador as to whether or not he felt he should leave at any time. He did not exercise that discretion. But as a result of the heavy bombardment over the weekend and the fact that our staff there has been subjected to pressure for so long, plus the difficulties we are now having communicating with them—with electricity and other services unavailable, it was very difficult to get through—I felt that the time had now come to ask them to close the embassy in West Beirut and to operate as effectively as they can for the near future from the suburb of Jounieh.

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the reports of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petitions presented by hon. members on Friday, July 30, 1982, and finds that the petitions meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

MR. LEWIS—RECONSIDERATION OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege to present a petition on behalf of 728 residents of the riding of Simcoe North, many of them contacted by the Orillia Fish and Game Conservation Club. They suggest that Canada needs tougher laws to control the criminal use of firearms, tougher courts and tougher punishment, not further controls on those who use firearms for sport purposes.

The petitioners feel that the passage of Bill C-451 would infringe upon the rights of law-abiding citizens who own and use guns for legitimate purposes. It is their request that the petition be reviewed, and they wish to have it presented to you at this time.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING CREDIT UNIONS AND CAISSES POPULAIRES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-660, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable government to have the lawful ability to deposit money in credit unions and caisses populaires. It is an amendment to the Financial Administration Act. It splits the simple matter of helping credit unions and caisses populaires from the controversial and far-reaching amendments proposed by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) with respect to Bill C-96, and it would meet a need of those credit unions and caisses populaires.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING REGISTRATION OF POLITICAL PARTIES

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull) asked for leave to introduce Bill C-661, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (registration of political parties).

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Isabelle: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to remove any trace of ambiguity as to the national character of political parties desiring to operate at the federal level, by restricting registration to those parties that are fielding the required number of candidates, distributed over a majority of the provinces. Under the present legislation, the required number is fifty, but there is no reference as to how the candidates should be distributed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-124

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-124, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, one sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of each of the report stage and the third reading stage of the bill; and

That 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on those days, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

He said: Madam Speaker, I believe the time has come to move expeditiously to the conclusion of report stage and third reading of Bill C-124.

First, let me say that the proceedings to date have been fruitful, that the work of committee members on all sides of the House has been productive, has brought forward change and comment, and that we now have before us a number of additional motions which appear on the Order Paper, some of which were discussed briefly on Friday and a number of which, I hope, we will have the opportunity of debating during the closing hours of report stage. I would point out that in the course of the debate before the committee a number of significant amendments were made. In addition, of course, we have the further amendments on the Order Paper to which I made reference.

Let me, if I may, for just a moment touch upon those to remind the House where major progress has been made in improving the bill and in making it more effective in achieving its ends and also more equitable in its application. I refer the House to the change in Clause 3, subparagraph (4), which has the effect of extending the application of the bill to employees of Canadian Pacific Limited and its subsidiaries as well as to the employees of a number of other railway companies which are specifically enumerated, namely the Ontario Northland Railway, the Algoma Central Railway Company, Toronto Terminals Railway Company and Shawinigan Falls Terminal Railway Company.

• (1510)

Members will recall that these amendments were brought about because of the history and importance attached to joint bargaining by both the unions, on the one hand, and by management on the other. This joint bargaining has a history of something like ninety years, and with this amendment which was introduced at committee stage that joint bargaining, that very important institution, will be preserved.

In addition, much has been said during the course of this debate with respect to the issue of collective bargaining and the importance of continuing a measure of collective bargaining during the period of this wage restraint program. At the committee stage I introduced an amendment which is now found in Clause 7 of the bill. That amendment goes some way to restoring and preserving collective bargaining in that it permits parties to a collective agreement which has been extended in accordance with the terms and conditions of the act to amend by agreement any terms or conditions of the collective agreement or arbitral award other than wage rates or other terms and conditions of the compensation plan.

This means with respect to those non-monetary items—and I think particularly of the issue of health and safety which is of concern I know to all members of this House, to members of management and to members of the unions themselves—that they will be permitted during the extension of any agreement under the provisions of the law to continue to collectively bargain and to agree on these very important areas.

There stands on the Order Paper further amendments dealing with the issue of collective bargaining. There is a proposed amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), and I hope in the time remaining to us we will have the opportunity of exchanging our views with respect to the proposed application of that amendment. That stands as Motion No. 9.

I suggest—and I will elaborate on this a good deal further in the course of debate at report stage—that this amendment in fact falls far short of what the member for Rosedale himself seeks to achieve in terms of preserving and enhancing the collective bargaining process. At the same time I will have the opportunity to elaborate at some length on Motion No. 17 standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board, which provides that the governor in council may by order terminate the application of this act in respect of an employee or group of employees to which this act applies.

That, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, is a very significant amendment in terms of the preservation of the collective bargaining system. I indicated in this House and in a release which I made at the time this amendment was tabled that this amendment will permit parties who would otherwise be bound by this agreement to enter into negotiations and to arrive at an agreement through the application of the traditional collective bargaining process, subject to the 6 per cent and 5 per cent total limit. This means that within that limit parties will be able to negotiate, to make trade-offs, to permit items such as, for example, maternity leave, which was raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) in the course of the debate at the committee stage, to be incorporated into collective agreements and then, when the parties have reached an agreement, they will be subject to order by the governor in council, an order which will in fact terminate the application of the law with respect to that particular contract, with respect to that employer and with respect to that group of employees.

I see this amendment as being very significant. I realize I have only a few minutes to speak on the motion and hence I do not intend to engage in a wide and complete analysis of how that particular provision can be applied as opposed to how the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Rosedale will be applied. However, I suggest that this permits maximum flexibility to take account of the wide variety of circumstances that can exist with respect to any particular employee or group of employees and permit agreement to be reached through the normal operation of the collective bargaining process, subject at all times to the over-all limitation of 6 per cent and 5 per cent which, of course, is fundamental to the thrust of this wage restraint program.

We have already discussed at some length motion No. 3. It was the subject of some exchange in the House during question period. As I indicated during my comments on Friday, I regret that this amendment is necessary but I believe that in the circumstances, due to the unfortunate impression that has been created across this country and has been adopted by some observers in the media to the effect that one particular group has been singled out for favoured treatment, it was the government's decision, to counter what I call that unfortunate impression, that all political appointees in fairness must be treated on the same footing.

I know that comments have been made. We heard them on Friday, we heard them during question period. We know the effect is to treat these employees in a way which is more difficult for them than any other group of employees to which the bill applies. We know that, but we ask them also as good public servants to join with us in this anti-inflation crusade and set an example which all Canadians are being asked to follow.

It originally had been the intention of the government to limit the application of the actual rollback of wage rates to Members of Parliament and to senators—in other words, to parliamentarians. That point was made, I believe, in a question during question period from a member of the NDP.

Miss MacDonald: And my motion.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands confirms that. When I responded at an earlier period in this debate, I did say that the intention of the law was to limit the rollback to parliamentarians. However, in the circumstances in which we find ourselves where the credibility of the program is so important, where the thrust of the program is so important and where the example set by the federal government is so important, no false perceptions can be allowed to remain.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. The hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz).

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, the government has brought in closure on Bill C-124, the restraint legislation. Frankly, we hope that the 6 per cent and 5 per cent restraint program works. The problem is that it is seriously flawed, as per the amendment brought in by the minister on Friday afternoon which so seriously hurts members' staffs who have no tenure, no security, no bargaining power in unions. So we see that this legislation is seriously flawed.

• (1520)

This is a government which has proven that it is interventionist, that it likes to control—or should I say loves to control—the lives of people. My question is, if this legislation is so important, then why cut off the debate now? What is the big hurry? Indeed, what is the matter with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet who cannot seem to be capable of realizing how badly our country is hurting?

My leader has said that the hard facts are easy to manage but no one ever gets used to the human costs of Canada's economic mess. The Prime Minister keeps insisting that Canadians must "curb their expectations", that they must "restrain their wage demands and tighten their belts", ad nauseam. In the same breath, the government authorized $5 million for the 115th birthday party which in fact was over $1 million more than the previous year.

I would like to read a couple of paragraphs from a letter which I received just today from a constituent in Wainfleet. The letter is dated July 23:

> While it is encouraging that the government is finally acting based on the extreme condition of the economy it is not going to be effective enough to have appprecíable effect on the economy, or government spending.
>
> I am a white-collar worker at Atlas Steels, a specialty steel producer. In my job as metallurgical service representative, I visit many of our customers on technical problems etc. and I feel I can speak with authority when I say that the government does not know what is going on in the real world.

He goes on to say:

> Many companies including Atlas Steels are laying off (actual termination) white collar workers. At Atlas Steels there has been a 20 per cent staff cut via terminations and early retirement. Employees with 19 and 24 years service have been terminated. The government never mentions staff cuts. In fact, I read that Ottawa hired 8,024 workers during the first quarter of the year—

He concludes in the last paragraph:

> —I would ask you to do your best to bring this government to the knowledge that people are hurting a lot more than they realize. Further, help them to understand that while their recent actions make good newspaper reading, they still are about 8 months out of phase with the industrial sector of the country.

On June 23, 1982, it was stated in The Globe and Mail that "This government must curtail its own voracious appetite for more and more money to support more and more expansion of its control over Canadian resources." One indeed wonders whether the average Canadian realizes that one dollar out of every four dollars spent by the federal government is now spent on interest and debt charges—it is more like "depth charges", for it indeed will surely sink us.

The former Auditor General, James Macdonell, predicts that the deficit will reach $22.5 billion for this year. That is $3 billion more than the government estimate. He also said that Canadians face a 50-cent dollar if the present government does not get spending under control. A government serious about turning around the economy must first learn to restrain and discipline itself. Spending rose in the fiscal year 1981-82 by 22.1 per cent. This Liberal government is trying to hide its own responsibilities by blaming all of our economic problems on American policy.

As Barbara Amiel stated in the Sun on July 11, 1982, "Reagan has cut taxes; Trudeau increased them. Reagan has cut government programs; Trudeau is increasing them. Reagan is trying to cut the deficit; Trudeau has doubled it. The United States is importing less oil; Canada's oil costs are going up."

A government whose fundamental national policy is to blame others is unlikely to come up with much creative thinking or much co-operation from the people it blames, whether they are our neighbors to the south, our provinces, our businesses or our unions. As well, the suggestion of helplessness eats away at the very spirit of the Canadian people.

This land was settled and developed into the great country that it is today by our forefathers who came here to overcome the odds, try new things and accomplish goals unobtainable in the old world, for we are not at the mercy of the world. Canadians want to accomplish better things with a government that will help and not hinder them. But the tragic lack of confidence in Canada today is solely due to lack of government leadership, not lack of resources or opportunities. Much of our unemployment, our negative growth and our high interest rates have been the high price of ideology in Ottawa, laid squarely on the shoulders of the government and not the high price Canadians have to pay for a fight against inflation, as the government would have us believe.

To quote Laventhol and Horwath, chartered accountants, from their advertisement in The Globe and Mail on June 17, 1982:

> Only a major reversal will begin to answer the needs of the economy. The pride of the Minister of Finance, the stubbornness of the Minister of Energy and the ideology of the government must be set aside in order to restore the basic confidence that is key to any economic recovery in this country.

The Progressive Conservative Party believes in the Canadian people and the great future of our country. However, we must first replace this arrogant, dictatorial and self-indulgent government that is glutted with 17 years of unrestrained spending and completely out of touch with the rest of Canadian society.

Today, Canada is at a crossroads both in government policy and lack in confidence of the Canadian people as a result of the political, social and economic system. When our people no longer feel that they can count on a secure future, then the whole system falls apart. Our party is working hard to preserve the Canada that we love and believe in. We acknowledge that there has to be restraint, but over-all restraint. We must act today to solve our problems. We have to replace this government with one that will adopt new directions and restore confidence and hope—most of all hope—to Canadians, and especially the 1.3 million unemployed Canadians, the poor, the elderly, the troubled home owners, the harassed small-business people and the dispirited investors.

If the Progressive Conservative government of 1979 had been left in office and its budget approved, Canada would today be indeed a more prosperous country. The Crosbie budget was designed to stimulate and give room to the private sector to expand and develop. The NDP do not like that. The budget was designed to encourage small business and to encourage Canadians to hold ownership through shares in Canadian companies and to deal sensibly with our energy problems. The Alsands tar sands project and Cold Lake would indeed be well under way. The east coast oil and natural gas resources exploration and development would have gone ahead without the unpleasant dispute with Newfoundland on offshore mineral development. The battle over unilateral changes to the Constitution would have been avoided. Co-operative federalism would still be in place.

It is the firm conviction of our party that these same directions and thrusts of the budget are still basically right for Canada. If our party had been in power and had introduced a budget on June 28 as a majority government, we would have implemented the following measures.

I see you are preparing to stand, Mr. Speaker, so I will conclude by saying that the present government has yet to see the light. It is continuing to discriminate against job-creating investment. It is continuing to discriminate against tax-employee benefits. It is continuing to tax businesses at an increased rate. It is attacking pensioners, and it has increased government spending by 20 per cent for two consecutive years while asking Canadians to restrain themselves by 6 per cent. It is asking Canadians to finance a $20 billion deficit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

• (1530)

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I always find it amusing to listen to Conservatives speaking about this legislation, given the fact that they intend to stand in their places and support it one by one when the final vote comes. I find it a little hypocritical that they find themselves or think they are in a position to criticize something which they have already indicated they think is a step in the right direction. I often wonder if they ever read their own material in trying to decide just what side of these issues they are on. However, with that out of the way, I want to deal with what is before us.

The legislation which is before us is wrong. It is wrong because it does nothing to correct the many serious problems which currently confront Canadians and the Canadian economy. To limit the debate under Standing Order 75C as moved by the minister earlier today will not in any way assist us to bring this bill around to a point where it could at least be less oppressive. I think that is all we could hope to accomplish in this House of Commons.

When the bill was first introduced, it was totally unacceptable. Now that it has been amended, the bill is even worse. It is hard to believe that we could have gone through three or four days of committee proceedings and then found that the bill which ultimately came back to the House of Commons was worse. The chairman of the committee is holding up his hands to indicate that it was seven days. I appreciate that. I can make that out very nicely. The problem is that no matter whether it was three, four or seven days, the days were wasted, because the legislation is now more repressive and more unacceptable than it was when it first came in.

The government, together with its friends in the Tory party, has never believed in collective bargaining. It has been first in line to restrict it every single time that restriction was called for by anyone. Its supporters, the Liberal and Conservative big business supporters, are the people who are standing up and applauding this government, saying, "Don't you worry. We will be behind you all the way. You do not have to worry about us. We will restrict wages for you. We will make sure that people do not get enough to live on, do not worry. But whatever you do, do not ask us to restrict profits and do not ask us to restrict prices. After all, we need these high profits and these high prices while we are holding down people's wages."

Mr. Stewart: What pays for hospitalization?

Mr. Deans: Ian Sinclair, who now stands in the private sector and speaks on behalf of the government and its Tory friends, says, "Oh, yes, you do not have to worry about us at CP; we will make sure that we restrict the wages of our employees and we will encourage all the other people in the private sector with whom we come into contact to restrict the wages of their employees." However, he then goes on to say that companies which hold wage increases to 6 per cent cannot necessarily be expected to do the same with prices because survival, for him, depends on increased profits. He says that these profits and price margins must be restored or there will be a significant number of failures and more people will be out of work.

I ask Mr. Sinclair, the government and its supporters in the Tory party, what about the people who cannot make it with their wages restricted? What about the people who cannot afford to take on a mortgage because the government, with the support of the Tory party, has allowed the Bank of Canada to push the interest rates up and up to the point at which the average working family can no longer afford a mortgage?

What about the small businesses which are facing almost out-of-sight costs, tripled, almost directly attributable to high interest rates, which are going bankrupt because the government and its supporters in the Tory party refuse to take action to limit the interest rates which the Bank of Canada is foisting upon the people of this country?

What about the farmers in every part of the country who are facing possible bankruptcy, many of them having already gone bankrupt in record numbers in the last year? What about those farmers who went bankrupt because interest rates were far too high and they could not afford to carry the additional burden because they were not getting a sufficient amount of income? What about those farmers who are losing or who have already lost their farms because of the interest rate policy of the Liberal government, supported by the Tory party?

I say to Your Honour that to ask us now to limit this debate which will restrict the wages of people while doing absolutely nothing about the exorbitant prices which Mr. Sinclair now demands that they be allowed to charge, to limit this debate on a bill which will hold down people's incomes while bowing to Mr. Sinclair's demands that these companies must be able to charge whatever they want in order to restore their historical profit levels, is shameful. I say to Your Honour that these two parties, the Tory party, standing up together with its allies in the Liberal Party in support of their big business friends, in opposition to the people of the country, should be ashamed of themselves. These two parties, which are really one party, I suppose, under two names, should be ashamed of themselves. There they are, standing as one, standing together when it comes to people's wages. Ready, aye, ready, making sure that—

Mr. Taylor: Who supported them on property rights?

Mr. Deans: —there will be an overwhelming majority to defeat those of us who think that people's wages are far too important to be tampered with.

The government is not satisfied to restrict wage increases to 6 per cent and 5 per cent in those areas where collective bargaining is in force in the public sector. It also reaches into the private sector and says "We will restrict your wages, too". Oh, it is only in the case of CP Rail at the moment, but who will it be next? Who are the next ones in line? Who is it that the Conservative-Liberal alliance will be picking on next in this country?

The government says that the reason it chose the civil service employees is because they have job security. It is true that other people are facing lay-offs, but those people will never get back to work unless the people who are working can afford to buy the products that they make, and that, my friends, is a truism.

Mr. Stewart: Without profit.

Mr. Deans: It is a fact that those people will never get back to work unless there are those who are working who will be able to purchase, and they will never be able to afford to purchase if interest rates remain high and their incomes are further restricted. Yet the Conservatives and Liberals are standing together, shoulder to shoulder, on behalf of high prices and profits and against the wage earners of this country.

I say to hon. members that we cannot stand for that. We cannot sit by and watch this hypocrisy. We cannot sit by and watch this unholy alliance between the government and the pretenders in the Conservative Party who pretend to be in opposition at every turn. In fact, when the chips are down and the Conservatives have to choose between the corporate elite and the people of the country, they choose the corporate elite every time.

As a final move, what does the government do? The government says, "We will restrict this measure to those people in the civil service who have security of employment." Then, because the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) stands up and makes an allegation which may or may not be founded but which has some political ripples in it and causes the government a little embarrassment in western Canada, the government says, "Well, we will show him." Two or three editorials pointed out that the government is showing some favouritism in the way in which it deals with employees, and they were written at the behest of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. The government says, "We will really show him. We will take some more money from some other people and teach him a lesson. We will reduce his staff salaries. We will reduce the salaries of all members. That will really show him where to get off. He will not do that again, by gosh, because his employees will not have the money that they need."

• (1540)

I see you rising, Mr. Speaker. I will not take any more of your time. But this is wrong, dead wrong. When the Tories and Liberals stand together, they should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak once again on Bill C-124 because I support it wholeheartedly. People in my riding, and people I have met across Canada since the budget, overwhelmingly support the idea that 6 per cent and 5 per cent are manageable economic targets and manageable ways to bring our economy back to recovery.

Bill C-124 provides leadership by asking public servants and politicians to limit their salary increases to 6 per cent and 5 per cent over the next two years. More important, this bill stands as a symbol of the necessary collective effort that all of us must put into our recovery. Let us repeat over and over again that 6 per cent is a manageable target, 6 per cent is an increase that will bring health to our economy, 6 per cent is something that each person in our society can contribute to our mutual recovery.

Inflation is the economic disease that all of us can help defeat. We cannot reach out into our traditional markets around the world and into other economies to change their direction, but we can fix our own economy and bring it under control so that when the world recovery comes, we will be there to take advantage of it.

This bill limiting wage increases in the federal public service provides only the first step toward that recovery. It is the example to the rest of our society. We as an employer are saying to our employees that we will go through this step. However, we are asking the rest of our economy to come along with us.

We just heard a very passionate speech from the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) on prices and profits. He raises a question that many people ask. Are they going to go through limited wage increases only to see unconscionable increases on the price side? Quite fairly and quite rightly, ordinary people are asking this question.

I wish to refer to today's Globe and Mail "Report on Business". The lead article on that page is entitled "Industry prices tumble in weak economy". It states that the industry price selling index for June was 6.5 per cent. I quote from the article to explain why this is happening:

> The selling price index provides a hopeful sign that inflation is slackening and that consumer prices are likely to be on a downward trend. During the last period when manufacturers were being forced to limit prices increases, in the spring of 1977, retail prices moved down markedly—
> The small advance in manufactured goods prices also gives credence to the view that the government's restraint measures are unnecessary in the case of most private sector companies.

In the private sector we are seeing a slowdown in some prices. What we are also seeing as a result of the government's action following the budget is a slowdown in government administered prices. We are seeing some very tough leadership on the part of individual ministers and the cabinet collectively to control prices that we influence. We are seeing the price side slow down because of the influence of our economy and the leadership of the federal government.

Personally, I welcome the enthusiasm that I heard from the mayors of Canada's leading municipalities last week when they talked about influencing prices in their local situation. I welcome as well the initiative taken by the province of British Columbia to join in the 6-5 plan, because that will affect the wages and administered prices in that province. I hope that other provinces from Alberta to Newfoundland will join British Columbia in this effort. Whether it be rent controls or beer in the ballpark, we need 6 per cent and 5 per cent in prices as much as we do in wages. We would welcome the involvement of the provinces to help us with that.

Turning back to the bill and the question of the increases that we are extending to public servants, I am reminded of a conversation I had last Friday at the Ottawa airport with the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie). On Friday we had a very heated debate here, and that debate carried over when the two of us met on the weekend. We were discussing whether the 6 per cent rule could be fairly applied to people on the lower pay scales in the public service.

After a few minutes we were interrupted by a total stranger who introduced himself as an Ottawa area businessman. He told us that his experience was that he could not keep a typist on his payroll because that person would be so highly paid in the public service. Following that experience, I thought about my own riding. I realized that the men and women who work at the Gateway postal station are some of the highest paid industrial workers in my riding, and my riding is a very affluent area.

These two examples show why our leadership is badly needed in this area. We have good workers. We have given them honest rates of pay. They have bargained fairly for those rates of pay. Today the outside world is influenced very directly by the pay we give our employees. Our leadership is vital. Despite the comments we just heard a few moments ago, we must recognize that our employees receive very good salaries and have very good job security. We must realize that in those circumstances our employees can limit their increases over the next two years and provide the leadership that is so badly needed.

Today we must remember as well that that leadership will be hollow if we cannot encourage other employees and employers across this country to join in. We must convince Canadians that this is a collective and manageable effort. We are asking our employees to show the way, but we are asking the rest of the country to follow. Their support will be vital.

I appreciate the opportunity to join in the debate today. I hope this bill will pass quickly through the House. I know the people in my riding, the people on the radio shows and those in the cities across this country with whom I have spoken in the last month support this initiative. They are ready to follow our leadership. They believe us when we say that together we can reach a 6 per cent world and that in a 6 per cent world we are in a position to recover our economic health. In a 6 per cent world we will be ready to join the recovery of the whole world when that recovery comes. We need a joint effort.

I thank our public servants and I thank those in our Crown corporations for helping us to provide that leadership for the rest of our economy.

• (1550)

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I might say at the beginning that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) should be ashamed of himself. If he had one ounce of knowledge about business, he would know that inventories are being dumped at cost prices by thousands of businesses and that a cost price means no profit. The hon. member must know that profit is what is left over after all wages, material costs and taxes are paid and that without profit there is no business; there are no jobs and no taxes can be paid. The people know that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain moves from left to centre to right as the occasion dictates. It is the cost of money at the bank that is causing prices in the country to drop, and that is a known economic fact.

I want to say at the outset of this debate that I oppose the way Standing Order 75 is being used, and the motion before us is a perfect example of my point. The House of Commons is a debating forum. Its purpose is to bring forward, from the government and the opposition, points of view on legislation before the House. If a matter before the House is complex and is the cause of concern and controversy in the country, the hon. members are required to convey those concerns in the House in debate. If a member is on the government side, he tends to look upon all remarks by opposition members as obstruction, as a means of stringing out the process and as a means of fouling the government's legislative timetable. On the other hand, opposition members many times must wrestle with legislative language that is obscure, which in many cases requires considerable research, which is poorly drafted, with loopholes through which one could drive a Mack truck and which is based on wrong-headed, immature and biased information and opinion, as we see in Bill C-124 and Bill C-53, to name two current bills.

Standing Order 75C was placed in our House business procedures to allow the government to bring to an end a debate which had run beyond a reasonable time. It was not intended that a complex bill be entered on the Order Paper and scheduled for debate and, within two hours, time allocation placed on that bill. That is using the rule book as a sledgehammer.

There is no reason in the world why the House of Commons cannot work to a proper legislative timetable. There should be a set timetable for the House to convene, a period of recess for Christmas and New Year's, a short break at Easter and a predetermined recess date. It then becomes the government's problem to fit its legislative program into that time-frame. There would have to be provision for emergencies which require parliamentary action. Anyone who examines the process presently in use has to agree that the quality of debate would be vastly improved if we had to work to a parliamentary time schedule.

Having said that, let me deal with the matter at hand. The government introduced Bill C-124, which has a wide and sweeping effect on the economy. Even before the bill has passed, we are being told by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the PMO that if this bill does not work, then full wage and price controls will be legislated. The Prime Minister has even gone further, stating that if the provisions of Bill C-124 fail and wage and price controls fail, then the economy will collapse.

The truth of the matter is that one picture is painted by legislation—Bill C-124—and another by the Prime Minister. A third picture is presented to business and labour leaders when they meet behind cabinet doors with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and his officials. In other words, we have an economic situation that is bad news, very bad news and potential economic disaster. The longer we stay here and debate, the more likely it is that those "private details," spoken about only behind doors with selected groups, will become public knowledge.

As hon. members know, the budget forecasts a deficit of $19.6 billion, but the deficit is based on a turnaround in the economy in the third and fourth quarters. No one in the private sector with whom I have talked has forecast a bottoming out or a turnaround for at least 18 months. The question which begs to be asked is, what will the deficit be if there is no turnaround in the third and fourth quarters? I believe information is being given to those persons meeting with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance which is not intended for the public.

It has been speculated that the deficit could climb to $25 billion or $28 billion. If that proves to be true, we could face economic collapse. I hope that speculation remains only speculation and that the provisions of Bill C-124 are adequate to bring some order to a deteriorating economy. However, I do not believe the people of Canada are being well served when the truth of the gravity of the situation we face is held from them.

When the Prime Minister states that the people of Canada demanded high interest rates and that is why the government had to pay 19.5 per cent interest on Canada Savings Bonds, I believe that is an abuse of the truth. Equally, when the government, through the Prime Minister, intervenes in the market process through regulations designed as fine tuning and then declares that the enterprise system is not working, that also is an abuse of the truth. When the government refuses to curb its own expenditures, through sleight-of-hand rhetoric states it is curbing employment and then hires an additional 8,000 people in the first quarter on this year, that is deception which borders on contempt. When the government blames wage demands on labour as the cause of inflation when in fact it is a reaction to inflation, that is bending the truth and inflaming an already precarious situation.

It is because the government is firmly committed to intervening continually in the marketplace and believes it can only spend its way out of inflation that we will continue to have difficulties. Had the government dealt directly with those problems in the last few months, then perhaps we would be recessing this House on a positive note and a plan would be in place to alleviate the economic difficulties we face. But that is not the case. Instead, we are presented with a poorly drafted bill, the scope of which keeps changing with each succeeding question period. For these reasons, I oppose the imposition of Standing Order 75C in this debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity this afternoon to speak to Bill C-124, or rather to the motion of closure or Standing Order 75C, if you prefer, because I think it is high time Canadians were told the truth about such things as why we want to limit the duration of this debate and what is the major reason why the government and Liberal members are anxious to introduce time allocation. There are a number of reasons. Obviously, this bill is urgently needed and it should be passed and implemented as soon as possible. So if we were to allow every member of the House to speak to this bill for 40 minutes—and there are 282 members—we would still be here in a year's time, Mr. Speaker, and in that case, it is goodbye to the desired effects this bill is supposed to have. I would also like to say a few words about the last votes that were held in this House. If Canadians and if the people of my riding were to look at the last two or three divisions that were held in this House, they would be able to see for themselves the kind of strategy the opposition parties are following. If I am not mistaken, during the last division, 64 out of more than 130 members of the opposition were here in the House, Mr. Speaker. That is what the situation is like. So what is happening, in fact, is that the House is still sitting at the beginning of August, Mr. Speaker, because the opposition parties are keeping us here. Why? For a host of reasons, with the exception of the welfare of Canadians.

I have just spent 15 days in committee, considering Bill C-124. One party, the New Democratic Party, told us at the beginning: well, we do not know whether there are going to be any amendments. We are going to have a caucus meeting this week and then we will be able to tell you. They had a caucus meeting, they came back and said well, we still do not know whether we are going to have any amendments. We will know after the next caucus meeting. A week later, there was another caucus meeting, with the same results. However, there was a possibility, and we finally received the amendments in committee, although it was like pulling eye teeth. Another example, when the same party, the New Democratic Party, wanted to invite witnesses to appear before the committee, instead of just presenting a motion requesting that people appear before the committee, they presented about five of these motions, which we had to vote down, one by one. Just one more way to make us waste an hour of our time. It is so ridiculous, Mr. Speaker, because while we on the government side are being kept here in the House, we cannot see our constituents who would like to meet with us to discuss their problems.

The opposition parties usually keep half of their members here, and it is high time Canadians realized that, while we have to be here to support our policies, those people are using delaying tactics and are strutting around their ridings, playing politics. Where was the member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the Leader of the New Democratic Party during the first week Bill C-124 was considered in committee? I do not know, but he was not in Parliament, either at the committee meetings or in the House. That is what we have to put up with, Mr. Speaker. We are asked to come to Ottawa to represent 80,000 or 90,000 people and to sit in Parliament from the middle of October until the begining of August and probably until the middle of August, five days a week. Mr. Speaker, we are told to be there, because the opposition might call a vote. For instance, the bells crisis which cost us 15 days. And then we are criticized for using solutions like Standing Order 75C. No, I feel we must act sensibly, and I think Canadians realize this. I am not particularly happy about the fact that, as the member for Lac-Saint-Jean, I am going to vote to have salary increases of public servants restricted to 6 and 5 per cent. No one likes to do that. I would much rather give them 20 per cent a year!

Nor am I particularly happy about the fact that I voted for a cut in my own salary of over $3,000, just for this year, plus a cut in our special member's allowance. Nobody likes to do that either. But it has to be done, Mr. Speaker. It has to be done on behalf of thousands of unemployed workers who are waiting for inflation to go down. It has to be done on behalf of the taxpayer, because, and many people are unaware of this in this House, Quebec taxpayers are literally being squeezed dry by the PQ, as the member for Laval (Mr. Roy) has said, and if no one eases their burden, they will go under. Meanwhile, the New Democratic Party is setting itself up as the defender of I forget what it was.

I was listening to them in committee. The CLC branch plant, Mr. Speaker! And the CLC is not even a political party! If only they were speaking for the workers, but none of these people has realized Canadian workers think that they are paying too many taxes, that government spending is perhaps a bit too high, that federal buildings are perhaps a bit too big and a bit too air-conditioned and too luxurious. None of these people has realized that Canadians feel that perhaps we have too many public servants, because in ten years' time, the Liberal government has doubled the number of public employees. Mr. Speaker, those people are defending Mr. McDermott in committee, and meanwhile, people in their ridings and ours are unemployed. Do they go back to see them? No! Do not ask them what is going on in their ridings, they do not even know! They do not want to know because they are not interested. The only thing that interests them is what Mr. McDermott can deliver. It was incredible, Mr. Speaker, but at the same committee, the briefing notes that were handed out to the New Democratic Party had been prepared by the union representatives sitting there. That is really incredible. And meanwhile, their party leader was travelling around. Where, I do not know, but he was travelling. I believe in being sincere and honest with Canadians. Our country is experiencing financial problems.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that what Japan and what West Germany have done, we can do here in Canada. But we need everyone's help. We have started by setting an example ourselves. The New Democratic Party should stop being a branch plant, it should present positive ideas that will contribute to the wellbeing of Canadians and not to the wellbeing of the privileged classes who have comfortable jobs with fat pay cheques for life. That is plain speaking. And if Mr. McDermott does not agree, I may remind you that the Leader of the New Democratic Party is the Hon. Edward Broadbent and not Mr. McDermott!

[English]

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to what the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaiël) had to say. One of his comments concerned the urgent need that he felt to be out of here and that the opposition parties were holding up the recess of the House of Commons. He said that he wanted to get back to his constituency. I can understand that desire on his part. I know that a lot of members would like to be working in their own constituencies. But I want to tell the hon. member that the opposition parties are not holding up the recess of the House. The people holding up the recess of the House, as far as I, as the member for Kingston and the Islands, am concerned, are the government members who will not bring in Bill C-53, the amendments to the Criminal Code, which will allow us to change the crime of rape to a series of sexual assault charges. As long as that bill is not brought into the House I am not going home, and I want him to know that. That bill has to come before the House before we recess for the summer.

I am very interested in the fact that the government feels it necessary at this point to introduce a motion under Standing Order 75C on Bill C-124. This is a bill which the government said is key to its economic recovery plan and is one of the major pieces of legislation introduced in this session. What I find very unusual about the government's use of closure is that it always feels it is necessary to use it on the major pieces of legislation it brings into the House, the things that it considers to be most important and which should justify the greatest examination by members on all sides and members of the committee. Before that can take place the government brings in closure and cuts off debate. It moved closure on the Constitution bill before it was even under way. Before the country knew what was happening with regard to the major changes to the Constitution, the government introduced closure. And it has done so again.

What this signifies to me is that when it comes to major pieces of legislation that the government wants to introduce, it immediately feels insecure. The only thing it feels secure about is a motion under Standing Order 75C. It can hide behind closure instead of facing the legitimate questions that should be asked by its own party, by members of the opposition and by the Canadian public. That is the situation with this bill.

This bill requires a great deal of examination, Mr. Speaker. We have given it a fair amount of examination in committee but by no means have all the questions been answered. I very much regret the decision of the government to cut off debate before it has made its position clear with regard to its intentions on all aspects of the bill.

It seems that at every step of this bill the government has introduced new and ill-conceived amendments that have not been properly thought through. That was very evident in the House today when questions were put to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) about the 6 and 5 per cent society that he predicts, of which he says this bill is the cornerstone. What happened? He said, "Why are you asking me those questions? They concern somebody else. I should not have to answer them." Surely if he is co-ordinating a program for the government he ought to be able to answer legitimate questions about to whom these 6-5 measures will apply and how far they will go. They have not been answered. That is why extra debating time is necessary.

I mentioned that he brings in ill-conceived amendments. Nothing is more ill conceived, as I pointed out to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) the other day, than Motion No. 3 standing in his own name. This is the amendment which changes the time period in which the restraint measures will apply to staff of Members of Parliament and members of the Senate. To that effect, I moved a motion today which I sincerely hope the President of the Treasury Board will consider. I asked that the government amend immediately Bill C-124 so that its provisions take effect for the staff of MPs and senators on the expiry of their present salary arrangements, as they will for all other employees in the public service, and that staff of MPs and senators not be singled out for punitive action by this government.

I listened to the President of the Treasury Board speak to that item when he took part in this closure debate. I made a note of some of the words he used when he spoke. He said "We have to take that step." In other words, to take the punitive action it has against the staff of Members of Parliament and senators in order to counter the unfortunate impression the government has received about the country with regard to another group of employees known as exempt ministerial staff. If the President of the Treasury Board were honest in his presentation, he would have stood in his place and said that exempt staff for ministers, on average, are paid much, much higher salaries than are staff of Members of Parliament and senators, who are in categories ranging from $24,000 a year down. Some of them earn as little as $14,000. The majority of them are women, many of whom, if the minsiter would take the time to inquire around this building, are single parents supporting families and who really should not be put in a situation where they are singled out for punitive action.

I am sure that if the minister had asked a number of Members of Parliament whether we would have been willing to take a further cut so staff in our offices did not have to take a cut, he would have got agreement. I am sure he would have found that there were members willing to make that sacrifice so that the people unable to bear that kind of burden would not have had to. I really regret, as I told the President of the Treasury Board the other day, the fact that he has done this.

However, I want to tell the minister that I said some things in anger the other day about which I feel badly. I know now that the idea for this measure did not come from him. I know now that it came from the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that it originated from a reaction of spite in the Prime Minister's office. Consequently, I regret some of the things I said to the minister the other day even though he is the author of this amendment. He has more decency than a lot of other people over there, and I know he would not have done this on his own. I know now, of course, where the blame lies.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please.

Mr. David Berger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am often amazed at the holier than thou attitude of the former minister, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I note that she bandied statistics about, such as the fact that most of the staff in the House of Commons are females and she said most of them are single parents.

Mr. McDermid: You are misquoting.

Miss MacDonald: Are you saying they are not?

Mr. Berger: I wonder whether that is just pure argument on her part or whether she has actually made a survey.

Mr. McDermid: Eighty per cent are women.

Miss MacDonald: Are you arguing about that?

Mr. Berger: I would agree with that, perhaps. However, I wonder where the hon. member gets the statistics that most of them are heads of single parent families.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Kelly: Sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just attributed statements to me that will not be found in the blues. I did not say "most were". I asked whether the minister had any idea how many of the women were single parents.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): That is obviously not a point of order, it is debate. The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, another example is the discussion about time allocation which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands misrepresented as being closure.

Miss MacDonald: A rose by any other name.

Mr. Berger: Most members in this House know that Standing Order 33 governs closure and that time allocation is governed by Standing Order 75C. Her government used time allocation on its infamous mortgage bill in the fall of 1979.

Miss MacDonald: Too bad it isn't in effect now.

Mr. Kelly: She did not protest then, did she?

Mr. Berger: My colleague from Toronto points out that the government House leader at that time, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), as I recall, said "This is not closure; this is a more gentle way of cutting off debate." The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands in speaking to the Canadian public, some of whom may not be as informed about parliamentary procedure as members of this House.

Miss MacDonald: Don't belittle the Canadian public.

Mr. Berger: Those who follow parliamentary procedure a bit will know that time allocation is used in the Mother of Parliaments practically on a daily basis, and is a normal procedure appended to most bills. It is not as if we are pulling off some kind of a hijacking, something to which the hon. member's party is accustomed.

Dealing with the particular motion before us at this time, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out some articles in favour of it. There is a saying that a picture is worth a thousand words. I recall having seen a graph in The Financial Post about two months ago which compared the increase in wages in Canada over the past ten years to the increase in productivity. In that one graph was an excellent example of the ills afflicting our economy. Between 1971 and 1981 the increase in wages was something in the order of 157 per cent, whereas productivity had increased in that period by something like 5 per cent. A better illustration of our problems could not be provided.

Another factor glossed over frequently by the opposition parties is that 30 per cent of our gross national product is exported. This is a fabulous figure when compared with countries such as Japan and Germany which export only about 10 per cent of their gross national product. It demonstrates the extent to which Canada is dependent upon world markets for its prosperity and the extent to which we must be competitive in order to have continued growth and prosperity. For those who feel that perhaps a large part of our exports is in primary resources, I point out that it is more like 70 per cent which are in manufactured or semi-manufactured products. Therefore, it is clear that wage increases in Canada must be tied to productivity or we will be unable to compete with other countries.

• (1620)

Earlier this year I had the opportunity of talking to Sylvia Ostry, the former head of the Economic Council of Canada and now chief economist of OECD. She had been to West Germany, and she explained how its metalworkers' union settled in the neighbourhood of 4 per cent. It is the strongest union in that country and leads off bargaining for other sectors of the economy. Mrs. Ostry went into a bank and congratulated the bankers for this settlement. They sort of turned up their noses and said, "Yes, it is pretty good, but it could be better." She also explained that West German unions were realistic in their wage demands. They understood that Germany, in order to compete, had to have wage increases which matched increases in productivity. Also she explained that they were very well informed. Apparently most of the unions in West Germany have economists and other experts tied to their staffs or working for them, which enables them to embark upon negotiations in a very sensitive and intelligent matter. With the recent meetings of the government, the private sector and unions, I hope this is the direction we will move toward in the next few years.

Prior to concluding, I should like to point out that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) said that the government does not restrict profits or prices. The government is restricting prices in Crown corporations. The hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) referred to an article in The Globe and Mail. I recall having read in the latest annual report of the Governor of the Bank of Canada that profits of companies in Canada last year fell by something like 30 per cent or 40 per cent. Therefore, it seems evident that market forces will look after that aspect.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to join in this segment of the discussion on Bill C-124. One thing which came to mind as I listened to some of the discussion so far on this bill was Murphy's law. Murphy's law suggests that if anything can go wrong, it will. The corollary of that, which comes from the discussion here and in committee, is Johnston's law; Johnston's law suggests that Murphy's law is optimistic.

There are many things wrong in terms of what we are doing here today in discussing the limitation of debate on Bill C-124. The bill embodies much of the principle of the government's 6-5 formula. I guess all Canadians can be very thankful that the government is now working with numbers which it can handle. Clearly the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) could not cope with tens and twenties because in a six-month period he made a $10 billion error in the deficit. Now we have him down to numbers which he can perhaps handle by using his digits and keeping everything straight. We are thankful for that initiative, but there are many flaws in the bill.

We have heard other hon. members mention that this was an ad hoc piece of legislation. There have been so many changes in such a short period of time that it has been very difficult for hon. members on all sides of the House to cope with the bill. Clearly the minister, by accepting some of the changes almost on a daily basis, has admitted that the bill is both imperfect and requires amendment and further change.

One area about which our party is concerned and would like to see changes in is the expression of the minister concerning contracts. In committee we suggested an amendment to look at how the 6-5 regime would apply to service contracts of the government. The professional contracts let by government are very major components in government spending. In fact, it is a $1 billion component. The amendment we suggested would have struck out some lines in the appropriate place, substituted therefor "or rate of pay", and would have included "any person engaged under personal service contracts".

In response to representations by our party in an attempt to include that very significant amendment which would indicate the true intentions of the government and its commitment to this principle, the minister said he would look at it and think about it. He has really come forward now with his most recent amendment, going after the staff of Members of Parliament and hitting people who are not the cause of the problem. These people are almost helpless bystanders in the situation. He has not presented today or at any other time any explanation of what he intends to do about a major sector over which he clearly has control and could do something about. We are very disappointed, but it is just one example of the kind of imperfect legislation which we have not yet had a full opportunity to examine.

There are many other things wrong with the whole scene. One matter which came to mind as I was sitting in committee listening to the discussions and some of the interventions, and again today in the House, was that the bill has holes through which one could drive a Maislin truck. The whole environment is clearly wrong. Again we will be limited in our ability to look at it. This is the kind of wrongness I should like to discuss.

We really have a political program which is trying to cope with the government's position in the Gallup poll, and with the obvious lack of support in the country for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as expressed by repeated polls, whether Gallup or others. It is taking one piece of the problem created by the government and is trying to use it in a political way with a lot of imagery and a lot of political reaction to try to co-opt people in labour and in business, indeed people across the country who are concerned about the unemployment level, the 1.3 million declared and the many undeclared unemployed people, to alert them to the growing problems of businesses in Canada through the loss of liquidity and the difficulties they will be facing if they do not come to the point very quickly where they can do economic planning on the basis of interest rates which are 12 per cent or less. We have this entire country concerned about these things, and what we have is a political reaction, an effort on the part of the government to try to gain support of all these segments in order to deal with the problem they have created themselves.

I think on that basis alone people should question whether or not there is a program that justifies their support for this initiative. There should be, and this indeed is part of the problem. But where is the rest of that program? What other measures are going to be taken? Are we going to see the commitment that has been made to control prices fulfilled? Are we going to get other things done which would help restore investor confidence? Are we going to get things done that would give people the sense that the government is truly committed, as this party is, to restraint.

I do not see it in anything that has been brought forward so far. We still have many instances where we have aircraft flights taking off to expensive parties; we have continued high levels of government advertising and on and on. We have the expansion of the government's budget into the seventies of billions of dollars. We have the interest rate payments of $13 billion in one year which is above the level of total government spending ten years ago. We have all these things which do not give anyone who takes a look at them any sense that there is a serious initiative on the part of the government to hold true to this principle of restraint. That is the bottom line if we are going to resolve these problems.

There was a report from the Economic Council of Canada that has been mentioned in this House several times. That report suggested that the government itself is responsible for an 18 per cent inflationary factor, whereas private enterprise, the rest of the economy, has been running along at about a 9 per cent inflation factor. With that kind of background I think it is clear that it is the entire government framework that is at fault.

I would like to make reference now to some of the comments made by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), the House leader of the New Democratic Party. One of the ironies of sitting in opposition now and listening to members of a different opposition party discuss things is the way that they like to link the things that this party will support with the things that the government is doing, things that we have supported and have stood for for years and years and years and now are being criticized because of our consistency by people like the member for Hamilton Mountain.

There is nothing inconsistent at all in our opposing the limitation of the full discussion of this very important bill in spite of the fact that we do support the principle of restraint that is embodied in parts of this bill, imperfect as it is.

I think there are many other things that could be said and I am sure other speakers will say them, Mr. Speaker, so thank you very much for the time.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to speak this afternoon, but after hearing some of the comments made by my good friend for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), I felt moved to take part in this debate.

First of all, I should point out to the House that, contrary to what the member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin) said a few moments ago, that we are now dealing with C-124, we are not; we are dealing with the application of a motion under Standing Order 75C to limit debate on that very bill. I have been somewhat surprised at your generosity, Mr. Speaker, in allowing members to continue the ongoing debate on Bill C-124 and, having made a couple of procedural points, I will take note of your generosity and also join in the fray on the substance of Bill C-124, the government's restraint program.

In answer to the member for Kingston and the Islands, I think it should be emphasized—and my friend the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) made the point a few minutes ago—that it is very convenient for any opposition party to vote against the application of rule 75C of our Standing Orders, but when those opposition parties themselves have the responsibility of government they change their tune.

Obviously the New Democratic Party has never had that luxury and I doubt that they ever will, certainly not in my lifetime; but the Conservative Party were in office just for that brief, fleeting period in 1979, and as was pointed out by my friend from Laurier the House leader of the Conservative government at the time, who is sitting in the chamber this afternoon, my good friend the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), rose in his place, I think it was on November 20, 1979, and moved a motion under 75C on the mortgage tax deductibility bill of the Conservative government. I was not here at the time but I remember reading the House of Commons Debates, and he said "This is not closure; this is a more gentle form of closing off debate."

I think those people who are watching us on television and those here in the galleries today should not accept the argument made by the member for Kingston and the Islands. We are not closing off debate, using the very brutal instrument of Standing Order 33; we are allocating a further amount of time. This is done in other parliaments with some regularity, and I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to order our business in a better fashion in this place in the future, we are going to have to come to grips with some kind of a normal time allocation process.

The substance of the matter really is something that I suppose one could talk more than ten minutes on, but certainly in the last 18 months there has not been any other issue that has so captured the imagination of the people of my constituency than the government's crusade to limit inflation to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent the second year. I think the members on the other side, if they go home and talk to their constituents over the summer period, will get perhaps a very rude message, which is that the public accept this program and are very happy to see that the government is taking the initiative and showing leadership on this particular issue.

The opposition has been yelling at us for the last 18 months, seeking a consensus to deal with Canada's economic problem. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) meets with labour leaders, municipal leaders and business leaders, he is seeking a consensus. But this is not consensus in terms of the opposition. They are advocating these meetings and, once we meet, they say we are using these people. It is co-option. You can see that rhetoric comes cheap in the House of Commons, and we have seen it this afternoon. The government is seeking a consensus in dealing with the very urgent problems facing the economy, but when we meet with these leaders we are accused of co-opting them for purely partisan reasons.

Let us be honest. This country is in a grave economic crisis. The election campaign can be fought whenever the election comes, but I think the Canadian public are getting fed up with the spectre of the opposition every day fighting an ongoing election campaign. One can only suspect their motives, but people like Mr. Mulholland of the Bank of Nova Scotia, Mr. Sinclair of CP Investments, very eminent Canadians from the business community—these are people not identified with the Liberal Party; they are outstanding business leaders—realize that we have to put aside all this backbiting, all this nit-picking, all this political partisanship. Because this is destroying the country as much as the ongoing economic problems.

I would draw the attention of members opposite to the comments made yesterday by Bob Blair, as reported in the Toronto Star. Mr. Blair is a great friend of some on the other side, Mr. Peter Lougheed, for example. Mr. Blair is a very sensible businessman whose company made quite a profit in the last few years in a very dynamic industry, during a time when adverse conditions faced that industry. Mr. Blair has been very—

• (1640)

Miss MacDonald: —critical of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Mr. Collenette: Everyone has been critical of the government. You accept that in a democracy. But Mr. Blair says that it is the continual barracking and nit-picking of the opposition and the tearing down of the confidence in this country that is destroying the economic climate here. It is the unwillingness of the opposition parties to work together to support this program.

The opposition Conservative Party has the luxury of saying, "We support it in principle but we do not like the way you are doing it." Anyone who is watching at home or anyone in the galleries would realize that that is the normal rhetoric of all oppositions. The opposition is saying, in other words, "We do not like to support your good idea."

It is my contention that nothing else has gained the support and imagination of the Canadian public in the last few years like this restraint program has. I would exhort members on all sides to support the program. In a sense, it is the last chance for Canada to come to grips with our economic problems. We will fight the election campaign whenever it comes, 18 months or a year from now. But let us, as Canadians, try to develop some consensus in dealing with our problems.

The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) is still bemusing the fact that he was once in office for a very short period of time and he waxed eloquent in The Citizen last week about what he would do if he were back in power. He is not back in power, and thank God for the country that he is in the opposition. All he has to offer are worn out clichés and platitudes, suggesting that the government do something about FIRA or with the National Energy Program. These are all old, hackneyed expressions and policies that were rejected two years ago by the Canadian public. Does the Leader of the Opposition not have the sense and the moral commitment to the betterment of this country—

Mr. Fretz: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has just thanked God for the mess that the country is in. I think that that is a gross error and a misjudgment.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, obviously the points I have been making have not been missed by the opposition, for that erstwhile point of order was an attempt to rebut what I am saying.

I believe that the Leader of the Opposition should discuss with his advisers what is good not only for the Conservative Party but for the whole country. I submit that now is the time, to paraphrase a historical figure, for all good Canadians to rally around the government, as people like Mr. Mulholland, Mr. Blair and Mr. Sinclair are doing. We can fight the election campaign two years from now. This continual electioneering is not appreciated by the Canadian public and does not serve the opposition well. In fact, it is a blot on the role of the opposition in this country that they are so ill served by their leader and his advisers in trying to tear down the confidence of this country.

To sum up, this bill is a damned good piece of legislation. It is supported by most people in Canada and I hope the opposition wakes up to this fact over the summer.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to hear the last Liberal speaker quoting another great Liberal leader, Mr. Lenin, saying that it is the prime responsibility of the opposition to come to the aid of the government. I do think the parallel exists somehow. It is the concept that this government has of democracy, that it is our responsibility to come to their defence rather than the responsibility of the government to come to Canadians with solutions to its own problems.

Earlier in this very short debate we heard it suggested by some Liberal backbenchers that the debate on Bill C-124, the public service wage restraint act, has prevented them from travelling to their ridings to meet their constituents and hear their views. That is not really the case. They are in a rush to pass this bill through the House of Commons because they want to go on vacation. That is the truth of the matter.

We no longer call this motion closure. This motion is now called time allocation, to use the vernacular of the House. What this really means is that time allocation sounds much more acceptable to the Liberal government than the term "closure". If the government were honest, instead of calling the motion time allocation or even closure, it would call it "the vacation rush measure", since they want to rush off to the beaches.

When one reviews the history of this bill, one sees that the minister responsible introduced it only on the last day of June. Once he introduced the bill and had it printed, he took nine days to bring it to the House for debate. He finally had the courage to introduce it on July 9. Less than one week later he introduced time allocation on that stage of the debate.

The following week the Liberal majority on the committee restricted the number of witnesses so that no further witnesses could appear before the committee. They would not let other union leaders or other business leaders come forward and explain their position on the bill.

I have a letter which was sent to the clerk of the committee. It is from the National Union of Provincial Government Employees and is signed by their president, John Fryer. In this letter he says:

On behalf of the 230,000-member National Union of Provincial Government Employees I am writing to express our disappointment at not being able to appear before the committee and present our views on Bill C-124.

What is interesting is that the government has always claimed that this bill was to apply not only to federal employees, but it wanted this bill to be copied by provincial premiers, followed by the business elite and accepted by union groups throughout the country.

The second group in the line of fire, after the bill has dealt with the federal government employees, would be the provincial government employees, which group the Liberal majority on the committee would not allow to come forward to express their opinions on this legislation. Another person who the Liberal majority on the committee would not let come forward was their own Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia). When my colleague for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) asked over and over again to have the Minister of Labour explain his position on this bill, I wondered why he could not come. Why did the Liberal majority on that committee prevent him from appearing? I now have some information from a letter which the Minister of Labour wrote to The Globe and Mail prior to the bill being introduced. In the letter he says:

> The right to strike is one of the important cornerstones of a free and democratic society—

He went on to say:

> There is clearly room for greater co-operation between unions and employers, and Parliament has entrusted to Labour Canada—

His own department.

> —the responsibility for assisting in the development and maintenance of constructive relationships.

That is a quote from what the minister wrote and it was published.

The bill destroys the entire collective bargaining process. It allows the government to break contracts that it has already signed. It outlaws strikes and prevents binding arbitration for many workers.

The Minister of Labour, who is now sitting in his seat, has refused to come forward to explain how he can write one thing in a letter one day and then his government introduces a measure which does exactly the opposite a couple of weeks later. He has refused to do so with the compliance of the Liberal majority on the committee.

• (1650)

I am, therefore, not surprised that we have time allocation on this bill. It has been the attempt of the government, from the first day the bill was introduced, to rush it through the committee and through the House and to prevent interested groups and its own ministers from appearing. Last Friday, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), who was first to speak on behalf of the government during report stage of the debate, called for time allocation. The night before he had proposed two major amendments to the bill. We found out about those amendments on Friday morning, and early Friday afternoon he gave notice that the government would like to call for time allocation. The government does not want to hear from the public and does not want groups which would be affected by the bill to present their cases. That is why we are being rushed. That is why the Liberal members, who say they would like to get out to visit their constituents, really do not care what their constituents and interested groups want. If they did care, they would allow those groups to come before the committee responsible for the passage of this bill.

There is something even more upsetting than the trickery of the government, and that is the hypocrisy of the Conservative Party. Member after member speaking before the committee on behalf of the Conservative Party pointed out the errors in the bill. They pointed out the problems existing in the bill and its unfairness. They discussed how it will affect women workers and pensioners. They did all of this, but what will they do now? They will vote with the government on the bill. Last week, there was a humorous situation when the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark)—

An hon. Member: Which leader?

Mr. Murphy: The official leader of the official opposition—was quoted as saying, "I would reject controls and I would not allow my PMO to be issuing rumours that they were coming in while I was saying that they were not. I think that controls will not work." That comment came from the leader of a party which will vote for controls, from a leader of a party which has pointed out, just as we have in committee and in the House, that this bill is completely unfair.

Mr. McDermid: And what does your leader, Dennis McDermott say?

Mr. Murphy: This hypocritical group to my right, this group of Liberal yea-sayers, pretends that they are fighting for their workers, their employees, women workers and the lowly paid people in the civil service. They do not vote the way they speak. In other words, they do not mean what they say.

Their argument, in summing up, is that this bill is for restraint and therefore they are for this bill, and that somehow, because we do not approve of this bill, we are against restraint. Let me point our that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) has been citing cases of Liberal government misuse of funds day after day in the House. Day after day he has pointed out how the government has been spending money in flights which are completely unnecessary. He has pointed out other problems with the way in which this government misuses government money. We are for restraint, but we are also for a bill which will do something. This bill will do nothing. The whole effort by the Conservative Party and its ally, the Liberal government, is to raise a smokescreen to hide the fact that the bill will do nothing for our economy and is just a measure to zap labour.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Argenteuil-Papineau (Mr. Gourd)—Airports—Inquiry respecting government's intentions to make Mirabel profitable; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-Delta North (Mr. Friesen)—External Affairs—(a) Application for passports. (b) Request that application form be redesigned; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—Railways—(a) Effect of wage controls on Canadian Pacific agreements. (b) Timing of imposition.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-124

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston:

That, in relation to Bill C-124, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, one sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of each of the report stage and the third reading stage of the bill; and

That 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on those days, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn every question then necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will not stand up and yell at anyone across the chamber today because I must tell Your Honour and hon. members of this House that I am very pleased with the bill and with the process which has expedited it. I will not look at it, then, from a partisan point of view.

When I go back to my riding or when I travel across Canada—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Which is rare.

Mr. Kelly: —I hear much criticism of the government, which makes me feel uncomfortable but it is tolerable. The criticism which makes me feel uncomfortable and which is very pessimistic is the criticism which is directed at this institution. People not only say that the government is not working but, more important, they also insist that the House of Commons is not working. A belief is really developing in the country that our institutions are not giving us the service that they once did.

I am pleased to say that, on the basis of the bill, this House has demonstrated that in times of crisis or emergency it can act swiftly and with sensitivity. For example, last year in the House the most important bill was Bill C-48, which was designed to expedite oil and gas development on Canada lands. It took us almost a full year or more to get that bill through all stages in the House and committee. Quite frankly, I could not understand the time it took, because that was legislation we desperately needed. We must find oil and gas quickly and we must ensure that, in finding it, we give the majority of the jobs and contracts to Canadians. Those were two objectives with which everyone in Canada could agree. But for some reason, the House could not translate those ideas or yearnings into effective legislation. It took a full year or more before we could finally deliver the goods.

This year, everyone in Canada understands that, once and for all, with determination and insight, we must address the economic problems of the country. Everyone knows that the very first step in solving those problems is to impose restraint on Canadians in all aspects of their lives, whether it be in government, at all three levels, or in business, or in our lives as consumers. There must be restraint. This bill—

Mr. Gamble: It does not deal with the real nature of the problem.

Mr. Kelly: —gives expression to those desires. The bill understands that Canadians want action today. I am pleased that, by and large, the House has co-operated with the government in expediting Bill C-124. For all the noise that one hears, for all the thunder and lightning flashes which punctuate the political skies, by and large the opposition has been very reasonable and has helped us get this bill through the House and committee with a minimum of fuss.

I said earlier that we were acting not only swiftly but also with insight. I think that the last part of my statement can be proven if one looks at the bill as it stood when we brought it into the House on June 30 and the way it presently stands as amended. When the bill came before the House, wages, benefits and non-monetary items were completely frozen. There was to be no movement in those three areas. As a result of arguments made in the House and in committee by members of the two opposition parties, this government moved from no movement in those three areas to complete and total movement inside those three areas under a 6-5 cap.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kelly: Members opposite find something jovial about my remarks. I point out to them that these are the very things for which they were asking. To hear them talking critically at this time, after the government has delivered, smacks of the cheap shots or sleaziness of which they so often accuse us in the House.

In summary, I will repeat my opening remarks. The way in which we have handled this bill in all stages proves not only to Canadian politicians but to Canadians across this land that this House has the capacity to react. It has the ability to respond to Canadian problems. I am pleased to be a part of that process.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, there is a proper place for closure. However, report stage of this bill is not the proper place. At report stage there were two NDP speakers, four Progressive Conservatives and one Liberal. It is not the time for closure or time allocation when we have not yet even started to cover the subject, let alone repeat ourselves.

The hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) made much ado about the people of Canada wanting restraint. He is right. However, he said they want nothing more than restraint, and I do not agree. There is something more the people want, and that is the resignation of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Liberal government. The vast majority of the people in this country want that even more than restraint. In any other country, the Prime Minister would have resigned long ago. He would have been impeached for the policies he has brought in. The national energy policy helped push the country down the tube. The November 12 budget pushed it even further. That is what started the depression in Canada. The Liberals must take responsibility for it. That is what closure should be on.

When you kill confidence, you kill the chance for investment. The Liberals, with the help of the NDP, have killed confidence in this country. That kills investment. The Liberals, with the help of the NDP, have killed investment in this country. Therefore, there are no jobs, and that is the reason.

The way the New Democratic Party has been criticizing the Conservative Party, you would think we were the government. The NDP policy and the Liberal policy are much closer together than the NDP and ours. We believe in free entreprise, fair profit, freedom of the individual and initiative. The Liberals go only part way. They do not go fast enough for the NDP. They are blood brothers with regard to their policies. When the NDP criticize the Progress Conservatives, they are trying to help their blood brothers, the Liberals.

We believe in restraint. It is necessary if we are going to fight inflation. However, this party believes in a restraint that is fair. We believe in more restraint for the rich than the poor. We believe in restraint on Ian—what's-his-name—Sinclair of the CPR and his $500,000 salary. We believe in restraint for high salaries and for our salaries, and that is why we are voting for it. However, we want restraint to be fair. We do not go along with waste and believe there should be some restraint in that area. We believe in restraint on prices.

The government is lowering and putting restraint on the wages of its own workers, but is it lowering the rents for those in Banff who face increases of 15 to 35 per cent? I ask the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) to roll back the rents of those in Banff to 5 and 6 per cent.

We ask for fairness in connection with CALEA where collective bargaining is being stopped. It goes on for the staff of ministers until April, 1983 but CALEA is going to be cut off earlier. If the government corrects that, we will see its sincerity. There should be restraint on prices and we must do away with waste.

I want to deal with one other matter regarding this motion. The government says that Canadians want restraint only. People want restraint in all areas. They want fairness in restraint, but they are not getting it. When the government rolls back rents for those in Banff, I will say it is being fair. However, it is not being fair as long as it restrains wages to 6 per cent and 5 per cent and says that it is okay to increase rent by 15 per cent to 35 per cent. That is not fairness. It should be rolled back.

Industry is being asked to follow the government's example. The unemployed must live on a pittance compared to those of us who are working. We agree there should be restraint, but it should not be carried out on the backs of the aged and the retired people of this country. Let us not have restraint at the expense of the low-paid employees who barely get by. Let us have restraint on those in the upper brackets, such as cabinet ministers and Members of Parliament. Let us set the example. Then people will say we are doing something. That will build up confidence.

• (1710)

It is the free enterprise system that will bring this country back to prosperity, not socialism, whether it is fashioned by the NDP or the Liberals. That is what is killing this country. Free enterprise will give every individual confidence to invest in this country. When money is invested, jobs are created, products are manufactured and the country gets moving. What we want is productivity. We want more productivity per man per hour. If we bring that about, we will get this country out of the slump it is in. That is exactly what our leader was saying the other day. We will get the country out of its slump through free enterprise principles. Give us a chance. We challenge hon. members opposite to resign and let us show the country what can be done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please! It being 5.09 p.m., the two hours provided for consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 75C have now expired. I must therefore interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of this motion.

[English]

The question is on the motion of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Johnston), which was agreed to on the following division:

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following question will be answered today: 2,818.

[Text]

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—EDUCATION LEAVE COSTS

Question No. 2,818—Mr. Clarke:

1. With reference to the education leave costs recorded by the Department of External Affairs at page 13.6, Volume I of the 1979-80 Public Accounts of Canada, what guidelines were used to determine (a) which employees should obtain educational leave and whether such employees should be granted (i) leave with pay (ii) travel expenses (iii) payment for tuition (b) whether the skills to be acquired were needed on a permanent basis?

2. What percentage of the education leave cost of $46,188 was necessitated by the acquisition of new equipment and by the need to have new skills in order to use the equipment?

3. What percentage of the education leave was necessitated by reason of job redundancy because of the (a) acquisition of equipment (b) change in the role of the employing agency (c) change in the capabilities of employees?

4. What percentage of employees granted such leave in the past three years have subsequently left the public service?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. (a) and (b) Treasury Board Policy; chapter 110 subchapter 5 of the Personnel Management Manual, conditions governing education, training and development, including subsidization.

2. Nil.

3. Nil.

4. Of the employees granted education leave in the past three years, 25 per cent have subsequently left the public service.

[Translation]

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I suggest that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

The House resumed from Friday, July 30, consideration of Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and Motion No. 2 (Mr. Murphy); and Motion No. 3 (Mr. Johnston); and Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7 (Mr. Murphy).

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in returning to the regular debate on Bill C-124, I should like to say that many hon. members of the House have made much of the fact of the so-called principle of this bill being a principle of restraint. The principle of this bill before us is not restraint. The principle of the bill is compulsion and the transfer of wealth and power, relatively speaking, from those who do not have it, to those who have. That is wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member who has the floor. Would hon. members who wish to have conversations, please carry them on behind the curtains or in the lobby? The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I can well appreciate why some hon. members of the House, particularly on the government side, do not want to hear anyone question the principle they say is behind this legislation. The principle is not restraint, it is compulsion, and that is all it is. We do not need to look very far to find the kind of thinking that gave rise to it. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), according to an article for Southam News written by John Ferguson on June 14, 1982, which appeared in The Vancouver Sun, made a rather inflammatory speech to the Conference Board of Canada. His speech reads in part:

> Governments at all levels have gone too far, too fast, in yielding power to their unions. What we have in fact created is a series of union monopolies which have been granted power to close down large sections of our economy, to deny education to our children and hospital care to the sick, to cut off police and fire protection for the public and to bring transportation to a halt municipally, regionally and even nationally.

That is the kind of thing that gave rise to this bill. It is a feeling of revenge on the part of members opposite. They are the true heirs to Joey Smallwood.

I can remember when I first became involved in the political process. One of the debates going on at the time concerned legislation that came down in the province of Newfoundland in 1958 or 1959 to outlaw a union from the shores of the province of Newfoundland entirely. That action was taken by a Liberal government headed by another premier and another representative of that party who could not stand to see free men and women stand up on their own two feet to challenge their kind of arbitrary dictates as to what was best for them. At that time there were loggers in the province of Newfoundland who were attempting to get a wage of $1.05 an hour, and trying to get rid of the kind of conditions that people in that industry in other parts of Canada had eliminated from their places of work decades before. At that time they hauled in their own blankets and put them down on bunks of straw or ferns in old rodent-infested bunkhouses. The Liberal premier of the province at that time decided that he could not stomach it . . . that is, their reaction. He formed his own government-sponsored union and actually passed legislation which banished the union of the people's choice in that province, an action the likes of which had not been seen in this country for almost half a century. This legislation is in the same kind of spirit.

• (1740)

While dealing with this bill, I should like to direct a few remarks to hon. members of the official opposition. We are all well acquainted with The Globe and Mail. Most of us read it every morning. This particular newspaper is hardly a socialist one. It is not even a Liberal newspaper. If anything, it is Conservative. Every day the masthead of its editorial page reads:

> The subject who is truly loyal to the Chief Magistrate will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures.

This was not written by Jean-Claude Parrot. It was not written by working people across this country, and particularly not by those in the public sector who see themselves singled out as victims in the public relations gimmickery of government. I talk about public relations gimmickery rather advisedly.

Earlier in the debate we reminded government members of the document entitled, "Anti-Inflation Policy, Options" which was presented to the federal cabinet some months ago. I should like to quote from that internal government document. In part it reads:

> The main advantage of the program would be that it would enable the government to be seen doing something about inflation and to lay part of the blame on the private sector.

Also it reads:

> We are not currently facing a wage-driven inflation such as we were in 1975;

Also it indicated that inflation had been "highly resistant to government policy, including wage and price controls."

The government has acknowledged the arguments presented in that paper. On innumerable occasions ministers of the government have expressed the same sentiments and outlined the same facts, yet we are now asked to believe that Bill

C-124, including all its amendments, will somehow do what the Anti-Inflation Board and its wage and price control mechanisms of the 1970s failed to do. At least the AIB attempted to appear to be even-handed. They do not even make that pretence this time around. Their total purpose, other than as a public relations exercise, is to attempt to bring the working people of this country to heel. This is wrong, and it is something which I and other members of my party will resist, no matter how much the Conservatives and their pals on the Liberal benches say it is time to tell workers to "git back". They make high-sounding suggestions and equity, but the kind of equity suggested by Conservatives in committee, upon which the government acted as it did with other suggestions was, "You are only discriminating against public employees; why do you not expand it to people in other industries?" They expanded upon discrimination. It was their idea of producing equity; it was funny reasoning. I have a hard time believing that they do not realize that this is no kind of equity at all. Once they get away from their haste to take a kick at the working people of this country and look at it objectively, I do not think they would believe otherwise.

Where will this kind of measure lead us? Just the other day someone brought to my attention an article that appeared in The Washington Post on July 26, 1982. It concerned an industrial dispute which was taking place in Dakota City, Nebraska. This may seem a long way away, but it well demonstrates the kind of course upon which this House appears to be embarked. There has been a strike in the meat packing industry in that city since June 7, 1982, involving some 2,400 members of the meatcutters' union. They are not on strike for higher pay; they are seeking a two year wage freeze. The company has refused to sign an agreement because it is insisting upon a four year wage freeze. During the last two months the company has brought in strikebreakers. There has been violence on the lines. A number of people have been injured and a number have been arrested. The city has become an armed camp.

This is the kind of insane violence to which such a measure leads, the kind which we saw from one end of the country to the other during the 1930s. We do not want to see it again. Surely to God they can be more enlightened in the way they deal with people.

Earlier today reference was made in the House to recent remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) in a letter to the editor of one of the Toronto newspapers. At least his remarks showed an intelligent approach to labour relations. At least he understood and admitted that working people had rights, rights which are just as inviolate and just as important to the functioning of a free and democratic society as many other rights which we often proclaim in this place and in other assemblies across the land. I only wish that we had had the opportunity of having the Minister of Labour appear before us in committee. I do not know whether he was hiding or the government was keeping him hidden, but I am sure the government did not wish us to hear the comments which he made in his recent letter to the editor. It would not want us to hear such comments in the context of the debate in committee because the government's legislation flies in the face of those kinds of principles. It flies in the face of anything akin to a free labour movement.

A few moments ago I quoted from the masthead of The Globe and Mail. Again it reads:

> The subject who is truly loyal to the Chief Magistrate will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures.

"Arbitrary", as defined in the second edition of the Oxford Illustrated Dictionary, reads:

> Derived from mere opinion, capricious; despotic; (law) discretionary.

This bill is discretionary. They have simply picked out this group to kick. They have not even attempted to appear to be even-handed. It is discriminatory, it is arbitrary. When Parliament acts in that way, how can it expect honest, hard-working people across the country who believe in freedom to respect either that law or the institution which passes it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: I am not advocating that people should disregard the law. I would be the last to do so. But, I do not think that members of this party and I are alone in understanding that, when people feel they have been subjected to laws which are discriminatory, arbitrary and capricious, many of them will react accordingly. It is a despotic law and it will be dealt with in that way. In turn, that will lead to the kind of breakdown none of us desire to see. If we are ever to begin to work together in any kind of intelligent way to put society back on the path where government, labour and management can deal with each other in good faith and in an atmosphere of trust, then we must at least respect each other's rights as individuals and as segments of society. We must deal with each other on a non-discriminatory basis.

This law could be called a "git back" law. I do not know whether hon. members are familiar with that phrase. It is used often in the American south, "Git back, boy; git back." This amendment, this new amendment of the government, is a "git back" one. It is the government's attempt to be fair. It is going to tell members of free trade unions in the country, at least those in the public sector, and in the little bit of the private sector that they arbitrarily decided to throw in with them, that if they are good boys and girls and they sit down and negotiate within the arbitrary confines of this arbitrary law, then the government, out of the goodness of its heart and acting alone, will decide, this is compensation and this is not; this is a monetary clause and that is not; and if they are all very well behaved then they will be able to negotiate within the confines of that very peculiar definition of what is monetary and what is compensatory and what is not.

There is a word for that. In the old labour lexicon it is called a yellow-dog contract, and no self respecting worker would ever sign one. That is a yellow-dog clause and this whole damned thing is a yellow-dog bill. The Norris-LaGuardia Act, passed in 1932, made the yellow-dog contract illegal. That was 50 years ago. I am just going to give a short example of that kind of contract. This is a typical one. It was offered by the Hitchman Coal & Coke Company to all employees in 1908 . Those who refused to sign were fired. In the case of Hitchman Coal Company v. Mitchell, the U.S. Supreme Court in 1917 declared this contract valid. In 1932 it was thrown out.

Let me quote as follows:

> I am employed by and work for the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company with the express understanding that I am not a member of the United Mine Workers of America and will not become so while an employee of the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company, and that the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company is run non-union and agrees with me that it will run non-union while I am in its employ.
> If at any time while I am employed by the Hitchman Coal and Coke Company I want to become connected with the United Mine Workers of America, or any affiliated organization, I agree to withdraw from the employment of said company, and agree that while I am in the employ of that company I will not make any effort amongst its employees to bring about the unionizing of that mine against the company's wish. I have either read the above, or heard same read.

That was the yellow-dog contract that was ruled invalid by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1932, and this bill is in that same spirit. This amendment, particularly the new Clause 16, is in exactly that same spirit. As they say, "I'se gonna be a good boy, Massa," and that is what this is all about.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Kristiansen: There is a book in the province of Quebec called the "White Niggers of North America". That is not a racist term in this context. I think some members are aware of the phrase "being a good nigger" and it has nothing to do with being black or white or yellow or brown or any other colour. If you think that Canadian workers, who are used to being free people are going to say, "I'se gonna be a good boy" just because the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) over there, with his union bashing and desire to seek a servile attitude from among the employees of the Government of Canada, thinks Canadian workers are going to kowtow to that kind of attitude, then the government is very wrong.

There may be a number of Canadians, with the best of motives, who are going to get sucked in for a little while as they have been on other occasions, with regard to the War Measures Act and at other times, when this House unwisely attempted to invade the very freedom upon which this society is built. Sometimes it takes a little time for people to see very clearly exactly what is happening to some of their very basic and fundamental freedoms. But they will learn, and just as the Liberals and Conservatives voted together in that instance, the War Measures Act in 1970; just as the Liberals and Conservatives, going back further, voted together in the War Measures Act to discriminate against Japanese Canadians in the 1940s—and now they wish they had not, and everybody now says that that was a bad thing to do—and just as almost every member of this House, except for a few, maybe, who secretly keep their opinions to themselves, now says that the kind of arbitrary, dictatorial action that Joey Smallwood utilized against the International Woodworkers in the province of Newfoundland when he banished them from the shores of that province in 1958-59—that that was wrong. In the same way, people will come to realize that this kind of legislation which is arbitrary and discriminatory is wrong as well and they will react in time against the government and against all politicians who are in a haste to find any old perceived answer to the very serious economic problems that beset our society. Those people will see through that and will punish those very shortsighted politicians accordingly; and they should.

There have been a number of comments from the other side. I have only got two or three minutes left so I will attempt to be very brief.

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Kristiansen: They do not like people withdrawing their labour, they do not like free people speaking out either, and that is obvious from the tone of that remark. We do not "git back" and fit into their nice, cozy corner. I have never "got back," and I have never known the people I have worked with, people I am proud to have worked with, "git back" either. It is just not their way. We will express ourselves and we will be around, and whether it is in this place or whether it is on the street, we will be there and you will not shove us back.

There is no purpose in people having a union to protect them if that union cannot negotiate for them. The history of collective action on the part of working people is too strong and too deeply imbedded for it to be floated away and washed away by a quick flick of the wrist, as some of the people opposite would like to see happen. Unfortunately there are a few Conservative members who join with them enthusiastically in that aim. Others join them but are not quite so enthusiastic. We hope that in time they, along with the vast majority of people of this country, will some day see their way clear, in whatever forum they wish to express it, to tell this government that this action is no good, it is wrong, it has to go and they have to go too.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is a very important bill and the government I know is in a hurry to get it through. I wonder, so that I could keep my remarks in the same tenor throughout the 20 minutes allotted to me, if I might now call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Shall we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): It is not six o'clock.

Mr. McKinnon: I see the NDP are demonstrating their usual witless kind of lack of co-operation. It is rather interesting that the NDP are in trouble on this bill. I might tell the watching audience that this is a bill for restraint that they oppose; this is a bill that cuts MPs' pay, and they opposed it from the start.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: There are lots of things wrong with this bill, mainly the amendments to it, but the NDP are now on record as opposing an MPs' pay cut.

Mr. Deans: I will speak later.

Mr. McKinnon: Another bill they opposed here was to pay $5,000 to each of those poor unfortunates who accepted the government's advice and put the UFFI insulation in their homes. The NDP are picking some very peculiar bills to oppose, it seems to me, and I am not surprised that they do not want to call it six o'clock. They would much rather be speaking themselves trying to explain these positions, I expect. Also, the last one they opposed before that was the freedom of information bill. They have quite a track record recently in the House. It is very difficult to feel kindly toward them. However, if they wish me to talk in this vein for the next minute, I am glad to do so.

The NDP also talk about the Conservatives supporting the Liberals. Maybe the country needs to be reminded once more that the NDP, when the votes count on confidence motions, 19 times in a row supported the minority Liberal government back in the 1972-74 minority government position.

So that we do not keep the Sergeant at Arms waiting too long, may I now call it six o'clock?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the House adjourned at six o'clock the hon. member for Victoria had the floor.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I have been forced to cut my speech into two parts, the NDP having refused to give me unanimous consent to call it six o'clock at three minutes to six.

You may recall that at that time I pointed out that the NDP have, so far in recent history, voted against the UFFI bill which would give $5,000 to those unfortunates who took the government's advice to instal that insulation in their homes. They have voted against the bill before us, Bill C-124, from the beginning. This is a bill that cuts MPs' pay. They have also voted against the freedom of information bill.

Those members also talked about their voting record against the government. As I pointed out, in the 1972-74 minority government situation, the NDP voted with the Liberal government at that time 19 times before they finally voted against the government. There was another minority government in 1979 which was headed by the Conservatives. At that time the NDP never once gave us the fair chance they had given the Liberals some seven years before. Not once did they support the Conservative government when it was in a minority position. They now try to claim their neutrality and dissociate themselves from the Liberals but, as the Saskatchewan election proved, they cannot get away with it.

I would like to discuss how this bill was brought about in its present form. As we all know, it was brought in as a restraint bill. The Liberal position is a rather peculiar one these days. As always, I believe that the party is being run by a combination of Mr. Goldfarb and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Mr. Goldfarb recently found out that the general public thinks that the civil servants are being paid too much, or that the public would not object to their pay being cut. Therefore, the Liberals introduced Bill C-124.

The Liberals also introduced a number of other initiatives that I believe are derived from Mr. Goldfarb's polls. They are beginning to relax on metric. Any poll could have shown them that metric is vastly unpopular in the country. So the Liberals are beginning to change their position somewhat on metric. I expect that any day they will float some kind of a vote in the House on capital punishment. That would be the ultimate in changing positions to suit Mr. Goldfarb.

I must say that the amendments to this bill are making life extremely difficult in the House. I began being a supporter of Bill C-124 because of its restraint qualities. It cut the pay of MPs, and I found it rather easy to support. However, the amendments started to come in. I find it difficult to believe that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) alone is responsible for it. Although it may seem strange, and I hate to admit it about that group of oddballs—to be kind to them let us call them that—oddballs who are running the country, if there was one member with a glimmering of sense, it was the President of the Treasury Board. But then he produced this mean, small-minded and vindictive amendment, which he brought forward. I wonder if he was forced into it by the Prime Minister. It does not suit him, yet here it is.

How did this restraint measure begin? There is a great deal of argument back and forth with various people wishing someone else to take the credit for it, but this measure started on budget night when the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) brought in his budget.

As for the Minister of Finance, some people say he is the worst Minister of Finance since the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) was minister of finance. Others disagree and say he is the worst Minister of Finance since the hon. John Turner was the minister of finance. I tend to agree with both.

In any event, the Minister of Finance said, as it appears on page 4 of what seemed to be an interminable speech that night when talking about the rollback and restraint, "However, only ministers, MPs and senators will be subject to actual cuts in pay." That suited me and received my support.

The bill was then introduced. A measure was introduced based on the provision in the budget speech about the 6 per cent limit on future pay increases. I believe that the staff around this place accepted that with very good discipline. They saw that it was necessary and beneficial and that it would help the country to become accustomed to taking less out of the public trough. They generally accepted it with a very good grace.

I have a staff of four who are all women. As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) said, they were the ones who were treated the very worst here. Eighty per cent of the staff here—100 per cent of my staff—are women. I had an unwritten contract with my staff because they trusted me as a Member of Parliament the way I trusted the government as a Member of Parliament. I was given a global amount. In my office we decided who would get how much. They did not receive a great increase. They received this increase in April and for the last four months they have been drawing that pay because I said that that is what they could have. My staff have done their work. When they received the news that they would receive only a 6 per cent raise next year, they said, "If this is what is needed to get the country back to normal, I guess we are the goats, but we will get along with it."

The President of the Treasury Board then introduced this amendment No. 3. It is really a bombshell tucked away in the bill. The amendment would mean that those people would have to roll back 6 per cent of their pay so that they would only have had a 5 per cent increase from April. They have become accustomed to living on a certain stipend each month. They have made arrangements to pay off mortgages and to rent apartments. They have purchased new and second-hand cars. Most of them live up to their incomes. Now, bang, they are to be treated the way the Minister of Finance said that no one except ministers, MPs and senators would be subject to in terms of actual cuts in pay. This will create far more difficulties than the government imagines, but it is really noted for not realizing for a moment the consequence or consequences of its actions. It goes blindly into these half-thought-out programs and is then astonished when they do not turn out well because its helpers or advisers have said, "Do it our way and worry not."

• (2010)

One can never forget the look on the face of the Minister of Finance when he was questioned by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney) a couple of days after his November budget. She pointed out to him that 20,000 construction workers had been laid off in the country because of the cutting off of the MURB program, the multiple unit residential building program. Builders had their allowances cut off unless a MURB had its foundation in. The result was that 20,000 people were put out of work. But the Minister of Finance had never dreamed that would happen. He had not thought through what would happen, any more than the President of the Treasury Board understood what would happen when he brought in this amendment, that he would turn many of his friends in the House into people who are finding it extremely difficult to vote for this restraint. Yes, we are very much in favour of restraint. We are willing to accept it, even for ourselves. But it is very hard indeed to have it put on us if we must go back and tell our staff that they are to be added to that very select group which will be subject to a rollback, and that of all the 500,000 people who work for the federal government, 2,000 will have to carry the only rollback, which will be on their backs.

At page 2 of the bill, with reference to the rollback provisions, it states:

(2) This part applies to

(a) staffs of Ministers of the Crown and of members of the Senate and House of Commons—

That affects some of our secretarial staffs. At this time it might be interesting to read just what kind of provisions we are supposed to be working under here. For the benefit of those who never do read the instructions that are sent out I would like to read from the book provided to members of the House of Commons, which is entitled "Allowances and Services". In Section 7 at page 2, under "Administration of Staff Allowance", it states:

Members of Parliament have the prerogative to recruit, hire and release employees. Rates of pay are also determined by the Member, providing such rates fall within the guidelines set out in Part B, paragraphs 2 and 3. Salary expenditures will be reflected in the member's principal budget.

Members' assistants fall under paragraphs 2 and 3 to which reference was given. The lowest level, level 1, starts at $10,537 a year. It goes from there through to level 2, level 3 and then level 4. The salary at the very top of level 4 is $25,408. However, members are given a global budget, and, as it is stated, salaries are at our discretion. It is just as plain as can be. I expect that if this bill passes, this whole manual will be scrubbed out and we will be put on a new footing. One of the parts of the new footing is that our own staff would probably never believe us again.

With reference to classification and salary, it is quite interesting. This book of instruction for MPs states:

As it is the prerogative of the member to determine the rate of pay of an employee, it is also the responsibility of the member to initiate any change in the rate of pay of an employee. Only the signature of the Member may authorize the appointment, the amendment to the rate of pay, or the termination of employment in either the Ottawa parliamentary office or the constituency office.

It is really something like the limit put on the indexation of retired servicemen. I am doubtful as to whether the government has the authority to break these contracts. If it happened in the private sector, I suspect that a firm would be sued for the money which is still outstanding or due to the employee, because there was a verbal contract, at least with the staff. It can be backed up by papers sent out by the parliamentary administration which lists everyone and states what they are paid. Suddenly, this contract has no bearing or effect. It is not a contract. It seems wrong to me.

The fat really hit the fire when word came out just after the budget, which I believe was June 28, that the exempt staff of the ministers had received a pay raise of 11 per cent some 11 days before the budget. The members of the House of Commons were asked to put their usual intelligence on hold and believe that the government knew nothing about the matter, that the President of the Treasury Board knew nothing about it and that no one knew what was in the budget until budget night. What the government said about the November budget was that no one knew what was in it, including the Minister of Finance, until budget night.

Mr. Kristiansen: Or a month after.

Mr. McKinnon: Yes, some people wonder whether he knows anything about what was in it to this day.

There was a press report that this was the second of a pair of pay raises. I have only seen it once. It is by no means conclusive. I would look forward to the President of the Treasury Board telling me truthfully at some time whether or not there was another pay raise involved before that. For those who do not know about exempt staff, "exempt staff" means employees who are exempt from having their pay questioned, and the government takes very good care not to tell us how much they get paid, no matter how much they get paid. So we have to take the government's word about whether there was or was not a previous pay raise. It seems to me that is partly the fault of the Liberal backbenchers more than those in the opposition whose job it is to oppose, but I understand that members of cabinet received quite a bit of criticism about raising the salaries of their own exempt staff just 11 days before a budget was introduced, which limited to 6 per cent the increase for the staff of everyone else and left theirs at 11 per cent. This seemed to be a sly trick to get in a pay raise quietly just before the ceiling was put on.

Not only did the opposition oppose it, but I also believe that some hon. members, the more forthright of the backbenchers in the Liberals, criticized the cabinet, not realizing how dangerous it is for any backbencher to criticize the cabinet. The reaction was swift and immediate and their staff will now have their salaries rolled back. In my opinion, this is absolutely outrageous, and is the reaction of a petulant, vindictive man, and a meaner example of the use of power is really hard to contemplate. That is why at the beginning of my remarks I said that I am amazed if it really came from the President of the Treasury Board, although he is a friend of the Prime Minister and has never before, as far as I know, participated in any actions similar to this. I know, of course, how I will vote on Amendment No. 3, which relates to this matter.

There is another amendment which equally worries me, and that is Amendment No. 13, which mentions the powers of the Treasury Board under the new bill. While I would not like to bore hon. member by all the jargon that is written therein, I will say that it starts off by stating:

> 13. The governor in council may, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, by order,
> (a) substitute, in respect of a compensation plan or a class of compensation plans, a percentage different from that set out in paragraph 9(1)(b)—
> (b) amend Schedule 1 by adding thereto any department or ministry of state of the Government of Canada or other portion of the public service—

I have been around here for nearly a decade and I have never seen provisions like this put into a bill. This really would give the President of the Treasury Board authority to exempt people from the pay regulations and, under these regulations, I suppose he could exempt the exempt staff once more. No one knows how much pay they receive or how much they will be receiving. But this is a power which is not customarily given to the Treasury Board, and I see no reason at all that it should be given to it now. It is a move which I really think should be altered.

• (2020)

If the minister could find it in his heart to cancel Amendment No. 3 and soften what is now Motion No. 17, I could support the bill with quite an easy conscience. However, I find it hard to accept Motion No. 3 which picks out a small group of very dedicated people. The only people in Ontario working today are the staff of Members of Parliament, among those in the government service. They are here. They work long hours. They are not unionized. They are not tenured. They can be fired at the drop of a hat or the whim of a Member of Parliament, yet they are treated in such a shabby fashion by this government which is simply trying to get even with opposition Members of Parliament in the House of Commons or members in their own party. It is a disgraceful performance. I would like to see it changed before this motion is put to a vote.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I want to continue with the speech I started earlier today when dealing with the question of closure. The speech by the member who preceded me did not make it quite clear how he is going to vote when the bill finally comes before the House of Commons. I suppose it is part of the Tory strategy to keep them guessing as long a you can or say whatever you must to have the people believe you are on all sides of every issue. That seems to be the normal practice for the Conservatives these days. I do not want to dwell on the Tories. They are doing themselves enough harm that I do not have to help.

I want to deal with the bill. As I said this afternoon, the bill is an unsatisfactory piece of legislation. Not only is it not supportable in any of its current form, but it is a piece of legislation that is intended to address a problem which, in my mind and in the minds of a large number of people, is not the fundamental problem confronting this country.

The government brings forward this legislation in an effort to try to provide some leadership. It claims it is attempting to provide for the balance of the country a sense that it knows what it is doing. It claims to have a path of action that it proposes to follow, that the economy will at the end of this road, wherever that may be, benefit significantly and substantially from the direction that this Liberal government is now charting. When you stop to think about it, you cannot help but wonder how holding civil servants' wages to a maximum 6 per cent increase this year or in the coming year and to a maximum 5 per cent increase in any subsequent year is going to provide that new direction.

Was it because civil servants' wages were too high that the bank rate was close to 20 per cent and remains now at 16 per cent or thereabouts? Was it because civil servants' wages were too high that unemployment continued to escalate in the country to a level that is now annually adjusted at 1.3 million but is in fact close to a total of two million unemployed, those who are in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits plus those who have long since run out of those benefits, no longer qualify and are no longer part of the statistics?

Was it because civil servants' wages were too high that the level of bankruptcies among small businesses rose to an unprecedented 5,700 in the first six months of this year, up 37 per cent from the same time last year? Was it because civil servants' wages were too high that 22,000 people in this country lost their homes in the month of April, up 32 per cent from last year, 6,000 of them in the province of Quebec?

Was it because civil servants' wages were too high that we saw only 145,000 to 155,000 housing starts in Canada this year, when the need is now over 220,000 housing starts each year? Are we to believe it was because of the high wages of civil servants that instead of having 100,000 rental units started in Canada to meet the demonstrated need, we have only 30,000 units started in Canada this year?

What I am saying to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the minister is this: was the level of incomes in the public service the primary reason why the economy at every single level is suffering so dramatically and drastically? Is this the answer to the significant and difficult problems now confronting every single sector? Is it because of civil servants' wages being too high that close to 50,000 auto workers are not working?

Is it because of civil service wages that Massey-Ferguson was in so much difficulty or that Chrysler was unable to make it in the world of business? Is it because of civil service wages in Canada that we find so many families faced with such difficult economic times? Young people leaving school cannot find jobs. I suppose the high wages paid to civil servants is the reason that so many people coming out of high schools and universities cannot find employment in the country.

I imagine that once the government thinks about it, it will be able to answer all these questions, whether it be the high level of unemployment, exorbitant interest rates, the exceedingly high level of bankruptcies, far greater than we have seen in 30-odd years, or the tremendous losses incurred by families trying to hold on to their homes in the face of such pressures, the dramatic drop in the number of housing starts or apartment rental starts.

I suppose the government is saying to us in the House of Commons that the reason for all this is that the public service wages are too high, that in order to get to the nub of it, the nitty-gritty, the government will deal with the real problem, cut wages, and that will solve the problem. The government believes that all of a sudden everyone will be working, inflation will drop, interest rates will drop to insignificant one-digit numbers, no bankruptcies will occur, people will keep their homes. Is this what the government is saying? Is this what the government is offering? Is this why the government has brought this measure forward?

Am I to believe that civil service wage levels are to blame for all of the economic woes in this country, that by taking this step and limiting them to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year we will see a dramatic turnaround in the economy, real prosperity, and the days of the 6 per cent world will be upon us? To me that would be something out of Alice in Wonderland.

If the minister truly believes the measure he has brought forward is supportable because it provides a cornerstone for the government's economic initiatives or somehow will resolve the very many complex problems in the economy, then I say the minister is dreaming in technicolour. There is just no justification for suggesting that this measure is in any way a measure which will begin to effect that turnaround.

There are people in the country who think cutting someone else's wages will solve the problem. The Tories recognize that. They do their polling, and the Liberals do theirs. We do not have to do polling because we are sufficiently attuned to what is going on. We do not need polls. I meet with unemployed people frequently, and they ask, "Ian, will this be of any value?" If this measure were to be of any value, people would think it worthy of support. If I were to ask an auto worker why he is not working, he would tell me he is not working because people are not buying the automobiles he manufactured. Would cutting the wages of public servants encourage people to buy automobiles? People do not think that is likely. When I ask how this measure will help get people back to work and how it will provide them with a market for what they were previously making—and continue to make, for that matter—they ask me, "Is the government doing anything about the real problem in the auto industry now?" They ask whether the government is taking steps to curb imports so that we can get our industry back on its feet. I would like to say "Yes", but I have to answer "No". The government does not care. It is not doing anything about that.

If the government is not doing anything about that, what is it doing about mortgage interest rates as they affect unemployed auto workers whose unemployment insurance benefits are about to run out and who do not now have enough income to pay the exorbitant interest rates charged since mortgage renewals last November at 20.75 per cent? I have to say that the government is not doing anything about that either. I am asked what it is the government is doing, and I have to say it is cutting the wages of civil servants. People ask how that will benefit them, and I tell them I do not think it will benefit them.

Inevitably the response is, "Why are the Tories supporting the government?" I must confess that the Tories are in a bit of a conundrum. I do not know why they are supporting this measure. I cannot figure them out. I thought they were brighter than that, but I have come to the conclusion that I was wrong.

If the government is going to limit wage increases in the public sector to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year, is it likely the government will also limit wage increases in the private sector? The government has already done it. It has included CP in the bill. Not only has it included CP in the bill, but it has also enlisted the help of its friends, and the friends of the Conservatives, who are at the heads of the majority of major corporations. As I explain this to people and tell them what these major corporate executives are saying, I can see the look of dismay on their faces. There is disbelief at first, and then they realize I am telling the truth. These corporate executives are telling us not to worry about them because they will keep wage increases to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year. No matter what the cost of living and no matter whether the cost of living remains at 11 per cent or 12 per cent, wage increases will be restricted to 6 per cent. Does this mean people will fall behind? That is what the Tories and Liberals want. That is why they are supporting the bill.

People think that the government surely will take some steps to try to limit price and profit increases and that surely the government is not blind to the major problem which will confront them. They think that perhaps the government will bring in some kind of measure to limit profits and price increases, but I have to tell them the truth. The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) would understand that it is absolutely essential to be consistent. Perhaps he would not understand that, but let us assume he would.

Ian Sinclair, the chairman of Canadian Pacific, represents the blue ribbon committee of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and he is out there pushing, tugging, shoving, cajoling and bullying his colleagues and friends in the corporate world to accept the Prime Minister's direction. Ian Sinclair has said that although wages will be limited to increases of 6 per cent and 5 per cent, we need not expect that prices or profits will be limited. After all, profits are "not high enough". Prices need to rise. More profits are needed. Workers will get by with less, but more profits are needed. Why? More on top of what? Today I asked the minister about Suncor. The minister has just arranged to bail out yet another major corporate entity with public funds. Tens of millions of tax dollars will be involved, and Suncor has agreed to live by the 6 per cent and 5 per cent wage guidelines. I thought to myself that that was very big of Suncor, in return for those tax dollars. I thought that was very kind and that Suncor showed a certain amount of understanding of the Prime Minister's and the Tory party's logic. But Suncor then said it wants to have the right to maintain its profits at historical levels. I began to worry about that, so I took a look to see. Historical levels would lead me to believe that Suncor would be entitled to something similar to what it got, let us say, in 1976, 1977, 1978 or perhaps even 1979. In 1976 Suncor's profits were $13.3 million; in 1977, $23.6 million, almost double; in 1978, they dropped to almost $20 million; in 1979 up they went to $84 million; in 1980, $115.5 million; and in 1981, $100 million profit. However, there was Suncor tapping on the Prime Minister's door and asking if it could just get its trunk into the trough one more time so it could get more tax dollars, in spite of the fact that it was prepared to hold the wages of its employees down. Where in hell does Suncor think the money comes from? Who does Suncor think puts the money into the tax coffers? Suncor wants more. In the first quarter of this year the profits of Suncor were in excess of $11 million, which means that by the end of the year they will probably be at around $60 million. What historical profit level would Suncor want to achieve? Would Suncor settle for the 1976 level of $13.3 million? If it settled for the 1976 level of $13.3 million, it would not need tax dollars because it is generating enough now. Would Suncor settle even for the historical level of 1977, $23.6 million? Suncor would not need to come to the Government of Canada to raise additional funds. It is all right now.

• (2040)

When people ask me why I am not supporting the bill—I know my time is nearly up, Mr. Speaker, and it is a shame—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank God for that.

Mr. Deans: I am not supporting the bill because it does not deal with the fundamental problem. If the government had wanted to take steps to curb the high interest rates and whatever other steps are necessary to secure them, if the government had wanted to assist in the building of homes that would house the people of Canada, every dollar of which investment would be returned, if the government had been prepared to enter into arrangements to cut off or limit the import of vehicles in order that our own vehicle manufacturers could rebuild and in that way provide jobs for Canadians—in other words, Mr. Speaker, if the government had been prepared to bring forward an economic program aimed at putting people back to work, then I say that this measure would have been unnecessary.

The government does not begin to deal with the problems of Canada. The government does not give a damn about the problems of Canada, Mr. Speaker. The government does not have it within its scope of understanding to appreciate the problems of people now unemployed and how it should put things back together again. It is supported, of course, by the Tory party. I do not know why. It will go the same way as the Liberal Party will go. It will disappear eventually because it no longer meets society's needs.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few brief remarks on the bill before the House. I cannot help but reflect on some of the remarks I have heard tonight. We have just heard the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) try to speak like a prophet. He may be many things, but a prophet he is not, Mr. Speaker.

It always surprises me when I hear members of the New Democratic Party pontificate in manners holy and righteous and make the kind of rash judgments they are known for making in this House.

I do not speak on this bill with a great deal of happiness or enthusiasm but I believe that some of the measures in it are necessary in view of the state of the country at the present time. I believe, as well, that the government must show leadership. I was a bit surprised and concerned, although I should not have been having heard him before, at the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) when he spoke on the amendment known as the Baker amendment. I know I should not use a member's name in the House, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): When you use them, use them truthfully.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I will try to do that, hon. sir.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Do your best.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): He made a great tirade against the 11 per cent increase in salary that the staffs of ministers received in early June before the budget was brought in.

It seemed to me that in the presentation of his budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) made it abundantly clear that the provisions of the budget applied to those increases in the public sector under the control of the Government of Canada that would come into effect after June 28. The salary augmentation for members' staffs came into effect at least two weeks before that date, and therefore, in my opinion, should not have been subjected to the budget provisions.

I know that there have been a lot of comments and a great deal of commentary about ministers' staffs and the salaries and perks that they enjoy. If one takes their salaries and perks in complete abstraction from the reality in which they live, they do look pretty impressive. When one looks at their work day, their work week, their hours per month, then the salaries and perks dim. I think that any fair-minded member of the House will agree that they work as long hours as we do. They work with much dedication to their ministers. Sometimes I wish some of them would work with a bit more dedication to members. Be that as it may, however, there can be no doubt that they work with complete dedication to their minister. They subject their lifestyle, their family life, their home life, everything, to the will and necessity of the minister they serve.

That is as it has to be in our system. I was therefore surprised to hear the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) try to equate the salary and lifestyle of a ministerial assistant with that of the ordinary public servant. There is a great deal of difference, Mr. Speaker.

I have had differences with the public service, particularly the Public Service Commission, which, in my opinion, has set itself up to be the god of public employment in the departments and agencies of the federal government. I do not blame it for that; I think we must take the blame for giving it that kind of absolute power and allowing it to continue. There can be no doubt that a ministerial assistant does not work a 35, 37½ or 40-hour week; it is more like a 70, 75, 80 or even 100-hour week.

If ministers work as hard as backbench members, then I know that their staffs are working consistently 70, 80 and 90 hours a week. I do not believe that the salaries they earn are too high.

I think the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was wrong when he tried to equate the two, and I think the hon. member for Victoria was wrong when he made his remarks in the House tonight. I also believe that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) was wrong to bring in this amendment to affect the salary levels of the staffs of Members of Parliament.

At the beginning of the fiscal year our staff allotment was increased by 11 per cent. Most of us, I hope, passed that on to members of our staff. In my case I did it after some negotiation with my staff. I asked my constituency secretary to take less than members of my Ottawa staff because she was earning relatively more in the economy in which she lived than members of my staff here in Ottawa were earning in the economy in which they live. In order to be fair, I negotiated an increase for each member of my staff, to which all members of my staff agreed. I believe that is the way things should be done. I disagree wholeheartedly with members of the New Democratic Party who want to unionize the staff of Members of Parliament on the Hill. I do not believe that will work. I do not believe it is necessary if Members of Parliament are, as they should be, model employers.

Without any advance notice to my staff or the staff of any other member, we found out last week that our staff was going to be asked to make the same gesture that we were asked to make on June 28. I made that sacrifice without grumbling and without complaint even though I have to maintain two homes, both of which have mortgages. I have five children, the eldest of whom will be starting university this fall. But that is not the fault of Parliament. It is not the responsibility of Parliament, nor is it the responsibility of the government. That is my responsibility and I accept it.

But when I make a verbal contract with my staff, which to me is as binding as if it were written, and for someone then to come along and tell me that the contract is null and void is wrong. Something has gone wrong. Therefore, I am making the plea tonight to the President of the Treasury Board and his colleagues in cabinet who are here, to withdraw that amendment and to leave the salaries of members of our staff alone because we made a contract with them. We did not consult with them to find out if they were willing to take a cut in pay or if we intended at the same time to give them a corresponding cut in responsibility or a cut in the number of hours worked.

I know that many members here have had someone in their offices as long as they have been here on the Hill. I know that members ask their staff to serve long hours. I ask my staff to serve eight or nine hours a day. I believe Mr. Lincoln set an example when he abolished slavery, and I do not intend to reinstate it in my office. When a normal work day is done, if my staff have not gone home, I send them home. If we cannot cover our work in a normal work day—and I know I cannot do so with the various responsibilities and activities in which I have to participate—then I believe we should have more staff and we should not have to ask each staff member to do the job of two or three people. I know it is impossible for there to be two Members of Parliament from each riding. That idea was done away with some time ago and I do not want to see it reinstituted. I am not prepared to ask my staff, who work very hard, all of whom are the sole breadwinners in their families, to try to manage on 5 per cent or 6 per cent less when they have not been consulted nor have there been any negotiations with me about that.

Therefore, I want to put on the record tonight my plea to the government to withdraw that unfair, unannounced and injudicious amendment, which I suspect was made in response to representations made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—whether or not that is what he meant, I do not want to ascribe motives to him—because the amendment is unfair and it is unacceptable to me.

I believe the bill itself is necessary for the state of the nation today and I am prepared to vote for it and to take whatever political flak comes from it. But I am not prepared to vote for something which retroactively affects a contract made in good faith with our staff. The other provisions in the bill do not affect people on a retroactive basis. Therefore, those provisions can be justified. I can argue the cause and the need for those provisions.

We were told on budget night that as Members of Parliament and senators of this nation we had to make a sacrifice, that we had to show the way, that we had to set an example. I accept that, we do and I will. But I am not prepared to say the same to my staff. I am not prepared to say that they are in a different category from public servants who generally work no more than 37½ hours a week. They are in a different category from employees of Air Canada and a different category from the employees of the oil and gas industry of this nation. For that reason I again plead with the government to withdraw that amendment because I cannot support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Nurthumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) for a stand I think he has taken on a personal basis which flies in the face of what most Liberal members are going to do when voting on this amendment.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate the comment of the hon. member who is just beginning his speech but I take grave exception to his attributing motives to my colleagues. I do not think that is necessary nor is it called for. I would hope he will put his position on the record and not speculate on the position of other members.

Mr. Miller: Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is known what the position's of the members of the New Democratic Party on any amendment to this bill and on the bill in general. We have spoken out both in debate and in committee as being adamantly opposed to the bill in general. We are certainly opposed to amendments that will curtail the increase which the staff got about four months ago. This amendment will affect our staff members severely.

I appreciate the comments of the hon. member in terms of the problems of his staff and what other staff members will experience by having a cutback in salaries at this time. I am not too sure that I am attributing any motives to the Liberal Party that have not already been enunciated across the land.

What this bill has done for me and for many members of the public service as well as members of any labour union is to indicate the extent to which the Liberal government—and we will see the proof of this when the votes are counted—and to what extent Liberal members will go in order to gain favour in this land. The cynical attitude of Canadians toward their federal government will be totally justified.

Bill C-124 simply confirms the kind of attitude and cynicism which exists toward the government. We have a government which has ruled the land during most of the last 117 years. Basically it controls its policies through Gallup and public polls.

The situation we have today is a government which is in disarray and is disorganized. It is unaware of where it is going. The feeling exists in the land that pubic servants are doing well in comparison with many other unions and businesses in the country. Canadians are looking for answers. The Liberal government is prepared to give a simplistic answer, that it is public servants who are too rich, whose compensation packages are too rich. The government will give the public something which it perceives will gain some political favour, that is, control over public sector wages. We have a government with a 6-5 formula—the mythical 6 per cent society—which the government is prepared to use and impose upon public servants in an attempt to gain favour in the business community and with the electorate who really do not understand the economic problems which have led to the present situation in Canada.

We have a government which is willing to say to Canadians that it should set a precedent by controlling the public service to a 6 per cent increase this year and to a 5 per cent one next year and that somehow this will solve most of the economic problems in Canada. We know that is not true. Public servants know that is not true. Trade unions know that is not true. Deep down, most Canadians know that it will not be the salvation of the Canadian economy.

In terms of the public service and its members, they are in somewhat of a state of shock. They know that there are some critical problems in the Canadian economy. They have heard over and over again that the public service somehow, in some mythical way, is to blame for them. They are quite willing in some ways to carry their share of the load of economic recovery. They have not reacted to the extent to which they will react when they discover what is being imposed upon them in terms, not only of salary curtailment but, more important, what they have lost in terms of their ability to bargain collectively with their employer.

I come from a constituency which is very heavily trade union oriented, mostly in the forest industry. I am interested in seeing the reaction of the unemployed workers in my riding toward the government program in Bill C-124. This program gets at the public service. I think there is a sense within Canada—and certainly within the private trade union movement in my riding—that this bill will not stop at the public sector. It is a propaganda ploy of the government in order to curtail collective bargaining in many other sectors. To some extent it has already included the independent trade union movement within areas in which Crown corporations are involved through contracts. IWA and the Canadian paperworkers' union in my riding have nearly 10,000 members. They are looking very carefully at the bill and at the possibility that come this fall, when they have seen a total failure of the bill to bring any reduction in the cost of living or to make available any greater employment, they will be fighting the Liberal government on the same kinds of programs with which public servants have found themselves faced at the moment.

There are approximately 6,000 members of the IWA in Port Alberni. Approximately 600 of them are currently employed. We have pulp mills which will be shut down for 11 weeks over the summer months and into September. We have sawmills which are closed down. We have loggers out of work. Only 600 of the 6,000 are working in that valley. Many of these people have been unemployed for 11 months now. They are looking at the spectre of going on unemployment insurance within the next month or two, which will bring the total in the community to approximately 1,000 workers on unemployment insurance and then on to welfare.

I ask these people what this bill means to them. Do they think this bill will put any people back to work in the forest industry? Obviously the answer is no. The reduction in incomes of public servants across Canada will mean a reduction in expenditures by union members within their local communities. Local business people are already suffering. There are record bankruptcies in the small business sector of Canada. Those businesses will have even less money. As long as the government persists in a high interest rate policy, home owners will be unable to meet their mortgage payments. New home owners and young people seeking new homes will be unable even to think about purchasing them.

Woodworkers in Nanaimo, Campbell River, Duncan, Kamloops and Prince George will continue on unemployment insurance. Also they will continue to face the spectre of even worse fate, that is, the welfare rolls.

We wonder how such a bill ever got this far in a country which prides itself on freedom, the right of self-expression, the right to a job and free movement across the land. Most Canadians feel very fortunate about living in Canada, considering the difficulties in most other nations. In a land which prides itself on its democratic system and the choice to make a free decision at election time as to what government the citizens want to represent them, the government has recently gone through a very difficult time in adopting a new Constitution. It took pride in its Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Yet, within a matter of months it comes along and says to public servants that for a period of two years they no longer have the right to collective bargaining nor the right to deal with health and safety issues. It tells them that their current contracts will be frozen and that the wages which they will negotiate over the next two years will be limited to 6 per cent and 5 per cent, regardless of the cost of living, the price of housing or of fuel.

A government which will impose this kind of legislation on its public servants, who have been loyal to it and to the Canadian public, will carry the process even further. It will take away freedoms from all of us, whether they are rights in the trade union movement or the right of small business people to make decisions on how they will run their businesses. It seems to me that the government, through this bill, is quite prepared to go to any extent.

In talking to people in the public service in my riding—and I think the situation is probably similar across the land—I found in them a hesitancy to take strong and deliberate action against the bill. I think that is a reflection of the dedication and commitment of public servants, not only in the federal government sector but also in the provincial area. People working for governments really feel some commitment to their jobs, to their ministers and to their departments. This bill simply cuts all the respect they may have felt for the government. I suspect that it will lead to the kind of attitude which many public servants felt when the Conservatives campaigned in 1979. In order to gain political favour across Canada, the Conservative government talked about 60,000 fewer public servants. It did not really explain from where they would be cut, from what departments or programs. It talked a little about them being lost through attrition, but not about how it would affect programs which were built up by government over the years. Whether social programs or economic programs for the business community, we were simply going to curtail about 2 per cent of the public service in each department and we were going to reduce that heavy, overweight public service by 60,000 people, the same kind of effect that the Conservatives are now talking about in terms of slashing the federal budget. There were no specifics in it, simply that we are going to have to slash budgets and we are going to have to turf out some of the public service.

Again I think of my riding, of the number of people unemployed and how this bill is going to affect them. It is not going to put any of them to work; it is not going to give them any more confidence in this government; it is not going to give anybody any confidence in this government. I think that most people, when they assess this bill, will recognize it is simply a political ploy to give the impression at the end of this session that the government has finally recognized that we have an economic problem, and their knee-jerk reaction to this problem is again to attack the public service. If this does not work and we get into the session in October and we still have an inflation rate of 11 per cent, an unemployment rate nearing 11 per cent or 12 per cent, budgets for provincial and municipal governments for welfare skyrocketing, and a lack of any industrial strategy in Canada, this government very likely will be prepared to bring in wage and price controls, or at least wage controls in the private sector.

We went through 1975, did we not? We went through 1974 when this government was attempting to get re-elected and it condemned the wage and price controls advocated by the Conservative leader, Mr. Stanfield, at that time, and soon after they were back in. We had an economic crisis in Canada, and the only solution to that of course was wage and price controls. Workers' salaries and workers' income have really never recovered from the 1975 era. Over the last four years, workers have experienced a net loss in disposable income because of high inflation and the high cost of living.

But that does not matter. We are going to get back into the situation where we continue to have an economic crisis in this country, and the Liberal government is prepared again to bring in at least wage controls and, just to coat the cookie a little bit, we are going probably to talk about some price controls.

The government has rejected any attempts that the New Democratic Party has made to get it to look at the cost of energy, how that is affecting the rate of inflation and how that is costing Canadians millions of dollars, or at least hundreds of dollars out of their own domestic household budgets. Why can the government not make some commitment to renegotiate contracts with the provinces in order to reduce the burden of energy costs on individual pensioners, home owners and people dependent on transportation for access to employment?

If blaming the public service for our ills does not work, we have the other scapegoat, and that is, the Canadian workers' productivity scheme. Somehow or other, if we cannot blame the public service, we have to say Canadian workers are not productive enough, they cannot compete on world markets. And yet that myth can be dispelled if we look at productivity in modern plants. The Canadian workers I know in my riding in the pulp and paper industry are more productive or as productive as any woodworkers in the world. These people are idle these days, 90 per cent of them are idle these days because of the economic crisis not only in Canada, but in the United States owing to some of the economic policies there which are related directly to the same high interest rate policy that the Liberal government in Canada is supporting, which is supported also by the Conservative Party, the official opposition in this House.

When I look at the opposition to unions coming from both the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party, often I think back to the kinds of working conditions that the coalminers in Nanaimo must have experienced in the 1850s and 1860s and up to the 1900s and past. That is where the Liberals and the Conservatives want to take us, back in the past, the same working conditions that existed in the 1850s. There were no bargaining units, no negotiating abilities at all. That is exactly where they are. I do not know where they get the name progressive because it is obviously always a regressive party that sits on my right hand side here. That is exactly what they are. They just adore having 11 per cent and 12 per cent of people out of work in the mines, the forestry industry, the fishing industry and the manufacturing industry. That is just about the size of the economic policy that we find from both the Liberals and the Conservatives in this House of Commons.

Mr. Taylor: You are the ones who voted against property rights.

Mr. Miller: The hon. member from Bow River (Mr. Taylor) is on to his property rights problem again. It is about all he has been able to say in the House of Commons since the Constitution was passed—property rights.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is your problem.

Mr. Miller: We all know that the property rights are protected by provincial governments, and we are very, very upset when anyone mentions intrusion on any provincial constitutional area.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Would you trust Bennett, lately?

Mr. Miller: Now the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) says I should not trust Bennett. Perhaps I do not trust Premier Bennett but I do not know why I should not leave it to the people in Saskatchewan and British Columbia to determine, on the basis of the policies of those governments, who they should vote for, and if those governments are not going to protect the rights of property owners then they should be turfed out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Miller: We have finally got under the skin of some of the Conservative members here because I think they also are pretty sensitive about this bill.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): So is Mr. Blakeney.

Mr. Miller: They do not appreciate the response that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) has given to them in terms of the public service and staff cutbacks. They are nervous about that because they have a sense that the minister has really responded to the demands of the Conservative Party to slash controls on our staff, and I think they should be sensitive about that.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Now, now, take it easy.

Mr. Miller: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think that the amendment which reduces the staff allowances is as bad. It simply compounds the problems that we have in the New Democratic Party with regard to a bill which restricts collective bargaining throughout all the public service.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Now you are making some sense. Sit down while you are ahead.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before I proceed to the question may I remind hon. members that pursuant to an order made earlier by Madam Speaker, Motions Nos. 2, 3 5, 6 and 7 were grouped for debate and were to be voted upon as follows: that is to say, first, Motion No. 3 will be voted upon separately, and thereafter we will deal with Motion No. 5, which will dispose of Motions Nos. 2, 6 and 7. I will now put to the House Motion No. 3 standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston).

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the yeas have it. Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Also pursuant to the rulings to which I referred I will now put the question on Motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

• (2120)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division stands deferred.

Following the ruling made earlier by Madam Speaker, the House may wish to consider Motion No. 4.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-124, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended in Clause 3 by striking out lines 6 to 17 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"(4) This part is binding on Her Majesty in".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would first like to explain what the effect of this amendment might be. It would be to delete Section 4 which was proposed by the government in the present bill. It says:

(4) This Part applies to employees of Canadian Pacific Limited and its subsidiaries who are employed in the operation of a railway and to the employees of the following:

(a) Ontario Northland Railway;

(b) Algoma Central Railway Company;

(c) Toronto Terminals Railway Company;

(d) Shawinigan Falls Terminal Railway Company.

That clause was not there when this bill first came to the House of Commons. We were told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) that this was a bill which would specifically apply to Crown corporations and government employees. We were told that it did not apply to the private sector. The inclusion of this amendment has now brought in the private sector.

This amendment was included after all groups who were entitled to present witnesses to the committee had done so. In other words, no further witnesses were heard after this amendment was placed before the committee.

Of course, this meant that the railway unions and others who were concerned about the effect of this amendment, not only on collective bargaining but also on railway transportation, especially in western Canada, were not given an opportunity to be heard.

Many of us, especially those of us who live in western Canada, believe that the long term effect of this amendment will be to bring the railway peace which has existed in this country for the last number of years to an end. We believe that by singling out the railway industry as the only private sector industry to come under the auspices of this bill, the government will have brought about the prejudice, hate and long-term instability that it said it did not want to create in this country.

The Liberal majority on that committee refused to allow those people who were concerned about this amendment to come before the committee. Members of all parties were not able to hear what those concerned groups of Canadians felt about this amendment.

There has been an indecent haste in the entire approach to this bill. I suggested earlier today that this indecent haste showed a lack of a concern for the importance of this bill, an extremely important bill. This bill allows the government to break contracts that it has already signed. It changes the collective bargaining process in this country for the next number of years by basically outlawing it for the next two-year period. Another important aspect of this bill is its unfairness since it only affects some workers in Canada. I suggested this afternoon that the rush to pass this bill is based on the desire of a number of members to begin their vacations. I believe tonight's very low attendance is an indication of that. We have just witnessed closure under a time allocation motion which was passed by the government this afternoon.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Why do you not talk about the bill instead of describing the motives of other people?

Mr. Murphy: I presume the hon. member ranting and raving on the other side will be voting with us. I appreciate his support.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Why were you not here to listen to my speech? You would know what my position is. Wake up.

Mr. Murphy: I heard what the hon. member said. Perhaps he wishes to deny it. I do not know what his problem is.

As I said, this is an important bill. The government has introduced closure so it can rush off to its vacation. As a result of its haste within the House and the committee, we were unable to hear from wheat farmers in western Canada or those who wish to use the railways for travel across Canada, or from communities in all parts of Canada which rely upon the regular transportation system which is provided by the railways. Nor have we heard from the railway unions. We have not heard from Canadian Pacific or the other railway companies included in this amendment.

An hon. Member: We heard from Ian Sinclair.

Mr. Murphy: While my colleague said we heard from Ian Sinclair, that is not quite true. Those of us who served on the committee did not hear from him. We did ask that Ian Sinclair, who is head of Canadian Pacific investments and is a leader in the private sector calling for wage controls, appear before the committee. He indicated to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance that this is the route that they should follow. As well, he told the press that he was in favour of voluntary controls. The next day, the government did not bring in voluntary controls for CP, it brought in mandatory controls. As a result, Ian Sinclair, who is telling Inco to restrict the wages of its workers to 6 per cent and 5 per cent, Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting to restrict the wages of their workers to 6 per cent and 5 per cent, telling some of the wood and forestry companies to keep their workers' wages down to 6 per cent and 5 per cent, no longer has to worry about it himself. As far as the railways are concerned, the government has sent Mr. Sinclair a thank you note by automatically holding those workers' wages to 6 per cent and 5 per cent.

We have an ironic situation because the NDP members on the miscellaneous estimates committee which investigated this bill moved a motion to ask Ian Sinclair, who is leading the private sector crusade on this issue, to come to the committee to give evidence, as others were invited to do. However, the Liberal majority on that committee voted it down. Mr. Sinclair has met at least twice with the Prime Minister behind closed doors. He advocated the bill that is before us. He went to the press, to the private sector and to employers, saying why this bill is such a great deal, such a great suggestion for the future of Canada. But we, as Members of Parliament, who were supposed to study the bill clause by clause, and to make amendments and improvements where possible, were not allowed to hear what that man had to say. It is interesting because, after all, witnesses had been heard by that committee, and after the government refused to hear any more witnesses, we then received this amendment. Of course, the workers and communities that are affected could not make their presentations.

There was someone else who could not make presentations. That was the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia). As we have pointed out in some previous debate, workers such as the Canadian Pacific workers do not come under the jurisdiction of the President of the Treasury Board; those workers come under the Canada Labour Code. That means that we are in a situation where it is not the responsibility of the President of the Treasury Board to pass legislation or to make suggestions about workers under the Canada Labour Code. It is the responsibility of the Minister of Labour.

Earlier today I read a letter written by the Minister of Labour to The Globe and Mail wherein he defended the right to strike and the collective bargaining process. As well, he mentioned that the Parliament of Canada had made Labour Canada responsible for the operation of companies like Canadian Pacific and others which come under the private sector. In other words, he said, "That is my area. I have certain views in this area and I am the minister responsible." We agree with the minister. He is responsible to the House and to Canadians.

The hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) asked that the minister come before the committee. The first time, the government members said, "Okay, he can come." But they said he had to come at 3.30 p.m. the following Monday. It appeared that the Minister of Labour could not come at that time on Monday. We could accept that. It is reasonable to assume that a minister, just like any other Member of Parliament, has some other duties that he or she must look after. When the committee met again, we said, "Okay, we still want him. When can we get him? Can we get him to appear before the committee?" Again, the Liberal majority on that committee said, "No, we do not want him to appear before the committee. No, we will not invite him to appear before the committee." That decision was made ten minutes prior to the introduction of this amendment by the government. Ten minutes after the Liberal majority on that committee had said the Minister of Labour could not appear before the committee to give evidence, to explain his position and how he thought the bill would affect the workers who come under his responsibility, the President of the Treasury Board circulated an amendment in that committee saying that Canadian Pacific would be excluded in the legislation. How in God's name or anyone else's name could the committee be perceived to be hearing witnesses? How could the committee be perceived as studying the legislation clause by clause, which is the function of a committee as we well know? How could we be perceived to be looking after the interests of the public if the Liberal majority in that committee strangled debate, prevented witnesses from appearing, and then introduced very important amendments after the last witness has been heard? Of course, the answer is that we could not.

Not only did we have to act without the knowledge of the Minister of Labour, but also without the knowledge that may have been given to us by his mediation officers. We also had to vote yea or nay to government and opposition amendments without knowing what the deputy minister of labour thought. We had to act without knowing what the labour relations officers thought. We were in the situation where we had to act without the knowledge of the people who serve the country in the Department of Labour, the people we rely on to ensure that negotiations are proceeding, to ensure that labour laws are fair and, once passed by government, are actually followed up on or pursued.

I have not been in Parliament very long. I was elected in 1979. But after having served on five or six committees, I can say I have never yet been told that the minister or his senior officials could not appear before a committee, except for that time a week and a half ago. That was unheard of to me. Other hon. members who have been here longer may know of other times when this has happened, but I find it to be more than remarkable; I find it to be repugnant.

We took that matter very seriously. When the Liberal majority on the committee refused to hear the Minister of Labour, my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker) walked out. He may have a chance to speak later on in this debate, even though time allocation has been brought in—

An hon. Member: Imposed.

Mr. Murphy: Imposed is the more correct word. If he gets the chance to speak, he may be able to point out that he felt he could not do his duty as a Member of Parliament without hearing from those officials. He is the labour critic for our party. The bill definitely deals with people who come under the jurisdiction of the Canada Labour Code, yet the Minister of Labour could not come forward. That was completely unreasonable.

In the last few days, we have said much concerning this bill and we will be saying more over the next day or two allotted for this debate. We really do not believe that the bill will work because of the type of occurrence with the government amendment bringing in Canadian Pacific. The government has preached in the House that it is in favour of co-operation. It has said that if we are to get Canada out of the current economic slump, then all sectors, whether the provincial government employees, the public sector or private sector employees or the municipal employees, must all co-operate and work together, and that if we do not work together we will really not be able to solve the problems that we face. I believe that if we do not have co-operation from the private and public sectors and the employees and employers in both those areas, then it is probable that we will not be able to solve many of the problems that we face. As one of the members who spoke previously said, it is not simply a matter of wage controls. It is a matter involving a comprehensive program affecting energy pricing, interest rates and the direction in which this government plans to take the economy of this country. It involves all those factors. The whole history of this bill and this amendment is typical of that approach. It has not been to call for co-operation in public but to try and shove this bill through as fast and as dirty as possible.

• (2140)

One thing we found out in committee from some witnesses was that the government did not meet with the public service unions prior to introducing this bill. That is not perfectly true. The day after the President of the Treasury Board announced the bill, he did meet with the Public Service Alliance for 30 minutes, before rushing off to some other meeting. However, he did not meet with them prior to this bill being talked about in the June 28 budget. He did not meet with the Public Service Alliance. Nor did he and his colleagues in cabinet meet with the Canadian Labour Congress or with municipal officials, and they had not met with most provincial premiers since last February.

I believe I have 40 minutes as the first speaker on this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): My apologies to the hon. member. He is quite right.

Mr. Murphy: I knew I was getting a high sign, but I did not think I deserved it yet.

As I was saying, they did not meet with all of these groups I just mentioned. If the government believed in secrecy, perhaps that would be a reasonable route to follow. However, they met with the Business Council on National Issues, the kind of group to which Ian Sinclair and Mr. deGrandpré of Bell Canada belong.

When that group met with the cabinet in May, they called for 7 per cent public sector salary controls. That group did not want wage controls in the private sector. It certainly did not want price controls. The government basically followed the suggestion of that group. However, just to prove it had its own leadership, it went for 6 and 5 per cent as opposed to the Business Council's suggestion of 7 per cent.

If in May the government had accepted that idea from the Business Council on National Issues and really wanted a co-operative approach, it would have been meeting with labour leaders, provincial government leaders, municipal leaders, farm leaders and others. If it really wanted a national approach to solve the problems, it would have held those meetings then and not waited until after the budget was announced on June 28, and then have a half-hour meeting with the largest union in this country to be affected by this bill. It would not have met even later with the Canadian Labour Congress, the premiers and all sorts of other groups, after introducing this legislation.

The amendment which the government brought in, the amendment which threw Canadian Pacific into the hopper, was done by the exact same method. The bill did not bring in Canadian Pacific. It brought in Canadian National. To be quite honest, a number of groups, workers and citizens were concerned about one railway company being brought in but not the other. A union delegation came before the committee to point out the problems that existed with bringing in one company and not the other. However, the government did not consult with them. It did not suggest to them the route it would take was to bring Canadian Pacific into this bill. If you do not co-operate with others on this bill or on any other issue, how do you expect them to co-operate with you? For a number of years we in the New Democratic Party have said that the economy is in trouble, that there must be some kind of co-operative approach. We believe that. We also believed there must be some government restraint.

My colleague, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) pointed out a number of areas where the government has not had very good control over the coffers it is entrusted to look after. He pointed out a number of flights taken by senior officials which obviously were not necessary. We have pointed out programs where the government is letting hundreds of millions of dollars flow to oil companies, which is completely unnecessary. We just have to look around this edifice to see money being wasted.

Those issues are being raised by our party, both in the Public Accounts Committee and in the House. Therefore, we do believe in a restraint program. I hope some members of the other opposition party will keep that in mind when they attack us for not supporting this bill. We cannot support the bill for the reasons I have indicated. It is not a real effort to come to grips with the problems we face.

We have suggested that Canadian Pacific and its employees be taken out of this program. We have a parallel amendment, which probably will not be reached because of the time allocation, which takes Canadian National out of the program. We believe that that can be justified. We believe that the entire railway system has to be in or out. We believe that peace in the railway system is important to the future of this country. One of the advantages in the joint bargaining system that existed in the railways for the last number of years is that we have had labour peace.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Do you say in or out?

Mr. Murphy: We say both railway companies, the major companies and the minor companies that have been thrown into this bill, must be kept out of this program. That is very clear. That is our position.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I thought you said in or out.

Mr. Murphy: Definitely out. We argued that position in committee and in the House of Commons.

I talked about labour peace. I would like to talk about the fact that in many ways Canadian National has been treated as if it were a private corporation. It was not an attempt by this government to get into the railway business when it took over the company that formed Canadian National. We took over two private sector companies that has basically mismanaged their affairs. It was felt there was a need for the Government of Canada to move in this area.

We believe this has basically been treated as a private sector area and so we must keep those unions out of this program. We have made specific recommendations to that effect. We are also concerned about whether the action by the government is legal, but that will be dealt with in a different court. Parliament for the most part is not a court.

I am concerned about another aspect of bringing in Canadian Pacific at this time. Both Canadian Pacific and Canadian National have signed contracts with their workers. The effect of bringing those workers under the provisions of this bill will be to break those collective agreements.

• (2150)

Private sector and public sector companies have signed agreements with their workers, but all of a sudden Canadian National—and even more suddenly Canadian Pacific—have come come under the auspices of this bill. That means signed collective agreements are broken. As I said, the government has said it does not care if workers and their railway companies have signed a collective agreement for the next couple of years. The government does not care that it knew what was going on, through its arm's length relationship with Canadian National, and that it as the Government of Canada okayed Canadian National's agreement with its workers. Despite the fact that there is a collective agreement signed by both sides—a number of parties were involved—and despite the fact that the agreement was signed in good faith, the government has decided that means nothing. The government has listened to Ian Sinclair and a few of his "poorly paid" buddies, the barefoot boys from Bay Street. Ian Sinclair's income is $550,000 a year, and we are not sure about the extras he might get. I suspect he may even have a railway pass. Mr. de Grandpré receives a salary from Bell Canada of $650,000 a year. He is another poverty striken lad. After listening to Mr. Sinclair and Mr. de Grandpré in the back rooms, the government has decided that the contract between the railways and their workers is no longer worth very much. Because of its majority in the House of Commons the government will force this bill through the House. The contract between the railways and their workers will be rolled back, and another contract cannot be negotiated unless, according to Motion No. 17:

The governor in council may, by order, terminate the application of this Act in respect of an employee or a group of employees to which this Act applies.

I am not a lawyer; I do not have to be a lawyer to know that that means that if the government feels at a certain time in the future that it wants to give Canadian Pacific and its employees the right to negotiate, it may or may not do so.

Mr. Kristiansen: The divine right of Liberals.

Mr. Murphy: I think that is quite correct. It is the divine right of Liberals and the divine right of a few members of the Liberal cabinet. This was done behind closed doors. This was done in consultation with Ian Sinclair, but not in consultation with his workers. This will be done because the Liberals have a majority in this House and because, for the most part, the Conservatives will vote with the Liberals on this bill.

I wish the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) would not leave because we would like to know his position on this bill.

The government is saying to these workers that they as railway workers are making sacrifices because that would help the Canadian economy. Other speakers for our party and I have indicated earlier that we do not think this will help the Canadian economy. We do not believe it will help unemployed fishermen, unemployed woodworkers or people in resource communities who are losing their jobs. We do not believe taking money away from those people who still have jobs will enable them to go out and buy more goods. We do not believe taking money away from people who otherwise would have money to buy goods will put other Canadians back to work. We do not believe that sacrifice will come to any good. So much for the government's argument that this sacrifice will help.

Mr. Kristiansen: Workers are being sacrificed.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, I agree that the workers affected by this bill are being sacrificed.

The government's new argument is that it will still allow collective bargaining. Hon. members opposite say, "Don't worry about this bill, folks." Last Thursday there was a press release put out in the name of the President of the Treasury Board. It fooled a few people in this House because it said: "Hey, guess what! You can negotiate again." The government has decided, despite what it has said for the last three weeks, that it will allow collective bargaining. The government says it should not matter to CN, CP or their workers that they are included in this bill because the government has said it will let them negotiate anyway. But then I read the government's amendment which I just read into the record, and it says that the governor in council may, by order, allow groups of workers not to come under the act. I cannot believe anyone in this House on either side believes this amendment will restore collective bargaining. It certainly will not.

We do not trust the way the Liberal government is running the country. Because of the way it has introduced this bill, we do not believe the government can really expect co-operation. The government has squandered taxpayers' money. We do not believe restraint is a priority of this government. We do not believe this government has the economic plan to solve the problems we face. We believe the government basically acts as the elective arm of the Gallup poll. We cannot trust this government with an amendment which says that the governor in council may, by order, terminate the application of this act, because it says nothing about how the government will make that decision. The amendment does not say that if the government thinks it is for the good of the country it will let people negotiate. The amendment does not say that a group, which is behind because its agreements over the last five or six years have not kept up with the cost of living, may negotiate. The amendment does not say that the government will decide on the basis of any empirical facts or even government goals or objectives that it will allow negotiations to continue. The amendment just says "the governor in council may", with absolutely no regulations, specifications or indications of what the government will do. We do not trust the government with this power, and one of the functions we will perform as we go through this debate in the House is to point out matters like the inclusion of Canadian Pacific and why we believe the bill has to be amended so that we do not have to leave everything up to this government amendment, which is the whole bill, because that basically is what is happening. We will be coming to this catch-all amendment at some time before the final vote and, I suspect, because of the nature of the closure motion, we will not have an opportunity to debate it in this House. The amendment really says that everything the government spent the last month on may be null and void, if the government so determines.

The debate has to take place, not on that final clause because we will never get to it, but on each and every clause as we go through them. We have proposed that the government amendment bringing in Canadian Pacific must be removed and I have stated the reasons for that.

I realize that it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, but this is my last chance to speak on this matter. We are not out to kill the Canadian economy; we are out to make sure that if we have a bill—whether we like the bill or not—it is the best possible one that we can have for government, business and for all Canadians. Because of that, we do not want what I called earlier a namby-pamby bill, all loopholes and with no direction to help the unemployed, private businessmen, farmers or any other group of Canadians concerned about the economy of the country.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House deemed to have been moved under Standing Order 40.

AIRPORTS—INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT'S INTENTIONS TO MAKE MIRABEL PROFITABLE

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil-Papineau): Mr. Speaker, this is probably the last time in this session that I will have an opportunity to ask the minister about a subject that is of special interest, not only to the riding of Argenteuil-Papineau but also to my colleagues from the ridings of Laval, Duvernay, Blainville-Deux-Montagnes, Terrebonne, Labelle and to the entire population of the Lower Laurentians, the North Shore, Montreal and the Laurentians. I am speaking on behalf of some 3,000 employees now working at Mirabel who are faced with an uncertain future. I am speaking on behalf of the municipalities on the North Shore that are trying to develop and plan their development in terms of the airport that was built at Mirabel and which was supposed to be the gateway to North America. Mr. Speaker, on April 21, 1980, I rose in the House to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) for a decision to lift restrictions on development at Mirabel. The minister answered that a study would be ready by June, 1980. On December 2, 1980, I questioned the minister again, and mentioned development at the airports of Malton, Calgary and Edmonton, and asked him what he was doing to make Mirabel a profitable enterprise. The answer was that an announcement was forthcoming. On February 18, 1981, I rose again in the House to ask the minister about Mirabel. After further delay another answer. On March 23, 1981, I asked the minister once again about making Mirabel a profitable entreprise. This time, his parliamentary secretary gave me a list of measures aimed at encouraging the use of Mirabel, an old list that was published when the airport opened.

On April 23, 1981, I questioned the minister once again, this time about the cost of fuel used at Mirabel, and I asked him what he intended to do about the situation. Once more, I got an evasive answer. On October 26, 1981, I was still asking the minister questions. On February 16, 1982, 33 mayors from the North Shore area and some 80 councillors were present in the House. My questions were about flight transfers and again, how Mirabel could be made profitable. The minister answered as usual, but this time he was a little more specific and said that a decision would be made within the next two or three months. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer was given on February 16, 1982. On May 14, in other words, two days before the end of the period specified by the minister, I asked whether the government would shortly be tabling a document or a study showing that a policy decision would be made with a view to making Mirabel profitable. The answer was that the government hoped to make good its promise made on February 16, 1982.

On May 20, 1982, I rose in the House again, Mr. Speaker, and as always, not for my own benefit but on behalf of people who are waiting for a decision and for the benefit of 3,000 employees faced with an uncertain future. The answer was that the government hoped to make the right decision and that it was a delicate matter. On July 16 of this year, there were rumours from usually well-informed sources that the minister, urged by some of his officials, had submitted to cabinet a document recommending the shutdown of one of the runways at Mirabel. I rose in the House and asked a question that probably sounded a bit ludicrous, namely, whether the minister wanted to shut down the take-off runway or the landing runway.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like an answer to that question because the plan recommended by the Department of Transport is unacceptable to the people of the North Shore and to their Member of Parliament.

• (2205)

[English]

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for taking advantage of Standing Order 40(3) to debate in this House topics that are of great interest and concern to his constituents.

Few Members of Parliament have followed the debate on the future of Mirabel as closely as the hon. member for Argenteuil-Papineau (Mr. Gourd) has. He is aware that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) spent some considerable time studying all aspects of the issue and meeting with interested parties.

Mr. Blaikie: It doesn't show.

Mr. Flis: He is also aware that the minister recently took his views to cabinet for its consideration. Although obviously I am not in a position to divulge what options the cabinet has before it, I can tell the hon. member that the question is receiving very careful scrutiny. The minister informs me that an announcement may be expected in the very near future.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—(A) APPLICATION FOR PASSPORTS. (B) REQUEST THAT APPLICATION FORM BE REDESIGNED

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I hope I get as sympathetic and as encouraging a reply to my question as did the hon. member for Argenteuil-Papineau (Mr. Gourd) from the parliamentary secretary. At the same time, I hope it is a little more enlightening than the answer he just received.

Some time ago, I rose in my place in the House to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) why it is necessary for Canadian citizens when applying for a passport to include information as to their birth place on their passport application. I was not so concerned about information on the application form itself, but rather on the actual passport document. The reason is that we have many, many citizens in Canada whose birth place is behind the Iron Curtain.

I am sure many members realize that Iron Curtain countries, particularly countries such as Czechoslovakia, and I expect East Germany, the German Democratic Republic, Poland and other east bloc countries, do not recognize the validity of exit from those countries without an exit visa. People leaving countries, such as Czechoslovakia, are deemed to have committed a criminal offence simply by leaving the country. This means when former citizens want to return to visit their birth place, or relatives in Czechoslovakia, for example, they are deemed to be fugitives from justice and liable to arrest. In addition, if they received any kind of education in the country of their birthplace, that education is deemed to be part of the public expense for which former citizens are liable.

Since Canada extends dual citizenship to its citizens, regardless of birthplace, this means we accept the citizenship within Canada of that person as well as citizenship of another country. However, in the case of Iron Curtain countries, those countries refuse to yield that former citizenship to the new Canadian citizen and, therefore, the Canadian citizen has an unwilling dual citizenship even though he would like to renounce the former citizenship of an east bloc country. That puts him in a very precarious position.

I would think that the Department of External Affairs would be ingenious enough to be able to handle this. Surely the commitment we have to international standards for application forms and to international standards for passports does not reach into that particular sphere where we jeopardize the security of our own citizens when they visit foreign countries. I can imagine a Canadian citizen taking his Canadian passport, going to Checkpoint Charlie, seeing the officer at Checkpoint Charlie or at the boundary of Czechoslovakia, having that officer look at his Canadian passport and seeing his birthplace, whatever it might be, a city such as—

Mr. Blaikie: Dresden.

Mr. Friesen: —Dresden, East Germany, or Prague, Czechoslovakia. Immediately that officer says, "Aha, a citizen of my country. I wonder if he has paid his indebtedness for his citizenship. I wonder if he is draftable into the armed forces. I wonder if he has paid for the criminal offence of leaving this country." It seems to me that Canadian citizens, once Canada has accepted them as citizens, ought to enjoy all rights and privileges which are ours as Canadian citizens. One of these rights is security.

Games area already being played at border crossing points. I talked to a gentleman just a week ago; as a matter of fact, an airline pilot. He told me that when he was in Europe he had a special passport. When he was going to visit Yugoslavia, all of a sudden, because the border crossing guard saw that he was nervous about his special passport and what it might implicate him in, the border guard slipped a piece of paper into the passport and stamped it, so that the passport itself would not be disfigured with a Yugoslavian stamp.

We all know it is difficult to enter an Arab country if one's passport is stamped with an Israeli stamp. Going the other way there is no problem, so the Israelis gladly put a piece of paper into the passport and allow the guard at the border crossing simply to stamp the piece of paper, not jeopardizing that citizen's right or opportunity to enter an Arab country. These kinds of games are being played. We all understand that.

Why is it so difficult for the Department of External Affairs to make one small concession in passports, by simply deleting the blank on the passport which indicates where the person was born? Then we could enjoy all the rights and protections which ought to be ours as Canadian citizens when we visit foreign countries. Why should a citizen from Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Bulgaria or the Democratic Republic of Germany; why should a citizen of Canada, because he was born in one of the east bloc countries, have to stay home and deny himself the opportunity of visiting his relatives because he is afraid of what will happen to him if he goes there? Why should he be fearful as he crosses the border at Checkpoint Charlie to go into that country? It seems to me that the Department of External Affairs could make that one small concession and give Canadian citizens the full rights of citizenship when they get their passports.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the place of birth is requested in the prescribed application form for a passport in order to assist in the identification of the applicant, by verifying the information provided with the documentation submitted to confirm identity, proof of citizenship and, therefore, entitlement to a Canadian passport.

• (2215)

Canadian passports are issued to fulfil the requirements of present day travel and to give evidence of the Canadian citizenship of the bearer. They do not reflect any other nationality. This practice is designed to avoid involving the passport in any political controversy while maintaining its viability as a travel document which will permit Canadians to travel in all parts of the world.

The policy of the Department of External Affairs has been to include place of birth in passports. It is included by tradition and international custom as it is a very important element of identification since, unlike the physical description, it is unchangeable and cannot be altered.

The fact that the passport meets international norms and provides full identifying information is of benefit to all Canadians for a number of reasons. Provision of the place of birth in the passport obviates for the majority of travelling Canadians further questioning by foreign officials examining them as to their identity. It has a bearing on the negotiation with other countries of reciprocal visa waiving agreements, as the information is of primary importance when obtaining permission to enter a foreign country. The place of birth in the passport must agree with the place of birth given in the visa application.

Place of birth information is also a requirement of the Canadian government for persons seeking to obtain a visa to enter Canada. As we require this information of visitors to Canada, to omit it from the Canadian passport, where it may be equally an entry requirement of the other country, would derogate from the concept of reciprocity and would ultimately handicap Canadian travellers generally.

RAILWAYS—(A) EFFECT OF WAGE CONTROLS ON CANADIAN PACIFIC AGREEMENTS. (B) TIMING OF IMPOSITION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, on June 30, 1982, I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) whether or not the government had carefully thought through all the implications of Bill C-124, the bill to limit wage increases in the public sector to 6 per cent and 5 per cent. I asked the President of the Treasury Board whether they had considered the effects their program would have on collective bargaining in the railway sector, by including the CNR in its wage control program. The CNR and the CPR bargain together with the railway unions and the concern expressed by the railway unions, among others, was that the historical accomplishment of joint bargaining between the railways and the railway unions would be jeopardized. The concern was expressed that the pieces would never be able to be put back together again.

There was a simple solution to this problem and that was to take the CNR out of the wage control program. This is what I advocated in committee when we were discussing Bill C-124 with the Canadian Railway Labour Association which were before us to make sure the government knew the full implications of what it was doing. The association was concerned about the attack on collective bargaining in general which Bill C-124 represents, about the way it breaks already signed contracts and about the way it limits collective bargaining on non-monetary as well as monetary matters.

What was the government's response? The response of the government was to make matters worse, to compound the injustice for thousands of Canadians by bringing the CPR in under the program and giving the government another beachhead in the private sector for the day when it brings in full wage controls.

The bill to control wages in the public sector is an incompetent, cowardly and unjust response to Canada's admittedly serious economic problems. It takes advantage of the willingness of the average Canadian to help out his country and to do his bit for the economy. The Liberals and the Tories are more willing to take advantage of this virtue in our people, than to show any virtue of their own by facing up to the real causes of inflation. To do this would require courage to stand up to the banks, stand up to the multinationals, stand up to the Americans and to stand up to the values and perceptions of the investment and business communities which are the lifeline and real centre of both the Liberal Party and the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada.

The Conservatives often like to say of the NDP that we are in bed with the Liberals. They do not have the capacity to develop an intelligent critique of our policies or, for that matter, to develop any policies of their own. All they know how to do, in their fear of the NDP, is to go around western Canada, in particular, slandering the good name of the NDP by falsely associating us with the Liberal Party.

The facts speak for themselves. The Conservatives have voted with the Liberal government in this Parliament twice as often as has the NDP, and those occasions have always been the same in nature. They have always been votes in which there was a choice to be made between the interests of average Canadians and the interests of the powerful and wealthy in this country. When it comes to that kind of a choice, there is no difference between the Liberals and the Conservatives. The Liberal-Conservative coalition is the most basic coalition in Canada. Bill C-124 is just the latest example of it.

The NDP, and the CCF before it, was formed to challenge this oppressive illusion that there is really a choice between the Liberals and the Conservatives. Let Bill C-124 stand as an illustration of our point.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, earlier this year Canadian Pacific Limited, Canadian National Railways and several smaller railways signed a master agreement with a number of unions respresenting their non-operating employees. The master agreement, dated April 26, 1982, is for a two year period commencing January 1, 1982. The agreement provides for wage increases of 12 per cent on January 1, 1982, 9 per cent on January 1, 1983 and contains a COLA clause.

Following the introduction of Bill C-124 representations and information were received from the companies involved, the unions concerned and others. After giving full consideration, an amendment was introduced to Clause 3 of Bill C-124 which would extend coverage to the railways operated by Canadian Pacific Limited and the other smaller railways which are signatories to the master agreement.

Bill C-124 will permit the negotiated terms and conditions to stand until the first wage rate following June 29, 1982, comes into effect; namely January 1, 1983. The 9 per cent increase negotiated for January 1, 1983, will become 6 per cent under the program until December 31, 1983, and 5 per cent on January 1, 1984, to last until December 31, 1984.

The inclusion of CP employees under the bill will ensure the maintenance of the long standing pattern of negotiations with CP and CN. Canadian National and Canadian Pacific have jointly negotiated their labour agreements since immediately following the removal of wage and price controls after the Second World War. With some groups, joint railway negotiations actually go back to the First World War.

Recognizing this historical relationship, the proposals will ensure that employees of CN are treated in a way no less favourable than the employees of CP. Not to have included CP under the bill would have destroyed the relationship at the end of 1983, when CP would have been faced with renewed labour negotiations while CN would still have one year to go under the program.

Thus, the proposed legislation results in equitable application in the railway industry and eliminates an unfair imbalance that may have developed between the competing Crown corporations and private sector corporations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock in the afternoon.

At 10.23 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

AGRICULTURE

CALL FOR REMOVAL OF TAX ON FUELS USED IN FOOD PRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an urgent matter relating to agriculture. It has now become evident in farming operations that the federal tax on farm fuel will have a counterproductive effect on agricultural production. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House request the government to remove the federal tax on fuels used for the purpose of farming so as not to have an adverse effect on the production of food in Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DEMAND FOR RETENTION OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS IN HALIFAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, during yesterday's oral question period the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) said that he did "not play politics with defence" when he was questioned about the move of the naval reserves from Halifax to his home riding of Quebec City. What other answer can there be for this unnecessary move, other than for reserve naval personnel to be closer to our fighting ships in drydock? This is a pure and simple case of yet another giant slab of pork for the Liberal pork-barrel. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the Minister of National Defence cease thinking members of this House are as naive as he is, stop playing pork-barrel politics with defence, and allow naval reserve headquarters to remain where it is in sight of the Atlantic ocean.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN PACIFIC ENTERPRISES

SUGGESTED FORGOING OF PAY INCREASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion which I think should obtain support from all hon. members of the House. Whereas the president of CP Enterprises, Ian Sinclair, has given enthusiastic support to the government's wage control policy of limiting wage increases to 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year, and whereas the president of CP Enterprises has a salary of more than $500,000 per year, so that an increase of 6 per cent in the coming year would amount to an increase of more money than the bulk of Canadian Pacific employees make in the whole year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House calls on the president of CP Enterprises to put his money where his mouth is to show that he is really doing what he has been saying, by forgoing any pay increase in the coming year.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

PROVISION OF LOAN GUARANTEES FOR BOND APPLICANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, there is money for Maislin Trucking but not for small business. In the month of June a record 348 bankruptcies were recorded by the region of Niagara. July was not far behind at almost 300 bankruptcies. At the same time, branches of two chartered banks within the region have indicated to applicants that no small business bonds are available from them. In view of the government's bail-out of Maislin, and in view of its stated commitment to the success of the bond program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the government treat small business in a fair and equitable way and restore the banks' confidence in the small business bond program by providing loan guarantees of the type extended to Maislin for small business bond applicants.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FORESTRY

FOREST FIRE FIGHTING CAPABILITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, once again forest fires are raging out of control in northern British Columbia, the Yukon, and the Northwest Territories, destroying vast areas of virgin forest land, the life and habitat of all species of wildlife, and causing extensive damage to property and serious threat to human life. This kind of natural calamity of course cannot be contained within political boundaries of territories and provinces, and it is for reasons of conflicting and overlapping jurisdiction and responsibility that the present situation in the north has once again reached such monumental proportions. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) and any other hon. member who wants to associate himself with this motion:

That this House urges the government to establish and maintain through the Ministry of National Defence, and in co-ordination with the provinces, the capability to respond quickly with equipment and manpower to forest fires anywhere in Canada and, further, to establish within the Canadian forest service a much improved program and capacity in the area of forest fire prevention.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

CALL FOR TABLING OF POLICY DISCUSSION PAPERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, the newly released audit of all 1980 revenues of Canada's charitable organizations compiled by Statistics Canada confirms that the government would have saved money if, two years ago, it had implemented the "give and take" tax reform proposals of the national voluntary organizations. Since the government has never established a mechanism to measure either the employment capacity or the contribution to the gross national product of Canada's voluntary sector, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House urge the government to table for public discussion before the summer recess the background discussion papers on the national voluntary action policy and thereby seek advice for a divided cabinet from representatives of Canada's three million volunteers whose cost effective services are more needed now than ever before.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON APPLICATION OF RESTRAINT PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, according to a story in today's Globe, several informed Canadians, including CRTC's John Meisel, law professor Paul Weiler and Advocacy Centre's Andrew Roman, have questioned the legality of allowing a cabinet minister's budget statement to supersede existing legislation as it relates to applying the wonderful world of 6 per cent to federally regulated companies such as Bell Canada. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

• (1410)

That this House instruct the government to come clean with the people of Canada and admit that it has neither the power nor the intention of controlling either the prices companies charge or the profits they earn, and that Bill C-124 was designed primarily to welsh on collective agreements with the federal public service and latterly to victimize the staffs of M.P.s.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONDEMNATION OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS RELOCATION TO QUEBEC CITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, the current Government of Canada is obviously in its dying days and hopefully will lead to the demise of the Liberal Party in Canada in the same way that Lloyd George did with the Liberal Party in Britain. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the government be condemned for its outright pork-barreling by moving our broken, dispirited navy to inland waters from its strategic location in Halifax in total disregard of national defence.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

CALL FOR EQUAL TREATMENT FOR ALL TRUCKING COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, the government's announced decision to bail out Montreal's inefficient, debt-burdened Maislin Trucking company stands in stark contrast to this same government's embarrassing and unprincipled policy of slowdown of customs inspections of Japanese imported cars into ports in British Columbia which is forcing a number of small independent British Columbia truckers into bankruptcy. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House require the government to recognize the inconsistency and favouritism shown by taking immediate action to ensure the same generous and compassionate consideration for all independent truckers that it provides for its Montreal based friends at Maislin Trucking or, failing that, withdraw the Maislin advantage.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

POLICY REVIEW—DEMAND FOR PUBLICATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, Canadians who are concerned about the uncritically pro-nuclear power policy of the Liberal Party have been waiting for some two years to hear the results of the government's internal departmental review of nuclear policy. These Canadians want to know, for instance, whether the rumours about increased federal assistance to provinces willing to construct nuclear power plants for electricity export are true, and thus whether or not our tax dollars will continue to be poured down the nuclear drain out of technological vanity and the stupid commitment of this government to keep the nuclear power industry alive at all costs. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the government publish the conclusions of its internal review and that this be followed by a public inquiry in which many concerned Canadians will finally get a chance to tell this government that they reject the nuclear mania of the Liberal Party and are willing to embark on an energy future based on renewable energy resources, conservation and respect for the environment and future generations.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO ADMINISTRATION OF CORRECTIONAL SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the allegations of relaxed, if not casual administration policies at Archambault, and that these policies contributed to the extreme brutality there, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the right of the public to know how the government operates the correctional system be honoured and that a full public inquiry be implemented into the administration of the correctional system and that the philosophy, the criteria for hiring personnel and the administration of prisons in general be included in the public inquiry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DEMAND THAT SALARIES OF MEMBERS' STAFFS NOT BE REDUCED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House direct the President of the Treasury Board not to reduce members' staff's salaries.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SHIPBUILDING

CALL FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF MARINE INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas Bill C-48, the Canada Oil and Gas Act, is supposed to ensure that Canadians capture their share of industrial benefits associated with oil and gas exploration and development, and whereas Canada's Office of Industrial Benefits is a weak imitation of the British and Norwegian originals, and whereas it appears that Dome Petroleum is likely to build four carriers for the Arctic Pilot project offshore and is currently planning to build five LNG carriers in Japan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson):

• (1415)

That the government admit that Bill C-48 fails to guarantee Canadians their rightful share of industrial benefits from oil and gas exploration and that this House urge the government to implement immediately a Canadian marine industrial strategy capable of capturing those benefits.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRANSPORT

MAISLIN TRUCKING COMPANY—QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS BY MR. BRONFMAN

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 19896 of Hansard:

—in so far as I know, Mr. Bronfman has made no representations, nor have his associates, to members of this government.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister, while I must accept his word even though I may not believe it, has he checked with other members of his ministry to see if Mr. Bronfman did in fact make representations to them about Maislin?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member would not accept my word and would not believe my word, why would he believe me if I were reporting on behalf of some other members?

REPRESENTATIONS TO MINISTERS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, whether I believe it or not, under the rules of the House I have to accept it. I am telling the Prime Minister, the leader of the land, that he must be more than the Pinocchio of political prevarication.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: He has to show some principle here, and he must show some responsibility in checking with his ministers. I am suggesting to him that there were at least two ministers directly called by Mr. Bronfman, directly in relation to Maislin. In the time between yesterday and today, has the Prime Minister checked to see if any of his ministers had been called by Mr. Bronfman?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will know that I am not interested in giving him any answers if he does not believe them.

Mr. Lawrence: Caught!

Mr. Clark: Might as well call off question period then.

Mr. Lawrence: Well, none of us believe you. Why do you not get out?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Why do you not just get out?

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Why don't you?

Mr. Lawrence: Even your own people do not believe you.

Mr. Nowlan: I am with my colleague.

CRITERIA GOVERNING EXTENSION OF LOAN GUARANTEES

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): What I personally feel or believe is not the reason I am asking the question of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has some duty with regard to a guaranteed loan in a brand new area of the service industry. Service industries across this country are crying for assistance. The reasons for the question, regardless of the effect of some people who may have lobbied on behalf of Maislin, involve the very fact that if the Prime Minister believes there is no political clout and if one does not have to be bankrupt to fit some form of criteria, then surely he owes some duty to the people of this country, the taxpayers of this country, and people who vote, to clarify these areas. If those are not the two reasons, political pressure and the fact that one must be bankrupt, will the Prime Minister or his officials publish the criteria so that other people can apply for help?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would be happy to deal with this problem, but I will not deal with it in answer to an hon. member who has sworn to me that he will not believe my answers.

CRITERIA GOVERNING EXTENSION OF LOAN GUARANTEES TO TRUCKING COMPANIES

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Even though the majority of the employees of a Canadian company are employed elsewhere and are not Canadians, what are the criteria by which such a company may secure a loan guarantee from the government to enable it to avoid bankruptcy? More specifically, what trucking companies in Canada, no matter what their size, may apply to have their loans guaranteed at their lending institutions and thus save the jobs of their Canadian employees?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): First of all, Madam Speaker, I do not agree with my hon. friend's premise that the majority of the Maislin company's employees are in the United States. My information is that half of them are in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: You are right. It is not half full, it is half empty.

• (1420)

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, my understanding of majority is 50 per cent plus one. I know the opposition would like to have it otherwise, but that is still a majority. In any event, generally we want to see whether there are reasonable prospects for restructuring and returning to long-term viability on the part of companies applying for loan guarantee assistance. If my hon. friend knows of companies he would like to bring to our attention that might be considered because of their financial difficulty, and if there is a basis on the merits for their applications being considered, as I said before, I will be very happy to have the matter brought to the attention of my cabinet colleagues.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON CRITERIA

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, the merits are that they are going bankrupt all over the country. Those are the merits. Last Friday the minister's colleague from Northumberland-Miramichi put it far better than I, that is, what is he to say to his business constituents who could be saved from bankruptcy and, therefore, have jobs saved, by the government guaranteeing their line of credit at the bank? Those are the merits. Having established that, I repeat, what are the criteria? Is it going bankrupt? Is it having 50 per cent of your employees in the U.S.? Is it knowing Charles Bronfman? Is it going to an All-Star game? Just tell us so that I, the member for Northumberland-Miramichi, and hundreds of others can come to the minister and say, "Please save these companies from bankruptcy the same as you saved your friends at Maislin."

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, for some time the federal government has had in place a program of offering loan guarantees in high-risk last-resort situations where, without that type of loan guarantee, the prospects of restructuring and returning to long-time viability of an enterprise would not be there. This program assisted a large number of companies even before the current Maislin situation. As I said before, if people will come forward with applications and make their case on the merits, they will certainly be considered.

NATIONAL REVENUE

FILING OF INCOME TAX RETURNS BY CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue, of which I have given him notice. When filing their tax returns, 50 people across the country made out cheques to the Peace Tax Fund representing 10.5 per cent of their income tax, which is the percentage that goes to the Department of National Defence. As conscientious objectors, they did not wish their tax money to be spent on weapons or the armed forces. Eight of these cheques were accepted by the department and were cleared by their banks or credit unions. Therefore, the minister is now holding a significant amount of money in the Peace Tax Fund. Since this money has been accepted and deposited, what is the minister planning to do with this Peace Tax money?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I am not aware that any funds so earmarked have been banked. Indeed, I know of one case where the cheque was sent back which had been addressed to the Department of National Defence because the Income Tax Act does not permit the targeting of tax dollars to any specific project, policy or fund. People may have views and may hold them very sincerely, but the withholding of income tax for special purposes is not a legitimate form of protest.

DEPARTMENTAL POLICY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the answer, but it seems that the group which has been managing this kind of protest has recorded that, of the 40 cheques which have been handled by the department, there are at least five policies. First, the cheque is cashed and the taxpayer told he owes no more money. Second, the taxpayer is told that the cheque has to be made out to the Receiver General and that he still owes the money. Third, he is told that he has to pay the money with interest. Fourth, he is told that he has to pay the money with interest, plus a fine. Why is there so much uncertainty within the department if the policy is quite clear as to how to handle these kinds of things? They seem to have at least five different policies. How can the minister justify that?

• (1425)

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, a number of cases have been brought to my attention. If the hon. member has other specific cases he wants to bring to my attention, I will be glad to deal with them. I must caution him, of course, that discussion of the situations of individual taxpayers is prohibited under the Income Tax Act, but to my knowledge there is one policy. Cheques made out specifically to policy or program areas are not acceptable, and the withholding of tax dollars as a form of protest is not a legitimate form of protest. However, if the hon. member has specific cases, I would be glad to hear from him on that matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRANSFER OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS FROM HALIFAX TO QUEBEC CITY—CABINET POSITION

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question concerning Canada's naval reserve force which I would like to address to the Prime Minister because it really does involve important government policy.

The Prime Minister now knows that a decision has been made to transfer naval reserve headquarters from Halifax to Quebec City. What he may not know is that this decision has shocked both civilian and military officials because it does not relate to national defence. I want to ask the Prime Minister this: was the decision approved by the cabinet, does the cabinet endorse the decision and, if it was not so approved, will the Prime Minister immediately order a review of the decision by a committee of cabinet or a committee of Parliament? If the decision is sensibly reviewed, I know it will be reversed.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would be happy if any minister wanted to raise this in full cabinet. We have a full cabinet meeting on Thursday and, if any minister wants to raise it, I would be happy to deal with it.

The reason why this decision was taken by the minister, on the advice of his officials and of military people themselves, is pretty straightforward. There is not a high enough percentage of Francophones in the navy, and we think it is important that some naval operations be conducted out of Quebec City. That is a simple fact established by statistics. Whereas in the armed forces in general some 26 per cent of the forces are Francophone, in the case of the navy I believe the average is around 13 per cent for other ranks and as low as 10 per cent or 11 per cent for officers.

I think this is an important and progressive move. It will not prevent the naval forces remaining in Halifax from growing. It will simply ensure that some of the services of the navy will be delivered out of Quebec City.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, I think the real concern is that this is only the first in a series of initiatives designed to give the naval force a greater presence in the province of Quebec.

POSITION OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State, particularly in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has suggested a cabinet review.

The Secretary of State now knows that the reason for this move of naval reserve headquarters from Halifax to Quebec City is to increase Francophone participation in the naval reserve and in Canada's navy. As the person responsible for the administration of the Official Languages Act I would like to ask him whether he thinks this is a fair extension of the provisions of that act and whether he thinks it is a proper exercise of power and authority under that act and within the intent of that act. Does he think that the interests of this nation in terms of national defence should govern over considerations like Francophone participation in the navy and the extent to which there is a certain number of Francophones versus a certain number of Anglophones? What does that have to do with guns, bullets, and national defence?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will agree with me that there is no part of Canada where it is more important to have a viable and well-balanced navy than Halifax, and what we have here is not the transfer out of Halifax of a large number of jobs but something which, if every last person was transferred, would amount to about 40.

This is not something which has always been in Halifax. When it suited the purpose, the administrative headquarters of the naval reserve, which is what is affected, was formerly in Ottawa, then in Hamilton, lately in Halifax and, if it is transferred to Quebec at a time when the size of the four naval reserve divisions in Nova Scotia, as well as the navy in general, continues to grow, and a time when $260 million are being invested in buildings to make permanent the headquarters of the navy in the dockyard in Halifax, I cannot think of a better assurance of the future of the navy in Halifax.

It seems to me that if this transfer results in bringing more Francophones into the navy, the future of Halifax as the bastion of the navy in this country is better assured than ever.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

DECISION AFFECTING LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for FIRA regarding the 12 jobs that will be lost in the ridings of York East and Etobicoke-Lakeshore, both held by Liberals, if the government persists in its plan to force J.B. Lippincott of Canada to close. The company will be closed as a result of a FIRA decision because there is no Canadian buyer. If I may quote the most likely Canadian buyer, they said that "it would be more profitable" for Lippincott to close the Canadian operation and export books from the United States to Canada rather than selling to a Canadian. Given that description of Lippincott's problem by its most likely buyer, why does the minister continue to adhere to such a vicious double standard? In the Maislin case, American jobs are guaranteed with Canadian money, while in the Lippincott case, where 100 per cent of the jobs are Canadian, the minister remains firmly and pigheadedly committed to putting 12 Canadians out of work and forcing those jobs into the United States.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the government is not forcing Lippincott to close. That is a decision of the foreign parent, which we deplore, and which it is not being forced to take by this government. It has a number of alternatives available, including making a new application to the government, including seeking a Canadian for a joint venture, and including selling to Canadians. The Association of Canadian Book Publishers has said that it knows of three Canadian firms willing to buy that company. So, Madam Speaker, we are not forcing the company to close. It is a decision of the foreign parent. It is the foreign parent that is putting Canadians out of work. With respect to Maislin, we are saving 2,000 Canadian jobs. There is no double standard; we are being consistent.

QUERY RESPECTING ACHIEVEMENT OF BENEFIT FOR CANADA

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, it is sometimes difficult to get ministers to listen. May I repeat what the most likely buyer, the president of Gage Publishing, had to say in The Globe and Mail this morning. Presumably the minister only read the headline. He said that "it would be more profitable" for Lippincott to close. The minister is saying that the new foreign investment policy of this country is that if a firm is profitable and can make money, it should get out.

FIRA's job is to decide whether substantial benefits accrue to Canada from foreign investment. Can the minister explain to the House, and to the 12 Canadians who will lose their jobs on November 20, what significant benefit is achieved for them or for Canada when their jobs disappear and there is no food on their tables?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the decision with respect to the Lippincott application was taken in June, 1981, by the cabinet. On the basis of the information presented, it was found that there was not significant benefit in terms of, among other things, consistency with the long-standing policy of the government to encourage a greater Canadian presence in book publishing and book distribution.

The government has not told Lippincott Canada to close. The announcement the company made the other day was not as a result of any order by the government but as a result of a decision taken by the foreign parent. That is a decision it does not have to take at this time, and it is a decision it has taken in spite of the fact that alternatives are open to it. If it does not want to take those alternatives, it has to bear the responsibility—a regrettable one—for the action that my hon. friend is talking about.

PUBLIC SERVICE

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Four months ago the government announced that it was appointing Pierre Juneau as president of the CBC. In the intervening four months no announcement has been made about who Mr. Juneau's successor will be as deputy minister of communications. When will the Prime Minister be making an appointment to that position, and will he give the House the assurance that the new deputy minister of communications will be someone who is experienced and who is drawn from the industry itself, and will not simply be one of the political protégés of the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will be attempting to fill that vacancy as soon as possible. I can assure the hon. member that I want to choose the best possible person to fill the post.

ASSURANCE SOUGHT ON BACKGROUND OF POSSIBLE APPOINTEE

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, will the Prime Minister give the House the assurance that the person chosen will be drawn from the industry and will be someone who has had first-hand, on-the-job experience in the telecommunications industry, not simply someone from the bureaucracy who has not had first-hand experience in this field?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there are many qualified people in many areas. I have no one in mind particularly now, but I can assure the hon. member that I will cover the field for the best possible candidate. I cannot give the assurance in advance that he will come from any particular branch of the industry or the private sector or for that matter, of the rest of the public service.

VIA RAIL

SENATE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. The minister may have had a chance by now to familiarize himself with the recommendations of the report of the Senate Standing Committee on Transport concerning passenger rail service in Canada provided by VIA Rail, in which the minister's reorganization of passenger rail system which took effect on November 16, 1981, is referred to as "an unfortunate ad hoc response that has detrimental long-term ramifications for the passenger rail system in Canada."

Does the minister plan any changes in government passenger rail policy in response to the undeniable national consensus that his decision of last year was an arrogant and dumb mistake, and would he be willing to be helped out of his errors by agreeing to the Senate committee's recommendation that a special joint committee of both Houses of Parliament be created for the purpose of analysing contemporary and future options for passenger transportation service in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not regret the decision that was made a year ago about this time. I think history will prove that this was the right decision to make. However, I must say, and I have already said it, there is no intention on the part of the government to effectuate other cuts in the VIA system of the size we made a year ago, and no intention of effectuating any major cuts in any way. I am prudent in saying that because there might be an opportunity for other changes.

With respect to the formation of a committee, I have already indicated to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transportation that I would most probably have a discussion paper to submit to its attention and competence in the fall.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

FUTURE OF CN EXPRESS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, history has already proven the minister to be wrong. Empty trains are running from Regina to Winnipeg, the tourist business is a shambles in Jasper, and there are many isolated communities all across the country. But the minister does not listen.

My supplementary question concerns another way in which the government is allowing the proper role of railways in this country to deteriorate, and that is what it has allowed to happen to CN Express over the years. I wonder if the minister is aware of the fact that Air Canada is cancelling, as of February 1, 1983, as was made known last week, its long-standing air express arrangement with CN Express? This move will affect approximately 200 jobs across the system in Canada. Does the minister approve of the apparent intention of Air Canada to contract out these services, and what does he intend to do to protect the jobs of the CN employees affected by this latest move?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as I have often said, I do not intervene in the day to day operations of Air Canada or of CN. I do not, and I repeat that, I do not intend to intervene in the day to day operations of Crown corporations. That is in the best traditions of government in Canada.

Occasionally they change their minds about what they have done in the past and decide to do things differently, that is their responsibility. On a number of occasions CN and Air Canada—and a speech was made recently by the vice-president of Air Canada on the subject—have ventured into other operations close to their main operation, that is, operating a railway or an airline. In that recent speech the vice-president of Air Canada demonstrated that this has been very profitable for them and has created a great number of jobs in Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—PLIGHT OF REFUGEES IN EMBASSY BUILDING

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He will know that yesterday we were advised in the House that the government has recalled the Canadian ambassador to Lebanon. He will know that Mr. Arcand had personally viewed his position in Lebanon as being one that would result in his taking a risk if he remained in that country despite the potential loss of his own life. In that regard he was following the fine tradition established by other Canadian ambassadors.

• (1440)

We know that at this time there were approximately 50 refugees housed in the basement of the building in which the Canadian embassy is located. What does the Prime Minister anticipate the effect will be of the withdrawal of the ambassador on those refugees housed in the basement of that building?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of State (External Relations)): Madam Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that the Canadian ambassador, Mr. Théodore Arcand, is at Juniyah, not quite five miles from the embassy office, that the embassy is open, that immigration files are being processed quite normally, and that the ambassador, from his office in Juniyah which is partly in the town hall and partly in a hotel, is in constant communication with our embassy, and finally, that the ambassador is free to go to West Beirut if he feels this is necessary. Thus, our embassy is still functioning, and I do not think we can blame the Secretary of State for External Affairs for having made this decision to protect our staff.

[English]

PROTECTION FOR CANADIAN CITIZENS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, it was my understanding yesterday from the message that we received that the ambassador was being recalled. There are approximately 1,500 Canadians in Lebanon who need the services and, indeed, the protection of the ambassador. What efforts will the government make to place a full embassy staff at the disposal of Canadians and those, such as the 50 refugees to whom I made reference, who look to Canada for some kind of protection?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of State (External Relations)): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is confusing the present situation with the normal rotation process that usually takes place at this time of the year, when transfers take place between various foreign postings. It was understood several months ago that Mr. Arcand was to return to Canada within a week or two. His trip to Canada has no connection with the decision we made a few days ago to instruct him to move a few kilometres outside the capital. Once again, in view of recent occurrences, it would seem that the Secretary of State's decision was the right one in the circumstances.

CANADIAN EMBASSY IN WEST BEIRUT—SECURITY OF PERSONNEL AND OF CANADIAN CITIZENS

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary. I would appreciate some further clarification by the minister. This is very important, at least for Canadians who have to contact the embassy in Lebanon. Yesterday, the minister said the embassy was closed, and I quote what he said:

—I am recommending that the Canadian ambassador and his staff leave West Beirut, for their own safety and also to safeguard Canadian interests.

The embassy in West Beirut is either open or closed. If it is closed, there is no one there and in that case I understand there are security reasons. If not—and as I heard this morning—the embassy is still open and there is still staff there. Does the minister mean that the safety of the staff now working in West Beirut is not as important as the safety of the Canadian staff who were asked to leave yesterday and move elsewhere?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of State (External Relations)): Madam Speaker, of course we feel all lives are important, whether we are talking about Canadian or local staff. In fact, the latter volunteered to stay. Our ambassador told his local staff that they were free to stay home and not work any more. Some employees preferred to go on working, and that is why the temporary office located at Juniyah is in constant communication with our chancery offices. I can assure the hon. member for Saint-Denis that Mr. Arcand told his local staff that they were free to stay home. I am saying this especially because of the news received this morning that a member of the local staff was killed near the chancery. Once again, Mr. Arcand let them know that they were free to stay home.

EFFECT OF NATURAL GAS TAX ON GREENHOUSE PRODUCERS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. The minister knows, I am sure, that under the National Energy Program greenhouse producers have been faced with crippling federal taxes which have risen from zero to 83 cents per mcf for natural gas which they use. This increase has occurred over a period of less than two years. Coupled with the fact that the federal government imposes a 60-cent-a-gallon federal tax on farm fuel this constitutes a very regressive measure for the producers of Canada, particularly the small operators. Is the Minister of Agriculture doing anything at all to remove this unfair burden?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member keeps making representations and statements about how much producers are paying for energy. We have done a study on the costs of energy to farmers in Canada compared to costs of energy to farmers in the United States, a country with which we compete generally in agricultural production, both domestically and in international markets.

We can make comparisons. For instance, Alberta, which province has a tremendous amount of money, does not charge provincial tax on gas, etc. At mid-March gasoline cost 29.1 cents a litre and diesel fuel cost 28.8 cents a litre in Alberta, whereas gasoline cost 34.5 cents a litre and diesel fuel cost 31 cents a litre in Montana in the United States.

Mr. McKnight: Try Ontario.

Mr. Whelan: Hon. members can see by those figures that the Americans were paying more than Alberta farmers were at that time. We are considering the cost of natural gas and we are putting together a presentation for my colleagues on the cost of food. As far as the cost of food is concerned, we are very concerned about it. We are most concerned about the total cost of food, in fact about any input into the cost of food.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, the minister of Agriculture, either accidentally or deliberately, refused to answer the question which I posed. The question has to do with the imposition of an 83-cent-per-mcf tax on natural gas, a commodity which is used by the greenhouse operators. The greenhouse operators in the minister's own backyard are complaining bitterly about it.

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF TAX

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, given the fact that market gardening and produce grown in greenhouses offer Canada's best potential in terms of reducing food imports into this country, and since this tax on natural gas discriminates and reduces the competitive position of the greenhouse producers in Canada, is the Minister of Agriculture actively engaged in making representations to his colleagues to have this discriminatory tax removed retroactively?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I hope that the hon. member is not suggesting the greenhouse industry can supply Canada with fresh produce.

Mr. Mazankowski: I did not say that.

Mr. Whelan: He says it offers the greatest potential for production of those products. The greenhouse industry produces tomatoes and cucumbers.

Mr. Stewart: Tell us about taxes.

Mr. Whelan: We know that the food value is twice as good from naturally processed foods as from products grown in greenhouses. They are luxury items. They are used in salads, etc., by our society.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member said they are in my backyard. I know that very well. He is trying to say now that I do not know what is going on. In the hon. member's own province there are many benefits for his producers because of the rich Heritage Fund. Funds are distributed easily. His province is not giving producers that much of a break—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

REPRESENTATIONS MADE BY GREENHOUSE INDUSTRY

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture will know when he speaks of facts that the greenhouse industry is located in his backyard and, indeed, in my riding. He will also know that for the last two or three years that industry has required access to stabilization by reason of non-profitability and non-return of the marketplace to the growers who obviously are having difficulty. I brought this matter to the minister's attention many months ago. I would be interested as well in knowing whether there is a time frame within which cabinet will deal with this issue and will, in fact, respond to members of the greenhouse industry in Canada which represents some $20 million in my riding alone.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1450)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that I have a long association with that organization and that productive entity because—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: You are the best in the world, Eugene.

Mr. Whelan: —before redistribution, all that greenhouse industry was in my constituency. Most of it was built while I was the Member of Parliament for that area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I am saying that I am fully aware of the needs of those people. I am fully aware of what the stabilization board has said about the returns they need, etc. I am fully aware of what the Agricultural Stabilization Act says, about 90 per cent which is statutory, and about using a five-year average price with the current year's input costs. It does not show that there should be a pay-out on that, but if I move into 95 per cent or 100 per cent and make that recommendation, which would be an extra expenditure, there would be no pay-out at the present time under that program. I am just saying that, yes, I am as concerned as the hon. member—

Mr. Epp: Then answer him.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

PENITENTIARIES

PLACEMENT OF INMATES IN DOUBLE CELLS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Recently he announced a new policy of placement of inmates in a number of federal penitentiaries in double cells. Both staff and prisoners have strongly protested this policy, arguing that it will lead to increased tensions in the institution and possibly even to violence.

In view of the fact that this policy of placement of two prisoners in cells built for one runs completely contrary to the 1977 report of the subcommittee on penitentiaries, and contrary to any sound correctional philosophy, and could lead to serious incidents in the institutions affected, will the minister now agree to end this dangerous policy of double-cell usage in federal institutions? Further, particularly in light of the recent tragic deaths at Archambault, when will the minister finally implement the key recommendations of the 1977 unanimous subcommittee report which he has so far completely ignored?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, there are no double-cell occupancies in Archambault, so obviously that was not a factor in the tragic incident there. In general, my answer to the hon. member is that inmates are being put two to a cell in a limited number of institutions because we have no other place to put them. We do not have new institutions coming onstream to provide extra capacity for another couple of years. The indications I have from the correctional services are that they anticipate extra inmate population as a temporary problem and that it will decline within the next couple of years. I would like to put to him that at this particular point, with the responsibility we have at law to incarcerate federal offenders, what other option is there to double celling at this time?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): One of the key recommendations of the 1977 subcommittee report was to look seriously at alternatives to incarceration. If we looked at that, perhaps it would deal with the question of overcrowding.

RIGHT OF ARCHAMBAULT INMATES TO SEE LAWYERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): My supplementary is also directed to the Solicitor General. Notwithstanding the assurance given last Friday to the President of the Quebec Bar Association that the right of inmates at the Archambault penitentiary to meet with their lawyers would be respected, yesterday, several lawyers were barred from seeing their clients. How can the Solicitor General justify the denial to inmates of fundamental rights enshrined in the new Canadian Constitution, and does the minister intend to reverse immediately this indefensible policy?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Regarding alternatives to incarceration, Madam Speaker, I am not responsible for such alternatives since it is up to the courts to decide whether a prisoner is to be sent to prison or elsewhere, and we at Correctional Service Canada are responsible for the people sent to us by the courts. So I suggest that the hon. member ask the courts about alternatives. As for lawyers being barred from Archambault, I am very sorry about the situation following last week's riot, but I can assure the hon. member that the prison will be open to lawyers of inmates as soon as possible. In fact, this morning I spoke to the President of the Quebec Bar and I told him that probably Tuesday next week the prison would be open to lawyers of inmates.

ENERGY

DOME PETROLEUM—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PROVISION OF ASSISTANCE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who, on July 8, informed the House that consultations were going on with his staff members and certain representatives of Dome Petroleum, with a view to arranging either a loan or some form of financing assistance for that group. Bearing in mind that the group, out of a total indebtedness of $8.4 billion, has $1.4 billion coming due next month, would the minister indicate whether he has anything to tell the House concerning the government's involvement in this matter, or is the street talk true, that he is saving it until the House adjourns so that we may not be able to question him on this subject?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the street talk is not true.

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE AGREEMENT IN PRINCIPLE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister simply indicate whether it is true that there is an agreement in principle concerning an arrangement to help the Dome people and, if so, would he indicate what authority he feels the government has to make such an arrangement involving over $1 billion of federal government guarantees?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have not been informed that there was any agreement in principle, and I have certainly not given my assent to any agreement in principle.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

RANDOM HOUSE, CANADA—PROSPECT OF JOB LOSSES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for FIRA. It concerns another 85 Canadian jobs in the publishing industry. The minister will know that, as a result of the sale of the parent of Random House, Canada, the question of the future of Random House employees in Canada is now before FIRA, and indeed has been there for two and a half years. It is exactly the same case as the Lippincott one; they are on all fours. Will the Random House case be treated in the same way as the Lippincott case with the certain prospect of a loss of Canadian jobs?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the decision in this case, as in the other cases in question, will be made by the government. Certainly we will have to give careful consideration to all the circumstances required by the law. We will certainly carry out our responsibilities in that regard.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the matter was first raised with FIRA two and a half years ago. It is now before the cabinet of Canada. The cabinet of Canada has already forced Canadians employed by Lippincott to lose their jobs. Will the cabinet of Canada force 85 Canadians employed by Random House to lose their jobs as well?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I reject the premise of my hon. friend that it is the cabinet of Canada which forced Lippincott to announce that it was laying off its Canadian employees. It has taken that decision on its own, which is something that we have not required it to do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: In the Random House case, we will certainly look carefully at all the circumstances, in the light of the requirements of the law, including the views of the provincial government. My hon. friend should know that a year ago when we considered the Lippincott case we received the views of the Ontario government, and it was in opposition to the acceptance of that application.

TIMING OF GOVERNMENT DECISION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, will the Prime Minister tell me two things? First, will he tell me when the Random House decision will be taken by his cabinet and, second, is this policy decision by the Government of Canada, to throw Canadians who work for Lippincott out of work and to throw Canadians who work for Random House out of work, part of the reform of FIRA which was announced in the budget?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will inquire as to the date when this item is coming up for a cabinet decision. As to the second question, it is spurious and beneath contempt.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

AMENDMENT TO RESTORE COLLECTIVE BARGAINING RIGHTS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Last week the President of the Treasury Board indicated that he would be restoring collective bargaining rights to the public service and to those Crown and private corporations that come under Bill C-124. He claims that the government would be doing so under the provisions of an amendment which reads in part, "The Governor in Council may by order terminate the application of this act in respect of an employee or group of employees to which this act applies."

How can we trust the government with this completely unbridled power which allows it to exempt the rest of the act from certain groups of employees and employers, keeping in mind the callous and discriminatory treatment that it has given to the employees of Members of Parliament and employees of the Senate by arbitrarily rolling back the present salaries of those workers? How can we trust the government with any more power, when it has already abused the power it has?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, in the course of debate on the report stage, when we look at the proposed amendment, the hon. member for Churchill will have ample opportunity to make his point of view known. I explained at the time the amendment was tabled what its purpose was, how it was intended to restore collective bargaining with those groups who agreed to the six and five limit. That is the position of the government. We stand behind that position. I hope that we will have the comments of the hon. member in the course of this afternoon's debate, at which point I will be happy to elaborate on this brief answer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, after consultation with my House leader colleagues in both opposition parties, we have come to an agreement on the following motion. If you seek unanimous consent, according to them and certainly myself, I think you will obtain it.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the time provided for government business under orders of the day on Wednesday, August 4, 1982, shall expire at 6 p.m.;

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order of the House, when the House has completed its consideration of the business ordered to be completed by that time, it shall suspend its sitting until 8 p.m. that day and upon resumption of the sitting shall revert to Routine Proceedings for the purpose of taking into consideration the motion of the President of the Privy Council, now on notice, for an adjournment of the House;

Provided that if, at 10 p.m. that day, a message concerning the granting of the Royal Assent to Bill C-124, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, has not been received, the House shall adjourn, but proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 40 shall not take place;

Provided further that, if the House sits on Thursday, August 5, 1982, the business taken up under orders of the day shall be aforementioned motion by the President of the Privy Council;

Provided further that, if the aforementioned message has not yet been received by 10 p.m. on August 5, 1982, the debate on the aforementioned motion shall be deemed to have been adjourned; and

Provided that, when the House returns from the granting of the Royal Assent to the aforementioned bill, the aforementioned motion shall, not before 10 p.m. on August 4, 1982, be deemed to have been adopted without amendment and the House shall thereupon adjourn.

This has been the agreement we have been working on for quite a while. It seems that there is unanimous consent. I therefore ask that you seek unanimous consent for that motion.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Does it give its unanimous consent to the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MISS MACDONALD—RECONSIDERATION OF BILL C-124

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I wish to table a petition signed by 45 Progressive Conservative Members of Parliament, demanding that the government immediately amend the provisions of Bill C-124 so that the restraint provisions will take effect for the staffs of Members of Parliament and senators only on the expiration of their present salary arrangement, as will be the case for everyone else in the public service; and that the staffs of Members of Parliament and senators not be singled out for punitive action by the government.

I do so in the hope that the government will give credence to this particular petition before the bill is voted on later this day and that this discriminatory action not be taken by the government against the staffs of Members of Parliament—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Miss MacDonald: —and senators.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member knows that speeches are not allowed when presenting petitions.

Mr. Clark: And none was given.

TOTAL ADVERTISING BUDGET FOR 1979-80

Question No. 1,439—Mr. Beatty:

1. What was the government's total advertising budget for the fiscal year 1979-80 and what is the proposed budget for the fiscal year 1980-81?

Order Paper Questions

2. (a) What amount was spent by the government on French language advertising in Quebec during the referendum campaign period (b) to which creative advertising agencies were contracts awarded to produce such advertising (c) what was the value of the contracts signed by the creative agencies (d) were any of the contracts offered for tender?

3. Were government advertising contracts awarded for the fiscal year 1980-81 to the advertising firms (a) Vickers & Benson Ltd. (b) Ronalds-Reynolds & Co. Ltd. (c) BCP Advertising (1978) Ltd. (d) Jean Prévost Inc. and, if so, in each case (i) was the contract publicly tendered (ii) what was its value?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Multiculturalism Directorate:

1. See reply to question No. 1,450 tabled today. Because no central control was developed prior to 1980, it is not possible to provide the government's total advertising budget for fiscal year 1979-80, or fiscal year 1980-81. Procedures are presently being established for a central control of the government's advertising budget for fiscal year 1981-82.

3. See reply to question No. 1,450 tabled today.

Canadian Unity Information Office:

2. (a) $929,371.15. (b) PNMD Communications, Montreal, Ronalds-Reynolds & Co. Ltd., Montreal. (c) Contracts not to exceed $1,500,000 were awarded to both companies listed in (b). The contracts terminated March 31, 1981. (d) Due to the short notice regarding the launching of the campaign, contracts were not awarded through tender.

3. (a) Yes. (i) The appointment of advertising agencies is made through the chairman of the Cabinet Committee on Communications upon recommendations from the Advertising Management Group as per chapter 485 in Treasury Board Canada, Administrative Policy Manual. ADVERTISING ADVOCATING GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Question No. 3,231—Mr. Cossitt:

1. In each of the past three years, what was the total amount spent on advertising advocating government programs and what was the total for all three years combined?

2. (a) For the same period, what was the amount spent by the government for advertising the constitutional views and the constitutional resolutions prior to passage by Parliament (b) what are all the reasons justifying the expenditure of public funds on one point of view on a question that was not the law of the land at the time?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): 1. See reply to question No. 3,501 answered this day.

2. (a) $5,900,000. (b) The Canadian Unity Information Office has a mandate to inform Canadians on their country, its system of government and the services offered by their national government. The objective of the advertising on the Constitution was to make Canadians more aware of the importance of what was being discussed without advocating any particular approach.

The government's policy was restated lately in a speech by the Hon. Gerald Regan on November 25, 1981, "In addition to explaining programs and legislation which have been approved by Parliament, the government has a duty to inform the public on its proposals before they have been decided by Parliament. This principle recognizes that without factual information about the government's proposals and the issues being addressed, the public does not have the opportunity to make its views fully known to the legislators, based on good information.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING BUDGET

Question No. 3,501—Mr. Beatty:

What amount was spent by the government for advertising in (a) 1979-80 (b) 1980-81 and what is the projected budget for 1981-82?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services assumed responsibility for contracting for government advertising services on September 19, 1979. Since that date, the values of contracts placed by the Department of Supply and Services, by year, are as follows:

(a) 1979 (Sept. 19)-80: $22,500,000.

(b) 1980-81: $57,900,000. As of December 2, 1981, the projected budget for 1981-82 is $68,900,000.

VALUE OF ADVERTISING CONTRACTS

Question No. 4,185—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

By (a) department (b) advertising agency, what was the value of all advertising contracts processed through the Department of Supply and Services for the fiscal year 1981-82?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The tables below provide by department and advertising agency the advertising expenditures for the contracts processed through the department.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 1,450 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 1,450 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT'S ADVERTISING BUDGET FOR PAST TEN YEARS

Question No. 1,450—Mr. Beatty:

1. By organization, what was the government's advertising budget for each of the ten years beginning in the fiscal year 1970-71 and concluding with the anticipated budget for 1980-81 and, in each case (a) for what program was the advertising designed (b) what agency or agencies performed the work and was a formal contract signed with the agency and, if not, in which cases were contracts not signed and for what reason?

2. Have there been any instances where one organization reserved media time or space with the intention of turning it over to a second organization within the government and, if so (a) what were the organizations involved (b) on what date did such an occurrence take place (c) for what reason was such a course of action followed (d) what was the cost of the time or space purchased and how was it ultimately used?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I once again ask the parliamentary secretary if he has forgotten question No. 2,042, which was asked on January 29, 1981. If the parliamentary secretary has forgotten what the question was, it stated:

1. What was the total cost of the Prime Minister's December-January world tour?

2. What percentage of the total cost of the trip will be paid by the Canadian taxpayer?

Would the parliamentary secretary indicate why this question is still not answered?

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I will look into the matter on behalf of the hon. member. I know that I have done so before, but I will make a further inquiry. Of course, I was so busy lately assembling the material in the response to the question which I tabled today—it weighed about ten pounds—that I have been slightly preoccupied. However, I will look into the matter again.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, while the parliamentary secretary is looking into that, he might also look into why questions Nos. 3,216, 3,217, 3,218, 3,219 and 3,220, which also asked about other trips on the part of our emperor, the Prime Minister, to various parts of the world, have not been answered. These include a trip to New York in March, 1981, a trip to Algeria in May, 1981, a trip to Washington in July, 1981, a trip to Australia, Korea and The Philippines in September and October, 1981, and a trip to Cancun, Mexico, in October, 1981.

• (1510)

None of these questions has been answered in spite of the fact that they were asked almost a year ago. As we now know that the Prime Minister is planning extensive new trips, I think it is time the Canadian public were informed what these trips are costing them.

Mr. Smith: Of course I will be happy to look into those matters on behalf of the hon. member, but lest anyone think the government does not take these questions seriously, I should point out that as of today 3,527 questions have been answered during this session.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I do not want to interfere with the happiness of the hon. member, since every time I ask a question he says he is so happy to look into it, but I wonder if he would make me happy and let me have an answer. When may I expect an answer to question No. 2,329?

Mr. Smith: I would be more than happy to look into that matter on behalf of the hon. member and I will do so with holy haste.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

The House resumed from Monday, August 2, consideration of Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and motion No. 4 (Mr. Murphy).

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, perhaps before you leave the chair I could ask a question with regard to a ruling you made the other day. You indicated at that time that you were ruling Motion No. 1 out of order, and that at some later time I would be allowed to speak to that. I wonder when that time would be.

Mr. Epp: Not now.

Madam Speaker: That time has passed, I am afraid. When I gave the groupings of the different amendments which were up for debate, I ruled Motion No. 1 out of order and indicated that, if the hon. member wanted to make argument I was prepared to listen to him. I believe we have now gone through these motions up to Motion No. 7 or 8, if I am not mistaken, and therefore if the hon. member wanted to present an argument about Motion No. 1, he ought to have done that at the very beginning, especially considering the nature of the particular motion which has to do with the title of the bill. So I am afraid that the time at which the hon. member could bring argument has passed. I am very sorry that he did not take advantage of the offer I made to him at that time, but the time has passed and I suppose it would not be very useful to discuss Motion No. 1.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I may have been misled inadvertently by your own statement. It is reported on page 19866 of Hansard of July 30, 1982, where in the second last paragraph on that page you say, referring to myself:

> Unless the hon. member wishes to present argument on this point later, I intend to rule Motion No. 1 as not acceptable.

As we were going on to Motion No. 2 immediately afterwards, I presumed, maybe wrongly, that "later" was not immediately, that later referred to some time in the future. It certainly is the intention of this caucus to pursue the matter of the title of this bill. We believe that the present title does not really talk about the substance of the bill, and that the title that we have suggested, which says basically that it outlaws collective bargaining, allows the government to break collective agreements that it has already signed and so forth, is the real purpose of this bill and should be the title of this bill.

I would be in the Speaker's hands for her to indicate when "later" really is, because I certainly went on the advice of what she said at that time.

Madam Speaker: Later was certainly later, but I gave no indication of how late that was. The hon. member must realize, since we do take up motions in the order in which they are numbered, that later meant that these objections had to be raised before we discussed that particular motion. I will quote what I said in my ruling on page 19866 of Hansard, July 30, 1982:

> The long title sets out, in general terms, the purposes of the bill and should be amended only if and when amendments of substance are made to the bill which would necessitate as a consequence changes to that title.

Therefore, unless the bill is substantially changed I could not see any reason for changing that title. Therefore, my ruling has to stand. I am sorry that the hon. member did not raise his arguments earlier because I would have been more than happy to listen to them then; but I am afraid the time has passed.

Mr. Murphy: On that same point, I guess I have a problem because again reading from what you said on page 19866 of Hansard:

Unless the hon. member wishes to present argument on this point later, I intend to rule Motion No. 1 as not acceptable.

There is no other reference to Motion No. 1 in your ruling. So you give an indication that I can speak later. You say that you intend to rule this out of order, but you do not rule that. My understanding was that you gave notice of your own intent.

Madam Speaker: I am not as good as the hon. member at interpreting English, but "I intend to rule" is a soft way of saying "I rule". I do not like to stand up here and be too affirmative, but I am sure the hon. member should have understood that that was my intention and was my ruling at that particular time.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Certainly, Madam Speaker, I can see how the hon. member might have been confused by your ruling; I am confused by the explanation. Surely the House is the master of its own destiny, and if the hon. member wishes to argue whether or not Motion No. 1 is out of order, this House through its generosity and fair mindedness could by unanimous consent permit the hon. member to put his argument at this moment.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the words of the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) and if that would help the House in its dilemma we would be quite prepared to give unanimous consent so he can put his argument.

Madam Speaker: It is quite a dilemma because I have just given an interpretation of what my ruling said, and in my view it meant that I had ruled. If the House did not understand what I meant, I suppose there is nothing wrong with being generous. If the House generously wants to allow the hon. member to give his argument on Motion No. 1, I am sure we can listen to him; but in the interest of the House I would ask him to be brief. Subsequently I will look at his argument and rule on it in a definitive manner.

Mr. Murphy Thank you, Madam Speaker, and I thank the House as well.

It is our position that the title of the bill should reflect the substance of the bill. We believe as a result of suggestions in this bill and government amendments made to the bill that it is much better to have the bill named in such a way that the general public and the people affected by the bill clearly know what it means. Because of that we have argued, both in committee and we are now arguing in this House, that this bill should properly be entitled "An Act to break contracts, lower real wages and outlaw collective bargaining in the public sector of Canada".

• (1520)

That is the motion that we have moved. We sincerely believe that that would make the real intent and effect of the bill very clear to all Canadians. The titles offered by the government, both the long title and the short title, say noting on these very important factors in the bill and, as a result, many Canadians do not know what the government, together with the official opposition, are doing with regard to the bill.

I do not wish to speak longer on this subject. I do not want to delay debate because only one and a half sitting days remain for debate on the entire bill. But I would ask Your Honour to rule that titles should reflect the actual substance of a bill.

Madam Speaker: I need not rule. That is a requirement. Titles should reflect the substance of a bill. I am afraid that the suggestion which the hon. member is making is that titles should be argumentative, as well. I decided that the suggestion in Motion No. 1 was argumentative, and I ruled it out of order on that ground. The hon. member has not given me an argument to change my mind. Therefore, I do rule that motion No. 1 is out of order.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I understand that I have three minutes left in which to conclude my argument with regard to Motion No. 4 which stands in my name. The intent of that motion is to restore collective bargaining rights to employees of the Canadian Pacific railway system and to employees of the other four railways the government has decided to include in the bill, although all five of those railways are in the private sector. We will present a similar motion later on which would also state that Canadian National should be excluded from the provisions of this bill.

It is our belief that the railway system is a very important sector in the Canadian economy. Through good management in negotiation arrangements involving Canadian Pacific, Canadian National, the other companies and the unions, we have managed to have railway peace over the last number of years in this country. Therefore, not only do we find the bill itself to be repugnant, but we also find it very dangerous that the government will break a collective agreement which has already been reached between the railways and their unions. After negotiations have already been settled and after an agreement has been signed by the respective parties, I think it is very dangerous to break it.

This will result in many problems for Canadians in the future, not only for the companies and the unions, but also for farmers and communities which rely on those railways. That is because at the end of this wage control period, the members of those unions will want to catch up. For each of the next two years, they will lose 6 per cent and 5 per cent. At the end of that time, they will want to catch up. I and fellow members of my caucus cannot see how we can have railway peace two years hence when all those workers will suddenly attempt to catch up and regain the wages to which they had already agreed but which have been lost strictly because of the government's action.

We therefore argue that the amendment with regard to CP and our later amendment with regard to CN must pass. I would hope that Conservatives and Liberals from all parts of the country who are concerned about the transportation system would support our amendments.

Mr. David Berger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to speak in the debate on Bill C-124, particularly because of the comments by hon. members from both opposition parties in the debate yesterday, which I had the opportunity to hear. Each hon. member from the opposition parties told us how the Canadian economy would be radically different if the government followed their prescriptions or if they were in power. They said it would be much improved and we would not be encountering today's unfortunate problems.

These prescriptions reminded me of a recent article in Forbes magazine. The article, an interview of the French historian, Fernand Braudel, was captioned "Inflation; poverty; dying industries: The crisis is universal, a great historian tells Forbes. Politicians who promise quick cures are fools or liars."

I believe that anyone listening to the debate in the last day or two and hearing these prescriptions from the two opposition parties would come to the rather rapid conclusion that we have plenty of fools and liars in the House. An illustration is the state of the auto industry in North America. We are all familiar with the problems it has had in the past several years involving imports and its production of automobiles which are not up to world standard. As a result, there have been tremendous lay-offs throughout the industry. There have been many studies of the problems of that industry. One which I recently had the opportunity to read was carried out for the task force on employment opportunities in the 1980s. This study, entitled "The Medium-Term Employment Outlook in the Canadian Automotive Industry", discussed the state of the industry and tried to predict the number of persons who would be employed in that industry in Canada over the course of the next ten years.

In 1980, the Canadian automotive industry employed approximately 98,000 workers. The study forecast that in 1985, not allowing for offshore procurement, it would employ somewhere in the neighbourhood of 64,000 to 73,000 workers, which would mean a decrease of approximately 34,000 workers, if one wants to take the lower limit. Allowing for offshore procurement, that is, if the automotive industry were to purchase parts from foreign countries, the automotive industry would employ only something in the neighbourhood of 53,000 to 60,000 workers in 1985. By 1990, even a further reduction is predicted. The forecast, again not taking into account offshore procurement, is that approximately 50,000 to 55,000 workers would be employed; or allowing for offshore procurement, only 41,000 to 45,000 would be employed.

You have there, Mr. Speaker, an authoritative study which predicted that even under the best of circumstances the Canadian automobile industry will employ in ten years from 1980, which is eight years from now, approximately half the number of workers it employed in 1980. I quote from the conclusion of this study:

> Essentially we are looking at an industry whose size and work force in North America will contract, even if the same number of vehicles are purchased, because of changes in production technology.

I defy the members of the opposition to tell us how they, if they were in power, would change this employment outlook. The problems which the Canadian economy is facing today are complex. They require all the ingenuity that Canadians can muster in order to solve them. To suggest that interest rates can be magically lowered, as is often proposed by the New Democratic Party, or that all of our problems can be solved by less government intervention, is foolish.

Recently we had an example of how the prescriptions or preconceived notions of the New Democratic Party fit in with reality in the study on bank profits. The two members of the NDP who sat on that committee walked out of the committee hearing when it turned out that the facts did not fit the ideas they had when the hearing started. As my colleague said, their attitude is "don't confuse us with the facts".

We had a similar example of the prescription of the Progressive Conservative Party, that less government intervention will solve all the problems. The best example I can cite is Chrysler Corporation. Because of the structural problems I was referring to and because of bad management and a failure to keep up with advanced technology in other countries, it was on the verge of bankruptcy several years ago. Governments in the United States and Canada decided that, given the importance of the automobile industry in North America, the number of people it employed and the subsidiary industries that relied upon the help of that industry, it was necessary to provide certain loan guarantees and government support in order to get that company back on its feet. Assistance was given only when it was assured the company had a plan and ideas to restructure itself and improve its techniques in order to produce more efficient cars which the public would be willing to buy. Naturally those in the Conservative Party abhorred that kind of government intervention. They felt the government should not get involved. Even today when the government sees fit to help other companies experiencing similar difficulties, we hear the same cry—"No, the government should not get involved".

What is the proof of the pudding? Several weeks ago Chrysler Corporation announced the largest last quarter profit in the past four or five years and seems to be well on the road to recovery. That is proof that simplistic solutions from the Conservative Party do not provide the answers to the ills of the Canadian economy.

This bill proposes that increases in wages of public servants be limited to 6 per cent and 5 per cent over the next two years. As could very well be expected, the plan has been vilified by both of the opposition parties and by members of the press. Jack McArthur, in a column in the Montreal Gazette of July 2, 1982, stated as follows:

> It's not possible to have one group of Canadian workers and organizations heading for long toward a chilly austerity not noticeably suffered by the remainder. Over time, that would bring an indigestibly large number of economic distortions, demonstrations, strikes, resentments and political difficulties.

He has criticized our program. It is clear that the circumstances which he cites support our program. Certain parts of the economy are suffering from the recession and from the transformation that is taking place in our society. They have been asked to bear the burden solely, without help from other segments of the economy.

There are two good reasons for supporting this program and this legislation. The first is on the basis of equity and the second on the basis of competition. As I was mentioning, certain industries are being asked to bear the burden of this recession and the structural changes taking place in Canadian society. Other sectors, such as the public sector, are not subject to market forces. They are removed from competition. The workers do not negotiate under the same constraints as those in areas of the economy that are subject to competition.

In those areas of the economy that are not subject to competition and the kind of technological change which is hurting certain sectors of the economy, it is only logical that those most fortunate people be asked to contribute to the improvement and restructuring of those parts of the economy undergoing such difficulties. In a few moments I will get into some of the efforts the government is making to help with the restructuring of the industries to which I was referring.

• (1540)

As I mentioned earlier, the second reason for supporting this legislation is competition. Certain sectors are facing competition from industries overseas and in the United States. I am familiar with a number of companies which bid on contracts in the United States or in other countries. I am sure all hon. members are familiar with similar companies in their constituencies or in their areas of the country.

As I mentioned yesterday in the few brief remarks I made, 30 per cent of Canada's gross national product comes from exports, whereas only 10 per cent of the gross national products of the United States and Japan are dependent on exports. This indicates the extent to which Canada has had to trade in order to survive. I am familiar with certain companies which in recent years have had to bid on contracts in the United States. They have had to put up with wage increases which have far exceeded increases in productivity and far exceeded the level of wage increases in the United States.

There is a particular company of which I am aware which has a plant in an area of Montreal and another plant in the state of Vermont. Some time ago I was talking with the president of that company—this was before the recent devaluation of the Canadian dollar—and he told me that he paid his workers in the plant in Vermont approximately $4 per hour less, all things being considered, including the exchange rate, yet the workers in the two plants were doing essentially the same work. Recently this company had to go through wage negotiations again. As we know, settlements in the United States have recently been in the order of 4 per cent or 5 per cent in some industries, but the Canadian workers in this particular company asked for increases of something in the order of 10 per cent. The president of the company said no, he would not go beyond 6 per cent, and he encouraged the workers to follow the lead which had been taken by the Government of Canada and to understand the extent to which their jobs were dependent upon showing restraint. I am happy to say they agreed to that. They agreed to increases of 6 per cent, and hopefuly this company will continue to prosper and grow.

What would have been the case if the government had not changed its policy, if we were going along oblivious to the difficulties being experienced by many sectors of the economy and allowed increases in the order of 10 per cent or 11 per cent? It would certainly be a very difficult situation. It would be almost untenable for people in more competitive industries and those open to international competition to go to their workers and ask them to accept something less.

I think I have demonstrated that this program can be supported both on the basis of equity and for competitive reasons.

I believe my time is up. I wanted to say a few words about the national training program which has just been adopted by the government. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) described it as the most significant piece of legislation we will pass in this session. Unfortunately, I did not have a chance to get into that. I hope to come back to that at an early opportunity, and I thank hon. members for this opportunity to express my views on this subject.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada and, particularly, Motion No. 4 which we have moved and which would strike out lines 6 to 17 on page 3 and substitute certain words to which I would like to refer, because the bill is very deceiving as it now reads. The bill is legislation respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada but, because of actions taken by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston):

> This part applies to employees of Canadian Pacific Limited and its subsidiaries who are employed in the operation of a railway and to the employees of the following:
> (a) Ontario Northland Railways;
>
> What is public about that?
>
> (b) Algoma Central Railway Company;
> What is public about that?
>
> (c) Toronto Terminals Railway Company; and
> (d) Shawinigan Falls Terminal Railway Company.
> What is public about that?

Mr. Blaikie: Let's make them public. Let's nationalize them.

Mr. Parker: We know Ian Sinclair came to Ottawa to head the private sector in pushing this bill through. In my speech the other day on one of the other clauses I questioned the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) about meetings they had with railway representatives. The government has added to this bill the railways I have cited with the consent of the Conservative Party, and the result for employees of these railways will be misery. The hon. member for Rosedale said that the New Democratic Party is not acting in a responsible way and that we are in serious trouble. Yes, we are in serious trouble, and one of the reasons is that since 1978, almost $30 billion has been spent on takeovers by large multinational corporations. Half that, a staggering $14 billion, was spent in the first nine months of 1981, but not one job was created by those takeovers.

Ian Sinclair is chairman and chief executive officer of Canadian Pacific Enterprises Limited, and the list of his directorships goes on and on. However, I will name only one. He is a director of the Royal Bank of Canada. It is interesting to note that other corporate elite tied into Canada's corporate structure also sit on the boards of directors of the Bank of Montreal and other major banks across Canada. This corporate elite is neatly tied together to dictate interest rate policy and other policies to the government. The Conservative Party is following suit with the corporate elite right down the line. Members of the Conservative Party want to steal money from workers while these takeovers take place.

Small businessmen are losing their businesses because all this money is tied into big multinational takeovers. The boards of directors of banks have clearly directed bank money into takeovers which have not created one job but have taken money away from small businessmen. A small businessman who walks into a bank wanting to borrow money finds that the money is already taken by the big corporate elite for the purpose of takeovers but not for the purpose of creating one job. I brought this matter up in committee and was told that this was done in the energy field. What energy is involved in the Hudson's Bay Company taking over Zeller's? Where are the extra jobs in such programs?

Another interesting gentleman sits on the board of directors of CP Rail, the Hon. John Turner, a former minister of finance with the Liberal government. Let me list his directorships. He is a partner in McMillan, Binch which is located in the Royal Bank Plaza in Toronto; a director of Canadian Investment Fund, Ltd.; Canadian Pacific Ltd.; Credit Foncier; MacMillan, Bloedel Ltd.; Marathon Realty Co. Ltd.; Massey-Ferguson Ltd.; Sandoz (Canada) Ltd.; The Seageam Co. Ltd.; Wander Ltd. Those are the directorships he holds. We begin to see the tie-in between the Liberal government, the former Conservative government and who they represent.

We heard members of the Conservative Party say how concerned they are about jobs. If they are so concerned and if the government is so concerned, then why do they not tell Ian Sinclair to build his ships in Canada and man them with Canadian merchant marines instead of flying the flag of another country? Those are the kinds of programs that should be put in place in order to put people back to work.

I want to speak about the bill as it affects workers, Mr. Speaker. I feel that members of this House do not understand the problems there are in the railways industry. The President of the Treasury Board has no knowledge of what is going on in the Department of Labour. He has literally smashed Part III, Part IV and Part V of the Canada Labour Code.

Over the last few years the unions on the railways and in many Crown corporations have been negotiating contracts on actual problems and actual costs. They agreed to build a COLA clause into the last two contracts to provide that the money agreed to would be collected the following year. In other words, if the cost of living went up the year after, then they got an increase; but if it did not, then they received nothing. Of course, the cost of living is going up. The government knows that it will continue going up, so now it is going to freeze the wages of the people concerned.

If that is done, then what happens to the local union representation on the railway system? What happens to the people representing the workers and who have to deal with their problems? When you take away the initiative of having something to bargain for, the initiative to deal with health and safety problems, and you tell the workers these are monetary problems and cannot be dealt with, it is no wonder that people are reluctant to join the union executive.

I want to talk about the slides that come down the mountains, Mr. Speaker. When they shoot the slides down and the trains come down the hill and they wait, a clause in the railway workers' agreement says that after ten or eleven hours of duty they are entitled to go home. But many dedicated employees will wait and continue to carry out their duties. What kind of working relationships will there be when there is this kind of hardship?

When Mr. L. A. Hill, who is manager of Canadian Pacific's western lines at Vancouver, was superintendent of the Revelstoke division, he wrote a letter commending the workers for their dedication during very, very serious snow conditions. That took place in a spirit of co-operation, not a spirit of confrontration, Mr. Speaker. The government has presented this bill to the House in a spirit of confrontation. How does it expect the workers of Canada to accept it and then perform beyond what is required of them when takeovers are taking place, excessive profits are being made and CP steamships are flying the flag of another country and manning its ships with workers from another country? All this is in the interest of profit and not in the spirit of building Canada. Yet the workers of Canada are being asked to try to help rebuild. The government's policies have destroyed Canada. In a manufacturing economy we have to start to build and put things back together. We have to hire employees, invest in the unemployed and put them back to work.

I should like to talk about other things that have taken place with the railway trade unions, Mr. Speaker. There is the problem of the grievance procedure. Who is going to devote his time to a local grievance committee which is 100, 200 or 300 miles away from the general chairman? This job of representing 200 or 300 employees carries no remuneration. Safety problems such as those with the Connaught tunnel where exhaust fumes overtook some employees and resulted in their being taken to hospital in the past cannot be discussed at a distance. A bill such as this requires that a monetary value be placed on such incidents, and then it is declared to be a monetary issue and the workers are told to find the best solution they can to the problem.

I want to talk about train derailments on the CNR, CP Rail and the other railways. Employees go out to try to clear the track and get the trains moving again. Some of them work as long as 24 or 36 hours without rest in wet, cold and miserable conditions. An agreement has been signed, sealed and delivered by the unions and companies and voted on by the membership, yet legislation can take it away. Is that democracy? I call it hypocrisy.

Those are the things that this bill will do, Mr. Speaker. It will destroy the basis on which we have built a free collective bargaining system. I should have liked to ask the chief mediation officer, Mr. Kelly, for whom railway workers have the deepest respect, if he had been allowed to come to the committee, how he was going to deal with some of these problems. I would have liked to ask the labour relations officer who came to Revelstoke to investigate an illegal dispute over hours of work and meals on the job about all these things.

The grain people were blaming the railway workers and the railway workers were blaming the railways, while the truth of the matter was that so much traffic was coming in from the coalfields in the Kootenays, there was so much grain, so much potash and so much sulphur all arriving together, that the workers had reached their limit.

The labour relations officer went to investigate. The workers defied the law and they were told that although their problems were recognized they would have to wait until their bargaining unit went through the proper process. They pleaded with the judge and told him that they realized they had broken the law but they had to bring the issue to someone's attention. However, they were fined $500 each under the Canada Labour Code. Now the Canada Labour Code is going to be butchered in half. How are you going to have accountability from mediation officers, labour relations officers and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) when the President of the Treasury Board starts bringing in legislation that he knows nothing about? He denies the committee the right to have the Minister of Labour and his officials appear before that committee.

• (1600)

I want to say, and I say it with the deepest of thoughts, that I can see some very, very serious problems arising as a result of this legislation. I hope I am wrong. I hope to goodness I am wrong. We have had a free collective bargaining system working which recognized the cost of living. Our trade unions have operated in a responsible way and have said: "We recognize the problem; therefore, we will not put in our demands. But at the end if there is a cost of living clause, we expect to get it." People have been getting the cost of living increases. But what is going to happen in January when these workers are not only told that their wages on which they have a signed contract will be rolled back but also that their COLA clause has been destroyed? If the cost of living continues to rise, what do you think is going to happen, Mr. Speaker? I can see the framework within each local union starting to disintegrate.

Why would anyone in their right mind want to take a position on a local trade union when his hands would be tied behind his back? How do you think this person would feel when he is faced by literally 200 or 300 members who plead for something to be done? Members approach their union representative on faith. You hear them say "I have my ten hours in; I want to get home. I was in Field for over 14 hours, I want to get home." Who in their right mind would take on those kinds of responsibilities?

When the AIB guidelines were in force, some of those things were recognized. They were serious. You cannot and you must not dictate policies when you have had the freedom of collective bargaining.

The trade union movement, especially in the railways, has come a long way working with the Ministry of Labour, working with various departments, whether in mediation, in conciliation or in labour relations. People had a feeling they would be heard. When things fail, there was a railway arbitration system to which they could go. People accept decisions of arbitrators. Yet almost 90 per cent of the time the arbitrator rules in favour of the company, but people accept these decisions because they were made through an arbitration system. Representatives of the railways, the labour unions and companies come to an agreement and they accept the arbitrator's decision. They feel that at least their case was heard.

How many cases will get that far now? The local process will be gone. The general chairman's authority will be criticized by every worker who will say: "You can do nothing for me. The bill is in front of us. Everything is tied up. What can you do for us? The law has been passed. We are severely dealt with. Where do we go from here?" Those are the kinds of problems this bill will create.

There is one more myth which I would like to refer to before I close. It concerns productivity. I refer to the U.S. bureau of labour statistics which in 1981 stated that hourly wages in manufacturing were 11 per cent lower in Canada than in the United States. Let us look at longer-term figures. Let us take a look at ten major western nations, including Canada. Every single country had higher manufacturing wage increases than Canada between 1975 and 1980. Here is the list: in Great Britain, manufacturing wage increases top 115 per cent; France up 104 per cent; Belgium up 100 per cent; Italy up 93 per cent; Japan up 93 per cent; West Germany up 91 per cent; Holland up 85 per cent; Sweden 76 percent; the United States up 56 per cent, and Canada up 48 per cent. Canadian workers are not pricing themselves out of the market. That is a myth which this government and the Conservative Party are trying to spell out across Canada. I think it is time the government started to deal with the serious problems of our economy. The government should not be taking it out on the workers and stealing money from the workers' pockets.

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to speak on the issue of six and five. I believe this measure is one of the most important directions the government has taken in terms of getting the country back on the road to economic recovery.

An issue with this much intervention is bound to raise some controversy. Therefore, we must ask the question: Is it necessary? There are three very strong reasons why it is necessary. First is inflation. We have been fighting inflation in the western world through the mechanism of high interest rates.

Mr. Deans: And it has not worked.

Mr. Lang: High interest rates on their own are being used to curtail the money supply in an effort to reduce aggregate demand and to bring down inflation.

Mr. Deans: That has not worked either.

Mr. Parker: One failure after another.

Mr. Lang: This measure deals with one cause of inflation, but there are other causes of inflation. There is the cost-push element of inflation with which we have not been able to deal in a voluntary manner until this point. The government has now introduced the six and five restraint. There is support in the country for it. I know that because I hear support for it in my riding, not only from businessmen or people in the academic world but from people in the public service, to whom this policy applies and who are making the sacrifice.

Mr. Parker: Read your own study paper.

Mr. Lang: People are supporting this restraint because they see a concrete direction being taken to get inflation down and, therefore, interest rates, which is the number one problem facing this country.

Second, we have to take this direction and make this six and five restraint work because of Canada's competitive level. Almost one-third of our gross national product depends on trade. If this country is not competitive in trade, it means higher unemployment, less economic growth and a drop in our standard of living. We have to decide whether we want to remain a competitive country.

The previous speaker listed a number of statistics through which he tried to show that Canada was still as competitive or even more competitive than the United States and other countries in western Europe. Over the last two years that has not been the case, particularly when it concerns our greatest competitor, the United States, with which we have 70 per cent of our trade.

Mr. Rose: What do we sell them?

Mr. Lang: Wage settlements in Canada are running 5 per cent higher than in the United States.

Mr. Althouse: Wages are lower and that is what counts.

Mr. Lang: It is easier to take the popular stand. It might be a little harder to get up and say: "Look, if we don't restrain ourselves right now, you are going to lose your jobs." People and workers know that, and that is why they are supporting the six and five policy.

Mr. Rose: Which workers?

Mr. Deans: You are abusing their trust.

Mr. Blaikie: Tell us about the doctors. Are they willing to take six and five?

• (1610)

Mr. Lang: We are having a problem with corporate liquidity. We are finding that the rate of return on common shares and on common equity for corporations is less than their debt expenses. To put that into layman's language, there is less money coming in than there is going out in the corporate sector.

Mr. Deans: That is because of your high interest rate policy.

Mr. Lang: If hon. members opposite would listen, I would indicate that if that continues, it does not take many brains to know that these corporations will go under.

Mr. Rose: Right.

Mr. Lang: This is the reason we have to get interest rates and inflation down. In my view there is no excuse for trying to nickel and dime to death a very direct and positive measure which gives momentum to getting inflation down so that we can get interest rates down. We do not have time to dilly-dally any longer.

I would like to share with hon. members some of the views of Mr. Henry Kaufman, the economic guru of Wall Street, concerning how long we can last with interest rates so high. He gave us six months before suggesting that major corporations all through North America will be in serious danger of bankruptcy. We do not have time to waste on the fallacious or spurious arguments which have been raised. We have a solid six and five program which the people are supporting.

I challenge members of the opposition to get behind this measure so that we as Canadians can get inflation down, can maintain our competitive position in international markets, and can avoid the corporate liquidity crisis which we are facing. These are the three reasons that I believe this six and five bill is necessary.

It is also important that the bill be equitable. We have heard criticism from the opposition that we are picking on public servants, that they are the only ones who will be bearing the burden of the fight against inflation. Members of the opposition forget their own rhetoric. They forget the fact that small businesses have been bearing a very heavy burden in the fight against inflation. They forget that farmers have been bearing a very heavy burden in the fight against inflation. They forget that labour in the private sector, far from being able to obtain a raise of 6 per cent, are losing their jobs. They forget that home owners are having to renew their mortgages at rates which put a tremendous strain on their budgets, at tremendous sacrifice to them. The public service is not the only one bearing the brunt.

We must keep in mind that there is much greater job security in the public service. This is not something we have to back up with statistics because we know it, but it can be backed up statistically. There is much greater job security in the public sector than in the private sector. In exchange for that job security, we are asking that the increases—not cutbacks—in the salaries be limited to 6 per cent next year and 5 per cent the following year. Many public servants in my riding are supporting this measure. In fact, I can count on one hand the number of complaints I have received. I have had more telephone calls of support. As most of my colleagues will know, it is rare that people will telephone in support of anything. Usually they are telephoning to complain. That is the general case, and as Members of Parliament we all know it.

On this issue people are telephoning us in support because they want some direction. They want to see the government taking a direct course of action which will have positive results in the near term, because they know that time is critical. For the first time in the last year we have seen representatives of business supporting the measures of government. We have seen bankers supporting measures. Even the occasional media person has supported them. People are beginning to realize that it is time we stopped this conspiracy of negativism that everything is wrong, that everything the government has done is wrong, that everything the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does is wrong. People do not buy that any more. They want to see constructive action.

Despite the lack of popularity of the Liberal Party at this time, of which we are all aware, this measure has received support because it is a good one and it gives direction. People in their intuition are sensing that we are on the road to turning the economy around.

I ask hon. members opposite to read the July report of OECD. This is an international organization, as hon. members are aware, of western world countries, gathering economic information to give governments an idea of how to co-ordinate their efforts to deal with the international economic problems facing us. In the economic analysis of the report they listed one of the main problems in Canada's economy as the lack of co-operation among various sectors. They talked about the confrontational attitude between business and labour, between government and business, and between government and labour.

I see that Mr. Speaker is signalling that my time is running out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I would not want to mislead the hon. member. As he and perhaps other hon. members know, from time to time I indicate to hon. members who are speaking that they have some minutes remaining. I made an error. The hon. member's time will expire at 4.26 o'clock, so I am informed, and I apologize for misleading him.

Mr. Lang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The major problem in the report of this international organization, compiled by international economists, is the lack of constructive co-operation. We in the House should really take that to heart and listen to what outsiders are saying. We should go beyond our own sphere.

Mr. Murphy: What if they say "resign"?

Mr. Lang: I hear the hon. member opposite. This is the kind of thing which will not lead to one more job being created, which will not lead to the interest rate being reduced by one point, which will not lead to the inflation rate being reduced by one point, or will not contribute in any way to economic recovery.

The fact is that the government was elected by the people of Canada. It is a majority government with a mandate for four years. If opposition members do not like a measure which the government has taken, they can oppose it. All I am asking is that they do it in a constructive manner rather than calling names and saying "resign". They should put forward their alternative proposals and, if they are good, people will buy them. That would be good for them politically. Rather than sitting on the fence and avoiding taking any position because they might lose a vote, they should take a position. They might find that people will say "Yes, they are putting forward alternatives".

• (1620)

We in Canada have many advantages over some other countries. I want to deal with this just for a couple of minutes because one of the major criticisms that has been levelled at us is that we are spending wildly and with abandon. If members read the July OECD report they will see government expenditures in Canada before World War II were running at about 10 per cent as compared to the GNP. Between World War II and 1970 that increased to 20 per cent. In the last ten years we have been holding the line between 20 per cent and 23 per cent.

These are international statistics. There is no bias in them. There is no reason for them to be biased toward the opposition or towards the government.

An hon. Member: We know that is right.

Mr. Lang: Maybe the NDP knows that it is right, but it is one of the major criticisms that the Conservatives have been levelling at the government and I think it is time we stood up and said: "Look, here are the statistics; read them and you see that this accusation is not a valid one."

Therefore, I ask the opposition not to try to discredit the government's attempt at bringing restraint into the economy by the fallacious criticism that we have been spending wildly, with abandon. The statistics do not bear it out and I am the last one that would be suggesting this, because I think I am fairly well known as being much in favour of reducing any government waste or fat.

The second myth that is being generated is that we cannot have an economic recovery until we get the deficit down to $10 billion or $5 billion; that the deficit is wildly out of proportion. I would like to point out that hon. members take a look again at the OECD July report. They will find that the country in the western world that has had the lowest inflation, the lowest interest rates, the lowest unemployment rate and the strongest economic growth consistently over the last 20 years has had a greater deficit compared to GNP than Canada; and that country is Japan. Japan has much less in terms of resources or advantages than Canada has. It was only 35 years ago that they had no economy, that they had to start over from nothing due to the devastation of the war. We all know that they do not have natural resources.

What does the July OECD report say? Why has Japan been able to have such a strong economy performance? One of the major things they have is again co-operation among business, labour and government and a general willingness of the people to see that their economy is going to be a strong one. The second major area in which Japan has had a tremendous advantage or head start on most countries in the western world is that it has recognized that we are in the third industrial revolution of history.

In the seventeenth century we had the first industrial revolution with the steam engine. In the 1870s we had the second industrial revolution, with electricity coming on line and with the combustion engine. We are now in the middle of the third industrial revolution, a revolution of technology and computers that will impact on every sector of society. The major reason that the Japanese have been able to get a head start is through this co-operative effort of sharing information and working with the various sectors of their society.

I suggest that the 6 per cent and 5 per cent measure puts Canada in a position where we can take part in a recovery, where we will have an opportunity at that time to improve the co-operative effort between sectors, which is part of the six and five program, and again get on board the technological revolution that is occurring now and can lead to tremendous prosperity. We have many more resources, human and natural, than Japan.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be participating in this, the debate at the report stage of Bill C-124, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada. My pleasure, though, is not derived from any sense that the bill is a good one. In fact, the legislation is not only bad; it is also grossly unfair.

I say unfair because the bill discriminates wildly against one group of workers in the country, namely public employees, by forcing them to carry virtually single-handedly the burden of the government's restraint program. Maximum permissible increases in wage rates for them are to be set at 6 per cent in the first year of application and 5 per cent in the second, regardless of whether an individual is a $14,000 a year janitor or a $75,000 a year deputy minister.

Equally offensive to my party is that the principle of collective bargaining, including the right to strike, is being effectively suspended in a most unfair way as the government moves to impose unilaterally conditions of employment on its own employees.

We are now debating Motion No. 4. Regarding that motion, we on this side accept the principle of restraint embodied in the bill, even to the extent of the proposed 6 per cent and 5 per cent ceilings. We think that while increases in the total payroll of the public service should not exceed those percentages, collective bargaining rights should be retained to resolve issues like the particular pay packet of individual employees, as well as health, safety, grievances and other general issues.

My party does not object to the government's goal of restraining wages and prices in Canada to combat inflation. Indeed, we have been pressing the government all along to act, especially in the area of curbing its own voracious appetite to spend taxpayers' money. What we object to most in Bill C-124, however, is the arbitrary way the government has decided to impose restraint.

There are essentially two problems. There are others, but there are two in particular. First, the government has singled out public employees to bear the lion's share of the burden of the restraint program, as if, magically, by restraining their salaries alone, inflation would somehow automatically recede. Secondly, even within the public service, the burden will be borne unevenly from one employee to another, for the program is essentially regressive.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to deal first with the fact that public employees are being asked to carry more than their share. Public employees constitute a relatively small proportion of the total work force—conventional wisdom notwithstanding. The government's program applies to employees in line departments of government, to Members of Parliament and senators and their staffs, to employees of Crown corporations, to the RCMP, to judges, and to Armed Forces personnel. In all, some 500,000 people are affected.

I admit that this number is not insignificant but the total is small compared to the whole work force in the country, which numbered 12,192,000 in June, if I remember correctly. Even if the salary of every public employee in the country was slashed to $1, inflation would not disappear. Obviously, the government believes it needs a convenient whipping boy to blame for its mismanagement of the economy and to demonstrate that it has finally converted to restraint. Therefore, the public service is being made the scapegoat.

Once again we have evidence that the government is motivated, not by the public interest but by its own narrow, partisan interest. Opinion polls have demonstrated that civil servants are currently out of favour with the public. Highly publicized strikes in certain sectors, notably at the post office, and among air traffic controllers and others, have left a bitter taste with many people throughout the land. It does not matter, it seems, that most labour disputes in the public sector are settled amicably and without strikes. Unfortunately, the image of public employees is, unfairly I submit, at an all-time low. True to form, the government thinks that it can reverse its plummeting fortunes coast to coast by flexing its muscles at the expense of the public service. Doctor Gallup and Mr. Goldfarb have told the government that those people are unpopular, so the government has decided to do battle with them in order to court public favour. That is exactly what Bill C-124 is all about. It is a public relations job.

After spending the country into bankruptcy during the last 14 years, the government has suddenly chosen to make restraint the rallying cry in its fight to win back public support. People can see behind the facade of this feigned conversion. They instinctively and intuitively recognize the essential unfairness of it all. The government is slapping 6 per cent and 5 per cent ceilings on allowable salary increases in the public service, no matter what the income level might be in a particular case.

For the high rollers at the upper levels of the income ladder, 6 per cent would mean an allowable increase of $4,000 or more, which is not a small bundle even in these times of debased currency. By contrast, the lowly junior secretary or maintenance person who receives 6 per cent on a $14,000 salary gets a paltry $840, which is hardly enough to pay the daycare bill of a single parent for half a year.

I wholeheartedly agree with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), who said during her excellent speech on Friday, that people at the lower end of the salary scale should be allowed a higher percentage increase than those at the upper end. In this respect, I would perhaps go even further. I believe the low-income group should be permitted increases on a sliding scale, beginning with something close to a full cost of living adjustment at the very lowest level. All these matters could be considered, within the constraints of the over-all 6 per cent and 5 per cent ceiling, through the normal collective bargaining system and not imposed on by the government on the public service. In this manner allowable increases could be less as one went up the income ladder. Obviously, increases could not be too great, except at the lower level, because the general 6 per cent and 5 per cent restraint ceiling must be respected. But in the case of the highest paid public servants—those earning $50,000 or more—salaries could be held down and perhaps even close to the existing levels. In a sense, such an approach applies the principle of the progressive income tax system by calling on the strongest among us to carry the heaviest load.

As the amendment at present before us and the amendments to be introduced later by our party later contemplate, the approach that I have in mind will help spread the sacrifice to be made in the name of restraint more evenly while preserving the cherished principle of collective bargaining. Rather than a scheme being imposed on the public service by the government, individual salary ranges and other matters such as health benefits—if consistent with the over-all objective of 6 per cent and 5 per cent limits—could be worked out following careful negotiations between both sides, instead of being imposed on one side by the other.

Of the 215,643 regular full-time employees of the federal government, which does not include employees of Crown corporations or other such agencies although they are also covered under Bill C-124, 13 per cent earn less than $15,000, about 40 per cent earn less that $20,000, while well over half—60 per cent to be exact—earn less than $25,000. In all, 75 per cent earn less than $30,000. That is not a lot of money.

These figures belie the widespread notion that public employees are highly paid. They are not. Most of them are struggling with the same kind of income-related pressures faced by virtually everyone else in society. The problem is particularly acute for women in the public service. While 39 per cent of the total number of men in this sector earn $23,000 or under, 79 per cent of the total of women earn $23,000 or under. In its present form, Bill C-124 will perpetuate inequities such as this.

My riding of Hillsborough, which includes the capital city of Prince Edward Island, Charlottetown, and the small villages and towns surrounding it—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A great part of the country.

Mr. McMillan: It is a great area, as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has rightly pointed out. There are many federal public employees in that riding in addition to provincial civil servants. I know many of them personally and others at least as acquaintances. My work as an MP requires me to work hand in hand with these people and their counterparts elsewhere in the Atlantic region, especially in regional head offices, and in Ottawa. My experience is that public employees are the most maligned group in society and no doubt partly due to their own deficiencies in the public relations area. They could be doing a great deal more than they are to present themselves as the hardworking, industrious and resourceful people they are in fact. Nevertheless, they are commonly perceived as being underworked, overpaid and too plentiful for all the good they do. However, the truth is that we in Canada have the best public service in the world, with the possible exception of Britain from which our public service has inherited its traditions of dedication and professionalism.

In my view, the extent to which the public service is taken for granted by Canadians is, in reality, a measure of how efficiently our public employees do their job; unobtrusively yet competently. By the same token, only when they are on strike, which is rare, do we sometimes realize how dependent we are on the services these fine people provide. Sure, there are exceptions, just as there are in any enterprise, be it public or private. Understandably, there will be more such underachievers in government, if government is the largest employer in a given community, just by virtue of their large presence in that community. But I know that, proportionately, government harbours as many diligent, competent and qualified employees as can be found in any field in the country. I defy anyone to demonstrate otherwise.

That, I think, is in the spirit of the motions that we are now debating at report stage of the debate on Bill C-124. Many people would be amazed to learn, as I have through my work, how effectively public employees actually perform, frequently well beyond the call of duty. By requiring public employees to bear the lion's share of the burden of the government's restraint program, instead of including them in an over-all package of wage and price restraint, sensitive to the low-income people in particular, the government is both reflecting and contributing to the conventional myth that those people are responsible for the double-digit inflation in the country. Nothing could be further from the truth. The blame for our inflation, the blame for our unemployment, the blame for our debased dollar, the blame for investment capital fleeing our country from coast to coast, rests squarely with the political mismanagers in the federal cabinet, especially the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who has been calling the shots for the last 14 years.

At the heart of the inflation problem, in particular, has been the government's 14-year spending spree which has seen government expenditures soar an incredible 630 per cent since the Prime Minister took office in 1968. The deficit of the federal government this year is several billion dollars more, probably as high as $7 billion more, than the total budget of the government in the Prime Minister's first year in office. Having increased its total spending this past year by some 20 per cent, having racked up a deficit of $19.6 billion in the current year alone, 80 per cent higher than forecast as recently as seven months earlier, the government now expects everyone, public servants and the general public alike, to settle for no more than 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases in their salaries.

Nothing else has contributed to inflationary pressures in Canada as much as has the government's overspending. That overspending is largely the result of the establishment of costly programs like metric which the public neither wants nor needs, as well as waste in the administration of programs which the public does want and does need. Little of the overexpenditure relates to bloated salaries of public employees or their numbers, except at the highest levels.

What we need is a resolve by the government, throughout the cabinet, to devise a total economic package, including low interest rates, to get people producing, selling and working again. Only when the one million unemployed in Canada are back in the labour force earning salaries, only when they are gainfully employed and paying income tax on those salaries, will we see a marked reduction in the federal deficit and in the multibillion dollar costs of our current unemployment insurance and welfare programs. The government should be attacking the unemployment problem in the country. Instead, it is attacking public employees whose formidable skills should be marshalled with those of the private sector in a real war against the serious economic crisis facing us all.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak in support of Bill C-124 and also in support of the motion before us, which I have not heard anyone discuss very much. It deals with allowing the CN and CP and other railway employees to be treated with equality since they are part of one national, industrial collective bargaining system across the country. I would like to give notice of the fact that this is the motion before the House. In general, my remarks pertain to CP employees, who are really included in Motion No. 4.

The bill itself is a very important piece of legislation, not so much for what it does, because it does not do a great deal, but because it is where we begin to restrict the growth of wage costs and some administrative prices. It is important for what it wants the country to do as an example, if we are successful in making the bill work. For the last several months I have heard hon. members on both sides saying that the government should resign, resign, resign, call an election, put a new government in power, and then all the problems would go away.

Mr. Friesen: Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. McRae: I have not heard any significant contribution from either party. Neither one has stated how it would go about changing this very difficult world we are in today if it were in power.

Mr. Taylor: No energy policy. No metrication.

Mr. McRae: It reminds me of a statement H. L. Menken made after he had spent a good deal of time at the Scopes trial. In reference to complex problems and simple answers, he made the statement "For every complex problem there is a solution that is simple, neat and wrong." The solutions that I find coming from the other side are simple, neat and wrong. For instance, we heard from hon. members opposite the first thing they would do if they were in power.

Mr. Deans: They are supporting you.

Mr. McRae: I do not want anyone to say I am not relating my remarks to the motion or the bill, but what I am saying is that the solution to our problems is very complex. The solution they would offer—

Mr. Crombie: —is simple.

Mr. McRae: Their simple solution, number one, is to get rid of the National Energy Program and tone down FIRA. They say that would solve all the problems. I cannot even remember if they had a second solution. Beyond that, there is really discussion about spending. However, they do not mention any programs. They talk about following Reaganomics. We will discuss that later, but basically they feel that the whole problem in the United States and the whole world stems from the National Energy Program and FIRA and that it would be solved if we would only get rid of the National Energy Program and trim FIRA, in one of the most innocuous operations possible.

Mr. Crombie: We are discussing Bill C-124.

Mr. McRae: If one asks members in the opposition what they would do about interest rates, why, they would do the same thing. Not long ago the Leader of the Opposition (Mr.

Clark) made the statement that he would do exactly the same thing with interest rates.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We would make them climb more equitably.

Mr. McRae: This particular bill is not simple or neat and it is not wrong. It would begin a recovery program in the country by doing one very significant thing. It would attempt to bring inflation down to a single-digit percentage, like 7 per cent or 8 per cent. It would start with salaries but it also embrace prices. We talk about Air Canada keeping their prices down and we discuss Bell prices.

• (1650)

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. McRae: I will be glad to permit a question at the end of my remarks. I am not sure I want to accept a question now. The hon. member has not heard my dissertation. Once he has, I will be glad to answer a question based on it. Therefore, we can come back to this question at the end.

What we are trying to do with this bill is to get ourselves to the point where the inflation rate in this country is brought down to 6 per cent or 7 per cent. Some say this bill will not do that. Certainly it will not. This bill is the government's start in that direction. If the government does not do this, then why would anyone else? One has to give an example, to make a start.

If, and I am hopeful this "if" will come true, we are successful in convincing other sectors of the Canadian economy that this is the right direction and wages, prices and inflation are brought down, at that time the 6 per cent and 7 per cent will be the cost of living. Therefore, public servants should not suffer any more than the rest of the population. This is a reasonable approach to this situation.

There is no simple single answer. That is what H. L. Menken was saying when he was dealing with the Scope trial. That is what a lot of economists are saying today. There is not one simple thing you can do quickly. You cannot just spend more, gut the National Energy Program and all your problems will be solved. This is a very complex and dangerous period internationally in terms of economics. The simple act of passing this bill will not really solve all the problems. It is an indication that we want to start solving the problems.

We on this side, and I am sure those on the other side, are concerned about the serious difficulty we have to face, high interest rates. There is a very definite relationship between high interest rates and the rate of inflation. The term "real interest" is the nominal interest rate minus the inflation rate. Traditionally that rate in terms of bank prime should be between 2 per cent and 3 per cent over an historical period of time. That rate is probably 7 or 8 per cent in the United States and 5 or 6 per cent in Canada. It varies depending on the inflation rate and, of course, changes in the interest rate.

Real interest rates are too high; no one says they are not. They should come down. In order to change interest rates significantly, we must bring down the inflation rate. If we get the inflation rate down to 6 or 7 per cent, then we can move. If the expectation is that it will stay down, we can move to considerably lower interest rates. That will have a tremendously stimulating effect on the economy.

This will not be accomplished by any simple means. It was very nice in the fifties and sixties when we could depend on Keynes. We could take some fiscal or monetary measures to stimulate the economy or slow it down, depending on the condition it was in. It was very simple and we could achieve considerable results. We were not always as successful as we might have been, but that was not because of Keynes. In most countries it was because the timing was off a bit.

That does not work any more. The failure of this to work, the reliance on simplistic answers, the simple need but wrong answers that we hear, show that it is that reliance that is wrong. There are some things we can begin to do, and this is one of them.

We often hear that the cause of the problem is government spending. As the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang) stated earlier, the country with the highest spending in relation to its gross national product is Japan, yet that country has the lowest inflation and interest rates of all industrial nations. There are many reasons which indicate that huge government deficits are not the basic problems that we are facing.

This year we are going to have a deficit of close to $20 billion. It might be a little lower or a shade higher, but it will be in that area. In November it was projected the deficit would be about $10.5 billion. It climbed very rapidly in the last eight months.

The reason for the climb is not an increase in government spending. There has been some increase. Eighty cents of every dollar of that increase in the deficit has been directly due to decreased government revenues. Twenty cents of that dollar is due to increased government expenditures, mostly caused by a world recession. It has been because of a decline in revenue. Most of the increased expenditures have been caused by a global recession. It is not a simple matter to deal with.

Government spending is not the major source of all of the problem. This government will spend approximately $90 billion in the next fiscal year. Only 20 per cent of that amount will be spent on the operation of government, the part this bill deals with, although we are dealing outside of the public sector when we deal with those areas under the Canada Labour Code, as indicated in this motion.

Only 20 per cent of government spending is for the operation of government; defence, the post office, and all other operations of government. The other 80 per cent is transferred to Canadians in one way or another either through the provinces, directly to Canadians through pensions, or in other ways. We should have a good debate in this House about where the money comes from, where it goes and whether that is the way it should be done, rather than a debate on the amount. Governments such as in Sweden and other countries transfer perhaps 50 per cent of their gross national product from one group to another. That is the debate we should be having. The amount of the transfer is not all that significant.

Again with regard to these simplicities we keep running into, I would like to compare our situation with that in the United States. Not long ago I was criticized for talking about the United States rather than Canada. The economy of this country for many reasons is tremendously dependent on the economy of the United States. One reason is the very large ownership factor. That was one of the reasons we brought in the National Energy Program, which the Tories would love to be rid of. Before that program was brough in, 75 per cent of our oil and gas resources were owned offshore, mostly by American companies. That was a very good reason why we brought in the national energy policy, and it is a very good reason to talk about the American economy and compare it with ours. I think that comparison is important.

• (1700)

One of the statements often made since the budget is that our deficit as a percentage of our gross national product is double the American deficit. That simply is not true. As a percentage of gross national product our deficit is about the same as the American deficit will be. There is a very small difference between the two deficits. The American deficit is $100 billion; we can probably say that is a close estimate, but the American deficit will not be $100 billion in the fiscal year coming up, it will be in the area of $160 billion to $170 billion. The total deficits of both countries will be approximately the same in terms of gross national product. Sometimes we use the ten to one ratio. The ten to one ratio is not adequate because our gross national product is larger than that of the United States. The ten to one ratio does not quite work. However, the deficits of the two countries are very, very similar.

One of the interesting things about the government's deficit is the deficit as a function of savings. The total Canadian gross national product will be about $360 billion in the current fiscal year. The government deficit of $20 billion represents about 5.1 per cent of the total gross national product. At the same time, Canadians have a gross capital formation—savings—in the order of 25 per cent of our gross national product.

I obviously do not like simplicity in this regard, but let me make a simple comparison. A family which spends something in the order of $2,000 more than it earns but actually saves $9,000 in another way is not in bad shape. Basically speaking, if we look at the Canadian economy and see the deficit at $20 billion but our gross capital formation at $90 billion, then we do not see that deficit as being so serious that we cannot live with it. That represents something like 21 per cent or 22 per cent of capital formation. In the United States the figure is closer to 30 per cent. Canadian problems in this respect are not more serious than American problems. They are problems, however, in terms of inflation.

Our inflation rate is still a good deal higher than the American inflation rate. It is probably three or four percentage points higher. It is hard to tell because the American rate has been fluctuating quite a bit in the past couple of months. The American rate has been up considerably, but one can assume about a 4 per cent to 5 per cent difference in the rates. That is the problem this bill and this motion attempt to ease so that we can get interest rates down.

In this comparison there is one area on which we have not spent much time. I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is one who can accept a lot of praise for her efforts in this respect. As a country we have not cut back significantly—we have not really cut back at all—the amount of money we provide for social services. There has been a very small cut in the old age pension. It is not really a cut; it is a reduction of the increase to 6 per cent for people who presumably have sufficient funds. It is not a cut for those who do not.

I would like to relate a short story about the situation in the United States to give some idea of what is happening there. In the middle of June President Reagan went to Texas and spoke at a testimonial dinner for the governor of Texas. Thirty-five hundred people came out to that testimonial dinner to hear their president, and each laid out $1,000 a plate for this dinner. In the same week that those 3,500 Americans—from Texas, mostly—laid out $1,000 each for a meal, the state of Texas put out a brochure indicating that people should not move to that state because there was a high unemployment rate in the south, particularly in Texas, because with no national energy program the oil industry was in serious trouble throughout the United States. That very week the state of Texas put out a brochure which said that people on welfare would get monthly incomes of $32 for food stamps and an additional $32. That is in a country where 3,500 people are able to lay out $1,000 each for a single meal.

The Government of Canada has not at any stage forgotten its social responsibilities. This government has not reduced expenditures for health, welfare and so forth. We are not cutting these things back. I noted that the social council gave some praise to the government for not doing that. I think that is one of the fundamental differences in the two countries. If this recession becomes worse, the base for any kind of recovery will be the fact that we are funnelling out money for unemployment insurance benefits, solving social problems and making sure people have some money to buy goods.

I could go into much more detail on the American scene than I have done. I am very much afraid that base is disappearing in the United States.

Hon. members opposite offer simple solutions to our problems. As Menken says, they look at a complex problem and come up with a simple, neat, wrong answer. I say this bill is a beginning. It is with this bill that we start to come together as Canadians to reduce our inflation. That is one step. There have to be many steps to solve the problems this country and the rest of the world face.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I can put a question to the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae). The hon. member supports the government's proposal to limit wage increases in the next two years to 6 per cent and 5 per cent and suggests that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am not certain whether the hon. member is rising on a point of order or whether he rises to enter the debate. May I inquire whether the hon. member rises on a point of order?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask a question. I wonder if the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan would permit me to ask him a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thought it might be that. That is why I interrupted the hon. member. The time of the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae) has expired. Consequently, in keeping with our precedents it is necessary for the Chair to seek the unanimous consent of the House in order that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) might put a question to the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is supporting the government's proposal that wage and salary increases for public servants in the next two years be limited to 6 per cent and 5 per cent, and suggests that if this were done, along with other things, the rate of inflation could be reduced to 6 per cent. I would like to ask the hon. member how he can argue that the rate of inflation might be brought down to 6 per cent when it is government policy, through an agreement between the Government of Canada and the producing provinces, that the price of energy will go up between July 1 of this year and July 1 of next year by over 30 per cent. That means the cost of transportation, the cost of heating a home, the cost of travelling by car, bus or air must go up. The cost of producing food will go up substantially because of fuel prices. Does the hon. member really believe that the cost of living will be brought down to 6 per cent? Is it not more likely it will be 9 or 10 per cent this time next year?

• (1710)

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked a very serious question. If I had had another ten minutes I would have dealt with it. We have a strange situation in the country where one of the large contributing factors to inflation is the rising cost of energy. We have an agreement that our energy prices will go to 75 per cent of world price. At present our price is considerably below world price; it is coming down but our price is going up.

I suggest to the hon. member that if we were to raise our energy price to 75 per cent of world price tomorrow, our inflation would start coming down. It is a ridiculous situation but that is exactly what would happen. The inflation rate would descend and the expectations of higher inflation would also descend.

I think we can accept the fact that three or four percentage points of inflation will still be caused by energy prices. I do not see how we can get around that because of the rather ridiculous situation we are in that other countries are not, since our price is so far below world price.

I hope the government will renegotiate the agreement with Alberta and limit this at some point. It may mean that the costs of operating government may increase because the amount of transfers may have to increase. If government revenues decrease then we may have to find some other tax sources.

I think we have to understand that if we got 75 to per cent of world price for our energy tomorrow, our inflation rate would decline. It is ridiculous but that is the situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians must be wondering why the House has been sitting practically all summer. Well, I hope they realize that the present government is doing everything it possibly can to remedy the present economic situation.

Obviously, Bill C-124 is not a panacea. In any case, Mr. Speaker, I do not think any parliament, whether here in Canada or anywhere else in the world, has ever been able to come up with the ideal solution to all our ills. We do not claim that this measure is going to be effective on all counts but, as I said before, none of the laws passed by the world's parliaments has ever been perfect. Take old age security, for instance. If we had wanted to be absolutely fair, there are millionaires who certainly do not need the pension and there are other people who need it very badly, so it is impossible to come up with a measure that will please everyone.

Of course, my colleagues opposite—and I am not surprised, since they are fond of criticizing—are opposed to this bill and have said so during the hours this House has been considering this legislation. On the other hand, they have been unable to come up with any tangible solutions. These people are fence-sitters, because they are trying to please everybody. However, there comes a time, Mr. Speaker, when a responsible government must make decisions that, though not necessarily attractive to everyone, are aimed at correcting certain situations. Of course, the New Democratic Party especially is fiercely opposed to this measure to restrict wage increases. We must not forget, however—and I think everyone will agree, the members of the New Democratic Party as well—that the main problem, and this is nothing new, the main problem is, how are we going to fight inflation? We are also agreed that there is a price to pay if we want to fight inflation. And we know that this price is being paid today by the people who are being laid off: the last to be hired are the first to be fired. This price is also being paid by businessmen who are faced with high interest rates and are daily running the risk of losing their shirt. So there is a price to pay, and these are the people who are now paying the price for bringing inflation down to more rational proportions. So what do we do with the public service where people have practically absolute job security? Is the government supposed to go on handing out wage increases of up to 11 or 12 per cent and let these people who have job security take advantage of the fact that others have to pay the price for bringing inflation down to more rational proportions? Should we let them be a burden to the unemployed and to businessmen who are going bankrupt? Is the government supposed to turn around and give more to people with job security? Is it going to say, "Take your wage increase and take advantage of the fact that others are being squeezed dry in order to reduce inflation? Mr. Speaker, I feel that a Liberal government that has always been proud of the fact that the Liberal Party stands for justice, equity and sharing, would have failed in its duty to the country had it done so.

The reason why Canadians keep re-electing Liberal governments is that the Liberal Party stands up for everyone, for the rich and the poor and the middle class. It stands for justice. That is why we cannot afford to have something like this happen. Of course, if the economy were in very good shape, we certainly would not bother putting restrictions on wage increases. Unfortunately, it is like Petula Clark says in her song: Everyone wants to go to heaven but nobody wants to die! Everybody realizes that these are difficult times, but when they are asked to do their bit, they always want the other person to make the effort.

Of course, we must start somewhere. The New Democratic Party members opposite are saying that if we want to control wages, we should control prices as well. It sounds great, but we must not forget that we are living in a free enterprise and competitive society where prices practically control themselves. My colleagues opposite seem to think this is ridiculous. Well, if a perfect solution could be found, I would be the first to look for it. There is some talk of controlling prices; now, I am not necessarily against price controls, on the contrary. If there were a scientifically proven and effective way to control prices, I would be the first to try it. Unfortunately, introduce price controls and you open up a whole can of worms. And I mean it, Mr. Speaker. For instance, people are complaining that CMHC housing is going up, and during question period we are constantly being urged to control the price of homes and control rents to keep increases at 6 per cent or less.

I would like to remind these people that Canada is a trading country and that CMHC is in the housing business. Of course we could promise not to raise the price of houses by more than 6 per cent, even if that meant we would have the largest deficit ever. We cannot go bankrupt since we are the government. What I mean is, we are competing with the people in the private sector. What is going to happen? We are going to put these people out of business. They will not be able to survive if the government gives them unfair competition. It is unfair because as a government we can absorb deficits indefinitely, but how can we expect the small entrepreneur, who is already losing money if he only raises prices by 9 or 10 per cent, to stay in business if he is restricted to 6 per cent? We have to remember that sort of thing. It sounds wonderful, this clamouring for price controls as well as wage controls, but it is not as easy as it sounds.

Mr. Speaker, I wish Canadians, and not just the people opposite, but Canadians in general, would give some serious thought to what the consequences would be if the government were to impose price controls in all areas. Obviously, if all our businesses were to go bankrupt as a result of excessive controls—it is not that I like to see companies making exorbitant profits, certainly not—but if price controls are excessive, we may be causing companies to go bankrupt. I really doubt that would be in the interest of Canadian workers.

I think that, generally speaking Canadians realize that a start has to be made somewhere, and we on the government side have decided to set an example and start putting our own house in order. We are often accused of minding everybody's business except our own, Mr. Speaker, but I think most governments have this habit of minding other people's business. But this time, it is our business, and it is up to the government to do something about it. The government is responsible for the public service and all Crown corporations, and therefore, in a situation like the one existing today, the government must act. Most public servants agree wholeheartedly with this measure. Of course, Mr. McDermott and the New Democratic Party and cohorts do not agree, but most public servants do. They know perfectly well that this is not a punitive measure, it is anything but, and it is not because we want to impose anything on anyone or because we resent anyone but, as I mentioned earlier, Mr. Speaker, it would be absolutely unfair in our present society for people to be laid off while others enjoy absolute job security and are being granted more money.

Mr. Speaker, if I were a public servant and were earning $12,000 or $15,000 a year, in the circumstances I would rather have my salary increase restricted to 6 per cent than get my 11 per cent increase and be obliged to go on unemployment insurance or welfare. So I want to make it quite clear to all public servants that this is not a punitive measure, on the contrary. We realize that we are working closely with public servants, some of whom are our employees, and we want to treat them with dignity and respect. Of course, some people are going to be rather pleased because like the politicians, the bureaucracy is not necessarily well loved, and it was Balzac who said that the bureaucracy was a monster administered by pygmies. In fact, Mr. Speaker, although many Canadians may see the bureaucracy as a monster, these people often work, without recognition, to enhance the well-being of the entire population. So, these people understand perfectly our position and our reasons for taking this action.

Mr. Speaker, a start had to be made somewhere, and everyone knows that here in Canada we have had some very good and prosperous years, and we have lived very well. Now we are going through a difficult period, and people should realize that they will have to make an effort to change their lifestyle. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues will go outside to talk if they are not too much in a hurry; if they really want to talk maybe they could talk outside, it is a bit disturbing, Mr. Speaker, so I would say that a country's economic ups and downs are very similar to the human life or cycle, also just like in the bush: when there is a population explosion of certain animals and then there is an epidemic and they die and the situation goes back to normal. It is about the same in an economy. In good years, businessmen make more profits, they are more generous when business is good and give more substantial wage increases until they realize that they can no longer do so. The economy cannot always follow an upward trend. At some point, you have to face the facts, and this is what happens then.

We have to realize that we may have expected a bit too much. We have a population of 24 million people in Canada and there are 28 million credit cards in circulation. It will give food for thought to many people to know that 28 million credit cards are in circulation and that we have a debt of $200,000 per capita, for every one of our 24 million people, and that the child who is born today has a debt of $200,000. This is the federal, provincial, municipal and corporate debt. It amounts to $200,000 per capita.

I would like to know what opposition members believe would be a normal, acceptable debt for a country like ours. Of course, they will suggest something else because, generally speaking, members of the opposition wait to see what we are about to suggest. They like to play cat and mouse. As soon as we speak up to suggest something, they are against it. If we had suggested something else or made an alternative proposal, they would have recommended the very thing to which they are now opposed. It is obvious that the members opposite have no really constructive proposals to make, but they still stay in the House and delay passage of this bill without reason.

Mr. Speaker, we in the government can always intervene, but each time we do, it is an artificial intervention. We can only postpone the crunch and Canadians are beginning to understand it. Canadians throughout the country are now realizing that each time governments intervene by granting a subsidy here and a subsidy there to help such or such a company to remain in business, to prevent it from going into receivership or from closing its doors and to save jobs, it is a good thing for that specific company, but it is unfair to another one which is well managed. Every time the federal or provincial governments intervene, their intervention is artificial. Canadians generally must apply self-discipline. There are limits to the extent to which governments can put bread in the mouths of each individual. We shall now have to realize that we have had good years and that we must now make an effort and lower the thermostat by one degree if need be to make both ends meet. We shall have to work intelligently, the way it is being done now in European countries.

In the past, Canadian businessmen, for instance, wanted to become millionaires within two years. This is all very well if you can afford it. It does not work like that in Europe. A businessman must stand behind his counter for years. Those are the facts! Workers will also have to be a bit more productive. Employers and businessmen will have to reduce their expenses.

I was in business myself and there were times when money was scarce and I had to get rid of certain items. I was sorry to do so because I thought, "Well, this pickup is nearly paid for and I have to sell it." However, that is what it means to go through a difficult period. Mr. Speaker, I know that the House will pass Bill C-124 this evening and that Canadians in general will understand exactly our position and our decision and I am certain that it will benefit the Canadian economy.

• (1730)

[English]

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I am certain that Bill C-124 which is before us today will be seen by history as an injust bill, as a hollow gesture at fighting inflation. It will be seen as a bill which attempted to make scapegoats of public employees and other working people in Canada for the disastrous economic policies pursued by the government. It will be seen as a bill through which the government, cheered on by Conservative pretenders in opposition, deliberately sparked a confrontation with labour to deflect attention from the destructive impact of high interest rates, rapidly increasing energy costs, and monopoly control of the marketplace in the Canadian economy. Obviously my colleagues in this party and I stand opposed to the bill. The government has forced it upon the people of Canada and we have no intention of letting it slip by without doing everything in our power to attack the inequities of this contemptible piece of legislation and to support whatever constructive amendments are proposed.

My friends to the right, the Tories, seem to be stumbling over themselves to help the government sell this PR campaign. It is a campaign to try to convince Canadians that attacking collective bargaining and the incomes of working people is what is needed to fight inflation. The government is spoiling for a fight with labour to convince Canadians that it is doing something about the economic crisis. The Tories over here are right behind them, trying to limit the ability of working people to fight back within the realm of the law. Unlike the Conservatives, I do not support attacking the living standards of a typist in Winnipeg who earns $11,353 per year, or the people working in government hospitals who earn only $11,055 per year, in order to encourage Ian Sinclair and his blue chip cronies to take advantage of the 6 per cent world of recovery. That is what the bill is intended to do. Neither do I support an attack on the collective bargaining rights of working people in Canada in order to deflect attention from the government's ruinous economic policies.

The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) has moved a number of amendments, seeking to reintroduce real collective bargaining in the bill. The effect of his amendments is to return to those people covered under the bill the right, according to the Canada Labour Code or the Public Service Staff Relations Act, to negotiate a collective agreement and the right to choose between arbitration and strike action to solve disputes which may arise in negotiations. These amendments are constructive ones. They restore not just the appearance of collective bargaining but the very substance of it.

The announcement last Thursday by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) that collective bargaining would soon be permitted in the 6 per cent world of relapse was a crafty piece of public relations, but as we have seen, it really lacks the substance to deal with the charge that the government is undermining collective bargaining in Canada. With limits of 6 per cent and 5 per cent on all forms of pay, benefits and prerequisites, there is very little room for negotiation. All the President of the Treasury Board has given the people of the public service is the privilege of negotiating how their standard of living and working conditions will deteriorate, and then only if the government decides to permit negotiations.

According to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), that little statement by the President of the Treasury Board will go a long way toward quelling Tory opposition to the bill. When we scratch the surface, we find that there is really not much Tory opposition to wage controls. Just like their opposition to government economic mismanagement, the Tory opposition to wage controls is a bit of a paper tiger. There is very little to differentiate the Liberals from the Tories in respect of collective bargaining or their remedies for high interest rates, high unemployment and falling productivity in Canada. The Liberals and the Tories want to reintroduce the appearance of collective bargaining rights in the federal public service. That is all it is—the appearance of collective bargaing.

There is precious little for women working for the government who look forward to decent maternity leave provisions. There is precious little for those public service employees nearing retirement who hope for reconsideration of the restraint which will be imposed on their pension incomes. There is nothing for those people hoping for a return to their right to collective bargaining.

What is the purpose of this bill? When he introduced it four weeks ago, the President of the Treasury Board moaned about the 25 per cent to 30 per cent of our productive capacity standing idle. He complained about the one and one-quarter million people unable to find work, and he gnashed his teeth over the businesses and consumers staggering under high interest rates. We must improve our production, he said; and I cannot think of anyone who would disagree with him. Our economy is being ravaged by this recession-cum-depression. It is a dismal picture and it is a picture that we in this corner have been trying to get the government to see for a long time.

We have no doubt it is the ruinous fiscal and monetary policies of this government and the Bank of Canada which have brought this recession upon the heads of Canadians, and the government knows that. It has known that would happen all along. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself has admitted that the object of his government's economic policies is to scare the wits out of Canadians with high unemployment, to reduce their demands on the Canadian economy; and it worked, it did scare the wits out of Canadians, but the only result has been more unemployment, less production and no relief from inflation.

Surely the Liberals cannot be surprised that Canada is now in the grips of a severe recession. They have brought it on intentionally to fight inflation. The Liberal Party, the government of this country, no less than the Tories who snap at their heels, has embraced the monetarist economic policies which are squeezing the life out of western economies everywhere.

The budget introduced in this House on June 28 was a crushing disappointment to the people of Canada. It was a prescription for social chaos and economic disaster. It is another chapter in the decade of Liberal and Conservative economic mismanagement since this crisis began in 1973. This budget held little for Canadians except the same bankrupt principles of monetarism, spiced with a pinch of the voodoo remedies of supply side economics.

The June 28 budget could have been the turning point at which the government abandoned the Conservative economic doctrine of Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher and the Conservative Party of Canada. The government could have turned its back on the unjust economic schemes whose basic tenet is to take from the poor and give to the rich, hoping the rich will be enticed to invest in a more prosperous society. The government could have turned its back on this, but it did not. Instead it gave Canadians a repudiation of the principles of collective bargaining combined with another squeeze on the already falling incomes of ordinary Canadians. It gave Canadians pension cuts and further cutbacks in social services, and so as to sell it the government went scrambling to come up with what it thinks are catchy phrases like solidarity and sharing and a crusade on inflation and the 6 per cent world of recovery.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was preparing his budget he brought in what The Toronto Star called an old Liberal warhorse to advise him on the revolution of semantics. A revolution of semantics, what a lovely phrase! That is the magic that the Liberals expected to sell this thing they call the plan for recovery. For a party that has not had a new idea in ten years I suppose the best thing that they could come up with is a revolution in semantics.

However, I think the Minister of Finance did not quite need to retain an adviser to stage this revolution. At much less cost and with a good deal more honesty he could have borrowed a phrase or two from the 1979 Conservative budget. No less than the Tories, the Liberals' only remedy for the economic crisis is the short-term pain for long-term gain or rather, to be more honest, it should be short-term gain for long-term pain.

That is what this budget and Bill C-124 are all about: long-term pain for short-term gain. But it is not the $500,000 a year captains of industry and finance who will be hurting; it is the people of this country who work for the government and, after them, those working in the private sector. They are the ones being asked to be the foot soldiers in the government's crusade against inflation. Not only is their real income to be cut over the next two years, but with the limitations imposed on their right to bargain collectively, their working conditions as well could well deteriorate, while they have little power to demand improvements.

I can see no sense in attacking the wages of working people, wages which have been falling against the cost of living. What makes even less sense is to attack the right to collective bargaining as part of a crusade against inflation. And whether or not the government decides to permit its employees to request negotiations on some parts of their contracts, this bill clearly attacks ferociously their right to collective bargaining under the guise of wage restraint. It is here that the government's logic is most transparent. Attacking collective bargaining may be good sport in the corporate board rooms but in itself the right to bargain collectively really has no impact on inflation.

Last year my party leader received an internal government document spelling out how the government would deal with the economic crisis. Let me quote a paragraph from it. It reads:

> A program of consultation and public relations aimed at changing public attitudes and expectations would be useful, even though the main advantage of the program would be that it would enable the government to be seen doing something about inflation and to lay part of the blame for inflation on the private sector.

So that is what the government is doing now. But it is doing so under the rubric of wage controls, laying the blame for inflation not so much on the private sector as on the working people of this country. But even that same document recognizes that it is not wages which are fuelling inflation. That document says this, and I quote again:

> We are not currently facing wagedriven inflation such as we were in 1975, instead real wages have fallen for four consecutive years.

That document was written last year. Wages have now fallen for five consecutive years. If wages are not the cause of inflation, and the government apparently recognizes that, can a 6 per cent world of recovery really be an honest attack on inflation? I think not.

Wage controls will not bring inflation down; they will not put people back to work. All they will do is to provoke fresh fights between government and organized labour. Union bashing is a popular avocation among some of Canada's editorial writers and conservative economic think tanks such as the Fraser Institute. With its 6 per cent world of recovery, the Liberal government is trying to woo support from the Conservatives. It is trying to show Conservative supporters it can be every bit as neanderthal, economically, as the Tories can.

The last time Canadians had a bout with wage controls was from October 1975 to April 1978. Canadians were told that controls were absolutely essential to get the economy off the rocks. They were to be part of a concerted attack on inflation that would put an end to spiralling prices and give the economy a period of stability during which the government promised to do something about unemployment. After 30 months of controls, what did the government accomplish?

When controls were introduced, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) predicted they would bring the inflation rate, which was at 10.6 per cent, down to 4 per cent by 1978. Did they do that? We all know they did not. The rate of inflation in 1978 was not 4 per cent at all, it was 9 per cent. From 1975 to 1978, prices in the country rose by 38.9 per cent, but the control guidelines limited wage increases to only 19 per cent.

What about unemployment? In October, 1975, when controls were introduced, the federal unemployment rate in this country was 7.2 per cent. After 30 months of supposed stability during which the government said it would do something about unemployment, the unemployment rate actually increased to 8.6 per cent. That has to be a discouraging record for the proponents of wage controls, for the Liberals across the floor and for the Conservatives on my right.

The Canadian economy does not need restraint to get back on track. It does not need an attack on collective bargaining. It needs a major shift in economic planning by the government of this country.

Whether the government of this country is formed by Liberals or Conservatives, the only solution Canadians can expect is more long-term pain for short-term gain. The Conservatives are fond of accusing this party of being in collusion with this government, but the record of the House shows that it is the Conservatives who have supported this government's policies most often by votes in this very House. If there is an alliance brewing in this country, it is between the two parties of big business. When it comes to economic planning, the only difference between the two is a difference in style.

Was it not the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who said that the wage controls proposed in the June 28 budget were a step in the right direction? Was it not the member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), after accusing the government of being adrift, who admitted that the Tories would not get elected if they now told the public what they would do if they were in government?

What kind of remedy does this Liberal-Tory alliance prescribe for the Canadian economy? They have made the war on inflation their number one priority and have bravely accepted the high and rising levels of unemployment and the farm and small business bankruptcies as the cost of licking inflation. To increase productivity in Canada, they want to strangle the economy with high interest rates, more unemployment and low productivity.

If that is not enough, they want to strangle the economy further by reducing domestic consumption through the imposition of wage controls and the deindexation of pensions. In both cases their solution rests on a fundamental redistribution of income away from working people and senior citizens, away from farmers and fishermen and from small businesses to the already rich and powerful.

I think I have made it clear that we find the economic solutions put forward in this bill totally lacking. We find the bill which we are debating today to be unjust. It is a charade designed to hoodwink Canadians into believing the government is doing something positive about the economy. The amendments which we proposed and for which we are asking support of the House later this evening, would only address some of the excesses of Bill C-124. While we believe these amendments should be accepted, we cannot accept the plan for economic recovery that makes working people scapegoats of a government that is trying to get us to believe its hype about a crusade on inflation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED DISPOSITION OF BILL RESPECTING SEXUAL OFFENCES

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to a very important matter about which I would like some information. There has been a disposition among members from all three parties to deal with legislation which would overhaul Canada's rape laws. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) will know, we have been working very hard in the Justice Committee to bring forward legislation in this area. Canadian women have waited far too long for these overdue changes.

I want to ask the Minister of Justice, if I may, whether there is a disposition on the part of the government to move forward on this important matter because we, on our part, are prepared to proceed at six o'clock with a two-hour debate to deal with this very important legislation.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I agree with what the hon. member just said. We have worked for many months on this bill. We had many sessions last week that went late into the night. We have made an agreement that there will be a new bill to deal with the change in the rape laws of Canada and the child abduction laws. There was a disposition among the official representatives of the three parties to pass it between six o'clock and eight o'clock.

Further to that, in discussions this afternoon which we had with the two spokesmen of the opposition parties, we agreed to some amendments that will be acceptable to all of us. I could not accept these amendments in the committee because the drafting came quite late. We have now found some new wording, and there is a proposed agreement that two amendments per party will be allowed in order to permit some flexibility to all of us.

That was the understanding which we had. I am told by the House leader—I hope it is not true—that unfortunately the official opposition apparently no longer wants to agree to that. Of course I am very sorry about this because some of the members of the opposition parties have worked very hard on it and were very keen. They even twisted my arm somewhat, but now they cannot twist the arm of their own party. It is a sad state for a party which wants to form the government some day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I assume the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) is rising on the same point of order.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am simply prepared to say that we acknowledge the many months of effort which the committee has put into making an attempt to reach some consensus with respect to what would go in the bill. But the document which I have in my hand is Bill C-"blank" which will be coming before the House for the first time when it is introduced. The bill is dated today. This is the third printed document that was submitted to the committee and will ultimately be submitted to the House for consideration.

The justice and legal critic for the official opposition has taken the position on many occasions that it is the government's responsibility to bring in a bill to the House so as to let us know what we are up against. As far as we are concerned, we are prepared to discuss the bill whenever the minister is prepared to present it to the House for consideration.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I want to see the bill proceeded with. While we were prepared, and continue to be prepared, to give the unanimous consent necessary to allow the bill to proceed through all stages during a two-hour period this evening, we would also be prepared to do likewise tomorrow evening. We understood that the bill would be coming forward in the state that it is currently in. We were not taken by surprise; I do not think anyone was taken by surprise.

I recognize that it is not the normal practice for the House of Commons to receive a bill on the same day on which it is dealt with through all stages, but I also recognize that there is a great deal of demand from those most affected by it in the public, and they have made it clear that they would like to see the bill proceeded with and not delayed. With that in mind, we were prepared, and continue to be prepared, to deal with this bill.

Since there seems to be some dispute about proceeding with it, I would suggest that perhaps the prudent thing to do would be to delay until tomorrow at six o'clock. We should try between now and then to come to an agreement between the various members of the House to see if the matter can proceed tomorrow before the adjournment as we have already determined should occur.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, all members agree about tomorrow night. We will certainly consider that. I am disappointed because I thought we had agreed for six o'clock. However, I see that the official opposition wants additional time to get its act together. Well, so much the better if they can march to the same tune tomorrow between six and eight o'clock. We will certainly consider that very seriously. The difficulty we are facing is that the Senate has already begun its preliminary study of the bill and I think that the official opposition will have to tell the Progressive Conservative Senate leader to toe the line because I think he does not see it quite that way. So, tomorrow between six and eight o'clock. I would certainly be in favour of that, but we shall see if the opposition can rally its members to reach an agreement, such as we on this side have come to after concerted efforts. I see that even the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) agrees with me. Since he does, Mr. Speaker, that creates a precedent of which we should take full advantage.

Mr. Lawrence: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Hon. members always have the right to be aware of and to make use of the Standing Orders. I do not think it would be in order for the Chair not to see the clock much longer. Standing Orders require that the Chair recognize the clock. In an attempt to balance the interests of the House, if an hon. member wishes to put a motion on the floor which could be dealt with, then perhaps the Chair's duty would be to not see the clock. But I want to warn hon. members that there are some who may call upon the Chair to apply the Standing Orders, and the time is approaching. In order to pursue the matter, I will—

Mr. Pinard: Six o'clock!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize—

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I see that we have reached an agreement with the NDP, but we might have an agreement with the Tories later.

Mr. Crosby: Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. Pinard: The Conservatives. Obviously the Tory member does not agree that we sit between 6 p.m. and 8 p.m. to deal with that bill. I will therefore consult with the House leaders later today or tomorrow but, for the time being, I think that our time is being wasted. So I call it six o'clock.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, may I ask either the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) or the House leader a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair has no choice now. One hon. member has called it six o'clock. I would have recognized the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland but—

Mr. Lawrence: I think you are putting his rights ahead of mine.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Well, then, I will ask hon. members to—

Mr. Deans: Would you guys stop fighting?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I would ask hon. members to extend a certain courtesy to the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland who, after all, was on his feet prior to six o'clock. I will then recognize the time as being six o'clock.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my point in rising was merely to ask a question. The Minister of Justice has indicated that a brand new bill is available to hon. members of the House with respect to the whole question we are discussing. Most hon. members who have asked for a copy of that bill have not been able to get a copy. The second point is that with no new bill before us, the Minister of Justice then came along and said, within the last ten minutes, that he has agreed to new amendments which none of us has seen. My question to the Minister of Justice, if he were still in the House and had not been rude enough to leave, would simply have been: when will we see the amended bills—plural—and the amendments to which he referred so that we could properly discuss them?

An hon. Member: Your critic has it.

Mr. Chrétien: I am here, I am here!

Mr. Lawrence: Where have you been for the last year and a half?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The Chair extended a particular courtesy to the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, with the consent of hon. members, I thought. I will now make a ruling. Because it was a question by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, the Chair will not extend further consideration except to the Minister of Justice, and following that the Chair will call it six o'clock, unless there is unanimous consent to proceed otherwise.

Mr. Chrétien: I just said that the amendments have been given to the critic of the party opposite, the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid), and we discussed the matter with him after two o'clock. He knows all the amendments I have been willing to accept. He proposed one amendment to us. I think that we have agreed to proceed with it. The NDP have also proposed some amendments. So for those who are interested in the bill and who have been present in committee, there were some informal discussions. All the information is in the hands of the critic of the official opposition and it is for him to communicate it. It was agreed that the bill was to be tabled for first reading in the House by unanimous consent. I cannot table it because the matter is in the hands of the opposition and there is no more deal. When there is a deal, it will be tabled.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): May I suggest, with great respect to any hon. member who seeks the floor on a point of order, that it is now six minutes after six o'clock. Accordingly, I call it six o'clock and do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.06 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and Motion No. 4 (Mr. Murphy).

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. When the House took recess at six o'clock, the Chair had given the floor to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for dinner, I was about to tell the House how pleased I was to take part in this debate in early August in a session that will certainly turn out to be the longest ever. I want to say why I feel that it is our duty as parliamentarians to be here at the very time, when hundreds of Canadians have an opportunity to come and follow our proceedings and see just how seriously all parties in the House deal with the economic issue. I think that all Canadians fully realize that exceptional measures must be taken if we are to come to grips with the crisis that is currently undermining the country. Within the parameters of this debate on Bill C-124, I think we must warn all Canadians not to be taken in by such prophets as those of the New Democratic Party who claim to have magic and easy solutions. These are hardly times when irresponsibility, complacency and particularly petty politics are acceptable. I would suggest that the times we are going through are too important for the 1,250,000 idle Canadians who can only hope and entertain the thought that their government does not forget them. The magic solutions advocated by the New Democratic Party simply do not wash in economics or in sociology because, if we were to endorse their theory, everything would be a cinch, we would simply spend more money.

They fail to say where the money would be coming from but, as far as they are concerned, the way out is to spend more money. We heard them during the sittings of the committee when they claimed that the solution is not to cut back the salaries of the public servants, but to give them more money to enable them to spend and keep the economy rolling. If we were to do that, we would find ourselves in a situation where the Canadian people would have to pay a very steep price for a small minority, which happens to be among those who enjoy the best protection in the country. The real issue is that the time may not have come yet for the New Democratic Party to pay its debts to the unions that provide its financing. It would be better to let those unions realize the seriousness of the crisis and enable them to join the collective effort aimed at restoring in Canada an acceptable and profitable level of economic activity for all Canadians. There is no simple formula to curb inflation. To be here today and propose a—

• (2010)

An hon. Member: And the high interest rates?

Mr. Lapierre: If you will remain silent, I will talk about high interest rates later on. I did not interrupt you when you had the floor. Mr. Speaker, we all wish for a higher standard of living, we would all like to see Canadians live in a world of opulence, but the fact is that the standard of living is related to individual responsibility. We often have misconceptions about our wealth. People think that we are going to pull through this crisis because Canada is a wealthy country and that nobody will have to make personal sacrifices, but the reality is something else again. We have been deluding ourselves for the past five, six, seven or eight years by telling one another that the public coffers were bottomless. Today we are faced with the sad reality: Canadians can no longer contribute as generously as in the past to government programs. They simply cannot pay too many taxes and yet, at the same time, they expect the government to come up with solutions. Those who now bear the brunt of the economic crisis are mainly young people and women who make up the majority of the unemployed. They are also businessmen on the brink of bankruptcy because they cannot compete any longer on some markets.

It seems to me that if we went along with what the New Democratic Party is suggesting, the rest of the people would suffer, while unionized civil servants would be protected. It seems to me also that the Canadian people now have neither the means nor the desire to protect anybody. What they want is economic leadership. They want their government and all its elected representatives to lead the way. They rely on firmness and a sincere desire to end the crisis once and for all and to wrestle to the ground this inflation which would destroy us all sooner or later. When Mr. Karl Beigie appeared before our committee, he gave three causes for inflation. He mentioned, of course, that the main cause is increased costs. It is a fact that energy costs have increased tremendously over the past ten years.

Labour costs have increased as well, and caught in a vicious circle, we say, "Because of the higher cost of living, give us more money without bothering about productivity!" And whenever we get an automatic pay increase of 12 or 13 per cent, does it really reflect an increase in productivity? And we realize that in the past few years in Canada, in spite of significant pay increases in every sector of the economy, there has been no corresponding rise in productivity; in fact, productivity has stagnated. Mr. Beigie felt also that the Canadian dollar in the 50's had been overvalued, although other economists may feel differently; yet, in his view and as he sees economic reality, from the moment the Canadian dollar found its true value, the cost of imported goods increased accordingly and fed inflation. We often hear people say that the value of the Canadian dollar should be set in such a way that it is worth one dollar to Canadians buying on the domestic market. A dollar is always worth a dollar, but because of the great many imports we buy—we have become more sophisticated customers, we appreciate imported and choice cheeses and other similar products—we are, as I said, sophisticated consumers, and this also feeds inflation, because our dollar is worth 80 cents U.S. and we import a tremendous amount of goods, this causes costs to rise.

Mr. Beigie referred also to a new phenomenon, namely, state control over increasingly larger areas of the economy. Under popular pressure, probably with the best intentions in the world, governments have taken an active part in the marketplace, have become involved in dozens of social and economic programs of every shape and form which are becoming increasingly costly for the Canadian taxpayer and the Canadian economy as a whole. We have also contributed to the spiralling increase in the cost of living by individually and collectively deciding to protect ourselves against it by indexing social benefits to the cost of living; so, we have made monsters of programs which originally were quite modest but are now costing us an arm and a leg, Mr. Speaker, something that is forcing us to lower our expectations. We have to ask ourselves whether Canada can keep on spending, even with the best intentions in the world. But can the Canadian people still afford all those expenditures without complaining; are those expenditures synonymous with growth? We feel that growth can never be achieved unless we change our ways. The last few years have proved it beyond a doubt; unfortunately, that experience has made its victims: we must now turn to those victims, and the government must take drastic measures to remedy the situation.

Salaries, which I mentioned a moment ago, no longer bear any relation to productivity; it is a forgotten element of our language, an element none of the unions which came before the committee even mentioned. They merely said: We need more! But they did not relate what they deserve to what they produce; that notion is unfortunately too often overlooked, which explains our problems in world markets. Yes, over the past five years, our productivity has been stagnating and the cost of labour at all levels of government has increased. We should ask ourselves what the rate of productivity is in government services. With all the resources of his staff, the Auditor General of Canada has assessed the productivity of the public service at 60 per cent compared with the private sector. I do not want to generalize because there are of course public servants who have a productivity of 110 percent. Others, unfortunately, must have a lower than average productivity, which would mean lower than 60 per cent, but none of those who appeared before the committee to speak on behalf of public servants mentioned productivity. I believe that other Canadians are becoming more and more concerned about productivity, whether in the private sector or in some public agencies, and they are becoming increasingly aware of the importance of being more productive if we want to keep our markets open.

The bill now under consideration is really part of a general restraint policy. Parliament has been asked to vote on this matter which is the most urgent of all the legislative and administrative measures put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), because if we want to convince everyone that the government means business, that it wants to practise what it preaches and that we are not just long on rhetoric when we talk about tightening our belts, we have to show the Canadian people that we are going to impose restraint first on ourselves, the members of the House of Commons and the Senate, on our own staff and on the public service in the hope that other public agencies and the private sector will follow our lead to give jobs back to those who need them so much and to bring down inflation, which in turn will bring interest rates down. I am convinced that with this bill we shall lead the way in this fight against inflation. Bill C-124 should be seen rather as a model for all Canadians to copy from. It is but one component of a general policy. If the government were to suggest that Bill C-124 will solve all our problems, I do not think the Canadian people would take it seriously. It is all very well to control wages, but prices too have to be controlled.

The Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) have made many announcements concerning prices because these two factors are interrelated. If we look at the recent announcement made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove)—if my hon. colleague would care to listen and learn, he would see that when the government talks about price control, it does mean business—no rent paid to the Canadian government—and we know how many housing units it controls in Canada—will be increased by more than 6 percent. Many other prices will be regulated and I am already convinced that the same will apply to Bell Canada and many others if we want this program to be effective.

All members of this House have to take this program seriously. If they are here only to score political points, as our colleagues of the New Democratic Party seem to be doing, if they are here to make sure that the program will not work, they are not discharging their responsibilities as the people's representatives who must see to the best interests of the whole population and not just clean up the slate with those who contribute to their party fund. I believe that it is important for all Canadians to realize that the New Democratic Party made no contribution whatsoever to the debate during consideration of the bill in committee. Most of its members did not even vote on the proposed amendments. They did not vote for a very simple reason, they wanted two things: first, to have an unblemished record; second, to pay their debts to the unions which fund them. Gentlemen, you succeeded. Now, Mr. Speaker, we must return to the Progressive Conservative Party which in spite of its differences of opinions with us has realized that this was not the proper time to play politics.

They have also realized that they should provide some leadership. Mr. Speaker, Canadian municipalities have been wiser than the New Democratic Party. The municipal representatives who are as qualified as we are have understood the message. They are aware that this is not the time for politicizing but to resolve the issue. They have decided to join us in the struggle against inflation. Many businessmen and union members understood. Of course, the executives of some unions which you so well represent do not understand because they are afraid. They want to justify their existence. And my hon. colleagues say that it is at the expense of workers. We are taking that step specifically to assist workers because the unemployed were former union members whom unfortunately the unions are now betraying. We are helping those people to make sure that they will re-enter the labour market and they will surely not do so thanks to your co-operation and your example.

This program, Mr. Speaker, does not discriminate amongst Liberal, Conservative or NDP ridings. The program is fair for everyone. All public employees will be subjected to restrictions. Canadians generally believe in such a program because they feel it is quite realistic. If the creation of 25 jobs in the Public Service was announced, you would see many applicants. There is no ... an hon. member is laughing over there. He knows that a large number of Canadians would like to become public servants specifically to enjoy security of employment which cannot be found in the private sector and to receive salaries which are ... I am convinced Mr. Speaker that the hon. member is trying to prevent us from making our comments and make me run out of time.

Mr. Blaikie: There is no security of employment at the CN, my friend.

Mr. Lapierre: I hope you are going to call them back to order Mr. Speaker. In my opinion, that program is quite fair. It allows all unions—and there is no exception in the program, everyone is restricted to raises of 6 per cent and then 5 per cent—

Mr. Blaikie: What about the 3,200 laid-off employees?

Mr. Lapierre: And also our staff Mr. Speaker. I hear my hon. colleague who tries to get stirred up because my staff is restricted to 6 and 5 per cent.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And your staff also.

Mr. Lapierre: There is nothing more normal Mr. Speaker. I am not interested in promoting a minority. My staff understands it quite well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order. I regret to have to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has now expired.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on Motion No. 4 stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 8.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-124, An act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended in Clause 7 by striking out lines 4 to 8 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"extended under Section 4 may amend any terms and conditions of the collective agreement or arbitral award other than wage rates or other terms and conditions of the compensation plan pursuant to the provisions of any act regulating collective bargaining between those parties or persons."

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) (for Mr. Crombie) moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-124, An act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended in Clause 7 by striking out lines 1 to 8 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"7. (1) Subject to subsection (2), parties to a collective agreement, or the persons bound by an arbitral award, that includes a compensation plan that is extended under Section 4 may, by agreement, amend any terms and conditions of the collective agreement or arbitral award, provided any amendment to the compensation plan takes effect

(a) on the day immediately after the day the plan would, but for Section 4, expire, or

(b) on the day the first increase in wage rates on or after June 29, 1982 would, but for Section 8, occur under the plan, or on the anniversary of the day referred to in paragraph (a) or (b), as the case may be.

(2) The total value of the compensation, including wage rates and all other benefits and perquisites, weighted and averaged in the manner prescribed by the Treasury Board, provided for in any compensation plan included in a collective agreement or arbitral award that is amended pursuant to subsection (1) shall not, in the twelve month period of the plan following the first such amendment, exceed by more than 6% the total annual value of the compensation under the previous compensation plan for the same employees, and the total of the compensation in the twelve month period of the plan following the second such amendment shall not exceed by more than 5% the value thereof in the first twelve month period of the plan.

(3) In the event of a dispute in the application of this section, the provisions of sections 155 to 159 of the Canada Labour Code apply mutatis mutandis."

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-124, An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended in Clause 7 by adding immediately after line 8 at page 6 the following:

"(2) Where the parties fail to agree, the parties shall retain the right to employ the dispute resolving mechanisms included in the Public Service Staff Relations Act or the Canada Labour Code, whichever is applicable."

Motion No. 11

That Bill C-124, An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be amended in Clause 7 by adding immediately after line 8 at page 6 the following:

"(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, parties to a collective agreement or arbitral award may bargain collectively with respect to paid maternity leave as if this Act had not been passed."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I find it interesting at this time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I apologize to the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy). I recognize the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) on a point of order.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, it has occurred to us that since the House order reads that Motions Nos. 9, 10 and 11 should be grouped for debate and voted upon in the manner described in the circular issued by the Chair, you might wish to recognize a member from the official opposition first. Extra generous time was given to the party to our left this afternoon. Those of us who have been here all day heard the debate go all across the ball park. I think it would be time for other people to offer a balanced point of view.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I think the point raised by the hon. member who has just spoken is well taken. I beg the indulgence of the House respecting the hon. member for Churchill. In view of the fact that the motions have been grouped for debate according to an earlier decision of Madam Speaker, I think it would be in order for the Chair to have recognized the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River earlier.

• (2030)

Mr. Kelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order just so I understand what is happening. If the hon. member opposite in the official opposition speaks first, I assume he will have 40 minutes. Will the member from the New Democratic Party also have 40 minutes?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): The Standing Orders provide for the mover of a motion at report stage to have 40 minutes. The same rule applies to any member moving a motion on behalf of another member. Both the official opposition speaker and the speaker for the New Democratic Party, since they have both moved motions, each will be entitled to 40 minutes.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I was identified. There had been consultations earlier today explaining that it is the New Democratic Party's motion that comes up for debate first. That procedure has been followed by each and every occupant of the chair with respect to this bill. It is our position that since you recognized me, in accordance with the procedures of this House I should be the first speaker.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I too rise on the same point of order. I think you made a ruling just a few moments ago and I think you made it on the basis of equity and fairness in terms of the debate. I think it was quite appropriate that you made it and quite supportable on that basis, certainly on the basis that you made a ruling and as well with respect to the equitable distribution of speakers among the three parties in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I thank the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for his contribution. I am afraid the Chair has put the House in this situation. The Chair, of course, cannot take cognizance of private negotiations. I am not aware of what goes on in the House privately or behind the curtains. I am afraid the point made by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River is a valid one. The Chair apologizes to the House for the situation, and I do now recognize the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like some reassurance. You have already recognized me. If you recognize a member of the Conservative Party for 40 minutes and if you recognize a member of the Liberal Party for 40 minutes, what happens is that the two parties that agree with this bill will monopolize the rest of the House time. In your capacity as Speaker you have already recognized me.

Without the unanimous consent of the House I do not see how you can take away that recognition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): On that point the Chair may share the concern of the hon. member for Churchill. The Chair does not provide for the length of the speeches; the Standing Orders provide that. At this stage, having ruled, I think we ought to get on with the debate. Once again, I recognize the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River.

Mr. Heap: What a rotten deal.

Mr. Keeper: What about fair play?

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will probably not use the 40 minutes allocated to the speaker of the party introducing an amendment. It is my pleasure on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) to introduce Motion No. 9 and to speak as briefly as possible on this motion and the debate before us.

All of us realize that our country is in very serious and dire economic straits. We share this dilemma, admittedly, with a number of other countries in the western world. But nowhere in the world, particularly in the western world among the people with whom we trade, is this crisis as deep, as profound and as devastating as is our experience here in Canada.

We say that inflation is the cause of this serious problem. Up to this point it has been a favourite pastime of this government and of other important and powerful players in the economy, like the corporate sector and unions, to say that inflation is crippling our economy, destroying our freedom and destroying our ability to manage the resources of this great country in the manner best suited to our needs. We hear it said, "Let us all now step out and fight inflation". This is what is being preached throughout the land. But we also hear it said, "If I am not right there when we get started, just get started without me and don't wait. Somebody make a beginning."

But we have to come to grips with the problem of inflation to restore once again confidence and faith in our country and to give substance, belief and foundation to the great security systems that we have, and to the social contracts that we have planned and put in place for ourselves. As we all know, the government is in a position today where in some instances it is defaulting on social contracts in which it has entered. One example is the removal of indexation, which is part of the last instalment in the federal budget. That was a social contract. Another is the question of collective bargaining, which has caused all of us some difficulty and which has invited the wrath and the anger of our friends in the New Democratic Party.

As we all know, the best security system in the world and the best security system any government could offer is a job and peace of mind, knowing that one's savings will not be ravaged by inflation or a government's economic mismanagement.

Every speaker who has participated in the debate following the budget, particularly those who have participated in this debate, are to blame for the situation that we are in. Members on all sides are to blame. We sought to attach blame for the incredible situation that we have got ourselves into. Even the government would have to admit that not all of the misery dispensed has been imported from some other part of the world. We have managed to shoot ourselves in the foot quite ably by ourselves. It was not the Americans or any other country that told us we should have a Foreign Investment Review Agency which, at the moment, does nothing else but scare and frighten away the scarce and much needed investment capital. No one in the rest of the world told us that we should have a National Energy Program, which has literally destroyed and probably rendered impotent the most vital sector in our economy today. These wounds are self-inflicted and the misery that results from them is distributed not in a very fair and equitable manner. As we all know, there are some people who actually profit from inflation and there are some people who actually profit from the misery of others.

We hear our friends to the left speak about equity, fairness and the equal distribution of wealth. They always say that, without accepting an equal share of the misery and the hardship and the determination to straighten out the mess. The necessity for that also applies to my friends on the left.

We know who is to blame. It is now believed that the term ministerial responsibility is really a contradiction because we see no examples of ministerial responsibility. Certainly in the last two or three years, none of our ministers of the Crown or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have accepted any blame for anything. They brought in a budget in November. In June they returned and said that they had made a little mistake. They have rendered thousands of small businesses insolvent and have thrown the country into bankruptcy. They said that they had made a little miscalculation; they thought the deficit was to be $10 billion and it turned out to be $20 billion. Now they say they have seen the light and have some new ideas. They ask us to hang on, that they will show us something different.

• (2040)

We all know that if there were any ministerial responsibility left, or if any of them were willing to accept ministerial responsibility, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) would have had to offer his resignation and let someone else try something fresh. This goes as well for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) who fought tooth and nail a couple of years ago to bring in the National Energy Program, which was to secure energy self-sufficiency by the year 1990 and to ensure above 50 per cent Canadian ownership content. Now we know that neither of these goals will be achieved. But has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources resigned? Of course no, because as we all know the term "ministerial responsibility" is not in fact a contradiction in terms.

I did not want to use the time available to me to attach blame to any one of the players in the economy, because I assumed that at least those who are in the chamber this evening and, indeed, most people who take the time to turn on their television sets to watch our debates know full well who is to blame and where the buck should stop.

I compare our situation to a ship which has run aground. Luckily there was no loss of life, but the ship is sitting on a sandbank and we are all floating away in lifeboats. When you are in a lifeboat, you do not make judgments or hold court on who is to blame for the predicament. What we do is all get together to try to make the best of the situation. We look at what the options are. Our aim is to stay alive as an important industrial nation in the world and as an equal and respected partner in the community of the western economy. In so doing, we have to make some fundamental commitments to change the way we have behaved as partners in the economy within our country. Again, it is up to the government to take the lead in showing some new direction.

Anyone listening to the debate over the last couple of days would know that it is simply not true that there were no constructive suggestions by the opposition to help the government find its way out of the dilemma. There is no easy and simple solution. This is a fact with which we all agree. But some constructive suggestions have been made in terms of Bill C-124, which was designed to portray the government as finally accepting some responsibility and showing the lead without, in the very initial period, imposing restrictive and comprehensive measures to force everyone into a certain stream.

The government has said that it will restrain itself and its employees to a wage package which will not exceed 6 per cent this year and 5 per cent the following year. Of course there are various complications with such an approach. Many of our friends and colleagues have pointed out some of these problems. The misery which a senior civil servant in the $90,000 to $105,000 range will have to suffer with a 6 per cent increase in his salary will of course be much easier to bear than that of a public servant in the $12,000 per year range. Usually both have to buy their groceries in the same supermarket, and yet one will receive a $6,000 increase and the other might receive a $700 increase in one year.

I have looked at the total package and have listened with great care to the defence of the government in support of this so called 6 per cent world. I am still very uneasy because I happen to think that the idea could work, if the government did not limit this restraint to its own public servants and, incidentally, to our own employees. It is grossly unfair that employees of Members of Parliament should have their salaries rolled back. I am not entirely convinced the arguments of the New Democratic Party with respect to this bill, which they are vehemently opposing in general, are correct. At the outset they said that regardless of whether we accept or reject their amendments, they are opposed to this kind of approach. I happen to think, as is always the case with socialists, that the greatest of all human failings, greed, applies to them more than it does to capitalists. They are really more interested in the 6 per cent reduction of their own salaries than anything else. It would be an exercise in intellectual honesty if they admitted it. I personally do not think that Members of Parliament are overly generously rewarded, but I do not think that a system such as the one proposed would work unless we took the lead and showed some restraint. If this restraint were carried throughout the system, I think it would work.

Naturally I am disappointed already because we learned that the government has found ways to protect certain of its friends from the impact of this measure. We are told that regulatory agencies will be given certain guidelines. They can award to Crown corporations or to regulated industries increases in their charges and tariffs in excess of 6 per cent, but any such settlement or benefit to a Crown corporation will have to be reviewed by cabinet. There is no doubt in my mind—and I have watched the government now for ten years—that there will be certain friends who will convince the government that their input costs have been too great; that if they are tied to the 6 per cent rate they will have to reduce services, which will be harmful to its political welfare; and that they should be allowed to make additional charges. We have seen examples of this already.

It will be interesting to see how Bell Canada, other regulated Crown corporations and private agencies will be treated in response to their demands. When I say that I support and think the program will work, I qualify it by those comments. If we stick to our guns, when we return to our constituencies businessmen will be able to see their telephone rates, hydro bills and natural gas bills, restricted to a 6 per cent increase if the government forgoes further increases in gasoline prices. In other words, if all regulated industries, products and services dispensed throughout the country are restricted to a 6 per cent increase, the program would have an excellent chance of working.

I cast my mind back to the time when I managed a business. Certainly, if I could have seen the government taking initiatives with conviction and strength, I would have had no problem convincing employees working in my firm that the time had come for all of us to follow the lead because there was a chance we could come to grips with some of the serious problems faced by the nation.

Let me come to the problem of one of the shortcomings in this bill which is the collective bargaining process. As we know, the bill introduced certain restrictions to this process of collective bargaining. Reasonably one could ask, "What is the sense of bargaining if you already know that you are tied to a 6 per cent ceiling?" The ceiling will become the floor and the floor will become the ceiling, so everybody will get a 6 per cent increase. Surely no one is going to bargain for anything less. So what is the sense of bargaining collectively?

If we were convinced this is a program that will work and will legislate this program into place, what was the reason for saying then that you cannot bargain collectively? It follows logically, except of course that there are other things that unions and groups of workers bargain for. We have certain commitments to affirmative action programs, for instance. I have said that the bill is unfair in terms of the great differential in the wage scale where we have senior bureaucrats earning in excess of $100,000 and we have some employees of the federal government who are in the very lowest of pay scales. Therefore there could have been a process of collective bargaining to close this gap and to make some necessary adjustments. There are some legitimate problems that the women's groups have made us aware of and that are involved in this affirmative action program. Maybe there is room for some collective bargaining to overcome and straighten out some of these problems. Unfortunately, the government moved to restrict the process of collective bargaining, and that is terribly unfortunate because certain groups who are crucial to making this program work will, for that reason, opt out.

If you cast your mind to the time in 1974 when my party proposed a program of wage and price controls you will recall that we had intended to introduce a 90-day freeze. When I think back to that particular election campaign, I remember that it was not very difficult for me to get people to join us in that campaign because we were able to make the commitment that for 90 days the price of gasoline, butter, bread and whatever you needed to buy would not increase. There was no need to set up a monitoring agency or police force because if anyone in any supermarket or anywhere else increased their prices it was quite obvious that it would not have taken more than 30 seconds for someone to know that someone else had been breaking the law.

You will also recall that after that 90-day freeze we had proposed an 18-month period of adjustment, and that is precisely the kind of adjustment that we had in mind, because, as we all know if we want to be honest with ourselves, we have established in our society and in our economy certain elites. Those are, first of all, the corporate or the public elite, the government and its friends, the bureaucracy, insensitive, stubborn, with ravenous appetites for our tax dollars, and, as I have already said, accountable to no one. That is a certain elite and I am not including in that elite the lower paid public servants who are performing throughout our country a very useful, vital and essential service to all of us.

Then there is the other elite and that is the corporate elite. That is mainly the control sector of the economy. Those are the people who, again in a monstrous and ravenous way, have gobbled up all the available resources of the country, not to create new jobs, not to create new enterprises, but to use all the money that our banks have available, and even some the government had available that it had taken from other taxpayers, to gobble up existing companies, to enlarge their sphere of influence and to concentrate and to integrate their large corporate entities.

One cannot blame the large corporations for doing that because no one in their right mind would start any new enterprise today at a time when there is such uncertainty about where the government is going and what the future intent of the government will be in becoming involved as an active partner in the economy.

If the National Energy Program and Canagrex are any indication of what the government intends to do in the future, I certainly, if I were free to do so tomorrow, would not start a new business in this country. I suppose that a lot of large corporate decision-makers have come to the same conclusion. So what do they do? Instead of expanding their plants, creating new jobs, doing research and development to produce new products and getting out in the world to sell these products, they have simply engaged in an exercise which I call corporate cannibalism by gobbling up other companies and enlarging their sphere of influence in that way.

That has had a devastating effect on the economy, particularly since the banks were willing partners in this scheme of corporate cannibalism. Some banks are in such dire straits today. There is no question about that, because of loans they have handed out to Dome Petroleum and to other major companies which are, for all intents and purposes, insolvent today, that they have to call back loans made to small businessmen who are paying their interest and struggling away, despite the adversity and the difficulties that they are encountering.

We have this corporate elite. It is usually the regulated sector of the economy. The government tells them to what extent they can increase the cost of their services or the products they produce, and the government has them completely regulated in every way. Unfortunately, if we compare our corporate sector with that of the United States, we find that our large corporations have always been very willing to be regulated by government. The reason is that they felt there is a certain amount of security in that, because should they get into trouble the government will give out, offer letters of comfort, loan guarantees or even cash. As long as they are big enough, as long as they employ a lot of people, the government will come to their aid.

And their judgment was right. If you look at Dome Petroleum, no one in their right mind really believes that this government will allow Dome Petroleum to go under. They have been too willing and too helpful in bringing the National Energy Program about, and friends always help each other, so the government will bail out Dome Petroleum. Unfortunately, the government of course will not be able to bail out everybody, so it has to be very selective in the way that these bailouts are being conducted. Some peple who have the ear of certain ministers will, of course, get help and others will be allowed to go under and die.

The third elite is the labour elite. When one looks into the background of this elitism which is in charge of our economy, one finds that the one third of our labour force, numbering approximately 12.2 million, that is unionized, is employed by the corporate elite of which I have spoken. While it is not fair to say this about all organized labour, to a great extent the organized one third component of the labour force that is unionized works for the corporate elite. The corporate managers no longer understand, and certainly this government has long forgotten, the most basic principles of a free market economy, which is supply and demand, or the invisible hand which regulates the economy. I have said before in the House that the invisible hand has become the invisible handshake. It is the invisible handshake between Dennis McDermott, the CP group of companies and these large corporations whose products are regulated but whose future is protected by the government, the third partner in the elitist conspiracy.

The present situation is that this blue chip elite, made up of corporations, is now in dire straits. These are the same corporations which the government is now calling in to advise it this fall on what it should do in terms of developing better measures to turn the economy around. I shudder to think what the outcome of that dialogue will be. However, these people are now in dire straits. The corporate elite is not producing any revenues for the government, so it is defaulting on its social contract. The corporate elite is in dire straits because it can no longer increase its prices according to what the union demands because the government wants to regulate the end price of their products. This reaction has caused our ship to run aground.

When the system is running smoothly and everyone is able to eat, has a place to live and can afford to go on a vacation once a year, even the low-paid paid worker, then of course no one complains. But the corporate elite and the labour elite are now being asked to take a share of the misery that our present economic circumstances dictate. Therefore they are squealing. The squeals are heard no louder than those of our friends to the left, the New Democratic Party. That party represents no one else in the House but one partner in that group of elite. That is, labour. They are upset because of this attack on collective bargaining.

To conclude, I would like to focus on that particular component. I firmly believe that as long as our unions insist, so stubbornly on adhering to this adversary process in which they like to engage, we will not be able to repair the damage that has been done to our economy on a permanent basis. As long as this juvenile and outdated method of collective bargaining in industrial relations continues we will simply be unable to devise and chart a plan of economic recovery.

I would yet have to meet a union boss who would not much rather sit in the boardroom to help make decisions that would ensure the health and welfare of the company and create new wealth, which could ultimately be passed on to the employees of that company, than sit in the lunchroom and plot how to destroy the company and hinder any effort on the part of the corporate managers to create new wealth. I would yet have to meet a union leader who would not much rather discuss profit-sharing, for example. However, if he had to discuss profit-sharing with his boss he would also have to accept the responsibility of working together with his boss to create wealth and profit before sharing it.

That is why we call people who never appear to have anything and want to share it with everybody else socialist. You cannot distribute wealth that you have not first created. That is as true for the smallest business as it is for the largest corporation. It is certainly true for the managers who are in charge of looking after the public interest.

I am not blaming the corporations for our present situation or for their contribution to our present problems. I am not saying that the unions are to blame. As I have said, the buck stops at one place only, and that is here, at the treasury benches across the aisle.

If the corporate sector behaves responsibly there is no need to compete with it in the public interest. We should proceed as does every other country, which is to make laws and regulations within which the corporate sector must operate. If free enterprise has been the basis of the prosperity of a nation such as ours, it then must operate within certain principles of the free enterprise system. This means competition. Perhaps we should be considering competition laws, or anti-trust laws as they are called in the United States. When a corporate entity becomes too integrated or monopolistic, or when a group of corporations become too oligopolistic, a government should intervene and force them to divest themselves of certain holdings to assure the maintenance of fair competition.

The blame belongs to the government for its deliberate policy of neglect which allows this kind of situation to occur and for giving the banks the leeway which they have to plan with the corporations in the scheme of corporate cannibalism.

The unions are not to blame for the power which is not due to any group of workers. Under present circumstances, two thirds of the workers are not unionized and do not have an opportunity to be unionized because the large unions are not interested in those who work in the private sector and have to compete in the free market economy. They are the ones who are paying the bills.

I am not blaming the unions, either for the power they have, which is a power, if one can imagine it, to compel every person who works in the federal or provincial public sector to be in the union. Every person who wants a job with the federal or provincial government is compelled to belong to the union. We have a great chartered principle of democracy called freedom of association which was entrenched in our Constitution, in the wisdom of those who supported the entrenchment of certain aspects and principles of democracy. This applies to every Canadian except to members of unions. They have no choice. They either belong or they do not work for the federal or provincial government or the CP group of companies or any other large integrated corporate entities. It would also include any large industry where wages are usually double those in unregulated industries, like the construction industry, teachers, and so on. Those are the people who are compelled to belong to unions.

That is totally inconsistent with one of the most cardinal principles of democracy. When we speak about embarking or setting out on a road of economic recovery, and we look around at the rest of the world, at Japan, Sweden, or Germany, and we ask why it is that some of the problems we are experiencing are not experienced in those parts of the world, we may find that it might well be for reason. For instance, it is said that Sweden is mainly a socialist country and West Germany is certainly a socialist country. Yet that cardinal principle, freedom of association, is respected. In fact, I have statistical comparisons. In the West German labour force, it is precisely one third of the work force which has chosen to belong to unions. But every person who works, any worker in any sector of the economy, has the opportunity to belong to a union, because a union does not obtain certification from any of the provincial governments or the federal government unless it makes itself available for membership to every person who works.

Would your Honour agree with me that that would be a much better system? Would union leaders in this country not be much more responsible if they had to compete for the affection of their members instead of behaving as if they lived in some kind of one-party democracy to which some of the Iron Curtain socialist countries subscribe? Would Your Honour not believe that a fellow like Dennis McDermott would think twice before he stood on the steps of this place and said that, "The next time we meet, we will be meeting inside if these turkeys in there do not behave"? Would Your Honour not believe that a fellow like that would have to think twice before he said that because otherwise he may well see mass resignations?

I happen to think that the workers in the country, at least the people who support me, the people with whom I sit in the lunchroom, the people who have worked for me over the years, have as much at stake in this economy and in the future of this great country and love this country as much as you and I do, and they want to do as much for it as you and I do, and do not want to be irresponsible. They do not want to break the laws of this country deliberately. Certainly, they do not appreciate their leaders doing and saying things which are irresponsible and derisive.

Therefore I say that before the NDP gets up in this House and fights for the survival of the collective bargaining process, a process to which I subscribe wholeheartedly, but under different management and circumstances, its members should seek counsel among themselves and say what it is about this collectivism that they are defending. It is the kind of collectivism which operates in socialist countries behind the Iron Curtain, this kind of one-party collectivism, this one-party democratic process where people can elect someone but the choice is limited to one party.

I would like to conclude with just one sentence. It does not make sense for us to criticize this bill if we are not prepared to take the lead ourselves in setting some goals and objectives which will be reasonable and will signal to the rest of the country that we, ourselves, are serious. We have said that we will reduce our own salaries by 6 per cent. We have said that we will insist that the people who work for us will restrain themselves to a 6 per cent increase. I think that that is a signal, and if we are earnest and serious about it, the rest of the country might follow.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, after hearing the last anti-union tirade, I am in some ways grateful that I am able to speak after that rather negative representation made by the representative of the Conservative Party. Since the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) allowed the hon. member who just spoke to speak as his replacement with regard to his amendment, I presume that what the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) stated is the policy of the Conservative Party when it comes to unions in this country. I find that interesting. I only have about 15 minutes in which to speak, if I am also to allow the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) to contribute in the time remaining. I find it interesting that very few of the Liberal or Conservative members from whom we have heard in this debate have really spoken about the effects of this legislation. When it comes to collective bargaining, there is an assumption in the country that the government has moved to allow collective bargaining actually to take place. Let me read from the bill which is before us. Clause 7 states:

> The parties to a collective agreement, or the persons bound by an arbitral award, that includes a compensation plan that is extended under section 4 may, by agreement, amend any terms and conditions of the collective agreement or arbitral award other than wage rates or other terms and conditions of the compensation plan.

What that government position means is that not only must the employees want to negotiate, they must also seek leave and permission of their employer before they can even start negotiations. That means that Ian Sinclair's workers at Canadian Pacific must receive his permission before they can open negotiations. That means that the employees of the various Crown corporations must seek the permission of those Crown corporations before they can negotiate. That means that workers who work for the public service, for the people of Canada, will have to receive the permission of the various ministers and of the President of the Treasury Board before they can even open negotiations. That goes against every principle of negotiating under the laws of this land, against the right to negotiate, not only one's salary but the other terms and conditions of one's work. That is a right which cannot be arbitrarily denied by one's employer, be it government, Crown corporation or private sector company.

We should consider the Conservative amendment because they have spoken as though they had some new solutions, as though they had a different approach to the whole debate. Amendment No. 9 states:

> Subject to subsection (2), parties to a collective agreement, or the persons bound by an arbitral award, that includes a compensation plan that is extended under section 4 may, by agreement, amend any terms and conditions—

That is, with the exception of money. Again, the Conservative Party members, who parade in this House as the people who are fighting to bring back collective bargaining rights, are admitting by their own amendment that collective bargaining will only occur with the gracious permission of the employer. So let us not have any more hypocrisy in this House. Let us have the truth from the Conservative Party. The Tories will vote for the bill, but their amendment will not restore collective bargaining. Their amendment will not even guarantee that workers will have the right to open negotiations.

Let us presume that the negotiation procedure has been opened, that negotiations on non-monetary items have proceeded, and that there is still some sort of dispute or deadlock. What would happen under the provisions of this bill? Under the provisions of the bill as it now stands, nothing would happen. If the workers and the employers disagree, there would be no solution to the impasse.

In committee, the President of the Treasury Board said that perhaps they could agree to voluntary arbitration. It is very unlikely that employers will agree to voluntary arbitration on items they cannot negotiate with their employees. They had just gone through a process of negotiation. They have not come to any resolution of the disputes they have. Now, according to the President of the Treasury Board, they may try voluntary arbitration. Obviously that is not a solution.

What does the Conservative amendment say? It says that these measures could go to binding arbitration, as long as there is no talk about money. They deny the right to strike, which is guaranteed to many workers under the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Canada Labour Code. In other words, they are against legislation presently existing on the books of this country.

They also say by their amendment that maternity leave, pensions and other items that are negotiated must come under the 6 per cent. That is the position in the amendment they put forward.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) stated in the House last Friday that negotiating within the 6 per cent is a good idea. It allows for maternity leave, for pensions and for workers at the top of the scale to get 2 per cent and for those at the bottom to get 9 per cent. That in principle sounds wonderful to the Conservative Party. They fail to recognize that within most collective bargaining agreements, the range is not that wide. You are talking about somebody earning $20,000 receiving a 2 per cent increase and somebody earning $10,000 receiving a 9 per cent increase.

That is the reality of what the Conservative Party is saying. It sounds great. You get the impression from the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands that somebody earning $80,000 or $90,000 would settle for a 2 per cent increase in order to help someone earning $10,000. In reality, with most collective bargaining agreements the spread is not that much and they tend to be lumped together. The low-paid tend to be lumped within one collective agreement and the high-paid within another. Therefore, the 6 per cent solution is no solution at all.

As the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) said, the people who will suffer tend to be in the bargaining unions which basically represent women workers, those with low salaries. They are the bargaining units that tend to represent those in the cleaning or clerical jobs, those who, according to the Public Service Commission annual report of 1981, earn between $10,000 and $15,000. Thirteen per cent of the government workers fall in that range and 29.3 per cent fall in the range between $15,000 and $20,000.

In that 43 per cent range you find most of the poorly paid workers, most of whom are women. How are they going to resolve the problems they face with the Conservative and Liberal 6 per cent solution?

It is interesting at last to see the minister responsible for the Status of Women in the chamber. It is unfortunate that she has not said one word in this debate. It is unfortunate that the Liberal members on the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee who studied this bill clause by clause would not allow the minister responsible for the status of women to appear in person, regardless of what her position is on this legislation.

Mr. Kristiansen: She has one more chance.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, I will sit down in five minutes. I challenge the minister to get up in this House and state her position on this bill. Our position is that the laws passed by Parliament, the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act should be used to complete each and every set of negotiations. The government may have some guidelines of 6 per cent and 5 per cent or it may change that guideline to 10 per cent and 9 per cent, depending on what happens to the cost of living. However, the regular laws of this land which allow unions and companies to open negotiations and negotiate in order to come to some dispute-resolving method if negotiations break down are the procedures which should be followed in his country.

I wish to quote from a letter from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) to The Globe and Mail. It is very nice to see him in the Chamber. His letter reads in part:

> The right to strike is one of the important cornerstones of a free and democratic society . . . There is clearly room for greater co-operation between unions and employers, and Parliament has entrusted to Labour Canada the responsibility for assisting in the development and maintenance of constructive relationships.

Parliament has entrusted that responsibility to Labour Canada. Where was the Minister of Labour when this bill was being debated? He did not speak once in the last month during this debate. Nor did he appear before the committee. That same Liberal majority refused to allow that minister to appear, if he had the courage to do so. We will never know because the Liberal majority prevented that. It is interesting to see his remarks on the right to strike, it being an important cornerstone in a free and democratic society. It is important to note that this bill denies and takes away the right of those groups within the Crown corporations and, in some cases, government workers.

Collective bargaining has not been restored. The Conservative Party does not wish to restore it. The Liberal government will make sure it is not restored. The Minister of Labour will remain silent.

Our Amendment No. 11 in my name and the name of the hon. member for Vancouver East guarantees that maternity leave can be negotiated and also guarantees that it will not be considered part of the 6 per cent and 5 per cent. In our amendments Nos. 2 and 11 we exclude maternity leave from the definition of compensation and from the 6 per cent ceiling that this government wishes to impose.

It is our belief that this basic human right, which speaks to the very heart of equality and is of concern to so many families, cannot be ignored by this Parliament. I challenge all members, whether Conservative or Liberal, to get up in this House and support an amendment which guarantees that maternity leave can be negotiated and that it will not come from the pockets of the very poorly paid workers within that bargaining unit.

• (2130)

We have suggested similar treatment for pensions in Motion No. 2 and in Motion No. 14. We have said that pensions must be excluded from the definition. We have said that workers in their last two years of work will make sacrifices in addition to limiting increases in their wages to 6 per cent and 5 per cent for the next two years. They will be making sacrifices each and every day of their lives, and so will their families. Their spouses will be sacrificing each and every day of their lives. Most pensions which are adequate—and they are not for the most part in the country—are based on the last five years' income. By restricting the incomes of workers in the last two years of their employment we are restricting their incomes for the rest of their lives. In addition to that, the 6 per cent and 5 per cent provisions of this bill will exclude the right of unions to negotiate to strengthen weak pension plans. These are reasonable amendments made with restraint in mind with the recognition that there is some need for government leadership on this issue, but this bill does not provide that leadership. It does not even come close to providing it.

I recognize my time is limited. I would like to say one more thing before sitting down. I remind the Conservative members of what their leader said in an interview published last Thursday. I remind them of this because they will be voting in 15 minutes. Their leader said:

> I would reject controls. And I wouldn't allow my PMO to be issuing rumours that they were coming in while I was saying that they weren't. I think that controls won't work.

I agree with the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and I will be very interested to see how he and his colleagues will vote in 15 minutes.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few minutes in which to raise a few points in response to the comments of the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) and the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy). I would also like to leave a few minutes—unfortunately, they will be very few—to my friend, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), who has indicated some interest in making some comments before the debate closes this evening.

Much has been made by my friend, the hon. member for Churchill, of the fact that Bill C-124 would restrict collective bargaining. We agree that it would indeed restrict collective bargaining, and we tried in the course of the committee hearings—I would like at this point to thank the members who participated in those hearings for their very constructive contributions—to open up the collective bargaining process through the amendment to Clause 7. This now permits parties to negotiate non-monetary items—the one which immediately springs to mind is the issue of health and safety—during the course of a collective agreement.

I suggest that the hon. member for Churchill and his colleagues have tended to discount the significance of that provision. I suggest to hon. members that it indeed restores one of the most important aspects of collective bargaining and preserves collective bargaining during the period when the program envisaged by the bill is in effect.

We have heard much exaggeration. I cannot help but go back for a moment to the principles of the ILO to which I referred the other day. Those principles are found at page 19873 of Hansard for July 30. The following statement is made in the ILO Geneva-77 principles at page 15:

> —the (ILO) supervisory bodies have not ignored the serious problems that may arise in certain circumstances in the economic field, and they have accordingly stated that it would be difficult to lay down an absolute rule concerning voluntary collective bargaining because, under certain circumstances, governments might feel that the economic position of their countries called at certain times for stabilization measures during the application of which it would not be possible for wage rates to be fixed freely through the medium of collective bargaining. Nevertheless, any such restriction should be imposed as an exceptional measure and only to the extent that is necessary, without exceeding a reasonable period, and it should be accompanied by adequate safeguards to protect workers' living standards.

I cite that again because clearly the program of wage restraint introduced by the government in Bill C-124 is indeed on all fours with the criteria set forward in that statement from the ILO.

Let me turn for a moment to the specific amendment which stands in the name of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie). It is argued that that amendment would do more than what we have proposed in terms of providing for a degree of collective bargaining during the period of this program. In fact, if one looks carefully at the proposed amendment—and I see the hon. member for Rosedale in the House—one will see that in many important respects the amendment is more stringent and places more of a strait-jacket on the parties than what we have proposed in our amendment, which also stands on the Order Paper. Specifically, the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Rosedale suggests a total compensation approach within the limits of 6 per cent and 5 per cent. Our own amendment is very flexible in that it does not propose such criteria. I have stated that it is the government's intention that when parties—employers and employees—are able to reach an agreement within the over-all criteria of 6 per cent and 5 per cent, they can be released from the application of the law or the law can be terminated with respect to that particular group by order in council. In the case of the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Rosedale there is a strict adherence of total compensation to the six and five approach. I suggest this means that any incremental adjustments which would otherwise be available, particularly to those groups at the lower end of the pay scale, would have to be included, under the terms of this proposal, in the 6 per cent and 5 per cent, and therefore this would make it impossible to provide some of these groups with compensation to which they would otherwise be entitled in accordance with the government's proposal.

Specifically, I refer to the example of clerks which was raised in committee. It is clear that in the case of clerks in certain instances there will be incremental payments moving clerks toward job rates which could be as much as 3 per cent, thereby in certain cases, at the lower end of the scale, providing for compensation increases in a given year of as much as 9 per cent. It was specifically to prevent incremental steps taking place at the higher end of the scale that an amendment was introduced by the government in committee which is found in Clause 6(5) where it states:

Employees or groups of employees whose salary range as of June 29, 1982 has a maximum that equals or exceeds forty-nine thousand five hundred dollars shall not——be entitled to the merit increases or performance awards that would, but for this subsection, form part of their compensation plan.

For the period of the program.

This includes incremental increases. Under the proposal of the hon. member for Rosedale lower paid groups, those who earn less than $49,500—I think of clerks in particular, who have often been cited by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald)—would not be entitled to receive incremental increases except within the 6 per cent and 5 per cent total compensation package which, I suggest, is much more stringent than our proposed approach under the amendment which has been tabled by the government. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rosedale is considerably less fair to lower paid groups.

• (2140)

I presume it is for one of these reasons that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands lauded the amendment which was tabled by the government last Thursday night. I referred earlier to her comments as reported in last Friday's Citizen where she said that the announcement goes a long way toward quelling Tory opposition to the bill. She said that the federal government had done a complete somersault on the bill during the past few days and that the amendment should help workers at the lower end of the wage scale. She said, "I think it will give much more equity within the six and five limit."

I was struck and pleased by the objectivity of her comments, notwithstanding the fact that there was also a Tory announcement which was also directed toward opening up the collective bargaining process.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the intent of our amendment, to permit groups to strike their own deal, reach their arrangements within the six and five limit and then be released from the application of the law through an order of the governor in council, is much more appropriate, much more flexible and much more equitable and also preserves in total collective bargaining within the six and five limit.

It is true that the Tory amendment also suggests that there should be a system of arbitration making reference to the Canada Labour Code in the proposed amendment and specifically, as I recall, to certain sections, namely Sections 155 to 159 of the code which are for the adjudication of dispute purposes and not for the arbitration of interest purposes, and use those sections to settle disputes between the parties.

I suggest that arbitral awards during the period of this program would very likely establish precedents which would be unacceptable and which would not have taken place in the normal course of collective bargaining. These awards would undoubtedly prove more expensive in the longer term. We saw an arbitral award earlier this week in the Province of Ontario, which greatly extended maternity leave benefits, for example, during this period of restraint. Our purpose is to restrain costs, not increase costs, and I suggest that arbitral awards could increase costs during the duration of this program.

Nor only that, Mr. Speaker, but I suggest that many parties would object to the imposition of compulsory arbitration during this period, where we have provided a means of sound, firm and fair collective bargaining.

I would also remind hon. members that with respect to binding arbitration under the Canada Labour Code, I am advised that there is no appeal to a higher authority. Therefore, I submit that any form of arbitration—and I have much more to say on this subject—would be most inappropriate.

I must leave at least a moment to my friend, the hon. member for Capilano, to make at least some comments. I regret that the clock does not permit me to offer him more time for his comments.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) for the courtesy of allowing me a minute to offer a few remarks. I wish him well with the voluntary restraint program which he is appealing to the country to accept in Bill C-124.

When he talks about the arbitration aspect of this bill I have to wonder why he has not given the House of Commons and its staff the opportunity for arbitration through the Commissioners of Internal Economy. Instead of having Treasury Board reach its arms and tentacles into the management of the affairs of the House of Commons, surely the arbitration of pay for the staff that serves individual members of the House should come under the Commissioners of Internal Economy and not under Treasury Board. It is most unnatural and unjust that Treasury Board should roll back awards that have already been granted to the staff that serves members of the House of Commons.

It is most unfair that Treasury Board would take this action against a small group of unorganized employees who serve us without tenure, work long hours into the night and sometimes early in the morning—this unorganized group is saving the government about $480,000 per year through this Treasury Board action. The government wastes more than 200 times that amount on advocacy advertising.

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we all know there are many motions to be voted on tonight. To avoid too many recorded divisions and to save time, we have discussed among House leaders and other representatives of different parts of the House and have agreed to follow, in the presence of the Clerk, a certain pattern for the voting procedure tonight. Therefore, once in a while I will have to rise on a point of order and mention the terms of the agreement. The first one is that we think that if Your Honour would ask for unanimous consent, you would obtain it to vote on Motion No. 3.

Madam Speaker: Do we have unanimous consent to vote on motion No. 3?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 3 standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston).

The House divided on Motion No. 3 (Mr. Johnston) which was agreed to on the following division;

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has not been an agreement on the following, but due to the spirit of collaboration which seems to have developed tonight, perhaps if you seek unanimous consent we could deal with the third reading of this bill tonight so that we could deal with Canagrex tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). When shall the bill be read the third time, at the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: It being after 11 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 11.07 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

POLITICAL PARTIES

QUESTIONING OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES BY LIBERAL MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, with the welcome and ever-growing number of Liberal backbenchers openly criticizing and questioning government policies, now joining the ranks of letter-writing cabinet ministers who have disagreed publicly with the government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That Liberal members, including the cabinet, not be intimidated by the Right Hon. Prime Minister but continue to question and criticize policies which are destroying the economic and moral fibre of our nation, and further, that these brave members be congratulated by our giving unanimous consent to this motion now.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

HALT IN PROSECUTIONS FOR USING IMPERIAL MEASUREMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, on May 14, 1982, the federal PC party moved in part the following motion which was opposed by the Liberal and NDP spokesmen, "that the government immediately implement a moratorium on all metric related prosecutions and action be taken to abandon compulsory metrication in Canada."

How pleased we are today that a Consumer and Corporate Affairs lawyer, Mr. R. G. Thompson, advised that both imperial and metric measure are legal and that it is not considered illegal to use imperial measure. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the government acknowledge and support this action, and give support to Consumer and Corporate Affairs for not prosecuting anyone for using imperial measure as demonstrated by the actions taken in dropping charges against Zoritza Kasparian, a Calgary carpet dealer who continues to advertise legally in imperial square yards.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CALL FOR HOLDING OF GENERAL ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, added to the many knowledgeable voices predicting an even worsening economy as a result of the mismanagement of this country, is the view of officials from the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce who, only yesterday, forecast unemployment reaching a record level of 12 per cent of the work force, and a continued gloomy economic future for the nation.

Canadians themselves clearly understand what all these financial experts are saying, that this government has caused and is continuing to cause our financial woes and is doing little to solve them. This understanding by the average, financially pressured Canadian, is reflected in the latest Gallup poll which shows the government at an all-time low in popular support, 19 percentage points behind the Progressive Conservatives. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That the government show some concern for the state of this nation and some respect for the plight of Canadians by putting the welfare of both ahead of its desire to cling to power, and immediately call a federal general election, or at least the three byelections.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

RECOGNITION OF HEROISM OF RAOUL WALLENBERG—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Madam Speaker, in March, 1944, Nazi Germany partially occupied Hungary and dispatched Adolph Eichmann to organize the deportation of the last substantial population of Jews within Nazi influence. Eichmann quickly completed what he proudly called "a deportation surpassing every preceding deportation in magnitude". Some 437,000 Jewish men, women and children were sent to concentration camps on 148 trains between May 14 and July 8, according to a Nazi report.

A young Swedish diplomat by the name of Raoul Wallenberg, arrived in Budapest in July on a rescue mission and in the ensuing months saved perhaps as many as 100,000 persons, including many Canadians of Hungarian origin. Arrested in 1945 by the Soviets, reports still persist that he is alive. Today, August 4, would be the seventieth anniversary of his birth. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) and the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

• (1410)

That this House, on the occasion of Raoul Wallenberg's seventieth birthday, recognizes his heroic deeds on behalf of all humanity and urges the Government of Canada to continue its efforts to obtain information about him from the Soviet Union.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—SENDING OF UNITED NATIONS OBSERVERS TO BEIRUT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, in view of the increased hostilities in West Beirut in the face of the UN decision to send observers into that region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Châteauguay (Mr. Watson) and the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the Government of Canada react forthwith in a positive manner by unequivocally endorsing that decision and offer any assistance which may be available to us to participate in that move in an effort to bring some relief to those innocent children, women and men whose blood, even now, is being shed and whose suffering is unimaginable to most of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

DEMAND THAT ISRAEL STOP BOMBARDMENT OF BEIRUT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I, too, have a motion on the important subject which was just raised by the hon. member in the Conservative Party. Given the official position, taken both by the official opposition and the government in the past on this important human question, I hope it will have unanimous support today.

Considering the continuing refusal of the Government of Israel to comply with United Nations resolutions calling for a withdrawl of its troops from Lebanon and, in particular, considering the horrible suffering and deaths which the siege of Beirut is continuing to cause for the half million innocent civilians entrapped in that city, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House demand that the Government of Israel instruct its armed forces to cease their violent bombardment of Beirut.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, in view of the refusal of Liberal members of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to allow a smaller subcommittee to examine the urea formaldehyde foam insulation crisis, and since the government has only scheduled five days of hearings on UFFI, beginning as late as October 2, and since there appears to be political direction to government members from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to minimize their embarrassment over the UFFI mess, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly):

That this House instruct the subcommittee on agenda and procedure of the standing committee to meet before the summer break, preferably within the next 24 hours, in order to priorize witnesses on UFFI and to prevent this investigation from being a whitewash and a further disservice to UFFI homeowners.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

POLITICAL PARTIES

SUGGESTED ALLIANCE BETWEEN PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE AND LIBERAL PARTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. One week ago the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said that he rejected wage controls, yet last night he voted for them. Last night provided a unique opportunity to defeat the Liberal government on its economic policies, However, some 41 Conservatives refused to attend the vote, thereby bringing Conservative support of Liberal policies to a cunning all-time high in Canadian history, reflecting the 47 per cent Gallup confusion. Since the Conservatives have now voted on major legislation 66 times in support of the Liberals since the 1980 election, while the Liberals have voted with the NDP only 36 times, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly):

That this House give unanimous support to the formalization of this homopolitical alliance.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF SURROGATE MOTHERHOOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That this House ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to provide the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs with the necessary reference to enable it to inquire into and report recommendations to the House on the subject of surrogate motherhood and human artificial insemination.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRANSPORT

MAISLIN TRUCKING COMPANY—FORGOING OF LOAN INTEREST PAYMENTS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. I have been advised by a government official that under the terms of the Maislin bailout the government has given a $34 million guarantee on the condition that Maislin can forgo interest payments on nearly $24 million of its loan for two full years. The financial position of this company is incredibly weak. It has a net capital deficit of $24 million. That is $24 million in the red. The Enterprise Development Board of the government has turned down this loan. Did the minister withhold the fuller information on the details of this loan on the condition that he could save this type of sweetheart deal for other friends of the Liberal Party?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the House has already been informed of the fact that several considerations led to the decision to help Maislin under the loan guarantee component of the Enterprise Development Program. One of these considerations, to which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce referred yesterday, was that the government was very concerned about the company's 2,500 jobs in Canada. I feel that the agreement we concluded with the bank that is financing Maislin, that the investors themselves and that the entire restructuring of the enterprise were satisfactory, and we have therefore decided to grant aid as requested.

[English]

FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS OF OTHER COMPANIES

Hon Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, this saving of jobs is a red herring across the whole issue. Those jobs would have been provided by other trucking companies which have 20 to 30 per cent of their people laid off. There are 15,000 trucking companies in Canada, responsible trucking companies which are suffering badly, operating at about 50 per cent capacity and, as I said, with about 20 to 30 per cent of their people laid off. These people must continue to make the whole interest payments on their bank loans. Does the minister feel it is fair to help one large company forgo interest payments on its bank loan while the other 15,000 companies are struggling to survive?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, under the loan guarantee component of the Enterprise Development Program, each case is examined on its merits, and if other companies apply for assistance, their application will be considered.

[English]

INCREASED COSTS FACED BY OTHER COMPANIES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, let us look at that particular offer right now. Another part of the deal in the Maislin bail-out is that they have agreed to limit their price increases to 6 per cent. Because this is a very competitive industry, other companies will be forced to limit their price increases to 6 per cent. This is in the face of 25 to 30 per cent increases in their gasoline costs and in the face of having to pay all, not just 50 per cent, of their interest costs. How can the other trucking companies apply for the same sort of sweetheart deal so that they too can forgo paying their interest costs on 50 per cent of their bank loans?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I already answered this question in my previous reply. Regarding the commitment by Maislin and its employees to remain within the 6 and 5 per cent maximum, I would like to inform the hon. member that the company is merely joining the ranks of the mayors of Canada, Canadian housing corporations and Canadian businessmen and women who have already agreed to support this program. If the hon. member wants to continue these rear guard skirmishes, that is entirely up to him.

ROLE OF CANADIAN IMPERIAL BANK OF COMMERCE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it is related to the question of my colleague about the financial implications of an interest-free loan to Maislin which is, in effect, a two-year interest-free loan of $19 million. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister, who has just now come into the House, has talked quite a bit about leverage, I would like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if he can assure the House that in the negotiations affecting Dome Petroleum and its financial indebtedness, part of the sweetheart deal to get the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce to go along with a two-year interest-free loan to Maislin was not part of the carrot to help the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce out of its Dome difficulties.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Madam Speaker.

[English]

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE REPRESENTATIONS TO MINISTER

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The minister has taken the Privy Council oath. He flew with Bronfman in 1974 and knows him very well. When I refer to Bronfman, I mean Bronfman, Kemp Investments and Leo Kolber. Can the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources assure this House that he has received no representations, either written, verbal, bilingual or otherwise, from anyone involved with the Bronfman interests, and that he has not been the one carrying the can for Maislin because of the long-standing connection between Maislin and the Bronfman interests?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would be very happy to leave the hon. member in the gutter he seems to enjoy and tell him I have never at any time received any representation from either Mr. Charles Bronfman or anyone connected with the Kemp Investment group, or anything of that nature. I can say that categorically and emphatically, and the hon. member can stay in the gutter he seems to enjoy.

SHIPBUILDING

REQUEST FOR PLACEMENT OF ORDERS IN CANADA

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, and it concerns the more than 15,000 man-years and the jobs we have lost in the Canadian shipbuilding industry, which have affected employment in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia directly. Yesterday an industry spokesperson pointed out that the contention of the minister last week that the shipbuilding industry in Canada is uncompetitive is competely false. Earlier a report prepared for another government department by a government-hired expert also indicated that what the minister contends is false. The report indicated that the Canadian shipbuilding industry is quite competitive.

In light of this, I would like to ask the minister if he will guarantee that all the shipping requirements in relation to resource project needs in many provinces in the years ahead will be met by ships produced in Canada by Canadian workers.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, first I would like to clarify what has been attributed to me as a sweeping indictment of the Canadian shipbuilding industry. In the comments I made in Halifax on the Canadian economy, those particular comments were directed to the general economic situation in the country, including the over-all productivity performance of Canada in comparison with other countries and including the competitiveness of the Canadian economy in comparison with the United States as demonstrated by our rate of inflation and as demonstrated by the level of our wage settlements. Those comments were made in general terms about the Canadian economy, and at no point did I enter into an analysis of the competitive position of the Canadian shipbuilding industry in comparison with the industries in other countries.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, we hope what the minister has said is the case, and that the government has no intention of castigating a particular sector of the Canadian economy which in fact is performing quite well.

REQUEST THAT OVERSEAS PURCHASES BE CURTAILED

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): More specifically, Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether the government will live up to its 1980 election campaign promise, which was to produce an industrial strategy overall, by implementing it with specifics in terms of commitments in the shipbuilding sector. More specifically, will the minister guarantee to the House, that is to say to the people of Canada, that ship requirements—and there will be thousands of them in the years ahead—will no longer be met by purchase offshore, whether from Belgium or Korea, to name two countries that are getting significant orders in the near future, but in fact will be met by Canadian producers so that Canadians and not those offshore will get the needed jobs?

• (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has underlined one of the objectives of the Government of Canada, namely, to ensure the highest possible Canadian procurement in the offshore industry. That is one of the objectives that has been followed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it will be pursued. I ask the hon. member to reflect a moment on his question. Is he asking the government to give an ironclad guarantee—

Mr. Broadbent: Don't use that phrase. A real guarantee, not an ironclad one.

Mr. MacEachen: —an ironclad guarantee that, regardless of costs, all equipment required will be purchased in Canada? If he is making that suggestion, then who does he expect will pay the additional amount? I cannot give the kind of guarantee that the hon. member wants me to give in light of the condition of the Canadian treasury.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DIRECTORS OF QUEBEC AMPUTEES' ASSOCIATION

Madam Speaker: I also wish to draw the attention of the House to the truly remarkable presence in our gallery of Mr. Gilles Cédillot and Mr. Henri Gagné, who are, respectively, founder and director general, and chairman, of the Fédération d'entr'aide aux nouveaux amputés du Québec, and have almost finished a trip of some 4,000 kilometres they undertook in order to help amputees.

SHIPBUILDING

DOME PETROLEUM REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is supplementary to the industrial strategy question and concerns the government's prodigal son, Dome Petroleum.

[Translation]

Now that the superport project at Gros-Cacouna has been abandoned and there is a possibility of lay offs at the shipyards of Davie Shipbuilding Limited in Lauzon, and considering that Dome Petroleum intends to have five tankers built in Japan for the British Columbia gas project, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the government, to balance its assistance to Dome Petroleum, take over the shipyards in Lauzon and, as part of an industrial strategy, set up a shipbuilding project, either in Lauzon or elsewhere in Canada, so that we will be able to transport our own resources?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, first of all, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway on the excellent results of his course at Laval University in Quebec City. I can inform the hon. member that negotiations with Dome Petroleum have not been finalized, and that no decision has been made to the effect that the Government of Canada is going to help Dome Petroleum. However, among all the possibilities considered, we did not consider taking over or acquiring this particular shipyard. The issue raised by the hon. member is, of course, a very important one, namely, opportunities for Canadian businesses to expand their share of profits resulting from sales of natural resources, especially abroad. Regarding the Dome Petroleum project, and especially the sale of liquefied gas to Japan, I have already had some discussions on the subject with representatives for Dome Petroleum and the Japanese interests concerned, and I recently received a message from Dome Petroleum to the effect that they would see to it that there were balances in the agreement concluded with the Japanese so that, especially as far as the methane tankers were concerned, Canada would have at least a 50 per cent interest. As for the rest of the project, Canadian ownership will be around 80 or 90 per cent.

INDUSTRY

ENTERPRISE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM—ELIGIBILITY OF SERVICE INDUSTRIES

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who held forth the Enterprise Development Program as a possible solution to those companies whose continued existence might be preserved were the government to guarantee existing debt. Having now had a chance to read the regulations under that program in the brochure, I presume the only part of the program for which such companies could qualify would be the loan insurance for adjustment projects. There is no indication that service companies qualify under that particular project. As a matter of fact, it mentions specifically manufacturing and processing only. Can the minister advise whether that program has now been enlarged so that many thousands of Canadian companies that could be saved from bankruptcy in the service industries could make application?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we are working now on the question of appropriate changes to the regulations so that, if they are accepted, consideration can be given to applications made by service sectors in support of manufacturing and processing activities. I think this is consistent with what I was saying on earlier occasions.

Mr. Jarvis: Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister will take this opportunity to advise when those regulations will be changed, because he invited applications yesterday. It seems rather foolish to make application for a program whose regulations do not provide for any possible acceptance of the application.

FORGOING OF LOAN INTEREST PAYMENTS

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We heard today that, as part of the Maislin deal, that company will enjoy the luxury of not paying interest for two years under the government guarantee program. The minister has held forth the Enterprise Development Program as the counterpart to smaller businesses—thousands of them across the country. Does that same deal apply elsewhere? In other words, if a corporate constituent of mine makes an application, will he be afforded the opportunity of postponing or forgoing interest for two years under any guarantee from the Enterprise Development Program?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, with respect to the kinds of companies mentioned by my hon. friend in his earlier question, I said that if applications came I would be happy to draw them to the attention of my colleagues in cabinet for consideration.

With respect to the matter of postponement of interest, that is a matter to be negotiated between a company and its bankers which would then be seeking the government guarantee. The postponement of interest is not a matter that involves payment or nonpayment to the government; we are talking about guarantees of loans made by private sector institutions. If that is part of the package negotiated with a lender, and if on balance, on the merits of the matter—

Mr. Clark: And if, and if, and if.

Mr. Gray: —it is found that there are reasonable prospects for restructuring with the help of loan guarantees which will assist the company to return to viability, then this is certainly something that can be considered.

Mr. Clark: And if they can find a Grit friend.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REMOVAL OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS TO QUEBEC CITY—COST TO ECONOMY OF HALIFAX

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Yesterday the minister informed a press conference that the move of naval reserve headquarters from Halifax to Quebec City "will cost practically nothing for Nova Scotia but will have, by contrast, a very important impact on Quebec". There will be a loss to Halifax of 44 servicemen and women and a substaff of approximately 20. Does the minister expect us to believe that the economy of Halifax is so buoyant that this is practically nothing?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I am very suspicious of the fact that when people in the opposition raise that question they have motives, other than for the good of the Armed Forces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: That is unparliamentary.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Withdraw.

Mr. Lamontagne: As I said the other day, nobody will lose their job in Halifax due to this move. On the military side, this decision involves strictly a posting so they will not literally be giving up their jobs. There are about 20 civilians who might be moved from Halifax if they want to be moved. Hon. members opposite know all about the flexibility of the public service. If they do not want to move to Quebec, then someone else will be hired, and they will be offered jobs elsewhere in the organization.

By the way, yesterday I received a letter from the president of the Maritime Defence Association of Canada who is located in the riding of the hon. member for Victoria, who wrote:

—on the move of the Naval Reserve to Quebec. I had assured him—

He was referring to a conversation with me personally last year:

—that MDAC would support the move, and certainly our position has not changed.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, I think it is very important that we clarify the situation to show that we are not playing politics with defence. I want to mention also that we have the agreement of most of the 18 naval reserve divisions across the country with respect to the move. I think that agreement certifies that there is no politics involved. It is a move to help francophones better serve their country in the navy.

Mr. Clark: What leverage did you use?

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, I am sure that on reflection the Minister of National Defence might wish to withdraw those remarks he made concerning questions asked by the opposition. As for the matter of getting concurrence from people who serve under the minister's command, it is fairly easy if they serve under his command to get concurrence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONSULTATION WITH SECRETARY OF STATE

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I am a little puzzled about what is going on over there.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McKinnon: I thought I might have equal time, considering the rather lengthy reply the minister gave.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: I know that the United States has Reaganomics and it appears that Canada has a form of "Reganomics" wherein the Secretary of State feels that he is serving Halifax well by spending $100,000 on a bash for 600 sports writers at the All-Star game in Montreal while his seatmate is stealing 60 jobs from his constituency in Halifax.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Could the minister inform the House whether he consulted with the Secretary of State about this move? Could he also tell us whether, before last Friday, he had permission of the cabinet to go ahead with the move?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think it is very clear, and I believe I said before, that it was strictly an administrative move on the part of the Armed Forces. I do not think this represents a change of policy. It is moving and organizing so that francophones can better serve their country in the Navy. That is not a change of policy.

Mr. Andre: Just like your leader.

Mr. Lamontagne: It is a confirmation of a policy to give both francophones and anglophones a chance to serve at all levels of the Armed Forces.

As far as the question about whether I had consulted with my colleague who sits next to me is concerned, yes, I did. He understood the position of francophones in the Navy very well and he was very broadminded about the issue. It is the same as the one I have just cited. When the hon. member for Victoria said that some people under my command in the reserve are following just like sheep, I hope he will realize that he said that in the presence of all these people.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAELI BOMBARDMENT OF BEIRUT

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[English]

Earlier on today the House in its generosity, on Raoul Wallenberg's seventieth birthday, recognized his heroic deeds. That motion was moved by the hon. member for Laurier, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo and the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill. Everybody agreed to that motion. But the House seems to have been less generous with another motion, and that leads me to my question. It seems the person who said no to the other motion presented by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party is ready to reconsider—

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question? He cannot revert to a motion the House has already dealt with.

[English]

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, will the minister agree to this House demanding that the Government of Israel instruct its armed forces to cease the violent bombardment of Beirut?

• (1440)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think no useful purpose would be served in attempting to revert to a motion under Standing Order 43 on this, but I am very happy to state our position. Yesterday we made a demarche to the Israeli government, protesting the bombardment up to that point of West Beirut and saying that the process should be seen as reflecting a deep and growing concern in the Canadian Parliament and public over the impact upon civilians of the Israeli bombardment of Beirut.

I want to say today, having yesterday brought a message of restraint for Israel to the United States Secretary of State, and having stated that position publicly there, that the new bombardment today is an extraordinarily unfavourable development for peace. It is hard to understand how the Government of Israel thinks it can advance the cause of peace in this direction, at a time when negotiations appear to be taking hold. We are very disturbed by it. We protest in the strongest way against this resumption of hostilities, and we hope that it will cease forthwith.

CRIMINAL CODE

PASSAGE OF RAPE LAW AMENDMENTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. For the past two years the House and the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs have been considering legislative proposals to overhaul Canada's archaic and ineffective rape laws. The minister knows that we on this side of the House were and are prepared to consent to a speedy debate on these long overdue amendments, despite the fact that some Conservative members, the dinosaur wing of that party, have so far blocked passage of the bill.

Mr. Chénier: You are to blame.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): If the House does not pass this bill tonight, which would be a travesty of justice to thousands of victims of sexual assault, will the minister assure the House that this session will not be prorogued in the fall until the bill, with all the amendments to which we agreed yesterday, including those on previous sexual history and spousal immunity, has finally been approved by the House?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I think the great majority of hon. members of the House would like this bill to be passed. I am still hopeful that there will be an agreement so that we could pass the bill between six and eight o'clock tonight. I think everyone will be happy if we can achieve that goal.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, surely if we can pass pay increases for Members of Parliament in two hours, we can do the same with rape legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Don't be stupid. You will kill the bill.

Mr. Clark: You are trying to sabotage the bill again.

Mr. Mazankowski: Sleazy.

Madam Speaker: Order.

REQUEST THAT SUPREME COURT DECISION BE REVERSED

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Over 22,000 Canadians from coast to coast, as well as every national and provincial women's organization, have expressed their outrage at the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Regina v Pappajohn, endorsing the defence of honest belief without reasonable grounds. Despite the fact that the Conservative Party supports the Pappajohn decision, will the minister finally agree to amend Canada's rape laws to reverse this decision, called by some the "rapist's charter", which denies the fundamental principle that "no means no?"

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I think it is evident that, if the hon. member were to be more moderate in his statements, it would be easier to pass bills.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: But I think he has matured a little; yesterday he agreed with me for the first time in his life, so I will not say any more.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REMOVAL OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS TO QUEBEC CITY—QUERY RESPECTING CABINET DISCUSSION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Defence will be aware that when he uttered the great words that he does not play politics with defence, he was the one who in fact moved the 880 Squadron to Summerside and followed it up with the 420 ARS, which is now for all intents and purposes defunct and dead. I would like to have it absolutely clear as to whether or not the question of the first step toward bringing about a greater naval presence in the province of Quebec, in principle, was discussed by cabinet. If not, why was it not discussed by cabinet? The simple explanation that it is administrative in its intent and in its end is not sufficient to answer the growing fears in the Halifax-Dartmouth community.

While he is on his feet, he might as well respond to the very open invitation left by the Prime Minister yesterday when he invited ministers—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Madam Speaker: Order. Order.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East should know better than to ask a question about what was discussed in cabinet. As far as moving anything else from Halifax is concerned, there is no plan to move anything at the moment, not more than we have done before. Perhaps the hon. member is aware that we are spending at the moment over $260 million for new facilities in the dockyard in Halifax. This provides 3,850 man-years of work in that area. I do not think he can argue much about that.

Mr. Forrestall: The minister has complained about the extravagance of defence spending in Nova Scotia for two or three years now. Frankly, I am just a little fed up with it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I asked a very specific question as a result of an invitation by the Prime Minister yesterday, as reported at page 19948 of Hansard, in which he said:

—I would be happy if any minister wanted to raise this in full cabinet. We have a full cabinet meeting on Thursday and, if any minister wants to raise it, I would be happy to deal with it.

I ask the Prime Minister whether or not the Secretary of State, or any other minister, has had the guts to take this in front of his full cabinet, because you are not telling the truth.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East knows that he has to rephrase his question, or would he simply withdraw the last part of it?

Mr. Forrestall: When the minister indicates to the House that he does not play politics with national defence—

Madam Speaker: I need a simple withdrawal.

Mr. Forrestall: —I wonder if he has the courage to answer. I do withdraw.

Madam Speaker: Thank you very much; it is withdrawn.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, it is true that there is a cabinet meeting tomorrow. If any of my colleagues want to raise the question, I have no objection. But I think it probably takes more guts to accept the truth that in Nova Scotia the Department of Defence is spending a lot of money. It is treated better than any other province in the country. This is the truth about Nova Scotia, and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East should know that is the truth.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

DISAPPEARANCE OF QUANTITY OF SEIZED DRUGS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It arises from today's startling story that a large quantity of illegal drugs with a street value of several million dollars, which were seized last year by the RCMP, disappeared as a result of a foul-up at a Toronto incinerator, and found their way into the hands of individuals who were arrested just last month by the Toronto metro police. Can the minister tell the House whether a spokesman in his office, who is quoted as saying that the Solicitor General will not be making a ministerial investigation into this matter, was reflecting accurately the minister's lack of concern about this serious incident?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I do not know who the spokesman is supposed to be, but I do not agree with that statement. I can assure the House that I have already asked the RCMP for a full report on the matter. I will see, when I get the report, if any further investigation is justified.

I understand from the investigation to date that, of the 13,000 pounds of drugs which were sent to be burned, it is now established that only 35 pounds are unaccounted for. This is far from the $10 million value shown in The Toronto Star. But, I am looking into the matter, and I hope to be in a position to decide shortly whether any further inquiry is justified.

• (1450)

REQUEST FOR MINISTERIAL INVESTIGATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, surely the minister is aware that there is quite strong disagreement, to put it mildly, among at least two police forces in this country as to exactly what quantity of drugs are missing, and therefore, obviously, whether it has all been recovered or not. Considering the impact of this upon the reputation of the RCMP, for whom the minister is responsible, surely he should be giving this matter his most serious personal attention with some type of ministerial investigation, apart altogether from the RCMP investigating the RCMP. Surely, for the sake of the continuing fine reputation of the RCMP, something more than an internal investigation is required.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, that may well be the case. I would be prepared to consider further inquiries, but I think the proper place to begin is with the RCMP by asking them for their explanation and for an analysis of exactly what has happened.

The article in The Toronto Star seems not to be founded since, as I say, the current view—and more investigation is under way as I mentioned—is that only 35 pounds of the 13,000 pound are not accounted for.

CHARTER OF RIGHTS

LEGAL COSTS FACED BY ENGLISH SCHOOL APPLICANTS IN QUEBEC

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Madam Speaker, since 1978 the federal government has helped citizens and groups finance legal actions against provincial legislation which contravened Sections 93 and 133 of the Constitution. With the new Charter of Rights and the Canada clause, will the government now provide financial assistance to individuals in Quebec who are seeking admittance to English schools this fall under the Canada clause? The Prime Minister understands that, if the Charter is to be effective and meaningful, citizens must have means to enforce these rights in the courts, even to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not think that I could give a blanket guarantee that the government would guarantee in advance legal costs of any and every citizen using the Charter of Rights to plead their rights. That would entail unknown costs and uncalculated expenditures. But if the hon. member is suggesting that we look at the guarantee of a particular section, I am prepared to discuss the matter with my colleague, the Minister of Justice.

There again, I am sure that many citizens and groups, now that we have a full Charter of Rights for the first time, will be claiming that their particular rights are the ones that should be defended at the public's expense. I am afraid that it might open a door that even the treasury of the Government of Canada could not easily enter. However, I am prepared to look at the particular aspects suggested by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East.

EMPLOYMENT

CANADA COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROJECT—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister recently announced the allocation of $270 million for the Canada Community Development Project. Only 6 per cent of these funds will go for jobs in British Columbia. Will the minister explain why British Columbia rated such a low priority for jobs when unemployment there has more than doubled over the past year? There are 50 per cent lay-offs in the forestry and mining industries, and in my riding of Vancouver East, like many others, claimants for unemployment insurance have risen by up to 240 per cent. Most of these people are now off unemployment insurance and going on welfare. Will the minister explain why we received such a low allocation and what he will do about it?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we certainly are very well aware of the serious problems faced by the people of British Columbia, particularly those in the mining and forest industry. I find it very surprising that the hon. member would say that there is such a low increase when, in fact, we increased the allocation to the province of British Columbia by 162 per cent, which seems to be a fairly generous contribution to help the unemployment problems in that province.

ROLE OF LOCAL ADVISORY GROUPS IN ALLOCATING FUNDS

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. During recent weeks Liberal Senators in British Columbia and Saskatchewan, acting under directions from both the minister's and the Prime Minister's office, have been playing pork-barrel politics with the allocation of employment funds within opposition constituencies under the guise of the Immediate Employment Stimulation Program, ignoring the nonpartisan priorities established by local advisory boards and often over the objections of the minister's own regional and local officials.

In view of this experience, and other information from within his department, is it now the intent of the government to wipe out the role of local advisory boards with regard to the allocation of employment funds under the Canada community development program and to return to the old Liberal-Tory style of wasteful and insensitive arbitrary allocation?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if we clear away the verbiage, the fact remains that the system which we established two years ago, after the previous government cancelled all the direct employment programs, was to return the responsibility to the constituency and to the Member of Parliament to give advice on the projects in those areas. That is still the case and it has not changed.

I do not know exactly what the reference is by the hon. member other than that through the budget allocation of the Minister of Finance, there are certain departments where projects which were on the shelf could be put into job creation in an immediate way are being allocated. It is only normal for the regional minister to make those announcements.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR FIRST MINISTERS' MEETING ON PROGRESS OF GOVERNMENT RESTRAINT PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Some provincial governments have committed themselves to the federal government's 6 per cent and 5 per cent restraint policy and program. Some have accepted variations and are pursuing them and some are still silent. Would the Prime Minister advise the House whether he is planning a second meeting with the premiers in the near future, and particularly before the start of the new session on October 27, first to brief the premiers collectively on the relative progress of the restraint program and, second, again to solicit their collective and individual support for the national restraint program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do plan to do that very thing in correspondence with the Premiers before their meeting in late August. I do not plan to do it in a personal meeting, but through correspondence.

The agreement that we reached when we last met at the end of June was that it was generally felt that it was inappropriate to have another federal-provincial first ministers' meeting before the premiers met in Halifax in the last week in August. But hopefully enough progress will be made there that we will find it useful to meet again sometime in the fall on the very subject which is of concern to the hon. member and, I hope, to all members of the House. Therefore, the answer is, no meeting, but a communication very much along the lines suggested by the hon. member.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

APPLICATION OF RATE SETTING GUIDELINES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a brief question for the Prime Minister. Would he confirm that he has received a letter from the chairman of the CRTC expressing doubt as to whether or not the CRTC could be required to abide by the 6 per cent guidelines in rate setting cases? If so, has he asked for and received a legal opinion on this question? Can he tell the House of Commons what was the result of that inquiry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am not aware that I have received such a letter from the chairman of the CRTC, but I may well have. I do know that the problem is actively being discussed by members of the government, that some lawyers have expressed doubts along the lines suggested by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and others have expressed the view that there is no doubt. I know that we are looking into that matter.

Parallel to that, it is hoped that, even without that action of the CRTC, various public companies which are in the rate setting business will heed the government's guidelines and will act regardless of whether they are asked to do so by the CRTC.

PENITENTIARIES

VIEWING OF EROTIC FILMS BY INMATES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. I now have a confirmed report that at one of the western penitentiaries the inmates are apparently holding regular midnight soirées viewing erotic video tapes. For example, I understand that "Deep Throat" is considered too tame. They are looking for some heavier erotica. Is it the minister's position that these men who, in free and open society, have not been able to maintain constraint in their lifestyle, are now expected to have free access to material which, in open society, is severely restricted to those people who have maintained constraint on their passions?

• (1500)

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, with the tragic incidents which have occurred in Canadian penitentiaries in recent days, it is astonishing to me that the hon. member repeatedly returns to his favourite obsession, pornographic movies. I will undertake to look into the matter and see if there is any truth at all to the allegations he has made today.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Despicable.

Mr. Friesen: If the minister conducts the affairs of the institutions in the flippant manner he exhibits in the House, there is no wonder that we have problems in those institutions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Weak applause.

COUNSELLING AND DISCIPLINARY ROLES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. There is only one institution in society where a person can be both counsellor and disciplinarian, and that is in the home, in the family. All other institutions avoid that kind of doubling up of roles. Does the minister believe that the correctional service can operate in opposition to conventional wisdom and outside society, and confuse the two roles of counselling and discipline?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, in fact I do believe it. It has been the practice in the Correctional Service of Canada, which was fully supported by the opposition during the short time that it was in office, that custodial and rehabilitative programs can be maintained side by side.

PETITIONS

MISS MacDONALD—RECONSIDERATION OF BILL C-124

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the 318th Report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) on Tuesday, August 3, 1982, and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF NOTICES OF WAYS AND MEANS MOTIONS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The President of the Privy Council, on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, there have been further negotiations and agreements among the parliamentary House leaders.

[English]

On my first point of order, if I may, there seems to be unanimous consent for the disposal without amendment or debate of Motion No. 83 on the Order Paper, which stands in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), and it is to refer two Notices of Ways and Means Motions to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Therefore, if Your Honour were to call Motion No. 83 on the Order Paper, I think you would obtain unanimous consent for the adoption of that motion without debate.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) with regard to the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved:

That the notices of Ways and Means motions to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971, tabled in the House on June 28, 1982, be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and that the committee shall report its findings thereon no later than September 30, 1982; provided that, if the House is not sitting when the report has been completed, the report may be deposited with the Clerk of the House and shall thereupon be deemed to have been laid upon the Table.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

MOTION RESPECTING STUDY OF INDIAN ACT BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): On a second point of order, Madam Speaker, there has also been agreement among House leaders in relation to a motion which is not on the Order Paper but which has been circulated to those interested. It is standing in the name of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro). It is rather long. If hon. members insist that it be read, it can be read. If not, I can assure my hon. friends that the copy I will give to the Clerk is the copy which was circulated. But if hon. members prefer that the motion be read, I understand that the minister is willing to read the three pages.

Some hon. Members: No, dispense.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, we have had an opportunity to review this order before this moment, and we would be in agreement with it being tabled and reprinted in Hansard without being read.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, we would also be prepared to have the motion tabled and printed in Hansard without it being read.

Madam Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

[Editor's Note: The motion referred to above is as follows.]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved:

That:

1. The Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development be empowered to study the provisions of the Indian Act dealing with band membership and Indian status, with a view to recommending how the act might be amended to remove those provisions that discriminate against women on the basis of sex.

2. The committee shall report its findings thereon no later than the first day the House resumes sitting, provided that, if the House is not sitting when the report has been completed, the report may be deposited with the Clerk of the House and shall thereupon be deemed to have been laid upon the Table.

3. The Standing Committee be further empowered, following its report to the House on the aforementioned subject, to review all legal and related institutional factors affecting the status, development and responsibilities of band governments on Indian reserves, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing:

(a) the legal status of band governments;

(b) the accountability of band councils to band members;

(c) the powers of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in relation to reserve land, band moneys and the exercise of band powers;

(d) the financial transfer, control and accounting mechanisms in place between bands and the Government of Canada;

(e) the legislative powers of bands and their relationship to the powers of other jurisdictions; and

(f) the accountability to Parliament of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for the moneys expended by or on behalf of Indian bands; and make recommendations in relation to the above questions in regard particularly to possible provisions of new legislation and improved administrative arrangements to apply to some or all band governments on reserves, taking into account the various social, economic, administrative, political and demographic situations of Indian bands, and the views of Indian bands in regard to administrative or legal change.

4. The committee, in carrying out its review, take into account:

(1) the jurisdiction of the federal government under Section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867;

(2) the recognition and affirmation of existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples in Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982;

(3) the current economic restraint program of the government;

(4) the fact that a First Ministers' Conference will be held for the purpose of identifying rights of the aboriginal peoples.

5. It be an instruction to the committee that it appoint a subcommittee for the purposes mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 3 respectively;

6. Each subcommittee, where it is deemed necessary, travel to major centres to hold hearings;

7. Each subcommittee be empowered to employ administrative and clerical staff as may be deemed necessary.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISPOSITION OF BILL C-126

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): On a third point of order, Madam Speaker, there is a very short bill which is not yet on the Order Paper entitled "An act to amend the Financial Administration Act", and it deals with credit unions. The bill has been circulated to those interested and it seems there is unanimous consent for the notice to be dispensed with and for the bill to be introduced now, that it be dealt with when we reach Orders of the Day as the first item of business and that it go through all stages, second reading, Committee of the Whole and third reading without amendment or debate. If that bill could be introduced and receive first reading now, or when we reach Orders of the Day, second reading could be called and we will dispose of all stages without debate and go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Yes, Madam Speaker, since that bill is an exact replica of the bill introduced as a private member's bill by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), we are in agreement with its passage.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, you will recall that I have been attempting to get the government to bring this bill forward for the better part of the last two months. I am therefore delighted to join in the unanimous consent necessary to have the bill dealt with in all stages.

Madam Speaker: If the House will give unanimous consent to waive the notice, then I will present the bill to the House when we come to introduction of bills.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I might rise on a fourth point of order later on to deal with some amendments to the Criminal Code. We are working on the deal, but the reason I mention it now is that if we reach agreement, which is likely, we might have recorded divisions before eight o'clock, between 7.30 and eight o'clock.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. McKINNON—UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE OF MR. LAMONTAGNE

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I would raise a short point of order. In reply to a question of mine today, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) at the start of his reply said: "I question the motives of the opposition questioners." I would like to point out to Your Honour that that was unparliamentary. Beauchesne's fifth edition, at page 103, states that any member, while speaking, must not:

—impute bad motives and motives different from those acknowledged to a member.

I gave the minister the opportunity to withdraw those remarks, and I now feel that Your Honour should ask him to withdraw them.

Madam Speaker: I have not seen the blues, but I did distinctly hear the minister say that he was suspicious. I did not catch the word "motives".

Mr. Clark: I did.

Madam Speaker: If the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) says that the minister did say "motives" and if the minister recognizes that, I must say to the minister that it is unparliamentary to impute to any member or members unworthy motives for their actions in a particular case. So I will leave it in the hands of the minister to withdraw his remarks now, if he recognizes that he has questioned motives. I am sure he did not do it deliberately. At any rate, certain words sometimes come out unexpectedly during the course of conversation.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, being a man of peace and not a man of war, if I have said anything improper this afternoon I withdraw what I have said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT

TABLING OF POLICY STATEMENT ON WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, with leave of the House, I wish to table a document under the heading: "Policy Statement on Western Grain Transportation", which is the government's first reaction to the Gilson report on the same subject.

ATOMIC ENERGY

TABLING OF NUCLEAR INDUSTRY REVIEW: PROBLEMS AND PROSPECTS, 1981-2000

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table, in both official languages, copies of a report entitled: "The Nuclear Industry Review".

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. MAZANKOWSKI—TABLING OF GILSON REPORT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that the minister has just tabled the government's response to the Gilson report. Again we have witnessed in this House a practice which has become increasingly frequent during this session, that is, the failure of ministers to make announcements of substantive policy measures in this House. Instead they have merely tabled a document or issued a press release outside the House. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has demonstrated today once again his contempt and disregard for this institution and for all hon. members of the House of Commons.

• (1510)

This is the third occasion on which the minister has, in dealing with a question of very substantive policy, namely the future of the Crowsnest Pass freight rates in this country, avoided the House of Commons. On February 8 he issued a statement in Winnipeg and that was a substantive statement of policy. The members of the House of Commons did not have an opportunity to respond; they did not have an opportunity to question the minister or to seek clarification on a very important and complicated subject. The opposition had to use an opposition day to get this issue on the floor of the House of Commons.

On June 28 when the Gilson report was released, once again the House of Commons was circumvented. A statement was made in Winnipeg; the minister held a press conference; once again the Members of Parliament and this House of Commons were not involved.

Today we have a statement that has been tabled by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). We do not know what it contains but we do understand that it is the government's response to the report of the Gilson task force. What is further rubbing salt into the wounds of all hon. members is the fact that the minister is going to go outside of this House of Commons and hold a press conference. I believe that is contemptuous and totally disregarding the role, the responsibility and the obligations that we have as Members of Parliament. He merely tables the report today. There is no statement, no opportunity for opposition members to respond. There is no opportunity to seek clarification. He is doing it by press release by tabling a document and holding a press conference outside of this chamber.

We all know this same Minister of Transport a year ago waited until Parliament recessed to make a very substantive announcement with respect to VIA Rail. This has been a habit with this minister and I must say it has been shared as well by other ministers of this government.

I am sure that you realize, Madam Speaker, that the issue of the Crowsnest Pass freight rates is a very fundamental and important issue to the people of western Canada and particularly to the farmers, the producers and the grains industry of western Canada. We all acknowledge that this government does not have any members in this House west of Winnipeg, but that should be no reason why this Parliament should be left out in the cold. We on this side of the House find, the action of the Minister of Transport contemptible. We believe that it constitutes an abuse of the rights and privileges of all members of this House of Commons. We believe it impairs the ability of each and every one of us to discharge our responsibility and to serve our constituents and our region.

I ask you, Madam Speaker, as one who presides over this chamber and who has the responsibility of ensuring that rights and privileges of all Members of Parliament are preserved, to seriously look into this matter and take the necessary steps to see that this practice cease and desist.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, on this issue I think the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is perfectly right. Since about 1975 we have had nothing but a litany of bypassing Parliament on the issue of the Crowsnest Pass statutory grain rates. We have had nothing but a total ignoring of the Hall royal commission by the government. We have had a total refusal by the government to let the Transport Committee—could it be because there are no Liberals from the prairies?—deal with this matter. The minister stacks the deck with organizations that he knows are opposed to statutory grain rates, namely, the private enterprise section of the grain industry. He refuses to consult the grain producers by way of a referendum to give them a choice whether they want the recommendations of Gilson or Mr. Justice Emmett Hall.

This business of using press releases and statements tabled in the House indicates to me that the minister does not want to make a statement on motions so that members of the opposition parties can respond. Instead of that, we have to work in our offices or down in Room 130S to respond to something that is so fundamental to the whole country, as well as western Canada.

Surely the minister should be bigger than he has been in dealing with this matter and should not continue to run around behind the backs of Members of Parliament in dealing with this issue on the last day of this House sitting.

An hon. Member: With no chance to question it.

Mr. Benjamin: There is no chance to question and for the next three months he will spend the summer, as he did with VIA Rail last year, machinating to undermine the western grain producers and the statutory grain rates. That is not the way for a responsible minister of the government to behave on an issue of this magnitude, and I hope the minister will take that into account the next time he has something to say on this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I cannot hear any more interventions on this particular point of order because I think all hon. members will agree that it is not a valid point of order.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

An hon. Member: If it is not, it should be.

Madam Speaker: I must remind hon. members that the members of the executive, the government, have the choice of announcing whatever they want to announce in any way they choose unless they are required under the Standing Orders to do otherwise. Of course, this particular area and this particular matter is not covered by the Standing Orders, and therefore although members might not approve of the way the minister has decided to announce a particular policy or to table a document in lieu of a statement on motions, the hon. minister has the choice of his means. Members might disagree, they might have a formidable grievance; all of that might be true, but it is not a valid point of order and it is not a question of privilege either.

MR. WADDELL—TABLING OF NUCLEAR INDUSTRY REVIEW

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Madam Speaker: I just want to remind the hon. member that he must not come back on this particular point of order.

Mr. Waddell: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) has also just tabled a report on a controversial matter, the nuclear review, equally exciting for the country; the country is interested in this. I cannot even get a copy of it, Madam Speaker. I asked the page to go up to the Table and get a copy—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Waddell: Surely I am entitled to a copy.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a point of order which is quite similar to the one on which I just ruled. He is not happy about the fact that the minister has tabled the document. He is complaining that he cannot find the report, that he has to run after it. That is legitimate, but it is not a point of order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKNIGHT—TABLING OF GILSON REPORT

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I feel there is a question of privilege before this House on the matter of tabling the Gilson report. I feel you have not had an opportunity to take a look at whether privilege has been breached, whether we have been denied as Members of Parliament the opportunity, on something that is very important to my constituency and western Canada, the opportunity to ask the minister questions on something that is as important as the Crowsnest Pass freight rates is to my position as a Member of Parliament. The minister himself, in answer to a question on July 17, 1982, that I asked him, told me that we would have this report on July 29.

Madam Speaker: Order, order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member as well but I am afraid he is arguing the same point under a question of privilege. I am sure he is very unhappy that he cannot ask questions but there are periods in the course of the sittings when members may ask questions of a minister, if they are lucky enough to get recognized, of course. But the hon. member has had his turn. However, that is not a question of privilege.

PETITIONS

MR. KEMPLING—PROPOSED TAX ON EMPLOYER CONTRIBUTIONS TO PRIVATE HEALTH PLANS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, this is a petition of the undersigned residents of the city of Burlington who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that this honourable House will therefore provide a remedy.

The 126 citizens of Burlington who have signed this petition state that:

We oppose the proposed tax on employer contributions to private health services plans and ask that this proposal be withdrawn immediately.

The tax proposed in the November 12 budget and carried over in the June 28 budget is a measure which will hurt low and middle-income families in Canada at a time when many of them are struggling to survive.

• (1520)

MR. SKELLY—B.C. TROLL FISHERMEN

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, the petition which I present here is on behalf of a number of troll fishermen in the province of British Columbia who have been forced, through the narrowness of the plan of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, into a situation which will undoubtedly lead them to bankruptcy and the loss of their vessels. They have appealed to the Canadian government. Their fisheries officer suggests that if they continue fishing or begin to fish outside the fishing plan, the Royal Canadian Navy will be used against them.

In the petition they request that the government, through the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) or senior officials in his department, meet with them to find a more acceptable solution to the impending economic crisis which they face.

MR. SKELLY—SALE OF AIRCRAFT TO HONDURAS GOVERNMENT

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, in addition I have a petition asking that the Canadian government stop its sale of Buffalo aircraft to the government of Honduras, which is supporting Somozista guerillas who have invaded the country of Nicaragua and launched a rocket attack on aircraft in the port of Corinto. They sent in invading aircraft which attempted to bomb an oil refinery inside Nicaragua.

MR. ROSE—MAINTENANCE OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, it is appropriate and perhaps even ironic that I present my petition on the day the government tables its reaction to the controversial Gilson report. People in my province are concerned about the historic Crow rail rate. Therefore, I have the honour to present a petition signed by residents of that province protesting changes in the Crow rate. These residents support their position by pointing out that the changing of the Crow rate will reduce farm income, contribute to the break-up of communities on branch lines and increase trucking and road costs. They therefore request that the Crow rate be maintained in perpetuity, as presently guaranteed by statute.

MR. GASS—BLUE FIN TUNA QUOTA

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I have the duty and the honour to present this petition on behalf of the Eastern Kings Fishermen's Association and fishermen from the fishing ports of North Lake, Morell, Savage Harbour, North Rustico and Malpeque. The purpose of this petition is to request the equal division of the blue fin tuna quota for Prince Edward Island.

The petitioners hope that in your examination of the petition you will find the petition in order and that you will exercise the discretionary powers vested in the office of Speaker of the House to allow discussion and referral to a committee of this issue at the earliest possible time.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HOURS OF WORK

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-662, to amend the Railway Act (hours of work).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. This bill to amend the Railway Act is intended to increase safety in Canada of the operation of trains. At the present time the railways in the United States have a law that railway workers operating trains will not work more than 12 hours if they require rest. When they cross the border to come into Canada, that act is no longer in effect. Sometimes they work as many as 20 and 25 hours without obtaining rest. If this act is accepted by the House, the existing agreements in the United States will carry on when they work in Canada. It is similar to the Canada Labour Code. I think it would be a very worthwhile bill to adopt.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,877, 4,258 and 4,468.

[Text]

ASTRA TRUST COMPANY

Question No. 1,877—Mr. Lewis:

Is Astra Trust Company presently an approved lender for the purposes of purchasing, making and administering approved loans under Part I of the National Housing Act and (a) if so (i) on what date was such a designation approved (ii) who approved the designation and on what basis (b) if not, has the Company ever been so designated and, if so (i) on what date was such a designation approved (ii) who approved the designation and on what basis?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am advised by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows: Astra Trust Company was designated an approved lender by an order in council on November 22, 1979. CMHC reviewed all pertinent information and documentation submitted by the applicant and was satisfied that this applicant met all criteria established by the corporation. On this basis CMHC sought an order in council designating this company as an approved lender.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—CODE OF CONDUCT

Question No. 4,258—Mr. Crosby:

1. Does the Department of Justice have written rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behavior for employees of the department and, if so, are they embodied in a code of conduct or other specific document and is the code or document available to the public?

2. In the five years preceding April 1, 1982, were any employees of the department disciplined by way of suspension, dismissal or otherwise for violations of any rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behaviour for departmental employees and, if so, in each case, what was the name of the employee and the date of the disciplinary action?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): 1. A code of ethics, governing standards of behaviour for employees, is published in the Department of Justice Personnel Administration Manual, to which all employees have access. In addition, all employees are provided with a copy of the public servants conflict of interest guidelines together with an explanation of the particular application of those guidelines with respect to Department of Justice lawyers. A copy is available to the public.

2. In the five years preceding April 1, 1982, only one employee has been disciplined for violation of any of the rules contained in the above documents. The disciplinary action was taken on January 15, 1982. To be consistent with the provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act we are not providing the name of that individual.

SENATE VACANCIES RESULTING FROM CRIMINAL CONVICTION

Question No. 4,468—Mr. Crosby:

1. Since confederation, has any member of the Senate of Canada had his or her place in the Senate vacated by reason of a conviction for felony or any infamous crime and, if so, who was the senator and what was the conviction?

2. What is the procedure or process by which the place of the senator in the Senate is declared vacant if a member of the Senate is convicted of felony or of an infamous crime?

3. Who is the officer of the Crown in right of Canada, or of the Parliament of Canada, responsible for taking action when a member of the Senate is convicted of felony or of an infamous crime?

4. Has the government or any one member of the government examined into the charges under the Criminal Code of Canada against Senator Irvine A. Barrow, following his committal for trial on the charges by a provincial court judge, to determine whether his conviction will constitute grounds for his expulsion from the Senate and, if so, what conclusion was reached?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): 1. According to Beauchesne this question is not in order because it (a) is intended to "seek, for purposes of argument, information on matters of past history"; (b) is intended to "seek information set forth in documents equally accessible to the questioner, as Statutes, published reports, etc." and (c) is intended to "relate to matters which passed outside the walls of the House and do not relate to any bill or motion before the House".

2. This matter relates to the procedure of another place, which is the master of its own rules and processes which the House of Commons may not interfere with or comment upon.

3. See part 2 supra.

4. In addition to the answers given in parts 1, 2 and 3 supra, this question is out of order because it "might prejudice a pending trial in a court of law".

Note: All words quoted in parts 1 and 4 supra are from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fifth edition.

CHARGE CARDS FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Question No. 89—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Which departments, agencies, boards, commissions, Crown corporations or any other government entity, issued charge cards to employees for any job related expenses including transportation, car rental, hotels, meals, etc?

2. In each case (a) how many cards are currently authorized and (i) to whom (ii) what is their position (b) what is the credit limit of the card?

3. In the case of a commercial card, what company issued the card?

4. In each case, what individual has the authority to grant the issuance of such cards and to set the policy for their use?

5. What general government guidelines or regulations govern the issuance and use of such cards?

6. What was the total amount charged on such cards in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977 (d) 1978 (e) 1979 and (i) what was the highest amount charged by an individual during each period and who was the individual (ii) have there been any cases of such cards ordered withdrawn and, if so, from whom, for what reason and by whom?

Return tabled.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I would like to take another run at the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council in connection whith Question No. 4,229, which I placed on the Order Paper on April 6 at the request of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It really is not that difficult a question to answer. It simply asks about the cost of a number of metric kiosks across the country, who is to be working in them and whether those jobs were advertised through the Public Service Commission.

On two occasions the parliamentary secretary told me that he would be quite happy to look into the matter. I presume I am making him quite happy a third time. I would very much like to know why I cannot have the answer to that question, particularly since this is probably the last day of the sitting of this Parliament. When will I get the answer to Question No. 4,229?

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I am sorry, but I do not have an answer for the hon. member today. I will be extremely happy to look into this matter on his behalf.

I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. GUSTAFSON—TABLING OF GILSON REPORT

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just asked the pages of the House for a copy of the Gilson report tabled by the government which is so important to the farmers in my area. I was told that they cannot give me a copy of that report now. It is very important to me as the member representing that area because I have to give an account to the largest wheat-producing constituency in Canada. The minister is dealing with a most important subject that could relate to the future of the farmers in my constituency. I rise on this point of order to ask when this material will be available to members.

Madam Speaker: We have the copy which was tabled. The pages are right, and it has been confirmed by the Clerk, that we have no other material for distribution. I want to assure the hon. member that as soon as that material is distributed, I will have it sent to all members as soon as possible. There is nothing else I can do unless the material is given to me.

• (1530)

Mr. Gustafson: Will that be today, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: I cannot answer that. As soon as I get it, I will distribute it. I cannot answer the hon. member. Only the minister can answer that question.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I think documents which are tabled should be made available to hon. members at the time they are tabled. Hon. members are being deprived of information which has been tabled here. Presumably it is available to the press. The press can comment on it, but Members of Parliament are unable to do so. Therefore, I think we have a question of privilege.

I am surprised that either the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) should dare table in this House reports which are not immediately available to members of this House. I think the House should rise up in anger that this affront to Parliament should take place at any time, let alone at this particular time in the session.

Madam Speaker: There is nothing unusual about what is happening today. There is a copy of the document the minister tabled, and any member can come to the table and consult it. Therefore it is available. As soon as I get copies, they will be distributed; but the document is there and can be consulted.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. We have just been advised that copies are arriving, so the hon. member will be satisfied.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, prior to their arrival just now some of my colleagues went to the Table and asked to see copies of the document. They were not available at the Table at that time. I presume that was about 20 minutes ago, so during the last 20 minutes members of this House have been deprived of a document tabled in this House. I therefore insist that my question of privilege stand.

Madam Speaker: I can only ask the Clerk at the table right now what happened to the document, which was supposed to have been available for consultation.

The Clerk tells me the document was sent down to Journals to be recorded, as is necessary with any document that is tabled, but it came back immediately after it, had been recorded to become available to hon. members. I think the matter is now resolved because we do have extra copies, and we will be more than delighted to distribute them to hon. members.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I wonder if you might consider during the recess whether it would be appropriate to require of those tabling documents that they table them in triplicate in order that there would always be one copy at the Table so that hon. members can in fact have access to it in the event it needed to be photocopied or sent to Journals.

Madam Speaker: I have no objection to any such practice, but the rules require ministers to table only one copy. I cannot force them to table more. If hon. members want to adopt the practice of letting me have more than one copy, I would be delighted, but the rules have been obeyed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT (NO. 2)

MEASURE RESPECTING ACCOUNTS OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-126, to amend the Financial Administration Act (No. 2), be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, in rising to participate in debate at the third reading stage of this bill I want simply to say at the outset that "six and five" is an exciting opportunity for Canada. It has been recognized by Canadians as an exciting opportunity to lead us on the path of recovery in the country.

We know that the problems which afflict the economy are far-flung and that their origins can be found in a complexity of causes, international as well as national. We know that a large part of the solution can be achieved only as a result of actions taken beyond the borders of Canada, particularly in the United States but also in other countries of the western world and, indeed, the world in general. However, we also know that if Canada is to be in a position to benefit from recovery as soon as that can be achieved, we have to do those things which will enable the maximum recovery to occur here and the maximum benefits to accrue to our people. Specifically, that means reducing the rate of inflation in this country.

I do not think there are hon. members who seriously would contend that the rate of inflation in Canada, running so far above that of the United States, is not the major problem and the major threat that is unique to Canada. We have in common with the United States, Germany, England and other countries a tragically high level of unemployment. We are afflicted by the same high interest rates those other countries have. And, as has been said many times, the dominance of the economy of the United States over those of other countries means that the change in interest rates must, to a large degree, be initiated there.

But what this bill is directly aimed at is that problem which is more grave in Canada than it is in the United States, and that is the problem of a rate of inflation that is higher here than in the area in which we sell our goods. If we are to sell our goods in that area, we must compete against United States domestic production. That is the situation with regard to many Canadian products being sold into the American market.

I think I speak safely when I say that the vast majority of the Canadian public recognize the threat inflation constitutes. The interesting factor in relation to this bill, perhaps the most important bill with which we have dealt in this session—and, indeed, for some period of time— is the opportunity it presents to Canadians to aim their efforts directly at combating inflation. It is not that the statutory provisions of this bill alone, by any means, affect a large enough part of the economy to bring about the amount of reduction in inflation that will be necessary in order to maximize the opportunity for Canadians in the recovery period. Rather, it sets a good example. It shows the way, the way that Canadians are already seeing and the way to which Canadian workers, businessmen and professional people react positively in vast numbers all across the country.

• (1540)

It is interesting to contrast the different positions of the two opposition parties on this bill. As I have heard and read the remarks of the official opposition, they are to the effect that restraint is good. The opposition is in favour of the principle of restraint but members say they cannot go along with the bill because it is presented by the government and the system is such that they have to try to make the government look bad and disagree with what it is doing. Since they cannot disagree with the principle of the bill, they try to attack the credibility of the government and spend their time trying to find some group not covered by the six and five as fully as the government intended.

This has been an interesting exercise. As they sought to do that, to their surprise, instead of defending any legitimate exception that has been found, the government has reacted by agreeing to plug such loopholes because it believes all Canadians must share in the sacrifices that are necessary if the program is to work.

I understand the approach of the opposition. That is its role. It is not its function to make the government look good. Even in difficult times when it is important to the country to have a program which can provide possibilities for recovery, as this one can, it is hard for a member of the opposition to say he is 100 per cent behind the program. Hon. members opposite know in their heart of hearts that it is an important program at this time for the country. They hear what the people in the country are saying. Perhaps a great number of people are surprised at how well the public of Canada is reacting to the principle of six and five—to the principle that in general we have to limit what we can take out of the economy if we are to create a climate in which it can grow.

The challenge for the minister who introduced this bill and for all of those on the treasury benches—and I recognize that there are difficulties in the challenge—is to establish our credibility. The challenge is to establish that we are not only reducing the increase in salaries for civil servants to six and five per cent over the next two years, but in the same way that we have cut back on the salaries of Members of Parliament and cabinet ministers, we are seeing to it that the regime, if you like, of six and five applies in every way it possibly can. Certainly it is a question of using leverage.

I was surprised at the criticism made by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The Prime Minister said that taxpayers' dollars are used for programs to provide special assistance to industries that have particular problems—he called that leverage—and that we ask in return that they join this crusade, since they are getting this benefit of special assistance, in helping to cut back by undertaking to keep prices and wages within the six and five margin in their operations. I think that is a very legitimate undertaking. I think it is the responsibility of government to do everything possible to see that this voluntary system works as it applies to the private sector in the country and that as many organizations as possible are encouraged to join and make that element of sacrifice that is necessary if we are going to build for the future in this country and if we are to solve the economic problems that the western world shares with us at the present time.

I was vastly encouraged by the polls conducted by the Gallup organization that showed that something like 80 per cent of the Canadian people would be prepared to take a decrease in pay, let alone a limitation on the amount of increase, in order to work together in the common cause of building a better tomorrow for our country. That is the Canadian way and perhaps we should not be surprised that the public is often ahead of the politicians—it is their world and their country. I am delighted that so many large and small companies and business associations have already endorsed the principle of six and five. I think that is important.

Let me come back to the question of credibility. I want to say to members of the House and to the people of this country that those of us who are in government are determined to do everything we can to see to it that within the government's operations there are no unnecessary exemptions to this program and that everyone shares in the sacrifice that needs to be made.

I would be quick to admit that obviously, as someone said about wage and price controls in the mid-1970s, they constitute rough justice. They do, because if a person is living on a more comfortable level of income then they can stand the gaff of restraint and can cut back to a greater degree than someone who has a limited income. Still, the percentage approach, in dollar terms, hits the person in the higher-income bracket much harder than it does other people.

There has been a lot of debate on this bill. I think hon. members opposite, whatever their approach may be to the exact terms of the bill, will have to agree that the minister has shown a commendable flexibility in relation to its terms. It is not a bill that has been returned for third reading unchanged from its original form. Rather, it has been altered in a number of ways, thus demonstrating the flexibility of the minister and the government. We are not so concerned about the exact wording of the bill; what we are concerned about is that we achieve legislation that will bring about a restraint program within the government service that is an example to the rest of the country and that will achieve the desired goal. There is flexibility in relation to bargaining wages, benefits and non-monetary items.

I could talk about other changes that have occurred but I am satisfied with the reaction of the various organizations in the country and with that of people generally. Hon. members opposite know well what I am talking about when I say that the reaction of the public to this program is very positive.

• (1550)

There is a mood in this country that in my 19½ years in public life I have not seen before. There is a mood of being prepared to share, of being prepared to make the sacrifice and of recognizing that we have to get on with seeing to it that Canada does not lag behind the other countries of the world in building a more prosperous tomorrow and overcoming the incredible economic problems which we have today.

I have said a word about the reaction of the official opposition to this bill. I have spoken about the fact that members of the official opposition do not question the principle. They have tried to find loopholes or have suggested that we were not serious about it or that there would be exceptions and so on, because they have to talk about the bill.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): And improve your bill for you.

Mr. Regan: I suppose to some degree we would have to say that, sure, in their own way they have attempted to improve the bill. I have already pointed out the minister's willingness to examine areas for improvement and what has been done in that regard.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is with Motion No. 3.

Mr. Regan: But the attitude of the public is one that poses a real problem for the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are right.

Mr. Regan: The public of the country is saying that it is better to have a 6 per cent limitation on wage increases than no job at all. People are recognizing the importance of sharing.

Mr. Parker: That is what they said in the 1930s.

Mr. Regan: Yes. My hon. friend and so many of his associates are stuck right back in the 1930s. Ideologically they have never escaped the 1930s, nor have they recognized that these times are different. The Regina manifesto lives forever in their hearts and in their minds so that they cannot deal with today's situation.

I want to say to members of the New Democratic Party that they, unfortunately, have structural encumbrances preventing them from dealing with the wisdom of this bill.

Mr. Murphy: Can you define that?

Mr. Regan: The New Democratic Party never looks better than when it is defending the widows, the poor, the unemployed or the unorganized. As a former Minister of Labour I am fully cognizant of the problem of the unorganized who by far make up the vast majority of the workers, in fact, nearly two thirds of them. They are the people who suffer particularly from inflation. It is the widows, the unemployed, the people on pensions and those with special disadvantages who suffer from inflation. There is no question about that at all. If you look, Mr. Speaker, through the speeches made by members of the New Democratic Party at the different stages of this debate, and there have been ten or 11 of them, you would think that inflation did not exist as a problem, that all we had to do was go blithely along having an inflation rate 6 per cent or 7 per cent higher than the United States and that that poses no problem to Canadians.

Mr. Miller: Who has been in government all those years?

Mr. Regan: My goodness, Mr. Speaker, when members of the New Democratic Party start to yell, it means we are getting close to the bone.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You have hit a soft spot.

Mr. Regan: I have not started to get close to the bone yet. But let me say that the New Democratic Party never looks better than when its members are speaking for the disadvantaged, the unemployed or the poor. However, they have a structural encumbrance in this issue which prevents them from properly representing those they claim to be their clientele. Do you know what they have to decide, Mr. Speaker? They have not done so in this debate but they have to decide whether their primary clientele is going to be the poor, the people who have less in this world and need government help to a greater degree, as we recognize on this side, or whether their primary clientele is the structural alliance that they have with a certain portion of the trade union movement of this country. They are not even allowed by that structural encumbrance to represent the views of the individual members of those unions, let alone the unorganized—the 66 per cent of the ordinary workers—because they cannot displease that small minority who are union leaders. They are a very integral part of their organization, a very important controlling part of their organization. How can they stand and say: "We believe in sharing. We believe all Canadians should share and, therefore, those who are organized and who have the clout to take from the economy more than the economy can properly give at this time should not be allowed to do so but should be restricted to six and five also?"

Do you know what the union leaders say to them, Mr. Speaker? They say: "We are the business agents and if we are not able to go out and bargain and get more and more wages, and if there is going to be some restriction even for a short period of time, then how can we justify our existence to our members?" That is the problem which they confront. Consequently, with this bill the New Democratic Party is in a quandary.

Mr. Miller: We are the only ones who voted solidly against this bill. This bill split the Tories and the Liberals.

Mr. Regan: They are solid all right, from one end to the other. I only want to say that they are blocking their ears to what the people of the country are saying. I do not mean to suggest that members of the NDP are a dull lot because there are some very, very able people in that party. As long as the people can be assured that no one is cheating and that everyone is going to sacrifice, that is what they want.

Mr. Miller: You are 28 and going down.

Mr. Regan: The reason the New Democratic Party cannot do that is that the minority, that part which provides so much of the financing for the NDP, the organized—not all organized labour but part of organized labour in this country—are telling them they cannot do that.

Mr. Miller: What do the banks tell you to do? Are they telling you to keep interest rates high? Is that it?

Mr. Regan: What is the result? The result is that the NDP has to say no and oppose the bill. Its members have to say no to the widows and to the poor. But they know who is affected most by inflation. They know which people inflation hits the hardest. Members of the NDP should look at speeches they have made in the past about that problem. I might say that the constant chatter that emerges from the New Democratic Party benches mean that we are even closer to the bone now and that they are really concerned about the conflict in which they are involved.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You have hit a soft spot.

Mr. Regan: Yes, as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has said, I think we have hit a soft spot. I appeal to members of the NDP. They are elected here as Members of Parliament to represent all of their constituents, not to represent the union leaders of some of the unions of this country. I ask them, as we come to third reading of this bill, to think about the 60 some per cent of the workers of the country who are unorganized and who do not have the ability to get continuous increases in ever larger amounts to keep up with and get ahead of inflation. I ask them to recognize the lack of justice in a system that allows inflation to go unchecked, when those who have the benefit of clout can negotiate renewals and agreements which overcome that problem. But the pensioners, the unemployed and the unorganized of the country are not in positons to do so. That is why they should support this bill.

• (1600)

Inflation attacks those in our society least able to defend themselves, such as the elderly and others on fixed incomes, but it also attacks our valued social institutions like hospitals, schools, churches and charitable organizations.

We have heard, by my count, 11 NDP speakers at second reading and several more at committee stage. None of them has really come to grips with the problem of inflation. They either want to ignore it altogether or declare, as an article of faith, that wages have nothing to do with inflation. I want to say clearly that I am not one who believes that inflation, as it exists in the country, was originally caused, in its latest upward spurt, by wage demands. Certainly I do not believe that it was caused by wage settlements in the public service. However, I do believe that from the point a year and a half or so ago when wages caught up with inflation and started edging ahead we have entered into the extremely dangerous period where wage increases feed on the already existing inflation and spiral it upwards, with devastating problems in the groups of society which I mentioned. Thus we have a situation where wages become a very important part of what must be restrained if we are to achieve success in combating inflation and making a better economic opportunity for Canadians.

In that circumstance the government concluded that because federal public servants are in the service of the public they have a responsibility to set an example and to help show the way. I do not think it is simply because of the fact that it can be argued that they do not face the same danger of lay-off as people in the private sector where, suddenly, there is no money to operate a business and the jobs are gone. I suppose some could say that that is a factor, but I think it is simply that they are a part of government and the public expects an example from government. As long as the example comes from everyone in government, then I believe, as we are seeing, the rest of the country is prepared to follow.

I want to appeal even yet—and I guess it is in vain—to hon. members of the New Democratic Party to recognize not just their responsibility but everyone's primary responsibility to the unorganized, the elderly and pensioners who cannot combat inflation by negotiating a big new increase.

For us to abandon the bill, for us to follow the system that we have, means we would simply end up with the organized and the powerful moving further and further ahead and the squeeze on the rest of our citizens becoming greater. This is why I think the bill is good.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks—and I am now at the conclusion of them—the bill does not begin to touch enough of the over-all economy to bring about what must be achieved in bringing inflation down to 6 per cent. It is not designed to do that. It is designed to show the way, to provide an example by government. My gosh, every day we pick up newspapers or go out into the streets of our home cities and find example after example of how people are reacting. I dare say the minister is surprised—I am—at how positively the Canadian public has reacted to this and what has been the response. You fellows over there in the New Democratic Party should get your heads out of the sand and recognize the real world out there. The NDP should recognize their primary responsibility, overcome their structural encumbrance with their affiliation with trade unions and payment from the trade unions, and recognize that they have a responsibility to the unprotected and the unorganized.

Mr. Rose: Like the pensioners you limited to 6 per cent.

Mr. Regan: That is right, like the pensioners. They have brought in their reinforcements over there. Now they have another member who is feeling a little upset by the remarks being made, but I will not repeat them for the hon. member's benefit; this is a serious matter. I appeal to the NDP to act responsibly, in the interests of the nation, and to stop playing politics to curry favour with union leaders.

The passage of this legislation is an important signal to the Canadian public that we are serious in this restraint program. I appeal to all hon. members, as they go forth from this place and return to their constituencies in different parts of the country, regardless of their political affiliation, to recognize inflation. Let us be honest and say that inflation is a very big problem, and if all Canadians share in a cutback and combat inflation in that way, then we can bring it down. If inflation comes down rapidly from 11 or 11.25 per cent or whatever to 6 per cent, no one will have lost anything as a consequence. But, above all, we will have all shared together.

We live in a country with a magnificent potential. The Canadian people out there are way ahead of us in Ottawa. They are willing to sacrifice and work together to realize that potential. Again my message is that that includes union members. They too are willing to sacrifice, as long as they figure someone is not ripping off the system. Let us all do our job to try to see that there are not exceptions by way of people ripping off the system.

Mr. Rose: Like Bell Canada.

Mr. Regan: Bell Canada is a good example. Let us try to see to it that Bell Canada does not succeed in ripping off the system. Let us try to see to it that no one does. Let us try to see to it that there is no increase of more than 6 per cent unless there is absolutely no way out and credible, legitimate reasons.

Mr. Rose: What about oil prices?

Mr. Regan: The hon. member indicates that they may be a problem. That is something with which the minister has to deal. We all recognize that contractual undertakings with provincial governments may pose a problem. The hon. member should remember in relation to the oil prices which he mentioned that we still have oil prices in the country that are below world prices. Also he should remember that through the National Energy Program we have had a program of subsidizing the price of much of our oil in the country and keeping the over-all price, through negotiations with the producing provinces, below what it is in world markets. That is the situation in relation to oil.

Finally, I want to say it is incredibly important that we do not allow a sense of gloom or pessimism to ride in the country. We are on the path to recovery with this program—not the Canadian government, but the Canadian people by the way in which they are reacting to the six and five policy. They are the ones who are doing it, not us. We are on the path to recovery.

There are things being done in the country. Opportunities lie out there. There are things underway. Let me mention my city as an example. We could use any area across the country and find the great potential which exists there. Yesterday we saw people being terribly concerned about 35 or 40 members of the naval reserve being transferred from one city to another; from Halifax in the east to Quebec City. At the same moment the very same organization, the navy, is expending—and hon. members can go down to the waterfront and see it if they visit the area this summer—$260 million on new facilities in Halifax to modernize the navy, to show once and for all that its headquarters are there permanently. This is providing over 3,500 man-years of employment.

While I talk about optimism, I find it strange that no one goes out into the streets to scream the headlines or issue news reports when new jobs like those are being created or when there is an undertaking which means that the area will be economically sound for a long time as a consequence of that investment. Announcements like that do not seem to gain media attention. Media people do not come to the door of the House of Commons to talk to me about those 3,500 man-year jobs. Instead, they talk to me about the fact that 35 or 40 people will be transferred.

In that great city of Halifax, if you walk about 100 yards from where that $260 million is being spent, you would arrive at the Halifax shipyard where this government has given $43.9 million, along with the provincial government, to create a Panamax drydock which will create 360 new jobs. That drydock is under construction now and will soon be providing permanent employment which will enable Halifax to handle the repairs on types of ships that it never had before.

To me, these projects are very exciting. We have just completed and opened our second container pier, again with the assistance of a great amount of federal money. At the moment, extensions are being built at our airport which indicates how our area is thriving. Three and a half million dollars have been spent on runway improvement and $4 million are now being spent on an entirely new taxiway.

I will not use all of the time talking about Halifax but I use it as an example, as one who loves Halifax. It is an example of the excitement and the opportunities which exist in that city along with the incredible new activity in our offshore. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) was there last week to announce a $500 million drilling program. I have to be very excited about the potential in that area when I see those rigs sitting in the harbour and venturing out to conduct their drilling. I am very excited about the future of all the other sectors.

What we must do in this country is overcome our inflation problems by self-sacrifice and discipline. We must lower the interest rates in common with the United States and other countries. We may then realize the potential that can be used for the young people in this country who can build Canada into what is its destiny as the best place on earth to live.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the minister allow a question since he still has a couple of minutes left?

Mr. Regan: I would be honoured to receive a question from such a distinguished member.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan) must be aware that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) has not spoken on this question in the House yet. He has been muzzled in the House since the introduction of the bill and he has been muzzled in the committee. We have not heard a word from the minister. The Secretary of State, being a former Minister of Labour, must know the rules of the mediation officers, the conciliation officers and the Labour Relations Board. The government has insulted the mediation officers who have mediated for years, signed contracts in good faith which now will be destroyed and rolled back. These contracts were signed, sealed and delivered by companies, the government, the mediation office and employees. Is this the reason we have been unable to question the Minister of Labour or hear him speak on the bill in the House?

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I want to say two things to the hon. member. First, I would say to him that the Minister of Labour is a man for whom I have great admiration. I think he will speak for himself on this subject when the occasion arises. I had admiration for his dedication to the working people of this country long before he came to cabinet, because I have known what his commitment in that regard has been over the years.

The other comment I have to make in answering the hon. member is that when he talks about how this system will upset the regular operations of the mediation and conciliation officers, I want him to back away from the problem and take a broader perspective so he may recognize that we are not talking about something permanent. This is a bill which provides a two-year special program for 6 per cent and 5 per cent. What he has to recognize from afar is that we have an incredibly serious crisis in the western world. Inflation in Canada is a very serious problem. We are talking about a way to try to help all Canadians overcome this problem. If that means interfering with mediation procedures for that period of time, if it means cutting the hon. member's salary for that period of time, then these are the sort of changes and sacrifices which must be made if Canada is to win this battle against inflation. I ask the hon. member to think about that.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time during the debate on this bill that I have had the privilege of following the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan) in debate. I say that kindly and honestly. During this debate on Bill C-124 I have listened to him talk about his optimism and his feeling for the innate strength of the country. I want to tell him that I share the same sense of optimism and the same feeling for the innate strength of the country. I believe that most Canadians share that feeling as well.

Having said that, I think we must ask ourselves a couple of questions. What has happened to the realization of these goals over the last few years? Can the failure to achieve those goals be blamed on the Americans, the Europeans or the weather, or have we lost some of the gold and glitter from the opportunities Laurier spoke of?

Perhaps the reason is that there have been some rather disastrous policies, policies for which this minister is not personally responsible since he has only graced us from the wreckage of his own government in Nova Scotia some years before. I do not say that unkindly. I am glad that he came here.

As I reflect on the changes which have occurred in our country which have required us to be asked to lower our expectations, I believe the fact that the country is strong, worthy and has a long-term stability to which it can look forward has been true during the past 14 years. However, what has happened is that during that time, unfortunately for Canadians, we have not had a government which has been worthy of the country and its potential. That has been the problem.

When the minister says that it is the opposition who desire to make and are trying to make the government look bad, I would suggest to him that we have not had to work at making the government look bad. In fact, the propaganda from the other side has been that we have been ineffective in that attempt. If that latter statement is true, and Canadians think the government is bad, which I generally accept, the government has done that all on its own. They can credit it to no one else.

When the minister says that the great challenge that faces the government is credibility, he is right. That is the great challenge it faces. As a Canadian who wants to see the country prosper, as a Member of Parliament who does not want to see men and women come to my office because they cannot find jobs after they have trained for them, as a Canadian who does not want to meet desperate farmers who have accepted the government's advice to invest only to find their investment going down the drain, or to see small-business men beside themselves trying to save their dreams, I want the program to succeed. I want the country to succeed. The people want the country to succeed. If groups of Canadians are gathering around this program, and I think there is some indication that they are, it is not in support of the government. They have given up on the government.

• (1620)

Mr. Darling: It is despite the government.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is despite the government and in support of the country. That is the mood, if there is a gathering around. I believe there is, and I hope it continues.

I am astounded, relieved and delighted to know of the intimate knowledge of the Secretary of State of the structural problems of the New Democratic Party because I have really wondered about that party during the course of this debate. I will be speaking about that in a few moments. I must say to the New Democratic Party that if the Secretary of State is right, and I believe he is, that the New Democratic Party is out of the mainstream of thought in this country, then its members must very seriously consider their position with respect to this bill, because not only do they have a responsibility to their constituencies, but also to the country. Before this debate is over, I hope that its members will be moved from the position which they have taken with respect to this matter, which is to deny the existence of a desire, a mood, a feeling in the country that something must be done, not to save the government but, rather, to save the country.

I want to call the attention of my good friends to what happened in the province of Saskatchewan to a New Democratic Party government which left the mainstream. Many hon. members to my left—this applies to some from British Columbia—will have to go back to the good, solid, clear-thinking, clear-headed people of Saskatchewan and tell them that when the country required their aid and assistance, they did not stand forward and say, "Ready, aye, ready." That is important to them as a party. I want to call that to their attention because I believe they should be able to say to the good, solid people, who demonstrated their strength, solidity and good sense not too long ago in an election which was held in that province, that it is important that there be a gathering together of the strengths in this country.

I want to read part of the most moving testimony heard by the miscellaneous estimates committee. I believe it sets the appropriate tone for this debate. This was testimony given by Dr. Carl Beigie, who is the chairman of the C.D. Howe Institute, one of the most noted policy analysts in North America. I would like to read what he said about the state of the country. This is not what a member of the House of Commons said, not a Liberal, Conservative or New Democrat. It was a policy analysis by a person whose job it is to report and analyse the appropriateness of policies of government.

I should say to the House that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) was present at the committee hearings. He will know that of all the witnesses who appeared, Dr. Beigie was the only witness who met with the spontaneous applause of all the members of that committee. It was one of the most impressive pieces of evidence that I have ever heard at a committee hearing. In the report of the miscellaneous estimates committee for July 22, 1982, issue No. 92, at page 92:47 Mr. Beigie states:

> There is no magic formula, no theory, no formula, no overwhelming historical evidence which exists to tell us how we can get out of the situation we find ourselves in.

He was really expressing, on behalf of Canadians and, I hope, on behalf of Members of Parliament, that somehow this program, as inadequate as it is, as has been admitted by the Secretary of State, is at least one which will set the mood. But he warned us that there is no magic formula. He also expressed the necessity for hope that that would happen. Then he said:

> —there is no easy way to bring down a high rate of inflation. The difficulty of the task of bringing down inflation becomes greater, the longer high inflation persists.

He went on to state:

> Canada's evolution as a society has been marked by the progressive expansion and extension of freedoms. If this evolution is to sustain a forward momentum, individuals throughout this nation must begin to display greater awareness that expectations for more rights, and particularly the rights resulting from improved standards of living, can only be satisfied with the acceptance of more responsibilities for the nurturing of the collective interest.
> Canadians may, or may not, have become soft. What happens with the passage of time will determine the answer to that question. I am convinced, however, that many of those Canadians who value individual liberty have been asleep. They have been lulled quietly into this state by tales of an abundance of natural resource wealth which could keep us, Canada, from experiencing severe economic distress. Millions of Canadians are today experiencing distress. For many, this distress amounts to little more than inconvenience—something like the discomfort of indigestion following a bout of overeating. For a large and growing number of Canadians, however, the distress has become acute, caused not by the frustration of having unrealistic expectations denied, but by a fundamental denial of their ability to meet their hopes for an even modest level of security and wellbeing. This is the tragedy of inflation in its full human dimensions, and it is a tragedy which is virtually inevitable to at least some degree, if a society refuses to co-operate in an exercise of collective responsibility to keep general price rises within reasonable limits.

By that, he set a challenge for this House, for that committee certainly, and for the country. It is our challenge now. We are dealing with this piece of legislation. That is all. No member of the government should ever fool anyone that this is the be-all and end-all of the battle, which is a battle for all Canadians. That is not the intention of the legislation. Any comment to the contrary by any hon. member of the House of Commons would mislead the public. The Secretary of State is right: the government is trying to set a mood. I am one Canadian who joins many Canadians on this side of the House in the hope and prayer that that mood will grab.

I do not want Your Honour to think that there are not differences among the parties in the House with respect to this bill. There are some vast differences. I am not the least bit overwhelmed with happiness about this bill. What is the Liberal Party's position with respect to the bill? First, the Liberal Party says, "We believe in restraint." That is a deathbed repentance by the Liberal Party because for 14 years the leader of this party, his predecessors, and members of this party have been telling the government that it ought to remember the biblical injunction to store up in the good years and save against the bad. Instead of doing that, the government squandered the opportunities of the seventies and the late sixties in Canada. That is why we are debating this bill.

• (1630)

The first principle in this bill is restraint. The second thing it shows about this government is that, having given lip service to collective bargaining in the public sector and elsewhere, we find that the government is really fearful of collective bargaining, because when that bill first appeared there was a blunt instrument in it with respect to collective bargaining. You could not collectively bargain about anything.

An hon. Member: You still cannot.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The members of the New Democratic Party say you still cannot. I think they are probably technically correct but at least there has been a movement towards collective bargaining in the sense that the government softened it. I think you would have to admit that, to be honest. It would have been much more honest if the New Democratic Party had accepted the amendment that we put in this House last night which would have allowed collective bargaining on all issues, and ultimately the resolution of those issues to a much greater degree and to a much greater extent than even the government has allowed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): But the New Democratic Party, with all the consistency of the wind, which can blow from all points of the compass from time to time—

An hon. Member: Look who is talking.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —decided to vote against that in committee, and they are going to have to answer to their organized constituency for that. But that is their problem, not mine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The Progressive Conservative Party, if you read the speeches, if you read the statements that have been made over the years, has consistently warned against improvidence in spending. When the Hon. John Turner was minister of finance, it began there, in my political lifetime. It was carried on with Donald Macdonald who followed him. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) when he was minister of finance, who followed him, was a spender, a marvelous spender. Even the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who unfortunately is not here today, I am sure for good and sufficient reasons, carried on the tradition—spend, spend, spend, do not think of tomorrow.

They did that—and, I have to say it, perhaps we were ineffective—against the advice of this Parliament, against the advice of the people who commented on the economic affairs of the day. That is what they did. We have always stood for restraint, always consistently stood for restraint.

The other thing we have done, and which we have exhibited in this debate is stand for the collective bargaining process. The collective bargaining process in Canada has come to mean, among rational people, the sitting down of two sides, the employers and the employees, to work out their differences as sane people. For the purposes of this bill we said that we wanted that process to continue within the cap of six and five, recognizing the fundamental principle of restraint.

The New Democratic Party is different. They believe in collective bargaining. They believe in freedom, untrammeled freedom.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): As exhibited in this debate, they believe in freedom to the point of irresponsibility.

An hon. Member: Who was irresponsible in 1979?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): But the one thing they do not believe in, and let us make no mistake about it, is restraint. They do not believe in restraint, and with respect to that the New Democratic Party is out of step with the country. As a matter of fact, they are not even marching on the same street with the country. They are marching to their own drummer, whoever that drummer is, and I will not name the drummer. In any event, he is leading that party into a dead-end street.

Miss MacDonald: At 23 per cent.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is too bad because they could have, I believe, at the committee stage, gone a long way to have brought the government even further to respect the process of collective bargaining, but they choose not to do it.

I gather from the heckling and from the speeches of the NDP that they intend to vote against the bill. I would hope otherwise but I gather that that is what they intend to do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want to remind them when they do it that contained in that bill is a very important section which, if it is approved by this House, will reduce the salary and allowances of Members of Parliament; and I want the country to know when the New Democratic Party votes against this bill that they are going to be voting to maintain their salaries and allowances—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —which the country thinks should be reduced, and which I think should be reduced from the point of view of leadership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They had better understand that, because while there is in that bill the principle of restraint—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a feeling I am getting to a soft spot again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I did not intend to do that. Everyone knows me as a rather mild member, but I want to tell the New Democratic Party and also the Canadian public who is watching this debate that when that vote is cast tonight every Member of Parliament in this House—and I do not care where he sits—who votes against this bill is voting to maintain the present level of his salary and allowances. He is voting to ensure—

An hon. Member: What about your staff?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He is voting to ensure that Members of Parliament will not form part of this crusade that the government is leading.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I think those are the principles of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) but the Chair has difficulty in following the hon. member's remarks. Could we have some order in the House, please.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. I appreciate the assistance from the Chair, I do not mind the noise. I have always found that one is getting awfully close to the truth when there is a great noise coming from the other side.

I want to speak for one moment about the public servants themselves. You will have to go a long way to find a public servant who will tell you that he is happy to take a pay cut. You will go a long way to find a Member of Parliament who will say he is happy to take a pay cut. You will go a long way to find any people in the gallery today who would be very happy about the idea of taking a pay cut. But I want to say to those people in the gallery and to you, Mr. Speaker, as well as to the country, that I do not think anyone in Canada should regard the public service as made up of second-class citizens. I speak to as many public servants as any member of this House of Commons. They tell me truthfully how they feel about this bill. All of the members of the public service that I have spoken to have cousins and uncles and aunts and brothers and sisters, some of them who worked at Dofasco, some of them who worked in the mines which are closing, some of them who have small businesses that have gone down the drain, farms that have that have gone down the drain. They all have relatives and friends like that. These public servants have always felt themselves fortunate to work in the Public Service of Canada, always. They feel it is a privilege to work for the Government of Canada. In terms of wanting something for their country, they do not take second place to anyone with respect to their desire for their country to get ahead. That is the attitude of the public service. Public servants are Canadians.

The other thing I want to tell the House is this. When I have spoken to them, what they have said is this. They have said: "I can live with the six and five, Mr. Baker; I do not like it, but I can live with it." When they look over their shoulder as time goes on, they want to see other Canadians following behind and joining the ranks. They are not happy to be in the vanguard any more than anyone else. They do not want the vanguard to be the only part of the parade; they want the parade to be joined by others.

• (1640)

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hope the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) will tell the members of this House what drummer he is marching to. Last week his leader said that he rejects wage controls. We would like to know what drummer the hon. member is marching to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it absolutely and completely clear. I am not marching to the drummer from Skeena. I want it clear that I am not marching to that drummer. I want to tell my friend that the Public Service of Canada is not marching to that drummer. Nor are the railway workers marching to that drummer. The workers of Canada have more respect for this than to march to the drummer from Skeena.

I will finish my speech since I understand that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) wants to speak. Public servants in this country want to know that they are not alone in this march. They want to be joined by the government. The government is going to monitor Bell Canada, Air Canada and other services of government. If that monitoring service falls down, the public servants will feel betrayed like every other Canadian.

If the governments of the provinces do not come to terms with rent increases and the operation of their rent review boards, these Canadians are going to feel betrayed. If there is not the same forthcoming attitude in terms of other people in the work force of Canada, they are going to feel betrayed. That work force, whether public or private, will feel betrayed.

In terms of this program, the jury is out as far as the Public Service of Canada is concerned. They want it to succeed. Like other Canadians, they hope it will succeed. I want it clearly understood that it is important that restraint be practised everywhere.

The Secretary of State talked about ferreting out waste in the government. That has to be done. When we look at the processes of our own Parliament, which is supposed to hold government accountable, that has to be done because we have a responsibility.

I started by saying that I believe this country is greater than the government which it has had for 14 years. I want to echo if I can what Dr. Beigie said before our committee, that something has to start, something has to be done. My reservation about the program is not the willingness of the public service to give it a try. My reservation is about the credibility of the government to give the program underpinning.

With those reservations in mind, with the country in mind and with what I believe to be the mood of the country to which the Parliament and all parties must answer, my party intends tonight to support Bill C-124.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Because of the advanced hour, I wonder whether the House would be willing to permit a change in the sequence of speeches.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I understand the minister is seeking the unanimous consent of the House to speak at this time. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question on a point of order? I realize this is a little unusual in the middle of a request for unanimous consent. Can I ask the minister how long he intends to speak before we make our decision?

Mr. Caccia: There is approximately one hour left. My intervention would require some 30 minutes.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, provided the minister agrees to speak no more than half an hour, we would be quite happy to allow him to speak ahead of our member, although it is a departure from the normal routine.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): I will ask the question again. Is there unanimous consent of the House to hear the Minister of Labour at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for giving me consent. I assure the House leader of the New Democratic Party that I will do my best to stay within the 30 minutes, as he has requested.

I would be remiss if I did not begin my remarks by making a brief reference to the various interventions made by members opposite. They made reference to letters recently written by me to the editor of a major national newspaper. I very much enjoyed their interventions. I do not know whether their utilization of my letter to the editor will encourage or discourage future writings on my part. However, I owe them a word of thanks for the free publicity they have given me.

In a serious vein before embarking on my speech, I want to make reference to interventions regarding some mysterious plot or plan on the part of the government to prevent me from appearing before the special committee which dealt with this bill. The inference was that somehow I was prevented from appearing.

Nothing could be further from the truth in that regard. Let me put the record straight. The invitation to appear before the committee was extended for days that I had been scheduled to be out of town. Otherwise, both the minister responsible for the status of women and myself would have been very glad to appear. I am referring to the dates after July 26. Having put that matter to rest, I now want to say the following in relation to the bill before us.

This bill establishes wage restraint by statute in the federal public sector, and by example in the rest of the economy. It is not labour legislation; it is part of the economic policy arising from the last budget. However, the bill has implications for the conduct of collective bargaining and for those terms and conditions of employment that are established in the democratic process.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, labour legislation on the federal statute books today is rooted in acts introduced since the turn of the century by successive Canadian governments. As we all know, these governments were mainly Liberal governments. One stream of legislative development has given us an impressive array of protective provisions which establish important labour standards. These standards include minimum wages, hours of work, vacations and maternity and other special leaves. They also provide for occupational safety and health regulations. These provisions compare well with standards established elsewhere in the industrial world. A second stream of legislation has produced two labour relations statutes governing collective bargaining and related matters in federal industries and the federal public sector of Canada respectively.

• (1650)

Our collective bargaining laws contain many positive features to promote labour stability. The concept of protecting the public interest in collective contract disputes was first introduced some 75 years ago under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with William Lyon Mackenzie King as his deputy minister of labour. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act of 1907 established a concept of public investigation of labour disputes before strike or lockout action could be undertaken. That concept remains an important element of our current laws.

Subsequent additions to our labour legislation have provided orderly procedures for the recognition of trade unions by employers as bargaining agents and for the acquisition of bargaining rights. Elsewhere such matters are sometimes resolved only after bitter recognition strikes.

Perhaps most importantly, our system is built upon the stable foundation of the fixed-term, enforceable collective agreement. The parties are required to honour their obligations to each other throughout the life of their agreements. Grievances arising as to the interpretation or application of the agreements must be settled, without resort to work stoppage, by arbitration or some other means. This feature of our system is perhaps most frequently remarked upon by foreign visitors. Some come from countries where such grievances can lead to sudden and damaging strikes.

In these circumstances I am more than cognizant of the precedent-setting nature of the bill which is presently before us for consideration. I have wrestled long and hard with its impact upon a paramount feature of our approach to industrial relations, namely, the fixed-term, enforceable collective agreement to which I have just referred. Not to have reflected seriously on that aspect of the bill would have been unworthy of the office of Minister of Labour.

Frankly, the most disturbing element of the bill for labour legislation is the override feature. In cases where a wage increase would otherwise have been due on or after June 29 of this year it will be disallowed and a statutory amount will replace it. Instead of a freely negotiated wage increase and other mutually agreed to changes in terms and provisions being allowed to prevail, the law will substitute a prescribed increase and effectively require the status quo to be observed with respect to other items and conditions of a compensation plan.

I am sure that hon. members of this House will share my awareness of the fixed-term agreement as the cornerstone of our industrial relations system. The importance of the sanctity of such agreements within that system cannot be overestimated. Only extraordinary and serious circumstances can justify the extraordinary and serious step of setting aside agreements which have been freely negotiated or which have been concluded on the basis or arbitral awards.

In the past this House has consented to adopt rapidly legislation to terminate specific labour disputes. Such steps have been taken only in emergency situations after very careful consideration. Frequently, support for such legislation has been forthcoming from all parts of the House. We have established, therefore, that there are times when the national interest must override the rights of particular groups in collective bargaining. What we are now considering is legislation which follows the same reasoning, but on a broad front.

The government has concluded that against a background of worldwide economic difficulties, domestic circumstances do warrant the extraordinary and serious measures proposed in Bill C-124. I wholeheartedly endorse this conclusion and, as a member of the government, I stand ready to do all within my power to implement the proposals before us today.

Reactions to our proposals in some quarters suggest that not everybody has realized the seriousness of the current economic situation and its effect upon all Canadians. Some appear not to have accepted the need for rapid implementation of the extraordinary measures proposed. I am encouraged, however, to see signs that important elements of the business and labour communities comprehend the gravity of our circumstances. Regrettably, too many workers in the resource and manufacturing sectors have had the seriousness of our economic problems brought home to them in a very personal way. Employees in the service sectors are also—again regrettably—becoming affected to a significant degree.

The need to start ratcheting down inflation and inflationary expectations has therefore become urgent. Wages in the federal public sector and federally administered prices are two key areas in which the Government of Canada can act directly to achieve that end. With respect to wages, it would be unthinkable to let stand agreements which had been negotiated in the hope of better economic times, now that it has become clear, in Canada and elsewhere, that the better times are not just around the corner. Indeed, the longer action is postponed, the further off these better times will be.

The government's aim is not to undermine collective bargaining. It is a system which, generally, has served us well. It can continue to contribute effectively to important economic processes, such as income distribution and the achievement of improved productivity. However, it is a system which, by its very nature, including its largely decentralized application, cannot be expected to respond rapidly to the economic circumstances with which we are faced today. The government therefore proposes to intervene to ensure that a response from the system is forthcoming.

By interrupting collective bargaining rights the government is doing two things. First, it is indicating to the nation the gravity of the economic situation and the urgent necessity to put our economy on the road leading to recovery. Second, with this bill it is asking federal public sector employees to make a sacrifice and to accept the idea of increases limited to 6 per cent and 5 per cent in order to convince other levels of government, provincial and municipal—and with them the private sector—of the necessity of doing the same. When 6 per cent is the norm, everybody in the nation will be the winner. When inflation, too, reaches 6 per cent—a goal nobody disagrees with—we will have completed the first step towards economic recovery.

The proposals before us today, with one important addition that I intend to deal with shortly, touch only the federal public sector, that is, the Public Service of Canada and federal Crown corporations and their wholly-owned subsidiaries. The federal public sector is not as readily affected or as immediately responsive to market forces as the private sector. Even Crown corporations, which are more oriented toward the marketplace than the traditional public services, are sheltered to some extent.

By limiting the wage increases of persons who, in the broad sense, are federal public sector employees, the government is taking direct action in an important sector of the economy. We are determined to do all in our power to persuade, coax, and induce others, including private sector employers and unions, to take similar steps. If collective action in support of restraint is not forthcoming, the cost of not making the effort will be borne by all sectors of the economy.

The addition to the scope of the bill, to which I referred earlier, involves an incursion into the private sector. The Canadian Pacific Railway and several private short-line railroads operating in federal labour jurisdiction have developed a long-standing bargaining relationship with their Crown-owned counterparts. This voluntary industry bargaining pattern has been encouraged and nurtured, for many years, by officers of Labour Canada in concert with the railway unions and companies.

For all practical purposes, the private sector railways bargain jointly or in tandem with the Canadian National Railways and its short line subsidiaries for contracts with unions representing the respective groups of operating and non-operating railway employees. Over the last few months, the companies and unions bargained responsibly and eventually concluded two-year renewals of their collective agreements which were scheduled to run until December, 1983.

When the substance of Bill C-124 became known, it was abundantly clear that the long-standing bargaining relationship between the public and private sector railways could be jeopardized. Indeed, the railway unions themselves brought the anomalous situation forcibly to the government's attention. Allowing the anomaly to persist would have created untenable stresses in railway labour relations, and within the unions themselves. Removing the anomaly requires following one of two starkly contrasting options: exempt the CNR and its 45,000 or so employees from the restraint program, or include the CPR and its employees in the program.

To have removed the CNR and its employees from the program would have significantly undercut the intent and coverage of the bill. Exempting a major Crown corporation engaged in a vital economic activity would have belied the seriousness of this government's commitment.

Naturally, we would not have expected the railway unions to campaign publicly for including the CPR in the program. However, Canada's railway workers have a long tradition of successful and responsible labour relations. Now that the government has decided to count CPR in, there is not a shadow of doubt in my mind that the railway unions will respect the law in a responsible manner.

I am equally confident that all employees destined to come under the federal public sector compensation restraint program proposed in Bill C-124 will accept the need for the program and its basic wisdom.

Because of the insidious effect of inflation in eroding real earnings the government is launching extraordinary measures, including the public sector compensation program—this bill—aimed at bringing the scourge under control.

The seriousness of our problems is obviously recognized by many in this House. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) made clear his support for the principle of restraint on wage increases when he addressed the bill last Friday. However, he could not accept the limits which are imposed on other aspects of collective bargaining for compensation plans.

He accepts the need for extraordinary measures but he would hamstring the restraint program. Instead of a simple and uniform approach, he would establish a complex and hard-to-administer program. It is questionable whether what he proposes would find much favour among those to be covered by this bill.

As to the proposals made by the NDP, earlier this afternoon the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan) made a very eloquent intervention in which he exposed the dilemma they face in relation to the constituency that they are going to protect and serve.

It is well known to anyone who has engaged in labour relations in Canada at the provincial and federal levels that collective bargaining is the most democratic method yet devised, in a free and growing economy, to protect real incomes, to ensure improved working conditions and to reward real productivity gains with real income growth. However, in a troubled economy the government has to act in the interests of everyone, from the pensioner to the minimum wage earner, from the unorganized worker who cannot command high wages in the marketplace to the unemployed, from the export manager engaged in a price war with foreign competitors to the worker whose job depends on that market.

A responsible government today cannot shrink from the task of planning on behalf of all Canadians. With this bill we are asking one group of Canadians to make a temporary sacrifice for the benefit of all.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia), because I can see why the members of the government who sat on the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates which considered this bill kept him hidden. I can see why from June 30, when the government introduced this bill, until August 3, not one word was heard from the Minister of Labour. I can understand why the Minister of Labour can no longer be considered a defender of the rights of workers in this country.

• (1710)

What the minister did in this House was to read a statement that was obviously prepared by somebody to defend this government's position. In his speech he referred to the quote we have used a couple of times in this debate. It is from a letter which the minister wrote to The Globe and Mail. He stated that the right to strike is one of the important cornerstones of a free and democratic society. That minister did not say the same thing today in this House.

Further on in the letter we read that, "there is clearly room for greater co-operation between unions and employers and that Parliament has entrusted to Labour Canada the responsibility for assisting in the development and maintenance of constructive relationships." What this minister has done in front of us today is to indicate that he has sold out the very principles that he wrote about in his letter to The Globe and Mail. That minister can no longer be trusted by labour. If that minister wants his cabinet spot, he should find another place because he certainly does not belong where he is. He cannot represent labour.

Mr. Deans: You have to choose sides, Charles.

Mr. Murphy: It is interesting that from June 30 until now the minister has said nothing. It is also interesting to note that the minister was kept away from that committee that was supposed to study the bill. It is interesting to note that the minister would not permit himself—or perhaps others in his party would not allow him—to come to answer questions about this bill.

We are told by some members on the government side that it was a deliberate strategy to hide the Minister of Labour until the end of the debate so that he could not be questioned and could not be held accountable to the elected members of this House.

It is amazing that the former Minister of Labour spoke earlier today and it is interesting to note that the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan) gave the major speech on this bill for the government.

Mr. Crosby: Do you call that a major speech?

Mr. Murphy: Yes, for the government. It is amazing to note that until tonight, on the last day of the debate on what the government calls a major piece of legislation, the cornerstone of economic planning for the next two years, the present Minister of Labour was not trusted to deliver the government's case. That is probably an indication of what is thought of the Minister of Labour. It is an indictment. It is saying that the minister is not capable of performing the duties which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appointed him to do.

In his short speech, the Minister of Labour talked about the serious nature of the economic situation that we are in. He talked about the extraordinary situation that Canadians are facing. He is right. We have been saying that throughout this debate, just as my leader and other members of our caucus have been saying for the last couple of years. We recognize the serious situation in which the Canadian economy is in. But this measure will not do one thing for the unemployed of this country. It will not do one thing to solve the inflation problem that we have. This measure will not do one thing to lower interest rates in this country. Interest rates are the real problem because they are killing the Canadian economy at this time, not the wages of Canadian workers, nor the wages of public service workers who receive lower increases than those in the private sector. The government has attacked not the villain but the victim.

This bill will do nothing to prevent business bankruptcies. It will do nothing to prevent farm bankruptcies. It will do nothing to restore this economy of ours. The government knows that. We have quoted a number of times before from the government's leaked document, a copy of which our leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), obtained. It reads in part:

> —a program of consultation and public relations aimed at changing public attitudes and expectations would be useful—even though 'the main advantage of the program would be that it would enable the government to be seen doing something about inflation and to lay part of the blame for inflation on the private sector.'

The government admitted in its own document that it was a public relations job. The government admitted that the program would actually do very little for the state of the Canadian economy and the government admitted that it is an attempt to cast blame on others, and yet the Minister of Labour defended that policy in this House.

In a speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and in speeches made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), who spoke a number of times on this issue, the government has called for co-operation. The government has asked that other sectors of the Canadian economy co-operate with it in this program. But the government is not willing to co-operate with other sectors of the economy. The only people the government met prior to this legislation were representatives of the Business Council on National Issues, the leaders and chief executive officers of the largest corporations in this country. That is the group that called for a 7 per cent wage control program in the public sector. That is the group which fathered this legislation. That is the only group which the government consulted prior to this legislation being introduced. The Canadian Labour Congress, the Public Service Alliance of Canada, other public service unions, the premiers, municipalities, small-business people were all brought in after this legislation was introduced. They were not consulted beforehand. Their co-operation was an afterthought by this government.

If this government were really serious in having a united program which would lower interest rates and keep energy prices from going up 31 per cent in the next year, it would have taken advantage of the time it had. But it did nothing for six months about the state of the economy. It did nothing from the November 12 budget to the June 28 budget. This government could have used those six months to work with other representatives of the various sectors of Canada's economy. They would have said, as members on the opposite side are now saying: "We have a very serious situation at this time." The government should have been saying that for the last six months, instead of downplaying the economic calamity that faces Canada. For the last six months the government downplayed the problems that we face. Then all of a sudden at the end of June the government decided that the situation was so terrible that it had to do something overnight. The government wasted six months. Now the government expects public servants and other wage earners across this country to make a sacrifice, a sacrifice about which the government has not consulted them.

I spoke earlier about the fact that the Minister of Labour was a no-show at the committee which studied the bill. I mentioned previously that the minister responsible for the status of women did not show. The Liberal majority on that committee prevented her from showing at that committee. Last night we had a situation where the minister responsible for the status of women voted against a New Democratic Party motion which specifically would have allowed the negotiation of paid maternity leave. That motion had only one other operative clause, that is to say, that paid maternity leave should not be included in any 6 per cent or 5 per cent compensation package. Not only do we have the Minister of Labour who no longer represents labour, but we have the minister responsible for the status of women who does not represent the women of the country.

• (1720)

Mr. Peterson: Nonsense.

Mr. Murphy: It is true. I have heard, as I am sure other hon. members have heard, representatives of government talk about the value of paid maternity leave. We have heard hon. members on all sides of the House talk about it as a family issue, as an equality issue, and as an issue of concern to both women and men across the country. When the minister responsible for the status of women had a chance to show what she really felt about the issue, she rose with the others on the government side of the House and prevented women from having the right to negotiate paid maternity leave and having that leave not count against the very minimal pay increases which they will be allowed over the next two-year period. It is a tragedy.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether the hon. member would entertain a question and indicate if he is aware that under Article 7 maternity leave can still be negotiated—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) in the midst of his speech, but before doing so I had talked with his House leader. I will be as brief as I can. We have had consultations and, if there is unanimous consent, I should like to move a motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is there unanimous consent for the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) to move a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION RESPECTING DISPOSITION OF BILL C-127

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order and/or order of the House, the Minister of Justice may this day introduce a bill entitled "An act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof", and that the said bill shall be considered at the first reading, second reading, committee, report and third reading stages before the House adjourns this day;

That the House shall sit between 6 p.m. and 8 p.m. this day for the consideration of the said bill at all stages;

That there shall be no recorded division on the second reading stage of the said bill;

That, after second reading of the said bill, it shall be deemed to have been referred to and reported by a standing committee;

That both parties in opposition and the government may propose no more than four amendments each to the said bill at the report stage, provided that any of the said amendments that are deposited with the Clerk of the House no later than 6 p.m. this day shall be moved or deemed to have been moved at that stage;

That no later than 7.30 p.m. this day all questions necessary for the disposal of all stages of the said bill shall be put without further debate or amendment.

That is the motion; it seems that there is unanimous consent to support it.

I want it to be very clear that the spirit of the agreement is that this motion in no way interferes with the House order of yesterday. Even if we start debate on the motion to adjourn later than eight o'clock this evening, because of the reported division required to dispose of this new bill, this agreement does not jeopardize the House order of yesterday.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, our party is prepared to grant unanimous consent to the House order and also agrees with the spirit of what is being done, in accordance with the comments of the government House leader.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, briefly, we have been trying to get such a thing to happen for the better part of the last week. We are delighted to agree with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): The House has heard the terms of the motion of the President of the Privy Council. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Johnston that Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I do not mind having my speech interrupted for that particular motion.

Before the interruption, I was talking about the facts that the Minister of Labour does not represent labour and that the minister responsible for the status of women has forsaken the women of the country. Now I should like to turn to the party which is supposed to represent opposition to government. I should like to start by quoting the comments of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), who said in an inverview which was published in The Citizen and in a number of other Southam newspapers across the country that if he were Prime Minister:

I would reject controls. And I wouldn't allow my PMO to be issuing rumours that they were coming in while I was saying that they weren't. I think that controls won't work.

Last night the Leader of the Opposition and members of his party rose and supported the government on a controls program. I find that that contradiction indicates that they are not in opposition to the Liberal Government of Canada; they are in coalition with the government.

There was one motion on which they voted with us and against the government. It was the one which rolled back the present salaries of the staff of Members of Parliament and Senators. Also it was a motion on which a number of government members supported us and on which a number of government members abstained. The motion to which I am referring was carried by the government side by 27 votes. At the time there were 41 Conservative members missing from the House.

Mr. Gamble: And six NDP members.

Mr. Murphy: The Conservative Party has the sole responsibility for keeping the Liberals in power as of last night. The government was telling its backbenchers that the amendment to restrict the salaries of their staff was a matter of confidence in the government. Despite what government members may have personally felt about how hard their staff worked or about how hard they struggled to survive on their incomes, for the most part they supported the motion of the President of the Treasury Board. However, there were enough of them who were not present in the House. Also there were enough of them who had the courage of their convictions to support the New Democratic Party in opposing it. However, with that matter on the record, a matter of confidence in this government, which could have brought it down last night, 41 Conservatives were missing. They hid. They kept the Liberals, that arrogant group of incompetents, in power.

• (1730)

From now on do not let any Conservative say that it is the NDP who keep the Liberals in power, because last night they had their one and only opportunity since February 18, 1980 to get rid of the Liberals and they blew it. Let us remember that. There were 41 Conservatives out of the House, and the Liberals are still in power today. They will remain in power because the Conservatives will do the same thing on major economic issues such as interest rates.

We have heard from the Leader of the Opposition and the member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) saying that they have no other solutions. With respect to the energy issue there is the acknowledged fact that the Conservative Party would do almost the same thing as the Liberals.

Despite the fact that the Leader of the Opposition said that he did not believe in controls and he would not implement them because they would not work, the Conservative Party voted with the Liberals last night, ensuring that the Liberals will not be defeated on the only weak part of the bill which Liberal backbenchers would not support; the only Achilles heel which the Liberals had, and upon which the Conservatives could have acted. But the Conservatives hid.

When it came to the final vote last night we watched the Conservatives line up again in support of their Liberal masters despite the fact that they spoke against salary cuts to our workers, despite the fact they voted in favour of paid maternity leave, with the exception of five Tory members whom I wish I could identify, and despite the fact that the Liberals defeated their amendment with regard to the Human Rights Commission, and their amendment on collective bargaining.

When we are faced with any major and significant economic issue in Canada, the Liberals and Conservatives are one and the same. It is a Liberal coalition with the Conservatives that is keeping the country in the terrible and degrading economic situation in which it is today. Those two parties are responsible for high interest rates. They are responsible for the high rate of inflation in the country. They are responsible for the 1.3 million officially unemployed, and who knows how many more unemployed in this country.

This country is facing very serious economic problems. Our party has discussed those problems. We have talked about the need for restraint. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish), who served on their respective committees in the House, have raised specific examples of government waste. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has talked about the public purse being ripped off by the oil corporations in this country. We have discussed all of these issues. We have warned that by allowing energy rates to increase 31 per cent in the next 18 months, inflation will be fueled even further and it will add to the killing of the Canadian economy. Bankruptcies will rise for farmers and businesses. Yet we have been attacked by the Liberal-Conservative coalition who have said that we are not concerned about the economy.

We are concerned about the economy. That is why we have kept the House here since the end of June, through all of July and into August.

We regret that this bill will do nothing to help our economy. We regret that the Liberals and Conservatives have ganged up to zap the workers in what has been described in a government document as "a public relations program" to blame the private sector for the country's ills. We regret that the result of this program in two years will still be a high cost of living, at much higher than 6 per cent, since energy prices are being allowed to increase 31 per cent and interest rates are so high that the cost of living must go up. There will still be bankruptcies and more unemployment, more shutdowns, more people losing their homes, and more people leaving the resource-based communities. It is so unnecessary.

Since the Conservatives take an anti-labour position on most issues, and the Minister of Labour has enunciated his position on labour which is basically capitulation to the President of the Treasury Board, and he will do nothing to protect the legal rights of workers, Canadians have before them a public relations effort in the form of this bill which will do absolutely nothing to help them or the Canadian economy.

I said earlier that the government has wasted the last six months when it had the opportunity between the budget of November 12 and the budget of June 28 to develop a program in co-operation with Canadians from all walks of life. We recognize, as do other members and most Canadians, that the present program will do nothing. Therefore, I will momentarily move a motion to give this bill a six months' hoist.

If this government and its collaborators in the Conservative Party are genuinely concerned about the state of the economy, they will support this motion. They will not use those months to create further hatred, to make one group of Canadians the scapegoat, to hurt those who will be retiring in the next two years and be forced to live on smaller pensions as a result of this bill, or to prevent women from getting negotiated paid maternity leave. In those six months the government would have the opportunity, if it were serious, to begin discussions and negotiations to seek the kind of compromise which is typically Canadian, and to ensure that we have a program which will resolve what the Minister of Labour called the very serious economic conditions facing us at this time. We will not have a program whereby Ian Sinclair, through the co-operation of this government, can zap his workers and prevent them from ever negotiating for more than 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases. We will have a program which will not outlaw collective bargaining. We will have a program which does not give the government the right to break the collective agreements which it may have signed as recently as two months ago.

• (1740)

In other words, if the motion which I am about to present does pass, and if the Conservatives and Liberals can vote on principle and on the future of this country, then perhaps—and it is not for sure—we can solve our problems by Canadians working together, through agreement by Canadian men and women that everyone must make some sacrifices, but also by recognition that each Canadian throughout the country faces different problems.

It is hard for some one who will lose his home next month because of high mortgage interest rates to agree that he must take a 6 per cent and 5 per cent increase over the next two years. It is hard for a businessman to recognize that his whole purchasing community, his customers, will have limited incomes, will spend less in his store, and that he will go bankrupt. It is hard for those Canadians to sacrifice more. But there are many Canadians in support of this program, including the Ian Sinclairs and the de Granprés who have salaries, respectively, of $550,000 and $600,000 a year. There are other groups that have that right and ability to sacrifice. As a result, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-124, an act respecting compensation in the public service of Canada, be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months hence."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) has, in short parlance, moved a six-months' hoist, and I thank him for providing the Chair with a copy. If the House so agrees, I think we will proceed as follows: we will deem it to be 5.45 p.m., I will put the six-months' hoist motion to the House and the bells will ring on that motion. But pursuant to an order made earlier, when votes are taken later, the vote on third reading of Bill C-124 will obviously be included.

Mr. Blaikie: Unless the hoist passes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In the alternative, it is possible that some hon. member may wish to speak for two minutes, but I do not think it is necessary.

The House has heard the terms of the said motion. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Murphy) which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Speaker: The motion is defeated.

[Translation]

The question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suggest to my hon. colleagues that the same tally apply to this vote as to the vote taken on the previous motion. If there is agreement, we could save time and then have more time to deal with the following bill, which deals with amendments to the Criminal Code.

Madam Speaker: Is that agreed?

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, the same numbers would apply, the only difference being that we would be voting against, and the larger, joint Conservative-Liberal effort would be voting for.

Madam Speaker: This is a bit complicated but, if it is agreed, I am sure it could be recorded in Hansard that way. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, I must reserve my right to vote as I wish with respect to the final reading of this bill. I will not insist upon a standing vote, but I do want the record to show—in order to save time, as the government House leader has said—that it would be my intention to oppose the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, may I be accorded the same privilege as the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)?

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, whereas I voted the first time, with respect to the pending vote I have chosen to abstain. With that reservation, I would acquiesce in what has been suggested.

Mr. Benjamin: Call the vote.

Madam Speaker: The Clerk informs me that it would be very difficult to proceed in the way suggested because the same tally would not really apply.

Mr. Broadbent: The Tories are split.

Madam Speaker: Therefore, he advises me to take the vote.

[Translation]

The question is now on the main motion.

Madam Speaker: The motion is carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

● (1820)

Madam Speaker: I am sure the House will understand that although the officers of the House are in favour of saving time, these particular circumstances would have obliged them to edit quite a lot out of the list and they did not dare to do that. I am sure the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) would not have approved. I am still more leery of him when he is not here than when he is here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: While hon. members are all present I should like to add some good cheer to this day and invite them to come after Royal Assent to Room 16 so that we can all have a drink together and wish each other a good holiday and shake hands with each other.

It being past six o'clock and pursuant to an order made earlier this day, the House will now proceed to Government Order 127.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SEXUAL AND OTHER OFFENCES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-127, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Madam Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to an order made earlier, now.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien moved that Bill C-127, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and the bill read the second time is deemed to have been referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I would like to rise . . . I think we should make our speeches on second reading. The amendments have been tabled and later we will proceed clause by clause, I do not know exactly how . . .

Madam Speaker: I am trying to understand the order made earlier by the House. We are now at the report stage and the motions are deemed to have been moved. So, can we proceed now?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) commences his remarks, may I indicate that pursuant to a House order made earlier, second reading is deemed to have been moved and we are now on report stage. Is that correct?

Mr. Pinard: No, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry, we are on second reading. I will read the relevant paragraph:

> That both parties in opposition and the government may propose no more than four amendments each to the said bill at the report stage, provided that any of the said amendments that are deposited with the Clerk of the House no later than 6:00 p.m. this day shall be moved or deemed to have been moved at that stage;

I should like to deal with one other matter. The Chair was approached earlier indicating that the parties have made an agreement which would allocate 27 minutes to the Liberal Party, 36 minutes to the Official Opposition and 18 minutes to the New Democratic Party. That agreement was predicated on the assumption that debate would begin at 6.10 p.m., in fact, debate is beginning now. I presume we will follow the procedure. Perhaps representatives of the parties would indicate to the Chair how they wish to proceed with the actual number of minutes to be distributed. The Chair will not be looking to the left or right but rather to the parties in that regard.

Mr. Pinard: We have no objection, Mr. Speaker, that the same proportion be respected. Of course, we are debating second reading and at 7.30 or so, according to the House order, I understand that the motions to amend will be deemed to have been moved. We will see then whether or not there is to be a recorded division. This is our understanding, and I think it is the understanding of my colleagues as well.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there has been an informal agreement. We agree to the same proportion in order that we may end up with the vote at 7.30 as set down in the House order.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with what was said. I suggest that the breakdown is 30, 20 and 15 minutes. I have just made the calculation based on 65 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Let me seek an understanding. Is it agreed that the number of minutes allocated to the parties will be 30 for the Conservative Party, 20 for the Liberal Party and 15 minutes for the NDP? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I believe we were in agreement that the proportion would be the same. I do not have the quick ability of the NDP House leader but I will find my CA degree somewhere and do the calculation quickly.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will cut short my remarks in order to help everyone even if I have responsibility for the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased with this opportunity to speak to a bill that has been the subject of debate during the past few months and is, in fact, a very delicate subject for Parliament because it concerns amendments to the Criminal Code regarding relations between persons. I believe that what we are proposing today in the House represents part of the work that the House and the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs have undertaken in the course of their consideration of Bill C-53, and we have thus succeeded in resolving half the problem, at least. I therefore wish to thank all the members of this House for having made it possible to dispose of this bill this afternoon, and I wish to thank all those who testified before the committee and all hon. members who sat for many hours, especially during the marathon sitting last Wednesday, which went on quite late into the night.

[English]

To turn to the particular provisions of the bill, first, an effort has been made throughout the bill to degenderize the Criminal Code provisions relating to sexual offences in keeping with the equality rights guaranteed by the Charter of Rights. The few remaining references to a male person or a female person will be dealt with when we amend the child exploitation provisions of the code.

Second, Section 244 of the code, defining assault, is amended by the addition of a new subsection to make it clear it is not consent to an assault where there is submission or lack of resistance because force is used against the complainant or a third party, such as the child of the complainant, or threats or fear of force is used against the complainant or a third party, or fraud is employed, or exercise of authority such as in an employer-employee relationship.

Third, a further provision has been added, as a result of the Supreme Court decision in Pappajohn, to require judges to instruct juries to consider the reasonableness of any grounds for belief by the accused that the complainant consented to the assault.

Fourth, under the category of sexual assault we are, first, creating a hybrid offence, with the possibility of an indictable offence with a maximum of ten years, or summary conviction, with six months' maximum for minor touching cases. This first level offence will cover everything from touching to forced sexual intercourse with a minimum of violence.

At the second level, sexual assault with a weapon, or with threats to a third party, or causing bodily harm to the complainant will call for a sentence of up to 14 years.

Finally, at the third level of seriousness, there will be a further category of aggravated sexual assault for wounding, maiming, disfiguring, or endangering life; this offence will carry a maximum of life imprisonment.

Among the further reforms proposed by this bill, I want to mention that corroboration of a complainant's testimony will no longer be required for conviction. This will make the law of sexual assault consistent with other types of crime.

The doctrine of recent complaint, developed from the old idea that a woman must raise a hue and cry against her attacker in order to be believed, will be eliminated.

• (1830)

No questions shall be asked about a complainant's prior sexual history with a person other than the accused, except as rebuttal to evidence led by the Crown, to prove identity, or where the other sexual activity was occurring at the same time.

Finally, I want to underline that "spousal immunity" is being eliminated by this bill. Women are not the chattels of their husbands, and sex without the consent of both parties is as unacceptable within marriage as it is outside of marriage.

With respect to that there will be an amendment to clarify it even further. In the committee hearings I was of the view that clarification was not needed, but members of the committee felt that it should be clarified. The words proposed before the committee were not acceptable, in my judgment as Minister of Justice, but since that time we have worked out new words. I understand that a motion will be presented by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), which will be seconded by my parliamentary secretary because of the work he did. I have accepted this motion.

Two new offences are created by Sections 250.1 and 250.2 to deal with the problem of child custody battles between parents. Section 250.1 makes it an offence for a parent to take his child in contravention of an existing custody order made by a court anywhere in Canada. Section 252.2 applies where there is no custody order as such, but one parent has had de facto custody of the child. In this case, consent of the attorney general of the province or his local representative will be required for prosecution.

Defences are provided for where the absconding parent has the consent of the custodial parent, and also for the rare case in which the absconding parent can persuade a court that his motive was to save the child from "danger of imminent harm".

I have proposed an amendment myself for Clause 19 that would clarify Section 246.6(1)(c). There was long debate about past sexual activity. My amendment will make sure that if there is any question about it it will be related to the incident of the moment. It will not permit delving into the person's history. As we discussed in committee there might be circumstances where, if there is activity involving many people at the same time, it has to be described because it might be related to the sexual activity of that person with another person in those circumstances.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that, today, we have made considerable progress. We have received proposals and suggestions from a number of organizations which appeared before the comittee. I particularly wish to thank all the women's organizations in Canada which took a very special interest in the proceedings. We introduced this bill in the House a year and a half ago, and we have made considerable progress in our attempts to reach a consensus. The issues are basically very complex and that is why, when I appeared before the committee, I purposely took a very flexible approach and said that I was open to all kinds of suggestions. I was so flexible that opposition members accused me of not knowing what I wanted. I wanted to experiment by giving the committee the greatest possible flexibility while remaining personally responsible for accepting or not accepting certain amendments. I was a little disappointed by the results, because at one time I found that people held this against me and claimed that I did not really know what kind of reforms I wanted to make. Nevertheless, I have no regrets, and we are going to continue this fall because there are still some problems to be cleared up, including the issue of child pornography. I think this is a point we must clear up once and for all. Some people insisted that the problem was not a major one yet, but I am convinced that the problem exists. This has been proved by witnesses who appeared before the committee, and even if it is only in its initial stages, I think it should be stopped immediately. That is why I was so disappointed when we were unable to reach an agreement. Incidentally, the member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) said that in 1976 and 1977, the committee had already recommended reforms in this area. I hardly think that, at the time, the committee was basing its views on assumptions only. It was in the light of this report by the House committee that I agreed to introduce these proposals, and we shall get back to them if the session continues this fall, and otherwise, we shall introduce the measures again. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank everyone who worked on this legislation. However, today I am somewhat disappointed that amendments have been proposed. When we were discussing ways of resolving this problem in committee, I agreed there would be no amendment and that we would be coming here without amendments. My concept was that any changes could be made in the fall, because we would then be considering the same kind of bill and improvements could be made to the bill at that time. However, amendments were proposed, so I also proposed one, that is, I accepted the amendment on spousal immunity. In fact, I produced the text that will be presented by the member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), and I also accepted further amendments which were proposed by the official opposition.

There were other amendments which I unfortunately could not accept. As Minister of Justice, I have to consider certain proposals, and I am thinking of the member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) who made some representations. He was a little disappointed that I did not accept an amendment he had discussed with my parliamentary secretary. Unfortunately, it touched on an area where we want to ensure that sexual offences and sexual assault are defined in a new Criminal Code in such a way that it is easier for the person concerned to press charges. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Cambridge seems quite reasonable, at first. However, one criticism that could be levelled against the amendment is that it goes against what we are all trying to achieve, namely, make it easier to make complaints and easier to make recommendations. If I had accepted the amendment, I think we might have regressed in relation to the joint commitment we made, especially vis-à-vis the women's groups, which insisted that corroboration should not be compulsory in order to find a person guilty of sexual assault. I can assure the hon. member that we shall get back to this if necessary.

I would like to thank my colleague, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women who is in the House today and who has been following this debate very closely, as well as the member for Saint-Michel (Mrs. Killens), both of whom have been keeping at me on the subject for several months. I am thankful to them for having exerted this pressure. I want to thank the members of the opposition for their co-operation. I wish to thank the chairman of the committee, the member for Arthabaska, no, for Lotbinière (Mr. Dubois). Mr. Speaker, the town of Arthabaska happens to be in his riding and that is why I made a mistake. I especially wish to thank my parliamentary secretary, who this last week has been working very hard to get a consensus. We made a small bet, and I said I did not think we would be successful. In fact, I said this on purpose, to get him going, and I am very grateful that he won his bet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before I recognize the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), let me say that I think it is easier on all hon. members if there is a clear understanding throughout the House of where we stand. Debate began on this bill at 6.25 p.m., fifteen minutes of which have expired. It is my understanding that there are five or six minutes remaining to the Liberal Party, which it may wish to use at the end of other debate. I understand that there are 30 minutes of debate belonging to the Progressive Conservative Party. Indications to me are that the 30 minutes will be divided among four speakers, giving each one seven to seven and a half minutes.

• (1840)

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Bill C-127 this evening, I want to pay tribute to the co-operation, perseverance and dedicated interest of hon. members on all sides of the House for having made this legislation possible.

I cannot overemphasize the importance I attach to this bill. It is one of the most crucial pieces of social and legal legislation to be dealt with for a long time. We are talking about amendments to the Criminal Code; indeed, we are talking about the modernization of some critical elements of the Criminal Code, particularly as they affect women.

But I would first like to mention the work done by my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), on that part of the bill dealing with parental abduction. In the closing minutes of our final committee hearing, he paid special tribute to Mrs. Lois Preston, president of Parents of Kidnapped Children in British Columbia, and Mrs. Lilia Lopez Karu, president of Abducted Children's Rights of Canada, for their contribution in ensuring that the amendments to the Criminal Code dealing with parental abduction become law.

In this bill, the current laws relating to rape and indecent assault are being changed to emphasize the violence as opposed to the sexual aspects to these crimes. In other words, we will no longer have the term "rape" in law.

This legislation has a long history. Individual women and groups of women all across the country have been pushing for years for changes to the rape laws. It was apparent that this section of the Criminal Code cried out for reform. The number of reported rape cases was far below the actual number of offences. It has been estimated that only one in ten cases of rape was reported. That was due largely to the stigma which surrounded the rape victim—the idea that somehow nice girls do not get raped and the belief that she must have asked for it. The victim was always subject to having her past sexual history used as evidence against her—the victim, remember—in a court of law.

The conviction rate for rape has traditionally been much lower than the conviction rate for other serious crimes—only a 52 per cent conviction rate for rape, compared with an 82 per cent conviction rate in the case of other indictable offences. As a result, women's groups such as the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and the National Council of Women began calling for a complete removal of the existing rape sections from the Criminal Code. They wanted, instead, the enactment of a new offence dealing with rape as a type of assault.

The government responded with Bill C-52 some four years ago, and that had one major beneficial effect. It brought together all women's groups calling for four basic principles which they wanted to see embodied in the law: treatment of rape as a type of assault, creating tiers of sexual assault to parallel existing assault offences, abolishing spousal immunity, and limiting admissibility of past sexual history.

In October, 1979, the Progressive Conservative cabinet approved draft legislation to change rape to sexual assault and to abolish spousal immunity. This is a philosophical position from which our party has never retreated.

Since the introduction of Bill C-53 by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) in January 1981, we in this party have made a sustained effort to ensure that the fundamental principles embodied in the draft legislation of the Conservative government would not be ignored. And we have stuck to that throughout the long months of committee meetings. I am sure the minister will agree that that determination on our part contributed significantly to the improved bill which we have before us this evening.

We now have a bill which provides that the assault and sexual assault structure of the Criminal Code will have three tiers. The minister has outlined those three tiers. The women's groups which appeared before the committee were unanimous in their desire that the new law would be modelled on existing assault provisions in the Criminal Code, so that there would be a firm foundation for the new sexual assault provisions. This was the reason our party insisted in committee on three tiers of assault and sexual assault. This is why we wanted the concept of "bodily harm" to be positioned in the second tier of assault and sexual assault. It was only late on the last evening of committee hearings that we finally secured that significant concession from the government.

Also we eliminated the amendment which was put forward to include acts of degradation in the second category. We insisted that that come out, as we insisted that serious bodily harm be restored to bodily harm. Those were the things we acquired during the committee hearings.

I know the bill before us is not perfect, but indeed it is a great step forward and it is of particular significance to women. I believe this piece of legislation will mark a new beginning in the way society views coercive sexual acts. This legislation makes a clear statement. It calls a spade a spade. It says that sexual assault is primarily an act of violence, not of passion; an assault with sex as the weapon.

The first major hurdle of name change has been achieved, but it is absolutely incorrect to argue that what we are doing here is only a change of semantics. The new sexual assault offences do not just refer to forced sexual intercourse but include all types of forced sexual acts. This, too, is a major step forward.

Until now forced penetration has been the major component of rape. No one will deny that forced penetration is a serious offence, but the new legislation recognizes that other types of forced sexual acts may be equally serious. This is very, very important. Fear is a four letter word called "rape". Removing the name does not remove the fear, but it means that women will be able to report sexual assaults against them without the additional fear of being branded as immoral by society. More important, the bill means that those who commit the heinous crime of violating another person are much more liable to be convicted for their vicious acts.

I am very proud of the role our party has played in bringing this legislation to fruition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, there are occasions when one feels good as a Member of Parliament when something is achieved or when an effort is made, even though the achievement may not be entirely what one expected. Such is certainly not my feeling today.

We are confronted with a bill that I oppose, and in the very few moments which I have I shall explain why. There was an opportunity, however, because of the orders of the House when I might have on my own terminated the discussion on this piece of legislation, but I did not. For that reason I am very unhappy with myself.

I believe that we are confronted with a piece of legislation which is a fraud perpetrated upon the female population of the country. I think it is appropriate to explain why. The amendments to the Criminal Code, as they relate to rape, have been well explained by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). There is a three tier punishment category for an offence called "sexual assault". In the first tier of that category one may, as an accused, be sentenced on summary conviction. It is important to bear in mind that we have eliminated from the Criminal Code an offence of rape which carried a maximum penalty of a life sentence imposed against the accused when convicted.

If one analyses the other two tiers and the nature of the offence which must be committed in order to obtain a conviction, it is apparent that unless there is bodily harm, unless a weapon is used or unless threats are made against another, the first tier will apply where a maximum sentence of ten years' incarceration will flow, the alternative possibility of a fine.

• (1850)

For instance, take the situation where a woman is indeed raped—despite the fact that we have eliminated the word—and there is no bodily harm. However, she becomes a vegetable because she lost her mind as a consequence of the trauma that resulted from these circumstances. The maximum sentence that may be imposed under those circumstances is ten years. With respect to rape as we currently understand it, where that result does not happen, there may in fact be a simple fine imposed. We have equated what we knew to be rape with a serious speeding ticket.

I think it is appropriate that we ask the women of Canada whether this is indeed what they want.

The House should bear in mind that at 25 minutes after this hour the last of the amendments were submitted to members of this House, who are now asked to vote on the entire package at 7.30, exactly 40 minutes from now.

I would be surprised if the bill with which we are concerned has been examined by 25 members of the House by the time that vote is taken. Yet it is our duty, as Members of Parliament discharging our obligations to our constituents, to read and understand the provisions of the Criminal Code which affect the liberty and the lives of Canadians. Are we discharging that responsibility, having had those amendments submitted to us at 6.25 p.m., exactly 65 minutes later? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, does it appear that we will have discharged that responsibility? The answer is no. For that reason I am unhappy with this bill.

I would like to point out that when this bill began as Bill C-53 it contained a provision relating to sexual exploitation of children. Those entire sections have been removed, and we are told that we will come back to them in the fall. Well, we have been working at this kind of legislation for three years and we are still at it now. When will we come back to the sexual exploitation of children? Will it be in five years? In the meantime, should we leave it alone? That is what the House is asked to do and that is what we are voting on.

I would be very surprised if the women of Canada would consent to that kind of conduct by the House. I am sure that they are as concerned about the welfare of their children as some of us are, some of us who intend, out of annoyance and anger in the way we have behaved, to vote against this legislation.

I would ask why it is that some members who are so anxious to deal with this bill in its present form have deleted Section 156 of the Criminal Code as it presently stands? Let me read that provision to the House:

> Every male person who assaults another person with intent to commit buggery or who indecently assaults another male person is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years—

The offence no longer exists once this bill is passed.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): It is still there. You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Gamble: We are dealing with sexual assault. While assault is defined, sexual assault is not defined under the bill. It will be left for the court to determine what it is. I do not know, there is no member of the House who knows, yet we are voting on it tonight in that fashion to expedite its passage before the House enjoys a summer recess. It is expediting the process which I find reprehensible.

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, back in 1963 I heard what to me was a very memorable phrase in a different context which concerned the civil rights in the United States. It was said by Everett Dirkson. His words at that time were,

"There is nothing as powerful as an idea whose time has come."

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members of the House that after sitting for more than 15 weeks and listening to witnesses, I am convinced by women's groups who testified before us, by police officers who have testified, by the Crown attorney offices and the Attorneys General of Canada in their submissions, that the time has come for this idea. It is overwhelming, and that is why we will pass that bill tonight.

This is the last evening we will be discussing rape in a legal sense. I would like to relate some views as a person who prosecuted and defended a great many rape cases before I was elected to the House. From the perspective of a woman, it is the robbing of a person's dignity. It is an invasion of freedom. It has a tremendous stigma. Obviously, not being a woman I would think that it is only one half of the agony. The agony is having to come to court and testify about the invasion of one's dignity and perhaps not be believed. It is a tremendous concern of fathers, husbands and victims. I am sympathetic with victims of the act not only because of their agony but also because of their having to testify about the act and the prospect that they may not be believed in circumstances where their credibility is contested.

The point I wish to make is that this bill is no panacea. The evidence is not going to change in one court in the land. The sentence of a person found guilty of sexual assault, no matter what tier, is going to be determined by the act and the seriousness of the act. Let no one be under the illusion that anything will change when it comes to court. We must remember that. But this bill is beneficial.

A woman from a women's group appeared as a witness before the committee. Since I did not want to act in a way that I thought was illusionary, I asked her if this was a question of a janitor becoming a sanitary engineer, are we really making a difference? The 60-year old woman said to me, "I cannot tell you why I feel that way, but I would rather be stigmatized as a victim of sexual assault than a rape victim." That statement told me a lot about how women feel with respect to this particular bill.

I have brought four amendments before the House. I wish to talk about process, but before doing so I wish to say that never in my life could I believe that the Department of Justice could draft legislation which was so inaccurate, poor and which did not represent what members felt. Let me give an illustration. In one of the sections of the Criminal Code that was drafted which will be in force tomorrow morning if this bill receives Royal Assent without the amendment, we would prohibit reputation evidence or a complainant from being called. That means that if a woman had a long criminal record or was a pathological liar, she could not be cross-examined on that matter. That is not what Members of Parliament intended. We intended to say "sexual reputation". That is what the protection was to be. Yet this was what ended up in the bill and would still be in it if not for the amendment.

I could give more illustrations but I want to make a point and I do not have much time. For weeks the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has cloaked his parliamentary secretary with the authority to deal on his behalf. This afternoon, before two o'clock, the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) myself and a representative from the Department of Justice met with respect to a very important amendment which does not need to be mentioned. I will not go into it at this time. But I gave up my amendment, the amendment before us today in the name of the Conservative Party of Canada, which will be voted for by the members of this party. It was literally drafted by a person in the Department of Justice. I had a clear understanding with the parliamentary secretary that the government would support it, and I came back and spoke with hon. members on this side of the House based upon the word of a man I thought I could trust.

• (1900)

In this House, no matter what one's political persuasion, one must have honour. If I say that I will do something, I undertake to do it. There is no doubt but that the parliamentary secretary was cloaked with that authority. I left his office and convinced certain of my colleagues who had some reluctance. But what do I find? At five minutes before six o'clock tonight, the parliamentary secretary said that we cannot vote on the amendment being prepared by this party. I went over and spoke to the Minister of Justice. He has undercut his parliamentary secretary. Never again can I trust the word of the parliamentary secretary, not because he is lying, but rather because the Minister of Justice undercuts him and does not have any faith in him, and I cannot trust him any more. I am angry. It is an absence of honour.

Mr. Chrétien: What about the word you gave us yesterday?

Mr. Speyer: The slimy treatment that the Minister of Justice accords to his parliamentary secretary—you lie, you cheat and you have no honour, and I say that to the Minister of Justice. Never again will his word be any good with me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, the first words I have to say with respect to this bill are words of appreciation to the members of this House who give me the opportunity of standing in my place to speak this evening. We have heard a presentation by the minister with respect to the content of the bill. I know that there were times when all of us felt that we would become hopelessly bogged down because we really did not know what we as members of the opposition would face with respect to the terms and provisions in the bill. We were faced with a moving target, the moving target that presented one amendment after another. Therefore we were somewhat critical, as the minister points out, of the minister and of the government position. We were critical, as well, because we wanted to know what theory was behind the movement being presented by the minister. We wanted to know what principles guided him in the presentation of those amendments. We wanted to make certain that the people of Canada understood what the words meant when they were presented to us for consideration. That was the kind of problem that faced those of us in the opposition as we concerned ourselves with one committee after another until we came down to the deadline of a closing session and we, along with him, wanted to see a bill passed which would meet the requirements of women today.

Finally, today we have reservations, but although we have reservations about some of the problems that were outlined in Bill C-53 and great concerns about those matters which were not addressed in this particular bill, we are hopeful that the minister will see to it that these are brought forward at an early date come the fall session so that we can address ourselves as boldly as we have in these last few days to those problems involving child protection, pornography and the problems he has outlined with respect to abuse to women and children.

I am pleased, along with the other members on this side of the House, that we are now in a position to recognize the need for Criminal Code reform and change. Sexual assaults which have been so offensive to so many have now been brought into a three-tiered system, a system that we can understand and approve and that the public can appreciate as well. To that extent, and I know Your Honour is prepared to rise, we say that this should be a useful tool by which the Code can apply to the needs and wants of the general public in the 1980s as we face the tomorrow that is before us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) rises on a point of order?

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I believe we still have five minutes remaining. I would like to address a few remarks to the question of procedure and what we have tried to do here today.

A great deal of work has been done by our committee with respect to this bill. The committee sat until two o'clock last Thursday morning. The results of the committee work did not become apparent in a formal bill which could be considered by this House until very late yesterday afternoon. For that reason, there has been no consideration of the final bill because we were waiting for what the government is about to bring forward.

I draw the attention of the House to Bill C-124, which was government legislation which cleared committee at eleven o'clock in the evening and was tabled in the House at three o'clock the next day. This bill cleared committee at two in the morning and now, six and a half days later, the bill is finally ready for discussion by this House. If there has been any delay whatsoever, the delay has been on the government side of the House. We would not be rushed to judgment by something we could not even see in the final form in which the government wished to introduce it to the House. The reason for the delay has been purely that.

Our consideration, once we received that final bill, was to see that the bill, as tabled in the House, represented the deliberations of the committee. It was only very late yesterday afternoon that the members of the committee on our side who took part in those deliberations were able to assure us that the bill which was about to be tabled within 24 hours represented what the committee agreed to as to substance, no more, no less. We feel that the opposition and government members should have had that time available to them to consider it as Members of Parliament. Once we had it, I can assure hon. members that our side moved expeditiously so that it was considered by all the committee members and by our research staff.

We were able to proceed from that point, which was 5.30 p.m. or 5.45 p.m. yesterday afternoon, toward the House order. We wanted that consideration. I say, as deputy House leader, with no knowledge of the substance, that we felt that the process had to be respected so that our people had the right and the duty to review the legislation. We feel we have done that and that what is now before the House represents the deliberations of that committee. That is why we have proceeded. It may appear that we proceeded quickly from a House order, but I can assure Your Honour that we have devoted much time and effort to the committee's deliberations over the past year and a half and the deliberations that evening and since that time in reviewing draft forms of legislation. We are now pleased to participate in the formal debate of the bill which the government took so long to bring here.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this most important debate on significant changes to the Criminal Code. Canadian women have been fighting for decades to overhaul Canada's archaic and ineffective rape laws, laws which are predicated on many myths, for example, upon the view of the victim of rape as damaged goods, laws which are predicated upon a deep distrust of the female accused, laws which basically suggest that rape is not a crime against a woman, but, rather, a crime against a man's property.

The statistics on rape are alarming. One out of every five Canadian women is sexually assaulted against her will, grabbed, fondled, her clothes ripped, or the victim of attempted rape. One out of 17 is forcibly raped. Yet, and surely there can be no more eloquent testimony to the weakness of the present rape legislation, 94 per cent of sexual criminals walk free, never to be arrested. Only two per cent of all rapists will ever stand in court and hear themselves pronounced guilty. For those two per cent the average sentences are far too light.

It is clear that the time has come for major change in this area of the law. I want to commend the many individuals and groups who have appeared before the Justice and Legal Affairs committee over the past several months, witnesses including the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the National Association of Women and the Law, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, and representatives of provincial and local organizations from right across this country. I also want to single out my colleagues, the hon. members for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) and Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) who, I want to say, have worked long and hard both within the caucus and in committee to improve the provisions of this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I also want to say, and this will be a surprise to some, that in view of what has taken place within the last 24 hours and despite the fact that I disagree profoundly with the views that he expressed, I am grateful to the member for York North (Mr. Gamble) for not having blocked this important debate from proceeding.

There are a number of very important and major changes that are being made in this area of the law, and I am not going to take a great deal of time to elaborate upon them. That is being done by other speakers. Most important I think is the concept that finally we accept that rape is not a crime of passion but rather it is a violent assault. But it is not just any assault. There is an additional element of violation of the integrity of the individual. This law recognizes the violent nature of the crime of rape.

In addition, there is the important element that spousal immunity is being removed, and I want to return to that in a moment, Mr. Speaker.

The laws respecting the admissibility of evidence of previous sexual history with a person other than the accused are being significantly tightened. The code is being degenderized. In other words, we are recognizing that not just women but males as well must be protected from sexual assaults. Finally, there are a number of provisions that significantly improve the trial process; laws respecting corroboration, the doctrine of recent complaint, the requirement to prove penetration, all are quite properly being overhauled in this bill.

I should say that the original bill that was presented to the committee, Bill C-53, dealt with a number of other important areas, including the sexual exploitation of young persons, the so-called morality offences, the area of child pornography and a number of other areas as well. It was felt, because of some of the difficulties in these other sections, that we should at least in this Parliament pass the important provisions of the bill dealing with the overhaul of the sexual assault laws.

All Members of Parliament express a repugnance at child pornography, this form of exploitation of children, but unfortunately the minister brought forward a provision that was poorly drafted. There was no evidence that the existing obscenity provisions of the Criminal Code had been used, and surely where the test is community standards this kind of repugnant and offensive material would offend any notion of community standards, and we know as well that the Badgley commission is presently considering this area of the law.

With respect to the so-called morality offences, I would submit that the governing principles that should guide us when we look at a review of the law in this area should be those principles which were enunciated by the Law Reform Commission of Canada in their report on sexual offences in 1978. They recommended that reform of sexual offences should be based upon three fundamental principles, protecting the integrity of the person, protecting children and special groups, and safeguarding public decency.

With those important principles in mind I suggest that the government unfortunately caved in, in the last few months, to the Canadian equivalent of the moral majority, by withdrawing any suggested changes, even though those changes certainly did not reflect in full the principles of the Law Reform Commission, by withdrawing any changes whatsoever in this area of the law. A number of the offences in the Code such as the provisions respecting gross indecency, the provisions that deal with the bawdy house laws which violate the principles that have been enunciated by the Law Reform Commission, have no part whatsoever to play in a twentieth century Criminal Code. The minister unfortunately caved in, as I say, to the Canadian equivalent of the moral majority. For example, it will still be an offence for three adult Canadians in the privacy of their own home to participate in le ménage à trois. They can theoretically go to jail for five years for that offence.

I do not have time to deal with the provisions of the bill now before us that overhauls the assault area of the law, other than to say in my view a significant change in this area was not warranted. We heard from no witnesses who called, for example, for an increase in the maximum penalty for assault causing bodily harm from five years to 14 years. Certainly I agree that the first level of assault should have been changed to a mixed offence in order that we might deal with the situation of domestic violence without having to find the person actually committing the offence. That change was one that we supported.

I intend to propose four amendments to this bill while recognizing that certainly it constitutes a very important advance for the women of Canada.

The first amendment deals with an explicit recognition of the repeal of spousal immunity. This important amendment, which I understand will be accepted by all members of the House, at least I certainly hope will be accepted by all members of the House, and which will be seconded by the minister's parliamentary secretary; and I might say as well was strongly supported by the member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) in committee, will eliminate once and for all the fictional notion that somehow marriage implies continuing and permanent consent to sexual relations. The idea that a husband cannot be charged with the rape of his wife under any circumstances treats that woman as a chattel.

I urged in committee that the removal of spousal immunity should be made explicit. At that time one of the minister's officials suggested that this was motherhood and apple pie, but I suggest it is a far more important amendment than that. I am pleased that it will be accepted by the House this evening. I should just note that this particular amendment was heavily criticized by the group that I mentioned earlier, the Canadians for Family and Freedom group who suggested that, as they put it, the spouse-rape concept would put a barrier between husband and wife in the marriage bed. It is regrettable, to say the least, that the minister responded in a number of respects to that same group.

The second very important amendment that I am proposing deals with the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Regina v Pappajohn. This decision perhaps more than any other has provoked the outrage of Canadian women because what it says is that a man who honestly believed that the victim of a rape was consenting must walk out of the court a free man, must be acquitted, even where there are no reasonable grounds for that belief. I am not suggesting that the defence of honest belief should be removed entirely, although that was advocated by some. I am merely suggesting that when a man wants to say that he honestly believed that the victim was consenting, it is not good enough for him to rely upon perverse or irrational grounds; for him to say, for example, that because her husband told him that she really was enjoying it, even though she was crying and saying no, that he should be acquitted. What I am saying is that there has to be a reasonable basis for that belief.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) in the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee indicated that he felt the Pappajohn decision was the "Magna Carta of the sexual assaulters across the country." The Conservative member for Edmonton-Strathcona said that he would put "the government on notice that this party is going to fight very hard" to oppose the Pappajohn decision. What happened in committee? What happened in committee was that both Liberal members and Conservative members, every Conservative member and every Liberal member of the committee, voted against my amendment, which would have included a defence of reasonable grounds, and reasonable grounds only.

That amendment will be put to a recorded vote tonight. I plead with members to consider very carefully the ramifications of this amendment. As I say, perhaps more than any other it is an amendment which has been strongly supported by every national women's organization, the chiefs of police and over 22,000 men and women who signed petitions urging that we accept the principle that no means no.

The third amendment I will be proposing deals with the question of admissibility of evidence of the previous sexual history. I want to indicate clearly that the minister, in response to the amendment I propose, has come a long way to tighten this area of the law. However, it is regrettable that the minister is still permitting evidence of the previous sexual history with a person other than the accused to be admitted under any circumstances. The minister said it is relevant on some occasions. That may be, but I would submit that a woman is always entitled to say no. She can have sex with the entire football team if she chooses to do so, but if she wants to say no to one player, she is entitled to say no. That integrity must always be respected.

The final amendment will restore the three tiers which have been recommended by a number of national women's organizations. The three tiers would include in the third level the important element of specific intent to commit the sexual assault.

I want to indicate that in my view this bill represents a significant improvement, but it is only a first step. The provisions of this bill represent an important first step. What is just as important as changing the law is changing the attitudes which exist in Canada and which far too often treat women as sexual commodities. Whether that is reflected in advertising, their treatment on the job, the absence of any protection from sexual harassment on the job, it is those attitudes that must be changed.

What is just as important is that we support and encourage sexual assault crises centres across the country. It is completely unacceptable that funds for these important sexual assault crisis centres only allow them to operate on a shoestring. Their work is critical in dealing with the pain suffered by rape victims.

In conclusion, I am pleased to support the important advances made in this bill. I hope hon. members will seriously consider supporting the amendments in the four areas I have referred to, the explicit removal of spouse immunity, elimination of the Pappajohn defence, elimination of all references to the previous sexual history of the victim with a person other than the accused and the establishment of an equitable and just tier structure for the sexually assaulted.

[Translation]

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, this is a great day for Canadian women and I am pleased to take part in this debate.

[English]

Before saying what I have in mind on behalf of the women of Canada, and I am sorry he is not in the House, I wish to respond to the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) who spoke against the bill a few minutes ago. He said it was a sad night for him. It is very easy to see that that member has never been scared.

That hon. member never attended any of the committee hearings. All of a sudden he woke up tonight and showed his ignorance. He has been totally misinformed.

I ask the people of Canada to remenber the words spoken tonight by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). The hon. member attended many of the committee meetings and spoke tonight on behalf of the women of Canada. When it comes to human issues touching the women of this country and the injustices done to them, I can assure hon. members that there is no partisanship.

[Translation]

We did experience difficult moments during the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The turn of events in recent days had been somewhat of a disappointment for me. The bill had reached a deadlock and it did not seem very likely that it would be passed before the summer recess. In the past three weeks, members opposite and several pressure groups have been urging us to split the bill in two, in such a way as to provide only for the adoption of the provisions aimed at protecting women. Since it was impossible to reach a consensus, the committee has had to postpone the study of the provisions related to the sexual exploitation of young persons and child pornography. On behalf of several committee members on this side of the House, I want to say how deeply disappointed we are by the filibuster of members opposite and we hope to be able to continue our study this fall.

However, we did manage to guarantee greater protection to Canadian women by providing three levels of sexual offences, and we did manage as well— and this is very significant, Mr. Speaker—to restrict to a minimum, I repeat, to a minimum, the possibility of reference to previous sexual behaviour and honest belief of good faith. I am pleased to support the amendments introduced this evening by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). I am glad to note as well that we were able to improve the legislation with respect to child kidnapping. Hon. members know that unfortunately a growing number of families have been faced with this problem since the divorce rate has been climbing in Canada. As you know, Mr. Speaker, three out of five marriages in Canada end up in divorce.

This evening we are seeing the results of many years of work by women, as well as men, interested in this problem. The event of this evening is just as significant as our victory about section 28 of the Constitution. Quite appropriately, Mr. Speaker, it is the same minister who gave us section 28 in the Constitution to protect human rights and who today is providing additional protection for women. Mr. Speaker, I want to leave a few minutes for one of my colleagues. I conclude by thanking members on both sides of the House and especially the groups of women who gave us their support to get this bill through.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset of my remarks that I was shocked by the comments of the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) who levelled accusations at everybody. The seriousness of his accusations has to reflect his attendance record at the committee, and I can say that he was seldom there so we ought not to pay too much attention to his comments. I am very glad to support this bill for which we have been waiting for a long time. It is an essential and very challenging step forward in criminal matters. It implements the recommendations of associations of women who had long been urging us to improve the Criminal Code, to do away with discrimination and especially to repeal the section concerning rape. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, it is very encouraging and I am quite satisfied. As to previous behaviour, we have made a lot of progress to meet the requirements of women's associations and it will no longer be referred to during a trial, save for three very rare exceptions. However, I must admit that I am disappointed about that part of the bill which deals with child pornography. It is a very serious issue and I regret that we were unable to reach agreement with the opposition to have that part of the bill accepted.

Still, I am glad that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), whom I commend, as I do his parliamentary secretary, will reintroduce the bill on child pornography in the next session. Generally speaking, I think we ought to congratulate all those who appeared before the committee or worked with the committee, and say that we have taken a step forward. All committee members on both sides of the House have done an excellent job and I want to congratulate them.

• (1930)

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on what I think really is a point of order because it deals with the travesty of process in which we are engaged here tonight. I am not blaming any single member of the House, but a large portion of the amendments to a technical statute which affects the lives and liberties of the citizens of this country was only received by some members of this House at 7.18 tonight, and we have to vote on them at 7.30.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the members in the House and the visitors in the galleries should know that there is only one amendment coming from the government side and eight coming from the opposition side, four presented by the Conservative Party and four presented by the New Democratic Party. Of the four presented by the Conservative Party, three are acceptable to us. The hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) does not agree with our position on the fourth one. My parliamentary secretary has discussed this with him. He is sympathetic, but as the Minister of Justice I cannot accept it. I said, and I want to repeat it, that when we come back in the fall, the amendment will be looked at again.

Of the four amendments proposed by members of the New Democratic Party, I suppose one is acceptable to everyone, and the other three are not acceptable to the government. Of the amendments proposed by the Conservative Party, three are acceptable to us, but one or two are not acceptable to the New Democratic Party.

I point out to the hon. member that there has been an agreement. We have worked on this bill in the committee for months. We tried to find solutions in the committee, and the agreement arrived at in the committee was that there would be no amendments. I was willing not to present any government amendments. I presented only one today, and others have been presented by the opposition parties.

I am glad the hon. member said he does not want to blame anyone. However, we need the bill, and it is because of an agreement among all three parties that we are in the present situation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): As the servant of the House the Chair can only deal with what it is ordered by the House to deal with. Pursuant to the unanimous decision of the House I have to put the question at this time.

[Translation]

It being 7.30 p.m., pursuant to the order made earlier today, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the bill now before the House.

[English]

The bill is deemed to have been referred to and reported from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Pursuant to the order already accepted by the House it is understood that the House is at this time at the report stage of this bill.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-127, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 19 by striking out line 25 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"believe, and that where the accused established that his belief was based on reasonable grounds, he shall be found not guilty."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Pursuant to the order already accepted, the vote stands deferred.

[Translation]

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-127, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be amended by striking out lines 37 to 46 at page 8 and lines 1 to 30 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"246.1 Every one who commits a sexual assault is guilty of

(a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for 5 years; or

(b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

246.2 (1) Every one commits an aggravated sexual assault who

(a) carries, uses or threatens to use a weapon or imitation thereof during or at the time he commits a sexual assault;

(b) commits a sexual assault that causes bodily harm; or

(c) with intent

(i) to wound, maim or disfigure any person; or

(ii) to endanger the life of any person causes bodily harm in any way to any person whether or not that person is the one mentioned in subparagraph (i) or (ii).

(2) Every one who commits an aggravated sexual assault is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable

(a) in the case of an offence under paragraph (1)(a) or (b), to imprisonment for 14 years; or

(b) in the case of an offence under paragraph (1)(c), to imprisonment for life."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion, the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I declare the motion lost.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Robinson (Burnaby)) negatived.

[English]

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-127, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 19 by striking out lines 43 to 46 at page 8 and lines 1 to 3 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) Where an accused is charged with"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): On division.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Speyer) agreed to.

• (1940)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The next question is on motion No. 4.

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-127, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 19 by striking out lines 17 to 19 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"person other than the complainant,

(c) causes bodily harm to the complainant,

(d) is a party to the offence with any other person,"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chrétien: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think there is agreement, but there is a grammatical error that can be corrected.

Mr. Speyer: Mr. Speaker, the "or" is in there. I do not know whether you read it. It should read "causes bodily harm to the complainant or is a party to the offence with any other person".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Instead of "(d)" it should read "or (d)". Does the House agree to the correction?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as corrected?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Motion No. 4 (Mr. Speyer) agreed to on division.

The House will now consider Motion No. 5.

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-127, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 19

(A) by striking out line 31 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"246.4 (1) Where an accused is charged"

(B) By adding immediately after line 41 at page 9 the following:

"(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), the court shall instruct the trier of fact on the special need for caution in any case where the court considers that such an instruction is necessary."

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Can the House have the assurance that the wording is the same in this amendment in the French and English versions? In the English version it refers to "the trier of fact" while in the French version it is "au jury".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member will have to recognize that the Chair cannot give that kind of assurance.

Mr. Lewis: On that point of order, perhaps I might be of assistance to the Chair, Mr. Speaker. The amendments on this side were drafted from the English into French by the Department of Justice. I would think that they have done their best to make sure that they mean the same thing in both languages.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion in both languages?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The division on this motion stands deferred.

The House will proceed to Motion No. 6.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-127, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 19 by striking out lines 10 to 21 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"adduced by the prosecution; or

(B) it is evidence of specific instances of the complainant's sexual activity tending to establish the identity of the person who had sexual contact with the complainant on the occasion set out in the charge."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Accordingly, the vote on this motion stands deferred.

● (1950)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The House will now consider Motion No. 7 in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien).

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-127, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 19 by striking out lines 17 to 21 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"(c) it is evidence of sexual activity that took place on the same occasion as the sexual activity that forms the subject matter of the charge, where that evidence relates to the consent that the accused alleges he believed was given by the complainant."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The House will now consider Motion No. 8 in the name of the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer).

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge) moved:

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-127, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be amended in Clause 19 by striking out line 10 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"246.3, evidence of sexual reputation, whether".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[English]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think there is a problem here. Rather than 246.2 and 246.3 I think it should be 246.7. We agree with the change but it is not the correct number.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, in the wording given to members the 246.2 and 246.2 appears in French and 246.3 appears in the English. I think it should be 246.7. I think that correction would correspond to the amendment being proposed by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer), which we are supporting.

Mr. Speyer: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House agree to the alteration?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 8 (Mr. Speyer) agreed to.

The House will proceed to Motion No. 9.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby) moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-127, an act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, be amended by adding immediately after line 13 at page 11 the following:

"246.8 A husband or wife may be charged with an offence under section 246.1, 246.2 or 246.3 in respect of his or her spouse whether or not the spouses were living together at the time the activity that forms the subject matter of the charge occurred."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 9 (Mr. Robinson) (Burnaby) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11) the recorded division on the proposed motions that have been deferred will be taken.

Call in the members.

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Motion (Mr. Robinson) negatived.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development) moved that Bill C-127, an Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to the order made earlier today, now.

Mr. Chrétien moved that Bill C-127 be read the third time and do pass.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions—

[English]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to make one thing clear. On third reading there was no division, and I think it would be fair to all Members of Parliament that it be recorded as a unanimous vote.

An hon. Member: On division!

Mr. Chrétien: Oh, I am sorry, I did not hear you.

Madam Speaker: On division.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION RESPECTING SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That, when the House adjourns on the day that this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until Wednesday, October 27, 1982, provided that at any time prior to that date, if it appears to the satisfaction of Madam Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, Madam Speaker may give notice that she is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time; and

That, in the event of Madam Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of Committees or the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees shall act in her stead for all the purposes of this order.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to speak to the adjournment motion, and according to my information, I think we shall be able to—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I apologize for interrupting the hon. minister, but I think he will agree it is for a good cause.

[English]

I would just like to say goodbye to our pages this evening and thank them in my name and in your name for having brightened the House of Commons with their usefulness and their fabulous motivation in their work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: We hope they will enjoy their holidays which they have certainly deserved, and we apologize for having kept them in the House for such a large part of the summer. We wish them every success in whatever they decide to undertake next year and the years after, and who knows, maybe we will see them back as members of this House.

• (2030)

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, without the slightest hesitation I want to join you in congratulating all those people who, through their work, have helped parliamentarians perform their duties during these past months. On behalf of the government, it is also a pleasure for me to point out the exceptional work done by House officials and by the pages and to congratulate them on their efforts.

I would like to take this opportunity, Madam Speaker, to point out first of all, that the motion now being debated, although it received the unanimous consent of the three parties in this House yesterday, is a motion on which debate, as indicated in the order of the House, is to last at least until 10 p.m. this evening and if necessary, until not later than 10 p.m. tomorrow evening. From what I have been told just now, it does not seem likely that the debate will continue tomorrow—we shall see about that in a few minutes—and there is every indication that around 10 p.m. this evening, there is a very good chance that at last we shall be able to adjourn the House so that hon. members can perform another of their important duties, namely, meeting with constituents in their respective ridings, listening to what the people have to say and also explaining various policies.

Mr. Speaker, if we briefly analyse the work done by Parliament over the previous weeks, months and years, during this session—and we have almost reached day 400 in this session—I think we should consider two main aspects. First of all, how productive this first session of the Thirty-second Parliament has been. There are figures which speak for themselves, but there is also the spirit that pervaded the debate or lack of debate at certain times during this session. To get back to the practical results of this session, namely, what it has produced in terms of legislation, of measures adopted by Parliament and especially by the House of Commons, we soon realize that not only has this session broken a record as far as duration is concerned but more important, we have set a record in terms of the number of bills we were able to pass.

In fact, when we adjourn, and this will probably be a little later this evening, we shall have passed nearly 140 bills or measures since the beginning of the session, which is definitely a record, if we consider that during a normal one-year session, without elections, the average result is about 50 to 55 bills. So, we have passed about 140 pieces of legislation, which is over and above the average number I have just mentioned. There is also the nature of the legislation debated and passed by Parliament, and in that respect, I think the present session has been the most important session in Canada's history. I am thinking of the debate on the Constitution and the passage of the joint resolution that led to patriation of our Constitution and the adoption of a Canadian Charter of Human Rights, provided mechanisms for an amending formula, and enshrined the concept of equalization payments to remove regional disparity, in other words, the sharing concept which is the very foundation of Canada. We have had the debate on the Constitution, and this most important piece of legislation was passed during this first session, and I shall come back later to the spirit which was evidenced during this debate.

Another important measure was passed by Parliament during this session, namely the legislation related to our national energy policy. This was another significant initiative of the present government, and the national energy policy was the occasion of a debate that led to approval of the government program. There were, therefore, two major subjects which the government decided to examine during this first session and which concern two extremely important and highly significant issues for the future of our country, namely our Constitution and energy.

Finally, as far as significant legislation is concerned there was also a whole series of bills, about 140 as I have just noted, which covered a wide range of activities and programs to help our society and improve economic and social conditions in all the regions of Canada. Let me simply mention such important bills as those concerning the Bank Act, the Canada Post Corporation Act, the Freedom of Information Act, the Occupational Training Act, and I could list about 135 others. However I shall spare the House this long enumeration and simply say that this session has produced just about 140 pieces of legislation, the constitutional debate and the adoption of the resolution to patriate the Constitution, the Charter of Rights, approval of the national energy policy, three budgets, two statements on the economy and approval of four series of budgetary estimates covering four fiscal years. When we examine all these measures, we can only conclude that we have, in fact, set a record during this first session of the Thirty-second Parliament regarding the volume of legislation approved, particularly the significance of the legislation debated and approved by the members of this House.

However, what I find even more striking is not so much what we have done as the spirit that was evidenced during the debates that led to approval of these measures. To really understand what has happened, we have to put it in the right perspective. Hon. members will recall that this session began after two successive elections in less than a year and that, in April, 1980, at the very beginning of the session, we were left with a whole package of legislation, budgetary estimates that had not been approved in the two previous years and bills related to these budgets. In other words, we were left with an enormous financial burden. At the same time, with respect to the mental attitude or psychology of parliamentarians, the government had to face a frustrated opposition, embittered because of its defeat during the 1980 election.

• (2040)

I believe that it was only human for the official opposition to have a rather negative reaction, at least for the first few months, since they had been defeated after only nine months in power. It was only human that it allowed its frustration to influence its tactics or attitude and its style of opposition to government initiatives. What surprised me however, and I am still trying to understand this phenomenon fully, was that during the first few months, we approved over 30 bills before the summer of 1980, in about two and a half months. Therefore, at first glance, this frustration and bitterness did not seem to have affected the style and tactics of the Official Opposition. It was as though, and this seems to be the most plausible explanation, the Official Opposition were still under the shock or the impact of its defeat, were still reeling after this event which put it back in its place, namely on your left, Mr. Speaker, and this is perhaps why Parliament was able to pass about 30 bills very quickly during the first two or three months of the session. It was a bit later on that we noticed the true consequences of this defeat at the polls on the philosophy of the opposition, and this is unfortunate for Parliament, because while its tactics did not ultimately prevent Parliament from being very productive, they made the process rather painful and difficult, and offered, in my opinion, a rather unpleasant spectacle to the public who judge parliamentarians severely on both sides of the House and expect their representatives to have a much more serious and dignified attitude than has been the case until now.

As an example, let us take the state of mind or the spirit that was evidenced during the debate on the constitutional resolution. I admit this was an extremely important and controversial measure. If we make a chronological summary of this debate, Mr. Speaker, we see that it was the first major debate undertaken by Parliament two years ago, and it was to be expected that the opposition would react vigorously to our proposals, not because they were bad, quite the opposite, but because the opposition did not have its mind set on this type of measure, did not have policies that could strengthen Canadian unity and was not particularly interested in the constitutional issue, patriation or a charter of rights. In other words, the Constitution was not a serious issue in the Progressive Conservative Party's program. As we know, the issue of national unity has never been of major concern to them, and this is probably why they are so used to sitting on your left, Mr. Speaker.

We introduced a very concrete proposal and expected a strong but constructive opposition. However, we were disappointed. What we got was more of an opposite to the process, a superficial opposition, an opposition on form rather than substance, because throughout the whole debate, the Progressive Conservative Party, the official opposition has never brought forth constructive proposals concerning the substance of our resolution, whether in relation to patriation or the Charter of rights itself. Instead, their proposals aimed at gaining more time, at postponing, and this gave other groups than the official opposition the opportunity to make a valid contribution to improve our resolution, and when I say others, I am thinking about the premiers and the Supreme Court of Canada. The Conservatives may say: "Yes, but our delaying action ultimately made it possible for the Supreme Court and the premiers to improve the resolution." Well, as far as I am concerned, that was sheer accident and the Official Opposition does not deserve any credit whatsoever, because it could not possibly predict that some improvement would be made and because the Official Opposition has always indeed refrained from proposing amendments or changes likely to improve the results of our constitutional endeavour and contribute directly to strengthening the country.

Mr. Speaker, what really happened in the constitutional fray is that, ultimately, the government got what it wanted. We now have a Canadian Constitution that was rejected by members of the Official Opposition. We have a Charter of Rights, we have enshrined the principle of the fight against regional disparities, we have a mechanism for the amending formula, and all that thanks to the initiative of this government and in spite of the superficial and impulsive opposition of the Progressive Conservative Party. Subsequently, we have had annual budgets with the related bills that came up for debate and, here again, everything went smoothly even though, in my opinion, we could have achieved the same results under more humane working conditions, with much less antiquated standing orders and in a more dignified manner for the people we represent here in Canada's Parliament.

The only other occasion when we witnessed that negative and destructive approach of the Official Opposition was quite recently, last spring in March, when we debated our national energy policy. There is the enigma, Mr. Speaker, the mystery which I mentioned earlier. Why is it that the Official Opposition did not react and co-operate at the beginning of the session, during the first months of 1980? As a possible explanation, I suggested the fact that it may have been still under the shock of the election defeat. In appearance only, members opposite got a hold of themselves during the constitutional debate, but their approach was superficial. Then the peaceful climate was restored for a while and we were able to pass a number of bills. Finally, the most negative and destructive strategy, the childish and irresponsible bell-ringing incident which we all remember and which made it possible for the government to implement its national energy policy much faster than it could have done otherwise. But we could have managed without that incident, Mr. Speaker. It was an incident that I consider unfortunate and useless, the reaction of an undoubtedly frustrated party, and especially of an immature official opposition party.

Let us briefly go over the facts surrounding the bell-ringing incident and set them in their proper perspective. Hon. members will recall that the government had given notice and introduced an omnibus bill. It was not the first time that an omnibus bill had been introduced in the House. Even the Progressive Conservatives had introduced two omnibus bills in 1979 during their short stay in office, including one concerning Crown corporations with a schedule in which some 89 acts were amended. It was really a general issue that had to do with a substantial number of measures, and it was quite obvious that is was an omnibus bill. We came before the House with an energy bill that had many provisions. Mr. Speaker, never did the other House leaders make a single suggestion to me—and I ought to know—never did anyone from the Official Opposition approach me before the bell-ringing incident to negotiate how we might study the bill. But the Official Opposition opted for a different course of action—I was told to be honest, I am being honest and frank, and I challenge anyone to prove me wrong—the Official Opposition took a decision, and I refer to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who must be somewhere and who knows full well what happened: he rose on a point of order in an attempt to get a ruling from the Speaker of the House about splitting the bill. No luck. The bill was not split, so the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) moved the adjournment of the House, frustrated as he was by the decision of the Chair not to split the bill.

It is then that the bells began to ring and the Progressive Conservatives decided to let them ring. The government could not anticipate it. We did nothing to provoke that childish incident. As I said, it was no doubt an unpremeditated tactic because I would not dare say that the opposition acted in bad faith, it was an irresponsible and childish tactic that was used again on the spur of the moment to stall Parliament as the Official Opposition bogged down further in the mud which it was slinging onto the floor of the House of Commons.

The government, in the most parliamentary manner, without violating the basic principles of the House and Parliament, an institution which we deeply respect, tried to stop that ridiculous ringing of the bells and exercise its right to legislate on energy, which we finally managed to do but unfortunately only after 16 days. However we should not forget that after those 16 days, Mr. Speaker, we concluded an agreement and initiated negotiations, after that ridiculous ringing had come to an end, having undertaken to divide the bill which we would have readily done if it had only been suggested to us. By dividing the bill we obtained a reasonable parliamentary schedule and a time limit for the passage of all bills resulting from the splitting of the omnibus bill.

Finally, on June 10 last, following the bell-ringing incident in mid-March, within less than three months, the government got its entire National Energy Program adopted, which is much more quickly than it took the only energy legislation, the bill on oil and gas that was passed the previous year after being considered, as we all know, for 12 months. We then realized that, from a practical point of view, the policy of the official opposition was hardly reasonable. It is a reaction that can no doubt be explained by the frustration to which I referred earlier but also by a lack of maturity, since in the final analysis the government got its National Energy Program through without agreeing to amendments, because once again the oppositon's position was superficial. They lacked substance, they did not say: The bells will stop if you make such and such a change. No, that was too profound, too intellectual for the people opposite. It was rather a superficial and technical filibustering. We do not like that bill, we want eight. Divide it into eight parts and we will give you what you want in three weeks or three months. Had we known in advance, we would have done it without letting the bells ring, but they wanted to give the public the impression that they were paralysing Parliament and the timing seemed right because we were in a recession and at such times, governments are impopular. They abused the good faith of the public by trying to mix everything up and make believe Parliament could not operate due to the stupidity of the government. Everything went smoothly for the first week, Mr. Speaker, but they soon realized during the second week that public opinion would not tolerate an institution as important as the Canadian Parliament being abused in such a way. Accordingly, at the end of the second week, the Progressive Conservative Party had to give up on all points and allow this institution to resume its proceedings. Thus, the government finally obtained what it wanted much more quickly than expected but as the House Leader, I am sorry that the official opposition chose to rely on such a useless strategy under the circumstances. If only the opposition had raised the issue of the splitting up of the bill at the level of the House B.C. leaders before throwing that bomb on the floor of the House we would have surely come to an agreement and we would have, as in many other cases passed and calmly and constructively discussed a bill on the National Energy Program with hopefully a more serious and substantial contribution from the Official Opposition.

Mr. Speaker, everything I have just said can be summarized and used to describe a certain type of opposition, that is, a superficial opposition, never interested in suggesting solutions or amendments, in improving policies, a reactionary opposition embittered by its defeat in the last election and, as a result, definitely irresponsible and infantile. Mr. Speaker, I have just heard my colleague the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) say "Ho, ho." He is right, and he will certainly recognize that to incapacitate this institution for 16 days, causing the bells to ring in the passageways . . . at least, when he was his party's House leader, he had the good sense never to do that and I am sure that if he had had his way, he would have never had the indecency to start these bells ringing. And when he says "Ho, ho," I agree with him, unless he wants to contradict me, which I doubt.

Mr. Speaker, I say that this is a negative and infantile opposition, and it is unfortunate in the present circumstances, because Canada, a country with tremendous human and material resources, with diverse cultures and regions, is not spared by the economic crisis that is currently affecting all industrialized nations. At the same time, we know that as soon as we see signs of an economic recovery throughout the world, Canada, which has an economic base, will get back on its feet very rapidly bringing back prosperity to every region and every citizen in this country.

During these hard times, the Opposition should be eager to present its views in a constructive fashion without losing political ground. Unfortunately, that is not the case. And do not bring up the matter of the current polls because they do not reflect in any way what is going on in the House of Commons. They are only indications of a temporary discontent, caused by the recession, and they are found everywhere in the world: there is not a single government in the world today that has the support of the people because of economic problems and because of the recession.

But getting back to the sense of responsibility expected from hon. members of the House, I feel that the Opposition should have used every opportunity to deal with this legislation, to suggest amendments in an effort to improve it in order to really help people get over these difficult times and who did not deserve to have its legislative body incapacitated through tactics that were somewhat questionable, infantile and irresponsible. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I regret this type of opposition, and I repeat that there is no cause and effect relationship between what has taken place in this House of Commons—in fact we were more productive than ever before in our past history—and the government's temporary loss in popularity. Quite the contrary, Mr. Speaker; it seems that over the past few weeks, Canadians have finally come to realize the true nature and value of this government and that they have had a change of heart which will make it possible for the government to keep on assuming its responsibilities to ensure their wellbeing, and that they will get back at the Opposition for its destructive attitude over the past few months. I think that in the long run, the effects of this negative attitude will work against the opposition, and I am certain that those members of Parliament who supported the tactics aimed at incapacitating such a respectable institution as the Canadian Parliament, who boldly deprived our society of its essential and fundamental forum of expression, will pay dearly for their complicity in an action that was altogether uncalled for and that brought no practical gain to the official opposition.

[English]

During this session, the House considered three budgets, two economic statements, and passed spending estimates for four fiscal years. The National Energy Program was put in place; major revisions were made to the Bank Act; the national anthem was formally approved; the Canada Post Corporation was created, the Access to Information Act was passed and a huge legislative backlog was cleared up.

Major committee reports were received and special parliamentary task forces reported on alternative energy and oil substitution; the disabled and the handicapped; employment opportunities for the '80s, North-South relations; regulatory reform; a national trading corporation; implementation of the Helsinki Final Act; acid rain; federal-provincial fiscal arrangements; Canadian relations with Latin America and the Caribbean; the Armed Forces reserves; domestic air carrier policy; security and disarmament issues, and several other matters.

I remain convinced that if on the one hand it is true to say that this session has established a record for length, almost 400 sitting days, on the other hand, as parliamentarians, at least on this side of the House, we must be proud to be able to say that it is the most productive session ever. It was able to adopt some 140 bills or government measures including private members' business. It was a session in which we were able to adopt the resolution on the Constitution; the national energy policy; three budgets; two economic statements and the estimates of four different fiscal years. All that put together makes me conclude that in fact if we compare this with previous sessions in the history of the country, it has been far and away the most productive ever.

If we take into consideration the importance of the measures that were debated we can say that it was a record session. The measures have an historic aspect that was most important. As a matter of fact, it was a record session for length, substance and production.

On the other hand, the spirit that animated the debate, or lack of debate for a while, during those two years, three months and a few days, has struck me more than anything else. The need for reform has become more and more obvious. That is why, a few months ago, the government decided to strike a special committee composed of 20 members from both sides of the House. They have started work and will look into changes that could render this institution more relevant and at the same time, we hope, more human and more modern.

I have great hopes for the report that will come from that committee. The way the terms of reference were granted by the House would allow its members who are now hearing witnesses and who will meet during the summer, who will look at previous reports on the subject on parliamentary reform, to come forward with interim reports, if it so desires, that could allow the institution to make experiments. I hope that in the short term we will be able to improve the appearance of the work that is done in this place.

Earlier I described the mood in the House. I described what I consider was the mentality of the official opposition, but trying to set aside partisan views, let me state that I think there is an urgency that the work done by the government and the work done by the opposition—which is hard work in any case—be better perceived by the citizens in all regions of Canada.

I believe that the committee on parliamentary reform will allow us, soon I hope, to be able to achieve that goal and to improve not only the image of parliamentarians in society but to improve the quality of the work we do and improve our capacity to serve Canada better.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that it was most encouraging on this side of the House to bank on unequalled team spirit. Despite the difficult times we experienced during this lengthy first session of the Thirty-second Parliament, government members managed to stick together and assume their responsibilities as parliamentarians. They are to be commended and they deserve my respect and appreciation for their continued support. I would be remiss as well if I did not take this opportunity to underline the constant contribution and exceptionally well done work of my parliamentary secretary, my hon. friend who is here tonight, and to emphasize the co-operation of the House leaders of both opposition parties, in spite of a few hitches along the way. Again, as I said earlier, the results are there, Mr. Speaker, the volume of work done is huge. The number of measures passed by this Parliament during this session is obvious, although this session was an historic one, of course, but what needs to be improved is the spirit of this House, the attitude of hon. members. One important factor that might contribute to raise the standards of debate and to command more respect for both the government's and the opposition's rights would be a little more maturity and seriousness on the part of the Official Opposition. Then we shall be able to improve the public image of this House. Again, I thank and congratulate the support staff of the House of Commons, all our Table officers, the pages and all those who enabled parliamentarians to do their job during the past two years and three months. Mr. Speaker, we are going to adjourn within a few hours, within an hour, it seems, and I wish to make it clear that it is quite exceptional for Parliament to sit this late.

Because of the current special economic conditions, a budget was brought down at the end of June, as we all know, which implied the urgent passage of at least two pieces of legislation, one authorizing the government to obtain the funds it needed to administer the country, and the other authorizing it to implement its anti-inflation policy and to limit salary increases in the civil service. Today we passed the latter, which explains why on this the 4th of August, 1982, we are still in Ottawa, in the House of Commons, debating and discussing. Usually, as we know, the House adjourns in early July to resume its activities around mid-October, a few days after Thanksgiving Day. This year, in view of the August 4 adjournment, we will resume the business of this session on October 27; the recess will thus be shorter by about two weeks than in previous years. Still, it will allow hon. members, once again, to play an important part of their role, that is, meeting their constituents in their respective ridings, listening to the people and also explaining government policies. I am convinced that we are not talking here of a two-month holiday, but rather of work that is different from that which we have been doing here for such a long period of time, as I have just explained.

Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not mention the warm relationship, from a personal and human point of view, which, despite the nature of our debates, existed between the various House leaders this year and last. More particularly, I must stress how deeply enriching and satisfying my contacts and discussions have been with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I feel that, throughout the months when we were called upon to negotiate together and plan the business of the House, the experience, the seasoned parliamentary spirit, the good will, the great human qualities of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spared this institution on several occasions pitfalls that could have harmed the parliamentary spirit. In other words, I want to say publicly that throughout his career and, of course, especially while as government House leader I had to negotiate directly with him, the contribution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for the good of society and in particular the proper functioning of this parliamentary institution has been priceless. I want to take the opportunity, this evening, to express to the hon. member through his party leader—but I see the hon. member has just stepped back into the House—to pay special tribute to him, by expressing my everlasting friendship and admiration. I have the deepest admiration for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am happy to see him here this evening. I wish him the best possible health and the longest possible stay in this House of Commons until the next election.

While emphasizing the exceptional qualities of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I do not want to minimize the good relations I have had and I still have with the other House leaders. Without going into details, I want to say again that communications and human relations are essential to the efficient operation of this institution, and I want to pay tribute to my two fellow House leaders, the member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) and the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). It has also been a pleasure to work with the member for Nepean Carleton (Mr. Baker) when he was House leader for the Conservative Party. It was with these four opposition Houses leaders that we, on this side of the House, had to compromise during this very long session to obtain the extraordinary results I mentioned earlier. I trust that in the future we will be able to improve the mood of the House, to improve the mentality that must prevail in a self-respecting institution and, in conclusion, I should mention that we build great hopes on the reports of the Committee on Standing Orders and Procedure. I believe that such hopes are realistic and I sincerely hope that these pressing changes will come true so that Parliament can become the most respected institution in Canada.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, may I say at the very outset that in spite of what the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) stated in his opening remarks here this evening, one thing is abundantly clear and that is that this country in every respect is in worse shape today than it was when this session started. It is in worse shape economically, and it is rather interesting to note that the minister failed even to acknowledge the state of the Canadian economy when he went through his litany of achievements. He said absolutely nothing about the economy. In terms of the attitude of Canadians, in terms of the negativism that exists in this country and in terms of the divisiveness, the cynicism, the lack of confidence, the frustration, the hopelessness, the despair, the alienation and the regional alienation that exists, there can be no question that we have slipped badly during the course of this session. No amount of rhetoric or justification from the President of the Privy Council will change my mind or the mind of many Canadians in this country about that.

I am not proud of this session, Mr. Speaker. It has been the longest and the most destructive session, clearly the most divisive session that we have ever experienced in our history. It has not been a good session for Canada and it has not been a good session for this institution.

My purpose in rising to speak tonight is to try to identify and review some of the offensive measures and initiatives which this government has taken to cause that. I want not only to identify and deal with some of those offensive issues but, more important, I want to seize upon this opportunity to implore this government, as it prepares for its fall legislative program, to change its course and to change its direction. It must stop the destructive lunacy that has characterized it over the past two years.

The course this government is following and has followed is not only idiotic but it is most dangerous. As a result of its policies and actions, this government is not only destroying important sectors of the Canadian economy, it is destroying the lives and fortunes of individual Canadians throughout this land. It is destroying a once vibrant entrepreneurial spirit that epitomized Canadians from coast to coast, and a growing number of Canadians in all regions of Canada are giving up economically and politically.

As I said in my opening remarks, there is in this country tonight a feeling of hopelessness and despair. I submit to you, sir, and to all hon. members in this House that if this country is going to remain as a cohesive federal unit, then this government must stop attacking one region of the country while it accommodates another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2120)

Mr. Mazankowski: I want to speak tonight as genuinely and as sincerely as I possibly can. I plead with the government to stop and consider what it has done and what it is doing to the country and to Canadians. I urge it to change its course and to change direction, because individual Canadians throughout the country cannot stand by much longer and accept the abuse and the hurt which has been thrust upon them by this government.

In that context I want to speak briefly about the political situation in western Canada. I do not want to sound alarming or hysterical, but I want to signal a warning to the government and to all members of the House of Commons that the separatist forces in western Canada are not dead. The separatist movement is alive. It is working away. It is developing a platform. It is in the process of solving some of its internal problems. It should not be discounted or written off. Perhaps more important is the fact that the western separatist movement is attracting individuals, working men and women across the whole spectrum of society, farmers and ranchers, businessmen, and especially young entrepreneurs who felt that there was a real era of opportunity in western Canada. Many invested heavily, many became involved in business enterprises, and many have seen those businesses collapse and disappear simply with the stroke of a pen and a change of the rules, laws and regulations emanating from the government. There are doctors, lawyers, housewives, teachers, oil executives, managers, economists, professors, and even rodeo riders who are members of the western separatist movement.

An hon. Member: They are a bunch of cowboys.

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, there are a few cowboys. They are fairly knowledgeable people too. I am surprised that that comment would emanate from a member of the New Democratic Party. I do not think there is anything wrong with being a cowboy.

Mrs. Mitchell: Cowpersons.

Mr. Mazankowski: They provide Canadians with a worthy service and excellent beef which we all enjoy from time to time. Many of these individuals who have found a haven in the western separatist movement have never been involved in politics before or associated with political movements. I say that these people who are involved are not radical sensationalists looking for a short burst of attention. The majority of them are concerned, rational and sincere, but most of all are angry about what is happening to Canada, particularly to western Canada.

Mr. McKnight: And they should be.

Mr. Mazankowski: I think the movement was summed up rather well in a recent article which appeared in the Alberta Report on July 26. It was contained in a letter from the publisher entitled, "What the WCC does, matters; why it exists matters more." He pointed out:

> The gathering of some six hundred people for the convention of the Western Canada Concept in Red Deer last week was as extraordinary as it was traditional. It was extraordinary for what it implied. Who could have imagined, say, 24 months ago that such a diverse throng could be assembled in the province of Alberta to declare that, under given conditions, they are ready to break up the country. It was extraordinary also in another way. The rank and file were far more impressive than the leadership. Here was no strident rabble or convocation of kooks. You met doctors, grain growers, lawyers, accountants, cattlemen, housewives, scientists, small businessmen, teachers, executives. It was this populism, of course, that echoed a great tradition. Here, no doubt, were the United Farmers of the twenties, or the first Social Crediters, or the founders of the western CCF, the grass roots of the west, issuing forth to damned well do something, nobody was one hundred per cent sure what.
> What they in fact do may or may not matter, depending on whether they succeed. What does matter, and matters terribly, is why they were there at all. This is of great current concern to the provincial government and, as far as anyone can tell, of no concern whatever to the government at Ottawa.

It is timely to put this on the record as we near the end of this session and to signal to the government and to all Members of Parliament that this movement should clearly indicate to us that there is an unhealthy condition out there. The federal government should heed the warning, if it is really genuinely serious about national unity in the country.

Mr. McKnight: The three government members who are in the House now.

Mr. Mazankowski: I want to say something else which I do not want to have misinterpreted. I say it with genuine sincerity. There is absolutely no question about my commitment and loyalty to this great country of Canada, but I have to say that it is becoming increasingly difficult to defend the federal cause when we have a government which has so viciously attacked and destroyed my part of Canada. In so doing it has weakened the very fabric of the nation. What is most disturbing is that the government is continuing along that same path and in that direction. They do not listen, they do not care.

This plays squarely into the hands of the separatist movement in western Canada. As a matter of fact, the actions of the government are really aiding and abetting the separatist movement. We have seen what has happened in Newfoundland and the recent decisions which have been taken with respect to Nova Scotia, such as the transferral of the naval reserve and the resource debate in Newfoundland. It is quite conceivable that easterners may soon feel the same sense of frustration and alienation.

Let us look at some examples of vicious policies which serve to destroy rather than to build. Let me look at them in the context of the fodder that they provide to the western separatist movement. The President of the Privy Council talked at great length and spoke very glowingly about the achievements in the passage of the National Energy Program. Let us review its objectives. It was to provide security. Well, we are less secure today than we were when the policy was announced. We are more reliant upon foreign oil. It was to provide opportunity. If hon. members go out west they will see what kind of opportunity was provided by the National Energy Program. It was to provide fairness. My gosh, we are paying retail prices at the pumps based upon world prices—and it is more than in the United States—while the wellhead price of oil from Alberta and Saskatchewan is roughly 55 to 60 per cent of the world price. Independent Canadian petroleum companies have been decimated by the National Energy Program. Instead of giving Canadian companies an advantage over their foreign competitors, they have been crippled by unreasonable rates of taxation to provide revenue for a government whose spending has gone out of control, not to mention high interest rates. Foreign companies have foreign incomes on which to survive. Canadian companies have folded and collapsed under the strains of high taxation and the high interest policies of the government. Where are these businesses located? The bulk of them are located in western Canada. The obsession with the accelerated Canadianization program and the thrust of nationalization has seen Petro-Canada grow from a mere window on the industry to a $6.6 billion company which is financed by a 4 cent per gallon surcharge at the expense of all Canadians. Gas is not any cheaper. The fact of the matter is that this country was Canadianizing the oil industry at a rate which our financial abilities could afford.

• (2130)

What happened during the National Energy Program? In the oil resource sector alone, some $9 billion of oil investment capital fled the country. Through this entire process not an additional barrel of oil has been produced. We are more reliant on foreign oil today than we were before. One billion dollars worth of equipment has left this country for the United States. Alsands, Cold Lake and Judy Creek projects have been cancelled. Twenty thousand identifiable jobs in the drilling and service sector of the oil industry have been lost. The government says this is due to world conditions. That is partly true, but what we need to do is examine the comparison between what happened in the United States and Canada over the year 1981. It is important to differentiate the policies of these two countries.

As we know, the National Energy Program imposed nationalization, higher production taxes and discriminatory taxes against foreign investors, and price controls. The Reagan administration took the other course by decontrolling prices, and adopting noninterventionist policies. These changes launched the two countries on two different courses. Investment was encouraged in the United States. Investment into Canada was discouraged.

What has happened? I refer to the Alberta Report of August 2, 1982. That report states that in 1981 the U.S. drilled 80,537 wells, up by almost 16,000. That is a 20 per cent increase. Canada's total in 1981 was 7,186 wells, down from a high of 9,188 in the previous year, which is an approximate 25 per cent reduction. Canada's drilling fleet decreased from 650 before the NEP to 450 afterward. What is worse, Mr. Speaker, is that most of the remaining rigs are preparing to leave for the United States, while 65 per cent of those which remain in Canada are inactive. Those are the figures from that report.

What are the estimates for the future? These are the estimates as provided by a recent survey by the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada. That is the Canadian oil industry. That association has estimated declines of 27 per cent this year, 33 per cent in 1983 and 41 per cent in 1984. This is with respect to exploration and drilling activity. Simultaneously, in the United States, drilling activity is projected to increase by 70 per cent this year and a further 88 per cent in 1983. There you have those estimates. I could go on to give further examples.

What we see happening in Canada as a result of this decline in drilling activity is sheriff sales, receivership sales, public auction sales and bankruptcy sales, one after the other. The papers in western Canada are full of these sales; close-out auctions, receivership auctions, gigantic farm auctions, and sheriff sales.

An hon. Member: And U.S. buyers.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is correct; U.S. buyers with a premium dollar.

Mr. McKnight: Tell them about Lloydminster.

Mr. Mazankowski: I have told them about Lloydminster. There was a large liquidation auction sale which came about as a result of two firms, which had a booming business three years ago, being forced into receivership and ultimate bankruptcy as a result of the National Energy Program. Some $3.5 million worth of equipment, including Cats, cranes, welders, trucks, tractors and trailers, sold for about 30 cents or 40 cents on the dollar, purchased by Americans with their premium dollars. And people wonder why there is no bitterness.

If the government wishes to talk about the world situation, let us see what is happening in Australia. There is an article in Canadian Business, February, 1982, with the heading "Waltzing with drill bits: The Search for Aussie Oil." It says:

> Five years ago, Canadian exploration companies had scarcely considered Australia. Now, our major players down under are punching drill holes all over the map looking for major finds.

Why is that? The reason is that the climate and the policy are conducive to attracting that activity down there. I could go on to quote at length. Therefore, it is not only the result of a world situation. It is a fact that the climate is conducive toward exploration and development in some areas but this country's government has chosen to drive investment and oil research and development as well as other exploration activity away, as it has driven jobs and investment capital out of the country.

We can also consider other areas such as the petro-chemical industry. Here again, the discriminatory and unfair taxes applied to ethane which is used for petro-chemicals has made our fuel stock non-competitive in the world market place. As a result, there are 15 projects in Alberta that have been postponed, cancelled or delayed indefinitely. These projects are worth some $8 billion. I did not bother translating what that means in terms of lost jobs and opportunities.

These conditions are again blamed on the world situation. What has occurred is that the government has failed to acknowledge that it has created the problems through Canadianization taxes, the petroleum gas and revenue tax, the increased prices and the anomalous tax on ethane, not to mention nationalization.

The petro-chemical collapse in Canada is not caused by a world problem. It is a made-in-Canada problem. This problem was created by this government and its vicious penchant for attacking western Canada, a region which stood on the threshold of greatness and opportunity. It is now being destroyed as a result of the deliberate policy aimed at destroying the economic future of western Canada.

Those words should not be considered in any partisan way. It is commonly accepted in western Canada, even by Liberals. I want to quote what a well-known member said about the federal government policies as they relate to western Canada. He was a distinguished member of the House of Commons and is still someone who is distinguished in economic affairs, farming and in the consulting field. His name is Hu Harries. I would like to quote what was said in the Edmonton Journal on August 1, 1982. The article states:

—former Edmonton Strathcona Liberal M.P. and economic consultant Hu Harries sees Canada's recession as being deliberately politically induced by the eastern Liberal establishment, which didn't want political or economic power to shift to the west and saw oil revenues as a way to subsidize federal economic mismanagement.

He is right on.

Mr. Laniel: He was brainwashed.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member opposite said that he was brainwashed. I think the hon. member had the privilege of serving with him—

Mr. Laniel: He was brainwashed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order.

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member who just interjected knows very well that Dr. Hu. Harries has a mind of his own. I should repeat his statement because it is very clear that it is a view which is shared by most western Canadians, including Liberals. My hon. friend who has visited my constituency should come out again to test the water.

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask the hon. member a question? I want to know what the ex-minister of transport does to defend and promote Canadian unity instead of promoting division in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (2140)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. The hon. member for Vegreville has the floor.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am doing that right now because this institution is a place where Members of Parliament have the opportunity to come and speak on behalf of their constituents and their regions. I have simply been laying before this House of Commons a signal and a warning that all is not well out there. I am sorry the hon. member was not in his seat when I started my remarks because I wanted to make it very clear to Your Honour and to other hon. members of the House where my loyalties and commitments lie. Having said that, one should never be ashamed of speaking his mind and telling it like it is. I have attempted to convey to hon. members not only my views and the views of people who have written widely in the west, who are business and community leaders, but, indeed, also the views of former Liberal members of parliament. I certainly did not put those words into Dr. Harries' mouth. He is a man of integrity and high principle.

An hon. Member: He is not a socialist.

Mr. Mazankowski: He is not a socialist, that is right. He is a Canadian, and he is concerned about the vicious destruction which has taken place at the hands of the government as far as western Canada is concerned.

I can give another example of the treatment of our resources. It is rather interesting to see how, just recently under Bill C-108, the government conveniently used an amendment with regard to the National Energy Board to exempt electric power export licences from the borad new powers of the Board. This means that while oil and gas export permits are cancellable without warning by the National Energy Board, the same does not apply to electric power which is exported to the United States. It is precisely this kind of double standard, as contained in Bill C-108, which is creating dissension, division—

An hon. Member: Corruption.

Mr. Mazankowski: —and corruption, as the hon. member says. But it is certainly creating division and frustration as the result of the alienation which is aiding and abetting the separatist cause in western Canada.

We must put Canada first. Our energy resources, whether they be oil, gas, or coal power, are all the same. They are very precious and we need them. If we are to put Canada first— Mr. Speaker, would you ask the hon. member to either direct a question to me or to sit down and listen?

Mr. Laniel: I would like to ask the hon. member if he is not abusing the situation, as I could have when I came here 20 years ago and could not get a francophone to answer me at the door, or get French service in all departments, and saw Quebec forgotten on many issues, but I did not blame it on the west. What you are doing is against the east only, you know. Why do we not fight together for Canada?

Mr. Mazankowski: I am very glad the hon. member asked that question because I certainly have no objections to the advances and progress made in Quebec, particularly the progress around here with respect to the furtherance of bilingualism and the francophone cause. I have absolutely no objection. I simply ask him to listen, because there are no Liberal members in the government from western Canada. This is our only opportunity to present our views.

I am speaking tonight as I would speak to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the whole cabinet. I am simply saying that there are some problems out there, and that they should listen and pay heed. They have an opportunity over the course of the summer to go out and examine, investigate and hopefully reconsider the destructive course they are on.

As I said when we were dealing with energy resources, if we are discussing a Canada policy, then that policy should apply to all energy resources in the same manner. There should not be a double standard. We take offence to that and it is part of the fodder which the western separatist cause is using.

What is unfortunate is that this deliberate anti-west policy has impacted very dramatically and negatively upon the industrial heartland of central Canada. With no drilling, no megaprojects, no exploration, there are no valves, cables, tools, machinery, pipe or steel being used.

Mr. McDermid: Transportation companies are not shipping.

Mr. Mazankowski: Let us consider what has happened to the transportation industry. One of the reasons we moved lots of grain this year is because there is nothing else to ship. It amazes me that the Liberal supporters in central Canada do not get their message through to their MPs. I have really remained convinced that Canada's economic—

Mr. Laniel: What is the position of the west on the Crow rate?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I really expected to complete my speech and listen to other hon. members. I listened very patiently to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). I would be very pleased to listen to my good friend who is heckling me across the way. I respect him, but I wish he would just simply keep his cool for a while. He can certainly respond if he wishes, at a more appropriate time.

To return again to my remarks concerning the National Energy Program, I am convinced and will remain convinced that Canada's economic collapse began with the introduction of the program, and our economy will not recover until there are fundamental changes to that devastating program.

I referred to one example which has served to alienate and frustrate western Canada. I would like to refer to a couple of others. At the outset, one must say that while we spent an exorbitant amount of time dealing with the Constitution, the economy was faltering. Surely our preoccupation with the Constitution at a time when the economy was collapsing around us is clearly part and parcel of the problem we are facing today.

Dealing with the constitutional debate, the attitude of the government, with its coercive tactics, created bitterness and division in the country. It has certainly created anger and confrontation. I say to Your Honour that it will take a long time to heal the wounds. Rather than harmony and goodwill, there is mistrust and bitterness and division. We must simply recall what the Prime Minister intended to do when he brought in the constitutional package. He was going to make two or three different classes of provinces. Some were to have veto powers and others were not. The west was not to be treated with the same equality as the other provinces.

The emergency planning order was another example. Broad powers were delegated to respective ministers of the Crown and so-called emergency. It was unwieldy and frightening. The way in which 20 per cent of the VIA Rail passenger service was dismantled, and particularly the effect on western Canada and the tourist community of Jasper without any reference to Parliament, without any public hearings, unilaterally carried out by a stroke of the pen, is another example. Does one not think that that causes some alarm in western Canada? The hon. member referred to the Crow rate.

Mr. Fulton: I rise on a point of order. I do not mean to interrupt the hon. member, but I realize that there are other hon. members who want to speak and there are only ten minutes left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry. The hon. member's microphone was not on when he spoke and I could not hear him, but perhaps the hon. member would repeat what he said.

Mr. Fulton: I was just pointing out, Mr. Speaker, for the clarification of the hon. member who is speaking, that it is traditional for hon. members on all sides to have an opportunity to speak, and I recognize there are only about ten minutes left in which to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Vegreville has the floor.

• (2150)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the hon. member's point of order was all about. I have the floor and I will maintain the floor until my time is up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, we have heard from the Liberal Party—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I think it is time—

An hon. Member: What about respect for Parliament minorities and all that?

Mr. Fulton: Tell us about goodwill and harmony?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, we have heard from the Liberal Party and I do not know why we have to hear from the Liberal rump, if that is the way they feel about it. I have respect for ths institution and I will abide by the rules. I have certainly not interrupted the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) or any other member of the party.

Mr. Broadbent: I have not had a chance to speak.

Mr. Kempling: He is never here.

Mr. Mazankowski: Most members in this House know that I am a reasonable and moderate person.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I for one do not have to take any lessons from the NDP about behaviour in the House and what is considered to be fair and reasonable. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, this is a very important debate for some of us and—

An hon. Member: Because we care for the west.

Mr. Mazankowski: —and the NDP have had lots of opportunities to make their case in the course of the last couple of days and they will have lots of opportunities tomorrow. The fact of the matter is, it is really amazing, Mr. Speaker, that they did not move to interrupt the minister who spoke over 40 minutes—

An hon. Member: He is their friend.

Mr. Mazankowski: The move to change the statutory freight rate, the Crowsnest Pass freight rates—

An hon. Member: We talked about that.

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, it has been quite a wild and hot debate, but what is very obvious about the debate that is going on out there is that there is a lot of mistrust associated with anything this government does. There is mistrust. Nobody out there trusts the government or believes in it.

We now have forced metric; they call that in western Canada the "Trudeau measurement." Here is something that really strikes at our basic heritage, acres, miles, the way in which our land was surveyed are all part and parcel of our lifestyle. Hectares and litres are a "no-no". Even in Ontario the farmers have lost hundreds of thousands of dollars as a result of their inability to mix their weed chemical; they got mixed up. They could not even phase it in with a dual process. It is forced metric. We now see the forced metric boys wanting to impose it on the cattle industry. Can you imagine selling beef by the kilogram? It is going to be an auctioneer's nightmare.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: As The Financial Post of July 31 said, there has been no case made for metric, and I second that motion.

Let us look at another issue, that of Canagrex. If you look at where the support and the lack of support lies in this particular measure you will find that most farm organizations in western Canada, individuals and groups, are opposed to the concept of Canagrex because they believe it could very well become the Petro-Canada of agriculture. They call it an Ottawa food grab, and they contend that the powers to be granted are so sweeping it could become another Petro-Canada; all-pervasive and unstoppable. Lubor Zinc calls it "Agriculture Can"; Lubor Zinc calls it "food for the bureaucrats". It is rather strange that in the communist countries where this kind of philosophy is rampant, they cannot feed themselves; and we are heading in that direction. That is what is startling westerners. We do not want to see our food industry taken over by the bureaucrats and by government.

What about the western development fund? That cynical vanishing fund started out at $4 billion in 1980. Today some $200 million has been pledged. Mr. Olson from the other place was in Edmonton a couple of days ago and he said, "Well, we have only got $200 million committed, but three more budgets and three more years and we will have the $4 billion." So much for that.

At the same time we have bailouts in some regions and enterprises that have failed in other regions. We have seen a new chapter emerged after the June 28 budget. This past month we have witnessed another phase of this government's unfair and manipulative tactics, and many of us in this House recognize that the central focus of this government's economic development policy is for it to become deeply involved in the Canadian enterprise system, either directly through Crown corporations, or indirectly, and perhaps even more potently, through leverage, through manipulation, through sticks and carrots, through grants and subsidies, loan guarantees, letters of comfort and blatant political patronage in some cases. They have developed a philosophy of deciding who gets and who does not, who will be the loser and who will be the winner. When we are considering some of these examples, which smack of favouritism, political patronage and sweetheart deals, we have to look no further than the example of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray)—Mr. Amazing Gray—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!
